In writing "The Thief on the Cross" (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.), Mrs. Harold Gorst no doubt desired to shock her readers; but perhaps the most serious shock imparted by her story is one which she did not design. From p. 15 leaps out the phrase "by tacit though unspoken consent," and leaves us in benumbed wonderment as to what Mrs. Gorst takes "tacit" to mean. A certain numbness, indeed, is produced by the whole clever story. The author hits too hard and too repeatedly. We become sure that her heroine will never be allowed a chance of happiness this side of the grave, and cease to care about the particular form of her misfortunes. Doubtless all the incidents recorded have occurred to somebody, but not all to the same person. Monotony rather than lurid adventure marks the general course of the working woman's daily life. The appalling picture of the jam factory, for instance, while not actually impossible, is hardly typical; and although the treatment of Esher Miller may have had some counterpart in real life, it can hardly have taken precisely the form described. Moreover, the speech of the characters is not the true Cockney. The stolen spoons of the matutinal burglar may be forgiven for "rattling some"; criminals of all lands are apt to emigrate, and he may have hailed from the States; the idiom of the native practitioner would be "a bit." A London child does not say "Ye do act funny"; "beyave" is her verb. Nor would Mrs. Ridgefoote speak of "me couch stuffed with real 'orse 'air w'ich me mother give me an' on w'ich my little Tommy died." Ladies of her standing employ "that" and "what" by way of relative pronouns, and their prepositions invariably succeed the verb. Not that Mrs. Gorst's narrative lacks touches of true observation—there are plenty of them; but the perspective is wrong, and the picture is too much from the standpoint of the outsider.

* * *

Miss Netta Syrett has the art of finding original situations. Her new novel, "Anne Page" (Chatto & Windus, 6s.), is as much off the beaten track as "The Child of Promise" was. To tell the story would be unfair, although the story is not the vital thing. The essence of the book lies in the development of an unusual and beautiful personality, the charm of which is brought home most successfully to the reader. At first sight the narrative seems awkward, going, as it does, backwards and forwards in a manner that generally indicates the hand of a novice. For once, however, this method is the right one. By means of it we see at the same time the ultimate Anne and the influences that have helped to make her. The central thesis, indeed, might bear a good deal of debate, but the debatable points are seriously and delicately treated, and the book as a whole is a good piece of work—deliberate, well digested, and artistic.

* * *

It is time that people in novels gave up losing their memories. Especially must Miss Moberly be warned that no character of hers must ever do so again. In "A Tangled Web" a heroine forgot that she had married or even seen a certain man; now in "Angela's Marriage" (Ward, Lock, 6s.), a hero forgets that he has married or even seen a certain woman. The repetition is aggravated by the circumstance that in both instances the couples parted on their wedding days. Miss Moberly should remember that she has many devoted readers who do not share in the liability to fits of oblivion that besets the children of her imagination.

* * *

There is a novel of Mr. Richard Pryce's which deals with much the same theme as Mr. Cosmo Hamilton's "Keepers of the House" (Long, 6s.), and of which, in reading the latter, it is difficult not to think. In both stories the wife of a childless nobleman, abetted by her husband,

BOOKSELLERS.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 93, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
[And at READING and GUILDFORD.]
MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.
Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.
School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'
BOOKSELLERS.
NEW AND SECOND-HAND.
All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

BOOKS. BOOKS. BOOKS.
Rare and curious Books for the collector. First Editions. Court Memoirs Medical, Occult, &c. Out of Print Books and everything that's a book supplied. No matter when published. State wants. 100,000 books on sale. Catalogues free.
HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.
BOOKS WANTED. First editions of all kinds. Sporting, Naval, Military Coloured Plates by Alken, Cruikshank, Rowlandson, and others. Special list of 3,000 wanted. LIBRARIES PURCHASED.

406 pages, 8vo, cloth, 2s. post free.
HEAVEN AND HELL:
Things Heard and Seen.
By EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.
JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER wrote:—"There is one grand and beautiful idea underlying all Swedenborg's revelations or speculations about the future life. His remarkably suggestive books are becoming familiar to the reading and reflecting portion of the community."
LONDON: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury St.

SECOND IMPRESSION.
Towards a Social Policy
SUGGESTIONS FOR
CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.
By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."
—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION
Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

STUDIES IN CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE
By JAMES DRUMMOND, M.A., LL.D., D.Litt.
(Late Principal of Manchester College, Oxford.)
Demy 8vo, 536 + xxiv. pp., 10s. 6d. net.

The Contents include:—The Rights and Limitations of the Intellect, The Moral Nature and Revelation, The Religious Element in Man, The Bible, The Church, Primary Conceptions of God, The Doctrine of the Trinity, Agency and Attributes of God, Doctrine of Man, Reconciliation, The Person of Christ, The Work of Christ, Means of Grace, Rise and Progress of Religion in the Individual.

"Will be read with almost equal interest by those who agree and those who do not agree with his conclusions."—Spectator.
"For its scholarship, its general reasonableness, and, not least, for its admirable temper, this work deserves to be warmly welcomed by students of theology."—Christian World.
"His book will command the respect of every school of theological thought."—Manchester Guardian.
"No theologian of the day has given more convincing proof of the possession of an open mind."—Westminster Gazette.

PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

NEW VOLUME COMMENCING.
2s. 6d. net—2s. 9d. post free.
JULY NUMBER NOW READY.
THE HIBBERT JOURNAL
Yearly Subscription, 10s. per annum post free.

"It supplies a meeting-ground for divers school of theological thought. The reader who follows it with attention keeps himself abreast of the movements of the day—with what Roman theologians modernists, and anti-modernists, Anglicans of the two similar schools, and the representatives of various independent communions are thinking."—Spectator

CHIEF CONTENTS JULY NUMBER.
PLURALISM AND RELIGION. By Prof. WILLIAM JAMES.
CIVILISATION IN DANGER. By RENÉ-L. GERARD.
SCIENCE AND THE PURPOSE OF LIFE. By Dr. FRIDTJOF NANSEN
THE RELIGIONIST AND THE SCIENTIST. By the Rev. G. A. JOHNSTON ROSS.
"AN APPEAL TO THOSE AT THE TOP"—AND SOMETHING MORE. By Sir EDWARD RUSSELL.
THE RIGHT TO CONSTRAIN MEN FOR THEIR OWN GOOD. By Prof. W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE.
RELIGION AND OUR SCHOOLS. By Prof. JOHN DEWEY.
ENLIGHTENED ACTION THE TRUE BASIS OF MORALITY. By Prof. A. H. LLOYD.
THE ROMANTIC ELEMENT IN THE ETHICS OF CHRIST. By STANLEY GERALD DUNN.
THE PROBLEM OF IMMORTALITY. By Prof. RUDOLF EUCKEN.
THE RELIGION OF THE SENSIBLE AMERICAN. By President DAVID STARR JORDAN.
THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND AND ITS FORMULA. By the Rev A. J. CAMPBELL.
THE BURDEN OF LANGUAGE IN RELIGION: A CATHOLIC STUDY. By W. J. WILLIAMS.
Discussions, Reviews, Bibliography of Recent Literature.
WILLIAMS and NORGATE,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

Williams and Norgate.

JUST READY.—Crown 8vo, Cloth, 350 pp., 5s.
ANGLICAN LIBERALISM.
By TWELVE CHURCHMEN. Prof. F. C. BURKITT, Dr. HASTINGS RASHDALL, Prof. PERCY GARDNER, Sir C. T. DYKE ACLAND, Dr. A. CALDECOTT, Dr. W. D. MORRISON, Rev. A. L. LILLEY, &c.

"This is a stimulating volume, and we are glad to see an able body of writers uniting to claim the free atmosphere as the condition of spiritual progress."—Westminster Gazette.

JUST READY.—Crown 8vo., 350 pp., 5s.
THE FUNDAMENTAL TRUTHS OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION.
By R. SEEBERG, Professor of Systematic Theology in Berlin.
Sixteen Lectures delivered before the Students of all Faculties in the University of Berlin.

JUST READY.—336 pp., 5s. net; 5s. 4d. post free.
DE PROFUNDIS CLAMAVI
And other Sermons.
By JOHN HUNTER, D.D. (Glas.), Minister of Trinity Church, Glasgow

WILLIAMS and NORGATE,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

successfully presents her illegitimate child as his heir, but the treatment of this incident varies enormously in the two. In the earlier the woman was vulgar, uneducated, and greedy, the motives of the husband were plausible, and the interest lay in the ultimate fate of the inheritance; in Mr. Hamilton's not only is the woman the central sympathetic figure, but her action is suggested and fostered by her father and by her uncle, a priest. Even readers who are not particularly squeamish may be pardoned for finding the situation thus presented repulsive.

* * *

It is not quite easy to see why Mr. Gurner Gillman's novel, "A Suburban Scandal" (Greening, 6s.), should be such agreeable reading as it undoubtedly is. The style is not distinguished, the story is not new, and we are never deeply excited as to its issue. But we read, and find ourselves liking to read. Probably the excellent construction has something to do with it. Then the touch is light, the persons, though only slightly sketched, are sketched truly, and the whole is suffused by a most pleasant kindliness of spirit. It leaves a good taste.

* * *

Mr. Vincent Brown is perhaps the most irritating novelist of our day. Talent—even considerable talent—is perceptible, but his work, especially in his later books, is always out of focus. He sees human life from some distorting angle, as a monk might see it who never left his convent, and had framed himself a world from the reports in stray newspapers. "The Last Shore" (Chapman & Hall, 6s.) has his usual faults: the unreal, incalculable people, the unnecessarily emphatic wording, the pontifical tone and the disjointed plan. It is also far, far too long. Of its ninety-four or ninety-five thousand words at least twenty thousand would be better away.

* * *

"Love's Shadow," by Ada Leverson (Grant Richards, 6s.), contains an extremely thin thread of commonplace story eked out by large slices of irrelevant and entirely delightful caricature. Only a woman could have produced this minute and malicious study of the empty and egoistic husband and the tolerant, but perfectly clear-sighted, wife. Farce it is, of course, but farce that rests upon fundamental truths, so that many and many a married man would be unable to read the parable of Bruce Ottley without hearing the words of Nathan in his own ears. A writer who can draw like this should abandon the conventional love story, and devote herself to the humorous study of domestic life.

* * *

Few things are more difficult than to write a romance of the future in which the individual fortunes of the personages are of the remotest interest to the reader. That feat Mr. Ellison Harding has accomplished in "The Woman Who Vowed" (Fisher Unwin, 6s.), a story which clearly comes from America, and which, it may be suspected from a parenthesis on its title page, once bore the much better name of "The Demetrian." The future community, half Socialist, half Platonic, is very credibly presented; if only the characters were really alive the novel would be a very remarkable one, and the adventures which now are interesting would be enthralling. But new institutions are more easily depicted than a new stage of human development; and it must regretfully be acknowledged that Mr. Harding's people are as purely conventions as are the harlequin and columbine of the old pantomime.

* * *

"Dominy's Dollars," by B. Paul Neuman (Murray, 6s.), ought to be a very good novel, but somehow just fails of being so. We do not receive the intended impression of inevitability; we feel the author hounding on the unfortunate hero to his fate; especially we do not believe that Sadie Walder ever went into a convent. The portraits of Baskervil and of his daughter are admirable, and at least one reader is perfectly convinced that, if Dominy did really lose Sadie, he eventually married Serena Baskervil, and found great comfort in the marriage. Dominy's creator, however, has other schemes, and drives him on remorselessly to a solitary death.

* * *

"Armadin: A Tale of Old Winchester," by Alfred Bowker (Sir Joseph Causton & Sons, 2s. 6d. net), is not a novel for the adult. Its artless composition, deficiency of characterisation, and wearisome verbosity are not to be patiently endured by readers who have outgrown the age at which brigands, coats of mail, and mysterious disappearances still arouse a thrill. To the young the book might be both acceptable and useful. It is good for children to be reminded that they had romantic ancestors, and it is also good that they should meet with words beyond the limits of the playground vocabulary. For the nursery, indeed, whose denizens are apt to have a lingering faith in witches, Mr. Bowker's witch, with her attendant crocodile, might be too horrible; but "Armadin" would do well on the schoolroom shelf. It is to be hoped, however, that no boy or girl will learn from it to say: "Sufficient reason enough," or "The last and final stand."

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

A little book of a hundred pages, "Mr. Gladstone at Oxford, 1890," by C. R. L. F. (Smith, Elder, 2s. 6d. net), is a very charming commemoration of Mr. Gladstone's visit to Oxford in 1890 as Honorary Fellow of All Souls. He was made free of, what he called in the charming letter in which he invited himself, "rooms, commons, Hall and Chapel." He clearly took immense pleasure in the visit, delighting everybody he met, and being delighted himself. The present writer happened to meet him shortly after his sojourn and he was still full of it, gravely censorious of the one new feature in University life of which he disapproved and which he somewhat ungallantly described, in his rich, deep-sounding voice, as "a plague" o' women. C.R.L.F. and other Dons who contribute their reminiscences to this most readable volume unite in fixing on those characteristics of Mr. Gladstone which would naturally come to full flower in his visit to Oxford, his strong Conservative tendencies, more especially in matters of ritual and custom, his simplicity of mind and quaint diversity of interests, the splendour of his appearance, and the kind of regal courtesy of his speech and personal habit. For example, he was much shocked at the spectacle of men promenading "the High" in boating costume. He said that in his day men only walked up the High Street "in the most careful attire." Moreover, in his own youth, in the average Union audience, dozens of men could not have been dressed for £30, whereas in 1890 he did not see a man who could not have been dressed for £10. It is curious that he ignored the obvious reason—namely, that modern Oxford had drawn its fresh supplies from far wider sources than the families who filled it with the "dandies" and "bloods" of the 'twenties and 'thirties. He thought the progress of Socialism alarming, and that the upper classes were largely responsible for it. The reason is not explained, but we have no doubt that Mr. Gladstone considered the extreme luxuriousness of living of the rich responsible for the growth of Socialism among the poor. While accepting democracy, he also thought a wide franchise was not an advantage. The great man drew freely from the almost incredible stores of his memory. He mixed his wines, as was his old-fashioned custom, drank port, brown sherry, and claret, read the great twenty-first chapter of Revelations "very simply, with his broad rolling Lancashire accent," charmed the men who hated his politics, and told many good stories. We quote one on a famous subject, which, we believe, was a favorite one with the great man—namely, the Duke of Cambridge's habit of swearing:—

> "Lord Mark Kerr had sworn at some troops at a review before the Queen. The Queen sent for the Duke of Cambridge and said he must reprimand Lord Mark, which the Duke did as follows: 'Look here, Mark, H.M. heard you swear, and she said she was damned if she'd stand it.'"

Altogether this little book is a perfect piece of painting in miniature.

* * *

Many people may feel that a bulky volume which aims at overthrowing the traditional authorship of the Shakespearian plays may safely be neglected. The affair is, they will say, a chose jugée, and, in any case, since we have the plays themselves, what does it matter who wrote them? This impatience is natural, but we would recommend all who care for Elizabethan literature to conquer it and read "The Shakespeare Problem Restated," by Mr. G. G. Green-

FROM MESSRS. GREENING'S LIST.

The Authoritative Work on the Subject.

EDUCATION, PERSONALITY AND CRIME.

By ALBERT WILSON, M.D. With about 100 Illustrations, demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

The author makes a new departure in suggesting that degeneracy forms as distinct a class as insanity. As a scientific basis he gives a full analysis of the brain of a degenerate who was a murderer. There are many microphotographs to prove his case. If later observers support this view, it will form quite a novel feature not only in pathology, but also in sociology and in the medico-legal aspect of crime.

Education, Responsibility, and Empire-building each occupy a chapter, while the subject of multiple personality and the sub-ego receives special attention. The author details one case, already published, which he watched for thirteen years, and also a second case recently brought under his notice, besides enumerating several other cases from various sources, both at home and abroad.

THE BOOK OF THE STUART PERIOD.

THE ROYAL HOUSE OF STUART.

By SAMUEL COWAN, J.P. Two Vols. Demy 8vo., cloth, £2 2s. net.

"A work of great historical research, throwing considerable light on many points, especially on the precursors of the Stuart Sovereigns, the High Stewards of Scotland, and their progenitors."—Morning Post.

"A valuable contribution to English history."—Daily Telegraph.

A POET OF PROMISE.

A PAINTER'S PASTIME.

By MARGARET THOMAS. Price 3s. 6d. net.

SOME LATEST AND BEST FICTION.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SCARLET PIMPERNEL."

BEAU BROCADE. By the Baroness Orczy. 6s.

A THRILLING STORY OF FRANCE IN THE TIME OF THE TERROR.

LEROUX. By the Hon. Mrs. Walter Forbes. 6s.

A POWERFUL YET HUMAN STORY FROM THIS POPULAR WRITER.

THE CARDINAL AND LADY SUSAN. By Lucas Cleeve. 6s.

NOT UNWORTHY TO RANK WITH DEFOE'S MASTERPIECE.

ROLLIN STONE By Ernest Suffling. 6s.

A SUCCESSION OF THRILLS.

ZOE'S REVENGE. By M. Y. Halidom. 6s.

A CAPITAL EXAMPLE OF THIS WRITER'S ART.

THE NEW GALATEA. By Samuel Gordon. 6s.

THE ADVENTURES OF A "DOUBLE" AND THE CONSEQUENCES

THE PLACE TAKER. By Peter Earlston. 6s.

SOUTH AFRICA—AS IT REALLY IS.

BRENDAVALE. By E. Black. 6s.

A STIRRING STORY OF THE SEA, & A DELIGHTFUL HEROINE

THE BLUE OCEAN'S DAUGHTER. (with Vignette by Lewis Baumer). By Cyrus Brady. 6s.

A COMEDY OF SUBURBIA—WITTY YET KINDLY.

A SUBURBAN SCANDAL. By Gurner Gillman. 6s.

THE STORY OF A LOST CITY IN THE DESERT.

DRELMA. By George Whitley Ward. 6s.

A VIVID DESCRIPTION OF TURKEY AND ITS PEOPLE.

A KNIGHT ERRANT IN TURKEY. By Arthur Oakstone. 6s.

THE ADVENTURES OF A "GRASS WIDOW."

MRS. FITZMAURICE ON LEAVE. By Gabrielle Fitzmaurice, 3s. 6d.

With frontispiece by DUDLEY TENNANT.

A GRAPHIC DESCRIPTION OF LIFE IN BURMAH.

THE AVA MINING SYNDICATE. By Cecil Lowis. 6s.

TREATS OF A SMALL TOWN IN THE WESTERN STATES.

GOD IN SAN DAM. By F. Blount Mott. 6s.

"THE BONNIE PURPLE HEATHER,"

HEATHER O' THE RIVERS. By W. Harold Thomson. 6s.

WHO IS QUINION?

For an answer to the above question you should read

THE PRODIGAL CITY.

By TRISTRAM COUTTS. 6s.

Which is a scathing exposure of MUNICIPAL SOCIALISM, and of which "The Academy" says: "The portrait of Quinion, the Labour Leader, is likely to arouse most irritation. Labourites and Socialists are most sensitive nowadays, and the character of Quinion will not be allowed to pass unchallenged, for the very reason that there is a strong suspicion that it is true to life. 'The Prodigal City' is well worth reading."

A BOOK OF MORE THAN EXCEPTIONAL MERIT.

WORKERS IN DARKNESS.

By HARRIS BURLAND, Author of "The Financier," "Love the Criminal," &c.

Price Six Shillings. At all Libraries and Bookshops.

In his latest novel Mr. Harris Burland tackles the subject of heredity not in the dry, official, scientific fashion, but, on the contrary, he offers his readers a story free from technicalities and powerful in human interest.

NOW READY.—A new and cheaper edition of

"OSCAR WILDE: The Story of an unhappy friendship."

By ROBT. H. SHERARD. Cloth bound with several portraits. ONE SHILLING NET.

NO ONE VISITING CORNWALL SHOULD BE WITHOUT

FROM ST. IVES TO LAND'S END.

in which Mr. FOLLIOTT-STOKES

Vividly describes the beautiful, but little known, Coast and Moorland district stretching from St. Ives to Land's End. Many of the excellent pictures by Mr. J. C. DOUGLAS represent views which have not hitherto been photographed and add much to the value of the work. It is a handy little volume for the pocket, and will be found of the greatest interest to tourists and visitors to West Cornwall. It is strongly bound in cloth, and the price is ONE SHILLING NET.

Complete catalogue and specimen copy of "The Imp," a bright little journal dealing with literary and other matters, sent on receipt of postcard.

GREENING & CO., LTD., 91, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

wood, M.P. (Lane, 21s. net.). For Mr. Greenwood is no faddist. He evidently does not believe that the plays were written by "that lout from Stratford," to use the phrase in which an accomplished lawyer once described their reputed author. But in supporting this view he gives evidence of a wide and close study, a critical temper, and a general mastery of his subject which may not carry conviction but must at least compel attention. Indeed, we doubt whether the case has ever been stated more persuasively or with greater force. It would be impossible in a short notice to deal with arguments upon which Mr. Greenwood relies in maintaining his theory that the great Elizabethan dramatist was not Shakspere (Mr. Greenwood uses this spelling to denote the Stratford player) but a mysterious Shakespeare upon whose identity he does not pronounce, though we cannot help feeling that he believes him to be Bacon. Although, taken separately, these arguments do not amount to much, they have an undoubted cumulative force. Take, for instance, the argument on which Judge Webb laid so much stress. "Love's Labour's Lost" is admittedly one of the earliest of the Shakespearian plays. Yet it shows an extraordinary knowledge of fashionable society and the ways of the Court; it gives evidence of wide reading, including some knowledge of Spanish and Italian proverbs. Coleridge says the blank verse has nothing to equal it but that of Milton, and Mr. Swinburne calls it "the speech of gods"; Mr. Sidney Lee says it contains much sound philosophy clothed in masterly rhetoric. How, then, could such a play be written by a young man fresh from Stratford? And this is but one of the many telling arguments brought forward by opponents of the traditional authorship. We cannot help admitting that they prove that there is a mystery of some sort connected with the plays. Where these opponents break down, we think, is when they come to deal with the positive evidence there is for connecting the plays with the Stratford player or when they attempt to explain the reasons that kept the real author (in their view) from claiming his own work. We would, however, advise all interested in this subject to consult Mr. Greenwood's pages. They will find there many hard knocks given to champions of the orthodox view. But they will be bound to admit that Mr. Greenwood has produced a carefully reasoned, scholarly, and interesting book. For our part, while still preserving our belief in "the Stratford yokel," we are quite ready to allow that there is "a Shakespeare problem."

* * *

Mr. F. S. Parry, in the short preface which he contributes to "The King's Customs," by Mr. Henry Atton and Mr. Henry Hurst Holland (Murray, 10s. 6d. net), tells us that the authors' task was rendered doubly difficult from the scarcity of ancient departmental records. The burning of the central Customs Office in the Great Fire and the negligent way in which registers and letter-books were stored in the out-post custom-houses, explain this scarcity. But in spite of this dearth of material, the authors have succeeded in writing a useful and informing history of British maritime revenue. Beginning as far back as Saxon times, Customs legislation and "practice" is traced down to the beginning of the nineteenth century. All important statutes are specified, and the interest is heightened by the inclusion of a number of Customs incidents. The most striking of these belong to the reigns of the first two Georges, a period which the authors designate as one "of frantic restrictions and fearless smuggling." A concluding chapter entitled "Customs Literati" gives brief accounts of Chaucer, Congreve, John Dennis, and Adam Smith, all of whom were Custom House officials, though Congreve's post as one of the five under-searchers in the Port of London was a sinecure. Full lists of authorities are added to each chapter, and there is an appendix of illustrative documents. Messrs. Atton and Holland are to be congratulated on the satisfactory way in which they have carried out a piece of research requiring a large amount of labor and application.

* * *

Probably no better authority than Mr. W. A. Baillie-Grohman could have been chosen for writing the book on "Tyrol" (Black, 6s. net). He has lived many years in the country, and studied its geography, its people, and its history; he retains for it an affection that is only clouded by his foreboding of what it may become when tourist agencies have worked their will upon it, as they have already done in the case of Switzerland. He has something of the old resident's detestation of the tripper, and his observations on the Swiss people's exploitation of their scenery are almost bitter in their strength. His comparison, too, of the Tyrolese peasant with his degenerate brother of the adjacent land is so unflattering to the latter as to seem a little unjust. But his facts are undoubtedly trustworthy, and if we accept his point of view, which is that of the sincere nature-lover not less than of the sportsman and mountaineer, there is little fault to be found with his opinions. Under his guidance we enter the Tyrol from the east at Kufstein, and, following the Munich-Innsbruck line along the Lower Inn valley, pass through Kitzbuhel, Rattenberg, Schwaz, and come to the capital. A chapter is devoted to Innsbruck. Thence a series of literary excursions lead us through the Upper Inn valley to the Arlberg, over the Brenner Pass to Brixen, and into the country of the Dolomites, the concluding chapter dealing with the southern Tyrol. There are many halts on the way, for the author has much to tell of a sympathetic people and their customs, of old time castles perched on high hills, of natural phenomena, and of his own experiences on mountain and in valley. The account of his mid-winter ascent of the Gross Glockner is of thrilling interest; excellent, also, are his pages on the Dolomites, particularly on that part of this curiously fascinating district where a measure of primitiveness still stays. In Mr. E. Harrison Compton he has a gifted artistic collaborator. Mr. Compton, like Mr. E. T. Compton, who created a sensation with a glacier picture at the Academy two or three years ago, has specialised in Alpine scenery, and with a broad, flowing technique and strong, clear color, interprets his romantic subjects with vigour, refined by tenderness. We have seen but few book illustrations in which the transparent quality, which is half of the water-color medium's beauty, was as well reproduced as it is in these.

* * *

The lavish display of really beautiful photographic illustrations should suffice to attract the general reader to "Motor Tours in Wales and the Border Counties" (Hodder & Stoughton, 5s. net). Mrs. Rodolph Stawell is responsible for the text, and the motor tour she describes appears to have started in Shropshire, to have embraced practically the whole of Wales with the exception of Angelsey, and to have ended in the valley of the Wye with Hereford, Monmouth, and Chepstow. The stirring history of Wales, and more particularly that of the Welsh Marches, has been copiously chronicled by writers, from William of Malmesbury to George Borrow. Giraldus the Welshman, Leland, and Camden provide a rich store of information anent medieval times; Lockhart is among other historians, while Lady Guest's translation of the "Mabinogion" has rendered the tale of Welsh folklore accessible to the many. With the aid of profuse extracts from this mass of material, Mrs. Stawell has produced a very readable book, much of the scenic description being happier and more intimately observed than one might expect from her method of seeing the country—a cheering proof that all motorists are not solely concerned with the car and the corners, or invariably view nature through goggles. Her narrative, however, shows one symptom of inexperience rather too plainly. She is apt in places to mistake a labored flippancy and a forced facetiousness for lightness of style, with results that alienate one's sympathy at the very points where it is most important to hold it.

* * *

The first of three volumes called "The English People Overseas: a History," by Mr. A. Wyatt Tilby, has been issued by Mr. Francis Griffiths. It covers the period from the beginnings of British colonisation in the fifteenth century to the overthrow of Napoleon in 1815. Mr. Tilby makes judicious use of the recognised authorities of which he gives useful lists, he writes soberly, and, on the whole, impartially, but we are inclined to believe that so vast a theme can hardly be dealt with to advantage by any one writer. However, as a book of reference Mr. Tilby's volume has its uses, though the number of facts that have to be crowded into the space at his disposal are not accompanied by a due proportion of significant comment. The value of the work for reference will be much greater when the third volume makes

LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING COMPANY, LIMITED.

ESTABLISHED IN 1836.

CAPITAL - £8,000,000, in 100,000 Shares of £80 each.
Paid-up Capital, £2,000,000. Reserve Fund, £1,600,000.

Directors.

Hon. SIR ERIC BARRINGTON, K.C.B.
JOHN ANNAN BRYCE, Esq., M.P.
JOHN JAMES CATER, Esq.
ERNEST H. CUNARD, Esq.
Right Hon. VISCOUNT GOSCHEN.
C. SEYMOUR GRENFELL, Esq.
CHARLES JOHN HEGAN, Esq.
WILLIAM E. HUBBARD, Esq.
SIR THOMAS JACKSON, BART.
WM. McKEWAN, Esq. (Honorary Director).
OSWALD CECIL MAGNIAC, Esq.
WILLIAM G. RATHBONE, Esq.
CHARLES J. CATER SCOTT, Esq.

Auditors.

HENRY GRANT, Esq. THOMAS HORWOOD, Esq.
Hon. STUART PLEYDELL-BOUVERIE.

Head Office Manager—HERMAN RICHARD WYATT.
Deputy Head Office Manager—FREDERICK JAMES BARTHORPE.
Country Manager—WILLIAM GEORGE GRIBBLE.
Chief Inspector—FRANK WILLIAM HOWETT.
Chief Accountant—THEOPHILUS JAMES CARPENTER.
Secretary—EDGAR FRANCIS ROBINSON.

Head Office: 21, LOMBARD STREET, E.C.
Foreign Exchange Office—80, Cornhill, E.C.

265 Branches in London and Country.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened on the usual terms. Facilities are given Customers at any Branch for the transfer of money to or from any other Branch.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.—Sums of £10 and upwards are received on deposit at interest, subject to notice of withdrawal, or by special agreement, in accordance with the usual custom.

PURCHASE AND SALE of Stocks and Shares effected.

DIVIDENDS, ANNUITIES, &c., received.

THE AGENCY OF FOREIGN AND COUNTRY BANKS is undertaken, and every description of Banking business transacted.

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT.

CURRENCY DRAFTS, CIRCULAR NOTES and LETTERS OF CREDIT are issued, and TELEGRAPHIC TRANSFERS made to all parts of the World.

APPROVED FOREIGN DRAFTS are purchased and Collections undertaken.

DOCUMENTARY CREDITS are established, and every facility given for the handling of Documents to or from Abroad.

The Officers of the Bank are bound to secrecy.

MIDLAND RAILWAY

THE BEST ROUTE FOR Comfortable Travel
AND Picturesque Scenery
TO AND FROM THE
PRINCIPAL TOWNS AND HOLIDAY RESORTS OF GREAT BRITAIN & NORTH OF IRELAND

Send a Post Card to any Midland District Superintendent, or Station Master, or Thos. Cook & Son's Offices, or to Mr. J. ELLIOTT, Superintendent of the Line, Derby, for Pocket Time Tables, Guides, &c.

W. GUY GRANET, General Manager.
DERBY.

UNDERWOOD VISIBLE TYPEWRITER

The Machine you will eventually buy

Every character in sight from Date to Signature

The only strictly high-grade visible writer

Especially Adaptable for Invoicing

UNDERWOOD TYPEWRITER CO., 120, Queen Victoria St., E.C.

it appearance since it will contain a complete index and a bibliography.

* * *

The title of E. V. B.'s collection of essays, "The Peacock's Pleasaunce" (Lane, 5s. net), is a charming one, but we are unable to discover any connection between the title and the contents. We took it up expecting to find a series of essays dealing with English gardens, but E. V. B. takes us as far afield as Banffshire and Lucerne, and ends up by a couple of chapters on art education. Her book is difficult to describe. It contains a dozen essays, most of them describing some aspect of nature written in a pleasant and graceful but rather self-conscious style. Judged as a revelation of personality the essays have charm, but we cannot help feeling that they were written because the author wished to make a book, and not because she had something definite to say.

* * *

There is an American atmosphere about Mr. W. P. Warren's "Thoughts on Business" (Eveleigh Nash, 1s. net), but the British reader will have no difficulty in digesting them. The little manual contains many shrewd counsels for those about to embark on a commercial career, whether as employers or employees; the author is clearly one who, in the course of a strenuous and successful life, has found time to think out many of the fundamental principles of business ability. The book shows insight into human character as well as sound business common sense.

* * *

The Midland Railway Company send us a number of pamphlets describing the places of interest and beauty spots served by their system. Those dealing with Scotland and the new route to Ireland are particularly attractive, and we can recommend holiday-makers who are in any doubt as to where to go for the summer to send to the Company for a selection of these little books.

* * *

A Novel Reader's Guide.—"Jack Spurlock—Prodigal." By George Horace Lorimer (Murray, 6s.). A lively and genuinely amusing story by the author of "Letters from a Self-Made Merchant to his Son." It narrates the doings of the son of a millionaire, who quarrels with his father and has all kinds of humorous adventures in his efforts to make a livelihood.—"The Japanese Spy." By Lancelot Lawton (Grant Richards, 6s.). A striking novel of modern Japan written by one who knows the country well and is keenly alive to the darker sides of Japanese character.—"Workers in Darkness." By J. B. Harris-Burland (Greening, 6s.). A pseudo-scientific tale with plenty of crime and adventure skilfully told.—"A Woman's Way." By G. B. Burgin (Hutchinson, 6s.). Relates the adventures of a peer who discovers that his mother "has dishonored his house"; the characters are crudely drawn but the book is fairly readable.—"Vane Royal." By the Hon. Mrs. Walter R. D. Forbes (John Long, 6s.). A good novel of analysis, the character of Frank Vane being very well done, and the writing easy and natural.—"The Future Mrs. Deering." By Thomas Cobb (Werner Laurie, 6s.). An entertaining love story with a good plot.—"God's Toys." By May Aldington (Collier, 6s.). Amateurish in tone and oversentimental, but shows knowledge of humble life.

The Week in the City.

The Movement of Leading Stocks.

	Price Friday Morning, July 3.	Price Friday Morning, July 10.
Consols 2½ per cent.	87⅞	... 87¾
German 3 per cent.	81½	... 82
Russian 5 per cent....	95¼	... 96¼
London General Omnibus	43½	... 40
Union Pacific Railway	149⅛	... 153¾
Grand Trunk Ordinary	17⅛	... 18¾
Canadian-Pacific	164	... 167½

Last Saturday afternoon, when the Stock Exchange had been closed, City journalists were startled by an official intimation of a new issue of Irish Land Stock to the amount of five millions. The secret had been so well kept that for several days Consols and other gilt-edged securities had been quite firm. The issue price was fixed at 89½, probably at least half a point lower than was necessary, for the stock then stood at 92. There was a great rush of applications, and when the list closed a premium of over a point had been established. Considerable falls occurred in the Consols market on Monday; but these have been partly recovered. Some satisfaction may fairly be felt in that the price is the best that has been obtained at any public issue of Irish Land Stock. If the Irish Government would encourage small investors in Ireland to put their money into Irish Land Stock we might look forward to further improvement. Otherwise nothing very momentous has occurred; but the American and Canadian markets have been cheered by the good crops and the reports now confirmed of a trade revival. At first there was some suspicion that the Republicans were "merely drumming up sunshine"; but a bank president who has just come over with a couple of big manufacturers, declares that there is no doubt about trade beginning to mend. Work is being resumed by the unemployed at lower wages and longer hours than last year.

Foreign Finance.

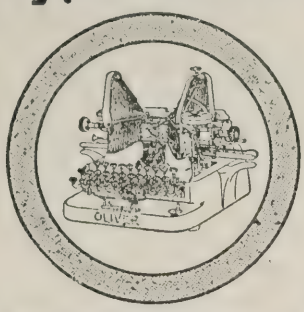
While Mr. Lloyd-George is struggling between Old Age Pensions and armaments, the German Government's experts in Berlin are hard at work with a financial scheme to make both ends meet. From what I hear it will be either very unpopular or quite futile. The customs tariff cannot be touched on account of the commercial treaties; so additional taxation will be laid on tobacco, cigars, and beer. Death duties will probably be increased. But what will the Reichstag say? The possibility of a naval arrangement with Great Britain is certainly more favored now that the Government is at close quarters with the taxes. Meanwhile, Russia is issuing an internal loan for twenty millions, in the hope of staving off a foreign loan till next year. The Japanese Government has been rearranged, and there is now hope of some further retrenchment in the military and naval budgets. For some reason or other Chinese loans have been in request the last day or two, probably on account of Sir Robert Hart's favorable pronouncements about China.

The American Harvest.

Three weeks ago the floods in the Western States threatened to do enormous damage, but good weather came in the nick of time, and harvesting is now in full swing. The gradual decline in the price of wheat shows that the market is beginning to count on the world's wheat crop this year making up for last year's deficiency. A good crop in the United States and a bumper crop in Canada should work wonders for trade. Reports from the North-West are exceptionally good, and Nebraska will have splendid crops. In Kansas the floods early last month did a great deal of damage in the low-lying districts. But there is plenty left. The acreage of wheat in Kansas this year, one reads, is more than the entire area of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, or Vermont. It had grown from 1,373,915 acres in 1887 to 7,235,283 in 1907, nearly 40 per cent. of the State's cultivated area. A single division of Kansas, Sumner County, has in a single year produced more than Texas, North Carolina, or any one of twenty-two other States and territories. The records of the State Board of Agriculture show that in the five years ending with 1907 Kansas farmers put in their bins 400,000 bushels of wheat, worth, on the farms where grown, over $269,000,000. This is a grand source of prosperity, and helps to account for the substantial business conditions in the Middle West and for the constantly increasing land values. "While the present crop is unlikely to break records," a correspondent of the "New York Evening Post" is confident that "it will average well with the large yields of the past half decade."

Lucellum.

THE NEW NO. 5 OLIVER Typewriter



The Standard Visible Writer

BRISTLES WITH NEW AND VALUABLE IMPROVEMENTS.

Leaflet N. gives Particulars.

OLIVER TYPEWRITER Co.,Ltd.,

75, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Branches, etc., everywhere.

ONE & ALL SEEDS

THE BRAND GUARANTEES ONE & ALL QUALITY.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

ONE & ALL SEEDS are reliable, pure, and guaranteed.

Each packet is dated with the year of issue.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS are complete Manures.

All are supplied in small quantities at reasonable prices.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Choice Varieties of Sweet Peas, with an Original Pamphlet on their Culture, by Richard Dean, V.M.H.—viz., Dorothy Eckford, white; Hon. Mrs. Kenyon, yellow; Prima Donna, soft pink; King Edward VII., crimson; Miss Wilmott, rich deep orange pink; Mrs. Walter Wright, mauve; Prince of Wales, fine rose; Duchess of Westminster, violet purple; Othello, deep maroon; Lady Grisel Hamilton, pale lavender; Duke of Westminster, purple; Navy Blue.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Annuals.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Perennials and Biennials.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables for Saladings.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables.

One & All Collection of Choicest Asters in 10 Varieties—2s. 6d. Giant Comet, white; Giant Comet, The Bride, white; Giant Comet, rose; Giant Comet, azure blue; Giant Comet, dark violet; Mixed Dwarf Chrysanthemum; Finest Mixed Bouquet; Mixed Victoria; Mixed Paeony; Perfection; and Betteridge's Quilled in mixed colours.

One & All Fertiliser No. 24 for general garden purposes. Half-rod packets 6d. bags, 7 lbs., 2/3; 14 lbs., 3/6; 28 lbs., 5/9; 56 lbs., 10/6; 112 lbs., 20/- Carriage Paid.

ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, LIMITED. Name and address of nearest Local Agent, Illustrated Catalogues, and other details, sent free by post on application to EDWARD OWEN GREENING, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS

The Daily News

Founded by

CHARLES DICKENS IN 1846.

Honored tradition and the spirit of modern enterprise are combined in "The Daily News." Matters of serious interest are reported at length. Place is also found, in shorter form, for the lighter news items which are a feature of 20th century journalism.

"The Daily News" is the only London Liberal newspaper that devotes every day a whole page to Financial and Commercial matters, Trade and Market reports and Stock Exchange Intelligence.

Its daily Parliamentary report is far more detailed than that of any other ½d. paper, and nearly a column is given to the Law List.

If you do not read "The Daily News" it is impossible for you to follow the progress of Liberalism.

HEAD OFFICES—

Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it WILL BE REPLACED.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education, Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.
Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

(For Leisure Hour Work, see the Bootham School exhibit in the Franco-British Exhibition, Education Building, Section J.)

Special terms for boys under 14 and under 13.

For copies of Prospectus and full particulars with regard to Scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

SCHOLARSHIP ENTRIES DUE JULY 1ST.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The South Wales and Monmouthshire Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts, 3, 4, 5 and 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

Superintendent ... Miss HESTER DAVIES.
Secretary ... ... J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.

The School is under the Management of a Committee appointed by the Council of the College. It is under Government Inspection, and the Committee is empowered to grant Diplomas in Cookery, Laundrywork and Housewifery, under the cognizance and with the approval of the Board of Education.

The Departments of the Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts are as follows:—

1. TRAINING SCHOOL OF COOKERY.
2. TRAINING SCHOOL OF LAUNDRY WORK.
3. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEWIFERY.
4. TRAINING SCHOOL OF DRESSMAKING.
5. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEKEEPING.

Further particulars can be obtained on application to the Superintendent of the School, at 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class: Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.

In the Cheshire Plain, four miles from Crewe. Opened in 1900. Modern Buildings, standing in 24 acres of grounds. Preparations for University Scholarships and Matriculation, or for Professional and Commercial life.

NEXT ENTRANCE EXAMINATION JULY 21st, AT THE SCHOOL.

For prospectus and particulars of admission on the Foundation, apply to the Head Master, H. L. JONES, M.A. (Oxon.), or to the Clerk to the Governors 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

BROMSGROVE SCHOOL, WORCESTERSHIRE.

AUTUMN TERM begins September 17th.

APPLY THE HEADMASTER.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

MISCELLANEOUS.

PRIVATE ACCOUNT BOOK. For Country or City Gentlemen. Guaranteed to fulfil every requirement. Post free 10/6, or Particulars free, McQueen & Co., 1a, Moat Rd., Leicester.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

KINGSLEY HOTEL, Near the British Museum.
Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

THACKERAY HOTEL,
Opposite the British Museum.
Great Russell Street, London.

These well-appointed and commodious Temperance Hotels will, it is believed, meet the requirements at moderate charges of those who desire all the conveniences and advantages of the larger modern Licensed Hotels. These Hotels have Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every floor, spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard, and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.
Inclusive charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, From 8/6 to 10/6 per day.
Full Tariff and Testimonials on application.
Telegraphic Addresses—
Kingsley Hotel, "Bookcraft, London." Thackeray Hotel, "Thackeray, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

A LIBRARY OF PEACE AND WAR

WITH AN INTRODUCTION
BY
F. W. HIRST.

1/- NET.

THE
NATION PUBLISHING CO., LTD.,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:
HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son, Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:

13 Insertions	8d. per line.
52 ,, ...	6d. ,,

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.
BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott. Prop.

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny. Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.
GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Afternoon Teas, Tel. 647.

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.
"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.
WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell, Manager

The Medici Series of Coloured Reproductions

AFTER THE OLD MASTERS.

The Burlington Magazine:—"A great advance upon anything which has yet been done in colour reproduction . . . . A better example of facsimile work we have never seen . . . . In the matter of quality, accuracy of form, and texture, the result is all that the most critical eye could desire . . . Nothing of the kind so good and so cheap has ever before been issued.

The Medici Society (Ltd.), supplies single copies of all its Prints subject only to the prior claim of Subscribers to copies of Plates in the Annual Series. Annual Subscription 1908 £3 3s.; for future year £3, prepayable on January 6th. The Annual Series is confined to the Old Italian Masters, but the Medici Prints will embrace examples from all Schools of Painting.

Illustrated Prospectus post free on application.

I.	Luini. Head of the Virgin (Fresco). Colour surface. 13¾ by 10½ ins.	12s. 6d. net.
II.	L. Da Vinci. Head of the Christ (Cartoon). Colour surface. 13½ by 10½ ins.	12s. 6d. net.
III.	Botticelli. The Virgin and Child (Tempera). Colour surface. 13⅞ by 9⅛ ins.	12s. 6d. net.
IV.	L. Da Vinci. The Last Supper (Fresco). Colour surface. 31½ by 16 ins.	25s. net.
V.	P. Della Francesca. Portrait of an Unknown Lady (Tempera). Colour surface. 15½ by 11¼ ins.	12s. 6d. net.
VI.	L. Di Credi. The Annunciation (Tempera). Colour surface. 17½ by 12 ins.	17s. 6d. net.
VII.	Filippino Lippi. (?) The Virgin in Adoration. (Tempera). Colour surface. 19½ by 15 ins.	15s. net.
VIII.	Botticelli. The Birth of Venus (Tempera). At Press. Colour surface. 36 by 21½ ins.	25s. net.
IX.	Botticelli. The Vision of St. Augustine (Tempera). Colour surface. 7¾ by 15 ins. Autumn, 1908.	10s. 6d. net.
X.	Titian. The Madonna of the Cherries (Tempera). Shortly. Colour surface. 16 by 20 ins.	17s. 6d. net.
XI.	Tintoretto. Bacchus and Ariadne. (Tempera). Colour surface. 18½ by 16¾ ins. Autumn, 1908.	15s. net.
XII.	Raphael. The Madonna in Green. Colour surface. 22 by 17½ ins. Autumn, 1908.	17s. 6d. net.
Special Plate, 1908.	Giorgione. The Three Wise Men. Colour surface. 24 by 28 ins. Autumn, 1908.	30s. net.
Occasional Plate, I.	Fillipo Lippi. The Virgin (Tempera). Colour surface. 13¾ by 10 ins.	10s. 6d. net.
Flemish Plate, I.	Unknown Master. Portrait of a Lady (never before reproduced). Colour surface. 15¾ by 12¼ ins.	17s. 6d. net.
Flemish Plate, II.	Reubens. Fruitfulness. Colour surface. 20¼ by 11¾ ins. Autumn, 1908.	12s. 6d. net.

Many other Plates after the various great Schools of Painting are in preparation.

CHATTO & WINDUS, Publishers to the Medici Society, Ltd., 111, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C.

PHOTO RELIEFS.

A remarkable advance in Photographic knowledge has recently made possible the reproduction, in the colours of the original Della Robbias, &c., of photographic facsimiles of such verisimilitude that, although flat prints from negatives taken direct from the original objects, these flat surfaces offer to the eye the complete illusion of a modelling in relief. Eighteen subjects are now ready, viz., Seventeen after the Della Robbias and one after Donatello. The average surface is 18 by 18 inches, and the price is, per subject, 25s. net.

Detailed Illustrated Prospectus post free.

Popular Fine-Art Publications by Chatto & Windus.

FOUR-COLOUR PROCESS REPRODUCTIONS.

Series No.	Artist.	Title.
F 1	Perugino.	The Crucifixion (Triptych 17x11in).
F 2	Giorgione.	The Virgin Enthroned.
F 3	P. della Francesca.	Portrait of a Lady.
F 4	,,	Federigo di Montefeltro.
F 5	,,	Battista Sforza, wife of above.
F 6	Pisanello.	SS. Anthony and George.
F 7	Fra Angelico.	The Crucifixion.
F 8	B. Caporali.	Madonna and Angels.
F 9	Pinturicchio.	Madonna and Child.
F 10	A. Mantegna.	Elisabetta, wife of Guidobaldo da Montefeltro.
F 11	Botticelli.	Madonna and Child.
F 12	,,	The Spring.
F 13	,, (?)	The Angel (from Tobit and the Angel). (After a Copy).
F 14	Tiberio d'Assisi.	The Crucifixion.
F 15	F. di Lorenzo.	A Miracle of S. Bernardino.
F 16	N. Alunno.	Coronation of the Virgin.
F 17	B. di Mariotto.	,,
F 18	Ant. Romano.	Three Saints.
F 19	L. Signorelli.	The Virgin Enthroned.
F 20	G. David.	S. Francis

Many other subjects in preparation. The above are now ready.

When ordering please state: (1) The Series Number, (2) Mounted or Unmounted, (3) Whether framed "Oak" or "Gold."

PRICES.	Prints.	Postage.	Mounted Prints.	Postage.	Mounted and Framed in Oak.	Postage.	Mounted and Framed in Gold.	Postage.
F 1	1s.	3d.	1s. 6d.	4d.	3s. 6d.	9d.	5s.	9d.
F2—20	6d.	2d.	9d.	2d.	2s. 6d.	6d.	3s. 6d.	6d.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, JULY 11, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. III., No. 16.] SATURDAY, JULY 18, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	Page
The Diary of the Week	555
Politics and Affairs:—
The Mutiny of the Expert	558
The New Spirit in Turkey	559
The Growth of American Radicalism	560
Wanted, a New Scheme of Culture	561
Life and Letters:—
Olympia Rediviva. By Professor Gilbert Murray	563
Recruits	564
The Water of the Moors	565
Short Story:—
II. Another Point of View. By May Kendall	566
Present-Day Problems:—
The Harmsworth Brand	567
Letters from Abroad:—
The Tactics of M. Clemenceau	568
Letters to the Editor:—
The Reform of the Upper Thames Conservancy. By C. H. Cook	569
"The Lost Liberty of the Road." By Peter Macdonald, and Charles Robertson	570
"The Tyranny of London." By Philip J. Dear	570
Is the Drama Dying? By William Poel, K.S., and Ella Levy	571
The King and Foreign Policy. By Julie Jephson	572
The Indeterminate Sentence. By the Rev. W. D. Morrison	572
The Future of the Police. By J. Fletcher Little	572
"Suffragette" History. By W. A. Jolly	573
The Outlook for English Fiction. By S.	573
Poetry:—
Hoodwinked. By Wilfrid C. Thorley	573
The World of Books	574
Books to be Read	574
Reviews:—
The Advance of England	575
The Ravin of Nature and Man	576
Three Groats' Worth of Wit	577
The Medieval Church	577
"Letters from Queer Street"	578
Books in Brief	580
Impressions of India	580
A History of the Evangelical Party in the Church of England	580
Francesca di Rimini: In Legend and in History	580
The Sanity of William Blake	580
A Novel-Reader's Guide	582
The Week in the City	582

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The mutinies in the Turkish army, which have been in evidence during the past week or so in Macedonia, are undoubtedly political. The arrears of pay, the detention of time-expired soldiers with the colors, and the system of espionage on the educated officers, all helped to prepare the ground; but the Porte would not have insisted on courses so discreditable to itself except to avoid the admission that the army was seriously infected with the political propaganda of the Young Turks. The chronology of events is difficult, but the immediate exciting cause seems to have been the recall and arrest of a number of prominent officers under suspicion of Liberal views on politics. Among them were several members of the general staff, and one of them was so popular with the Monastir garrison that when the adjutant-major of Resna, a neighbouring village, bolted into the hills with the regimental chest and 600 men, there were no troops in the district that could be trusted against him, and General Shemsi had to be sent for with two battalions all the way from Mitrovitza. His murder was obviously the crime of revolutionaries, not of mere mutineers. The centre of the rising is in the hills west of Monastir, but over the whole of Macedonia revolutionary placards have been posted in the towns, and appeals made to Mohammedans and Christians alike for assistance in the cause of constitutional and religious liberty. There is no evidence to show that the revolted troops are in collusion with the Bulgarian bands, but it is worth noting that as long ago as 1904 a Young Turkish officer proposed to make common cause with their Revolutionary Organisation.

* * *

The Shah has apologised for blockading the British Legation during his fight with the Parliamentarians in Teheran, but General Liakhoff has not been recalled from an equivocal position in which, as the Russian Press has pointed out, he is putting a severe strain on the Convention with England, and we do not seem to have tried to mitigate the ferocity of the Shah's measures of repression. At Tabriz 400 Parliamentary stalwarts, with such help as they can get from the population, are holding out against a band of 1,600 mounted tribesmen under the command of Rakhim Khan. All the approaches to the town are blockaded, some parts have been bombarded, and in others house-to-house guerilla fighting is going on. At the beginning of the Shah's coup d'état, England and Russia announced that they would not support any attempts to overthrow the dynasty or to interfere with the Mejliss; but the two parts of this undertaking have been kept in a very different spirit. Russia supplied the officer without whose help the Shah could not have overthrown the Parliament, but no attempt seems yet to have been made to bind the Shah over to any sort of constitutional régime.

* * *

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett's telegram from Fez in the "Morning Post" of last Tuesday is the first independent evidence that we have yet had from the interior of Morocco, and it is strongly in favor of Mulai Hafid. Fez is described as a vast camp; and Mulai Hafid is regarded as the national hero, who, left alone, could end the war in a few weeks. He is prepared to abide by the Algeciras Act, subject to revision of its details when the country has settled down, to acknowledge all his brother's debts, and to make suitable provision for his future. His intention is presently to leave Fez for the coast—probably Tangier—and there to ask for recognition by the Powers. A crisis is therefore approaching, in which France will be faced with the alternatives of war or the independence of Morocco and the renunciation of all territorial ambitions there and strict adherence to the Algeciras Convention. The facts have completely justified all M. Jaurès' criticisms; but France, we are convinced, cannot think of setting herself in opposition to the plain interests of Europe, which are now obviously bound up with Mulai Hafid, as the only man capable of giving Morocco a strong government.

* * *

The Prince of Wales sailed on Wednesday on the "Indomitable" to witness the celebration of the founding of Quebec by Champlain 300 years ago. France and England share the ceremonies, and join in acclaiming each other's heroes, especially Wolfe and Montcalm. This is an ideal method of reviving the glorious passages of history.

* * *

The shipbuilding vote was discussed on Monday, we are sorry to see with sole reference to the rival constructive plans of Germany. Mr. McKenna, challenged by Mr. Lee on a variation of Mr. Balfour's calculation that Germany would, in 1911 or 1912, overmatch us in "Dreadnoughts," replied that we should have ten of these vessels constructed before the German ships were completed, and that in 1911 we should have twelve to Germany's nine, in addition to our great superiority in other types of battleship. This, of course, is overwhelming. We have two "Lord Nelsons," only inferior by 1,300 tons to the displacement of the first "Dreadnought," eight "King Edward VII.'s," only 150 tons behind the "Lord Nelson," two "Queens," of 15,000 tons, five "Duncans," of 15,000 tons, six "Formidables," of 14,000 tons, and six ships of the "Canopus" class. None of these vessels will be obsolete in 1912, and many will be quite fresh. Against this secondary Armada Germany has only the "Deutschland" and "Braunschweig" classes, ten vessels in all, far inferior in coal-carrying capacity. Dr. Macnamara added a detailed comparison of strengths. He stated that in 1912 we should have forty-eight big ships, plus those laid down in next year's programme, which will probably be four, to Germany's thirty, and twenty-eight of the United States. Mr. McKenna said of the personal disputes in the Navy that the Press had over-stated them.

* * *

The strong objections of the Liberal Party in Parliament to the amended Sugar Convention were expressed on Wednesday in a deputation to the Prime Minister. Mr. Villiers, who introduced it, used strong language when he said that the Government had "betrayed" Free Trade and "violated" the constitution. The practical question, however, would seem to be whether Free Trade is consistent with an instrument in which we, contrary to the undertaking of Sir Edward Grey, commit ourselves to the restriction of free imports, and whether it is either constitutional or fair to pass such a treaty without taking the judgment of Parliament. The original Convention was submitted to Parliament; why not its substitute? Mr. Asquith's reply, though very courteous, was weakened by the fact that he, a Free Trader and Anti-Conventionist, had to defend the action of Sir Edward Grey, who may be a Free Trader, but who did not vote against the original Convention. The Prime Minister declared that he would have been glad to "get rid of the whole thing, lock, stock, and barrel," but he hinted that there were "difficulties and embarrassments" of a diplomatic character. This we take to mean the strong pressure exercised by France in favor of her sugar producers—pressure, that is to say, on us, to keep the sugar of our people dear.

* * *

With regard to the restriction of Russian imports, Mr. Asquith quoted the words in which our representative guarded himself from assent to the actual prohibition of Russian sugar. But the words in question are a mere hypocritical formula. We are express parties to the Protocol of the Convention, which provides for the restriction of the Russian trade, and is entirely devoted to that object. As Mr. Villiers said, a man cuts off his water supply equally whether it is stopped at the main or at his own service pipe. We assent to stopping it at the main, and keep our service pipe open. This is not the action of a Free Trade Power, and the Government's assent to the consequences of Lord Lansdowne's West Indian policy, a policy largely endorsed by Sir Edward Grey, illustrates the great difficulty of dealing with an established Protectionist tariff. If a Free Trade Government can only weakly qualify a Protectionist Convention, what will it do when we are entangled in the barbed-wire fencing of a Tariff?

* * *

The Democratic Convention at Denver has given Mr. Bryan an unanimous nomination to represent his party at the Presidential election. A two-thirds majority was obtained by Mr. Bryan at the first ballot and his name was cheered longer even than Mr. Roosevelt's at the Republican Convention. He stands on a Radical platform, the importance of which is that the anti-injunction plank, which is much stronger than that of the Republicans, has been endorsed by Mr. Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor. The Tariff plank approaches a pure revenue tariff, and proposes to place articles competing with trust products on the free list. The Pacific States are courted by an anti-immigration plank, which practically excludes Chinese and Japanese. There is no hint of free silver, but the anti-trust planks are tinged with Populist ideas. It looks as if Mr. Bryan would make a serious bid for success, for, although he is not a great intellectual figure, he is much nearer the Roosevelt personality and conception of modern politics than is Mr. Taft, the Republican.

* * *

Mr. Balfour has a perfect capacity for luminous speech, and if on Education and on Free Trade he does not always make his meaning clear, we can only conclude that he does not wish to be understood. He managed to deliver a cryptic utterance on education before a meeting of the Parents' League. Mr. Balfour declared that there were two movements in our system of public education. One was in the direction of abolishing religious teaching altogether; the other in the direction of increasing the control of the parents over the religion taught to their children. Mr. Balfour spoke of these two movements as opposed, though it is clear they are harmonious. If the State is to give up the idea of Cowper-Templeism, that is to say of a simple, common form of religion, and is thrown back on parents' views of what religious teaching should be, it is obvious that it can teach nothing itself but must leave parents and the ministers and agents they select to provide the machinery of this instruction. Mr. Balfour is for breaking down Cowper-Templeism in the provided schools, and he admitted that this would mean the encouragement of Nonconformist teaching in Church schools as well as of Church teaching in the Council schools. He further proposed that the Education Authority must satisfy itself of the teacher's capacity to give religious instruction. This, of course, is a test for teachers over again. The parents are to demand various forms of religious instruction, and the State is to supply the teachers fit to impart them. This is a system for Laputa, not for England.

* * *

The "Daily Mail" has raised the ten thousand pounds required for the entertainment of the athletes engaged in the Olympic Games. They were opened on Monday by the King, before whom defiled a great procession of competitors of all nations. But the contests have been thinly attended, and popular interest is small. The reasons, we think, are that London is sated with amusements, and that these international contests are naturally less attractive than sports which possess some local or home interest, such as contests between colleges or universities or groups of neighbours. Furthermore, the interest of the modern Olympic Games is purely physical, possessing neither the religious, nor the political, nor the intellectual associations that attached to their great exemplar, springing, as it did, from a conception of life entirely different from our own. Thus far, Great Britain seems to have won more than its share of events. The opening contest, that of throwing the hammer, was won by Flanagan, of America, with a throw of 170 ft. 4½ in. America also won the 1,500 metres' foot race, but the 3,500 metres' walking race and the 20 kilometres' bicycle race were won by this country. On the second day English riders were first, second and third in the three-mile team race. In all we have won five "events" to America's four.

* * *

Lord Shuttleworth, the new Lord-Lieutenant of Lancashire, by dint of much tact and exceeding good nature, has induced the Earl of Derby to withdraw his resignation from the West Lancashire Territorial Associations, but the correspondence which is published, oddly enough, by the War Office, does not make one think any the more of Mr. Haldane's Cromwellian model. There is less feudalism left in Lancashire than in most counties, but even there the Earl of Derby, having allowed his pique with the Government to get the better of him, has been able to play Coriolanus for the better part of a week. There is no reason to think that Lord Derby is less patriotic or more of a party man than thirty or forty other territorial magnates, and we do not like the prospect of these performances being repeated whenever a Liberal Government does anything to offend any one of them. Lord Derby defended his resignation as a protest against the Lord-Lieutenancy, with its new quasi-military duties, being made a political appointment; he has certainly shown his party how political pressure can be screwed on a Liberal Government through the Territorial Army. On Thursday the Duke of Bedford attacked the constitution of the Territorial Army, stating that of its 112,000 infantry only 56,000 would be available in the field, and that up to the first of July it had entailed a sacrifice of nearly 100,000 Volunteers, in addition to the destruction of the Militia. Lord Lucas, on the other hand, thought the force promised well.

* * *

Some weeks must elapse before Count Zeppelin's balloon is ready to take the air for its twenty-four hours' endurance test. But we already know that the Zeppelin IV. has many elements of "air-worthiness," that, for instance, it can remain in the air for at least twelve hours, that in ordinary weather it is capable of being navigated with, across and against the wind over a range of two or three hundred miles—the distance that separates England and Germany—and that nevertheless in its evolutions it can afford to carry several passengers or their equivalent in deadweight. Such a machine would be invaluable for reconnoitring purposes, or for harassing a retreat, but to try and raise a Zeppelin scare, as the "Times" seems inclined to do, is simply fatuous. The talk of an aerial invasion scarcely needs examination, while the spectacle of a "steerable" balloon, clumsily hovering over a 25-knot battleship capable of turning almost within its own length, in order to drop grenades on its deck would be rather ludicrous. In legitimate warfare the airship is certainly destined to play an important part as an auxiliary, but it will never influence the real issue of a campaign.

* * *

We are sorry to see democratic Ministers like Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Burns indifferent to the calamities inflicted on the common people by the misuse of motor traffic. Mr. Burns, answering a question in the House of Commons, refused an amended Motor Act, and even suggested that if the present Act were revised the maximum speed limit would have to go. Mr. Gladstone was hardly more sympathetic on Wednesday, in answering a powerful deputation on motor traffic in the City, introduced by the Lord Mayor. Mr. Gladstone stated that they were agreed as to there being "a nuisance and a danger, perhaps a growing danger," from motor traffic. But the "nuisance and the danger" have arisen from the action of the Home Office itself in admitting to the streets motor 'buses unfit for their work. That this is the case is clear from Mr. Gladstone's admission that 8,507 motor 'buses have been reported by the police for scandalous defects, amounting to a public nuisance or a public danger. The Home Office further suggested that the London County Council and other local bodies had failed to carry out the present law, and, therefore, that it was premature to ask for new legislation. But the notorious fact is that neither local bodies nor the police can offer a tolerable degree of comfort or safety to pedestrians under the present law. Thanks to the motor traffic, it is no longer pleasant to walk in London streets or tolerably safe to cross them. We hope that Ministers will wake up to this fact in time. Pedestrians are humble folk. But they have votes.

* * *

Count Tolstoy has published a most powerful and affecting indictment of the crimes now being daily perpetrated by the Russian Government, in which the following passage occurs:—

> "And not this kind of dreadful thing alone is being done [i.e., the executions of twelve peasants], but on the same plea and with the same cold-blooded cruelty, all sorts of other tortures and violence are being perpetrated in prisons, fortresses, and convict settlements.
>
> "This is awful, but most awful of all is the fact that this is not done impulsively under the sway of feelings silencing reason, as happens in fights, in war, or even in burglary, but, on the contrary, is done at the demand of reason and calculation, silencing feeling. That is what makes these deeds so particularly dreadful. Dreadful, because these acts—committed by men who, from the judge to the hangman, do not wish to do them—prove more vividly than anything else how pernicious to human souls is despotism, the power of men over men.
>
> "This depravity grows with special rapidity among the simple working folk, because all these iniquities—exceeding as they do a hundredfold all that is or has been done by thieves, robbers, and by all the revolutionaries put together—are done as though they were something necessary, good, and unavoidable; and are not merely excused, but supported by different institutions inseparably connected in the people's minds with justice, and even with sanctity—namely, the Senate, the Synod, the Duma, the Church, and the Tsar."

Count Tolstoy concludes by asking the Government to imprison or to kill him, fitting on him a "shroud and a cap," and pushing him off a bench, "so that by my own weight I may tighten the well-soaped noose round my old throat." This is the Government, in this stage of its wickedness, with which Sir Edward Grey, in violation of his own natural feeling, and of that of Liberals and of the nation, has labored closely to identify his king, his party, and our free State.

* * *

Well-informed Roman Catholics in France, writes our Paris correspondent, do not take the English view of the progressive character of the Papal decree on Roman Courts and Congregations. They are regarded as on the whole reactionary and consistent with the previous policy of the present Pontificate. Their tendency is a further accentuation of power in the hands of the Papacy. Any real reform in the Roman Church must be in the direction of centralisation; the tendency of the present changes is in the opposite direction. There are two points of supreme importance in the decree: the extension of the powers of the Pope's own Consistorial Congregation, which will in the future interfere everywhere in seminaries and dioceses, and the new Congregation for dealing with the "discipline of the Sacraments," which means, in plain English, more effective repression.

Politics and Affairs.

THE MUTINY OF THE EXPERT.

The Liberal Party will do well to note the concerted attempt of the Conservative Press to stop the process of examination of the Army Estimates which is proper to this period of the year, and is a redemption of the pledges under which the Prime Minister and his colleagues took office. Two newspapers, the "Times" and the "Daily Telegraph," have distinguished themselves by attacks on the policy of economy, and on individual Ministers who are supposed to favor it. The "Times" has spoken through its Military Correspondent, a writer whose character may be judged by his publication of a travestied version of the Kaiser's personal and private letter to Lord Tweedmouth, and whose knowledge and practical sense may be tested by his statement that the "military weakness of England" is the "greatest existing danger of our times." The author of this unmeaning phrase has the assurance to describe the Cabinet's customary revision of the Estimates as a "cut-throat business of political intrigue," to characterise members of the Cabinet, who are presumably Mr. Lloyd-George and Mr. Churchill, as "self-satisfied and self-advertising tyros," and to tell Mr. Asquith that if he keeps his election pledges his reputation will "vanish into the thinnest of thin air." These flowers of rhetoric and reason are strewn at Mr. Haldane's feet by a writer who, while professing to defend the scheme of the Territorial Army against professional or partisan critics, argues for the power to throw "100,000 British troops" on to the critical point in a Continental war, and calls for a "million men in the Territorial Army," who are to be asked, and, "if need be," compelled, to come forward. Mr. Haldane's scheme, therefore, is defended because it furnishes the nucleus of conscription, and every Liberal statesman who attempts to keep military expenditure within bounds, and to suit it to the tasks which we actually ask the Army to fulfil, is made the target for vulgar abuse. We venture to say that nothing that has been done within the last week or so has gone an inch outside the regular and proper practice of Governments, and we suggest that Mr. Haldane would be the last man to advance such an affirmation. What is the position of army expenditure? It stands at nearly twenty-eight millions. The Navy Estimates stand at some four millions more. In other words, a virtual parity of sacrifice is called for from the taxpayer in respect of these two forces. Yet what is the measure of their work and efficiency? One of them represents the greatest and costliest aggregation of sea-power the world has ever known. The Navy is the guarantee of our national life, so far as it rests on force and on resistance to force. The other arm compares in strength with that of Bulgaria, its place in the scheme of national defence is of quite secondary consequence, and its normal aim and scope of action lie in the management of those local and frontier wars which the accidents of Empire inflict upon us. Is it reasonable to call upon the country to accept, without close investigation, a charge of nearly twenty-eight millions on behalf of a force which nine years ago, when an Imperial problem of importance remained unsettled, only cost 20½ millions? The Liberal Party demands a reduction of army expenditure proportionate to the place which that force actually occupies in the general plan for safeguarding these shores. Its present share of the total is grossly excessive. It is the business of the Government to reduce it.

The fact is that the whole condition and organisation of our defensive forces call for close examination not by experts, but by statesmen. The present division of the army and navy into separate compartments is unbusinesslike and unscientific. So is the idea of Admiralissimos or of Generalissimos on the spot. It has been abandoned for the army; it cannot be revived in the navy. Modern wars are conducted under unified commands. They are also directed from the centre; they are games of chess played by strategists overlooking a board, not by gallant commanders winning fame (and advertisement in the halfpenny press) by brilliant feats performed in happy dissociation from their colleagues. The Japanese conducted from Tokio their naval and military strategy in the Russian war; we have made special arrangements, with the help of wireless telegraphy, for manœuvring from Whitehall the fleets that will guard our shores in the Channel and the North Sea. But all this implies the subordination of the "specialist," who for months has been using the Press to exalt his personality, or that of his friends, to decry his rivals, to "run" this branch of the service or to discredit that, but, above all, to depreciate the supervising force of statesmanship and to demand a voice in the framing of "policy," when his sole business and sworn duty is to execute it in good faith and in silence. What has been the result of this prolonged campaign, which resembles, on a reduced scale, the revolt of the French staff and the high regimental officers against the Republic and its Ministers? It has shown the incapacity of the "expert" for politics or for general judgments. It has revealed his weak points—his thin skin, his jealousy, his disposition to mistake the part for the whole, and to envisage only his own share of the general field of knowledge and of action. In the Navy, in particular, the interference of officers in policy has reached a pitch when, by a natural reaction, the public of all shades of opinion, satiated with recriminations, with veiled thrusts and petty assaults, directed against this or that commander or official or designer, have called on the directing statesmen to put an end to a serious scandal. The country has at last perceived that, however important questions of matériel may be, it is still more urgent to maintain discipline and mutual loyalty among the men who will have the disposition of it in war.

But, after all, the movement towards sanity must go a little farther than this. The seat of Government in this country is Parliament. From it proceeds the Cabinet, which is, to all intents and purposes, a Committee of the House of Commons, with a few members of the House of Lords thrown in. The House of Commons, acting on the advice of the Cabinet, that is to say, through its Executive Committee, votes, in its judgment of the needs of the country, and of the policy which interprets those needs, a certain sum of money for the warlike services, or, as we should prefer to say, for the general business of defence. What have executive officers and their agents in the Press in any department of the services, high or low, to do with dictating to the Government, directly or indirectly, what that policy shall be, or what they consider an adequate provision for it? Their business is to work out the practical problems submitted to them within the limits of the expenditure which the House of Commons sanctions. For more than this, unless we are to return to government by major-generals and admirals, they may have neither eyes nor ears. The attitude which for the last few years they have been encouraged to take is that of a veiled and indirect insubordination, not merely to the rules of their service, but to the principles of the British Constitution. French statesmanship dealt with such a situation in the Dreyfus case, and crushed those responsible for it. If the national safety and the time-honored principles of our Constitution call for examples to be made in high quarters, we hope that the Government will not hesitate to make them. We are quite sure that if they find it necessary to act, they will have the nation at their back.

THE NEW SPIRIT IN TURKEY.

The discontent which makes revolutions is bred only among masses of men, who can meet under one roof and learn to trust each other. In Russia the reform movement had its home during its earlier phases in universities; it became formidable when it invaded factories and foundries. In Turkey there are two classes of the Mohammedan population which have enough solidarity to be dangerous, and they are precisely the two classes on which the despotism leans as its pillars—the clergy and the soldiery. It was among the theological students (softas) of Constantinople that the turbulent Liberal movement of the late 'seventies had its vanguard. They it was who demonstrated in the streets, armed with cudgels, and supported Midhat Pasha and the Sheikh-ul-Islam when they deposed two Sultans in rapid succession. Their day is over. Abdul Hamid had learned their power by using it. He has taught them to employ their cudgels on the skulls of Armenians, and to cherish as their ideal a theocratic Panislamism. Their part has passed to the soldiers. The events of the past week in Macedonia would have been interesting had they happened in Russia during the crisis of the revolutionary fever; they are startling amid the apparent stagnation of Turkey. A Turkish major, with eighty men under him, "took to the hills," as a Balkan Christian would put it, at Resna, near Monastir. He declared himself the foe of despotism and gathered other officers to his standard. The main army at Monastir refused to march against its comrades, and the Sultan sent for the loyal old veteran, Shemsi Pasha, who came from Uskub, a two days' journey by rail, with two battalions behind him. He and they had often campaigned before against those chronic Moslem rebels, the northern Albanians. But the atmosphere of Monastir was infectious, and even these tried battalions refused to march. Old Shemsi, brave to the end, was about to start alone for Resna, when an officer shot him dead in his carriage. Two other victims have fallen since this affair, a clerical spy and a general. The troops who used to shout daily on parade, "May the Padisha live for ever," are now cheering for a constitution.

To an Englishman who has seen anything of Turkish garrison life, this sudden display of militant Liberalism among officers is surprising, but not inexplicable. The level of education among them is deplorably low. The lower grades are promoted from the ranks, admirable men and good, but illiterate soldiers. The younger staff officers have tried in recent years to ape the German spirit, which does not make for revolutions. Education, as it is understood in the East, does not necessarily produce enlightenment. Of the two ablest Turkish officers in Monastir known to the present writer, one was a corrupt Palace spy, and the other, a Professor in a Military College, carried out, for the sake of loot, the two bloodiest massacres during the Macedonian rising of 1903. But in this portrait gallery of recollections two amiable and generous types stand out. One was an Albanian Major, chivalrous, intelligent, and kindly, an ardent nationalist who despised the Turks as Asiatics, and hated them as the corrupters of his race. The other was a descendant of a Greek pervert, of only moderate intelligence, but studious, and ripe for revolution. He would say, as he passed a burned Bulgarian village, "It is we Turks, and not those Christians who ought to have rebelled." His favorite theme of conversation was the thesis that the Sultan really oppresses his Moslem subjects more savagely than the Christians, for the Christians have at least their autonomous churches and schools. He would rail against the tyrannies of the service—the constant espionage, the jealousy which forbids an officer to resign his commission and rarely allows him to travel, above all the constant petty obstacles put in the way of study and reading. Neither of these two men could have led a revolt; both would have followed.

Something has happened in the past four years to put the fire of action into such potential rebels as these. In the first place, the men and the "ranker" officers are profoundly discontented. The Turkish soldier will no longer starve and drudge contentedly, for the mere pleasure of obedience. The Yemen campaigns were fruitful in mutinies of a serious, though non-political, kind. The recent Liberal movement among the Turks of the Armenian provinces, which took the form of a refusal to pay taxes or to obey specially obnoxious Governors, had the support of the garrison of Erzeroum. It is probable that the Persian object-lesson has inspired the imagination of the Turkish masses, and the perpetual ferment of revolt in Macedonia must have taught its garrison to regard rebellion as a familiar and natural act. But the real cause of this movement is undoubtedly the new strategy which the Young Turkish Party adopted last Christmas at its Congress in Paris. In the past this party had been a futile, if estimable, band of exiled "intellectuals." They wrote novels and newspapers, but they neither went "to the people," nor did they dream of action. Above all, they refused to co-operate with the Christian rebels, and even denounced them as men who were the puppets of a hostile Europe, working for the dismemberment of Turkey. The charge was true a decade ago. To-day the Armenians at least have realised that they have nothing to hope from Europe. The result is that the Armenians and the Young Turks have formed a close working alliance, and fused their programmes. Their common aim is now the deposition of Abdul Hamid, the restoration of the Ottoman Parliament, and the reconstruction of the Empire on a federal basis. The Armenians have lent their brains and their modern conception of politics to the movement. Two well-directed campaigns have been set on foot, to league the peasantry in an agrarian movement, and to revolutionise the army. A few weeks after this historic Congress, thirty-seven "Young Turkish" officers were arrested in Constantinople. A few months later the Macedonian garrison is in revolt. When, in 1825, the "Decembrist" officers persuaded their men to shout for a Constitution at Moscow, it was afterwards discovered that the soldiers imagined that "Constitution" was the wife of the Arch-Duke Constantine. One may doubt whether these Turkish peasants know what they are shouting for. But at least they follow their leaders, and they have ceased to shout for Abdul Hamid. The educated Moslems of Turkey, like those of Russia, Egypt, and Persia, have turned their backs on their stagnant and stifling past.

In the light of these events, the first move of the new Anglo-Russian partnership in the Balkans reads like a conscious stroke of irony. Repression is to come before reform. The first half of the new programme is, accordingly, a proposal, put forward by Great Britain, to invite the Sultan to organise a specially destructive mobile column, under a Turkish general, with Hilmi Pasha as its presiding genius, to hunt down the Macedonian bands. The second half of the programme, which is to be fathered by Russia, will deal at leisure with the reforms to be applied, when "order" has been restored. The division of functions has been very cleverly arranged by M. Isvolsky. Great Britain will incur the odium of repression; Russia will reap the gratitude for reform. One may doubt, however, whether the repression is likely to be more effectual than the reforms. In the first place, the Sultan's army will be too busy in repressing itself to have much energy to bestow on the bands. In the second place, there is nothing new in this idea of a mobile punitive column. Yildiz Palace has dreamt of that before. There is already a force of this kind, with mounted infantry and machine guns and all the other resources of modern Imperialism. The only difficulty is that it does not do its work. The minor officers accept Greek bribes; the senior officers are politicians enough to understand that the Sultan prefers to rule by fomenting Christian feuds. It massacres Bulgarian bands to the last man, for they are really formidable. It allows the Greek and Servian bands to prey on the Bulgarian villages, for that is the easiest way of thinning out the rebellious majority. The new punitive column, if it ever is constituted, will observe this consecrated tradition.

The Anglo-Russian scheme has no very rosy future before it. "Order" cannot be restored while the administration itself is anarchical. The organic reforms, which are to be realised only after a due number of rebels have been slaughtered, are still in the future, like M. Stolypin's own reforms at home. When Sir Edward Grey's original plan has been revised, first by Russia, then by the Concert, and finally by the Sultan, it is unlikely that much of value will remain. The real crisis will come later, and it will come in the form not merely of a local Macedonian, but of a general Turkish problem. It will find us tied to the Power which has worked incessantly for a century to degrade and corrupt the Turkish governing class, the Power which regards the Armenians with a bitter hatred, the Power which has just destroyed the promise of a free national life in Persia. Russian statecraft will certainly not be sympathetic to the ideal of a federal Turkey, with the Armenians and the Young Turks in the ascendant. Shall we find ourselves committed to the policy of seconding her reactionary interventions, as we have tolerated her coup d'état in Persia?

THE GROWTH OF AMERICAN RADICALISM.

The American Democrats have had a varied career. For seventy years after the close of the Civil War they were shut out from power. Walpole kept himself in office by dubbing every Tory a Jacobite. The Republicans of the 'sixties, 'seventies and early 'eighties kept the Presidency, and, as a rule, both Houses of Congress, in their hands, by branding every Democrat a copperhead, a rebel, a friend of the South, a supporter of slavery. It was not until 1885 that a Democratic President entered the White House. The Republicans had used their long lease of office to surround themselves with a stout hedge of capitalistic interests. The relaxation that follows a great national effort had opened an easy path to abuses. The Reconstruction policy that was adopted in the South argued a deplorable lack of governing capacity. Protection accumulated in the Treasury vast and unnecessary surpluses that were scandalously frittered away. It was essentially as a protest against waste, corruption, the organised robbery of the tariff, and the conception of government as an affair of friends, that Mr. Cleveland was elected. We are able to see now that his two terms of office were a period of incubation, that the Democratic Party had not yet "found itself," and that the Conservatives who dominated its councils had no intention of allowing the measures they had advocated on the stump to be written on the Statute book. Several years of bad trade and poor harvests, culminating in the crash of 1893, and a succession of labor disputes, marked with all the peculiar fervency that Americans throw into their attack upon and their defence of capital, conspired to give the Radicals their chance. The mortgaged farmers of the West and the hungry, dissatisfied artisans of the towns were in the mood for almost any solution that promised relief. Free silver was offered them by men who honestly but quite erroneously believed that "the crime of '73" was the cause of all the country's misfortunes. They accepted it voraciously, not because they understood what it meant, but because they felt vaguely that wealth was too powerful and labor overborne and oppressed.

That was the real birth of American Radicalism. The Chicago platform of 1896 was hysterically attacked at the time. The entire East thought and spoke of the Democratic Party as under the control of men who, at best, were lunatics, and, at worst, revolutionists, incendiaries, and anarchists; and London seemed to find no difficulty in endorsing and emphasising the verdict. Yet there is little smell of gunpowder about the Chicago platform as one reads it to-day. Apart from Free Silver, it did not contain a single plank to which an English Liberal would object. Plant an English Liberal in the States and he is irresistibly drawn into favoring the Democratic Party. He would recognise that the Democrats are fighting the very battle of individual liberty that the English Liberals have waged for a hundred years. He would be in favor of a tariff for revenue only. So are the Democrats. He would declare war on trusts and monopolies, on all the terrible instruments of oppression which the American plutocracy has collected and wields with cynical remorselessness. So do Mr. Bryan and his followers. He would support an income-tax, and, above all, he would oppose with all his might "government by injunction"—that iniquitous perversion of justice which has made the American courts a handmaid to the arrogance of capital. He would realise, again, that Bryanism is at bottom a duplication, under four heads, of the eternal struggle for the emancipation of labor, and the return to an abler and more equitable democracy. The Bryanites of 1896 denounced Protection less as a mistake in fiscal policy than as a prolific breeder of trusts and monopolies. They denounced trusts and monopolies chiefly because they threatened to doom the youth of America to clerkships in the employ of a handful of millionaires. They denounced "government by injunction" as an unscrupulous abuse of the proper rights of capital; and they favored Free Silver because they believed they saw in the Gold Standard one more engine of plutocratic domination, and one more proof of the sinister alliance between Wall Street and Washington. That their currency heresies were really heresies they now themselves admit. That they were right in their fundamental attitude towards the far more vital questions of social and economic progress, few Americans now would be found to dispute. In 1896, however, the national mind was beclouded by such puerile generalisations as "the East stands for gold and honesty, the West for silver and knavery." Believing Bryanism to be a gospel of public immorality the Americans voted it down.

In 1900 the issue had changed. The United States had become an Imperial and Colonial power, and Mr. Bryan put his opposition to Imperialism in the forefront of his programme. His policy offended not the instinctive sentiments of his countrymen, but their practicality. They could not see that the results of the Spanish war had left them any option but to act as Mr. McKinley acted. Mr. Bryan fought a brilliant but hopeless fight. Twice defeated at the polls, he was faced with an internal revolt against his leadership. The Conservatives rallied in 1904, captured the nominating convention, deposed Mr. Bryan, and chose a candidate who was "safe and sane." The result was instructive. Judge Parker neither startled anybody nor attracted anybody. He was not merely defeated, he was annihilated. Most of the Radicals in the Democratic Party either abstained from voting, or voted for Mr. Roosevelt. Conservative Democracy was rightly appraised by the electorate as nothing but Republicanism and water. Half-frightened by the excesses of Mr. Bryan, half-cowed by defeat, the Democrats had assumed a temporary and unnatural Conservatism only to find it repudiated both by the nation and by the most earnest members in their own ranks. But a party that has once tasted Radicalism can never again be quite the same. There followed after 1904, as there was bound to follow, a reaction against the reaction. The party made a rush not merely to re-occupy, but to push forward the abandoned outposts. Mr. Bryan's ascendency, never really forfeited, became once more an unchallenged fact. The adoption by Mr. Roosevelt of most of the planks in the Chicago platform of 1896 helped to put Mr. Bryan in a juster light. He is unquestionably the only Democrat in the country who can hope to wipe out the enormous lead with which the Republicans enter the campaign. The task may again prove to be beyond his strength. But Bryanism is something greater than Mr. Bryan, and his personal fortunes will not affect or discount the inspiring fact that the Democratic Party is again on the high-road of Radicalism, and in touch once more with realities.

WANTED, A NEW SCHEME OF CULTURE.

The rise and growth within our time of a dozen or more Universities in our great industrial and commercial centres is, in part, no doubt, an endeavour to secure a wider sphere of operation for disinterested culture. But, though the spirit of our older Universities has, in varying degrees of power, informed these new seats of learning, other popular requirements and influences have served to modify, and even to transform, the work and the conception of a University. To have sought to plant about the country a number of little Oxfords or Cambridges, even had such a course been practicable, would have been a very grave mistake. For true culture cannot live either as an individual or a social factor by ignoring the special and practical needs of particular localities and grades of population. It is not merely a matter of historical significance that most of these new colleges have received their early endowments from the local patriotism of successful business men, and that some of them have hardly emerged from the chrysalis condition of a group of technical schools upon a rigorously utilitarian basis of physical science. Disinterested culture, as the flower of personal perfection, has not been the governing ideal in the movement. It is the perception of the truth that the struggle for life, for individual and national success in business, politics, and other lines of material achievement, requires the cultivation of the sciences, that has furnished most of the impetus. We have come to believe that "efficiency" depends upon trained engineers, chemists, lawyers, doctors, accountants, plenty of them, and we are prepared to find some money and some effort to provide this sort of person. To some very inadequate extent we also realise that a general intellectual foundation must be laid for this technical superstructure. The grave problem of the relation between these utilitarian and local standards of efficiency and the claims and needs of personal culture, we have never as a nation seriously set out to consider. Few even among our "educationalists" seem to realise the danger of the policy of stimulating the utilitarian motives with the view of correcting their excesses afterwards. They grasp eagerly after funds for the endowment of "brewing" chairs, military economics, or "loaded" Colonial history, with the result that the trend towards specific utilities is everywhere eating out the heart from the older and the wiser conception of the functions of a University. Though Lord Morley, addressing last week the members of the oldest of these new Universities at Manchester, stirred but lightly the embers of this hot controversy, his plea for the spirit of a University consisting in "the majesty of truth, the unity of learning, and the interdependence of knowledge," as distinguished from the dominion of technique, was no conventional rhetoric, but the utterance of a true prophet of education. To do both things, not by way of compromise or forced union, but of harmony, to recognise and to secure that the bank clerk, or the mechanic, or the cotton spinner, shall become a better man, a better citizen, a better worker, by studying the wisdom of the sages at the same time as the technique of his craft, and that such association of studies is essential for the conduct of life, this is the task before the University of the People.

Now, very little is being done to realise this ideal, and the fault, in our judgment, is not wholly or chiefly due to the drive of immediate utilities. The trouble lies deeper. Culture, in the sense of serious and vital concerns for the things that matter most in the life of thought and feeling, still remains a cloistered virtue, not merely the "possession" of a class, but a buried treasure in the separate minds of its possessors. There has never been a time when the great human facts and mysteries of birth, life, death, and all the profound and simple passions that gather round them, have been subjected to such a flood of various new light as within our generation. The marvellous revelations, not only of the new sciences, but of scholars and historians, illuminating the longitude and latitude of humanity, are everywhere forcing re-statements of the eternal enigmas and suggesting rich new solutions, or justifying the wisdom of the ancients by converting their speculations into verifiable laws. Would it not seem as if the intellects and hearts of men would be suffused to overflowing with the sheer interest and passion of such a new renaissance, and that its intellectual flow would dominate ordinary intercourse in educated circles? But is this the case? It is hard to find even a little coterie in any grade of English society in which conversation is apt to turn and dwell upon any issue graver than the surface features of some secondary question of politics or morals. Even among earnest religious folk, or laborers in some field of social reform, there is a studied avoidance of depths. Intelligent foreigners often express astonishment that in English "society" all matters of gravity and all displays of simple, strong emotion are "taboo," and they are apt to put their surprise too hastily into some theory of national psychology. But the real problem is better illustrated, not in the frivolity of ordinary society, but in the intercourse of personally cultivated men, such as are found in college or public school common-rooms or in London literary or artistic gatherings. Clever utterances will emerge occasionally in the midst of shallow talk about persons and events, but any sort of searching argument, even on matters which are known deeply to interest many of those present, is impossible. The difficulty becomes humorous when the gathering, as sometimes in a common-room, contains "specialists" supposed among them to cover a large segment of the entire circle of knowledge. For the specialist must not talk "shop," and no one else dare intrude upon a specialism.

To search the causes of this inhibition would carry us too far afield. That new knowledge, or even new hypothesis, should be narrowly appropriated to some little group of biologists, physicists, or economists, instead of flowing freely into every mind capable of assimilating it, is, perhaps, the greatest intellectual waste of our age—save one. That one is the persistent, the criminal, neglect of literature. This, too, is in part attributable to the same excess of specialism. What are we to say of the modern professor of theology who, when asked whether he was ready to apply to the New Testament those canons of authenticity which he had found so profitable in dealing with the Apocrypha, replies, "Ah, the New Testament is outside my province"? But it is in dealing with literature that we touch to the quick the inadequacy of "culture" to hold its own against the pressure of utilities in our new Universities. It is not materialism or commercialism that here is chiefly to blame, but the refusal of the directors and shareholders of "culture" to submit to an audit and a re-assessment of cultural values. Compulsory Greek is but the fringe of this great issue, which turns upon the obvious impossibility of applying to the spiritual nutrition of the common people an intellectual and emotional diet framed for the dainty palate of an aristocracy. Only by studying the process of selection and exclusion by which most literature has fitted itself into the place it has occupied in the decorative culture of a class can we understand the careful but far-reaching readjustment that is needed for popular culture. In a word, if practicality needs the softening influence of that pursuit of personal perfection upon which Matthew Arnold laid so much stress, culture itself needs purging of not a few elements of artifice and preciosity which it has acquired by too exclusive association on the one hand with an academic caste, on the other with the recreative life of the leisured classes.

Thus we come round to the old issue of the severance of literature from life, of words from things. The bridging of this chasm is one of the essential tasks in democracy: for a people, liable, on the one hand, continually to commit itself to the hasty grasping after immediate utilities, and, on the other, to be misled by specious tricks of language, can never possess power, lacking, as it must, true self-possession. We believe that the feeling in favor of organising the higher education of the people so as to stir the great latent fund of curiosity about things that matter is gradually settling down to certain serviceable judgments. The first of these is that the prime instruments of the culture of a nation are its own language, literatrue, and history, regarded not only as the repository of its own thought and achievements, but as the interpreter of others. The obstinate preference for alien, and necessarily inferior, instruments is itself sufficient proof of the need of that radical revision of culture standards for which we plead.

A still harder, but not less far-reaching, reform is suggested in the pregnant saying which Lord Morley quoted from Bacon: "When you read, remember you do it not to contradict nor to confute, not to believe nor to take for granted, nor in order to find talk and discourse, but to weigh and consider." Now, gravity of mind and the habit of consideration obtain no proper and proportionate place in the aims of education in the schools and colleges frequented by the sons and daughters of our upper classes. To this, perhaps, more than to any other cause, is attributable that levity of intellectual intercourse to which reference is made above. Not extent of knowledge, nor breadth of vision, nor dexterity in reasoning, are of quite the same importance as this habit of weighing and considering both words and facts. This, at any rate, is true of our age and our people, and those concerned to promote the higher education of the people may safely set before any other consideration the cultivation of a gravity of intellectual habit.

Life and Letters.

OLYMPIA REDIVIVA.

To read a succession of articles, such as have appeared this week, in celebration of the ancient Olympic Games, with their stories of the "divine honors" paid to successful athletes and the breaches made in the walls of cities in order that men so noble might not enter by the common gate, has a curious effect on the mind. It almost makes one doubt whether any nation so eccentric as the ancient Greeks can really have existed, and even have attained a considerable amount of success, upon this earth. The stories, no doubt, are always related apart from their context, and seldom quite exactly; and, of course, the rhetorical effect of mere selection is very great. If one chose to collect all the instances of public or private enthusiasm manifested in England over, let us say, music-hall stars, tame elephants, or millionaires, it would not be hard to produce the impression that almost the whole nation was occupied in admiring one or other of those objects. Yet, when all allowance is made for exaggeration, the Olympic Games had their own meaning, and served their own valuable purpose in history, though, perhaps, not for a very large portion of their twelve hundred years of life.

The immense fame of the Olympiad Festivals comes largely from their having been chosen as giving an era, or a means of dating other events. The Romans had apparently a fixed tradition of the founding of their city; they could date historical occurrences by the year ab urbe condita. There was no such fixed era for the Greeks. Some historians dated from the fall of Troy; but opinions varied within some six hundred years as to the time of that occurrence itself. There were divers other systems. Some dated by the Archons at Athens, or by the priestesses in the temple of Hera at Argos. But, apart from other objections, neither system was international, and both implied that the reader must know his list of archons or priestesses by heart. The archons were more satisfactory than the priestesses, because they had, at least, a fixed term of office. A priestess might hold office for one year or for thirty. But, obviously the great four-yearly festivals formed a better basis for dates than either, and among such festivals, the Olympian were probably the best. True, the Pythian Games at Delphi were fully as famous and inspired far more religious feeling. But the temple at Delphi was too much exposed to disturbance and pillage. Olympia lay quiet, out of the main track of war and political trouble. And Olympia professed, truly or falsely, to have a record of all conquerors since the great re-constitution of the Games in 776 B.C. The Games themselves are just declining from their prime glory at the time when we hear most about them, in the fifth century B.C. Bodily prowess was still such an important quality in a man that, if any great athlete happens to play a part in history, the historians generally mention his victories in the Games. But it was no longer an age in which Shaw the Lifeguardsman could seriously be regarded as a more admirable warrior than the Duke of Wellington. And in Pindar, the writer from whom we hear most praise of the Games, there is a constant undercurrent of regret, irritation, almost bewilderment, that the world is no longer attaching proper importance to the great boxing and horse-racing nobles, and to him, their prophet. Pindar, an aristocrat himself, was the poet of Dorian aristocracy. He was the bard of those great houses which, in spite of their not infrequent occupation in trade, their occasional leading forth of an adventurous colony, remained for the most part grumbling and half-forgotten, while the main stream of Hellenic life swept past them. They were men of courage and muscle; great hunters, runners, boxers; if need came, great warriors, though only in the manner of their ancestral tradition, with none of your modern book-learning or siege-tactics. Their object was to be "good men," and they meant by "goodness" what their grandfathers had meant. If they were outstripped in the race of life, it was as their great ancestor Ajax had been beaten by the unworthy Odysseus. Pindar added another quality to the "goodness," or Aretê, which he required of his patrons; they must "spend"—spend their money and strength and effort freely, for the attaining and maintaining of their Aretê.

It was a great ideal in its day, and Pindar conceives of it greatly. The misfortune is that in the Fifth Century it has ceased to correspond to outward facts. The time which created it was the period after the great race-migrations, especially after the Dorian conquest of the Peloponnese. Mr. Louis Dyer has shown how the Olympian festival is derived from an ancient pre-Dorian gathering of a number of neighbouring villages at a centre which they called "Pylos"; a gathering of the ordinary four-yearly type, with common worship and sacrifice, open competitive games, and opportunities for settling by discussion and arbitration any inter-communal difficulties. A general truce was, of course, necessary for any such common meeting, and was enforced, as usual, by taboos and curses. Eventually the whole territory of Elis, in which the festival was held, was declared "sacred," or, in modern language, neutral, and any invasion of it forbidden.

After the Dorian conquest, this festival became widened and glorified. The Peloponnese became full of conquering warriors out of work, athletes of war, with no one left to make war on. The games had a much closer relation to war than modern athletics have; and the idea of Aretê, or "goodness," in a man or a warrior, had become prominent and forceful in the Greek world. The conquerors of the Peloponnese liked the opportunity of practising Aretê and displaying it one against another. Only the nobles, as a rule, had leisure for such exercises. Hesiod, the peasant poet, never speaks of the games; neither is Piers Ploughman interested in tourneys. Nobles of other races joined in. The wealthy new nobility of Sicily and Italy not only won horse races—they had more money to buy expensive horses—but actually distinguished themselves in personal prowess. The games served a great purpose. They gave a harmless and humane outlet to the fighting spirit of many conquering tribes. They kept up the invaluable tradition of periodic friendly meetings between neighbour states, of the security of the public roads, of the notion of a fixed international state of peace and decent conduct even in the midst of warring units. And they served intensely, almost too intensely, to keep up that desire for "goodness" judged by competitive standards, which is at the root of many of the best and worst qualities of ancient Greece. Like most conquering nations, the classical Greeks were "good sportsmen." On the whole, one can see that Pindar's men neither cheat nor accuse others of cheating, and mostly take a defeat like men. It is only boys who are said to jeer at a defeated competitor, and those, I suppose, were the boys who looked on, not the boys who competed.

The decline in the importance of the games came when the idea of "goodness" changed. Aretê began to be identified, in part or whole, with Sophia. Goodness began to include "Wisdom," or the qualities of the intellect, and the old purely athletic virtues inevitably paled. True, a strong element of "wisdom" in various forms found its way into the Olympian Festival. Herodotus read his wonderful book aloud there. The great fifth century sophists lectured there. Poets recited their poems. Hippias illustrated how the "wise" man was self-sufficing, and should be the maker of his own cloak, tunic, boots, and signet ring, as well as the author of his own peace of mind. When Hippolytus wished to "stand high in the Great Games of Hellas," he was probably thinking more of "wisdom" than of pure athletics. But in reality "wisdom" had not much chance of cutting a good figure at these contests. Make the most sympathetic arrangements you will, a lecture by Huxley and a recitation by Tennyson would scarcely have "a fair show" at, say, the Henley regatta or the Oxford and Cambridge sports, not to speak of Epsom. The spiritually active part of Greece devoted itself more and more to "Wisdom"; the mere pressure of the world worked, as usual, in the direction of success and money-making; and Pindar's Dorian nobles were left to cultivate their splendid bodies and their expensive horses somewhat in a backwater of the national stream. True, they had more influence on ordinary adult life than athletes now have. Euripides, though a good athlete himself, once or twice denounces their influence with an intensity which would not be too great in a modern public school. Plato gently satirises the fashionable young Athenians who showed their admiration of things Spartan by acquiring, at much inconvenience, broken noses and "prize-fighter's ears." And it remains true, and a rather important truth, that in the comparatively simple conditions of ancient society, a man's body was much more with him and more important to him than it is now. The toothless and short-sighted man had then no oculist and dentist to put him, as a matter of course, on an equality with his fellows. The flabby man was not hidden behind good tailoring; the obese man did not fly lightly on a motor-car, he waddled and perspired. And correspondingly there certainly was—the statues alone would prove it—a great deal of sincere admiration for an object which has now been so long and sedulously hidden from human eyes that it has whitened like a starved plant out of the sun, the healthy and well-developed human body.

But in the main, though the concourses of people at Olympia were probably greater in the fifth and fourth centuries than in the seventh and sixth, the inward meaning of the Games was passing rapidly away at the very beginning of our classical period. They represent the ideal of a young Greece which possessed already many of her characteristic qualities, the intensity, the desire to excel and be praised, the frankness and the aversion to cruelty; but a Greece which had not yet awakened to the possession of an intellect or a moral character. And it was with these qualities that the future of Greece lay. After the deaths of Pindar and Bacchylides no more great poets thought it worth while to celebrate boxing matches and races of four-horse chariots or mule waggons. And by the first century Cicero anxiously contradicts the rumor that he has gone to attend the Olympian Games: such a thing would be beneath his dignity, scarcely even reputable.

GILBERT MURRAY.

RECRUITS.

YEARLY in thousands they arrive, because of tradition, necessity, or desire, to start their life. The Big Grey City claims them, and they come—thinking themselves men.

By their quick, untroubled eyes, and lifted head, and a certain conscious pride of walk, they show their youth; and their freshness is revealed in a suggested readiness to smile and look about.

They come from the universities, bound with an etiquette that rules their very talk, or loudly sure of the originality to create new verities; from the public schools they come, still mindful of their monitorial authority, or insistent of their liberty to drink and smoke; and they come from the training places of the Continent, imbued with a whetted taste for the freedom and indulgences of men. But a glad excitement of the mind predominates the infinite variety of their temperament.

For they have no past; for them the little trying disillusionments of present effort are not yet; they only know the elevating stir of large, unproved expectancy. So they are very sure. To them all things seem possible, and all women are fair, and men are but friendly rivals, as in the honorable rivalry of games. Because, in the beginning, they see as from a long way off, and they imagine what they feel they ought to find. For them the written lessons of centuries, and the seriously spoken word of older men, are all as fables, or the bloodless bogey-tales of frightened age. It is their conscious destiny to find out for themselves.

Therefore they come into the stress and gaiety of the city's life, hungry for the knowledge that is to make them old; and they reach out confidently to learn the all that has been known and memorised and written down forever and forever before. The splendid arrogance of youth upholds them all with a present faith and the hope of better things.

So, while various reasons draw them to the city's crowded ranks, they all bring confidence and eagerness—and many bring irresponsibility—and all are free from the fear that sees too far. For the anticipation of imagined things is theirs.

According to their varied tendencies, they gauge the rush and struggle differently—a fair where all is merriment, a wonderland of women's smiles, or a field of victory for by-and-by. And they see vague visions of unknown possibilities, and day-dreams of strange happenings and love; and they feel ambition's first faint urgency. But mostly they feel the power to enjoy. Because, however much they dream of future fame, to all but a few pleasure is paramount at first; work is only a duty of their life.

For the glamor of their early days is very real. Their experience is all in front. And though they try to hide the want of it with carefully drawled speech, or copied cynicism, or silent smiles, an impatient curiosity eggs them on to see and do and know.

Because in their initiation all things seem very good. All is so new; and all they do or see is illuminated and intensified with the imagination of inexperience, which gives a fascinating significance to common things; even the unrealities seem real. Only the anxiety to be correct tempers the joy of their experiences. For the brilliant allurements of unfolding life enthral them utterly. They do not see or care about the underneath.

Enticed by their own enthusiasm, they contrive long leisure for social intercourse; and they think the time well spent. They talk away long afternoons in dainty drawing-rooms, telling indulgent women of their hopes, and they gaze with open homage into the pleasure-worn, renovated face, because the ease and completeness of maturity is wonderful to them. Contented in the confidence of proper clothes, they attend at the places where the pleasure-seekers crowd; and they hunt anxiously, so as not to be alone; and they sit back indolently, and chat and jest, in careless satisfaction with their lot; or they meet by appointment a woman or a girl, and they talk and talk forever of themselves, exacting an overshare of sympathy; or they try with cunning hints to gain a reputation for wickedness; or confidently discuss the life-problems that perplex the minds of learned men. And always they play seriously at making love; for the imagined attraction of some one woman is essential to their state. Even the deliberate graciousness that makes use of them they prize, and act as escort, and pay the required expenses eagerly, thinking the honor of the company sufficient cause.

Under a studious indifference they glow with the satisfied desire of seeing life. At dances, though they may lean against the door, and hide their want of partners with assumed disdain, the lilt and shimmer of the dancing stir their blood; so that they go whenever they are asked, grumbling with spurious dislike; and they diligently arrange beforehand a programme of their own. And at fashionable functions, where rank and fame and riches congregate, they watch and enjoy the pageant secretly, with a hidden thrill at accomplished contact with the public world. The joy of a life of pleasure possesses them.

For, with each succeeding new experience, the excitement and appreciation grow, so that they seek for opportunities, and pay a willing tribute of calls, to help them to a leisure of hurried, overlapping gaiety. Their ambition is a crowded mantelpiece of cards.

Besides the enhanced amusements of a social round, the glamor of the city's life at night attracts them curiously. The tradition of dissipation lures them on with a certain inquisitive excitement of doing wrong.

They risk their temperance and peace of mind in evenings of expensive food and fun. They dine in splendour, without really caring what they eat, because of the glitter and the music and the glow. They drift into the reek and glare of music halls for fun; but they look into the tired eyes with unexpected diffidence, and meet the feverish jest with almost shy respect, so that their temptation is made easier, by reason of a woman's gratitude. Impelled by inherited beliefs, they go with extravagant regularity to musical displays of woman's loveliness; and they fix their conventional affections on one of the ladies on the stage; so that an eventual contrived acquaintance, that allows of public hospitality, makes them very proud. They sup luxuriously with men, merely to prolong the evening's revelry; or they add their name to a woman's interminable list of temporary hosts—choosing expensive wine; and when their guest is known publicly they are content. Thus they indulge and over-drink and lose their innocence, in a preconceived idea of what is right.

But by reason of the curious immunity of youth, their learning years are wondrously free from serious harm. The careless confidence that makes the fun and trouble pulls them through. For their sin is thoughtless, and their dissipation is merriment. The premediated iniquity that scars and wrecks comes afterwards. They learn, and they lose their illusions in the learning, but they who are fit for future effort do not really spoil.

Thus, when the period of initiation ends after a few short years, they settle down—wiser by a knowledge of the worth of things, and better for a wisdom that understands. For by this early training they are tried. And as the city and the people of the city seem to change, the test and the memory of it help.

THE WATER OF THE MOORS.

The romance of water is little known to him who draws it from the housewall by turning a tap. It is the spirit of a leaden pipe twenty yards long and of iron pipes perhaps twenty miles long, all the brightness of an earlier origin strait-waistcoated out of it. All that can be said for it is that it is good enough for the strait-waistcoated people who compel it from its labyrinth in the depths of a town. Not good enough for us when we come from the tent with bare feet on the dew-drenched grass and ask for water for the breakfast coffee. We dip the can from the torrent gushing between rocks that its impetuosity can wear no deeper than a chance impurity may cling. Then we lay it aside and take our morning dip in the pool from which it gushes, scaring the minnows and the trout with our happy floundering. Now, see the miracles that happen in this moorland water when it is upon the fire. For miles it has burbled and chattered in rocky waterfalls and cascades, sweeping here, tumbling there, resting at whiles, but fully making up for delays by later impetuosity. You can see or divine at sight that its history has been free and happy, but only when the fire quickens under the pot can you fully realise how much air it has gathered in its frolicsome career. The camp kettle that we filled with water is full of great pearls, which even become diamonds as they sway and break, flattening and sparkling with almost colored fire as they dance upward and vanish from their aqueous prison. Don't tell us that the boiling undoes all the tumbling of the trout stream. We have seen those pearls, and by so much the more relish our tea beyond that infused from the spray of a leaden pipe.

The trout, if not the best of all fish, is in every way far superior to those that inhabit even the swift-flowing, deeper, and less joyous waters. They are "coarse fish," while our trout are game—game by virtue of their better table qualities, and game in their love of life and the determination with which they fight for it. The better the water, the better the fish. How does John Ridd (in whose stream we will fish after breakfast) dwell on the delicacy of pickled loaches? We have not tasted them, but we are ready to believe that these tiny fish are excellent. They belong to the joyous stream. It brings them abundant oxygen even beneath the stones which they are bound to use as protection from the trout. When we turn them out, delicate and bearded, they remain awhile almost invisible by their similarity to the bed of the stream, then dart to shelter of another stone. Here, also, are the game little bullheads, capable of choking the grebe or kingfisher that should dare to swallow them, and worthy of a chapter all to themselves.

The insect life of our trout stream is beyond that of all the moors and all the forests through which it flows. Nine out of ten of all the dancing myriads of flies own the water as their birthplace. The stones are coated with little houses slated with chips about the size of these letters, most knowingly cemented together. Others, like the well-known caddis, have skins or overcoats of stick or stone, which give them the advantage of armour without the inconvenience of a fixed abiding-place. Every day the stream gives up a fresh horde of specifically new insects to dance in the sun and then return to feed the trout. All our dragon-flies, from the indigo-green or bronze-winged drakes and feeble demoiselles to the great whizzing "horse-stinger," come from the water. We catch the biggest of them all, and find that a fat fly between his jaws was the absorbing event that permitted us to steal a march on him. He is so rapt in its juiciness that he mumbles it between our fingers till it is all gone. But if you give this great dragon-fly warning of your intention to catch him, you can have no warier antagonist. He measures to a nicety the length of your butterfly-net, and seems to delight in letting you get almost within striking distance, and in dashing to and fro just beyond its sphere of influence.

But where is water for heather and whortleberries these brazen days? Before the sun has mounted half-way the sky is pitiless blue. At times, some taunting, unreachable argosy sails along on some errand entirely unconnected with our wants. Most promising young thunderclouds, rolled into crisp billows that speak of electrical restraint, show their backs above the hills, then revolve out of sight like some marine monster that has been up for a breather and gone back to its own world. But the heat of the world, whether physical or mental, is not diminished by such dreams of cool showers. Most life has fled from the moors. The crow looks over them for such cripples as may not have been able to remove, and migratory bands of doves take berries there as they roam on towards the sea. Long, widening green seams proclaim the more or less perennial watercourses, for here only trees are equal to the task of growing. These coombes are perfect oases in a sun-scorched desert, and they contain all that roams the moors on cool nights or at damper seasons of the year. Here the black-cock crows his thanks for a green and tranquil life; the red stag couches out of sight of man and almost out of scent of flies; the half-wild ponies climb like monkeys down to water that is deep enough to cover the fetlocks, and there stand swishing their tails and waiting for the cool of the evening.

Out of that brazen sky, that dry air that extracts pounds of moisture from the pores if we only sit and pant in it, there falls at night a copious dew. Long before daylight fades, the grass glistens with it, our last perambulation of the tent to see if the ropes are tight is a cold-water paddle, and as we lie in bed, we like to stretch out the arms and feel that the blessed water is really in the air. Now the argosies are thickening in the sky, and the wind that passes through the trees seems to be asking whether they are ready for rain. Their response is a cheering intimation that rain will come. It comes in the middle of the night pattering on our woven roof with welcome vehemence. The big spots, well driven by a forty-mile wind, send each a tiny spray through that kisses the face like dew. Bell after bell is added to the chime of the brook that before morning speaks with a hundred tongues to the two-noted tingle that was its message yesterday. The bog that never runs dry has been overcharged and is sending down the surplus like any pool. The coombes are running, from the last outpost mountain ash. The bracken roots cannot cope with what they have received and the improvident heather is shooting off the water it has been longing for. The caddis grubs have to fight for it in a torrent that rolls stones as big as cricket balls.

Loaches and bullheads are unhoused and must thank their lucky stars that the clear water of their stream is turned thick brown. No less grateful are we for this slight circumstance that puts us on equal terms with the trout. We have waited many days for the rain, and it has come at last.

Short Story.

II.—ANOTHER POINT OF VIEW.

You said I was to write and tell you all about it; but there is nothing to tell. We never even said good-bye. There isn't one good solid memory, just looks and tones that melt away. All the same, I know he cared.

You told me not to play with fire, and I suppose I have done. Fire's so warm and pretty to play with; besides, it didn't look like fire, truly, at the beginning. It looked like the Higher Life. I wondered why it was so much nicer than it had ever been before . . . and then, somehow, the whole thing blazed up . . . I think I hope he isn't burned so badly as I am.

You see, he was a kind of saint, and he was going to be a medical missionary, and bring all the essential elements of all the religions together, and make everyone live up to it, and she was going to help him—but I haven't come to her. I knew he was engaged to her, but I didn't realise it; and he was coaching with Father —that's how we saw so much of him. He'd taken his B.A. long ago, and he had brilliant talents, and he had intended to be a lawyer, only the Higher Life wouldn't let him. The Higher Life is very particular, and it made him be a missionary after working in the slums.

You know his name was Bernard, and I used to call him St. Bernard. He'd such a splendid medieval face; it made you feel that all your life had been wasted, and you must begin to do something great. I honestly didn't think at first about his caring for me in a human way. I'd as soon have expected Cardinal Newman to come down off the wall in the National Portrait Gallery and say how pretty my hair was, and shake hands. It seemed as if the immortal part of you was the only thing that mattered. I knew my mortal part was rather nice to look at, but he made me think that my immortal part might be a perfect frump all the while. I made up my mind I would be good too, before I'd done.

Then one day I saw his eyes shine, when I'd put on a new hat. Such a dream of a hat; and I'd a kind of a gown on like the dying blue in an evening sky, with little bits of rosy clouds flecked up and down in it! I do love being beautiful, and spending money on dress. It was sweet; and he didn't mean to show it, but his eyes gave him away, for one moment, before he recollected himself, and switched off the light, and looked stern. So I said:—

"I know what you are thinking, that it would send a crippled child in Shoreditch to a cottage hospital. And it would—six of them; but isn't it right to look nice?"

Then he laughed, he couldn't help it, and we plunged into the midst of things, and I told him I really had a soul, but I expected if there was an astral plane, as the Theosophists said, it was going about there all in rags —and wasn't that compensation, or Karma, or Providence, or something—the horrid thing that wouldn't let you eat your cake and have it, no matter how good the cake was?

After that, of course, we grew more friendly, and I thought I would live for others, off and on, anyhow. I went to see the nearest crippled children I could find, and took them strawberries; and I went slumming with the Kilburn Sisters, and came back and told him about it. It was so nice to see his eyes shine again, and feel it wasn't just for my face this time, or my hat—it was for the real Me. Oh, it was lovely being good; I began to think I'd been a ready-made saint all the while without knowing it. I suppose it's only the first step that doesn't count in goodness.

We talked about the universal brotherhood, and we got deeper and deeper. I know now it was all a quicksand; but, somehow, it looked like a rock. And I used to play Chopin to him; and one day I saw him pick up a carnation I'd dropped—a big rose carnation—and he kissed it. He didn't know I saw him; and I had no right to pretend I didn't see it drop. I suppose that was the climax, there wasn't much comfort in it. His grip of himself was almost perfect. And—I hadn't realised Miriam then—but you can't make a man make love to you, even if you know he'd like it! Only I've wished, ever since, he'd kissed me just that once instead of the carnation.

The next day Miriam came to tea. It was pure accident that I'd never seen her before, and she hadn't seemed to count. I'd always heard of her as very good and very clever, and hardly human, a kind of woman who didn't need love . . . When I saw her I knew she did count—she did need it.

You've never seen Miriam, have you? She's terribly perfect all round. She's always been living for others. She lived for her father first, and then for her invalid brother, and they died, and Bernard will die too, he'll get so tired of being lived for! She's the kind of woman who'd "live each day as if the last" for you!

That's mean, and she's splendid. She's simply soaked in humanity, and she took a tripos in philosophy. She talks about the ultimate reality and about the phenomenal plane—that's the plane people like me live and die on, and it's a worthless plane, no better than a casual ward. She wouldn't be bad looking if she didn't wear the wrong colors, but then her soul's beautiful, and she scores there—souls are so much more durable than bodies, if, that is, we're immortal. Though if being immortal just means being merged in a kind of general glory I don't see that it matters. But, no, I'm sure she'll always have a special glory where she is!

I asked her to write in my album, and she wrote about scaling the crags of duty. That's what she'll always do, and so will Bernard, and they'll come out together on the shining table-lands, and I shan't be in it—because the first real crag of duty will either have fallen on me or have left me dead with climbing it.

But she's this kind of woman: if she knew how I cared, and how he cared, she'd give him up like a shot. And you may be a poor tool, but it feels cheap to do to anyone what you know she'd rather die than do to you. I did nothing at college—worse luck! I never took an exam. I hadn't the brains, or the pluck, or the plod. I had lovely times with the dons, and the men; I broke every rule there was to break. But the girls always used to say, whatever I was, I was cricket.

And I watched Miriam; she didn't look to me as if her goodness had made her quite happy. Perhaps goodness never does, not until you're perfectly certain you can't get anything else. But I saw her face in the mirror when she was looking at Bernard, and his face was turned away . . . It isn't often you see a person's bare soul; when you do, you wish you hadn't. I'd meant to make a stand—but I gave in.

There are things even a girl like me can't do, that are like putting prussic acid in someone's afternoon tea, but worse, much worse. I saw what Bernard was to her, what it would mean to lose him. That's why I'm going to Egypt next month with Uncle John and Aunt Fanny. I expect the mummies will do me good. I shall think they were all alive, and now they are dead, and I shall die too, and nothing matters. Only, I couldn't go anywhere while he was ill; he fell ill, you see, three weeks after I first met Miriam—three nightmare weeks, and he has been ill a fortnight. I wanted to send flowers and grapes, but I didn't. He'll think I don't care. When I come back they will be married, and they will have left England.

September 7th.—If ever anyone tells you that goodness is the way to happiness don't believe it, it isn't true. I've never been good before; I never want to be good again. Up to the very last minute I was hoping something would happen. I thought she would find out the whole truth by some miracle and set him free. I wouldn't have let her lose him, she should have come and lived with us!

Yes, I was good on the surface. I never bought a wedding present. I knew I should only buy something that Bernard would have to look at, that would make him think of me. But, oh, how I begged him to come, with my soul, before I went to Egypt. It seemed as if such a longing must reach from the North Pole to the South Pole. I prayed, too; I don't think much of prayer. I must have begun fifty letters, saying I was glad he was better, asking him to come round and say goodbye . . . If I had! If he had!

But I never sent one of them. I finished quite a number. Several times I directed and stamped them, and took them to the pillar-box, and something stopped me. I suppose a person like Miriam would think it was God. I wish God would mind His own business and leave other people's alone, and let them post their own letters. I wasn't doing any harm to Him! And I'm a heathen, but I did love Bernard; and he loved me, and what if, after all, she never makes him happy?

Well, it's too late now. I've burned all my boats, except this boat that is going away, further and further from England—and I'm on it.

I can't help it, it was cricket. We shall all be dead soon.

MAY KENDALL.

Present-Day Problems.

THE HARMSWORTH BRAND.

THE announcement in the "Daily Chronicle," the "Morning Leader," and other journals, that the chief proprietor of the "Daily Mail" has acquired a "controlling interest in the "Times," is far too serious an event to pass unnoticed. The owners of the "Daily Mail" and the "Daily Express," appear to have contended for the prize; if these uncontradicted announcements are correct, it has fallen to the "Mail." It is not too much to say that with such a change of direction the life of the "Times" as a journal of authority comes to an end. The "Times" under Lord Northcliffe, may be an amusing, or a vivaciously conducted, or a commercially successful journal; it cannot well possess any moral or intellectual force. Sooner or later, to a larger or a smaller degree, it will be fixed into its proper place as part of a huge factory of printed matter, written to sell, and, incidentally, to acquire such an appearance of influence as may promote this strictly practical and limited aim. Some of its present qualities, such as the furtherance of hard, and essentially unenlightened, views of life, will, doubtless, persist. Other incidents in its later career, such as its publication of the forged letters, or of an obsolete edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," a manager of average prudence and adroitness may regard as warnings rather than as examples of enterprise or of party zeal. A third set of characteristics—the originality of the "Times"; its tradition of independence; its avoidance of snobbery; its air of haughty intellectuality; its power of influencing men's thoughts—must disappear as soon as its production is connected with the working of the loom that throws off treasures of fancy like "Golden Stories" and "The Funny Wonder." For while the object of this "gramophone" press, as Mr. Stead has well called it, is to take in all interests, its undisguised method is to be distinguished in nothing, to wrap up all the concerns of life in swathing bands of commonness, until the salient shows and figures in modern society—from Royalties to actresses—are involved in the net of flattery and advertisement that the conductors of the Harmsworth Press spread out for them. And the result is that whatever this group of tradesmen produce, and their output grows larger and more varied every day, they can produce nothing of individual merit—nothing in which the true elements of literature—passion, humor, truthfulness, deep or independent feeling, intellectual power, noble pity, or not less noble disdain—have any share. When they touch something distinct and interesting, it is straightway spoiled.

Two examples of this art of deformation will suffice. "Good Words" was, in its earlier days, one of the most refined of serious periodicals; to-day, it appears, under the Harmsworth auspices, a paper for lovers of gossip and cheap fiction. The "World" was, under Mr. Edmund Yates, remarkable for the strength of its critical and artistic work, to which men like Mr. Shaw and Mr. Archer contributed. To-day, its chief "feature" is the reproduction of snapshots of titled men and women, in talk with each other on race-courses and other places of amusement. The "religious" papers which this firm publishes have no moral or literary characteristics, distinguishing them from the "secular" papers. The issues which it controls may denounce gambling, or live on gamblers, or gamble directly through "Limericks" and "prize competitions," they may profess any form of religion, or party or national faith, may wrap their wares in all kinds of drapery. But they cannot conceal their aim and quality. To that quality the "Times" will come, and in the process will cease, in time, to possess any life or character of its own.

But before we discuss the nature of the Harmsworth publications, it is necessary to give the public some idea of their number and of the extent to which they are assuming the shape of a vast syndicated enterprise, aiming at the feeding, by a hundred conduit-pipes, of public taste and public opinion. The following, as far as we can gather, is a fairly complete list of the Harmsworth publications:—

PERIODICALS.

"Answers." 1d. weekly. Started as "Answers to Correspondence," and soon lapsing into a sensational periodical. The first weekly to offer large money prizes in competitions.

"Home Chat." 1d. weekly. Ladies' illustrated periodical. Modelled on Pearson's "Home Notes," started a few months previously.

"Penny Pictorial Magazine." 1d. weekly. Illustrated articles and sensational stories.

"The Country Side." 1d. weekly. A kind of "Tit-Bits" for naturalists.

"The Boy's Friend," "The Boy's Herald," "The Boy's Realm." 1d. weekly. Illustrated sensational stories, articles, &c.

"The Boy's Friend" Library. 3d. Reprinted stories from above.

"Pluck," "Marvel," "Union Jack." 1d. weekly. Started as ½d. weekly, ostensibly to "counteract the pernicious influence of penny dreadfuls." Clergymen wrote letters in defence and admiration of first numbers as they were perfectly harmless. On these traditions and testimonials later numbers (of a less ingenuous character) were accepted as "pure literature for the home." See advertisements.

"The Magnet," "The Gem." Later boys' papers of a character similar to the above. ½d. each weekly.

"The Girl's Friend." 1d. weekly. Sensational stories and advice on love.

"The Girl's Friend" Library. Reprinted stories from above.

"Forget-Me-Not." 1d. weekly. Ladies' illustrated paper. Romantic and sentimental stories, fashions, &c.

"Home Circle." 1d. weekly. Ladies' illustrated paper. Romantic and sentimental stories, fashions, &c. This periodical started as "Answers Supplement," and consisted of illustrated love stories. It was afterwards rechristened "Home, Sweet Home," and again altered to the name it now bears.

"Home Companion," "Woman's World." 1d. weekly. Women's illustrated papers similar to above.

"Cosy Corner," "Handy Stories." 1d. weekly. Illustrated novelettes. The second-named started as "Heartsease Library." It then became the "Handy Library," afterwards taking its present title.

"Fashions." (Discontinued.)

"Home Fashions." (Discontinued.)

"Fashions for All." An imitation of Welldon's journals.

"The Rambler." 1d. A cycling paper. (Discontinued.)

"The Sunday Magazine." 6d. monthly. A religious monthly purchased. (Discontinued.)

"Good Words." 1d. Purchased as an old, reputable sixpenny magazine, well and seriously written, and once edited by Norman MacLeod. Transformed into a penny weekly, commonly written, cheaply printed and illustrated, and divided, as are all these publications, between sentiment and sensation, relieved with gossip about clergymen and ministers.

"The Sunday Companion." 1d. weekly. A miscellany of "religious" scraps.

"The Sunday Companion" Library. Stories reprinted from above.

"Sunday Stories," "Sunday Circle," "Golden Stories." 1d. weekly. Filled with highly sensational and sentimental stories, in no way distinguished in character from those appearing in other Harmsworth issues, but with a seasoning of Biblical texts and a Church "atmosphere."

"Horner's Penny Stories." Purchased from an old-established firm.

"Horner's Library," "Horner's Weekly," "Horner's Pansy Stories." 1d. weekly. Started later on Harmsworth's usual lines. Contents similar to Harmsworth's "religious" publications.

"Fannie Eden's Penny Stories." Ditto.

"Comic Cuts," "Chips," two of the most profitable Harmsworth papers. ½d. weekly. Contents include sketches of the careers of criminals worked up into exciting serial stories, with wrappers of "funny," i.e., vulgar, pictures.

"The Jester." Similar to above, only 1d. weekly. It started as a comic broadsheet, the size of the "Daily Mail," under the title of "The Funny Wonder."

"Puck." 1d. weekly. A colored comic paper.

"The Butterfly." ½d. weekly. Similar to "Comic Cuts." Started as the "Comic Home Journal." Failing to sell, it was altered to the "Boy's Home Journal," and then to its present title.

"The World and His Wife." 6d. monthly. Started in imitation of the "Ladies' Home Journal" of Philadelphia.

"London Magazine." 4½d. monthly. Started as the "Harmsworth Magazine."

"The Red Magazine." 4½d. monthly, latest addition to the list. Illustrated fiction. Published so as not to be identified as a Harmsworth publication.

"The Connoisseur." 1s. monthly. A magazine dealing with objets d'art, &c.

"New Liberal Review." Owned and edited by Hildebrand and Cecil B. Harmsworth. (Discontinued.)

"The Gentleman's Magazine." 1s. Purchased and discontinued.

EXTRA PUBLICATIONS.

Issued fortnightly until complete.

"The Harmsworth Atlas."
"The Harmsworth Encyclopædia."
"The Harmsworth Self-Educator."
"The Children's Encyclopædia."
"Sixty Years a Queen."
"Nelson and His Times."
"Fortunes Made in Business." Discontinued before completion.
"With the Flag to Pretoria."
"The Russo-Japanese War."
"Punch's Library of Humour."
"Every Way of Earning a Living." 6d.
"Daily Mail" Novels. 6d. each.

NEWSPAPERS.

"The Daily Mail." ½d. daily.
"The Daily Mail" Overseas Edition.
"The Daily Mail" Paris Edition.
"The Daily Mail" Edition for the Blind.
"The Daily Mail" Manchester Edition.
"The Evening News." ½d. evening.
"The Daily Mirror." ½d. daily.
"Illustrated Mail." 1d. weekly. Changed to "Illustrated Weekly." (Discontinued.)
"The Observer." 1d. every Sunday.
"The Weekly Dispatch." 1d. every Sunday.
"The World." 6d. weekly.
"Vanity Fair." 6d. weekly. Sold to other proprietors.
"Manchester Courier." 1d. daily. Conservative.
"Manchester Courier and Supplement." 2d.
"Leeds Mercury." ½d. daily. Liberal Imperialist.
"Glasgow Daily Record and Mail." ½d. morning. Advertised as "Scotland's able exponent of the new journalism."
"Scottish Weekly Record." 1d. Advertised as "The great home journal of Scotland and famed for its serial stories."
"The Globe." 1d. evening.
"Golf Illustrated." 6d. weekly.
"Birmingham Daily Gazette." (Discontinued and amalgamated with the "Birmingham Daily Express.")

ANNUAL PUBLICATIONS.

"Daily Mail Year Book." 6d.
"Daily Mail Year Book of the Churches." 6d.

(To be continued.)

Letters from Abroad.

THE TACTICS OF M. CLEMENCEAU.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The French Parliamentary Session ended on Monday and it is a convenient moment to take stock of the political situation. Perhaps it is hardly possible to sum up that situation more accurately than in M. Clemenceau's famous phrase, "Nous sommes en pleine incohérence." There is a check, it must be admitted, to the steady advance towards the Left which characterised the Waldeck-Rousseau and Combes Ministries. This, as one has often said, was to some extent inevitable so soon as, the Church question being out of the way, the social question became the dividing line. But M. Clemenceau's policy has not tended to modify the inevitable.

Nor can it be said that there has been a consistent reaction, We really do not know where we are. What is the "orientation" of the present Ministry? It varies according to circumstances. The Third Republic has seen no Prime Minister who equalled M. Clemenceau as a parliamentary tactician. He plays off the Centre against the Extreme Left, and vice versa, with unfailing success, and governs with the support of one or the other as suits the necessity of the moment. As he himself said the other day, the Centre is always delighted to support him when he is acting as a policeman, but when the time of the social reformer arrives, the case is opposite; then he has to depend on the Extreme Left to outvote the Centre.

It is all very clever and very amusing, and there seems every probability that M. Clemenceau's tactics will continue to be crowned with success. I see no reason why he should not still be in power at the next General Election. There are many willing to wound, but all are afraid to strike. One party fears that the Clemenceau Cabinet would be succeeded by one of a more advanced shade; the other party fears the opposite contingency. So, when it comes to the point, the Cabinet has almost always, at least in the Chamber, an overwhelming majority, largely composed of Deputies who would prefer a change if they could only secure the change that they respectively desire. It is a curious, and not a very healthy, situation. I am not sure that a few months (it could hardly be longer) of a frankly "moderate" Ministry would not in some respects be better; perhaps nothing else will restore union to the forces of progress, which are being demoralised by the present state of affairs. A dexterous performance on the tight rope is hardly the fitting sequel to the great democratic victory at the elections of 1906.

At the close of the Session the Government is decidedly "orienté vers le gauche." It has stood firm both on the Income Tax Bill and on the purchase of the Western Railway. It has, though without putting the question of confidence, checked by the narrow majority of two the reaction against the abolition of the death penalty. The firmness of the Government on the two questions first mentioned has surprised both the Centre and the Extreme Left. On both sides it was the impression that the question of confidence would not be put and that the Senate would be allowed to give the two reforms their quietus. The impression proved to be quite mistaken and it is impossible to deny that M. Clemenceau has shown great courage and firmness, as, indeed, he always does. Nobody doubted his possession of these qualities; what was doubted was the sincerity of his zeal for the reforms under discussion; here again it must be admitted that the doubt was unjust.

Both the proposal for the nationalisation of the Western Railway and the Income Tax have excited the violent opposition of the large bourgeoisie, an opposition the vehemence of which is scarcely intelligible. The French State already owns one railway and the income tax has been adopted by the least Socialist of Governments. Yet one would gather from the daily lamentations of the "Temps" and the "Journal des Débats," to say nothing of the organs of avowed reaction, that these measures sapped the very foundations of society.

In France the rich man is now about to be taxed for the first time. The burden of the enormous indirect taxation is borne by the poor and the present direct taxes are grossly unjust in their incidence. To the comfortable rentier the impôt mobilier is a bagatelle; to the small tradesman the patente is grievously oppressive, and the peasant proprietor pays the lion's share of the direct taxation of France. The income tax of M. Cailloux's scheme is very different from the income tax as it is levied in England. It is really graduated (though for some unexplained reason the graduation stops at £4,000 a year), the difficulty of graduation having been overcome by the ingenious device of two separate taxes, one of which—the impôt globale, a tax levied on the income as a whole—will be paid only by incomes above a certain amount. It is in this tax that the graduation is mainly effected.

Unfortunately, the income tax will give no remission of indirect taxation; it is a substitute for the present direct taxes. But even so it will give great relief to persons with small incomes, particularly agriculturists, and it will for the first time secure from the possessors of large or substantial incomes an adequate contribution to the national expenditure. Against the proposal on its merits there is no argument save that of greed, and the opposition has centred itself on two points—the "inquisition" and the taxation of the rente. Eminent politicians with distinguished names have solemnly argued that the nation will be guilty of a breach of faith if it taxes the owners of rente, and a large minority of the Chamber was found to support their exemption. Those who made this preposterous proposal to create a privileged class can hardly have failed to understand that it would destroy the whole measure; that was its real object.

The outcry against the "inquisition" is more plausible, and therefore more dangerous. The impôt globale makes a compulsory and universal declaration essential, apart from the fact that the English system of requiring a declaration only from the owners of small incomes is grossly unjust and entails a heavy loss to the Treasury. I was once told by an English income-tax official that, if all income taxpayers were made to pay in full, it would be possible to take a penny in the pound off the tax. M. Cailloux is determined that the stockbroker as well as his clerk shall pay in full. Hence the outcry, which has undoubtedly appealed to a large proportion of small tradesmen, who have been told that their incomes will be revealed to their competitors, and appeals also to the French love of secrecy in regard to domestic affairs.

On both these points the Government has stood firm, and has won the day in the Chamber. There is every reason to believe that it will take an equally firm attitude when the Bill goes to the Senate in the autumn. It is in the Senate that the fight will be most severe. The Senate would reject the income tax if it dared, but I do not think that it will dare. It would certainly have liked to reject the State purchase of the Western Railway, but M. Clemenceau terrified enough waverers to secure a narrow majority. The purchase is now an accomplished fact; not only has the measure sanctioning it become law, but the Chamber has passed the Bill for the provisional administration of the line, which will be presented to the Senate as soon as Parliament re-assembles in October.

It will be seen, then, that M. Clemenceau is not content to act as policeman for the Centre and that for the time being it is to the Left that the Government looks for a majority. Whether this is only a temporary phase time will show. Perhaps, after all, M. Clemenceau intends to take a decided and consistent line in the struggle between the social aspirations of the democracy and the resistance of the grande bourgeoisie—Radical or Conservative.—Yours, &c.,

YOUR PARIS CORRESPONDENT.

Paris, July 15th, 1908.

Letters to the Editor.

THE REFORM OF THE UPPER THAMES CONSERVANCY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In connection with Mr. Philip Morrell's most admirable letter in your issue of July 11th on this subject, may I call your readers' attention to the following resolutions which were passed unanimously by the Borough Council of Maidenhead last week? They seem to cover, with the exception, perhaps, of some regulations for the better preservation of the beauties of the river, the whole subject of Thames Preservation. As Maidenhead is the chief pleasure resort on the river, and the Town Council are deeply concerned in the maintenance of the river as a place of public recreation, and have given careful study to the subject, an expression of opinion from this ancient borough should carry considerable weight with the Government.

"That the attention of H.M. Government be called to the infringements of, and encroachments upon, the rights of the public in and upon the Thames, and to the need for the preservation and enlargement of their rights therein and on the towpath and banks thereof; and this Council respectfully suggests that the Port of London Bill be amended to provide:—

"(1) That if the Board of Conservators after notice or complaint in writing to them by any person or body of any infringement, obstruction of, impediment to, or encroachment upon the rights of the public in or upon the Thames or any waters thereof, or any towpath, decline or omit to take any steps to remove or remedy the same, such person or body may appeal to the Board of Trade, who, if satisfied of the grounds of such complaint, may take such steps as the Conservators may be empowered to take, to remove or remedy the same, and may recover from the Board of Conservancy any costs incurred in so doing.

"(2) That, for the further preservation of the rights of the public in or upon the river and towpath, additional members of the Board of Conservators be appointed to represent the various preservation societies, angling, rowing, and other clubs of a sporting or recreative nature upon the river.

"And this Council is of opinion that it is desirable that the Board of Conservators should be empowered to acquire rights of fishing from, and rights of way for foot passengers along, such parts of the towpath as are not already public towpaths, and also to acquire land for bathing places, picnic grounds, and other public purposes."

In connection with this subject, may I also point out that the Government, in dealing with the upper river, are going on exactly opposite lines to those which they have followed in creating the Port of London authority. For the port they have rightly prided themselves upon bringing together a body of absolutely practical and experienced men. For the upper river they have gone almost altogether on territorial lines, and, with the exception of two proposed nominees of the Board of Trade, there is nothing to ensure the presence on the Board of men who understand such by no means simple subjects as river pollution prevention, flood prevention, watermanship, the rules of navigation, fishery preservation, and the construction and effect when constructed of weirs, locks, and other great river works. No one man is likely to possess a considerable knowledge of all these subjects, but some of these branches of riverine knowledge should be possessed by every Conservator. The landowning interest on the Upper Thames would be overwhelmingly represented by the nominees of the county councils, and as nearly all our troubles on the river are in the nature of disputes between the landowners and the public, this arrangement hardly seems, if I may be pardoned for saying so, statesmanlike, unless it is accompanied by a right of appeal from the Conservators to the Local Government Board in any matter in which public interests are affected.

So far as we know at present, the new Thames Conservancy will be much the same as the old one, except that five nominees of the boroughs above London and two for fourteen urban districts will be substituted for existing representatives of the London County Council and the Corporation of London, whose numbers would be whittled down from twelve to three. Above all things we want on the Board, and I am writing with some forty years' knowledge of the Thames, and Thames matters, practical men representing rowing clubs, fishery associations, and other like bodies; men who have no axes to grind, the interests of no particular locality to guard, and who therefore are the best possible representatives of London and the public generally on the river.

The three most important amendments which the Government could introduce into the Port of London Bill to safeguard the interests of the public in the Upper Thames are, in my opinion:—

(1) The addition of at least six practical men, selected, say, by the Board of Trade or Local Government Board from rowing clubs, fishery preservation societies, angling societies, and the like. These would be the real working members.

(2) A right of appeal to the Local Government Board when the Conservators are in default, in cases in which public interests are involved.

(3) A clear statement in the Bill that it is the duty of the Conservators to preserve the Thames as a public place of recreation, and to protect the rights of the public so far as their existing powers permit them to do so.

With regard to No. 3, I understand that no new powers can be created by the Port of London Bill, but it seems only a proper thing in creating a new authority that there should be a declaration in the statute bringing such authority into existence, that upon the new Board is the duty of carrying out the powers of the old one.

With regard to No. 2, the appeal to the Local Government Board, it was recently stated in the House of Commons in answer to a question, that the Board of Trade had nothing whatever to do with highway matters. The Local Government Board is, therefore, the most suitable court of appeal, as the Thames is a navigable highway, and the towpath and footpath rights on the banks of the river also come under the same category. The Local Government Board has proper machinery for dealing with questions of this kind, and has experienced advisers. The Board of Trade deals merely with commercial matters, which no longer loom largely on the Upper River; it is, of course, on the other hand, the proper authority to deal with the Port of London.—Yours, &c.,

C. H. Cook.

Willow Grange, Goring-on-Thames,
July 14th, 1908.

"THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In the last paragraph of his interesting letter appearing in your last issue, "The Writer of the Article" gives way to a sneer at me and at motor drivers which is characteristic of the spirit both of his article and his letter, and which at the same time affords typical evidence of the knowledge he brings to the matter on which he writes.

His words are: "As to dust, the motorist admits that objection. It is the only one which affects him personally."

Now here comes in the joke. The dust raised by the motor-car causes exceedingly little inconvenience to the driver of the car. Were I to write as recklessly as "The Writer of the Article," I should say it causes him absolutely none. The dust raised by a motor driver he leaves behind him, and his only objection to it is that it makes him a nuisance to other road users.

Almost every paragraph of his letter affords similar opportunity of pointing out prejudice and want of knowledge. I should greatly like to know, for instance, where I can insure against police fines. I have had dozens of prospectuses of motor insurance policies sent me, but I have never heard of one which covers fines. I know many motor owners, and I know none who do not insure their cars, but I know none who do insure their fines.

No object, however, can be served in a controversy exercised simply to try how clever one may show oneself at the expense of another. It is better to see on what points we can agree. The writer of the article pleads that "the furiously driving" motorist should be checked by the police. I agree entirely. He should be checked, and effectively checked. I would go much further. The discourteously driving motorist and the inconsiderately driving motorist should also be checked.

Where I join issue with the writer is: Firstly, when he makes or implies wholesale accusations against all or most motorists; secondly, when he presumes to set up a speed limit which is absurd.

He says that ten to twelve miles an hour is the limit of safety in towns and villages. I believe that he says so purely through want of knowledge, and, had he better knowledge of what ten miles an hour on a motor means, that he would alter his opinion. I have offered to demonstrate that much greater speeds are usually consistent with the safety of the public. Not only so, but that they are unattended by any discomfort to the public, nor need they cause him inconvenience or alarm. I have offered to demonstrate this to the writer of the article here in York, and to prove it, not to my satisfaction, but to his. Lord Russell has, if I remember aright, offered, in a letter to the "Daily News," to give a similar demonstration in London.

I propose to say nothing further than this; my offer remains open.—Yours, &c.,

Acomb, York, Peter Macdonald.
July 13th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I use your columns to enforce an argument for a frequently suggested remedy for the prevention of excessive speeds on the public roads by the users of motor cars, by mentioning the practice of the Stock Exchange? It is this: If a member of the Exchange authorises a clerk to transact business for him, he then becomes absolutely responsible for all business that that clerk may do in his name, even if means the loss of all his fortune. So it should be with the owner of a motor car and his chauffeur; the latter may be no better than a butcher boy in livery, though the owner may be a considerate man; but too many of the reported "accidents" are caused by the wilful heedlessness of the chauffeur. Increased responsibility should be put upon the owner, and abuse of the King's highway, or any other infringement of the rights of the public by the chauffeur in charge of his car should mean severe penalties for the master. It is simply ridiculous to suppose that a fine of £5 or £10 is going to stop the road-hog, whether master or man. What is that to the wealthy owner of a motor car?

This new pastime of the rich is engendering selfishness in them to an enormous extent. To enjoy himself completely the motorist must be selfish, I suppose, and be callous to the feelings of others on the highway. Nothing upsets a motorist more than to be passed on the road by a still more powerful car, and then enjoy for a few miles the other's exhaust and the dust he raises; he thinks nothing at all of inflicting this misery upon poor wayfarers he passes in his turn, and in fact is doing it all day long.

The peace of rural England is rapidly becoming a thing of the past. The loveliness of our countryside is being ruined by the noisomeness of the new Juggernaut, and lovers of our beautiful homeland, and lovers of freedom, too, should never cease to agitate till this new tyranny is overcome.—Yours, &c.,

Charles Robertson.

Brighton, July 14th, 1908.

"THE TYRANNY OF LONDON."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In your recent article on "The Tyranny of London," you seem to me to overlook the other side of the question, that it serves as a heart to the kingdom and the Empire in a way that no other capital in the world does. All the wealthier and more educated classes keep streaming through it, chiefly because of the Parliamentary season, carrying to it new blood and life; and carrying from it new ideas and manners. It is just because it is not "a concentration of England," but an "amorphous mass"; with more Scots than Edinburgh; more Irish than Dublin; more Jews than Jerusalem; more Germans, I believe, than Berlin, that it is so able really to be the head of the whole; and has solved the problem, attempted in vain before, of a successful ruling city. Not that it does absorb all the life of the kingdom; for Oxford, Cambridge, Birmingham, Liverpool, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Dublin, all have a very real existence; more real, because they are being constantly stimulated by influxes from London; and always sending their best products there. Berlin and Paris, in comparison, stand apart from their countries; Washington, and even Rome, are of little influence, for they have no season which attracts all the best of the people; but through London all the wheels of the Empire pass; and keep bringing out with them something ensnared in their cogs, and caught by their teeth. Some professions seek the place of greatest custom, of necessity; but it is not true that literature, music, and art are all concentrated there; and London sends to the provinces quite as much in these as it takes from them. A Provincial Capital, like those of the minor German States, is notorious for narrow-minded cliquism, and a Scot who has been out of Scotland is a wiser and a better man than the traditional stay-at-home dullard. This circulation of all that is best in the whole Empire through London seems to me to be a fact of the greatest importance, and redeems it wholly from the charges you make. Its outskirts are, indeed, some of the stillest of back waters; but they serve their purpose in keeping up the beat of the heart which sends life through the whole kingdom.—Yours, &c.,

PHILIP J. DEAR.

58, Findhorn Place, Edinburgh.

IS THE DRAMA DYING?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Let me assure Miss Stevens that the drama is very much alive, and will, I believe, have a great influence upon life in the near future. To the theatre, I believe, many of us will come to recover our lost ideals. There the dramatist and his audience meet with an open mind freed from dogmatism or superstition, willing and anxious to solve the many social problems that confront us. We have besides excellent actors, and a young school of rising dramatists that Mr. Pinero believes is destined to make the reign of Edward VII. a memorable one for drama.

The art of the drama is distinct from that of the novel. When a successful novel is dramatised all its readers flock to the theatre to see the characters visualised, and the incidents acted that they have read about. There is no pretence at the theatre. These real men and women speak and move, and something really happens—is not simply talked or written about.

The most serious rival to the theatre is the book and the comfortable arm chair, as Miss Stevens seems to know. But in a way both are enervating compared to the theatre because unsociable; we want them all to ourselves, and we like them because here we can escape from criticism and censure. We may fail to realise the humor and the wit of what we read, and no one will scoff at us; we may miss the pathos, and no one will pity us; we may skip the fine passages in preference for the silly ones, and no one will know. But at the theatre we meet our fellow creatures and find our just level. We realise our superiority or inferiority. We are forced to surrender ourselves to the spell of the actors' emotions and the author's creations. We laugh with those that laugh, and weep with those that weep, and we are the better for doing so. We leave the theatre more tolerant of the world than we entered it. We think less about ourselves and more about others. In short, the Book, the Pulpit, and the Stage are all a means of education, but undoubtedly the greatest of them is the Stage.—Yours, &c.,

WILLIAM POEL.

Dublin, July 14th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The letter under the above heading in last week's NATION reminds me somehow of a little girl of my acquaintance, who when offered a visit to the pantomime refused on the ground that she would rather go to the British Museum.

If Mrs. Stevens's case is typical, and the magic of the stage has ceased to hold its sway over most men's hearts, then indeed there has passed away a glory from the earth. But we are far from believing this to be so. It is not to the childhood of man, but to the child that is in man, and that is eternal, to which the drama makes its appeal.

Modern drama may have no great luminaries, but such stars as Ibsen, Maeterlinck, Rostand, Hauptmann, our own Bernard Shaw, lighten the darkness; and the old great name (not after all so great in his own day) still attracts a far larger public than the author of "The Egoist," or even of "Esmond." Most of us would not care, any more than Mrs. Stevens, to see our favorite novels dramatised; but would she deny that the genius of a great actor would help her to a fuller understanding of "Othello" or "Macbeth"?

Your correspondent complains that among the disadvantages of theatre-going is the fact that our fellow pleasure-seekers are an unloved stranger crowd. Has she never felt the sympathy of numbers, the thrill that runs through us when we turn and behold our neighbours stirred by the same emotion as ourselves? Surely such moments as these should be sought rather than avoided, as they must serve to strengthen the tie between man and man.

In Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick's "Home Life in Germany" she says that on Sunday, which is the great day of the week in German theatres, the play-houses are crowded with people of the lower middle-class, who enjoy "Hamlet" and "Egmont," and are interested in the problems of life presented by Ibsen, Gorky, Tolstoy, or Gerhart Hauptmann. So in Germany, at least, if the drama is dying, it is suffering a hard death!—Yours, &c.,

K. S.

July 15th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Before "dropping a natural tear" over its grave as your correspondent advises, I think it would be well if we first made perfectly sure that the drama is really dead. For my part I believe the report to be as "grossly exaggerated" as it was in the case of the death of Mark Twain.

If the drama belongs, as the writer of the letter avers, to the childhood of man, its existence would still be justified by the fact that we are not so very far beyond that stage at present. But I would rather say that it belongs to the child that is in man—and the child in man is his saving grace. We are a very long way from having done with pretending. So long as we are what we are, so long as life is what it is, so long as its pains are great and its problems insoluble, we cannot do without any of the channels by which we find refuge from the actual in the world of the imagination.

The novel, which your correspondent offers us as a substitute for the play, can never take its place altogether. The drama, and the drama only, answers to a want felt in the hearts of many of us. The art of the actor, that at its best is a very fine art (but one which your correspondent is evidently incapable of appreciating), appeals to our intellectual and aesthetic sympathies; and the opportunities which the theatre affords, the satisfaction that a pleasure enjoyed in common gives, and the bond of union that it forms between otherwise disconnected units, appeal to our social instincts.

The novel is one form of literary expression, the drama another. They are both important, yet they are quite distinct. Of the two, the drama, far from belonging to an earlier stage of our development, is the greater art because of the restraint inherent in the law of its being. "In der Beschränkung zeicht sich erst der Meister," says Goethe. The drama is also the finest vehicle that we have for the interpretation of human character.

But it follows that, inasmuch as the drama at its best is greater than the novel at its best, the great dramatist will always be rarer than the great novelist, simply because he is the greater genius.

It is true, as your correspondent says, that no amount of stage societies or State-aided theatres will improve the present condition of the drama. But that is not because the drama is dead, but because the force that rules these things is not "the army of actors and actresses, stage managers, and stage critics with vested interests," but the bad taste of an unperceptive public. Only the very greatest genius can afford to ignore the popular taste because the force of his genius creates his own public. "We needs must love the highest when we see it."

There are two ways by which the drama may be regenerated: by the growth of finer perceptions in the general public, or by the advent of a genius who can do for the modern times what Shakespeare did for his time. Meanwhile, let us be grateful for what we have. The value of the average play of to-day is on a level with the average novel, and both play and novel, thanks to a sixpenny gallery and to cheap editions, are within reach of the poorest of our fellow citizens.—Yours, &c., ELLA LEVY.

Campden Hill, July 15th, 1908.

THE KING AND FOREIGN POLICY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you allow one whose inclinations were till lately Republican, a member of several Liberal associations, and one of thoroughly democratic principles, to criticise your leader on "An Untoward Incident"? I feel that at last monarchy has justified itself in the eyes of all peace lovers. Our King has "made the situation" for his descendants, and for any monarch who earnestly wishes to do well by humanity. No man could work harder than Edward VII. has done, since he came to the throne as "member for the Empire," to conciliate European Powers. In our age imaginations seem too weak to picture the horrors of a European war, or the possibility of invasion. We have much sickly sentimentality, but clear vision seems on the wane. The King has done the work nearest to his hand—and done it nobly, with unceasing energy and zeal. Where Hague Conferences have almost fought over the details of peace plans, he has worked smoothly. After all, we cannot unreasonably doom a man who fills a throne to idleness and the mere signing of documents. On the lowest ground employment is necessary, even for a king, and our King has chosen the best employment—that of guardian of the world's peace. That some remote descendant of his should consider himself "his own Foreign Minister" does not concern us now. Future generations may be trusted to take care of that, and check such a development on constitutional grounds. Nor should we feel that if the King considers some of his subjects are endangering the cause of peace he is wrongly using his prerogative as a host in excluding them from his social gatherings. This seems to be a private, not a Royal prerogative. We feel it should be charily used, but that criticism is somewhat in bad taste, especially from those thus excluded. Most of us can remember a Republican feeling in England some twenty-five years ago, even alongside of devotion to the splendid personality of Queen Victoria, but now all such feeling is dead. Our King has made the post of sovereign logical.—Yours, &c.,

JULIE JEPHSON.

4, Cornwall Gardens, London, S.W.,
July 11th, 1908.

THE INDETERMINATE SENTENCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am delighted to see that the Home Secretary, in the Standing Committee on the Prevention of Crime Bill, has abandoned the principle of the indeterminate sentence. A punishment which has no limit attached to it by a judicial tribunal is not in harmony with the principles of English law. The fundamental principle of modern law is to protect individual liberty against the arbitrary action of the administration. The indeterminate sentence gives unlimited power to the administration; it places individual liberty entirely in the hands of bureaucratic officials; it is, as you have already said, a survival under another name of the old and odious lettres de cachet.

Apart from this objection in principle to the indeterminate sentence, which, from the standpoint of Liberalism, is a decisive objection, the practical objections to it are almost equally formidable. On this point I can venture to speak with the experience of a man who has passed thousands of criminal offenders through his hands. No man can tell beforehand how a prisoner will act when he is set at liberty. The best prisoners are often the worst men out of doors. A man whose will is broken by prison discipline, who has become a docile instrument of prison regulations, is an excellent prisoner, but when he is liberated he will almost inevitably be a bad citizen. The qualities which make him a good prisoner tend to make him a bad citizen. It is individual initiative, the exercise of individual will, which is required in a citizen of the modern world. It is the suppression of individual will and individual initiative which is the supreme virtue inside prison walls.

It is an unsatisfactory state of things that there should be so many professional criminals about, but we must learn to face the fact that there is no merely penal remedy which will remove them. Crime is almost entirely a social disease, and must be dealt with by social, not penal, methods.

The only penal methods which can be satisfactorily applied to the professional criminal are first a milder prison régime: secondly, a period of detention extending over the most criminal period of life; and thirdly (and above all), an extension of the principle of conditional liberation. These principles already exist in our criminal code. They are in harmony with the principles of modern law; they commend themselves to the modern conscience; and in practice they will be far more effective than the un-liberal nostrum of an indeterminate sentence.

I cannot close this letter without saying how much England owes to the present Home Secretary in the domain of prison reform. He has done more than any man living to put our penal administration on a humane and intelligent basis.—Yours, &c., W. D. MORRISON.

Marylebone Rectory, W.,
July 16th, 1908.

THE FUTURE OF THE POLICE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Royal Commission on the Metropolitan Police has presented a report, which is very flattering to the force, and a Select Committee is now inquiring into the propriety of a weekly day of rest for the men. There is, however, another question of vital importance that deserves the consideration of the authorities. The Metropolitan Police number 17,000—an army in itself, and at present this army is directed by one Commissioner, three Assistant Commissioners, and five Chief Constables, or nine in all, and not one of these officers has been promoted from the ranks. The mere statement of this fact is sufficient to condemn the existing system. How different are the conditions outside the metropolis. We find that there are 123 City and Borough forces in England, and of their Chief Constables only fifteen have not risen from the ranks. In the Metropolitan Force are men of education, of experience, of capacity, of character, and possessing such knowledge of police work that they would in the highest posts display a skill in the direction and management of the force, which it is hopeless to expect from gentlemen pitchforked from the outside. Were the highest posts to be open to diligent ability, a new spirit would animate the police, and there would be a distinct inducement to the best type of men to join the force. To-day, when a first-class man thinks of joining, he is daunted when he learns that assiduity, character, and skill will never lead a man to the top unless, indeed, they have been exhibited outside the force. To direct the force, ignorance of police duty is at present a necessary qualification.

It has been the custom in the past to discourage men from perfecting themselves in their duties, and from improving the vast machine of which they are a part by appointing to the highest positions officers from the army devoid of knowledge of the duties, and with everything to learn which may render them effective. This, in itself, is inexcusable, but it has the far-reaching effect of robbing the members of the force of the prizes which should be the reward of their merit. It reminds one of what was done when the post of Registrar-General became vacant; instead of appointing the great Dr. Farr, who had created the science of sanitary statistics, and was pre-eminently fitted for the post, the authorities appointed a dragoon.—Yours, &c.,

J. Fletcher Little.

125, Harley Street, Cavendish Square, W.,
July 15th, 1908.

"SUFFRAGETTE" HISTORY

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I observe that your correspondent, T. Wilson of Harpenden, has never heard of the "Blast of a Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women." T. Wilson naïvely remarks that he does not know "whence Mr. Bowly takes his quotation," although probably the average schoolboy in a non-provided school could enlighten him on the point. A study of the history of their own country is not apparently favored by the supporters of female suffrage. Not long ago I listened to an address by one of the leaders of the movement, in which she indulged us with certain sidelights on English history. "When the Romans first came to England," she informed us, "they were amazed at the power and dignity of the Saxon woman." One can appreciate the natural surprise of the Roman soldier at encountering this dignified female five centuries before she landed on these shores. Subsequently the same lecturer introduced us to a Countess of Southampton who, in the year 1675, insisted on acting as a magistrate, and flouted the wrath of King James I. A truly remarkable lady who could quarrel with a monarch fifty years after his decease! These are only two specimens of a carefully prepared typewritten discourse.—Yours, &c.,

W. A. Jolly.

5H, Portman Mansions, W.,
July 14th, 1908.

THE OUTLOOK FOR ENGLISH FICTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—To those of us who are accustomed to expect from The Nation a genuine attitude of criticism towards modern novels (very different from the invidious distinction of 75 per cent. as "standing out from the trash that is nowadays, &c.," which we find in most contemporary reviews), it is rather a shock to read the indeterminate article on "The Outlook for English Fiction" which appears in your issue for July 11th. The writer of the article sets out to express regret that two such worthy writers as Joseph Conrad and Leonard Merrick should receive insufficient support from the public, proceeds to draw up an indictment of modern novelists which practically cancels out with the indictment of the modern reader, and concludes with an appeal to several younger novelists to be true to nature for the sake of discovering whether this may not be "less displeasing to the English palate than [it was] a decade ago."

Further, it is surely unfair to say that Mrs. Humphry Ward is a "typical English novelist." Typically English Mrs. Ward may be, but among the many names given by your contributor, I do not find one whose method or outlook is similar to that of Mrs. Ward.

Is not Mr. Kipling's "Imperialism" rather a superstition? It is at any rate negligible in a criticism of his novels—such as they are. Imperialism has very little significance in a book like "Kim," and if your contributor confuses robustness with Imperialism in Mr. Kipling's other works, it seems possible that his knowledge of Mr. Kipling's preferences has colored his judgment of the works of Mr. Kipling's imagination.

Returning to the appeal to be true: there is, of course, the chance of publication to be considered. I do not imagine for a moment that many phenomenally honest and good novels are rejected persistently by London publishers, but it is conceivable that many books issued at six shillings owe their ultimate form to some outside consideration for saleability. One very serious point is that of length. A book which is to reach the public has to exceed 80,000 words, and this is a condition which, I believe, foreign novelists have not to bear in mind to quite the same extent as the Englishman. The Norwegian and Russian writers of the immediate past have been able to say what they wanted to say in the number of words most suitable; with the English novelist, it is of primary importance that he should secure a theme which will work out to a particular length. This is calculated to destroy spontaneity, excepting in those writers whose imagination is so fecund that the only difficulty is one of compression. One has only to examine George Gissing's novels to see that inspiration was frequently a little numbed, and eked out to make a book of sufficient length (evidence of this may be found in Edwin Reardon's regard for the mechanical proportions of his volumes). I suggest that until this difficulty is removed, together with the implication it carries of the public unreadiness to read for something more than listless pleasure, the novelist will in this country battle unavailingly with his desire to deal cleanly and directly with those problems with which his mind is engaged.

The idea that Meredith mirrors the life and spirit of his generation is novel: it may be true, but upon cursory examination the suggestion seems too large to be fully accurate. I presume the omission of Richardson from your contributor's range was accidental. And lastly, the pleasure expressed in feminine activity might surely have been experienced in England at any time during the last 150 years.—Yours, &c.,

S.

London, July 13th, 1908.

Poetry.

HOODWINKED.

I reined my charger on the height,
A goodly valley lay below,
That shone with waters silver-bright,
And young limbs laving in their flow;
Said I, "O, wasted pilgrim, go;
These heights are chill, the air blows suave
In yonder vale; the lilies grow;
There Love is lowly, Love is brave."

Thick belts of palest roses grew
Wide-blown to suckle wanton bees;
A thousand sea-blue swallows flew,
Slow-wafted on an idle breeze;
Like corks that rode the rippled seas
They floated, or their flight was curled
Like skaters who, with magic ease,
Wrought circles on the sky-blue world.

Sun-blazoned, lulled by unseen fans
Of drowsy winds, the river reeds
Thrilled ripples to the sweep of swans,
Dark-webbed beneath the water-weeds;
Or shuffled soft their tufted seeds
Whose plumes swayed gently as a clock's
Staid pendulum that mocks our needs,
And swift annuls the need it mocks.

From out the woodland, ringing clear,
I heard a voice; I saw the face
Of perfect Love that casts out fear
And bridges farthest time and space;
Whose speed is such it can outpace
The flight of Death, whose looks annul
All strife of hearts; who sang, "Embrace,
I am the unveiled Beautiful."

I waved my lance; I spurred my steed,
Who shook through all his shaggy pelt,
Poor patient beast, he seemed to heed
The tumult of the throes I felt!
I reached the woodland. Down I knelt
Before the vision. Floating swift,
I saw the magic dryad melt
Like plumèd seeds the breezes sift.

Wilfrid C. Thorley.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

WE believe that the process of purchasing the "Westminster Gazette" from Sir George Newnes has been completed by the new company, which starts with a capital of £100,000. The purchase price was £65,000, so that the margin of working capital is ample. The project of a new penny morning Liberal paper will be a matter for future development. The "Westminster" will in future be machined at the offices of "Lloyd's News." We need not say that Mr. Spender's and Sir Frank Gould's association with it is unchanged. That would be indispensable to its existence.

* * *

A COUPLE of weeks ago we announced that "The Women Bonapartes," by Mr. H. Noel Williams, was one of a number of works dealing with Napoleonic subjects to be published during the autumn. Mr. Williams has also found time for a book on "Caroline, Duchesse de Berri," which will run into two large volumes. The story of Caroline's life is full of interest. She was a woman of great resolution and firmness of will. Even her husband's assassination, which took place while he was escorting her from the opera, failed to shake her temper; and during the July revolution she herself offered to lead the troops against the insurgents. Afterwards she went with Charles X. and her son, the Comte de Chambord, to Holyrood, but the plots to restore the Bourbons, of which she was the chief engineer, showed remarkable adroitness. More than once she caused serious trouble to the Government, and in April, 1832, she landed at Marseilles with the object of stirring up a rebellion. After many adventures she was betrayed by a Jew at Nantes, and imprisoned in the citadel of Blaye. Her political influence became of no account when it was discovered that she had secretly married the Neapolitan Marquis, Lucchei Palli, and she was at once released. Her varied and romantic career lends itself well to the type of popular biography which Mr. Noel Williams always handles in a skilful manner.

* * *

MR. UPTON SINCLAIR has finished a new novel called "The Money-Changers," which will be published early in the autumn. It forms the second volume of a trilogy—"The Metropolis," issued last spring, being the first—dealing with the same set of characters and intended to be an adequate representation of the contemporary business and social life of New York.

* * *

STUDENTS of French literature will be glad to hear that Mr. Murray will shortly issue a book called "From Montaigne to Molière: or the Preparation for the Classical Age of French Literature," by Mr. Arthur Tilley. Mr. Tilley, who is a Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, is the author of "The Literature of the French Renaissance," a work which is regarded in France as one of the best modern contributions to the subject. His coming book is less of a literary history than an attempt to set forth the main political, social, and religious forces that were at work during the century preceding the age of Louis XIV., and prepared the way for the great creative epoch of the classical age.

* * *

AN interesting collection of biographical essays by M. Teodor de Wyzewa is to be published in the autumn by Mr. John Lane. The title is "Some Women Loving or Luckless." Among the subjects treated are the tragic love affair of Princess Sophia Dorothea of Hanover and Philip of Kœnigsmarck; the liason of Caroline Matilda, Queen of Denmark and Norway, with the unscrupulous Struensee; the Douglas Cause; the wives of Henry VIII; Mary Queen of Scots, who finds an able champion in M. de Wyzewa; Mary Wollstonecraft; Mrs. Carlyle; Fanny Burney; Costanza Monti; Elizabeth Barrett Browning; Marie Louise de Bourbon, the Queen of Etruria, whom Napoleon treated so hardly; Johanna Eckermann, one of Goethe's victims; Marie de Herbert, whose letters won Kant's admiration; and Madame de V—, one of Chateaubriand's numerous "Inconnues." The book is translated by Mr. C. H. Jeaffreson.

* * *

THE next three volumes in "The Socialist Library," a series issued by the Independent Labor Party, will be "Socialism and Religion," by the Rev. A. L. Lilley, "Socialism and Democracy," by Mr. J. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P., and "Socialism and Foreign Affairs," by Mr. H. N. Brailsford. Mr. Lilley is widely known as a rising theologian, and a leader of the younger school of Anglican Modernists. Like most men of his school, he anticipates that the energy of the Church of England will in the immediate future be directed towards social reform, rather than dogmatic discussion. In "Socialism and Foreign Affairs," Mr. H. N. Brailsford, whose brilliant style and clear intelligence stamp him as one of the most distinguished of British journalists, traces the influence of capitalism in history as the origin of wars. He emphasises the conception of nationality as intellectual specialisation rather than an aggressive competition governed by the interests of the wealthy classes, and urges that the secret way in which diplomatic transactions are now conducted prevents the democracy from having any real control in foreign policy. Many critics of Socialism seem to think that its great weakness lies in its attitude towards foreign affairs, so that it will be useful to have the subject fully treated by a Socialist who has a thorough knowledge of foreign policy.

* * *

SEVERAL promising biographies figure on Mr. Murray's new list of announcements. "From Ploughshare to Parliament" is the title of a memoir of the Potters of Tadcaster, which is founded on the diaries and letters of Richard Potter, the famous "Radical Dick," who, with his brother Thomas, founded the "Manchester Guardian." Thomas Potter was the first Mayor of Manchester, and his house was for many years a rendezvous for political and philanthropic reformers. The documents on which the memoir is founded give a full account of Richard Potter's life from 1793, when he helped his father with farm and shop at Tadcaster, to 1832, when he became a member of the Reform Parliament. The book is sure to be of great interest both on account of the picture it gives of middle-class life in England in the early years of the nineteenth century, and for the light it throws upon the struggle which ended in the first Reform Bill. Other books on the list are a life of Major-General Sir John Ardagh, by his wife, Susan, Countess of Malmesbury (Lady Ardagh), and a "Life of Lord Norton, 1814-1905," by Mr. W. S. Childe-Pemberton.

* * *

MR. C. LEWIS HIND is one of the not very large band of art critics who can make readers feel something of their own enthusiasm for pictures. He is, perhaps, at his best when writing of impressionist painting, and possibly impressionist is the most suitable word with which to describe his own methods. He is at present engaged upon "A History of Landscape Painting," but as he has also undertaken a biography of St. Gaudens, the famous American sculptor and friend of R. L. Stevenson, and also a book upon Watteau, it will probably be some time before it is ready for publication.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"British Imperialism in the Eighteenth Century." By G. B. Hertz. (Constable. 6s. net.)

"Sir William Temple." The Stanhope Essay, 1908. By Edward S. Lyttel. (Blackwell. 2s. 6d. net.)

"The Diwan of Abu'l-Ala." By Henry Baerlein. Wisdom of the East Series. (Murray. 1s. net.)

"Warp and Woof." A Drama in Three Acts. By Edith Lyttelton. (Unwin. 3s 6d. net.)

"Valladolid, Oviedo, Segovia, Zamora, Avila, and Zaragoza: An Historical and Descriptive Account." By Albert F. Calvert. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

"The Garden of Epicurus." By Anatole France. A translation by Alfred Allinson. (Lane. 6s.)

"Mr. Clutterbuck's Election." By H. Belloc. (Eveleigh Nash. 6s.)

"Littérature et Folie." Par P. Voivenel. (Paris: Alcan. 10 fr.)

"Histoire Générale des Beaux-Arts." Par R. Peyre. (Paris: Delagrave. 6 fr. 50.)

"Jeunes Filles." Roman. Par Victor Margueritte. (Paris: Fasquelle. 3 fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE ADVANCE OF ENGLAND.*

SINCE Pangloss it has been a commonplace to ridicule the cant of optimism; the assumption, so easy to those with whom life goes well, that everything is for the best in the best of worlds. The cant of pessimism is no less unreal and no less mischievous. That the society in which we live is imperfect; that so great is its complexity that the remedy of its defects is no easy matter, the best-intentioned change being liable, unless carefully thought out and balanced, to bring about evils as great as, or greater than, those which they are designed to cure—this is true. But that this society has advanced and is advancing; that the moral and material conditions of life are improving, if improving less rapidly than we could wish—this also is true. It is the insistence on this note of qualified and reasoned optimism which is the distinctive feature of Mr. Benn's book.

The second title defines the ground covered. "A record of opinion and action, as distinguished from a record of events, deals especially with those elements of history which are determined by mental causes, by human feelings, human reason, and human will." Two features may be noticed: the attention drawn to the various theological movements of the period, the rationalist, the pietistic, and the critical; and the emphasis rightly laid on the services rendered to good government and to the well-being of the community by the Utilitarians from Bentham to J. S. Mill. Laissez-faire, it is shown, had no more than "an accidental and transitory connection" with this school. It was Edwin Chadwick, a friend and disciple of Bentham, who drafted the Report on Factory Labor on which the Factory Act of 1833 was based: and his advocacy of the restriction of the hours of labor, of employers' liability, of compulsory education, and of temperance legislation, makes for Mr. Benn's contention that "our modern socialistic legislation was in part anticipated by the old Utilitarians, and in part has been directly developed out of their principles." To Canning—"the great, the noble, the adored," as Heine calls him—as the leader of European Liberalism, and to his successor Palmerston, ample recognition is given. Palmerston was great rather as Foreign Secretary than as Prime Minister, and his later years were not his best. But his errors were "inspired by the same noble love of justice and freedom which, together with a patriotism more antique than modern, was the moving spirit of his whole political career. As a part of this policy he fought the Crimean War, which, if I am not mistaken, was no such ghastly blunder as is now commonly believed, but a necessary step in the deliverance of Europe from the old despotisms and its reconstitution on the lines of national independence." Tyrannies, Bourbon, Hapsburg, and Romanoff, are near akin. "My view is that France was drawn into the war by England, acting under Palmerston's guidance; but that England's motives were not self-interested, the object of her people being to avenge the wrongs of Hungary, and to deliver Europe from the despotism that had been weighing on it for forty years."

Mr. Benn's judgments are trenchant. Disraeli was "the political bravo of the high Tory Party," and took up a moribund romanticism "in the spirit of a second-hand broker"; of Louis Napoleon, "most persons who retain any sense of political morality will agree with John Austin that 'the man was a scoundrel'"; Mr. Balfour's "Foundations of Belief" is designed to rehabilitate popular theology "by a sceptical attack on reasoned belief in general"; of the Education Act of 1902 and of Tariff Reform, "while Mr. Balfour was reviving the old system of privilege and protection in religion, Mr. Chamberlain was engaged in the congenial task of agitating for its revival in trade." With the argument for reciprocity he makes short work. Protection injures the nation in whose interest it is adopted more than those against which it is aimed. That the example set by England would eventually tell on other countries Peel and Cobden certainly believed. It may yet be so; we believe that it will. But, though they anticipated a coming era of universal Free Trade, they "never argued for the abolition of the corn-tax on the ground that it would be followed by a world-wide economic revolution, or hinted at an admission that England would be worse off than before if other countries refused to follow in her footsteps."

A noteworthy, perhaps the most noteworthy, event of the period under discussion was the re-entrance of England into the main current of European thought. In the seventeenth century, and before it, intercourse with the Continent had been frequent; under the Hanoverian kings it had died out, and the country had settled down in a backwater. Owing to the support given by the Bourbons to Jacobitism, and the incessant hostilities between the two countries, France, the natural bridge between England and the Continent, was difficult of access; the German surroundings of the Court were unattractive, the people uncongenial, their language unknown. Coleridge, and, later, Carlyle, did much to remedy this state of things, but till well into the last century the provincialism of English thought and feeling amounted to a disease. The Napoleonic wars had accentuated this isolation. The ideas by which Napoleon I. was inspired were more enlightened than those which animated the Government of George III. But the former, with all their enlightenment, stood for tyranny, the latter for freedom; and the country did not hesitate between the two. It preferred the substance to the forms of liberty, leaving the recovery of the latter to the next generation: and, reasonable as the choice was, its price was heavy and paid to the full. The constitution, as it then was, made neither for efficiency nor for good government: crime was prevalent, military and naval administration defective, religion secularised, the law chaotic. Looking back it is difficult to see how we held our own against abler and better organised opponents. It is "dogged as does it": as we had done before, and have done since, we "muddled through."

At home the country was the poor man's hell. The old Poor Law combined the maximum of expenditure with the minimum of relief to the class for whose benefit it existed. The average yearly cost of action at law regarding settlements and removals exceeded £300,000; laborers' wages were systematically made up out of the rates. Their level, naturally, fell; no one but the farmer and the landlord was benefited: labor was pauperised, the community robbed. The parochial system bred a regular slave trade: it supplied the factories with unpaid labor on such terms that it was not worth the employer's while to clothe and feed his apprentices properly; paupers were easily replaced. "It was often arranged by the parish authorities in order to get rid of the imbeciles that one idiot should be taken with twenty sane children." The wonder, when we remember the conditions under which it developed, is that the inheritance of pauperism to which our own age has succeeded is not greater and more insoluble than it is. The condition of those employed in collieries and mines was even more deplorable: nor, strange as it may appear, did these horrors shock the religious world of the time. Lord Shaftesbury complained that, to the last, few of the clergy supported the humanitarian reforms with which his name is so honorably associated. He was distressed and puzzled "to find support from infidels and non-professors, opposition and coldness from religionists and declaimers." Perhaps this was due rather to want of intelligence, our national fault, than of feeling. We do brutal things, not because we are brutal—we are not—but because we do not understand. And we are as lacking in imagination as in ideas: we cannot get outside ourselves or put ourselves in another's place. Hence an acquiescence in the actual, a disclination to look below the surface of things, a stolid resistance to change.

The same unintelligent temper showed itself in dealing with the things of mind. Orthodoxy was a protest against Papacy, Dissent, and Reform. Beyond this it had little positive content: Bunsen, when he came to England, found to his amazement the religious world distracted over questions which had nothing to do with religion—Apostolic succession, the use of the surplice in the pulpit, and the like. Nor is this want of perspective a thing of the past: a journalist only a few weeks ago described the proceedings of a certain diocesan conference under a headline in large type, "Important Discussion on Vestments." A century, however, or even half a century ago, things were infinitely worse. The English Church stood apart, on the one hand, from Catholicism, and, on the other, from the larger Protestantism of Germany; its position was negative, the spiritual life for which it stood was small. Education was at the lowest possible ebb: the governing classes opposed its extension; and when this became inevitable the question became, as it has remained, a cockpit for conflicting sects. The important thing was what religious teaching should be given to the children, not that the children should be taught. The Universities were remarkable more for the soundness of their port than of their learning; schools were inefficient and few. Scotland was an honorable exception: it was from Edinburgh, the modern Athens, that the first impulse to improvement came. John Russell and Palmerston were pupils of Dugald Stewart, and under the influence of the university, the bar, and the brilliant intellectual society of the northern capital, the "Edinburgh Review," long the chief organ of Liberal opinion in Great Britain, became a power. In those days it was dangerous to be a Whig. In 1793 a reign of terror had set in, having for its object the suppression of what were called French principles in print or even in speech. In Scotland four persons were sentenced to fourteen, and a fifth to seven, years' transportation, because they had agitated for Parliamentary reform.

* "Modern England: A Record of Opinion and Action, from the time of the French Revolution to the Present Day." By Alfred William Benn. Watts, 2 vols. 7s. net.

We have travelled far since then; and the progress made is an earnest of the progress to be made. Why should we assume, asks the pessimist, that progress is a law of life? that its benefits are genuine? that it will continue and prevail? We cannot, it is true, demonstrate that the world and nature—our own nature included—are not an elaborate conspiracy to deceive us: if a man insists on asserting this, it is impossible to say him nay. But the contingency is a negligible quantity. And, were it otherwise, the game is worth the playing: we play it, by a true instinct, as those who play to win.

THE RAVIN OF NATURE AND MAN.*

Mr. Hudson has earned already rich cause for congratulation in the publication of this book. His account of the capture by hooks of the wild birds drawn to West Cornwall by stress of weather—a process he rightly describes as "hellish," whose clumsy cruelty sickens the reader—has borne immediate fruit in the promotion of a Bill by Sir Frederick Banbury in Parliament, prohibiting the process. The Bill has been adopted by the Government, and should become law before this Session is over. Another appeal in the narrative, if less directly humanitarian, is none the less worthy of response. Mr. Hudson was impressed during a winter stay in Cornwall with the glamour of the "Land's End." Solitary pilgrims and adventurers herded in batches, swarming down to the remote extremities of the peninsula, were all inspired by that mystical longing which they could scarcely explain even to themselves. It was a longing for the end of all the world: the extreme west of Western Britain, beyond which nothing stretches but the salt, enormous ocean, the home of men's great past visions of magical and terrible things. In literature he finds writers "wondering for the last time, as we had wondered for half a century, what the Land's End would be like." In life he beholds special trains from the northern manufacturing cities pouring into Penzance after a night of travel, and every traveller in them filled with but one desire —to attain "the Land's End." "Not Stonehenge, nor Mona, nor Senlac," says Mr. Hudson, "not that hoary fane where Britain buries her great dead, nor any castle or cathedral, or tower or river or mountain or plain in all the land draws us so powerfully as this naked moor and rude foreland, with its ancient, dim memories." Dignity and majesty still abide there, in the wild granite cliffs and lights of tall beacons, flashing over the waste spaces of the sea. Mr. Hudson sees the inevitable changes coming, in the violation of the darkness and the silence, by the villas and hotels, and garages and mutoscopes. He pleads earnestly for the preservation of these sacred regions, and the purchase by the nation or by enlightened individuals of these few acres of barren land; in order to preserve for ever, clean and secure, the region from which, looking westward, the Englishman can see the pathway down which his race has travelled into the adventures of all the world.

"A naturalist's impression of West Cornwall" is the sub-title of this fascinating volume. But it is something more than observation of wild life of beast and bird that Mr. Hudson has put into its brilliant pages. He has described the people as well as the creatures of the earth and sky: he turns from faithful and gorgeous pieces of word painting, of the gorse in spring or the bracken in autumn, to the humorous and pathetic record of human life amongst a remote, detached people, in characteristic as different from the Briton as any denizen of foreign lands. The whole is told in that pure, simple, fastidious English of which this writer is an acknowledged master, which imparts distinction to every page. Certain fundamental antipathies appear here as elsewhere. Mr. Hudson hates, with a generous, fierce hatred, cruelty which is the child of callousness as much as cruelty which is the child of malice and lust. He tells stories of the brutalities of the lower class native, whose conduct the gentlemen and sportsmen rightly regard with horror; but he is none the less in protest and condemnation against the "gentleman sportsman himself, with his insensate passion for destruction." A tame seal is slaughtered out of wantonness, an osprey which had "excited a great deal of interest" amongst all who came to the waterside, is wounded to death in a similar stupidity; the life of a northern diver is accorded to the plea of a ferryman, but the temptation to shoot proves irresistible, and the promise is disregarded. "Stories equally sad and shocking," says Mr. Hudson, "were told me by other lovers of nature and observers of wild life at other points of the coast, of how every rare and beautiful species, every owl, buzzard, harrier, chough, hoopoe, and many other species, had been slaughtered by men who called themselves sportsmen and gentlemen." Even with the seals at St. Ives the annihilation appears inevitable. The Cornish fishermen, at first hostile, finding they committed no hurt, refrained from persecuting them. But the students of the Camborne Mining School "have recently found out a new and pleasant pastime, which is to seat themselves with a rifle or fowling-piece on the cliff and watch for the appearance of a brown head above the water below of a seal going out of or coming into the caves, and letting fly at it." "When they hit the seal," says Mr. Hudson, "it sinks and is seen no more, but the animal is not wanted, the object is to shoot it, and this accomplished, the sportsman goes back happy and proud at his success in having murdered so large and human-like a creature."

The sportsman could, indeed, plead against Mr. Hudson Nature's parallels: for it is as "red in tooth and claw with ravin" that Nature appears in this narrative of things seen. Sometimes it is life against life—the herring gulls pursuing the rock-pipit, a fox savagely assailed by a raven, a black-backed gull tearing to pieces and devouring a young guillemot, while the captive struggled in vain, sending forth its shrill cries for help far and wide. Sometimes it is the vision of the whole sentient world in the grasp of blind, senseless forces; without intelligence, without compassion: as in the experiences of the Great Cold which smashed down upon the unprotected bird life, senselessly ravaging and destroying. In such moments the observer descries visions of a "Nature Maligna" more awful than the old overlords of caprice, violence, or disdain: a spirit on the imprisoned land, and a protest against that spirit. "It seemed to me that the darkest imaginings of men—the blackest phantom or image of himself which he has sacrificed to—was not so dark as this dreadful, unintelligible, and unintelligent power that made us, in which we live and move and have our being." The mood passes: again appears the kindlier air and the benignant sun, with appealing visions of the splendor of expectancy in "the yellow splendor and orange flame of the furze against the blue of the sea": of the splendor of completion in the bracken all dying and glorious, a harvest of fairy gold. Yet the impression of a Menacing Presence in the background still abides: and it is in revolt against a being "all powerful and everlasting, creator and slayer of all things that live, of all beauty, sweetness, and compassion," yet

* "The Land's End." By W. H. Hudson. Hutchinson & Co. 10s. 6d. net

"himself without knowledge or thought or emotion," with nothing significant in that which he has made or unmade, that Mr. Hudson sets the watch and the vision of the little life of man.

THREE GROATS' WORTH OF WIT.

The shilling classic multiplies with extraordinary rapidity. In many bookshops it monopolises wall space to the exclusion of more expensive volumes. For the moment this may not be an unmixed blessing to the publisher of original works. One hopes, however, that there will be an ultimate gain in the increasing love of the best books in every branch of modern literature; that the biographer, the historian, the novelist, and even the poet of the future will find his reward in the more widespread taste for letters that will be diffused throughout the community. In the meantime, three publishers are engaged, with admirable emulation, in furnishing a multitude of "best books" for a fortunate generation of book-buyers of slender means—Mr. J. M. Dent, Mr. Henry Frowde, and the firm of Routledge. "Everyman's Library," "The World's Classics," and "The Universal Library" are series with great individual merits. Mr. Dent has precedence by virtue of his speculative daring. He aspires, it is said, to produce a library of a thousand volumes. How is this to be achieved? Each of us could name his favorite hundred best books, few of us would care to draw up a list of a thousand. Yet the publisher has already produced more than three hundred volumes—not one of them unworthy.

Of the twenty-five new volumes before us, perhaps Mr. Ruskin's "Crown of Wild Olive" offers most food for reflection when one moralises over the triumph of the cheap book. For Mr. Ruskin hated cheap books, and an earlier generation had to pay nearly twenty shillings for less printed matter by him than can now be obtained for one. Another writer all too inaccessible for many years was Thomas Love Peacock, whose novels will grow in popular favor the better they become known. It was Mr. Dent who first brought them into vogue with a new generation of book-buyers when he commissioned the late Dr. Garnett to prepare an edition. That edition it is clearly intended to issue in this shilling form, and two of Peacock's romances, "Headlong Hall" and "Nightmare Abbey," are presented here with Dr. Garnett's fine appreciation. As a rule, however, the introductions are by well-known living writers. Mrs. Gaskell's "Life of Charlotte Brontë" has a skilful appraisement of both author and subject from Miss May Sinclair, herself a novelist of power. Dr. Robertson Nicoll, who could not write ill if he tried, deals with George Eliot's "Mill on the Floss," and incidentally replies to Mr. Swinburne's indictment of that book so far as Maggie Tulliver's infatuation for Stephen Guest is concerned. He thinks that George Eliot did not herself realise that in Stephen Guest she was portraying a cad. Mr. Harold Spender writes on Kinglake's "Eothen," and says not a word too much in judicious praise. Two volumes are given over to Francis Parkman's "Montcalm and Wolfe," a most opportune publication at the moment when all eyes are turned to the scene of the exploits of those heroes. Mr. Thomas Seccombe here writes the introduction, and his method offers food for thought as to the purpose of the introduction in such publications as these. Mr. Seccombe, who is one of the ablest and most richly equipped of our younger critics, pays an eloquent tribute to the work of Parkman, to his qualities of accuracy and industry, to his freedom from moralising and theorising. But nowhere does he tell us who Parkman was, the year he was born, when and where he died. In a shilling series these, we should have thought, were the essentials of any prefatory remarks. Mr. Seccombe would probably reply that this information can be obtained in any biographical dictionary, and should be known to the reader. We believe, however, that the only kind of introduction that is required for such volumes as these is an introduction that takes nothing for granted in the way of fact, and is reticent only in the expression of opinion. The literary qualities of Parkman, or of any other writer who is thought fitted for a place in a cheap series of repute, should speak for themselves; but some facts about the author are not redundant.

Of the volumes of the "Universal Library," which are free from introductory matter of any sort, little can be said in praise of the form, which is mean looking. But much may be said in praise of the catholicity of the editor, who has gone far afield for his selection of books. The latest volumes include Matthew Arnold's "Essays in Criticism," Dean Plumptre's "Tragedies of Sophocles," John Stuart Mill's essays entitled "Auguste Comte and Positivism," and Sir John Seeley's "Ecce Homo." For their form and general appearance we are disposed to award the palm to the "World's Classics." Mr. Frowde, however, is in no sense a rival to Mr. Dent or to the Routledge firm. In the main, his selection of books is quite different. He is apparently more urgent than either of his competitors in providing complete editions of certain authors hitherto little familiar in a cheap, handy form. Here are the works of Gibbon, of Burke, of Hazlitt, and, among novelists, of the Brontës and Mrs. Gaskell. We love these books in the "World's Classics," which, in their appearance, present so much of simplicity and restraint. We admire, in good truth, all these shilling volumes of what are truly called "classic" authors. If our race is not the most cultured on earth, assuredly it is not the fault of certain of our publishers.

THE MEDIEVAL CHURCH.*

These three volumes all deal with the fortunes and vicissitudes of the Roman church at critical periods of its history. The age of Innocent the Great comes first in point of time; it is an attractive period for the historian who knows how to handle his materials, and Innocent is a magnificent figure on the centre of the stage. It cannot be said that Mr. Pirie-Gordon has made full use of his opportunities. He is careful and painstaking, and has evidently bestowed a considerable amount of labour in the collection of his materials. But his volume lags behind the greatness of the theme. There is an atmosphere of immaturity about it as well as an apologetic note which does honour to his heart as a loyal Catholic but seriously affects his credit as an impartial historian. The book may probably please certain sections of his co-religionists, but the bias in it is far too manifest to make it acceptable to the great outside public who are willing to hear all sides, but are repelled by supercilious sciolism. The Catholic church may have a devout son but it has a feeble advocate in Mr. Pirie-Gordon.

"The Great Schism of the West," by Professor Salembier, is a new volume of the International Catholic Library. It is a pity that this volume has no table of contents. At the end of the volume there is a somewhat meagre index, but this index affords no key to the contents of the book. The great schism in the West is that unhappy period in papal history lasting nearly half a century (1378-1418), when the church was rent and distracted by rival popes. M. Salembier admits that this is a scandalous episode in the life of the church, and he starts with the excellent maxim that the historian should say nothing false and conceal nothing true. But it can hardly be said that he always adheres to it in the volume before us. We are willing to admit that the rise of Protestantism has its dark side. But is it a complete explanation of the success of the Reformation to say that it was owing to popular passion, the cupidity of the nobility, and degenerate courts? An impartial Catholic historian like, let us say, Franz X. Funk, would admit that the Reformation sprang out of the necessity for reform, and that the best minds in the church saw this necessity for two hundred years before the Reformation actually broke out. Again, in the mighty struggle between Papalism and Episcopalism, which took place during the great schism, M. Salembier's volume would gain if it exhibited a more tolerant attitude towards Episcopalism. It is probable that the infallibility and absolute supremacy of the Pope is the ultimate logical outcome of Roman doctrine. But the men of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries are to be excused if they did not foresee that the papal was finally to beat the episcopal conception of the church. Ultramontanism has got its way in the Catholic church, and it can afford to be just to its unsuccessful competitors.

* "Innocent the Great: An Essay on his Life and Times." By C. H. C. Pirie-Gordon. Longmans, Green & Co. 9s. net.

"The Great Schism of the West." By L. Salembier, Professor at the Catholic University at Lille. Kegan Paul. 7s. 6d.

"The Elizabethan Religious Settlement: A Study of Contemporary Documents." By Henry Norbert Birt, O.S.B., Priest of Downshire Abbey. Bell. 15s. net.

Mr. Birt's Elizabethan Religious Settlement is a contribution of considerable value to the history of Elizabeth's relations with the church. Mr. Birt points out that Convocation opposed the Reformation in 1559, that the Marian bishops, as one would expect, voted in Parliament against severance from Rome, that the clergy of all ranks suffered deprivation in fairly large numbers rather than conform; that the learned professions were Papist to the core, and that the local magistracy, the county gentry, and the landowners long remained faithful to the old creed. He produces documents to prove that this was the case. These contemporary documents do show that a certain proportion of the classes he mentions did continue to adhere to Rome. But if they had adhered in anything like the proportions he assumes, Reformation would have been impossible.

"LETTERS FROM QUEER STREET." *

In "Letters from Queer Street" we can touch the harsh outlines of painful facts under the thin gauze veils of fiction. Many of the best chapters in "fiction" we possess are virtually pieces of the writer's autobiography. And, on the other hand, many of the most interesting pieces of autobiography, such as De Quincey's "Confessions of an Opium Eater," owe their literary value to the play of the author's poetic imagination. The value of the "Letters" before us is that they obviously hold, with little of fancy's adulteration, the simple narrative of hard realities suffered.

Mr. John Mason, the hero, whose correspondence is addressed to an old Colonial chum, is one of those men who are predestined, at birth, to arrive in Queer Street. Of his antecedents we are told very little, but we gather that he is an Australian of good traditions and education, who has seen life all over the globe and fought in the Transvaal war, a thoroughly good fellow, frank and generous, with one inherited vice—a weakness for drink. If he tells us next to nothing of his temptations it is through a manly instinct which prefers to lay bare their results. And accordingly he wins our sympathy from the start.

Having alienated his general acquaintances, and seeking to escape the observations of his respectable friends, Mr. Mason, after being ejected from his lodgings for debt, and from his club for "making a fool of himself," finds himself at large in the London streets with fifteen shillings in his pockets. "Going to ruin is silent work," says a Highland proverb, and many of us know how curiously friends seem to float away and become impalpable directly the tide of our luck ebbs. It is, of course, partly their own delicate desire not to notice our ill-fortune, and partly our own morbid instinct not to go near them that is responsible for our friends' departure. Mr. Mason is no exception to the rule. There is no one in the five millions of Londoners that he can turn to, and so, on catching sight of an acquaintance in the crowd in Piccadilly he turns hurriedly into an old haunt off the Lowther Arcade, and orders a drink. And here we are brought face to face with a romantic episode in Mr. Mason's downward career that justifies us in reviewing "Letters from Queer Street" as fiction. We believe in the incident he narrates, because, as anyone may notice, it is always at a crisis in our career, that romantic episodes occur. But the little incident that strips Mr. Mason of his last fifteen shillings is quite in De Quincey's vein. He rescues a young and innocent girl, "with the wide-open eyes of a child that looks on a life it cannot comprehend," from the clutches of "a man about town," with years of debauchery on his soul, and he spends his remaining shillings in paying her fare back to her Devonshire village. The incident has the air of being "well found" at this stage of the narrative, but fact is often more curious, if less appropriate, than fiction, as we all know. Mr. Mason has another drink, in order to consider ways and means, and then with his last copper bestowed on an abject outcast, he seeks refuge from the malignant downpour of a London rainy night under Hungerford Bridge.

The sensations of a hungry and friendless man, after a horrible, sleepless night in the open, roaming the streets of London for interminable ensuing hours, are most vividly painted by Mr. Mason. The present writer, who has tried it, when he was neither friendless nor homeless, can testify to the biting truth of the narrative. But the value of this personal record is that it may, perhaps, bring home to the comfortable reader what are the sufferings of grim and abject fellow creatures who accost him, with shivering whinings, at night under the bridges. There is nothing so mysteriously, so terribly aloof from us as human suffering. We may estimate its force to be as five, and it may be one hundred, or vice-versâ. But, in general, the healthy and comfortable man buttons up his pockets and says firmly, "It can't be as bad as all that," and passes on, on the safe side. So we quote here Mr. Mason:—

> "What a day that was! There have been many others since that were as bad in most respects—as famishingly hungry and as gloomily hopeless—but never a one of them ever contained so much of direful unhappiness and wretchedness. . . . It symbolises to me the uttermost and darkest depth of hell to which I ever descended. . . . I loathe that day: I hate to think of it. Even in the real wretchedness of those through which I pass now, in the worst moments and the most drearily miserable hours that tax endurance to its very breaking strain, I can look back to those aching twelve with a consolatory resignation to my lot in the thought that none can ever be as dreadfully horrible to me as they. I know that I have sounded the lowest depths of mental distress, and whatever may come after—starving nights in the snow, bitter shiverings in the east wind, the chill of frosty dawns by the river-side, the squalor and noisesomeness of such realities as may be available to me—I shall never really suffer again as I suffered then. . . . My back felt as though it had been beaten and scourged with rods of iron, my head ached and was dizzy, and I felt that weakness of hunger which is its worst and most distressing symptom. Of the demoralisation of that weakness of hunger no man can have understanding unless he has experienced it. And he cannot have experienced it thoroughly until he has endured it in a great and rich city. The Arctic voyager, the explorer, castaways in an open boat, soldiers dying of hunger in muddy entrenchments—none of these have ever experienced the miseries of a starving man in London. . . . You remember, Jimmy, how often we were foodless in Africa, the foodless and fireless outposts in the frost, or the unfed bivouacs, or the famished firing-lines in the long wet grass at dawn? But there we were all hungry. . . . But here it is so different. You pace wearily through hurrying crowds of well-fed people, eager and keen for the day's business, fortified by good food against the wear and strain that the day's work entails. . . . You, yourself, are the miserable exception. You alone are hungry, unhappy, weak, and wolfish. It is this sense of isolation that is most uncomforting to you. It does not matter that in all the millions there must be hundreds of thousands who are as yourself. You do not realise them. You only realise that you are half dead for want of food, and that unless some good miracle may happen, you must starve, and starve, and starve. . . . I crawled up to the wide open space in the middle of the Park, and threw myself down on my face in the grass, and almost at once dropped off to sleep. . . . When I awakened the sun was well down in the west, and it was late afternoon. And then I remember with a sudden shock who I was. That I was John Mason—a dead-beat, homeless John Mason, starving, aching and stiff. . . . When it all came to me, Jimmy, I rolled over on my face again, and buried my head in my folded arms, and cried like a child. I was weak, and I was 'done'—so forgive this confession of utter weakness. Nobody saw it."

In his starving misery and weakness Mr. Mason thinks of suicide, as he cannot face another such twenty-four hours, but he is saved by finding a gold pencil-case in his waistcoat pocket lining. And so, after coming out of the pawnbroker's, he "steps from the vagueness of the Beyond into the light and warmth of the sausage shop." Then commences the authentic chronicle of a broken man, who finds he can live on about three-penn'orth of food per diem, with nights spent in the doss-house, or in walking the London streets. Mr. Mason soon discovers that nobody wants his services, and that "once London has a man down it has very little intention of allowing him to regain his feet." He is always repulsed when he applies for work, and he passes successively through the stages of misery, sulky defiance, fatalism, apathy, and resigned cheerfulness. There are some very good pages on the psychology of the man who has become callous through suffering. In the "hell" period there is still hope, but "when a man loses the capacity of

* "Letters from Queer Street." Being some of the correspondence of the late Mr. John Mason. By J. H. M. Abbott. A. & C. Black, 6s.

"Not only a Great Novel but a Great Book as well."

HEATHER

By John Trevena, Author of "Furze the Cruel," "Arminel of the West," and "A Pixy in Petticoats." Now Ready. 6s.

THE DAILY MAIL says: "Expected a great novel from him, and he has given it. . . . Not only a great novel, but a great book as well, for 'Heather' is more than a novel. It is not a story told by one who has only the gift of story-telling, though it might have been that and still a good novel, for the gift of story-telling is by no means a little thing. But Mr. Trevena has more than that one gift; he has intellect and sympathy, and his stirring, passionate tale is touched with philosophy, without which, perhaps, no novel ever becomes a living book. 'Heather' is full of thought—thought that is a little harsh and rebellious at times, but always great and courageous and often wise. . . . Mr. Trevena has genius. It hardly matters where he sets his characters—whether in huts, on the moor, in village hovels, in the sanitorium, or in the vicarage, he makes them alive to us. They are many, but we remember them all, and shall remember them long. We are not more likely to forget them than we are persons whom we have really met in life. But beyond the moor, beyond the many persons and scenes and incidents, is Mr. Trevena. A moralist, a stern yet kindly moralist, a man with a big mind, is telling the tale. He preaches at us, but we do not object, for he is giving us health and courage, just as the strong wind of Dartmoor gives them. As the patients in the sanitorium gained weight by breathing the keen air, so we, morally, and intellectually, gain weight by reading Mr. Trevena, for he has much to give. He is a great writer, and has written a great book—quite one of the best that has appeared for a long time."

THE PEOPLE DOWNSTAIRS

By Eva Lathbury, Author of "Mr. Meyer's Pupil." A third Impression is now ready. 6s.

"Characterised by amazing powers of observation."
—The Queen

"It is evident that in Miss Eva Lathbury we have a novelist to be reckoned with. Alike in matter and in manner she stands resolutely aloof from her contemporaries."—Academy.

"An extraordinarily clever novel."—P.T.O.

LEAVEN: A BLACK & WHITE STORY

By Douglas Blackburn, Author of "Prinsloo of Prinsloosdorp," etc. Just ready. 6s.

THE FIRST REVIEW: "The truth about South Africa is sometimes a matter of so much variety that perhaps fiction is no bad name for it. Fiction so fervid and realistic, yet so restrained as 'Leaven: A Black and White Story' is, at any rate, an effective way of calling serious attention to undoubted evils. . . . We cannot enter into all the questions raised by this startling novel. . . . It may well be the 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' of South Africa."—Morning Leader.

THE SWORD DECIDES!

By Marjorie Bowen, Author of "The Viper of Milan" and "The Glen o' Weeping." Third large impression. 6s.

"A splendid book. Splendid in that it is full-blooded, bold, dashing, flaming-colored; splendid in that it goes with a tremendous clattering swing; splendid in that it is played under the full glare of blazing sunshine."—Daily Graphic.

FRANCE IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

By W. L. George, Author of "Engines of Social Progress." Just Ready. Please order it to-day from Library, Bookshop, or Bookstall. 6s. net.

"This book 'lets in fresh air,' and will doubtless tend to sweeten the imagination of its readers and lead them even further into the flowery closes of the Entente Cordiale."—Daily Telegraph.

"Writes out of the fulness of a plain man's all-round experience."—Times.

"Is worth more than a passing glance."—Sunday Chronicle.

London: ALSTON RIVERS, LIMITED, 21-22, BROOKE STREET, HOLBORN, E.C.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

THIRD ISSUE.

THE BRITISH TRADE BOOK.

Covering the Years 1880-1907, and showing the Course of British and International Commerce, with its bearing upon our Internal Trade and Industries, &c. By JOHN HOLT SCHOOLING. With a Preface by Professor W. J. ASHLEY. Including 340 Tables and Diagrams showing Trade Tendencies, &c., medium 8vo, cloth boards, 10s. 6d. net.

This is the only work that shows clearly and fully the course of British and International Commerce.

A TERRITORIAL ARMY IN BEING.

A Practical Study of the Militia Systems of Switzerland and Norway. By Lieut.-Col. C. DELME-RADCLIFFE, C.M.G., M.V.O., and J. W. LEWIS, late 19th Hussars. With a Preface by Field-Marshal Earl ROBERTS, V.C., K.G. With Illustrations, crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net; also paper covers, without Illustrations, 1s. net.

G. H. LORIMER'S NEW NOVEL.

"STOP THAT STRIKE, DAD!"

JACK SPURLOCK —PRODIGAL

By the Author of "Letters of a Self-Made Merchant to his Son." Illustrated. 6s.

FIRST REVIEW.

"A very delightful work. Jack Spurlock is a young American whom it is good to meet; Major George Magoffin Jackson claims relationship with one or two of man's best friends in fiction; the tale of their adventures simply rattles along.....Now we think of Tom Sawyer and Huckleberry Finn, and now we discover traces of Mr. Micawber. We recommend it most earnestly to anybody who is in low spirits."—Evening Standard.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

No. 416. JULY, 1908. 6s.

FORECASTS OF TO-MORROW. By the Rev. W. BARRY.
THE REVIVAL OF EGYPT.
THE FIRST HOMER. By A. W. VERRALL.
THE COUNTY OF SOMERSET. By the Rev. W. GRESWELL.
THE REDISCOVERY OF ROME. By THOMAS ASHBY (Director of the British School).
A GRAND TOUR IN THE 16TH CENTURY. By EDWARD ARMSTRONG.
OLD-AGE PENSIONS.
CANADIAN PROBLEMS AND PARTIES. By Professor S. J. MCLEAN (Toronto).
LADY LOUISA STUART. By JOHN BUCHAN.
THE UNREST IN INDIA.
A RECKLESS GOVERNMENT.
THE GERMAN PERIL.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

No. 425. JULY, 1908. Price 6s

1. PORT ROYAL
2. LIVERPOOL
3. HYMNOLOGY, CLASSIC AND ROMANTIC
4. THE QUESTION OF LIFE ON MARS
5. FENELON AT CAMBRAI
6. HERBERT SPENCER
7. COLONIAL POLICY UNDER THE EARL OF ELGIN
8. THE DUC DE CHOISEUL
9. THE FRENCH EXPEDITION TO EGYPT IN 1798
10. THE "THREE-COLOUR" PROCESS
11. LORD MILNER AND CANADIAN PREFERENCE
12. WOMEN AND THE FRANCHISE

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39, Paternoster Row, London.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

feeling sorry for himself—well, he is done. He is underneath, and he will never 'come up top-side' any more. He is below the surface, and he must adapt himself to the conditions that exist below it He is, as the Melanesians say, 'done-finish.'" And, of course, the comfortable reader must remember that when a man is once beneath the surface there is nobody to bring him up—the strong and happy people are all up above, on the top. After six months of semi-starvation, growing fatigue, exposure to bad weather, and mental and moral isolation, during which Mr. Mason finds by odd strokes of luck the few shillings weekly necessary to support a precarious existence, his nerve begins to give out, and he gets steadily more depressed in mind as he weakens in body. He grows to fear Queer Street more and more, to dread the grim cruelty of London, and to lie for hours wrapped in despairing melancholy, fearing the roar of the streets and the ceaseless rush of the hurrying crowds. He has got it, in fact, so ground into him that nothing is so unforgivable in Society's eyes as the poverty, hunger, and wretchedness of a man who has come down through drink or some other vice, that he begins to fear that he will grow mad. When he is a social pariah, it is the deepest instinct of the respectable world to keep him "right down to it." And even when the homeless vagrant turns in self-defence and preys on society, unless he is of the criminal type, he often turns a little crazy, as Josiah Flynt, the authority on tramps, tells us.

What finished Mr. Mason off was a London winter. "An aching fatigue that besets one, the weary despair that drives one through the friendless silent thoroughfares, the gnawing hunger—all these are spirit-breaking experiences. But add cold to them—frosts that numb your feet; chill winds that whistle round corners and lash you about the ribs; sleet that drives into your face until it aches with pain; rain that drenches your thin clothes; slushy snow in the roadway that soddens your inadequate footwear, and then you have a condition of Hell, my James, that out-hells the worst of Infernos." We have no space here to devote to the closing stages of Mr. Mason's life. When he, finally, met with an accident, and was identified and placed in a nursing home by a kindly acquaintance, he was found to be too far gone with a "'tubercular affection'" to last more than a few weeks. This, no doubt, is one of the gauze veils of fiction that the chronicler finds it artistically necessary to use, to satisfy the public's love of appearances.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"Impressions of India" (Macmillan, 3s. net) contains a series of articles contributed by Sir Henry Craik to the "Scotsman," describing a tour which he made in India last year. The collected articles make a readable book, for although the picturesque sides of Indian life have often been described, Sir Henry Craik seems to have enjoyed his visit thoroughly, and writes about it with freshness and zest. He assures his readers that the traveller who goes to India "will never, if he is capable of making any estimate at all, meet with that most irksome of all travelling recompenses—disappointment." The contrast between Western and Eastern life is so great and so evident that one never loses the feeling of being face to face with a strange and unfamiliar world. The book gives a vivid picture of this contrast, and the varied color of Indian country life is well represented. Sir Henry Craik has naturally a great deal to say about the present agitation, its causes and possible results. He is not usually violent or dogmatic, but he seems to have obtained most of his views from Anglo-Indian officials, with the result that his book shows an entire want of understanding of the new native movements. He condemns the subordinate native officials in sweeping terms, and even goes so far as to say that "the greatest blessing that could come to the country would be the deporting of the whole wretched tribe." Hardly less measured are the terms he employs when speaking of our educational system in India—a subject on which, of course, he speaks with authority. But he stops short of agreement with the opinion of "a wise observer of long experience," who declared that "it would have been a happy thing for India had Macaulay never lived." However, despite the political prejudices which Sir Henry Craik took with him to India, his book is not the least valuable of the many volumes upon that country which the present publishing season has given us.

* * *

Owing to the fact that many of the historians of the Oxford Movement have written as if Christianity was introduced into this country about the year 1833, the services of the Evangelical Party to English religion are hardly recognised to a sufficient degree. "A History of the Evangelical Party in the Church of England," by the Rev. G. R. Balleine (Longmans, 5s. net), is a well-informed and readable volume, which should do something to remedy this ignorance. Mr. Balleine dates the existence of the Evangelical Party to 1729, when John and Charles Wesley, with two companions, formed a club at Oxford to study the Greek Testament, and won for themselves such nicknames as "Bible Moths" and the "Holy Club," until a few years later they came to be called Methodists. In 1768 one of the tutors of St. Edmund's Hall complained that among the undergraduates were "several enthusiasts who talked of regeneration, inspiration, and drawing nigh to God." The Head declined to take action, but the Vice-Chancellor held a Court of Inquiry, and six undergraduates were found guilty, and sentenced to be expelled from the Hall and the University. The movement had now started, and soon attracted men like Romaine, Henry Venn, Grimshaw, Milner, Newton, and Fletcher of Madeley, whose sermons and writings established it firmly in the Church of England. The Clapham Sect and the opposition to slavery helped greatly to strengthen the Evangelical ranks, but the main strength of the party soon expressed itself in the great Church Missionary Society, an organisation which has done even more than the Palmerston bishops to spread Evangelical views. Mr. Balleine is particularly happy when writing of the great personalities whom Evangelicalism has produced, but his whole book is a readable and interesting contribution to English Church history.

* * *

The story of Paolo and Francesca has been treated by the poets and commentators of every century since the thirteenth, when the episode took place which was immortalised by Dante in the "Inferno," and became one of the world's romantic tragedies. "Francesca di Rimini: In Legend and in History" (David Nutt, 1s. 6d. net), adapted by Mr. Arnold Harris Mathew from the French of M. Charles Yriarte, is an essay in modern criticism; its main object is to ascertain the proportion of the historical to the legendary in Dante's account. The evidence is most carefully sifted, with the result that the later statement of Boccaccio as to the murder of Francesca and her lover by Giovanni Malatesta, the husband, is accepted as the most substantially correct of any. According to Boccaccio the tragedy took place at Rimini, whither Malatesta hastened from Pesaro, on learning of his wife's infidelity, contemplated or accomplished. The essay contains a good deal of interesting information concerning the social and political position of the Polenta and Malatesta families and the Italian feudal system during the eternal warfare between Guelf and Ghibelline. Mr. Mathew's free adaptation of the text is discreet and scholarly.

* * *

In his just and logical plea for "The Sanity of William Blake" (A. C. Fifield, 1s. net), Dr. Greville MacDonald observes, rather unkindly, that "Blake was undoubtedly mad if we are to believe all that his apologists wrote to prove the contrary." According to Mr. Swinburne, Blake lived like a saint and wrote like a libertine; while Messrs. Ellis and Yeats "invite us to substitute an absolutely unintelligible mysticism for some of the grandest symbolic writing the world has ever produced." Dr. MacDonald, while appreciating the devotion of these authorities to their subject, says bluntly that they misinterpreted him. His own plea for Blake's sanity is ingenious enough. There are, as he truly points out, two classes, the class of Facts and that of Ideas, and Blake, belonging as he clearly does to the latter, cannot be judged by the conventional standard of sanity set up by the former. He was a radical idealist whose "seeing through and not with the eye" was not the vaunt of an imbecile with a belief in his own mystic powers, but a spiritual possession involving a higher faculty for visualisation than is vouchsafed to most. Dr. MacDonald

The pipe that clears today of past regrets and future fears
Omar Khayyam (modernised).

is a pipe filled with

Player's Navy Mixture

A Tobacco of Matchless Charm.

Sold in Two Strengths:
MILD, 5d. per oz.
MEDIUM, 4½d. per oz.

John Player & Sons, Nottingham, will forward Testing Samples post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

0442

The Imperial Tobacco Co. (of Great Britain and Ireland) Limited.

TANGYE OIL ENGINE

AUTOMATIC TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP EXCEPT FOR STARTING

TANGYES LTD BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

UNDERWOOD VISIBLE TYPEWRITER.

The Machine you will eventually buy

Every character in sight from Date to Signature

The only strictly high-grade visible writer

Especially Adaptable for Invoicing

Underwood Typewriter Co.,
120, Queen Victoria St., E.C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

HIGHEST QUALITY

TURKISH TOWELS

AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

urges, in short, that Blake was mad only so far as a child is mad, who asserts the supremacy of the higher imagination over mundane reason; and that he was sane in that, in his so-called madness, he was too splendidly consistent to be credited with an erratic brain. This essay contains the substance, illustrated and amplified, of a lecture given before the Ruskin Union last year, and, short as it is, must be deemed a valuable contribution to Blake literature. The clearness of its argument affords a marked contrast to the bewildering maze of paradoxes into which the majority of commentators, including even the most brilliant, have suffered themselves to be drawn in dealing with this elusive and fascinating subject.

* * *

A Novel Reader's Guide:—"The Little Brown Brother." By Stanley Portal Hyatt (Constable, 6s.). A novel of adventure in which Mr. Hyatt, who was a war correspondent during the Spanish-American War, attacks the administration of the Philippines.—"Heather o' the Rivers." By W. H. Thomson (Greening, 6s.). A pleasant love story; the scene laid in a Scottish farm.—"The Dazzling Miss Davison." By Florence Warden (Fisher Unwin, 6s.). The usual novel of mystery and adventure, constructed with rather more than the usual skill.—"The Surprising Husband." By Richard Marsh (Methuen, 6s.). An unpleasant story of a politician who, famous for his violent anti-negro policy, discovers on the birth of his son that he himself is of negro blood. The story might be paralleled from many Americans' and South Africans' experiences.—"Aunt Maud." By Ernest Oldmeadow (Grant Richards, 6s.). A fairly good love story of the introspective type.

The Week in the City.

The Movement of Leading Stocks.

	Price Friday Morning, July 10.	Price Friday Morning, July 17.
Consols 2½ per cent.	87 11/16	... 87 13/16
German 3 per cent.	82	... 82½
Russian 5 per cent....	96¼	... 96
London and North Western Railway ...	137	... 134
London General Omnibus	39½	... 38½
Union Pacific Railway	153¼	... 154⅛
Canadian-Pacific	167½	... 172

There has been no important change either in the money or stock markets during the week. The absence of speculation is rather a good sign, and makes me think that a certain City editor who has been prophesying another collapse in Americans for the last six months will not see his prophecy fulfilled. The crops may not quite meet expectations in the United States, but they will probably be good enough to help towards a revival in trade, and the reports from Canada are so good that the Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk stocks have been recovering in spite of bad traffics.

The London Omnibus Amalgamation.

The terms of the London omnibus amalgamation are considered fairly satisfactory, and it is expected that they will be carried through without much difficulty. Everything will depend upon the organising power of the new board. The fact that the old London General Omnibus was able to earn good profits for so long shows that it might be done again. There is no doubt that the motor 'buses have been handled in a very stupid and wasteful fashion. The waste due to the racing of rival 'buses will now be eliminated, and this alone is an important advantage. Then it ought to be possible to charge more for the quicker and more costly motor service than for the slower and cheaper horse 'bus. It has been suggested that a good deal of loss might be avoided if the repairing staff were improved. Motor 'buses that don't pay should be withdrawn, and held in reserve, to take the places of those worn out. Altogether there does seem to be plenty of room for improvement, and the real question is whether those in command have the capacity to see and execute a sound policy.

The American Situation.

Now that the contest between Mr. Taft and Mr. Bryan has begun, and the platforms have been published, it becomes clear that the American railway market has nothing in particular to dread from politics. Mr. Bryan is the more radical, no doubt, but his tariff policy would almost certainly stimulate trade, and the abandonment of silverism removes the old fear of a democratic victory. The following, from Mr. F. W. McAdow of Chicago, to the New York "Journal of Commerce," throws a good deal of light upon the business outlook, and shows that the present conditions are not so bad as some people try to make out. It is, I am sure, worth reading by anyone who has business or investment interests in the United states: "The condition in Chicago as reflected by bank clearings for the first five months of 1908, shows a decrease for 1907 of 278,000,000 dol., but an increase over the corresponding period of 1906 of 337,000,000 dol. The commercial paper houses state it in this way: There has been an enormous liquidation in merchandise lines, in debts of mercantile concerns, and as business improves it will tend to increase borrowing to that extent, as well as improve the credit and standing of business concerns, and if political parties do not inaugurate a too unsettling campaign there will be a marked revival in trade. Four leading lines of trade report a decrease for five months averaging from 33⅓ to 50 per cent. The 50 per cent. reduction is in luxuries and in iron and steel. Seven houses report a gain over 1907. The entire forty lines report a positive prospective increase for fall trade, although the first orders are coming in smaller than the time of the year would seem to warrant, but the outlook is that the volume of a normal year will be reached before the season closes. The commercial agencies give these reasons: That there is less fear of lower prices, and that is restoring confidence; there was no great accumulation of merchandise stocks on hand when the depression came, and, therefore, as soon as the buying movement starts in, it will not be hindered by overstock. In May the railroads borrowed on bonds, notes, and stocks, 154,000,000 dol., against 52,000,000 dol. in May, 1907. The inference is that this amount borrowed will at once enter into construction work and increase the demand. The savings deposits are increasing. Building permits for the first five months of 1908 are about the same as for the corresponding period of 1907. There is a greater volume of trade moving over the railroads than for the same period six weeks ago. The grain receipts and shipments are averaging one million dollars per day, and the whole tone in the Chicago market is one of optimism and immediate improvement."

The Capital of Capitalism.

The extraordinary accumulation of gold that has been going on for months at the Bank of France is merely one of the outward signs of the extraordinary saving powers of the French, and of the equally extraordinary concentration of those powers in Paris. The thrift of the French peasants and merchants and manufacturers flows through regular and well defined channels into certain well-known reservoirs. A good deal of French floating money has been remuneratively employed of late at high rates in Berlin and other centres of Germany, and quantities of German bonds, now so cheap and plentiful, have been exported into France. Lots of hungry Americans have been over in Paris with prospectuses, but these efforts are generally fruitless. As a rule, French investors like Government bonds and eschew American railways, though an exception was made of the last issue of Pennsylvania bonds. It is quite true that the banks direct the conscience of French investors; but (as has been truly said) they could not retain the position if they did not consult and carefully watch at every moment the prejudices and notions of their customers. According to an American observer, the Paris banks are not likely just now to recommend anything big outside the public funds. Russia apparently still inspires sufficient confidence, and "no one here [i.e., in Paris] doubts that the Crédit Lyonnais is preparing for the new loan so long announced and so long delayed." France is also expected to furnish the money for the remaining sections of the "German" railway to Bagdad!

Lucellum.

Liver troubles

are speedily and effectually cured by LIVERETS. The great disadvantage of most liver medicines is that they have a distinctly debilitating effect on the health.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets

STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

Are especially compounded to overcome this evil. Prepared, as prescribed by an eminent physician, from purely vegetable ingredients, they thoroughly cleanse the liver of all impurities and leave it perfectly healthy. And the valuable tonic properties they possess, stimulate the liver while they relieve it, and, finally, make it sound and strong enough to enable it to perform its functions in a healthy, natural way. Of all Chemists and Stores, or Post Free, 1/1½, from

MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name MERIT'S LIVERETS, and the signature MERIT & Co., is on the package. Beware of spurious imitations.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it WILL BE REPLACED.

ONE & ALL SEEDS

THE BRAND GUARANTEES ONE & ALL QUALITY.

ONE & ALL SEEDS are reliable, pure, and guaranteed.

Each packet is dated with the year of issue.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS are complete Manures.

All are supplied in small quantities at reasonable prices.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Choice Varieties of Sweet Peas, with an Original Pamphlet on their Culture, by Richard Dean, V.M.H.—viz., Dorothy Eckford, white; Hon. Mrs. Kenyon, yellow; Prima Donna, soft pink; King Edward VII., crimson; Miss Wilmott, rich deep orange pink; Mrs. Walter Wright, mauve; Prince of Wales, fine rose; Duchess of Westminster, violet purple; Othello, deep maroon; Lady Grisel Hamilton, pale lavender; Duke of Westminster, purple; Navy Blue.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Annuals.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Perennials and Biennials.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables for Saladings.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables.

One & All Collection of Choicest Asters in 10 Varieties—2s. 6d. Giant Comet, white; Giant Comet, The Bride, white; Giant Comet, rose; Giant Comet, azure blue; Giant Comet, dark violet; Mixed Dwarf Chrysanthemum; Finest Mixed Bouquet; Mixed Victoria; Mixed Paeony; Perfection; and Betteridge's Quilled in mixed colours.

One & All Fertiliser No. 24 for general garden purposes. Half-rod packets 6d. bags, 7 lbs., 2/3; 14 lbs., 3/6; 28 lbs., 5/9; 56 lbs., 10/6; 112 lbs., 20/- Carriage Paid.

ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, LIMITED. Name and address of nearest Local Agent, Illustrated Catalogues, and other details, sent free by post on application to EDWARD OWEN GREENING, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING. — Typewriting of every description high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

MISCELLANEOUS.

PRIVATE ACCOUNT BOOK. For Country or City Gentlemen. Guaranteed to fulfil every requirement. Post free 10/6, or Particulars free, McQueen & Co., 1a, Moat Rd., Leicester.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

CARTOONS BY "F.C.G."
SHORT STORIES,
BOOK REVIEWS,
LITERARY ARTICLES,
PROBLEMS AND PRIZES,
SURVEY OF THE WEEK,
BRIDGE, CHESS, PHOTOGRAPHY.
NATURE AND SCIENCE,
Etc., Etc.

(One Penny Weekly.)

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR

CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY OF LIVERPOOL

SESSION 1908-9.

Prospectuses and full particulars of any of the following will be forwarded on application :—

FACULTIES OF ARTS, SCIENCE, MEDICINE, LAW AND ENGINEERING
UNIVERSITY TRAINING COLLEGE FOR TEACHERS
SCHOOL OF ARCHITECTURE
SCHOOL OF COMMERCE
INSTITUTE OF ARCHÆOLOGY
SCHOOL OF TRAINING FOR SOCIAL WORK
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC HEALTH
SCHOOL OF TROPICAL MEDICINE
SCHOOL OF VETERINARY MEDICINE & SURGERY
SCHOOL OF DENTAL SURGERY
SCHOOL OF PHARMACY
INSTITUTE OF COMPARATIVE PATHOLOGY
DEPARTMENTS OF BIO-CHEMISTRY AND EXPERIMENTAL MEDICINE
HALLS OF RESIDENCE FOR MEN AND WOMEN
EVENING COURSES FOR THE DEGREE OF B.A.
EVENING LECTURES AND LABORATORY INSTRUCTION

Fellowships, Scholarships, Exhibitions, Special Grants and Prizes.

The Matriculation Examination of the Joint Board, or its equivalent, must be passed before a Student is registered for a Degree Course.

The Autumn Term commences on October 6th, 1908.

P. HEBBLETHWAITE, M.A., Registrar.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education, Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities. Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

(For Leisure Hour Work, see the Bootham School exhibit in the Franco-British Exhibition, Education Building, Section J.)

Special terms for boys under 14 and under 13.

For copies of Prospectus and full particulars with regard to Scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

NEW BOYS ARRIVE SEPTEMBER 17TH, OTHERS 18TH.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C. Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The South Wales and Monmouthshire Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts, 3, 4, 5 and 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

Superintendent ... Miss HESTER DAVIES.
Secretary ... ... J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.

The School is under the Management of a Committee appointed by the Council of the College. It is under Government Inspection, and the Committee is empowered to grant Diplomas in Cookery, Laundrywork and Housewifery, under the cognizance and with the approval of the Board of Education.

The Departments of the Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts are as follows :—

1. TRAINING SCHOOL OF COOKERY.
2. TRAINING SCHOOL OF LAUNDRY WORK.
3. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEWIFERY.
4. TRAINING SCHOOL OF DRESSMAKING.
5. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEKEEPING.

Further particulars can be obtained on application to the Superintendent of the School, at 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.

In the Cheshire Plain, four miles from Crewe. Opened in 1900. Modern Buildings, standing in 24 acres of grounds. Preparations for University Scholarships and Matriculation, or for Professional and Commercial life.

NEXT ENTRANCE EXAMINATION JULY 21st, AT THE SCHOOL.

For prospectus and particulars of admission on the Foundation, apply to the Head Master, H. L. JONES, M.A. (Oxon.), or to the Clerk to the Governors 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

BROMSGROVE SCHOOL, WORCESTERSHIRE.

AUTUMN TERM begins September 17th.

APPLY THE HEADMASTER.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

BOOKSELLERS.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 93, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

[And at READING and GUILDFORD.]

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

BOOKS. BOOKS. BOOKS.

Rare and curious Books for the collector. First Editions. Court Memoirs Medical, Occult, &c. Out of Print Books and everything that's a book supplied. No matter when published. State wants. 100,000 books on sale. Catalogues free.

HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

BOOKS WANTED. First editions of all kinds. Sporting, Naval, Military Coloured Plates by Alken, Cruikshank, Rowlandson, and others. Special list of 3,000 wanted. LIBRARIES PURCHASED.

406 pages, 8vo, cloth, 2s. post free.

HEAVEN AND HELL:

Things Heard and Seen.

By EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER wrote:—"There is one grand and beautiful idea underlying all Swedenborg's revelations or speculations about the future life. His remarkably suggestive books are becoming familiar to the reading and reflecting portion of the community."

LONDON: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury St.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

KINGSLEY HOTEL, Near the British Museum.
Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

THACKERAY HOTEL,
Opposite the British Museum.
Great Russell Street, London.

These well appointed and commodious Temperance Hotels will, it is believed, meet the requirements, at moderate charges of those who desire all the conveniences and advantages of the larger modern Licensed Hotels. These Hotels have Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every floor, spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard, and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.
Inclusive charge for Bedroom, Attendance Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, From 8/6 to 10/6 per day.
Full Tariff and Testimonials on application.
Telegraphic Addresses—
Kingsley Hotel, "Bookcraft, London." Thackeray Hotel, "Thackeray, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

A LIBRARY OF PEACE AND WAR

WITH AN INTRODUCTION
BY
F. W. HIRST.

1/- NET.

THE
NATION PUBLISHING CO., LTD.,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:
HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son, Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.
NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.
SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.
ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.
BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott. Prop.

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.
HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.
MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing sea. 6/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.
ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.
GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.
ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Afternoon Teas, Tel. 647

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

SWANAGE.
"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.
WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell, Manager

ANDERSON ANDERSON & ANDERSON LTD.

CATALOG POST FI

THE WATERPROOFERS. THE RUBBER HO

ANDERSONS'

ANDERSON, ANDERSON & ANDERSON, Ltd.

INDIA RUBBER, WATERPROOF and OILSKIN MANUFACTURERS.

32 GOLD MEDALS AND AWARDS.

GOLD MEDAL

GARDEN HOSE.

NOTE OUR TRADE MARK.

AND FITTINGS

IMPERIAL ARMOURED

For very Rough and Heavy Work.

Diam.	1/2	5/8	3/4	1 inch	per 60 ft.
	56/3	66/3	78/9	118/9

ARMOURED

Red Rubber Seamless, Strong & Durable.

Diam.	1/2	5/8	3/4 inch	per 60 ft.
	43/9	51/3	62/6

DENSHAM GARDENIA

Light Seamless Woven Cotton, Rubber Lined.

Diam.	1/2	5/8	3/4 inch	per 60 ft.
	47/6	52/6	60/-

RAMTOHN HOSE

Very best Hose made. Known to wear 15 years.

Diam.	1/2	5/8	3/4	1 inch	per 60 ft.
1 ply	43/9
2 ply	51/3	57/6	65/-
3 ply	57/6	65/-	75/-	103/9

IMPERIAL HOSE

For hard wear. Known to wear 10 years.

Diam.	1/2	5/8	3/4	1 inch	per 60 ft.
1 ply	36/3
2 ply	43/9	52/6	61/3
3 ply	52/6	62/6	72/6	93/9

MELBOURNE. Seamless Canvas Woven Hose, very light, strong, suitable for Cricket Grounds. N.B.—Not Rubber lined, Sweats in use.

Diam.	5/8	3/4	1	1 1/4	1 1/2 inch	per
	6d.	9d.	10d.	1/1	1/5	yard

RICHMOND

Red Rubber, Seamless, Strong & Durable.

Diam.	1/2	5/8	3/4 inch	per 60 ft.
1 ply	25/-
2 ply	31/3	37/6	45/-
3 ply	37/6	45/-	52/6

VICTORIA

A Good Drab Hose, Excellent Value.

Diam.	1/2	5/8	3/4 inch	per 60 ft.
1 ply	18/9
2 ply	21/3	27/6	32/6
3 ply	25/-	31/3	36/

"Q. V." HOSE

Special Value at price (Complete with Fittings.)

Diam.	1/2	5/8 inch
60 ft.	14/9	22/6
90 ft.	21/3	32/6
120 ft.	27/6	42/6

"VICTORIA" SPRINKLER. 2/3

No. 1 No. 2. TAP UNIONS.

The "Facile" 2/6

No. 3. No. 4. HOSE UNIONS.

"ICH DIEN" SPRINKLER. 8 Arm 15/6, 4 Arm 14/-

HOSE BRANCH No. 5.

HOSE REEL.

No.		each
00.	Small size. To hold	6/10
0.	60ft 1/2in.	8/-
1.	60ft 5/8in.	9/3
2.	120ft. 5/8in.	11/10
3.	120ft. 3/4in.	14/5
4	240ft 3/4in.	17/4
5	300ft 3/4in.	21/-

PRICES FOR FITTINGS.

No.	1/2	5/8	3/4	1in.
1	1/2	1/7	2/-	3/-
2	1/-	1/5	1/9	2/9
3	5d.	3½d.	5d.	7d.
4	1/3	1/7	1/9	3/-
5	3/-	4/3	5/6	9/3
6	4/9	6/3	7/9	12/3
7	2/3	2/6	2/9	3/6

HOSE BRANCH, No. 6

"WINDSOR" HOSE REEL (Galvanised).

No.	To hold	each
00	60ft. 1/2in.	5/6
0	90ft. 1/2in.	6/11
1	120ft. 1/2in.	8/6
2	120ft. 5/8in.	10/6
3	200ft. 5/8in.	16/6
4	200ft. 1in.	27/6

Green Painted. No. 00 4/3

SPREADER No. 7

CATALOGUES POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

ANDERSONS'

ANDERSON, ANDERSON & ANDERSON, Ltd.

RUBBER, WATERPROOF and OILSKIN MANUFACTURERS.

GOLD MEDAL

FISHING WATERPROOFS

THIRTY-ONE PRIZE MEDALS AND AWARDS.

The "BUCKLAND" JACKET. 47/6

Well Ventilated. Storm Cuffs and Fly. With Hooks to shorten to Semi-Jacket for Deep Wading, preventing draggling in Water. 34 in. and 37 in. long.

The LADIES' "BUCKLAND."

Dark Fawn Fishing Costume.

Jacket	47/6
Skirt	31/6
Gaiters	8/11

The "BUCKLAND" COAT. 57/6

For Fishing, Shooting, General Wear.

Well Ventilated, Storm Cuff and Fly. With Hooks to shorten into Jacket for Wading.

OVERALL TROUSERS (Double Seated).

For Boat Fishing, &c. With Waterproof Flap behind the Fly Front. In strong Double Texture.

Twill, No. R14	25/-
Black Rubber	21/-
Fawn or Blue Black	32/6

STORM CAP.

(Ventilated).

Black Rubber, 2/9, 3/9, 6/6.

Double Texture 6/6, 8/6, 10/6.

THE "HAMPSHIRE."

33in. or 36in. long.

No. 1	No. 2	No. 3	No. 4
25/-	21/-	15/6	10/6

THE 'KNOCKABOUT' HAT.

No. 16, 7/6.

No. 10, 6/6.

Folds small for pocket.

OVERALL SKIRTS. (Double Seated).

For Boat Fishing, &c. In strong Double Texture.

33 in. long	21/-
36 in. ,,	23/6
39 in. ,,	23/-

Oilskin 15/6

ANDERSONS'

ANDERSON, ANDERSON & ANDERSON,

INDIA RUBBER, WATERPROOF and OILSKIN MANUFACTURERS

32 GOLD MEDALS AND AWARDS.

GOLD MEDAL

MOTORING COATS, &c.

NOTE OUR TRADE MARKS.

WIND AND WATER PROOF.

Fig. 1. Patent Neck Protecting Collar Extensions under Lapels. Patent Chest Protectors slip automatically in sleeves with coat.

Fig. 2. Patent Neck Protecting Collar Extensions, showing on right, hidden under lapel on left. Patent Chest Protectors partially fastened.

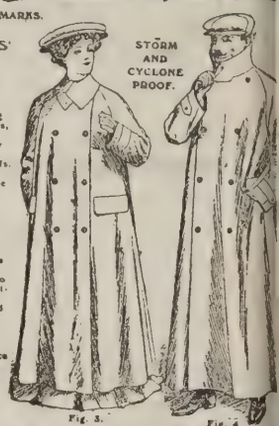
ANDERSONS' Patent MOTORING Cyclone-Proof GARMENT With Patent Neck Protecting Collar Extensions, Patent Chest Protector and Inner Storm Cuffs.

Gentlemen's Shape The "RITZ." Figs. 1 & 4 Ladies' Shape The "CARLTON Figs. 2 & 3

Same Garment, showing use as transition from ordinary coat to warm and comfortable, absolutely wind, water and cyclone proof Garment.

Made in a selection of choice high-class Mackintoshes.

Prices on application.



STORM AND CYCLONE PROOF.

Fig. 3. Patent Neck Protecting Collar Extensions exposed but not fastened. Patent Chest Protectors can be in use or not at will.

Fig. 4. Patent Neck Prot Collar Extensions to be fastened, all absolute protection be in use or not a

LEATHER LEGGINGS. (As illustration.)

	per pair
Super Pigskin	27/6
Selected best Pigskin	21/-
Brown Smooth Hide	15/6
Black or Brown Smooth Hide with seam down back	13/6
Black or Brown Pig Grained Hide	11/6

Cheaper qualities than above, in Brown only 9/6 and 8/6

AIR CUSHIONS

Strong and durable. Covered in Blue, Green, Brown or Drab

Price 21/-

WATERPROOF CAPS. (As illustration)

Super Double Texture Tweeds 12/6 to 18/6 each.

"Gall" shape, Double Texture Tweed, 7/6 to 13/6

GOGGLES.

To fold up flat in neat cases 2/6, 3/9, 5/- and 6/6 per pair

GLOVES.

Real Lambskin (as illustration), lined lambswool, leather palms, 7/6 per pair.

LEATHER GAUNTLETS Double palms and fingers, 9/6 per pair

Lined ditto, 10/6 per pair

WATERPROOF "KEEPWARMS." Warmly lined, 2/6 per pair

Superior quality ditto 5/6 per pair.

LEATHER STORM CUFFS To wear over ordinary short gloves, leather lined 5/6 per pair

SPECIAL FUR GAUNTLET Black Seal Leather Palms, L Lambswool.

25/6 per pair

CATALOGUES POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

ANDERSONS'

ANDERSON, ANDERSON & ANDERSON Ltd.

RUBBER, WATERPROOF AND OILSKIN MANUFACTURERS.

GOLD MEDAL

FISHING BROGUES

THIRTY-ONE PRIZE MEDALS AND AWARDS.

FOR HARD WEAR.

• "SANDEMAN." Leather and Canvas. No. 1 Quality.

Sizes, 8's to 12's	32/6
,, 13's	35/-

FOR MEDIUM WEAR.

• "TILT." Leather and Canvas. No. 2 Quality.

Sizes, 8's to 12's	27/6
,, 13's	30/-

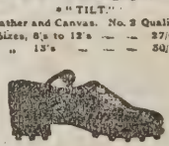
FOR LIGHT WE

"SEVERN." Leather and Canvas.

Sizes, 7's to 12's	32/6
,, 13's	35/-

• "TILT" SHOE. No. 2 Quality.

Sizes, 7's to 12's 25/-



RUBBER SHOE.

Sizes, 6's to 12's 12/6

"NEVERSLIP" SHOE.

Sizes, 7's to 12's 25/-

• THESE BROGUES ARE BRANDED "ANDERSONS' LONDON GOLD MEDAL BROGUES."

AND BAGS

"EXPANDING" SALMON. Ends can be folded in.

14in. by 11in. 10/6

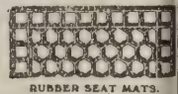
NEW "FREKE." Detachable Rubber Lining.

	Lined	Unlined
No. 1 (18 by 11)	11/6	9/6
No. 2 (19 by 13)	13/6	10/6
No. 3 (22 by 15)	16/6	12/6
No. 4 (25 by 15)	19/6	14/6

"PICKERING" SALMON. Will fold into small compass.

38in. by 13in.

"B.S.A." BOAT CUSHION. 15in. by 9in., Stout Twill 7/6



RUBBER SEAT MATS.

14in. by 10in. 5/6 15in. by 11in.

16in. by 12in. 7/6

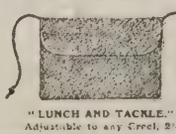
CANOE MATS.

13in. by 10in. 2/6

FOLDING WATERPROOF SEAT

14in. by 10in. 11/6

16in. by 12in. 2/-



"LUNCH AND TACKLE." Adjustable to any Creel, 2/-

WATERPROOF GLOVES. With Fingers, Without Fin

37, QUEEN VICTORIA ST., E.C. LONDON. 58-59, CHARING CROSS, S.

70, QUEEN STREET, CARDIFF. 23, CASTLE STREET, SWANSEA.

Or from every high-class Dealer in the United Kingdom.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, JULY 18, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. III., No. 17.] SATURDAY, JULY 25, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 587

POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—
The "Main Duty" of the Government 590
The Peers and the Poor ... 591
The Problem of Turkish Reform 592
The Reversal of Our Penal Policy 594

LIFE AND LETTERS:—
An Impeachment of Cathedral Building 595
The Poet of Freedom 596
Do we Over-eat? 597
The Art of Opening 598

PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—
The Harmsworth Brand—II. 599

ART:—
The Londoner and His Buildings 601

COMMUNICATIONS:—
The International Peace Congress. By G. H. Perris ... 602

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
"Wanted a New Scheme of Culture" By A. E. Z. ... 602
The Working of the Small Holdings Act. By Alfred Rowntree 603
Suffragists and the Temperance Cause. By Kate A. Hessel 603
The Indeterminate Sentence. By Arthur St. John and B. L. 603
The New Spirit in Turkey. By T. Palmer Newbould ... 604
"Is the Drama Dying?" By L. R. and Euphemia Stevens 605

PAGE

Goethe's 78th Venetian Epigram. By David Wilson ... 605
"The Lost Liberty of the Road." By R. W. J., Henry Holiday, and S. D. W. ... 605
The Court of Criminal Appeal. By a Criminal Lawyer ... 606
The Licensing Bill and Temperance. By J. W. Wilson 607
Politics in a Hurry. By Edwin Hill 607
Imperial Politics at Municipal Elections. By Albert Raphael 607

POETRY:—
Be Not Afraid. By Herbert Trench 607

THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 608
Books to be Read 608

REVIEWS:—
Bonaparte in His Prime ... 609
The First Irish Democrat ... 610
Lions and Worse... 610
Comic Verse 611
A Study in Bitterness 612

BOOKS IN BRIEF 614
Gospels of Anarchy and other Contemporary Studies ... 614
The Tower of London 614
A Century of Education ... 616
Edward Fitz-Gerald and "Posh" Herring Merchants 616
New Editions 616
Portraits of the Archbishops of Canterbury 616
A Novel Reader's Guide .. 616

THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 618

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

Quebec has kept her 300th birthday nobly this week. The celebrations began on Wednesday with the arrival of the Prince of Wales and the Atlantic Fleet, unless, indeed, we count as the beginning the sight to be seen last Monday of Count Bertrand de Montcalm and Mr. George Wolfe ascending the stairs of their hotel arm in arm. On Thursday, there was a pageant of the landing at Quebec of Champlain, the founder of the only France outside France, and on Friday the Plains of Abraham were dedicated by the Prince as a national park. The view from the heights above the town, both up and down and across the St. Lawrence, is perhaps the most beautiful illustrated page of history that any country has to show. Although Wolfe's bombardment of Quebec is in the pageant, the celebration in the main is of French genius, for it was the French who first conceived the idea of a great colony stretching across from the Mississippi to the lakes, and there are no nobler names in colonial history than Champlain, Cartier, and Montcalm. The presence of the United States ships at the fêtes served to remind the world of the disarmament of the Great Lakes, and France, too, by taking part in the celebrations, bore witness to the strength of the entente, and to the fact that under the Liberal colonial system New France can still retain its own individuality in Canada, and be a bond of union between England and the American continent.

* * *

The House of Lords carried the Second Reading of the Old Age Pensions Bill by 123 votes to 16, the 16 supporting Lord Wemyss's amendment postponing the Bill until after the report of the Royal Commission on the Poor Law. Lord Wolverhampton, who moved the Second Reading, strangely suggested that the industry clause was open to amendment. The Lords having accepted the principle of a Money Bill and thus ignored their conduct in 1860 over the Paper Duties Bill, cannot alter its structure. The debate, though able in tone and with some brilliant passages, was a singular example of class selfishness. Lord Rosebery, who, though he learns nothing new, forgets everything that he learnt as a Liberal, in particular suggested that the Bill dealt a blow at the Empire which might be "almost mortal," and embarrassed its finance to a degree to which no man living could see the limit. Lord Rosebery did not, however, propose to ward off this vital peril by opposing the Bill. Lord Lansdowne took similar ground, declaring that while old age pensions would cost the nation as much as a great war, its moral effects would be inferior; for while a war toughened the fibre of the people, pensions of 5s. a week at 70 weakened it. Lord St. Aldwyn thought more favorably of the Bill, believing that the country favored it and criticising its details with skill. But he regretted that it was being financed on a shilling income-tax.

* * *

But the most significant note of opposition came from Lord Cromer, that distinguished old age pensioner whose share in the national pensions fund has been commuted for £50,000. Lord Cromer, like Lord Rosebery, considered that pensions to the workers would cripple the Empire, its finances and its military and naval defences. The pith of these arguments was a sensational adoption of the theory of an inevitable war with Germany. We quote Lord Cromer's most reckless words, which have naturally caused a fall in German stocks, and must gravely imperil the prospects of international peace. He insisted that the main duty of the Government was

> "to make provision betimes for the European conflict which may not improbably be forced upon us before many years have elapsed. I am aware that the mass of the people of this country, who do not follow foreign affairs with any very close attention, are not alive to the possibility of any such conflict taking place. I say it is the duty of a Government gifted with both patriotism and foresight, who have means of information at their disposal which is not available to the general public, to provide betimes for that danger—a danger of which I, in common, I believe, with most people who can speak with real authority on foreign affairs, am very firmly convinced."

Lord Cromer added that this risk, and "more than risk," of conflict arose because national interests and race passions were involved, rather than because of deliberately hostile intentions. Perhaps Lord Cromer would inform us in what part of the continents of Europe, Asia, Africa, America, or Australasia, any real conflict of "interests" between Germany and ourselves arises, or has ever arisen. As to race passion, his speech is eminently calculated to arouse it.

* * *

The House of Commons, working under the plan of closure by compartments, which assigns two days to Clause 1 of the Licensing Bill, has passed that Clause by a majority of 208. The chief ground of discussion was the Government's failure to include grocers' and off-licences in the machinery of the Bill. The Home Secretary defended their exclusion chiefly on the ground of the difficulty of ascertaining their monopoly value, which does not strike us as an Herculean task. Undoubtedly a strong feeling exists in the country as to the Government's failure to deal with existing off-licences. Much of the drinking among women, which has greatly increased during recent years, is believed to be due to the existence of these licences. Even if there were no greater reason for bringing them under greater public control, it is necessary to do so in order to secure them at the end of the time limit. Licensing authorities should surely have a free hand to regulate the retail sale of intoxicants in all its forms.

* * *

The Bill does not provide for this, and there are signs that if it passes, much of the energy of the trade will be turned to stimulating the sale of liquor on and from off-licensed premises. A very large proportion of these places are owned by brewers, and during the last few months they have been seeking to acquire more of them. Owing to the extreme complication of the law, more Parliamentary time than is available might be needed to deal thoroughly with the off-licence question. But one comparatively simple and efficacious step may be taken. The time limit clause may be made to apply to all licences whether "on" or "off," so that in 1923, or whenever it expires, the licensing authority will have a perfectly free hand. This will not impair the rights which the licensing authorities possess in the meantime over all beer off-licences, and wine and spirit off-licences, which have changed hands since 1902. We hope this step will be taken, for the weakness of the Bill over clubs and off-licences has greatly hampered the feeling for it among Conservative temperance reformers.

* * *

President Fallieres and the Tsar meet on Monday at Reval. The object of the meeting is known to everyone. Indeed, for the last week there has been a persistent rumor on the Paris Bourse that the floating of the new loan has already been entrusted to the Crédit Lyonnais. The bargain may not be a nice one, but to the majority of Frenchmen there seems no help for it. Unnatural as the alliance may be, they say, France has need of it, and must pay the price, until some better arrangement is devised. It may be taken for granted that the meeting heralds no great changes in world-policy. France has no ambitious schemes to forward; she is averse from change, for change invariably brings with it the menace of war. Her one entanglement is Morocco, and there, in spite of General d'Amade and the Colonial party, the facts of the situation will eventually prove too strong for her. Though, as the special correspondent of the "Morning Post" points out, the whole of the country save a few coast ports, has declared for Mulai Hafid, she continues to give her support to the deposed and discredited Abd-el-Aziz.

* * *

The Parliamentarians at Tabriz succeeded last Friday in driving out the Shah's mounted levies under Rakhim Khan from all the quarters of the city except one—the Mujtehid's quarter. When, on the next day, they proceeded to attack the Mujtehid's (Clerical) quarter, the Russian Consul-General intervened, and promised the Parliamentarians to telegraph to the Shah and to secure amnesty. No amnesty was given, but instead the Shah has redoubled his efforts against Tabriz. The fighting this week has been indecisive. There is much indignation in Tabriz at the intervention of the Russian Consul, which, it is held, deprived the revolutionaries of the complete victory that was in their grasp. Apparently, the popular leaders in Tabriz were denied asylum in the British Consulate, for Sata Khan told the "Times" correspondent that if this hospitality had been given them the trouble would have been over ten days ago. The refusal is the more remarkable, inasmuch as Sata Khan protests that his quarrel is not with the Shah, but only with the local ecclesiastics, who are violent reactionaries; and, according to St. Petersburg telegrams, the same view has been put before the Russian Consul-General.

* * *

There is no truth whatever in the statements widely made in the Press and elsewhere that Mr. Churchill has entered the War Office or been entrusted with the "overhauling" of the Estimates, or has performed any office or duty outside the regular function of a Cabinet Minister.

* * *

Mr. Tilak, the Indian Nationalist leader, has been sentenced by a Parsee judge to six years' transportation and a fine of 100 rupees for publishing incendiary and seditious articles in the "Kesari." On receiving his sentence, Mr. Tilak said that they were on the threshold of a great Constitutional struggle between popular opinion and a mighty bureaucracy. The punishment of Mr. Tilak is serious, for he represents the Left Wing of the native movement in India, and stands to the agitation in much the same relation as Mr. Parnell occupied to the physical force party in Ireland and America. Part of Mr. Tilak's article seems to us to put crudely the arguments of all reformers that force used against national movements is no remedy, but the other part is certainly revolutionary, declaring that the use of bombs in India was on all fours with their use in Russia, and hinting that they might prove a more powerful anti-British weapon than muskets and guns

* * *

The article, like one or two of Mr. Parnell's speeches, hovered between constitutional doctrine and condonation of violence. Happily, the situation has been relieved by Mr. Buchanan's clear re-assertion, in presenting the Indian Budget on Wednesday, of the policy of reform. Mr. Buchanan, with Lord Morley as one of his audience, definitely announced that the Government were prepared to take a step forward on the fiftieth anniversary of Crown rule in India. Lord Morley, he said, hoped to make his statement before the Autumn Session came to an end. Mr. Buchanan defined our general task in India as that of adapting British rule and administration to those new ideals in India which we were able to satisfy, and particularly to offer to Indians an active and real responsibility for the control of their own concerns. We are glad to see that the expenditure on education has increased by 100 per cent., against which we have to set in five years a fresh sum of two millions a year for military expenditure. The estimated surplus is half a million.

* * *

The constitutional struggle with the colony of Natal over the case of Dinizulu continues. On Tuesday Colonel Seely announced that the Government had decided to pay Dinizulu's salary out of Imperial funds in order to end an embarrassing conflict of opinion between the home and the colonial Governments. But Miss Colenso's telegrams on the Indemnity Bill, which passed the Natal Legislature this week, would seem to indicate that the decision of the constitutional issue is only postponed. The extraordinary Clause 9 of the last Indemnity Act, which gave the Natal Government retrospective immunity for its acts in repressing the 1906-7 rebellion, has disappeared from the new Act; but, according to Miss Colenso, there is a section of the new Act "covering all orders made by the supreme chief." Among these orders was one for the removal of Dinizulu from the chieftainship. If the Act therefore receives the Royal assent, Dinizulu loses his position whether he is convicted or acquitted in the trial. Miss Colenso describes this as a trick by which the Natal Government seeks to abrogate the special agreement made by Mr. Chamberlain that Dinizulu should not lose his position without the consent of the Colonial Secretary. If her view is sound, the only answer that the Imperial Government could make, supposing that it is not satisfied of Dinizulu's guilt, would be to refuse the Royal assent to the Indemnity Act.

* * *

Wales seems quite as fixed in its progressive faith as Scotland. It is necessary, of course, to allow a discount for all the pollings of 1906. Making this exception, the Pembrokeshire voting is more than satisfactory. The young candidate, Mr. Roch, secured a majority of 2,172. Save at the General Election, Mr. Philipps never secured a higher majority than 1,664. The contest was fought out on the whole Government programme, though it is clear that Welsh Disestablishment had a considerable part in it, and it was necessary for the winning candidate to pledge himself strongly in the matter. The Prime Minister has now promised a Bill for next year.

* * *

The detailed news of the mutiny in the Turkish Army is still scanty, but all the scraps of information go to confirm the belief that it is a serious political movement which the Sultan will be unable to repress by force alone. The Young Turkey Committee has set up its headquarters in the Monastir vilayet, and is sending its emissaries all over the countryside. The agricultural population is said to have been almost entirely won over. In some places the Committee has assumed executive power and begun to collect the taxes; and it recently handed to the Consuls at Monastir a memorandum with a request that they should forward it to their Governments. The memorandum states that the "Ottoman League for Union and Progress" has for its object the "free and sincere application" of the Constitution of 1876; it disavows hostility to non-Mussulmans, and it promises to maintain order through its fighting corps. In this it seems to have been successful; it has the sympathy of the Albanians, and the Bulgarian bands, it is thought, will probably co-operate with the Committee. There have been more assassinations, and in every case the murderer is allowed to escape. Osman Hidayel, for example, was shot in the barracks at Monastir, in the presence of 2,000 troops. The army in Adrianople is also discontented, but not apparently from political reasons.

* * *

Mr. Asquith is warmly to be congratulated on his choice of Canon Moore Ede as Dean of Worcester. As the pupil and lieutenant of Westcott, Canon Ede has kept in close touch with the people, and with popular movements in the North of England. He is a man of intellectual distinction and activity, and he is a liberal in the broad sense in which all effective Churchmanship should be liberal. Another excellent piece of preferment is that of Canon Jephson to a Crown living. Canon Jephson has spent his life in the skilled service of London democracy.

* * *

A crushing blow has been administered to the obscurantist section in the Church of England, which has sought to maintain for it, not without episcopal encouragement, a kind of clerical Alsatia outside the range of civil law, in the decision of the Dean of Arches in the case of Canon Thompson. This clergyman refused Mr. and Mrs. Banister Holy Communion in his and their parish church, on the ground that Mr. Banister had married his deceased wife's sister. Canon Thompson's reliance was on the 99th Canon of 1603, which enables a clergyman to refuse the sacrament to an "open and notorious evil liver." The Dean of Arches, in a brilliant judgment, showing great powers of mind and knowledge, tore this contention in pieces, deciding that the defendant had failed to justify his action, and must be "admonished" for it, and that he must be further admonished to refrain from similar acts in the future. This, be it noted, is the judgment of an Ecclesiastical Court, which High Churchmen, we imagine, will feel themselves bound to obey. Sir Lewis Dibdin based his judgment mainly on the fact that reputable persons, "lawfully married according to the law of the land," can in no moral sense be described as "open and notorious evil livers," and that the proviso in the Act of 1907, which relieves a clergyman of penalties for refusing to carry out the Act, applies to the actual solemnisation of marriage, or the putting up of banns, and not to the exclusion of married persons from Holy Communion. It will be interesting to see whether the Bishops assembled at Lambeth will now advise their clergy to obey the law so plainly declared by their own Court.

* * *

We much regret to record the death on Wednesday of Sir William Randal Cremer. Sir Randal may fairly be called the Father in England of that phase of the Peace Movement which concerned itself with International Arbitration. Though never a Socialist, he joined Karl Marx in founding the International Working-men's Association forty-four years ago, and years before he entered Parliament he worked in the background to give the idea of arbitration form and substance. He was one of the promoters of the Anglo-American movement which nearly came to complete fruition in the Olney-Pauncefote Treaty, and he was twice an informal ambassador of peace to the United States. His personality was reserved and a little eccentric, but he had two great qualities—sincerity and concentration of purpose. He was one of the few Englishmen to become Members of the Legion of Honor, and he always wore its red ribbon in his buttonhole. His disinterestedness was shown in his refusal to accept the £8,000 awarded him as the Nobel Peace Prize, and he died, as he lived, a poor man.

* * *

Although the Italian Legislature, our Rome correspondent writes, does not expire until the autumn of 1909, a considerable agitation has already begun in the Press and among the electors and candidates of the 508 constituencies of the kingdom in view of a possible dissolution of the Chamber. There is no reason of a political character for such a measure, as the Cabinet commands in the Chamber an overwhelming majority, and the present Legislature has given proof of peculiar energy and activity, having already discussed and approved nearly 1,000 Bills, some of them of considerable importance. There is, however, the tradition that no Legislature should be allowed in Italy to run its extreme length of five years.

Politics and Affairs.

THE "MAIN DUTY" OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Lord Cromer, speaking in the House of Lords on Monday on the Pensions Bill, informed the Government that its "main duty" was to "make provision betimes for the European conflict which may not improbably be forced on us before many years have elapsed." We need not disguise the meaning of these words. They imply that, in the speaker's judgment, Germany will one day either attack us or place us in such a position that we shall be forced, in self-preservation or in self-respect, to fight her. We congratulate Mr. Maxse on his new convert to the theory of a Teutonic Jehad against England. Incidentally it suggests that, setting aside compassion for our poor, culture for our workmen and middle classes, science for our industries, the raising of existing standards of life and thought for our whole people, we must abandon the more civilised ends of nationality or subordinate them to the overmastering necessity of keeping this great community of traders armed to the teeth against a country with which we have no tangible ground of quarrel. Thus do artless Jingoes heap burdens on their own folk, for after this declaration of the "inevitableness" of war with Germany from a man in Lord Cromer's position, our Government may find slender ground for asking her to reduce her armaments. Thus do those whom we mis-term statesmen call a halt to the benign processes in the life of nations, and summon them to thoughts of madness and mutual ruin. In such conceptions of policy, at least, lies ample material for the consideration of the International Peace Congress, which meets in London next week. That body includes Germans as well as Englishmen; it is related to the commercial, religious, and industrial elements in both countries; it can speak apart from bad governments that design war, or weak governments that will allow themselves to be dragged into war. It is a very serious question to discover what such a party can do, what forces it can summon to its aid. England cannot act alone. It is not to be disguised that the official German attitude of mind and policy, and especially the German war expenditure, furnish real cause of disquietude But larger than the element of deliberate calculation is, we suspect, the element of fear. Germany, in Ruskin's phrase, is buying so many million pounds' worth of terror of us, as we are buying so many more millions' worth of terror of her. But between this costly exchange of fears, in the continual calculation of the relative strength of the two navies, this year, in the following year, in the year when the approximation seems closest, we are entering a dark and dangerous passage in the history of the two nations, from which the world may not escape without a convulsion. The business of the Roman and Protestant Churches, of the German Socialists, of the English Liberal and Labor Parties, is to intervene in this quarrel, and to stop it before it has gone too far, and for that purpose to gather to themselves all the strength, moral and material, which they can accumulate.

This is the peace question, which, pace Lord Cromer, we regard as covering the "main duty" of this Government in its outlook on foreign affairs. But there is an allied question, that of economy in expenditure, which must be an especial concern of this Administration. The Liberal Cabinet were elected on a cry of economy, following hard on a vote in the House of Commons in which the Liberal Opposition called for a reduction of 27,000 men in the numbers of the Regular Army. The present Prime Minister repeated that cry when he was at the Exchequer, and when he introduced his first Budget with an emphatic examination of the state of expenditure, he concluded that "a return to thrifty and economical administration was the first and paramount duty of the Government." That is strong language. Was it merited? On the face of it, it was. Take the question of military expenditure. Within a few hours of the Budget speech of 1906 a statement was issued showing that our military expenditure, counting India and Great Britain together, was 51 millions, whereas the leading military Powers of Europe, France and Germany, only paid 59 millions for the two greatest and best equipped armies that the world has ever known. The Prime Minister himself showed in the course of his Budget speech that in ten years the Army had increased 31 per cent. in numbers and 63 per cent. in cost, or 20 per cent. more than the increase in the cost of the Navy within the same period. These figures have not substantially altered during the last two and a-half years of Liberal Government. This year's reduction is largely unreal, for the complete cost of setting up the Territorial Army was omitted from the accounts. Yet even if we treat the naval situation in a pessimistic spirit, the military position is greatly improved. Liberal policy has slipped from the nation's shoulders the burden of maintaining an army of occupation in South Africa. Henceforward South Africa falls into line with Australia and Canada—that is to say, she ranks with the self-governing Colonies, which need no Imperial force of consequence, and in the main organise their own military police. The practical need, therefore, has greatly diminished. Not only is South Africa out of the category of danger-posts, but the pressure on the Indian frontier has been much reduced. For what other purpose do we want an army at all? Mr. Balfour has defined it in a classical speech, delivered as a finding of the Committee of Defence, which has formed the basis of recent military policy. We need some protection against casual raids—a raid, that is to say, on a small scale, for only such an expedition could elude the fleet, or be sustained without overwhelming peril of calamitous loss to the invader. Beyond all these national services we have no call for an army. And if we have no further call for it, if we rely on the Navy to save us from the loss of sea-power and the invasion that must follow such a loss but cannot precede it, what business have we with an expenditure of fifty millions on the home and Indian forces?

But there are further considerations of conclusive weight. The country, rich as it is, has only a certain amount of money to spare for defence. Some bounds must be set to warlike expenditure, or our trade and credit will languish. The first call is on the Navy. There is no comparison between its share in the business of preserving the national safety and that which the Army contributes. To put on to the Army, which is of fourth-rate or fifth-rate significance in the defensive scheme, is to take away from the Navy, which is of first-rate consequence. Now, the country supports a Government that has set up a certain balance between social reform—which, in plain words, means the building up of a civilised, efficient human society—and military expenditure. Are we to be told, in the third year of the life of a Liberal Government, pledged up to the hilt to economy and social reform, that not the vital point of national defence, but its outworks, stand like a wall against the modest claims of the social reformers? The Prime Minister will not, we are sure, take that line. He has called upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer to finance old age pensions. He has assigned him limits within which to work on our present basis of taxation. He has defined the concessions that are to be made, the extensions to be permitted. But if the ground is so circumscribed that, owing to the menaces of the Tory Press, not a finger must be laid on a scale of Army expenditure which has grown by ten millions in ten years, or fifty per cent. since the South African War, what hope is there—to give one example—of a redemption of the pledge to restore 200,000 or 300,000 old men to the ranks of citizenship? Or we take Mr. Haldane himself. Will he falsify the Liberal pledges on the army? Is he coming forward next year with the plea that 40,000 special reservists cost more than 100,000 Militiamen, and 180,000 Territorials than 270,000 Volunteers? That would be to condemn his administration of the Army for ever, for no one in his senses can conceive that the Government would commit itself to a readjustment of the reserve forces on lines that would actually add to the cost of the entire organisation, while reducing its numerical strength, and that a Liberal War Minister will dare to put such calculations before the House of Commons. Mr. Haldane's course in Liberalism has not been so flawless that he can bear such responsibility himself, or that his colleagues can burden him with it.

No; we will not assume that the Government will court shipwreck by any such courses. They will not desert the substance of national defence for its shadow. They will not put militarism and social reform in blank antagonism. They will not set before the House of Commons Army Estimates which the majority will refuse to pass, and which they themselves cannot defend without having speech after speech, pledge on pledge, thrust in their faces, to the discrediting of the moral force of Liberalism and the disruption and confusion of its Parliamentary strength.

THE PEERS AND THE POOR.

Last Monday night in their gilded chamber sat the Peers of England considering the poor. Though times are not what they were for agriculture, there must have been many there whose large rent-roll is taken from the toil of the laborers who till their land and whose spent bodies are thrown into the workhouse when old age has come. The hundred and fifty gentlemen who sat in that House are probably drawing in London ground rents alone as much as, or more than, would suffice to make comfortable the latter years of thousands of workmen and workwomen from whose meagre wages as much as a quarter, or even a third, goes in payment for the place they call a home. In profits on investments, which have evoked no painful abstinence upon their part, drawn from businesses in which others and not they are "busy," in innumerable forms of taxes and tolls upon the brains and skill and muscles of their fellow men and women, these favorites of fortune enjoy great possessions, almost all of others' making, which enable them to spend their youth and manhood in costly, highly varied, and entertaining leisure, or dignified pretence of occupation, while their old age brings an honored career to a secure and comfortable close. A minority among them, after a long, useful, and well-remunerated career in the public service or in some profession, have been raised to their present place. Most of them are supported during all their life, all of them in their old age, by the active labors of their countrymen, who, through rents, profits, taxes, or otherwise, provide the handsome incomes which they enjoy. Some, like Lord Cromer, have received a special and princely parting gift from the State.

No flickering of these plain truths, or of the moral responsibility which they involve, illuminated the debate upon the condition of the aged poor in which the House of Lords indulged on Monday. It would not, indeed, be just to describe the attitude of the speakers as lacking in sympathy with the sufferings of the poor. Such is not the general temper of the possessing classes in this country. We live in an age of easy—we had almost said cheap—sympathy. It was the lack of understanding of the salient features of the condition of the people, as disclosed by the complete failure of our civilisation to provide for the subsistence of the workers during their full natural life, that stood out with such appalling plainness in the debate. Underneath the carping criticism of the finance of the Government measure, the fears of militarists lest the claims of the old people should curb the extravagance of swelling armaments, of Unionist Free Traders lest a high income-tax should provoke reaction in favor of a tariff, of bishops lest the imperial contribution to Church schools might suffer, we can discern no scintilla of a recognition of the obligation of the State towards the necessary task of promoting sound social order and efficiency, which is the true meaning of this Bill. Even among those who professed goodwill, a vain hankering after the futility of a contributory scheme, which would sift out what Lord Lansdowne called "the meritorious poor," was openly expressed. The whole project was discussed, as one primarily concerned with the deserts and rights of individual laborers, from the standpoint of a Grand Committee who might spare a little time from shooting, motoring, or "work upon the bench," to settle what aged workers were "deserving" and what were not. The manifest feeling of the House was with Lord St. Aldwyn when he roundly dubbed the Bill an extension of out-relief, and predicted the loss of independence and the widespread demoralisation of character which were likely to ensue. We regret to add that the stoutest onslaughts were led by statesmen of past Liberal associations. Why should Lord Cromer, in receipt of a large retiring pension for great but not ill-compensated public services, grudge the ploughman or the clerk a trifling recognition for the smaller service his position and abilities have enabled him to render to his country?

But far more regrettable was the tone of "deep solemn disquietude" adopted by one who but a few years ago was a Liberal Prime Minister, and who with evil deliberation set himself the other night to plough a devastating furrow across the fair field of social reform which in earlier and better days he had been fain to cultivate. If we knew the exact equivalent to the term "demagogy" for appealing to the passions of the few, we should apply it to the speech by which Lord Rosebery strove to inflame his audience by cries of endangering the Empire. To set up the financial and military efficiency of the Empire as a reason for leaving to misery and decay the old people of England is a rhetorical device as contemptible in form as it is destitute of substance. Where are the strength and glory of an Empire which is so poor or so mean that it cannot make decent provision for its old folk at home? The ideal of an Empire maintained by a continually increasing display of armed force, the swelling cost defrayed by the taxpayers of these little islands, themselves too impoverished to take care of their weaklings and unfortunates, differs in no considerable measure from the Slave Empires of the ancient world. Lord Rosebery, and, we deeply regret to add, a weightier authority on Empire than he, Lord Cromer, in setting military expenditure as an alternative to social reform took a strange view of our national resources. We are, it seems, to husband our money for a war-treasure, in order to make provision for the great "European conflict" which Lord Cromer was reckless enough to prognosticate. But what sort of political economy is this? Are we in the fifteenth or the twentieth century, that we reckon the strength of nations by the size of their war-chest, or even by the number of implements of force in their arsenal, instead of by the health, skill, knowledge, character, and industrial efficiency of their population?

Now, the imagination of our people has not idly drifted into this enthusiasm for an old age settlement, nor has the project been foisted on us by a few enthusiasts or political schemers. It has come first to a head as the most pressing among a number of organically related measures of reform needed to raise the efficiency of the working classes so as to make the most of civilised conditions of work and life. Our piecemeal method of legislation has necessarily exposed the old age pensions policy to many misrepresentations which will disappear when it stands in its place as one among many pillars of a new social order. More than one of the speakers in the Lords debate expressed an apprehension that State expenditure would not stop with restricted pensions for deserving people over seventy. They feared that the unprotected young, the sick, the maimed, the blind, the mentally defective, the unemployed, would also claim from society that human care which their relatives are too poor to provide. This increased public protection for the weak they also associate with a general concern of the State for wages, hours of labor, and other conditions of the people. They see all the expense of this social policy mounting up, and involving an interminable series of demands upon the pockets of those who have ability to pay. It was this large vague consideration that was moving in the background of consciousness during the course of this lugubrious debate, and which from time to time blundered into partial expression. And, assuming their shallow view of efficiency and Empire to be correct, there would be grave reason for their disquietude. The Liberal Party, whether it fully understands or not, is committed historically to a widely varied and growing policy of social reform, and to the necessity of finding an adequate finance through an extension of sound principles of direct taxation, imposed upon the incomes which can bear it. The efficiency of national life in modern times demands this larger conception of the State as a basis of the conditions upon which the sanity of national life and the safety of Empire stand. To this policy, though not to an effective method of financing it, even Conservatives in this country are widely committed. There can be neither faltering nor going back. The spirit of social reform is awake and abroad in the nation, and we warn Lord Rosebery and his friends that if they set up their ideal of a Slave Empire as the rival and alternative of improved conditions for the workers of this country, they will prove themselves ill defenders of the State.

THE PROBLEM OF TURKISH REFORM.

The young Turkish officers are setting Abdul Hamid a harder problem than any Sultan has had to face since the days when the revolts of Pashas and Janissaries were chronic. By Christian rebellions and foreign wars the Ottoman throne has never been endangered. They might diminish its territory and empty its treasury, but they never shook the loyalty of the governing class and the fighting races. But this movement carries us back three generations, to the turbulent epoch before the centralisation of Turkey, when a Mehemet Ali or a Passvan Oglou, or an Ali of Jannina, could defy a Sultan who was little better than a feudal suzerain. The centralised despotism created a disciplined army, and now with all the formidable instincts of its acquired solidarity, it is the army as a whole which threatens to revolt. One thinks, as the news of one murder and rising after another comes breathlessly in, of the messengers of disaster who trod on each others' heels in the inspired vision of Shelley's "Hellas." Last week, when we wrote of the rebellion in Macedonia, it seemed as though a few outlawed officers had taken to the hills, backed only by the inert sympathy of the army and the murderous revolvers of a few conspirators. To-day these outlaws are the masters of a great reach of mountainous country on the Albanian borderland; they administer its towns, they hold its passes, they receive its taxes. Behind them is Albania in full revolt. In front of them is Monastir and the railway, and its garrison, as the local correspondent of the "Daily News" reports, is ready to welcome them when they descend upon it. In Constantinople all is confusion, and the Vizier has fallen amid rumors of a Palace plot. Nowhere is there a general who will face the rebels, nowhere, outside the capital, a regiment which can be wholly trusted.

There are three possibilities, each serious in its own degree. The paralysis of loyalty may end by reaching the heart of the Empire, and result in Abdul Hamid's fall. More probably he will attempt to meet the new spirit by concessions, which, if they do not transform the Empire, will at least convulse it. Finally, even if he should succeed in rendering these political concessions nugatory, he must at least consent to keep faith with the army, to pay and feed the men, and to spare the reservists who are weary of the task of continual campaigning and endless coercion. That in its turn must set for him a grave financial problem, and compel him to govern the more disaffected provinces of the Empire in such a way that they will not have to be held down by the mere weight of the army. A cheap army he can no longer have. A costly army will mean either reform or bankruptcy. Whether this movement succeeds or fails, it is a new Turkey which will emerge.

It is not for the Sultan alone that this movement [illegible] an anxious problem. It profoundly affects all the calculations of European diplomacy. We have to ask ourselves what are the relations between the Christians and the Young Turks, and in particular how its success would affect the prospects of the two regions, Macedonia and Armenia, towards which we have an especial responsibility. The movement is at heart undoubtedly patriotic and even nationalist. It is, if we may judge from the manifesto of the Paris Congress of the parties which control it, in great part the fruit of a resentment against Abdul Hamid for the humiliations to which he has exposed his country. His misgovernment, argues this manifesto, excused and justified the interventions of Europe, which were none the less an affront to the dignity of Turkey. The Young Turks are accordingly prepared to remove all excuse for intervention by recognising to the full the rights of the Christians. With the Armenians they are acting in complete accord. With the Albanians, among whom differences of religion count for little, they are obviously on friendly terms of alliance. With the Bulgarians of Macedonia they are now said to be negotiating. For the moment it is only the Greeks who appear—we hope only appear—to think that they have more to gain by keeping on intimate terms with the Palace. If nothing more were proposed than an equality on paper, or even a share of representation in the Parliament which the Young Turks demand, there would be some ground for scepticism. But in the proclamation issued by the rebel leaders from their headquarters in Ochrida there figures prominently one demand which testifies to the tolerance and sincerity of their movement. They insist that Christians shall be admitted to the army under universal service. In that clause they surrender the whole supremacy of the Mohammedans of Turkey as the one class capable of ruling and bearing arms. If the army were to include even a large percentage of Christians, the massacres, the oppressions, and the cruelties of the past would have become for ever impossible. Moreover, since the Young Turks have accepted Armenian and Albanian aid, and would welcome Bulgarian and Arab support, it is obvious that they must be prepared to welcome decentralisation, and to accord to all these intensely nationalist races some measure of local antonomy, or, as Prince Saba-ed-din boldly calls it, "Home Rule." If it were possible to hope for the ultimate success of a movement which avowed such aims as these, it is obvious that it would secure for Macedonia and Armenia a more hopeful future than anything which diplomacy can promise.

The prospect is at least sufficiently attractive to demand from us a certain suspense of judgment, and to suggest that we may have to reconsider our tactics. The liberating work of Europe has been successful wherever it has contrived to detach a province completely from the Turkish Empire. It is in the effort to control or reform what still remained under the crescent flag that it has failed. Each timid effort in Armenia was answered by massacre. The epoch of reform in Macedonia has intensified the chaos and aggravated the bloodshed. Worst of all, these interventions have aroused the fanaticism of the Turks and strengthened every tendency of reaction. The Turks will not see in a Bulgarian conspirator or an Armenian fedaï a simple rebel against Hamidian misgovernment. They see in him the agent and pioneer of a hostile Europe, who is working for England or Russia, as they think, for the dismemberment and destruction of their Empire. They watch the long streams of complainants, their own subjects, filing through the gate of a Russian Consulate, and in their anger they can only think of the whole process as a foreign plot. They feel neither more nor less indignant than we should have felt, if in the days of Irish coercion, the Irish Nationalists had carried their complaints to a French or German Consulate. To aggravate their resentment, foreign capitalists, under the shelter of the capitulations, are using their Embassies to wring concessions, sometimes fraudulent, always onerous, for railways or ports or mines, from a stepmother Government, which takes care that it is always the peasant who pays. They refuse, when the fleets sail to Mitylene to exact a debt, to believe that in all this intervention there is any element of disinterested humanity. The good in it is so mixed with evil that the whole becomes hateful. Through these methods we shall never attain the reform of Turkey. The most we can expect is to detach such a province as Macedonia from the Empire, leaving the rest to stagnate in the expectation of a further dismemberment.

If there is a chance, even a remote chance, that the Turks may themselves work out their own salvation, we shall do well to suspend any thought of special intervention on behalf of any Christian race. We lose nothing by delay. The Anglo-Russian proposals cannot be applied to Macedonia while this crisis continues. We must wait until the Sultan's authority is either restored or destroyed. If it is destroyed, a new situation faces us, and a new and much better solution becomes possible. If it is restored, if the Young Turkish movement proves to be weak or treacherous, then the last reason for restraint has gone, and we need no longer consider Turkish susceptibilities. Benevolent neutrality is for the moment the motto which should govern our conduct. So far no Christian lives have been endangered, no foreign interests been menaced by the revolt in the army. There is a chance of a real rapprochement between all the races which have suffered under the Hamidian despotism. Any inconsiderate movement by European diplomacy might sow suspicions where confidence is beginning. If the movement succeeds, there will be scope enough for friendly advice and tactful mediation. If it fails, diplomacy will have work enough to check the dire consequences of the reaction. Meanwhile, its duty is to wait. There must be no renewal of the impatient pressure which destroyed the hope of a Liberal Turkey during the somewhat similar crisis of 1876. Let us at least consult our own instincts of tolerance and sympathy. The Russian tradition is fatal to any unfortunate race which seeks at the eleventh hour to raise itself from the degradation of its past.

THE REVERSAL OF OUR PENAL POLICY.

It is with deep regret that we see the Home Secretary insisting on the retention of the indeterminate sentence after his definite promise at a previous meeting of the Standing Committee appointed to consider the Prevention of Crime Bill. That promise, if it meant anything at all, meant that a prisoner should be discharged at the end of ten years dating from the commencement of his preventive detention. Surely a sentence of this immense duration is amply sufficient for all the purposes of justice. Consider it for a moment. First of all there is ten years' preventive detention. Before the stage of preventive detention is reached there may be seven or ten years' penal servitude. In all the prisoner may have to pass between seventeen and twenty years in prison before he is liberated. But after the seventeen or twenty years' imprisonment has expired, Mr. Gladstone inserts a clause which enables him, at the bidding of his officials, to retain the man for life. The insertion of such a clause nullifies the promise which he made to the Committee last week, and the indeterminate sentence remains as much in force as ever. Mr. Gladstone's promise last week meant that after the expiration of a fixed period the prisoner was to be liberated, no matter what opinions the prison officials or the proposed Board of Visitors might form of the prisoner. But the value of the promise is completely taken away by the insertion of the words that the prisoner at end of his seventeen or twenty years' confinement is still to be detained for an indefinite time in prison if the" Home Secretary has reason to believe that, if released, he will relapse into crime."

How can the Home Secretary or anybody else have reason to believe anything whatsoever about a prisoner who has spent the best part of a generation in a penal establishment? The conditions of existence in such a place are so artificial that they are no test whatever of what a man will do when he is at liberty. The Home Secretary tells us that his proposed Board of Visitors will be composed of certain excellent men whom he has in his mind. We are willing to believe, and we do believe, that he will be most careful and painstaking in the constitution of this Board. We believe that he will put thoughtful and experienced men upon it, who understand criminal character, and are capable of forming an unbiassed opinion upon the facts which are laid before them by the prison staff. But in the end the decision of the Visitors must be largely determined by the reports of the prison staff. It may be said that their decision will be absolutely determined by these reports. It is the prison staff which will decide whether a prisoner shall be liberated or not. And the prison staff, excellent as may be the material of which it is composed, is not in a position to say whether a man when released will become an honest citizen or whether he will relapse into crime. The facts which the prison staff have to go upon are merely the prisoner's conduct when under detention. A well-conducted prisoner will be liberated at an early date; an indifferently conducted prisoner will be detained for life. And yet in a multitude of cases it is the well-conducted prisoner who will relapse into crime when liberated, while the indifferently conducted prisoner, if liberated, might be a perfectly harmless member of society. The fatal blot upon the indeterminate sentence is that we have no test for enabling the prison authorities to decide when it should come to an end. The lunatic in an asylum is under an indeterminate sentence; but the medical superintendent can tell when the patient is restored to a condition of sanity. He can tell when he is fit to resume his place in society; but the governor of a prison can never tell when a prisoner is fit for liberty. Cases are not at all infrequent in which a man is, to all appearance, an incorrigible in one prison and an admirable prisoner in another. One of these cases was brought before the Home Secretary when he was Chairman of the Prisons Committee. In the first prison to which the case in question was committed the prisoner was guilty of so many offences against prison discipline that he received an unheard-of amount of punishment—loss of food, loss of exercise, solitary confinement, the birch, the cat—in fact, all the gruesome paraphernalia of prison discipline. When removed to another prison, the very same prisoner was reported upon as a well-conducted inmate, who rendered a willing obedience to all the prison rules. Under the indeterminate sentence in the one prison he would have been detained in confinement for life; in the other prison he would have been liberated at the earliest possible moment.

The indeterminate sentence is only another method of increasing the duration of imprisonment. It is a return to a state of things which all the great statesmen of the last century found it expedient to abolish. In the eighteenth century the severity of punishment defeated its own ends. It was impossible in many cases to get witnesses to give evidence, or juries to convict, or judges to sum up on the merits of the case. Crime was rampant; the law was powerless. The statesmen of the nineteenth century proceeded upon the principle that the proper method of reducing the proportions of crime was to reduce the severities of the law. The application of this method has had the effect of bringing the penal law more or less into harmony with the public conscience, and the result is that England at the present moment is one of the most law-abiding countries in the world. The indeterminate sentence is the reversal of a policy which has commended itself to both parties in the State. It is a step which places the convicted man outside the sphere of law. It places his liberty at the mercy of considerations so unsatisfactory and shadowy that no one will venture to define them. In both of these respects it defeats and discredits constitutional government.

The practical effect of this new departure from all constitutional precedent will probably be a slow but steady increase of crimes of violence. The armed burglar of the type which used to shoot down the householder, or the policeman who attempted to arrest him, has practically disappeared within the last twenty years. The habitual offender of to-day does not carry arms, and if he steals our property he at least respects our person. But when he begins to realise that he is to be incarcerated for life for offences for which he now receives five, seven, or ten years' penal servitude, he will resume the use of weapons in order to facilitate the chances of escape, and one of the first results of the new experiment will be an increase in the proportion of murders. To many sections of the criminal population the death penalty is not so appalling as the prospect of detention for life. In these circumstances we appeal to the Government to stay their hand before it is too late. All the good points in their measure can be retained without resorting to the indeterminate sentence. It is already rousing resentment among many of their best supporters. It will have the effect of placing them in an odious light before the country.

Life and Letters.

AN IMPEACHMENT OF CATHEDRAL BUILDING.

Mr. Watson's impeachment of Cathedral building at Liverpool has excited a controversy of more than passing interest. A few weeks ago in this paper, in lines addressed to the "City of merchants, lords of trade and gold," he protested in stanzas of austerity and passion against the choice of a community which tolerated squalor and boundless degradation within its borders, while it raised a magnificent Church in honor of its religion. Liverpool, proud of its liberal experiment in architecture, which is to erect the greatest Gothic Cathedral built in England for more than four hundred years, has been somewhat taken aback by the violence of the attack upon its pious enterprise. "Is there anything criminally wrong," asks the Editor of the "Liverpool Daily Post," "in the behaviour of Liverpool towards such evils as exist in its midst, and towards such as suffer from such evils?" "Why should Liverpool's fane not be reared?" he demands, "Why should it not be splendid? Liverpool has been prospered greatly, and is rich. Reverent gratitude is a duty in a Christian city so rich." Those who subscribe to the Cathedral, he asserts, are those who never forget to subscribe to all good Liverpool social objects. He enumerates with pride the multitudinous charities which are working in the slums. "Almost everything that can reasonably be expected is in one way or another being done." Drink, he thinks the greatest cause of the degradation, and his regret is mainly directed towards the "great party in the State and the leader of that great party," for "misusing his great position to purchase, by patronising the liquor interest, an unworthy and debasing victory at the next General Election." Mr. Watson, in reply, refuses to be put off his attack by these allusions to the Licensing Bill. He repeats his charge in the plainest of prose. It is not only a charge of the general inequalities between rich and poor. It is a special reproach against the particular city which alone has set itself to raise a vast and splendid Cathedral. "Nowhere have I seen the contrast displayed quite so glaringly as in Liverpool, where there are now being laid the foundations of a structure the magnificence of which may, indeed, in some way utterly incomprehensible to me, be gratifying to the Almighty, but which at any rate will undoubtedly demonstrate the superfluous riches of some of your pious citizens."

The correspondence suggests an inquiry as old as time, and probably not destined finally to be answered while time endures. What kind of public or private luxury, if any, can be justified, while a considerable section of the human family are sunk in conditions of intolerable poverty and degradation? Few men honestly and squarely face the problem: most purchase a tranquillity by a percentage of doles to reputable charities, by some individual gifts to the poor, or by the fortifying beliefs that luxury is good for trade on the one hand, and that indiscriminate alms on the other is but a cruel kindness. Sometimes the challenge becomes importunate. During the Russian famine or the Macedonian relief operations it could be guaranteed that the gift of some mean sum—a few shillings or at most a few pounds—would preserve the life of a man or woman or child who, lacking that sum, would perish. A moderate sum was accumulated in face of such promises: yet, how, at first sight, could any superfluous expenditure be ethically justified before the importunity of such an elemental claim? Ruskin spent the latter half of his days tortured by this dilemma before which he could never give a satisfactory decision, on the one hand desirous of encouraging that beauty of building and ornament which seemed to him to be of permanent value amongst human achievement: on the other hand roundly affirming that no true art or sane life is possible until all men forsaking, if need be, their pleasant places, effect the restoration of the waste places of poverty to the control of the spirits which are orderly and pure. The traffickers on the Mersey, whose operations in Mr. Watson's poems appear as great as those effected by the Tyrian merchants with the ships of Tarshish, might well complain that they are directing their luxurious expenditure to no unworthy end. While others are squandering the profits of a civilisation, suddenly and beyond estimate opulent, in childish or senile amusement—in horse-racing, in mechanical engines of speed and tumult, in the mere animal exercises of food and drink—they are allotting their gains to the erection of a monument which may be beautiful and certainly will endure. It is the contrast between the private extravagance and public niggardliness which is one of the most disquieting symptoms of the modern world. We inherit our noblest buildings from a population in the main of the economic level of West Ham or Bermondsey, giving, in widespread popular devotion, all that they had: and the Cathedrals of the Middle Age were reared, as the Cathedrals of Ireland are being reared to-day, in violent contrast between the splendour of their glory and the squalor of their surroundings. Liverpool Cathedral is being built under conditions different from the building of Chartres. There the whole countryside gave themselves to the work, men and women harnessing themselves to carts laden with stones and wood, nobles and peasants alike, sometimes a thousand attached to one cart, offered themselves for the work, and "when they came to the church, set their waggons in a circle, so as to form, as it were, a spiritual camp, keeping watch, with candles and lamps all night, with hymns and songs of praise." Perhaps the contrast between the spirit of the twelfth century and the spirit of to-day will stamp its impression on the completed buildings: perhaps Cathedral building has become impossible. But the scourge of wrath should be less directed towards those who have set themselves to an impersonal and not ignoble enterprise than to all that greater mass of wealth which is scattered in ugly ostentation, or mere blind and wasteful exuberance.

Mr. Watson might perhaps retort that in these cases no standard of attainment is elevated, whereas in the case of the Cathedral the "pomp of arch and spire" is raised in direct outrage upon a teaching which demanded as the first interest of humanity a concern for all that are desolate and oppressed. He gazes upon the rising walls of this proud building with something of the anger of the early Franciscans when they beheld far over the Umbrian plain the white walls of San Francesco, built in supposed honor, in actual outrage, of the teaching of the little poor man of Assisi. Here, once again, is a controversy which all the centuries have not yet silenced: how far a religion which proclaims a plain ethical duty, and is, or ought to be, in perpetual protest until that duty be accomplished, can tolerate the diverting of money and effort into the construction of palaces and temples of worship. The reply would probably be that every religion has thus sought realisation in outward expression, and that, not diminished, but rather multiplied, in ages most conspicuous for compassion and active revolt against the harsher irregularities of fortune. To many the question of divergent gift may appear irrelevant, because dealing with different phases of endeavour. The slums of Liverpool would easily swallow up every halfpenny of Liverpool's Cathedral Fund, and yet be no whit the happier or better. The malady of the age—in ultimate analysis, social—will never be healed by individual gifts, however liberal, or individual devotion, however unselfish. Mr. Watson, himself baffled by a problem which Mark Rutherford, in Drury Lane, found "hard and smooth, like a ball of adamant," confesses his helplessness in practical suggestion. The social discontent which is born out of the poverty of the cities is a clamour which civilisation can neither appease nor forget. It is baffling the whole comity of Western nations in an international demand that these things shall cease, that no tranquillity shall be tolerated until they have ceased. It is destined to make and unmake kings and Parliaments, to cut across and rudely deflect the schemes of statesmen, to bend the courses of human affairs in accordance with its impetuous demand.

THE POET OF FREEDOM.

It was natural that Cambridge should celebrate the tercentenary of her greatest poet's birth by enacting his masque of "Comus." A masque was never aimed at drama, and so, by its very limitations, it escaped failure in the hands of an undramatic poet, and could be represented for the beauty of its language and idea alone. No one looks for more, and since the only alternative for Cambridge actors wishing to perform some work of Milton's was the "Samson Agonistes," they could not hesitate when they had youth to act and a summer audience to please. For about the "Comus" there still hangs something of the youth whose childhood was spent while Shakespeare still shone upon the world—something of Apollo's lute, some memory even of heart-easing Mirth, so buxom, blithe, and debonair. Comus himself enters with the step of careless charm, and it is no savagely abhorred abomination greeting the star that bids the shepherds fold, telling of sounds and seas, with all their finny drove, of pert fairies and dapper elves, and calling for a light fantastic round. The poet had a long and bitter road to travel—a road unpleasing to youth and summer audiences—before he should tell of Samson "eyeless in Gaza, at the mill with slaves, himself in bonds under Philistian yoke." It is no wonder Cambridge chose the "Comus" for her classic lawns and habitations dappled with sunshades.

Upon that long and bitter road no element of ironic tragedy was wanting. Except starvation, imprisonment, and execution, Milton escaped none of the miseries that can attend on noble minds. From boyhood it had been the aim of his existence to compose poetry in the manner of the great poets before him—"to leave," as he said in words that have become almost too familiar, "to leave something so written to after times, as they shall not willingly let it die." Rather that was not merely the aim of his existence; it was the very soul of his nature, the essential demand that would allow him no peace, but hold him unsatisfied and tormented till it was fulfilled. And for its fulfilment he resolved upon and strictly practised a spiritual asceticism, a consecrated devotion that none of our poets has attempted to rival, except Wordsworth alone. Who has not admired that first manhood of unembittered austerity, that pleasant comeliness of body and mind, a vital learning beyond the dreams of pedants, a purity of soul still open to the country air and the wonder of night and morning? The poet might describe himself as beginning late, but before first manhood was over, his success was not merely assured; it was unsurpassed. Before he was thirty he had within his own province of poetry reached a height of accomplishment that no English poet had reached before or has since approached. Life and attainment smiled on him equally. His spirit was irradiated by all the innocent delights of sound and thought and vision: it was braced to the pursuit of a noble purpose, inexhaustible but already secure. "He who would not be frustrated of his hope to write well hereafter in laudable things ought himself to be a true poem" he wrote in words only less well known than those others. And it seemed as if nothing could now frustrate that hope, nothing prevent his life from remaining a true poem such as the poems he himself imagined, pervaded by dignified sweetness and a sunshine purity of light.

But the ironic spirit stood ready in ambuscade, and at the height of his poetic power, his happiness and distinction, he ceased for twenty years to be a poet. Among arms, laws are not the only things that are silent. Milton, it is true, might have continued his poetic career without much external hindrance. There was nothing in his position to drag him unwillingly into the field of war and controversy. He seemed the natural associate of learned men like Selden, of cultured and reasonable men like Falkland and John Hales. One can imagine him taking part in the tolerant companionship at Broughton or Great Tew, when the moderate leaders of the constitutional party turned from their politics to the intellectual subjects that still delighted men of education. One can imagine him lamenting the sorry tide of affairs that was diverting the ablest minds from the fine traditions of literature and wit handed down by the great Elizabethans. But from the fate of a fastidious man of letters impotent in a raging world of deeds he was saved by his own grandeur of disposition. He appears never to have hestitated as to his side or his action. For him there could be no party of cultured compromise, no moderate arrangement with the enemy, while freedom was at stake. With an impetuosity all the more admirable because in his verse it is restrained to an intensity of power, he flung himself into the warfare that tore his country in half. Abandoning all for which he had hitherto lived—his learning, his art, that exercise of faculty in which alone a great man's happiness consists—not knowing whether he should survive to return to them again, he grasped such weapons as came to his hand in vindication of a thing dearer to him, after all, than even his spiritual content or the splendor of fame that it was his without question to command. Probably he did not actually recruit in the Parliamentarian army, and that failure is one of the few errors that detract from his nobility. But with a wholehearted sacrifice he gave up to freedom what was meant for art. Laying aside the sin that so easily besets the literary mind, he mingled without disdain in all the sweat and dust of envenomed and deadly controversies. Year after year the mind that had last composed the "Lycidas," and had already set its thoughts upon an epic to equal in renown blind Thamyris and blind Mæonides, now threw upon the world its turbulent and formless pamphlets, distorted by impatience, almost careless of expression, and, if such a thing might be, almost vulgarised by personality. Such faults do not count. They are the poet's glory. The peril of freedom called for any arms, and the strokes for her preservation must fall harsh and quick. Pamphlet after pamphlet leapt from his indignant soul; and whether the theme was religion or politics, or the Press or conscience or married life, each was a blow for personal and individual freedom.

But even in the din of all that conflicting fury the tragic irony kept her silent touch upon the pamphleteer. Milton had performed an act of devotion unequalled by any writer of genius till the pity of mankind's enslavement drove Tolstoy to perform the same. But, though a writer of genius, he made the writer's common mistake of exaggerating the power of words. He had not realised that men are not governed by reason, or even by passion, or even by interests, but by mental lethargy and habits, from which nothing but opposing action can rouse them up. There is no proof that his pamphlets had the smallest effect on public affairs, or that his labors and eloquent indignation altered the course of his own times by a single jog. What was far worse, the party for which he had made so great a sacrifice was seldom worthy of his own ideal. What had Milton to do with "shallow Edwards and Scotch What-d'ye-call?" Where was liberty under "the new forcers of conscience," to whom new Presbyter was but old Priest writ large? With what enthusiasm could he maintain the high conflict for a Parliament that almost habitually displayed its dulness and lack of courage? It is a hard issue for a man of genius when the leaders of his party, to which there is no alternative but tyranny, begin to compromise and skulk. Attaching himself to no Church, and constant to no sect, Milton passed from one division of his party to another, belonging to all extreme sections in turn, except the insane, and testing each only by that one touchstone of freedom. At last, as is well known, he found freedom's refuge in nothing but Cromwell's absolutism—"our chief of men," who alone could check the pedantic bores of social tyrannies, and alone could vindicate for England her rightful place as the avenger of oppression and darkness throughout the world.

Hardly had that place been won, hardly had the poet identified himself to some extent with the greatness of Cromwell's rule, when the tragic irony touched him again. The Protector died, and with his last breath everything for which Milton had sacrificed his dearest powers crumpled up and dissolved. It was not a change of Government; it was the collapse of his own people. Honor, virtue, heroism, freedom herself—all were gone. They were shoved aside to be the mock of lean and flashy songs, while all that was mean, corrupt, and paltry celebrated its triumph. Between the country he loved and the Powers of darkness and persecution secret "ententes" were arranged, and the flag that had stood for freedom throughout Europe was bartered for a harlot. There is no need to recount the shame of our country and the poet's woe.

> "Fallen Cherub, to be weak is miserable, > Doing or suffering."

Blind already for eight or nine years, reduced to poverty, experienced in one wife who refused him affection, in a second who died early, and in daughters who openly wished him dead, isolated among sons of Belial, his hopes shattered, his cause lost, his country prostituted to dishonor, he turned to fulfil the high promise of his bright and rigorous youth. He fulfilled it with a completeness that must have surpassed even the hopes of early manhood. He fulfilled it in such a manner that the finest of his critics has said, "An appreciation of Milton is the last reward of consummated scholarship." And yet, even in that noblest monument of our language, the tragic irony has not let him go. Building for after ages, he built upon a truth which he supposed to be eternal, but whose form has hardly survived the passage of three centuries, even if its poetic verity remain. That innocent Garden, that lovely Eve, in whose presence all higher knowledge fell degraded, that prone Archangel and the Tree, have faded as the unsubstantial vision in which they lived in their creator's eyes.

All this he suffered, and now that he has been so long dead, his tragedy seems to mock him still. But there he remains in his place unquestioned, the noblest personality in all our literature, the man whom in the hour of England's need we, like Wordsworth, should most wish to be living. For it was he who first sang "the mountain nymph, sweet Liberty," and in the masque of "Comus" adjured his hearers to love virtue, not for some divine or legal sanction, still less for the greatest happiness of any number, but because "she alone is free." And it was he who, for the sake of freedom, gave up most, even all that he had.

DO WE OVER-EAT?

It has often been remarked that conservative traditions have their most impregnable fortress in popular habits of food and drink. Such movements as take place are not merely very slow, but they are usually achieved by changes of opportunity and fashion rather than by reasonable adaptations. Doubtless hot-gospellers of dietetic reform are more abroad than ever. But this reforming zeal has hardly touched the great mass even of the middle classes, who are content to eat much as their fathers ate, adding a few new condiments and vegetable accessories of minor importance. Even in modes of cooking we are loth to learn, and our standard of food materials has stood almost intact the change from country to city life, from outdoor to sedentary occupations, from manual to brain work.

Though vegetarianism has of recent years attained a considerable vogue in certain "cultured" coteries, and may even be said to rank as a by-path of the radical and humanitarian movement, it must be remembered that in the very countries where this cult thrives most, large classes of workers formerly vegetarian by compulsion are extending their standard of living by a larger consumption of animal foods. Indeed, the cheapness and accessibility of food supplies have led of late to a new "reform" directed more against the quantity than the nature of our diet. Here and in America a few physicians and physiologists have thrown the weight of their authority into a campaign against over-feeding. As is perhaps inevitable, their assault shows signs of excess. It may even be true that more people die by over-eating than by over-drinking, and yet the mastication panacea may be somewhat overdone. Such, at any rate, is the judgment of Sir James Crichton Browne in his searching address before the Congress of the Royal Institute of Public Health. The very notion of "parsimony in nutrition" is repellent to what is termed "the natural man," perhaps because for countless ages he has been absorbed in a usually futile attempt to get enough. On this account we think there is not much danger lest the doctrine of economy in eating, which Mr. Fletcher and Dr. Chittenden have lately reinforced by their interesting experiments, will attain a serious vogue in this country.

That doctrine is in itself a not unattractive one. Its central proposition is the substitution of qualitative for merely quantitative eating. Thorough mastication will enable us to satisfy our appetite with a much smaller quantity of food, and will lead us to favor a diet with a smaller proportion of flesh and other foods rich in proteids. At the same time we shall get what we require for repair of tissue and energy with a reduction of work for the digestive system. Sir James Crichton Browne questions the validity and the sufficiency of the experiments adduced in support of this attack on the established diet, and upholds the fuller proteid diet on the ground that "the generalised food customs of mankind are the fruit of a colossal experience accumulated by countless millions of men throughout successive generations." "In all civilised countries the working-classes have as far as practicable arrived at a tolerably uniform diet containing about twice as much proteid material as Professor Chittenden declares to be necessary; and it is inconceivable that they should all, under the most diverse conditions, have fallen into the same mistake." This opens a really profitable topic of reflection for liberal thinkers. Few of us would be disposed to admit that the well-nigh universal belief in ghosts from early antiquity was proof of their existence, or that the same consensus until recent ages was valid testimony to the flatness of the earth. May there exist equally general tendencies to error in the evolution of diet? "Not so," Sir James might reply; "mankind has been selected for survival very largely on a basis of fit food, very little on a basis of fit scientific beliefs."

Within certain limits this answer is doubtless conclusive. But do those limits preclude the wide or even general prevalence of wasteful habits? Assuming, as is indisputably true, that until quite recent times the working-classes, even in the most civilised countries, have almost always been kept upon the verge of starvation, and the growth of population has been seriously retarded by sheer lack of food, may not the rapid rise of the standard of consumption for large masses of the people, which has been the most valuable result of the industrial revolution, contain large elements of excess? Sir James would himself admit, we take it, that imperfect mastication is a common fault, and that many maladjustments between appetite and bodily needs exist, although the "struggle for existence" might have been expected to eliminate them. Unless it is contended that appetite as a gauge of vital needs operates so quickly and so well as to sift within a single generation the physiological virtues out of the new food supplies, it is reasonable to suppose that grave abuses of foods should arise. Even allowing that the slow course of history has ground out the best combinations of food materials out of available local resources for working populations, it cannot be argued that the relative abundance and cheapness of the various food materials during recent years are kept in any right proportion to these vital needs.

While, therefore, we agree with Sir James in holding that the surprising results in economy of foods obtained by Dr. Chittenden's school and by vegetarian experiments are not sufficient proof of the lasting virtues of these reformed diets, we cannot think with him that biological selection has led us to approximately perfect diet, or that nature precludes tendencies to excess at periods of fresh abundance. We even doubt whether accurate statistics would sustain his assertion that "a tolerably uniform diet" has been achieved in all civilised countries, while his suggestion that Buddhism may have led whole nations like the Japanese to abandon a superior meat diet is not merely dubious history, but is inconsistent with the supremacy which his theory of survival by selection of fit foods involves. Nor does his interesting speculation to the effect that the recent rapid rise of Japan is due in part to "a vastly increased consumption of animal food by the best people" carry us very far or very surely. This same argument might be adduced to support the superior efficiency of European clothing. Besides, what is most remarkable in the rise of Japan is the energy not merely of "the best," but of the people as a whole. And they have not changed their diet, or their clothes.

Upon the striking physiological reasoning in favor of animal proteids as furnishing the best nutrition of the brain cells we cannot affect to form an opinion. But though "chewers," vegetarians, "fruit-and-nutters," and other food radicals may have undervalued the testimony of history to the validity of the orthodox diet of the well-to-do classes in modern civilised countries, we think that Sir James Crichton Browne's reliance on the wisdom of the ages has a far feebler logical foundation than he imagines. While quick poisons and grave habitual excesses affecting the life and strength of the population at a reproductive age are certainly eliminated from popular diets, dietetic vices less destructive may survive. And it may well be the case that rational selection can correct such faults, and even discover fresh elements of nutriment which unconscious selection had left unessayed. That a grave amount of undernutrition prevails in the working-classes, not only of our towns but of our villages, is undeniable; and this condition is due, certainly in large measure, to insufficiency of nutritious foods. This is, we hold, clearly established by the carefully considered dietary based on Mr. Rowntree's inquiry, which involves a minimum expenditure of 12s. 9d. per week on food for a working family of man, wife, and three young children. The current wages do not render this minimum nutrition attainable for large classes of workers even in this prosperous land. But it would be impossible to deny that the trouble is also largely one of perverted diet, composed as much of excesses of non-nutritious or mal-nutritious foods as of a deficiency of nutritious ones. Nature, human or other, may be trusted to look after her interests in the long run. But a part of human nature is the faculty called reason, and the necessity of using this faculty to check the otherwise wasteful and roundabout methods of the biological struggle has surely been established. We would not abandon the claims of long and wide experience to the hasty vaunts of new laboratory results. But we cannot agree that crude empiricism, however "colossal," can dispense with scientific inquiry, either in gauging the nutritive values of old foods, or in adjusting new diets to the changing demands of life.

THE ART OF OPENING.

Be it history, essay, romance, scientific tract, or sermon, there is an admirable art of opening. Every writer ambitious of distinction must have striven for the right beginning, yet not all the great ones have achieved it. Are there precepts? It is not easy to show them, inasmuch as every good beginning is a precept in itself, and of good beginnings there are many kinds. The reader should be so far an adept in his delightful recreation as to know by instinct whether the writer has led off well, indifferently, or ill.

The first sentence of Macaulay's "History"—

> "I purpose to write the history of England from the accession of King James the Second down to a time which is within the memory of men still living," is sufficiently direct, but less engaging to ear and eye than Gibbon's beginning of the "Decline and Fall":—

> "In the second century of the Christian Aera, the Empire of Rome comprehended the fairest part of the earth, and the most civilised portion of mankind."

Among political addresses, the exordium of Walpole's speech on the Peerage Bill (in George I.'s reign) is often quoted:—

> "Among the Romans, the wisest people upon earth, the Temple of Fame was placed behind the Temple of Virtue, to denote that there was no coming to the Temple of Fame but through that of Virtue. But if this Bill is passed, one of the most powerful incentives to virtue would be taken away, since there would be no arriving at honor but through the winding-sheet of an old, decrepit lord, or the grave of an extinct family—a policy very different from that glorious and enlightened nation who made it their pride to hold out to the world illustrious examples of merited elevation."

A powerful and artistic opening, marred by a tiny but most flagitious error of omission in the last clause of the second sentence.

Junius is in general extremely effective at the start:—

> "The submission of a free people to the executive authority of government is no more than a compliance with laws which they themselves have enacted."

Yet he is capable of two grammatical blunders in such an execrable first sentence as this:—

> "While Parliament was sitting, it would neither have been safe, or, perhaps, quite regular, to offer any opinion to the public upon the justice or wisdom of their proceedings."

Turn to one or two of the essayists. Bacon is almost always a magnificent beginner:—

> "It was an high speech of Seneca (after the manner of the Stoics) that the good things which belong to prosperity are to be wished, but the good things that belong to adversity are to be admired."
>
> "A king is a mortal god on earth, unto whom the living God hath lent his own name as a great honor; but withal told him he should die like a man, lest he should be proud, and flatter himself that God hath with his name imparted unto him his nature also."

In stately and well-chosen terms Sir Thomas Browne begins the second part of the "Christian Morals" with a sentence in which he thrice repeats himself:—

> "Punish not thyself with pleasure; glut not thy sense with palliative delights; nor revenge the contempt of temperance by the penalty of satiety."

Almost any opening of Addison's might be chosen, for its artistry, its humor, or its finely-pointed malice. From speculations as to the fate of Dr. Sacheverell (or had the Lords already found him guilty?), and inquiries as to what Marlborough was doing in the Netherlands, the wits and big-wigs of the coffee-houses must have come eagerly to the reading of the famous No. 1 of the "Spectator," in which Addison strikes up with a characteristic note of banter:—

> "I have observed that a reader seldom peruses a book with pleasure till he knows whether the writer of it be a black or a fair man, of a mild or choleric disposition, married or a bachelor, with other particulars of the like nature, that conduce very much to the right understanding of an author."

Macaulay, in his "Essays," is often a curiously ineffective beginner (for a writer, we mean, who has easily at command almost every expedient of the craft), but he occasionally throws off in a fine hilarious vein:—

> "The work of Dr. Nares has filled us with astonishment similar to that which Captain Lemuel Gulliver felt when first he landed in Brobdingnag, and saw corn as high as the oaks in the New Forest, thimbles as large as buckets, and wrens of the bulk of turkeys."

Professor Minto, by the way, has noted how Macaulay kept up to the last his familiarity with Swift, Cervantes, Dante, Bunyan, the Arabian Nights, and the Bible, for the purposes of literary illustration.

Lamb makes his bow in a style inimitably his own, and with a felicity beyond compare. It is a piece of deft simplicity such as this: "I have an almost feminine partiality for old china," or something fantastic or drolly hyperbolical, as in that portentous first sentence on "Poor Relations":—

> "A Poor Relation is the most irrelevant thing in nature—a piece of impertinent correspondency—an odious approximation—a haunting conscience—a preposterous shadow, lengthening in the noontide of our prosperity—an unwelcome remembrancer—a perpetually recurring mortification—a drain on your purse—a more intolerable dun upon your pride—a drawback upon success—a rebuke to your rising—a stain in your blood—a blot on your 'scutcheon—a rent in your garment—a death's head at your banquet—Agathocles' pot—a Mordecai in your gate—a Lazarus at your door—a lion in your path—a frog in your chamber—a fly in your ointment—a mote in your eye—a triumph to your enemy, an apology to your friends—the one thing not needful—the hail in harvest—the ounce of sour in a pound of sweet."

The sentence is Rabelaisian in its wealth of illustration, vocabulary, and piling up of the effect.

Of Stevenson we have little at hand that is of his choicest, but what a vivacious play of fancy marks this opening of the essay on "Talk and Talkers":—

> "There can be no fairer ambition than to excel in talk; to be affable, gay, ready, clear, and welcome; to have a fact, a thought, or an illustration, pat to every subject; and, not only to cheer the flight of time among our intimates, but bear our part in that great international congress, always sitting, where public wrongs are first declared, public errors first corrected, and the course of public opinion shaped, day by day, a little nearer to the right."

In fiction examples might be multiplied, but we may not multiply them. Who begins thus?—

> "I was ever of opinion that the honest man who married and brought up a large family did more service than he who continued single and only talked of population."

Who but Goldsmith, in the "Vicar of Wakefield"? The opening sentence, observes a careful critic, "touches the heart of the story; it is sententious, but its sentiment is instantly lightened by a ray of humor."

Again, remembering what is immediately to follow, could Bunyan have commenced the "Pilgrim's Progress" more perfectly than on this wise:—

> "As I walked through the wilderness of this world, I lighted on a certain place where was a den, and laid me down in that place to sleep; and as I slept, I dreamed a dream."

The beginning of "Tristram Shandy" stands quite alone in English fiction; but we prefer infinitely the first four sentences of the "Sentimental Journey." Would that Sir Walter had always started as grandly as he does in the "Antiquary"! It has been well remarked that Jane Austen is an invariably good beginner. This, certainly, is suggestive and adroit:—

> "No one who has ever seen Catherine Morland in her infancy would have supposed her born to be an heroine."

And this is a bright, neat little lead in "Pride and Prejudice":—

> "It is a truth universally acknowledged that a single man in possession of a good fortune must be in want of a wife."

Shall we be pardoned for submitting that the first sentence of "Esmond" is careless, cumbersome, and dull?

> "When Francis, fourth Viscount Castlewood, came to his title, and presently after to take possession of his house of Castlewood, county Hants, in the year 1691, almost the only tenant of the place besides the domestics was a lad of twelve years of age, of whom no one seemed to take any note until my Lady Viscountess lighted upon him, going over the house with the housekeeper on the day of her arrival."

Here we have "take possession" and "take note" in most inelegant proximity, while it might be the boy and not my Lady Viscountess who was going over the house with the housekeeper. It is a bad opening for so skilful a hand. In the familiar first sentence of "Vanity Fair," let us hasten to add, Thackeray is felicitous enough:—

> "While the present century was in its teens, and on one sunshiny morning in June, there drove up to the great iron gate of Miss Pinkerton's academy for young ladies, on Chiswick Mall, a large family coach, with two fat horses in blazing harness, driven by a fat coachman in a three-cornered hat and wig, at the rate of four miles an hour."

Here also the structure of the sentence is loose, but the reader is seized on the spot.

We have often thought that, among the many characteristic openings of Dickens, not one exhibits his peculiar quality more distinctively than that of "Dombey and Son":—

> "Dombey sat in the corner of the darkened room in the great armchair by the bedside, and Son lay tucked up warm in a little basket bedstead, carefully disposed on a low settee immediately in front of the fire and close to it, as if his constitution were analogous to that of a muffin, and it was essential to toast him brown while he was very new."

Two lecturers, since they are of the stature of Ruskin and Lord Acton, shall for one moment take the stage. Can we not detect the note of arrogant modesty in the tones of the great John, as he stands on the platform of Bradford Town Hall, setting forth in his harangue on "Traffic"?—

> "My good Yorkshire friends, you asked me down here among your hills that I might talk to you about this Exchange that you are going to build, but, earnestly and seriously asking you to pardon me, I am going to do nothing of the kind."

Imperturbable, refreshing John!

Acton, his editors have told us, eschewed rhetoric, and color-pieces in his massive pages are rare. But he cannot wholly escape from rhetoric, the sense of which is abundantly developed in him. The first sentence of his lecture on "The Rise and Fall of the Mexican Empire" runs thus:—

> "The scene of the tragedy, which I will attempt to describe, is a country on which Nature's fairest gifts have been lavished with an unsparing hand, but where man has done his utmost to thwart the designs of Providence."

A little stiff perhaps, yet not lacking in sonority.

It would possibly surprise the reader to know how many beautiful beginnings could be cited from purely scientific writings, and parenthetically it may be said that Mill's "Logic" abounds in paragraphs of exquisite and impeccable construction. One small example must suffice. It is the opening of Tyndall's treatise on "Light":—

> "Experiments have two great uses—a use in discovery and verification, and a use in tuition. They were long ago defined as the investigator's language addressed to Nature, to which she sends intelligible replies."

That is something more than an utterance of science; it is an utterance also of literature.

Yet must we ever at the last return to The Book:—

> "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth."
> "And God said, Let there be light: and there was light."

The manner of that!

Present-Day Problems.

THE HARMSWORTH BRAND.—II.

It is impossible to understand the aim and method of the Harmsworth Press without realising that all its productions are of a-piece. Daily papers, weekly papers, papers for duchesses and papers for servant girls, "Daily Mails" and "Comic Cuts," are thought out on a single well-conceived and well-executed plan. The newspaper business is to be run as a great shop is run. Its interior organisation, its outer face, are equally modelled on this idea. The big shop—say the big draper's shop—must pay; it must pay not in one department but in all. It must constantly seek and follow the public taste in all moods and tenses. It must "dress" its windows with the utmost care; it must always be in the public eye with something new or that looks like being new. It must puff itself constantly; it must use every device to persuade its customers that they are getting "bargains," that they are receiving, in Harmsworthian phrase, "something for nothing." It must never be original, only imitative. It must take from its rivals everything that seems valuable; it must always be reaching out into new branches, where the old goods are sold under fresh management, and a slight but perceptible variation of cheap-jack devices. It must have a few able heads and managers, who are highly paid, partly by results. For the rest it will be served by a crowd of items, whose special function is thoroughly drilled into them, leaving little or nothing to personal initiative, and whose wage is kept down to the competitive level. Its management must be highly centralised, and rigorous financial control exercised.

Above all, one class of goods must be sold in seeming, but quite delusive, variety. They must be turned out in vast quantities, machine-made, cut to pattern. The Harmsworth papers, therefore, the Harmsworth stories, the Harmsworth gambling devices, the Harmsworth "editorial" methods, resemble each other so closely that if one could conceive the mass of these journals running for a century, it seems probable that the issue of the twenty-first century would differ from that of the twentieth chiefly in the dressing of its dummies. For example, we have before us a kind of "specification" of the fiction plots that were required for some of the earlier numbers of "Answers," the parent stock from which sprang the wondrous growths of later years. Not only the ground plan but the decorative scheme of the jerry-built story is laid down in this remarkable document. Imprimis, they "must be sensational, and each instalment should contain a fresh sensation." It must also "carry the reader forward a distinct step in the plot, as though it were a scene in a melodrama," breaking off "at a curtain." The plot should "start at the first line," and there must be no literary superfluities—"no moralising," "no long descriptions of scenery," "no close analyses of emotions." Finally, each bit of the tale must "give scope for sensational pictorial illustration." The moralities are to be respected, and the feelings must be thrilled not shocked, so that though there may be criminals there must be no ghosts—no "phenomena." In a word, all must be clear, objective, not resembling life, but moving, like pictures in the cinematograph, with flashing quickness before the uncritical eyes for which the show has been built up.

Now it is interesting to see how this conception of the art of imaginative writing has worked out in practice. Examine scores of numbers of the Harmsworth publications. Their present mainstay is fiction, for the prize-giving mania seems for the moment to have run its wildest course, and the stories are all illustrated. They proceed in the main on three lines—(1) the so-called story of adventure for boys, (2) the sentimental love story for girls and women, (3) the crime story for all classes of readers, young and old, men and women. The illustrations follow the same threads of interest. They only depict women who are supposed to be beautiful, or pretty after the shop-girl's idea of beauty. For the rest their recurring subjects are violent situations between criminals and detectives, acted crimes, scenes of peril, melodramatic surprises, blows exchanged between heroes and villains, pistols fired, lovers in each others' arms, and a vast output of sprawling, grotesque figures and "comic" incidents borrowed from the Sunday editions of the American papers. So far as style goes, they might all be written by one hand. They are grammatical, they are not indecent or suggestive—as much could not be said for some earlier issues we have seen—there is even, as time goes on, a slight improvement in the mechanical virtues which have been held up to their authors—a certain bald simplicity of method and ingenuity in the development of a series of sensational incidents. The weekly papers have kept for the most part the broad road of vulgarity, with an occasional sharp dip to vileness.

But as between the two main interests of the Harmsworth story—sentimental love and crime—the latter holds the field. Crime for the "Union Jack," crime for "Answers," crime for "Good Words," crime for "The Home Circle," crime for "Pluck," crime for "The Sunday Companion," perhaps the most harmless of all these papers. To do the promoters of these enterprises justice, they have advanced—let us hope by choice—from the frightful crudeness of their earlier ventures. Many of the papers of a few years ago reeked with crime. The stories of the worst murderers—Cream, Palmer, Wainwright, Peace (especially Peace)—were the favorite subjects: their readers of all ages were rarely allowed to stray far from the gallows and the cell, until the murderous records of two generations had been raked and scraped clean of their horrors.

Most—not all—of these noisome ghosts now rest in their graves; the detective story takes their place. A hero once invented, "Sexton Blake" or "Michael Dred," or even "Dirk, the dog detective," lives for ever. He is the Hercules of the great Harmsworth Myth, in labors and perils oft, but gloriously surviving, unmatched in strength and cunning by the hydra brood he quells. The "Union Jack" (a paper for boys), having used up "Sexton Blake" for London, is about to match him with the "Apaches of Paris"; the "Home Circle," when it has thoroughly cheered itself up over "The Black Calendar" (one of a series of "enthralling records of great trials"), can swing back into the imaginative realm as its eye catches the blood-red announcement of "Tracked by Two." What harm do these things do? No one knows. The worst type is gone; and even the earlier papers were a thought better than the low sheets they superseded. But now and then a record leaps to light. Two years ago a boy broke into a safe in Newcastle and stole £90. His father found in his pocket a copy of "The Boys' Friend," a title of some humor, and blamed the paper for his fall. The Editor protested, and the boy recanted the charge. But we have before us a pamphlet with a picture of a hand grasping a bag of gold, and another laid on a banker's pass-book. It dangles before its boy readers the prospect of a fortune as a reward for joining a scheme of hustling colportage. Is that a vision to hold before boys' eyes? On the other hand, great masses of nonsense written for these papers are probably innocent. They are washed clean of evil as of every quality that can be called intellectual. They are ghosts of stories, which, like the shades that met Odysseus, would have to drink blood before they could be invoked.

But whatever the character of the Harmsworth paper, the same machinery of advertisement is set up in order to press it on the public for which it is designed. Each "editor" and group of "editors" set up an unending clatter of self-commendation and suggestion, spin an incessant series of webs for catching and holding the interests of their readers. This machine-made story is the best, "the grandest," ever written. That obscure author is known all over the English-speaking world. The next number will excel all its predecessors, all its rivals. Each paper advertises the other, and succeeds to it in order of publication, till the whole week is covered. Societies, bands of readers, "Chipites," "loyal supporters," Leagues of "Boys' Friends" (there is even a "Cradle Roll" for "Good Words"), are formed to spread the circulation, with bribes to those who yield the best results. A perpetually varied stimulus of money prizes, mostly rewards for foolish time-wasting employments, keeps the admirers of the paper excited and attached. For the moment the gambling elements in these lures—the hidden treasures, the scattered gold, the collection of tram-tickets, the Limerick and missing word competitions—are a trifle exhausted. They must raise an army of disappointed and embittered people; pauses in such delusive strategy are clearly essential. The Harmsworth firms did not start this madness, they followed their usual plan of imitation; they were not guilty of its worst excesses; their chief conductor, able and watchful, may turn to other means of sustaining the vast and flimsy fabric which he has reared.

[Apropos of the list of publications published as proceeding from the various Harmsworth groups, the Globe Publishing Company and Golf Illustrated (Limited) ask us to state that neither "The Globe" nor "Golf Illustrated" "are in any way connected with any other publications."]

(To be continued.)

Art.

THE LONDONER AND HIS BUILDINGS.

Probably there never was a time when the architecture of London was as much on the lips of Londoners as it is at the present moment. No doubt the opportunities for discussing the subject have been more frequent lately than for some time past, for the last ten years have witnessed an unwonted activity in building operations; old slums have been destroyed and new thoroughfares constructed, while that peculiarly modern feature, the palace-hotel, has set the fashion in more or less tasteful architecture to other buildings having a measure of public interest. Yet these facts, important as they are, do not quite explain the new interest of the man in the street in his day-to-day surroundings. There have been periods of architectural efflorescence before, and they moved him not a whit. Within the last hundred years our architecture has been submerged in turn by a Greek wave and a Gothic one. It was Greek when, in 1818, Parliament was so impressed by the spiritual needs of London that they voted a million of money for the erection of fifty new churches, and called all the architectural talent of the day to their service. The churches were "pure" Greek temples except for their steeples, which were what the architects, at their wits' end to find a pure Greek counterpart to this very Christian accessory, chose to make them; but we do not learn that either the purity of the Greek substructure or the anachronism of its steeple moved the man in the street either to enthusiasm or to laughter. He appears, in fact, to have accepted them with a complaisance amounting to indifference. Similarly, the Gothic revival of the 'thirties and 'forties affected larger London sentiment and opinion rather less than the pre-Raphaelite movement, and infinitely less than the later event, the career of Jumbo from glory to the grave. From these premises one may safely conclude that precedents are wanting for the present popularity of architecture as a subject of general conversation. The fact of the matter is that the Londoner of yesterday took London architecture by rote. He was taught to reverence St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey as monuments of architectural greatness; the rest of London was to him, not architecture, but simply buildings.

However, he is slowly awakening from his long apathy, is beginning to take a pride in his surroundings, to use his eyes, and even to criticise. As we have said, the number of changes in London streets that have been compressed into the last few years, is partly responsible for this, and the character of the buildings erected by the present generation of architects is still more so. There is a certain joyousness even in the worst of the new architecture, and this makes a succulent appeal to the inhabitants of a city long doomed to a sad austerity in its adornment. In regard to styles, the pseudo-Gothic and the pseudo-Greek have given place to Renaissance, with all its multi-hued elements, and statuary, hitherto an outcast, has come to play an important part in external decoration. Then the icy greyness of Portland stone has been replaced almost universally with the warm Bath stone and its kindred, and though on the grounds of suitability and durability this change is open to question, it undoubtedly tends towards the making of a brighter London. Such features of the new architecture are potent to attract the eye and kindle the imagination. If we go deeper, we may, perhaps, find the reason for the readiness of the imagination to be kindled in the growth of the civic idea under more democratic conditions than formerly prevailed; a growth that stimulates the sense of personal connection between the citizen and his city.

Recently two events have happened that have contributed remarkably towards the quickening of his faculties. The one was the opening of the Franco-British Exhibition, and the other the affair of the Strand statues. The buildings of the White City, insincere and meretricious as they may appear to many serious students of architecture, are, nevertheless, a revelation and an object lesson of what is possible in the art of decorative building, and their flimsiness, their exhibition character, does not detract from their importance in this respect. There are few Londoners who would care to see London re-built on the model of Shepherd's Bush, even if such a thing were possible; but as joyous stimulants to architectural fancies, rather than as types of what is desirable for a more beautiful London, these exhibition structures are decidedly inspiring.

The discussion as to the propriety or impropriety of the Strand statues acted, similarly, as a stimulus to our intellectual interest in London architecture, even if it was unproductive of any definite conclusion as to the merits or the decency of the statues themselves. To ourselves, speaking from the architectural point of view, they appear to be without any decorative value whatever. They convey the impression of having been stuck on to the building, to stand uncomfortably in niches so small as to suggest the Little Ease dungeons at the Tower, where a prisoner could neither stand up nor sit down. Their "pre-Pheidian" outlines, viewed from near or far, are pitilessly stark. On the other hand, they express in great measure the sentiment of medical science, and symbolise fittingly the aims and achievements of the British Medical Association in the study of human anatomy that it carries on for the conquest of disease. There is, probably, no public statuary in London where a clear artistic aim has been as faithfully realised as in these, and their very faithfulness gives them a certain nobility. Yet they are far from pleasing. The eye suddenly confronted with them receives a shock, and the shock in several cases deepens into the honest repugnance that belongs to instinct rather than to logic. The fact that offends is, perhaps, less that of what they are than of where they are. If we saw the same statues in sunny Greece or Italy, we should probably acclaim them universally as the masterpieces that some pronounce them to be. Even if surroundings as homely as the British Museum were their habitat, we should be disposed to extend towards them the tolerance with which we view a dismembered torso from ancient Rome. But in the Strand they provoke the Northern hostility to what is alien and unusual; they are interlopers, invaders of our conventions, outrages upon the misty peace of our London skies. They do not offend one's sense of decency, which is a personal sense; they obtrude themselves upon our Northern-ness, which is a national one.

However, the discussion had one useful effect in drawing attention not merely to the admirable new building of the British Medical Association, to which the statues belong, but to many other buildings, with or without statuary, recently completed or in process of construction. The instinct to compare is among the strongest, and an agitation of this kind arouses it. Passers-by who have been impelled, from whatever motives, to study the Strand statues and their building, are prone to look, possibly in the course of the same walk, at another building, and note the architectural difference, if any, that exists between the two. One can picture a man who has stopped to look at the already historic structure at the corner of Agar Street finding a new interest in the far more florid façade of the Waldorf Hotel or that of the United Kingdom Provident Society's building with its ample female statuary, that is frowned upon by the island of St. Clement Dane's; or contrasting the cupola-crowned New Gaiety with the grim and ill-adapted Gothic of the Law Courts; or proceeding down Parliament Street in search of fresh beauties in the exterior of the Admiralty and the War Office, and on, maybe, to the growing dignity of the new Victoria railway terminus; or even making an excursion to South Kensington to view Sir Aston Webb's masterpiece, the present Victoria and Albert Museum, and Mr. Alfred Waterhouse's symmetrical Natural History Museum. By such means the cursory glance becomes the detailed investigation, and the explorer, gratified by the discovery of some fact of beauty, which, not having talked with architects or read text-books, he believes to be a fresh one and his own, goes home and talks about it with authority. Necessarily the authority thus assumed is often open to question, and the interest in the subject is found to be based on anything but the sound knowledge that proceeds from constant observation and comparison. But whether it be shallow or deep, it is undeniably wide-spread. More than that, it is comprehensive to a degree. It is not confined to a particular building, or to one class of building; it embraces everything from a church to a railway station. It is gradually emancipating itself from the mere usage of Gothic and Renaissance as fascinating terms to play with, and from all the vanities of culture that were once deemed its realities. It is not an appreciation of a special cult in architecture, but a growing, if still immature, sense of the importance of architecture to the national life and of beauty to a town.

Communications.

THE INTERNATIONAL PEACE CONGRESS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—To the man who reads running, Peace would seem to have come in with a rush. Mr. Roosevelt's latest speech, demanding the impossible in the shape of a navy superior to any conceivable threat, sounds like a voice from the dim ages of the past. Group after group of foreign visitors is fêted—this week the Olympic arena (no longer barren of hospitality) and the French deputies and senators have shared newspaper honors; while a ground-swell of advertisement has prepared the public mind for the International Peace Congress which will fill Caxton Hall and Queen's Hall throughout next week. But this last is an occasion sui generis, deserving of some searching thought both by friendly outsiders and by its own members. The Congress is to be entertained at a banquet by the Government, at the cost of the new hospitality fund. It is to be received in deputation by the King and Queen at Buckingham Palace, and is to visit Windsor a thousand strong. It is to be addressed by the Prime Minister and several of his colleagues; and the Bishop of Carlisle will bless it at Westminster Abbey. Is a gathering that has for half a century represented the political Left in the International field strong enough to stand without hurt this sudden access of respectability?

The veterans of the movement are falling one by one—Randal Cremer has this week followed Hodgson Pratt, Elie Duncannon, and General Türr into the peace that is beyond Congresses and Conventions; Frédèric Passy is too ill to come to London; the Baroness von Suttner and Signor Moneta are the only Nobel laureates who will be present. Still, it is evident that the seventeenth Congress will be stronger than any of its predecessors in representative quality. From Iceland to Japan, and from Sweden to South Africa and New Zealand, there is hardly a country that will not have its spokesman. France, Germany, the United States, and Italy send large delegations. Three Japanese professors, several Hindus, half-a-dozen Poles, one of the Paris leaders of the Young Turkish revolt, and some distinguished foreign feminists will illustrate in their own persons some of the livest of contemporary problems. Many aspects of our own pacific sentiment will be in evidence. Three Universities, those of Manchester, Wales, and Birmingham, will participate; as will political organisations like the Cobden, Eighty, and New Reform Clubs, the National Reform Union, the two bodies of women Liberals; the Trade Union Congress Parliamentary Committee, and several of the largest trade unions; the Free Church Council, the Baptist and Congregational Unions, the Unitarian Association, and other religious bodies. The list of subsidiary demonstrations, especially the Young People's meeting on Thursday evening, the Labor gathering in Trafalgar Square next Saturday, and the Teachers' Conference on Friday proves, indeed, when we consider its precedents and the material weakness of the movement hitherto, that Peace Week will this year witness a somewhat notable feat of organisation.

This is all to the good, and still it is not untimely to express the hope that what has been gained in popularity may not be lost in pioneering zeal and political foresight. The sentiment of peace is becoming dangerously cheapened. The realisation of the means by which alone a settled condition of friendship among nations can be attained is painfully infrequent and feeble. What is wanted is a clear understanding of the causes of international disorder, and a network of vigilance committees that will combat these causes in season and out of season. The intellectual work of the peace movement, in fact, is not done; it is only just begun. There are only too many titled persons ready to cry "Peace! Peace!" where there is no peace. The first Hague Conference, almost universally scoffed at in respectable circles, has to its credit at least one enormous accomplishment—the Permanent Court of Arbitration. The second Conference, amid the plaudits of the world, achieved nothing comparable in importance with its decision to meet again in seven years

Seven years! And in the meantime the system of suppressed anarchy called the "armed peace" continues in full swing. Between the two Hague Conferences, according to Sir E. Fry, the yearly expenditure of Europe, the United States, and Japan, on armaments increased from £251,000,000 to £320,000,000. What incredible figure will it have reached ere the third Conference meets in 1914? We understand, of course, that every part of its programme cannot be fully discussed at each International Peace Congress. It is fortunate, therefore, and altogether fitting that this subject, which England has officially espoused, without, perhaps, very fully comprehending its logic, and certainly, so far, without much ingenuity or boldness, is secure of due consideration!—Yours, &c.,

G. H. PERRIS.

July 22nd, 1908.

Letters to the Editor.

"WANTED, A NEW SCHEME OF CULTURE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your article on this subject in last week's issue says so many true and wise things that many of your readers must have been surprised, as I was, at the lameness of its conclusions. You complain of the divorce between the common people and the specialist knowledge brought to light by the "new Renaissance," and you lament the consequent inadequacy of "culture" to hold its own against the pressure of utilities. But you have nothing further to suggest in remedy than that people should be taught, firstly, English literature and history, and, secondly, to "weigh and consider" what they read. This is admirable advice so far as it goes, but it hardly goes to the root of the very large question you raise—the divorce of "culture" from life. Will you allow the argument to be carried a little further by a member of one of those college common rooms with whose conversational gifts you were so much disappointed?

It is quite true that the older universities, and the "schools and colleges frequented by the sons and daughters of our upper classes," have developed a "culture" of their own, based largely upon the study of classical antiquity, which is a closed book to the great mass of the nation. An educational tradition extending over several centuries has produced a peculiar and distinctive atmosphere and habit of mind. It would be tempting to analyse and discuss it—to ask how it has managed to cultivate Hellenism without ceasing to be Christian, and to absorb itself in a rather formal study of literature and yet persist in its task of educating "governors" and "practical" men. But all your readers know the type of gentleman and scholar upon whom this "culture" has been impressed. One can guess beforehand what one will find on his bookshelves—Homer, Plato, and Sophocles (with, nowadays, perhaps Euripides) among the ancients, and Walter Pater and Matthew Arnold predominant among the moderns.

This is "culture" in the most esoteric sense of a word which many democrats have learnt to detest. Who would dare to quote Pater or the Symposium at a working-class gathering that has been brought up on the Old Testament, reads Mr. Blatchford weekly, and is buying up the cheap reprints of Darwin, Ruskin, and Carlyle? It is tempting to acquiesce with you in "the obvious impossibility of applying to the spritual nutrition of the common people an intellectual and emotional diet framed for the dainty palate of an aristocracy."

Yet, for all the "artifice and preciosity" you speak of, your conclusion is certainly premature; and there are many who have actually had experience in communicating the ideas embodied in this form of culture to working men and women who would boldly assert that it has already been disproved. Lord Morley referred in his Manchester address to the Workers' Educational Association and to the enthusiasm for the humanities it has succeeded in generating among many of the factory workers in the North. One of the most striking facts about the educational revival stimulated by this body is the remarkable affinity it has revealed between working-class and academic habits of mind. A university man, fresh from Plato, who spends an evening chatting (or, rather, listening) in a working men's club where this revival is in full swing, could almost fancy himself at a gathering of embryo university philosophers, or among the Athenians in the Agora discussing the One and the Many, or the nature of Oratory, or the relative advantages of one-man government and democracy, with the general secretary of a powerful trades' union substituted for Pericles or Alcibiades. Compulsory Greek is, no doubt, an important educational issue; but if you think that its abolition will lead to a "radical revision of culture standards," I am convinced that you are mistaken. Greek ideas are too interesting and infectious to have been killed even by coddling, and they only become more interesting and infectious when they put on an English dress.

To your two suggested remedies I would briefly add two more. Firstly, the democratisation of the older universities. Academic culture has suffered from a certain intellectual inbreeding. Make it accessible to a wider circle, and we shall see how much vital power it retains. In its details this is a wide and difficult question, but most people in Oxford would agree that the fresh wind blown through the university at the advent of the Rhodes scholars, and, in a lesser degree as yet, of the Ruskin College students, has strengthened rather than impaired the tender plant of culture.

Secondly, it should be recognised that many of the studies which are most distinctive of the "new Renaissance" cannot be carried on satisfactorily through the medium of books alone. Mathematics, metaphysics, and logic may flourish in any surroundings where men have leisure for contemplation. But history and economics, and even the study of antiquity, demand much that a university of itself cannot give—a knowledge of men and cities as well as of documents, and a faculty of learning by observation and intercourse. Scholars and historians are beginning to take lessons in the market-place and in the islands of the Aegean. This not only improves their conversation, but should help to bridge the chasm between scientific knowledge and the life of the people.—Yours, &c.,

A. E. Z.

Oxford, July 22nd, 1908.

THE WORKING OF THE SMALL HOLDINGS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In the discussion in the House of Commons a few days ago on the administration of the Small Holdings Act, I noticed much complaint was made that so little land had been obtained for holdings by the county councils up to the present, and this fact was used as evidence that the councils were almost all opposed to the Act and endeavouring to make it a "dead letter."

I hold no brief for the county councils, but this argument is scarcely fair as sufficient time has not yet elapsed for the committees of these councils to have got their plans fully matured. One council I know of—which is most anxious to make the Act a thorough success—has not yet obtained an acre of ground. In this district almost all tenancies are Lady Day takes, so notices to quit cannot be given until the spring of 1909 for farms that are required to be split up for Small Holdings purposes, and possession in most cases will not be obtained until 1910. On the other hand, where councils have taken pains to let it be known that they intend to do as little as possible, and where there is ample evidence of these obstructive intentions, the sooner the commissioners get to work the better, so that another year may not be lost to suitable applicants, and land obtained for occupation in 1910.

One way in which the Small Holdings Act, 1907, is working, and of which little or nothing is heard, is that landlords who were hardly ever known to split up farms into small holdings are now doing so to no inconsiderable extent rather than have county council tenants in the middle of their estates, and in one area some thirty or forty county applicants have accepted suitable offers, on as good—if not on better—terms than a county council would be able to offer.

When all applicants for land are supplied, then the question of the success of the holders will very much depend on the extent to which they will organise themselves, and it is to this end that Small Holdings Associations should now be laying their plans. Slow work it will, no doubt, be to get our men to unite together, but it will be from small beginnings that the larger undertakings will arise, and if successful live stock insurance societies could be organised on co-operative lines in our villages, this would, I believe, be the best way of introducing the thin end of the co-operative wedge, and out of them larger societies would arise, similar to those which are such a notable success in Denmark.—Yours, &c.,

Alfred Rowntree, Hon. Sec.,
Yorkshire Small Holdings Association.

July 19th.

SUFFRAGISTS AND THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Most of your anti-Suffragist correspondents seem to ignore one important fact, namely, that our country needs the co-operation of women in its great human causes, foremost of which is the temperance cause.

Why has the drink problem, this "gigantic evil in our midst," been allowed to assume its present proportions? Why has our Legislature, long before now, not restrained this vast monopoly, but allowed it so to grow up in the community as to become a menace to the integrity of our politics and the security of our country, the master rather than the servant of our public life?

Why is it that temperance legislation has been so far behind the temperance work of our country? This is not one of those vague questions that admit of no answer. There is an answer. Women have done splendid work in their various organisations, such as the British Women's Temperance Association, &c., but they have never been able to make that work effectual in the country because of the lack of political power. The backwardness of temperance legislation has, to a large extent, nullified their work. The drink problem is even more vital to women than it is to men, because of racial and domestic considerations. And it is a remarkable fact that wherever the Parliamentary franchise has been extended to women, as in New Zealand, Finland, &c., a decisive temperance legislation has invariably followed.

The ancient Egyptians represented man without woman as a single grindstone—unable to grind alone. And what the temperance cause most needs to-day is the co-operation of women with men, not only in practical temperance work, but also in temperance legislation.

Suffragists are supporting the Demonstration in favor of the Licensing Bill, in Hyde Park, on Saturday, July 25th, and they appeal to all women to join them, in order to show how much the co-operation of women is needed in this cause, and to make clear the fact that their effectual co-operation can only be secured by means of the power of the Parliamentary vote—Man cannot grind with a single grindstone.—Yours, &c.,

Kate A. Hessel.

Hampstead, N.W.,
July 21st, 1908.

THE INDETERMINATE SENTENCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have just read my friend Dr. Morrison's letter in your current number, and ask leave to point what appears to me to be the moral of it.

It is not necessarily an argument against the indeterminate sentence to say that it is not in harmony with English law. English law may not be perfect. And if it is inconsistent with our prison system, some of the wrongs of which Dr. Morrison has done so much to expose and alter, why, then, the answer might be: "So much the worse for our prison system."

Now, to take Dr. Morrison's three specifics for professional criminals. "A milder prison régime" may be very desirable, as compared with the present one; but it will be useless unless it is reformative. Mere mildness will not make it effective. Then, as to "detention extending over the most criminal period of life," the question is: What are we going to do with the man (or boy) under detention? Are we going to treat him to "the suppression of individual will and individual initiative," as Dr. Morrison says we now do, or are we going to cultivate these and give them a chance of growing wholesome? And what does Dr. Morrison mean by "an extension of the principle of conditional liberation"? Conditional on what? Conditional on docility and a broken will, which he tells us are the prison virtues?

Surely all people who think about this grave problem must agree that what we want is, not merely milder treatment, not merely detention at any particular period, but effective reformative treatment. Is it beyond our powers to devise such treatment? And would it be beyond the bounds of possibility, if we had devised and instituted such treatment, to find men who could be trusted to apply it honestly, and to devise safeguards, so that each person should have as much of the treatment as his case needed, and no more?

Will Dr. Morrison tell me that Superintendent Scott, of Elmira, does not know what one of his patients will do when set at liberty? And if he makes a mistake—why, the man is "on parole," and can be recalled.

With the statement that crime is a social disease, I suppose we shall all agree, and that it must be dealt with by social and not penal methods is to me quite obvious. But that is not to say that we should not attempt some reasonable method of cure to the symptoms of the disease.—Yours, &c.,

ARTHUR ST. JOHN.

7, Holly Village, Highgate, N.,
July 21st, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Gladstone's approval of indefinite sentences dates back to the year 1895, when he and Mr. Haldane were members of a Departmental Committee on the subject, the former being the Chairman. But the recommendations of the Committee differ in two respects from the provisions of the Bill, and in both of these I prefer Mr. Gladstone's earlier opinions to his later ones. The recommendation of the Committee is to the effect that when a habitual criminal is convicted, he shall be sentenced to a lengthened term of preventive detention—evidently in lieu of the ordinary sentence. The Bill makes preventive detention an additional punishment, instead of an alternative one. It is, moreover, an optional addition, and, like flogging, will probably be adopted by some judges and not by others. I fail to see the object of this change, the original of which is to be found in the writings of Sir Robert Anderson. The object of our ordinary sentences is understood to be to deter the prisoner from repeating the offence. The object of preventive detention is to protect the public against the depredations of persons who cannot thus be deterred. If we have given up the hope of deterring the prisoner by penal servitude or imprisonment, these punishments become purely vindictive, and the preventive detention ought to commence at once. If we have not given up the hope of deterring him, why not try, on the expiration of his ordinary sentence, whether he has, in fact, been deterred? The two parts of the sentence proceed on opposite principles, and no effort is made to see whether the first part has proved succcessful before entering on the second. It may be replied that we know from previous experience that the first part will not prove successful. Then why try it at all? The Bill proposes to act like a doctor who resolves to try curative treatment on a man's leg for a month, and then to amputate it, irrespective of the effects of this treatment.

But, secondly, the report of the Committee recommends a separate prison for preventive detention, and even makes a suggestion with regard to the most suitable site for one. Mr. Gladstone, judging from his speeches, has not entirely lost sight of this; but there is no provision to this effect in the Bill. Preventive detention is to be penal detention in ordinary prisons, controlled by the ordinary staffs, the ordinary prison rules being relaxed only to the extent to which the Home Secretary thinks fit to relax them. Indeed, he does not seem to be bound to relax them at all. The prisoner's treatment, while undergoing preventive detention, is left as indefinite as the duration of the sentence; but it is clearly to be penal treatment in an ordinary prison. This seems to me to render the initial term of ordinary penal servitude indefensible. I can understand (though I do not agree with it) a contention that a criminal should expiate his offence. I can understand that it may be necessary to lock a man up for a long time in order to protect the public, as is done, for instance, in the case of criminal lunatics. But why should a man first expiate his offence in the usual way, and then be detained for a lengthened period for the protection of the public, but under penal conditions which are not essential to that protection?

The report of the Committee does not define the phrase "habitual criminal," and neither does the Bill. Sir R. Anderson distinguishes two classes of habitual criminals—the utterly weak and the utterly wicked, the latter being otherwise termed "professionals." For the former class Sir Robert advocates preventive detention (in an asylum prison) at once. For the latter, he would have an initial term of penal servitude (if, indeed, the whole detention was not to be of that character). Mr. Gladstone sometimes speaks as if his Bill provided preventive detention for professionals only, but I can see nothing in its provisions to limit its scope to professionals. It will, I think, in practice, mete out to both classes of habituals the treatment which Sir Robert advocated for the worst class only, though even as regards that class he assigns no definite reason for the double punishment, which seems to me indefensible on principle.

As to the prisoner's right of appeal, it will not exist in Scotland or Ireland, and the decisions of the English Court of Appeal have up to the present been marked by extreme reluctance to interfere with any sentence. I look upon this provision, even in England, as nugatory.—Yours, &c.,

B. L.

Dublin, July 21st, 1908.

"THE NEW SPIRIT IN TURKEY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the course of the interesting, and otherwise, I believe, accurate article under the above heading in your issue of the 18th inst., you make statements which I cannot but think ill founded in fact, and which are certainly mischievous in their effect on British influence in the Near East. You state that the Turkish force in Macedonia "massacres Bulgarian bands to the last man," and "allows the Greek and Servian bands to prey on the Bulgarian villages."

I have pointed out before that our strength as a nation in relation to this tangled problem of the European provinces of Turkey largely depends on our retaining the confidence of the minor states of the Near East in our impartiality and disinterestedness; and that even were such statements correct no good purpose can be served by emphasising them.

But I venture to contend that you are seriously misled. Firstly, as to the massacre of Bulgarian bands. Although it appeared a few months ago as though there were a diminution of activity on the part of the comitadjis, it was not due to any efforts put forth by Hilmi Pacha, but to internal dissensions and lack of funds on the part of the rival Bulgarian organisations, and to the renewed overtures for an understanding with Turkey made by the party now in power. This party, to quote from its official organ, the "Courrier de Sofia," of the 11th inst., "is convinced that it is only by entertaining good relationships with Turkey, and not by the action of the bands, that the situation of the Macedonian people can be ameliorated." Now, I am not for the moment concerned to take exception to this policy, if loyally carried out. But I do take exception to your reading of the situation, according to which Bulgarian activity in Macedonia meets with extremely active hostility on the part of the Turks, whereas the Greek movement is encouraged. And when I learn from the "Dnewnik," the "Kampana," and other Bulgarian papers during the past few weeks, of the passage into Macedonia of one armed band after another, under Tchernopeef, Goremtseko, Delgradef, and others, and then hear even more recently of their appearance and baneful activity in districts hitherto recognised as preponderatingly patriarchist, I find it quite difficult to believe either in the sincerity of the new Bulgarian Ministry in carrying out its policy or in the earnestness of the Turkish troops in repressing these Bulgarian bands. How much more difficult, then, is it to credit your statement that the Bulgarian bands are "massacred to a man" by the Turkish pursuing columns.

Then as to the alleged impunity of the Greek and Servian bands. At the present moment there are literally hundreds of Greeks, Servians, and other patriarchists in Turkish gaols, either awaiting trial or serving their sentences, for connection with the bands. Only a fortnight ago the Bulgarian Press related with gusto that Dimitri Rochka and Nicolas Papageorghi had been sentenced to imprisonment for life; that Yorghi Timio had "got ten years"; and that a long string of other patriarchists had received sentences of from one to five years for their alleged complicity in the deeds, or, rather, misdeeds of the antartes. And in the "Courrier" of the 4th inst. I read of the members of a Greek band, captured near Monastir, being sentenced to seven years imprisonment, and in another case, of Leonidas Enthime and Traiko, a courier, receiving five years. And I could quote many other recent cases. True, this isn't "massacring to the last man." But it is hardly impunity to anyone who has the faintest conception of a Turkish prison. And even the Bulgarian organs, for the most part, have given up talking about "complicity" and "impunity." "Greco-Turkish relationships have been for some time past very strained," says the official organ of Mr. Takeff on the 8th inst., and proceeds to enumerate some of the causes, including the Cretan question, the crisis in Samos, and the alleged augmentation of the Greek bands.

I believe, sir, you are in complete agreement with me as to the desirability of putting a stop to the murderous action of the bands, whether Bulgarian, Servian, Greek, Albanian, Roumanian, Turkish, or nondescript. But where and how to begin? That is the problem. I cannot blind myself to the fact that this policy of armed propaganda was begun by the Bulgarians. Then let them be the first to withdraw. The Greeks looked on and restrained themselves for quite six years. But I am absolutely confident, as the result of exhaustive enquiries I have made, that they would not take six months, nor even six weeks, to follow suit were once the Bulgarian comitadjis withdrawn.

But how is this to be brought about? I have as little faith as you in the reforms and mobile columns of the new Anglo-Russian partnership; and feel sure we shall all come eventually to unity on the only just and practical solution, namely, a partition of (what is so loosely called) Macedonia by an International Commission on the basis of the wishes of its people—a solution deemed practicable, I believe, by the President of the Balkan Committee, and one which I should be glad to discuss at closer quarters dared I trespass further on your space.—Yours, &c.,

T. Palmer Newbould.

Broadway Chambers, Ilford.
July 20th, 1908.

"IS THE DRAMA DYING?"

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I heartily agree with Miss Stevens that to read a fine novel or play over the fireside is a completer pleasure than to see the same imperfectly represented on the stage. But is it possible for this pleasure to be universally enjoyed, and is there not a large class of people whose minds are so untrained to reading that this fireside pleasure is beyond their reach?

For these, in my opinion, the theatre exists, and will continue to exist.

Even though "Othello" and "Hamlet" can never be perfectly represented on the stage, it is better for the many who do not read that they should come to know them thus imperfectly, than that they should never come to know them at all.—Yours, &c.,

L. R.

Hartburn, Stockton-on-Tees.
July 22nd, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your three correspondents who replied to my letter on this subject all agree on one point, and that is that it is churlish that we should love better to be alone in the world of fancy rather than hunt pleasure in packs.

They seem to me to forget that, under modern conditions, our whole working life is spent on the market, in the office, the hospital, or the factory. We work in crowds. But the abiding soul in man cries out for times of solitude, in which she may recreate and rediscover herself. Of old, when each dug in his own vineyard, or sat at her own wheel, the gay and thronging crowd was as much a part of the joy as the play itself. To-day, I say we feel the need of quiet in off times rather than hurry and chatter and noise and glare. Therefore, this is one more support to my claim for letting fancy roam in an armchair rather than in stall, pit, or gallery.

Mr. William Poel repeats the Church and Stage doctrine that of all means "of education undoubtedly the greatest is the stage." This is begging the whole question. If the drama is dead, or dying, it is not only not a means of education, but is something which a bringer-up of youth would wish to avoid. And I maintain once more that the novel, which has been called into life by the desire of the imagination to live beautifully in harmony with what is around her, is the happy substitute for the drama. And wisdom is justified of all her children.

The drama in the past has done her great work. To-day the novel is her heiress, and "May she do her work as well,

Both the unseen and the seen,
Make the house where gods may dwell,
Beautiful, entire and clean."

Yours, &c.,
Euphemia Stevens.

Bradfield, July 21st.

GOETHE'S 78th VENETIAN EPIGRAM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I send you a rhymed translation of the 78th Venetian Epigram of Goethe, of which you print an unrhymed version on page 303, May 30th, 1908.

"On the prisms or the plants ever laboring, man,
When you might be a-touching soft hearts, as you can?"

"Any fool can do that. What I work for so much
Is the hem of thy robe, Mother Nature, to touch!"

Yours, &c.,
David Wilson.

Myaungmya, Burma,
June 28th, 1908.

"THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—You do well to open your columns to a full exposê of the motor tyranny. Having the misfortune to live on the Brighton road, I know something about it. Several deaths have been caused in my immediate neighbourhood by motors, one only the other day, when a poor old woman was literally crushed to a jelly by one of these juggernauts. What is the use of arguing about speeds, when the motorist's primary idea is to get along as fast as he can, and his friends will tell you that the great enjoyment of the thing is to rush through the air at lightning speed? Eight, or even ten, miles an hour is "child's play" to them, although it is fast enough for decent people, who are contented to sit behind one of God's noblest creations, the horse.

Perhaps the worst effects of the motor blight are to be seen in the country, where the devastation wrought by it is complete. For years I have been in the habit of staying at one of the quietest of Sussex watering places, where a holiday could really be enjoyed to the full by a weary man seeking peace. The place stands back from the sea, with a main road running between it and the beach. It swarms with children in the season, who have to cross this road, and whose parents or guardians are kept in a constant state of nervous tension lest they are run over, for the road is infested by motor cars, motor cycles, motor omnibuses, traction engines, and so forth. Preferring a country walk to the beach, I used the road, which has no side walk at many parts. But I found myself so constantly driven into the hedge by passing motors, and the dust was so intolerable, that I had to give up walking, and, in fact, confine myself to my rooms. Where the enjoyment of motoring comes in, when you have to arm yourself to the teeth, goggle yourself to the eyebrows, and stuff your nose against the stink of petrol fumes, I fail to see. The sights and sounds and smell of Nature do not exist for the motorist, whose organs and senses are destroyed for the moment by the very means he has adopted to secure his enjoyment. What I have said of my favorite seaside resort is true of every other place similarly situated, and, in fact, country life generally has been destroyed, not only for visitors, but for country dwellers, and especially for the little children whose only playground is the public road.

Then, there is the farmer. He has been hit in several ways, inasmuch as there is a lessened demand for the horses he breeds, and for the fodder he grows; while his hedges and the crops abutting on the high road are affected by the showers of dust which settle upon them. Finally, if there is any finality about the matter, he has to pay for the maintenance and repair of the roads cut up by the very persons who are injuring him in these other directions. At least, motorists ought to pay for these repairs, and this reminds me that, in the district in which I reside, the roads are at this moment being coated with tar, at the expense of the ratepayers. There should certainly be a "road tax" on all motors, and it passes comprehension why an imperial tax has not been laid on them long ago. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has admitted that he is on the look-out for a hen-roost to rob, against next year's Budget, and he could not do better than look in at the various motor garages throughout the country, besides putting a thousand or two per annum on a certain motor racecourse, which, by the cupidity of a single individual, has laid waste one of the most beautiful districts of this beautiful, but motor-infested, country. Mr. Lloyd-George need not be afraid of hurting the poor by this operation, because the only people affected would be a parcel of rich vulgarians, who fly through the country as though the roads were made for them and their "infernal machines," as Sir Theodore Martin has very properly designated them.—Yours, &c.,

R. W. J.

Surrey, July 18th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The answers that have been attempted to your admirable articles on "The Lost Liberty of the Road," and other apologies for the ways of the motorist which I have read or heard, lead irresistibly to the conclusion that motoring sets up a mental dry-rot in those who practise it, which eats away their moral sense and their reasoning faculty, at least in all that concerns their pastime. How else can one explain the statements they make, and the arguments they use, apparently in good faith, and in the innocent belief that they are offering a convincing defence?

For instance, one motorist confidently assures us that speed has nothing to do with the power of pulling up in a short distance. Every person not grossly ignorant knows that speed has everything to do with it. Had speed nothing to do with the case of the motor last week that killed the old woman of seventy-nine, and could not stop till it had dragged her mangled corpse fifty yards?

Several motorists have declared that the opposition to the motor is due to the same blind prejudice that objected to railways, and would obstruct all progress. No man in possession of his reasoning faculties could honestly advance a contention so silly as this.

First, the railways are not an amusement of the rich, they are for the use of the whole community. Secondly, they are strictly limited to narrow enclosed spaces, and risk of accident is confined to those who work on them and those who use them. The motor infests every road and lane in the country, ruining their charm for all other users of them, filling them with noise, dust and stench, and rendering them so perilous as to exclude from their use large numbers who have hitherto enjoyed them. As to the depreciation of property, which Lord Russell strangely denies, we hear of it on all sides. A friend of mine owns a house in a beautiful part of the country which he has let regularly every year for a season at eleven guineas a week. He told me last week that now his neighbourhood is so desolated by motors that he cannot let the house.

Another argument exhibiting the same decay in the reasoning powers is one I have met with several times on the subject of accidents. Or, rather, there are two such arguments on that point. First, when motors were much fewer than now, but the proportion of accidents high, motorists would give the actual number of accidents caused by motors and compare them with the actual number caused by other vehicles, without paying any regard to the enormously greater number of the ordinary vehicles. Any child could correct such a fallacy, but it is not more disingenuous than the later contention that, in comparing the two, allowance must be made for the greater distances covered in the same time by the motors. This greater distance in the time (i.e., the greater speed) is the gravamen of their offence and the cause of the accidents, and they gravely ask us to count this in their favor.

In the matter of sickening stench, the motorist seems to think it quite sufficient to allege (without evidence) that it does not injure health. Some time ago the police on duty in places in the city where there were frequent stoppages of traffic, including many motors, petitioned to be allowed to change about to other parts because they suffered torture from sick headaches.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY HOLIDAY.

Oak Tree House, Hampstead.
July 20th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Nothing of late has interested me so much as the correspondence in your paper on this subject. Like the writer of the article of June 6th, I am one of the "hunted," and have had my own experience of what the motorist is. My coachman, too, was knocked down the other day when close to the footpath, was badly bruised and shaken, and narrowly escaped with his life.

But the remedy for all this? The writer of the article says, that a "long and uphill fight" lies before us, if this tyranny is to be overthrown. Who so fit, then, as THE NATION and its staff to lead in the formation of a National Association for regaining the liberty of the road? Funds for this fight will be forthcoming in abundance.—Yours, &c.,

Sutton Coldfield, July 23rd, 1908. S. D. W.

THE COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Many of your readers, both lawyers and laymen, who welcomed the establishment of the Court of Criminal Appeal and have followed its working with satisfaction, will have noticed with regret that the Lord Chief Justice is carrying through the House of Lords a Bill which makes an important alteration in the constitution of the new Court. At present it consists of the Lord Chief Justice and eight Judges of the King's Bench Division, appointed for the purpose by the Lord Chief Justice with the consent of the Lord Chancellor. It is now proposed that all the Judges of the King's Bench Division should be Judges of the Court of Criminal Appeal. The present Common Law Bench is notoriously less strong in its personnel than at some periods of our legal history, but, were it stronger than it is, it would, I venture to think, be a mistake to regard all its members as necessarily qualified for the task of hearing criminal appeals and revising sentences. This is obviously a kind of work for which special qualities and also special experience are required, and many of the Common Law Judges will be the first to acknowledge that they possess neither in the requisite degree. On the other hand, there would be very little difficulty in choosing half a dozen, or even eight Judges, who would be recognised by their colleagues as having exceptional fitness for the position. One object which it was hoped to attain through the new Court, was a reduction in the present glaring disparities between sentences. This may, perhaps, be corrected by bringing the minds of the Common Law Judges into joint stock on the subject, but the standard arrived at in this way—a sort of rough give and take, which the competent and the less competent will have an equal share in shaping—will not be nearly so satisfactory and educated as would be one arrived at by a smaller body with steadily increasing knowledge and authority. I hope that when the Lord Chief Justice's Bill comes down to the House of Commons, its provisions may receive the examination and criticism of which they seem to stand very much in need.—Yours, &c.,

July 22nd, 1908. A Criminal Lawyer.

THE LICENSING BILL AND TEMPERANCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—As a reader of The Nation, and a Liberal who finds it difficult to discover any point of view from which the present Licensing Bill before the House of Commons is other than deplorable, I would ask you for enlightenment in regard to the note on page 438 of your current issue. You there describe the statements of Mr. Balfour that the Bill confiscates property, and that it is hostile to temperance, as being contradictory.

At the end of the period of the time limit, after 30,000 licences have been eliminated with compensation estimated at one-tenth of that awarded by the Act of 1904, the remaining licences are to be treated as new licences, and are only regranted on payment of the monopoly value. The monopoly value representing the market value of a licence may be regarded as property. This monopoly value has in nearly all cases been bought and paid for as part of the market value at which they were acquired by the present holders, and to take the licences away and only regrant them on repayment, and describe the process as anything but confiscatory, seems simply euphemistic. The other ground of Mr. Balfour's argument to which you refer is that the Bill will not be productive of true temperance. Few people assert that it will, or think that it may. The principal supporters claim no more than that it will clear the ground for experiment. That it is hostile to true temperance is surely clear, for reducing the number of public-houses without regard to the needs of particular districts would surely have the effect of driving those who have used the public-house into those places where the supply of drink is unsupervised and unregulated, i.e., the clubs. These two arguments do not seem to me to be contradictory.—Yours, &c.,

The Bungalow, Leatherhead, J. W. Wilson.

July 1st, 1908.

POLITICS IN A HURRY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The Socialists and the Suffragettes want things to go faster. But the means they adopt make things go slower. Unconsciously they may even produce a retrograde political movement, and thereby aid the forces of Conservatism. All progressive people are painfully aware of the shortcomings of the present Liberal Government, and it is right to criticise and use pressure. But it is the great tragedy of our politics that reaction may be produced by the very people who are most in earnest concerning reforms. If the Suffragettes and the Socialists will back up the Government then there is surely more hope for their reforms. But, otherwise, how can we blame members of the Government if they say as a consequence of bad by-elections that—after all, the country is not ready, and you cannot push John Bull faster than he is inclined to go. Then is the opportunity of the Whigs, as in the great split of 1886, when Mr. Gladstone hurried things on through the pressure of the Parnellite Party. The Liberal Party were demolished and Ireland had an extra dose of coercion in spite of the curious bidding for Irish support against Liberalism by Conservative leaders. This Government want encouragement and time to carry out their programme. And yet one man will think that his particular hobby will have a better chance if he helps a Tory Party to power. And another man will have an idea that his special reform may, perhaps, come if he votes for the other man at election time. We must punish the Liberal Ministers, and, of course, the same result takes place as in the past. The politician in a hurry gets punished worst of all.—Yours, &c., Edwin Hill.

Leamington.

IMPERIAL POLITICS AT MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Nearly all over the country, complaints are made that it is almost useless to vote for honest and efficient candidates at municipal elections, on account of Imperial politics being imported into the contests. It was the late Lord Salisbury who gave the cue to this course by importing politics into municipal elections.

In his speech at Queen's Hall, Langham Place, London, on November 7th, 1894 (on the eve of L.C.C. elections), he said:—

> "We cannot now keep politics out of these elections. . . . . We must not be shy of using all our political power and machinery for the purpose of importing sound principles into the government of London. . . . It is our duty in all these elections to act as a party, and to vote as in the election of members to Parliament."

Ergo, the qualification of Moderate candidates is that they must be party politicians, but from facts we know that Toryism is the arch-enemy in municipal matters (particularly) in London.

It is a pity that political jugglery should be allowed to play such a heavy part in the internal government of the country, when useful legislation is preferable to party triumph.—Yours, &c., Albert Raphael.

National Liberal Club,

July 21st, 1908.

Poetry.

BE NOT AFRAID.

Be not afraid; it was some wise
  Daemon amid that glade of Fate
Tore off the bandage from our eyes
  And stamped us mate and mate.

I am all yours. I kneel, I burn,
  Feel every naked rushing nerve
And tendril of my being yearn
  For you; for you I starve!

I am all yours. What creature else
  Exists but you? Passion divine
Pursued through half-a-thousand hells
  I make, I keep you mine!

Endless you yield what else none gives,
  That torturing, acutest bliss
That quenches self-hood while it lives
  Enheavened in your kiss.

So as the eagle on his ledge
  Huddles and broods above his prey
Eternal terrors in me rage
  Lest some one take away;

Lest I be not the universe
  For you (as you, my mate, for me)
Of every sense—all that confers
  This fearful ecstasy.

None other living shall feel thus
  The blaze consummate light the breast.
For like Death I am covetous
  Of this too perfect zest;
None shall share what possesses us
  Nor what I have possessed!

Herbert Trench.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

"HUMAN NATURE IN POLITICS" is the title of an important work which Messrs. Constable will publish early in the autumn from the pen of Mr. Graham Wallas, who since his release from his long and arduous labors on the London School Board, has devoted most of his time to this literary task. By a close analysis of existing forces and tendencies he presents a new statement of the problem of democracy, discussing many of those questions of individual and social psychology to which French Sociologists, like Gabriel Tarde, have given prominence, but which in this country have hardly begun to get clear recognition as subjects of scientific study. The fresh light thrown by recent experiments in government upon such problems as the proper position of the expert in legislation and administration, the struggle of interests in politics, and the new possibilities of international relations, will form the subject matter of several chapters. The general result of his criticisms of democracy is, we gather, to correct the overemphasis laid by crude equalitarianism upon the operations of the popular will, and to secure proper recognition for the individual elements in political judgment and control.

* * *

To the large number of books about Napoleon already announced as in preparation for the autumn must be added a translation of the "Memoirs of the Comte de Rambuteau," which will be published in this country by Messrs. Dent, and by Messrs. Putnam's Sons in America. Rambuteau was Napoleon's Chamberlain, and his memoirs give an animated account of the doings of the Imperial Court, both by way of informal amusement and public entertainment. The skill he showed in organising balls and fêtes conciliated many of the old aristocratic families who were attracted by the theatrical splendour of Napoleon's Court. The book gives an excellent picture of the society of the day, but its main interest is the light it throws upon Napoleon's character. Rambuteau had exceptional opportunities of seeing him in his everyday relations, and these opportunities were turned to excellent account.

* * *

AN unpublished work of Nietzsche, bearing the title, "Ecce Homo: Wie Man Wird, Man Ist," has been edited and prepared for publication by Professor R. Richter, and will be issued towards the end of next month. No arrangements have as yet been made for an English translation, but, considering the revival of interest in Nietzsche lately evident, it is probable that a translation will appear. In the meantime Mr. Fisher Unwin, who publishes the collected edition of Nietzsche's works, announces a book called "The Philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche," by Mr. Henry L. Mencken. It is partly biographical and partly expository, showing the growth of Nietzsche's views in his own mind, and setting forth their bearing upon practical affairs. In the last part an attempt is made to trace the origin of the Nietzschean philosophy in other thinkers, to estimate its present influence and its possible developments in the future.

* * *

"MR. APOLLO: A JUST POSSIBLE STORY," is the title of a novel by Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer now in the press. It discusses the religious thought of this country by means of a series of conversations between Apollo, who suddenly appears in London, and representatives of various scientific and theological creeds. Among those with whom Apollo comes in contact is Lord Aldington, the chief controller of the English yellow press. He believes in Apollo's pretensions, and promises that next morning all the placards of "The Daily Outlook" will be headed "A God in London." On reflection, however, he comes to the conclusion that the British public could never be induced to believe the statement, no matter how true it was, and he decides to boom the Zanzigs instead of Apollo. The conclusion reached by Mr. Hueffer is that science having almost destroyed religion, has now almost destroyed atheism, and that so deeply rooted is the sceptical attitude that it would not be convinced either to belief or disbelief by even the most irrefragable evidence.

MANY readers who enjoy Mr. Hilaire Belloc's brilliant political satire are of opinion that he appears to still greater advantage as an essayist, especially when he treats of open-air subjects. They will be glad to hear that Mr. Belloc is preparing a new volume of essays which, under the title of "The Eye Witness," will be published in the autumn by Mr. Eveleigh Nash.

* * *

IN a biography of Rousseau published a couple of years ago, Mrs. Frederika Macdonald attempted not unsuccessfully to clear the memory of Jean Jacques from some of the worst charges that lie against it. She has now made a collection of maxims and principles from Rousseau's writings illustrative of his ideas and convictions concerning education, society, and religion. The extracts have been chosen with the object of showing that the criticism of the past fifty years has misrepresented the true foundation of Rousseau's philosophy of life. The book is to be published by Messrs. Dent, and will have the title "The Human Philosophy of Jean Jacques Rousseau."

* * *

A LIFE of Pope Gregory VII. is to be published in the autumn by Mr. Francis Griffiths. The author is the Right Rev. Arnold Harris Mathew, the recently consecrated Bishop of the Old Catholic Church in this country. The book is to be called "The Napoleon of the Church"—a title possibly suggested by Guizot, who described Hildebrand as "the Czar Peter of the Church." Bishop Harris makes use of some documents that have not hitherto been printed, but apart from any fresh material that may be brought to light, the book will be interesting as giving an Old Catholic estimate of the victor of Canossa and the chief agent in forming the policy that was pressed to its logical conclusion at the Vatican Council of 1870.

* * *

WE are pleased to see that Messrs. Longmans are to issue in September a new volume by the authors of "Some Reminiscences of an Irish R.M." Few writers of our day have shown greater skill in reproducing the rollicking side of modern Irish life—indeed, they may be said to have almost re-discovered the Lever touch. If "Further Reminiscences of an Irish R.M." is anything like its predecessor it is certain of a warm welcome.

* * *

BOOKS on gardening illustrated by artists of repute have been greatly in vogue during the past season. Apparently there is a large public for such works, and several of them are announced for the autumn. One of the most promising is "Scottish Gardens," by Sir Herbert Maxwell, of which Mr. Edward Arnold is to be the publisher. Sir Herbert Maxwell is both a brilliant and poetic writer, and an expert gardener. The book will be illustrated in color from drawings by Miss M. G. Wilson.

* * *

A BIOGRAPHY of Jonas Lie, the great Norwegian writer who died a few weeks ago, is being prepared by his son, Erik Lie, and will be issued during the present year. A large selection of Jonas Lie's letters will be included.

* * *

A SELECTION from the letters of Oscar Wilde, which Mr. Robert Ross is preparing for the press, will be published during the early autumn.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"George Grenfell and the Congo." By Sir Harry Johnston. (Hutchinson. 2 vols. 30s. net.)

"The Twentieth Century American." By H. Perry Robinson. (Putnam's Sons. 7s. 6d.)

"Impressions of Henry Irving." By Walter Herries Pollock. (Longmans. 3s. 6d. net.)

"Dorothea Beale of Cheltenham." By Elizabeth Raikes. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)

"International Problems and Hague Conferences." By T. J. Lawrence. (Dent. 3s. 6d. net.)

"Memories of Gardens." By Alexander Innes Shand. (The West Strand Publishing Company. 10s. 6d. net.)

"A Short History of the English Bar." By Bernard Kelly. (Sonnenschein. 2s. 6d.)

"The Singular Republic." By W. H. Koebel. (Griffiths. 6s.)

"Le Valeur de l'Art." Par Guillaume Dubufe. (Paris: Flammarion. 3 fr. 50.)

"L'Espoir." Roman. Par Georges Lecomte. (Paris: Fasquelle. 3 fr. 50.)

"Erziehung der modernen Seele." Von. A. Horneffer. (Leipzig: Klinkhardt. M. 5.)

Reviews.

BONAPARTE IN HIS PRIME.*

The Duc de Broglie remarked in his memoirs that the four years of the Consulate, together with the reign of Henry IV., formed the golden periods of French history. The remark does no more than justice to the great work of reconstruction which forms the glory of Bonaparte. It is curious how much attention has been bestowed on the military triumphs of Napoleon, brilliant at the time, but fraught with disaster for France in the near future. The natural bent of a certain order of minds towards the petty and personal has also received striking illustration in their absorption in the trivial disputes of St. Helena. I sympathise with the remark of Dr. Fortescue, in his Introduction, that it would have been well for Napoleon, and conducive to the cause of truth, if all the literature emanating from, or relating to, Longwood had been left unwritten or promptly burnt. It is fairer to the man, as well as more illuminating for mankind, to take him at his best, to survey his great and permanent achievements, rather than to pry into the squabbles and dwell on the partisan pamphlets of his declining years.

In the present work we see Bonaparte in his prime. He had a unique opportunity before him. France, owing to the eager strifes of her factions, and the wars resulting from their aggressive policy, had never had a chance of settling down peacefully on the basis of democracy. The parties had been so intent on their own aggrandisement and the destruction of opponents, that they had almost forgotten the nation. No period was more barren of practical results, more fruitful in disillusionment, than that of the Directory after the coup d'état of Fructidor (September, 1797). The men who forced themselves on France rejected a peace which Pitt was most anxious to conclude. They plunged into aggressive courses in Italy and Switzerland, which provoked the War of the Second Coalition, and then showed their inability to cope with the difficulties which they themselves had raised. Only one constructive effort marks their time of supremacy, viz., the Act for enforcing almost universal military service—an enactment which Dr. Fortescue should have noted in his account of their doings given in his Introduction. This measure laid the foundation of the military fabric on which Bonaparte was to build; and, as Dr. Fortescue notes, France was saved from invasion by Masséna's victory at Zurich before the hero returned from his eastern adventures. It is, of course, easy to exaggerate here; and Thibaudeau, when he speaks of everything before the Consulate as being in tumult, disorder and anarchy, forgot that some progress had been made in the summer of 1799 under the lead of Sièyes. It should always be remembered that the writers of the Consular period had every reason for decrying the men who governed before them, and we shall, therefore, never get a fair view of things as they really were before the coup d'état of Brumaire. The work of scores of memoir writers and publicists has had its effect even on the monumental work of M. Vandal, "L'Avènement de Bonaparte."

Nevertheless, it is in the main true that nearly everything in the way of organisation had to be done by the First Consul, as regards local government, law, finance, public works, the navy, the colonies, education, and the religious question. It is the glory of Bonaparte that he associated his name indelibly with all of these undertakings. The chief value of Thibaudeau's memoirs, the part of which relating to the Consulate now for the first time appears in English, lies in his presentation of the motives which prompted the First Consul to the inception of his enterprises, the method of their accomplishment, and something of their results. No work gives a fuller and more accurate account of the procedure at the Council of State, that workshop of Government where Bonaparte displayed his many-sided energies to full advantage. The confidential character of many of Thibaudeau's notes on its debates is seen by the pains which he took at that time to preserve his anonymity.

In some respects the memoirs are disappointing. They deal scarcely at all with finance—a subject on which those of Gaudin and Mollien hold the first place. For the public works and similar efforts, those of Chaptal are far better, besides revealing more of Bonaparte's personality. But no volumes, not even those of Locré, Pelet, and Fauriel, show us so much of the working of the Council of State and the First Consul's share in it. Take, for instance, the account given in Chapter VI. of the rather half-hearted efforts made for elementary education. Thibaudeau was an expert on this subject, having worked at it in the Committee of the Convention. Chaptal presented a scheme for the foundation of 23,000 elementary or municipal schools, at a cost of no more than 5,000,000 francs a year, and 200 secondary schools or colleges. Napoleon scouted this plan, probably on account of expense, and the well-known system of lycées came into vogue. His views on economy were somewhat drastic, witness his statement that a technical school should not cost more than 400 francs a head per annum. It is noteworthy that he entirely excluded religion and instruction by the clergy from his system, though at that time (1801-2) the Concordat was taking its final shape. This part of the memoirs does not deal with that truly Napoleonic foundation, the University of France (1808).

More interesting, perhaps, to the general reader are those sections in which Thibaudeau dwells on the formation of the Consular Court and the doings of its chief personages. His narrative cannot be termed attractive. Napoleon hit off his character when he called his oratory vehement but cold. The medallion of him in the frontispiece shows a critical, eager, and rather anxious face, unlikely to warm beholders, and his style rarely illumines a subject. Yet Thibaudeau had an observant eye. He noted when the three Consuls were making their first State entry to the Tuilleries that they had to use cabs, the official numbers of which were concealed by paper. He remarked on the caution of the Second Consul, Cambacérès, in refusing to reside at the palace because Bonaparte was certain soon to need it all. In his pages we see the First Consul ever busy at daily reviews of troops, receptions, and council meetings; and we watch the swift transformation of the simple and awkward little Court of those early days into the splendour that marked the later Consular régime. But is it possible that the change was distasteful to Josephine? Is there one reader of M. Masson's elaborate work on her who can believe the curious mot here attributed to her (page 11), "How all this bores me. I never have a moment to myself. I was born to be the wife of a workman"? If this was the real Josephine, she is the most misrepresented woman in modern history. More convincing is Thibaudeau's portraiture of Bonaparte as always interesting the Court, "As soon as he had gone all fell flat. His conversation was seldom gay or jesting, but he had a wonderful charm of manner. Nothing that he said was conventional or futile. There was originality and depth in his lightest word, which made all that he said worth remembering and easy to remember."

Unfortunately, Thibaudeau was no Boswell. We have here few of Napoleon's lighter utterances. The value of the memoirs lies in their revelation of Bonaparte as the founder of institutions, planning them wisely, and defending them often with persuasive and illuminating eloquence. Of his statesmanlike utterances none is more striking than that given on pages 142—146, in defence of his proposal of the Legion of Honor. In reply to Berlier, who had denounced it as an infraction of the idea of equality which had always been necessary to the preservation of free republics, the First Consul defied Berlier to point out a single republic which had not granted distinctions for public services. Brutus, he said, was not a democrat, but an aristocrat, who killed Cæsar for seeking to diminish the authority of the Senate. As for any comparison between the French and the republic of the Ancient World, it was absurd. The revolution had not changed the nature of Frenchmen. They were what the Gauls were. Their one sentiment was "Honor." The State must utilise this sentiment. It was time to found new institutions in defence of the State, and the Legion of Honor would answer this purpose. It is in speeches like these that we discern the causes of the success of Bonaparte. He understood men, most of all, Frenchmen.

Dr. Fortescue has edited these memoirs with care and discrimination. His Introduction prepares the reader for

* Bonaparte and the Consulate." By A. C. Thibaudeau. Translated and edited by G. K. Fortescue, LL.D. Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.

the narrative, and the "Note on the Constitution of the year VIII. (December, 1799)" will be appreciated by students. The footnotes are also unusually full and informing.

J. Holland Rose.

THE FIRST IRISH DEMOCRAT.*

Mr. Sheehy Skeffington may, or may not, have been surprised at the thunder-shower of criticism with which his book has been received in certain quarters in Ireland. He ought to have expected it, for, in writing what he very accurately describes as "a primer of Davitt's ideas," he has spared nobody. Davitt has not yet passed into history, or out of politics. His public career was eminently a battle and a march. He lived under arms; and when he died he left behind him many struggles yet undecided, many eager disciples, and many enemies still sore from his blows. The task undertaken in this book was, therefore, in the nature of cutting through living tissue. Disciples and enemies alike have had their word to say upon it; and condemnation has come also from a still more important class—those political friends of Davitt who declined to be disciples, and who found him always fearless but not always right. And so from different standpoints Mr. Skeffington has been denounced as an anti-cleric, an anti-Parnellite, a cosmopolitan democrat and so forth, an anti-Nationalist, a libeller of the dead, a betrayer of confidences, a doctrinaire who has used Davitt's tombstone as a platform on which to advertise his own views and his own vanity.

All this seems to us very extravagant. Mr. Skeffington obviously writes within certain limitations. He has a distaste for nuances; a passion for broad, firm lines and pronounced colors; a temperamental need for arranging things, political and psychological, into neat sections, with labels about which there can be no mistake. Most lives are a mixture, as Hegel said, of reason and unreason, but Mr. Skeffington would refuse to see his master under the light of that law. Davitt must be shown as always reasonable and always right—except, perhaps, when he induced Lord Morley to make "popular" magistrates in 1893. The effect of all this is to give his book an air of undue simplification. It reads like a novel, bound together by a plot of the strictest logic, and one misses the chaotic heave of real history. Bias also comes in as an inevitable by-product; for, if Davitt was always right, those who did not agree with him, and especially Parnell, must have been wrong. Mr. Skeffington is, in fact, opaque to Parnell. But these defects are easily forgiven for the qualities to which they attach. All allowances made, this book remains, with its clear writing, admirable arrangement, fine enthusiasm, and entire absence of fear, a remarkable contribution to the literature of Irish politics.

What did Davitt achieve? The detailed answer would fill two volumes, but it can be compressed into two sentences. He found the Irish countryside peopled by serfs, and left it peopled by men. He opened out to the democracies of Ireland and England the path to reconciliation. It is not necessary to recapitulate the list of Irish Land Acts. One may say summarily that their effect has been to tear down the whole fabric of feudalism in Ireland and rebuild its agrarian system on democratic foundations. Many wills and minds joined in the making of this revolution, but the main credit of it must always belong to Michael Davitt. From the Gladstone Act of 1881 to the Wyndham Act of 1903, there was not one measure of agrarian reform but sprang from the seed flung abroad by the Irishtown meeting at which the Mayo Land League was started in April 20th, 1879. Davitt was, in a strictly literal sense, the "Liberator of the Irish peasant." At the same time it must not be forgotten that, as regards the form which the settlement of the land question assumed, he was utterly defeated. The motto which the Land League inscribed on its banners was, "The Land for the People." Davitt differed from most of his followers, and differed from Parnell, in taking the formula seriously. He was for land nationalisation, and not for a peasant proprietary. Parnell beat him almost out of public life upon this issue in 1884. "I still hold fondly and firmly to this great principle," Davitt wrote in 1902, "and I believe a national ownership to be the only true meaning of the battle-cry of the Land League—'The Land for the People'—but there are some faiths which cannot move Irish mountains, and I have to confess that mine has proved to be one of them."

His work in England in the labor movement was a noble influence rather than a concrete success. His "Labor World," established in 1890, had but a brief life, in part, no doubt, because it came before its time. Irish politics and journalistic work left him no time to renew the experiment until the last General Election, when he made a platform campaign in support of Labor candidates of every color, from Mr. John Burns to Mr. Hyndman. But he always remained the chief link of union between the Irish and English masses.

His life was crowded with a thousand other activities. There were few parts of the world that he had not seen as political envoy or newspaper correspondent. A considerable list of books stands to his credit in the libraries, the best in a largely human point of view being "Leaves from a Prison Diary," the most ambitious and important, "The Fall of Feudalism." If we are to accept Mr. Skeffington's statement, death found him busy with plans for a task greater, in some respects, than even the Land War, an organised campaign against clericalism. The battle-ground was to be education. Certain preliminary skirmishes point in that direction, especially the fierce controversy in which Bishop O'Dwyer of Limerick showed how little dignity, good taste, or Christian restraint were needed to raise a man to the episcopal bench. Davitt, it appears, would have fought for two things, popular control of primary education, and the secular system. On the first he would have carried the support of every new force in Ireland; on the second he would have been opposed and defeated by some of his own sincerest followers. It may be doubted whether he was the man for this task of re-adjusting the relations between the Catholic priests and the educated laity in Ireland. The circumstances of his life had not equipped him with the wide, calm culture, and depth of meditative experience, out of which that reformer must come. It is only right to say that, much misrepresented as he was, he was always a fervent, and even a narrow, Catholic. The present writer recalls a conversation about two months before his death, with Davitt striking his hand on the table and insisting, almost angrily, "Catholicity is the only spiritual religion, the only spiritual religion in the world!"

Lowell has called Lincoln America's first Republican Davitt may very well be called, as his disciple in substance calls him, Ireland's first Democrat. He was a Fenian unashamed; in the mid-heat of the wave of feverish Imperialism which brought about the South African War, he had a hand in international intrigues against England which might have sent him to the scaffold for high treason. But that was not his ultimate dream. War and the waste of war, national and racial hatreds were utterly abhorrent to him. How much he had to forgive England can be understood only by those who read his account, published in 1878, of what he saw and suffered in Millbank and Dartmoor. But in the end he did forgive, or, rather, acquit of all guilt, the democracy of England. He left a positive message not to be found in Tone, Mitchell, Lalor, or even Davis; and beyond doubt, it is as the pioneer of peace between two nations that he would most desire to be remembered.

* "Michael Davitt, Revolutionary, Agitator, and Labor Leader." By F. Sheehy-Skeffington. Fisher Unwin 7s. 6d net.

"LIONS AND WORSE."*

In many respects this is a more worthy book than any that the author has yet given us. In it Mr. Selous endeavours to make some reparation to the many lions he has slain by giving us an estimate of the species that now and then is almost directed from the lion's point of view. At the best, the notebook that is tied to the rifle sling must give but a keeper's-larder kind of account of the animal it deals with. Gun-room natural history is proverbially superficial, and its best excuse can be urged when its subjects are the large and dangerous mammalia that the pacific naturalist can scarcely study at close quarters.

We can expect very little natural history on the subject of such rare and distant creatures as the inyala of which

* "African Nature Notes and Reminiscences." By Frederic Courtney Selous, F.Z.S. Macmillan. 10s. net.

Mr. Selous has only shot two. "I saw amongst the grass and bush," he writes, "what I knew to be an inyala doe, as I could distinctly see it was reddish in color. . . . As I required two specimens of inyala does, the one for the British and the other for the South African Museum, I lost no time about firing." As soon as he had slain the doe, a male inyala sprang to his feet. There was an exciting moment of reloading, "and, as I raised my rifle once more, and took a quick and careful sight on his dark shoulder, I felt as I pulled the trigger that he was mine."

Mr. Selous has shot far more lions, and some knowledge of their habits is rather more essential both for offensive and defensive reasons. From his notebook concerning these therefore a good deal of interesting matter can be gleaned, and we are grateful to President Roosevelt, to whom he had showed his notes, for having insisted on their publication. The roaring lion is generally little to be dreaded. He is usually the full lion giving grace after meat. At such times they pass roaring quite close to the camp, whose smouldering fire they ignore, making the Kaffirs' "hearts die," while the experienced hunter is lulled to sleep by "the grandest of all earthly music." Far more to be dreaded is the silent lion, the first hint of whose presence may be his teeth crashing through the skull as he drags his supper away from close beside the camp fire. With leonine exploits of this kind the book abounds, as also with the lion that charges his assailant in open day—a charge that becomes more than a little exciting when his assailant is a Matabele warrior armed only with assegai and shield.

Beside the lion even the buffalo and the rhinoceros are tame victims of the rifle. As a foe to civilisation the tsetse fly is more potent than all of them, and one of the most interesting chapters of the book is that which traces, with a care that seems irrefutable, the connection between the buffalo and this death-dealing insect. We have had proposals lately to destroy all the game in large African districts in order to be rid of this cattle pest. But if only half the cases given by Mr. Selous are watertight, the sole connection between the buffalo and the tsetse is clearly established. Sebitwane, for instance, destroyed the buffalo up to the Zambesi, and established his cattle posts as far as Linyanti. Then the Barotse, under Sepopo, exterminated the Makololo, and gave back the country to the buffalo—and the tsetse. In 1879 the author found the fly swarming at Linyanti, and in 1899, when the rinder pest had destroyed the buffalo, Mr. Percy Reid finds once more that the tsetse is extinct there. A single bite from this insect usually means a lingering death to the ox, while man can sustain many without suffering more than a thinness of the blood and a wasting of flesh, from which he recovers on reaching non-fly country. Mr. Selous describes the marked effect on his own blood of a rather long exposure to the attention of the insects. His nose having bled in the night, he found in the morning "that the blood which had come from me was not blood at all, but slimy, yellow-looking stuff. It was exactly like the blood of a 'fly-stuck' donkey which I had shot some years before at Daka."

Such are a few of these jottings from a big-game hunter's notebook. With their compilation the glamour of the wild has come upon Mr. Selous, and he does not conclude the book without a quite poetic longing for the old days that can be no more. The luxurious saloon carriage that carries us to the Victoria Falls is all very well, "but no man will ever again sit by a camp fire near one of the little rivers the railway will cross, eating prime pieces of fat elephant's heart, roasted on a forked stick, nor watch the great white rhinoceroses coming down to drink just before dark, nor lie and listen to herd after herd of elephants drinking and bathing in the river near their camp."

COMIC VERSE.*

The Comic Muse lives by the study of incongruities. To borrow an illustration from a living wit, a man can but laugh when he sees his best friend walk up the College Chapel with a pious look in front and an antimacassar behind. The earliest example, the "Battle of the Frogs and the Mice" takes a burlesque form. The lengthy and sonorous epithets of Homeric speech, which have no parallels in an analytic language like our own, are transferred, unchanged or in parody, from the fights of heroes to the small deer of the field and the marsh. The effect is like that of Calverley's heroic line:

"O Beadle of the Burlington Arcade,"

a line rivalled in dignity by a by-product of the Midland Railway Company, the legend on its Western express:

"Bradford and Leeds and Birmingham and Bristol."

Of late years a garbling and skinflint painter has ruined the verse by omiting the conjunctions. It may be that the sense of the magnificent expired at Derby with its rejection of Sir William Harcourt.

The limits of comic verse are not easy to define. It covers the whole ground of the laughable from the most harmless infantility to the most ferocious satire. The same piece, as "Little Jack Horner," may be to the child a matter of innocent merriment and to the man a biting stroke. There is much serious satire that is by no means comic. Even the enjoyment which contemporaries found in Dryden's "Zimri," can hardly have moved them to hearty laughter, and we who never saw the Duke of Buckingham, though we delight in the verses, find our muscles unmoved. Of Buckingham's inconsistencies we are no less aware than was Dryden, but we have not the man before our eyes. Again, our sense of the incongruous varies with the age and country, and, like other faculties, it needs education. The footman who landed in France found something very absurd in the blue of the soldiers' uniform. There are savages to whom a wife without a nose-ring would be as grotesque a figure as a beggar on a throne. The uneducated are naturally conservative, and the child resents any variation on a story or a verse which it has once learned. It should be the work of the comic writer to rise above mere conventionalities and depict real inconsistencies. John Gilpin's profession and habits would have had nothing comic in them if the honest linendraper had learned to ride before he pursued his equestrian course upon the King's highway. Thus of good comic verse the essence is always the same, but the form which it takes perhaps depends less upon fashion than upon the animal spirits of the generation or the writer. At Athens it mounted the stage, and in England, from "Gammer Gurton" to "Bombastes Furioso," often occupied the same field. The later dramatic burlesques, unless we except Sir William Gilbert's, have had less of the literary quality.

The longest of English comic poems suffers from an incurable defect. It would be idle to deny that Samuel Butler had a keen wit, an observant eye, a view of life which gives play to the faculties of man. His mastery of words, of an individual rhythm, of a rhyme both indefensible and irresistible, has set many of his phrases in our everyday speech. But the vogue of his work is irreparably ruined by the malice with which he set himself to lash a fallen foe. Any dramatic power that he may have possessed is destroyed by his venomous spite. Dryden, on Shaftesbury, shows a divinity which outweighs the malice. Pope condensed his fury against Lord Hervey into a few witty lines. Had he bestowed upon the "painted child of dirt that stinks and stings"

the nine cantos which Butler found too little for his Puritan knight, the dust would lie as thick on him as it lies on "Hudibras." Great length is not in itself inconsistent with the comic form. It becomes inconsistent when it is impregnated with venom. We laugh when Prior tells us how old Alison's maid left her mistress's complexion and eyebrows at Calais. We should tire had the epigrammatist devoted a volume to all the means by which the dame strove to conceal the inroads of time. Nor did Prior make the mistake of adding a curse to his fact. Mr. Graves justly lashes "the yellow cockerel crew," but spoils his effect by a personal addition:

"The Future lies beyond our ken,
The Present stirs our indignation;
And forces from one lowly pen,
This humble meed of execration."

It would seem that he has read Juvenal and not read him

* "Humours of the Fray." By Charles L. Graves. Smith, Elder & Co. 3s. 6d. net.
"The Muse in Motley." By Hartley Carrick. Bowes & Bowes. 3s. 6d. net.

aright. He showed much more artistic power in "Wisdom While You Wait."

Ours is a world of laughter and tears, and he does not adequately present either side who does not present both. Here lies the greatness of Aristophanes, and we may fairly demand something of both characteristics from all his successors. The genius of Calverley has been called elfish, but the epithet is not quite well chosen. Your true elf delights in mischief for its own sake. He turns the milk sour only that he may see the dairymaid's distress. He has no real malice towards his victims, and any one dairymaid will suit his purpose as well as another. Calverley also is free from malice, but he has, what the elf has not, some sympathy with the objects of his ridicule. We laugh at the tutor of the young Augustus Edward, but in our hearts we could wish that his romance had some sounder foundation that the vapid fancies of a weakling mind. What is really meant when Calverley is called elfish is that he could see the comic side of incidents which may in themselves annoy. When Mr. Pickwick had been carried in a barrow to the pound, he threatened to bring an action for false imprisonment. His resolution expired in laughter when he was warned of the possible repartee that he had taken too much milk punch. The peripatetic performer on the barrel-organ may drive irritable nerves to frenzy, but Calverley hears him in no such temper.

> "Grinder, who serenely grindest
> At my door the hundredth Psalm
> Till thou ultimately findest
> Pence in thy unwashen palm."

Such lines recall Tennyson's dictum that it does not matter what you say, the vital point is how you say it. Yet the antithesis is not real, for the manner is begotten of the matter, the attitude of mind and temper finds the phrase. Calverley's imitators try to follow his phrases, but the attempt must be fruitless unless the mind's eye see the facts as the master saw them. Mr. Carrick complains that critics of light verse have one pet formula of praise:

> "This work recalls the cleverness > Of C. S. C. and J. K. S.,"

and that this formula is really but a disparagement of the two versifiers whom it names. Mr. Carrick seems hardly aware that he himself is much under Calverley's influence. His debt to Stephen he acknowledges by direct imitations. Mr. Graves is somewhat more original, but hardly so amusing. His humour is somewhat dashed by a fiercer touch, and he is, perhaps, at his best when his spirits are highest. His raillery at such momentary scribes as Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Le Queux is quite irresistible.

Mr. Quiller-Couch, who graces Mr. Carrick's volume with a preface, seems to opine that the mature Englishman is unfit to be either a writer or a reader of light verse. We look upon Prior and Gay, he thinks, with a shade of contemptuous pity, and Praed, had he lived to middle age, would have abandoned the frivolous Muse. A generalisation, which is based upon a few instances, may fall before a few others. Cowper had entered upon his eleventh lustre when he indited "John Gilpin"; Johnson, who was, perhaps, never a child, used in his old age to repeat, "in a very pleasant manner," says Boswell, the lines,

> "When the Duke of Leeds shall married be
> To a fine young lady of high quality,
> How happy will that gentlewoman be
> In his Grace of Leeds's good company," and Mr. Gladstone used to astonish a solemn acquaintance by the gusto with which he sang negro breakdown songs. Surely any contempt for Prior springs rather from the sordidness of his life and the occasional uncleanness of his verse than for the lightness of his touch. Dean Church, a great man if there ever was one, avowed that in his gray hairs he often forgot that he was not a boy. It may be doubted whether it is so much a question of years as of race and national education. Prior, says Taine, was neither gay enough nor refined enough for the work which he attempted. Gray, in his lines on the pensive Selima, could not help pointing a moral which was not in his theme, for the cat was not allured by gold. The error is like that which turns the laugh of the satirist into a knockdown blow.

A STUDY IN BITTERNESS.*

Mr. Belloc's latest volume is something of a satire and something of a nightmare, and it is difficult to estimate where the satire ends and the nightmare begins. There is irony, of the quality the reader will expect from him; cool, self-assured, savage, the irony which has no pity in it and no tolerance, but only disgust and disdain. There are scenes where the comedy becomes frankly farce, and yet farce unaccompanied by any jolly laughter, but a farce made out of the gyrations and antics of grotesque and monstrous half-human figures. And there are scenes so elusive and intangible in their sense of remote standards of morality and the distortions of the modern world, as to be frankly woven of the stuff of disturbing dreams. It is a cleverness which over-reaches itself and terminates in confusion, mingled with a bitterness that exacts a kind of sympathy with the victim. The questions are everywhere on the surface: Why this cleverness? Why this bitterness? What is the plan, object, motive of it all?

"Mr. Burdon" contained deliberately in many of its brilliant pages a similar suggesion of uncertain ends, of powers behind the visible scenery, almost (as it seemed) behind the volition of men, working for the disruption of a society essentially intolerable and unclean. Here the same apparatus is utilised, but with (in result) less sureness of touch and a more ineffectual result. An aging elderly gentleman of the English middle classes is in each case the central figure. In the early volume a resident of Alexandrovna Villa, in Upper Norwood, in his simple selfish limited life, finds himself entangled in a region of cosmopolitan finance, which breaks his spirit and throws him out only to die. In this latest study, Mr. Clutterbuck—emerging from a similar world at Croydon and Caterham—is dragged into a similar world of political intrigue, and emerges at the end, having attained his heart's desire, as Sir Percy Clutterbuck, ex-Member of Parliament. "Mr. Burdon" stamped upon literature one vision, a vision essentially true if incomplete; of that delirium of greed and arrogance which, at the end of the nineteenth century, established the Chartered Company, engineered the South African and the Westralian "booms," threw upon the successful surface of life the Barnatoes and Joels and Beits and Robinsons, and consummated in the squalid tragedy of the South African War. Tragedy was the keynote of it, and tragedy (of necessity) carrying with it a note of pity. There was pity for an England and Empire, built up in other ways and under a far divergent ideal, being steered on the paths of dishonor towards ruin by financiers and politicians who were blind to all the traditions of a not inglorious past. There was pity for this absurd mid-Victorian merchant, with his limited outlook and his out-of-date standards of friendship and honesty, being baffled and amazed, and, finally, driven to death, by the intrigues and merciless enterprise of a cosmopolitan financial world, in which he had no part or heritage. And with the entrance of death itself—in that ignoble suburban villa—the story took within itself something of the majesty which accompanies so elemental a challenge to all doomed and passing things.

No such external visitants illuminate the squalid story of Mr. Clutterbuck's shamble, along mean and squalid ways, towards the attainment of his heart's desire. He starts his fortune by a deal in eggs, purchased to sell to a kindly Government, at extravagant prices, as food for the soldiers at the war; sold actually to a kindly Government, at extravagant prices, after the conclusion of peace. He consummates his fortune in a gigantic, if unexpected and casual, gambles in "Congoes"—shares, floated by a company formed for the exploitation of the natives, after the missionaries have succeeded in wresting the country away from Leopold. He wins a by-election at the North London artizan suburb of Mickleton, by a passionate protest against the legal decision upholding a compulsory arbitration law upon the men as well as upon the masters. He is unseated, not because of the bribery, direct and indirect, which is so freely practised by both parties—for "the inquiry was conducted with honor," says the narrator, "and the conventions of our elections were allowed"—but because his secretary, in endeavouring to retain his sobriety in a pilgrimage through

* "Mr. Clutterbuck's Election." By H. Belloc. Eveleigh Nash. 6s.

WASHED BY FOUR SEAS

An English Officer's Travels in the Near East.

By H. C. WOODS, F.R.G.S.

Late Lieut. Grenadier Guards.

With an Introduction by Sir Martin Conway. Illustrated with 62 Photographs taken by the Author. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

This record of Mr. Woods's experiences during his tours gives a vivid picture of many little-visited parts of the Ottoman Dominions. The Author devotes special chapters to the defences of Constantinople, to the Bulgarian Army, and to the Railways of the Near East.

T. FISHER UNWIN.

THE SOUTH AMERICAN SERIES.

Edited by MARTIN HUME.

Vol. II. PERU

Its Former and Present Civilisation, Topography and Natural Resources, History and Political Conditions, Commerce and General Development. By C. REGINALD ENOCK, F.R.G.S., Author of "The Andes and the Amazon." With an Introduction by Martin Hume, a Map and numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

The Standard says: "One rises from the perusal of so lucid and exhaustive a survey with a vivid impression of the growing prosperity of Peru and the resources within it which await the arrival of capital and energy."

The Scotsman says: "Mr. C. Reginald Enock's elaborate and well-studied treatise . . . unites in the happiest way the best qualities of an official manual and a personal description."

The Financial Times says: "He must be a dull writer indeed who could fail to make the history of a country like Peru entertaining, and when one brings to the enterprise an admiration and love of the natural features of the land, like Mr. Enock, a vastly interesting book is bound to be the result. Major Hume's hope that the work will prove valuable alike to traders, travellers, financiers and students is sure to be widely realised. The volume is rendered additionally attractive by over seventy fine full-page illustrations and an excellent map."

Vol. I. CHILE

By G. F. SCOTT-ELLIOTT, F.R.G.S. With an Introduction by Martin Hume, a Map, and numerous Illustrations. Second Impression. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

The Westminster Gazette says: "An exhaustive and interesting account not only of the turbulent history of the country, but of her present conditions and prospects."

The British Export Gazette says: "This excellent work is far more than a fascinating history. From whatever standpoint it is read it grips the reader, and is alike interestingly informative on the natural features, products, and commerce of the country."

PLEASE WRITE FOR A DETAILED PROSPECTUS OF THE SERIES.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London, W.C.

THE CASE FOR FREE TRADE

is being pithily put from day to day in

"THE DAILY NEWS"

by

L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P.,

under the title

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE.

EVERY DAY ONE POINT.

All who wish to have ready to hand an apt reply for the Tariff Reformer should watch this series in

"THE DAILY NEWS"

daily.

What are the most hopeful Signs of the Times?——

The Editor of PUBLIC OPINION invites Essays on the above subject, and offers honorariums of £5, £3, and £2 for the three best Essays sent in.

FULL PARTICULARS to be obtained in this week's issue of

PUBLIC OPINION.

To be obtained of all Newsagents and Bookstalls, or it will be sent post free on receipt of 2½d. in stamps sent to the offices :—

31 & 32, TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, LONDON, E.C.

The Yearly Subscription to PUBLIC OPINION is 10s. 10d. a year post free for the United Kingdom, and 13s. a year if sent abroad.

the public-houses to glean information, had allowed his informants to consume his whisky. Baffled in his efforts towards a peerage by the refusal of the Government to consider his claims, Mr. Clutterbuck sets himself to terrorise the Ministry with vague allusions to the "Anapootra Ruby Mines"—which he is told, by a friend, to talk about, without understanding. He finds himself immediately set against the Mr. Barnett of "Mr. Burdon," now elevated from the title of Lord Lambeth to that of the Duke of Battersea. He is foiled, outwitted, bewildered, denied. At the end his enemies are triumphant; Anapootra remains vaguely intangible, forgotten; his secretary, who has been bribed to accomplish his defeat, announces his departure to "some works out in India, a sort of company"—presumably, Anapootra. And, at last, in a kind of consummation of the squalor of it all, the title he had sought so diligently in success, is flung to him—as a bone to a dog—in failure. On Empire Day, "that day which is now the chief festival of our race, when so many and such varied qualities receive their high rewards, the storm-bound spirit of Sir Percy Clutterbuck was at rest."

There is extraordinarily clever writing in it, with all the easy dismissal of certain hateful things which Mr. Belloc does not so much combat as trample under foot. But the cleverness is of the kind which sometimes only interprets itself to the reader with difficulty, and sometimes not at all. It is glittering, hard, inhuman; giving the impression of writing exercised in a spirit of ferocity, detachment and contempt. These rich men who (in Mr. Chesterton's description) only cannot be bought because they have been bought already, these middle classes whose sole ambition is wealth and rank and social advancement, these mobs of populace, ignorant, violent, despicable, filled only with rude elements of lust, and envy, and anger, form together the elements of a society afflicted with an ultimate corruption; a carcase eaten with maggots and worms. Mr. Belloc's laughter has no joy in it; it is filled with the fierce note of loathing and revolt, the kind of laughter which might have been sounded over the ruin of ancient empires when those who had been long oppressed found nothing in the high places of their enemies but nettle and ivy and the dead bodies of the slain. Mr. Clutterbuck, somewhat stout in figure, of a roundish face, with a thick and short moustache, making a crescent upon it; Mrs. Clutterbuck, in her black dress, with hair parted in the middle, and at her throat a locket of considerable size, containing initials worked in human hair; the "Spectator" and the "Winning Post"; the young Prime Minister with only one lung; the philanthropists who press for reform in the Congo—"Sir Joseph Gorley, the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Shoreham, Sir Harry Hog, Mrs. Entwistle, Lord Barry, the Dean of Betchworth, Lord Blackwater and his second son, the Hon. I. Benzinger"; the rich crowd of gnomes and dupes and fools, the poor crowd of gnomes and dupes and fools—all form a company resembling nothing so much as the denizens of the kingdom visited by Gulliver in his latest travels—half human, hideous, hateful altogether.

It is this savage revolt against it all which chokes the laughter in the mouth, and leaves the general effect as of a journey through sand and thorns. Mr. Belloc could have stung his readers to contemplation, even to protest (had such been his desire), if he had liberated any appearances of color to set against the grey, or exhibited one solitary character of all that ignoble rout to whom could be affixed the sentiment of kindness or compassion. He has exhibited instead individuals and a society heartless, greedy, ungenerous, remote; clawing and mowing at each other as they slide down the pathway of dishonor towards an end which excites no satisfaction because it attains no goal of justice, or even of revenge.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Vernon Lee's latest volume of essays, "Gospels of Anarchy and other Contemporary Studies" (Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d. net), is a critical exposition of the leading writers who, during the latter half of the nineteenth century, have voiced the intellecual rebellion which she regards as a main characteristic of the thought of our time. To do justice to an array so diverse as Emerson, Whitman, Tolstoy, Nietzsche, Ibsen, Ruskin, Mr. Bernard Shaw, and Mr. Wells, is beyond the powers of any single critic, but if Vernon Lee attempts an impossible task, she approaches it in very interesting fashion. Balance, sobriety, and insight are rare qualities in present-day criticism. To these Vernon Lee adds a refined and flexible style which, though now and then bordering on preciosity, frequently reaches actual distinction. But other qualities are necessary in the ideal critic, and of one of the most vital of all, enthusiasm, there are few traces in this book. Renan said that the best interpreter of a religion is the man who had once believed it but who believes it no longer. Vernon Lee gives the impression that—with the exception of Emerson—she has never believed in any of the prophets of whom she treats. The note of serene detachment that runs through the book is likely to excite in her readers a feeling of impatience, even amounting to antagonism. For, despite their many perversities and extravagances, the prophets of revolt have been utterers of the thoughts that breathe and words that burn, and in order to do justice to their teaching it is necessary to share, in some degree at least, their own enthusiasm. It is here that Vernon Lee fails. We see this particularly in her studies of Tolstoy and of Nietzsche. "Tolstoy's ideal of sacrifice is, like his notion of love," she observes, "an ideal of diminution, of sacrifice." Had Vernon Lee ever been a Tolstoyan she would have understood that the genuine ascetic, so far from regarding his self-sacrifice as a mutilation, claims that he is, as Mr. Shaw once said, the "only real voluptuary," and manages to extract a world of joy from his abnegation. Nietzsche, again, when he declared humility to be a vice, was but uttering a protest against the set of rules and conventions which most of us accept because we lack the courage to examine them. The truth is that these "one-sided thinkers," whom Vernon Lee finds so trying, are all bearing witness to some one aspect of truth, pressing it with undue violence, but often doing so because it was precisely the aspect which the world was in danger of forgetting.

* * *

In "The Tower of London," painted by the late John Fulleylove, and described by Mr. Arthur Poyser (Black, 7s. 6d. net), we have a refreshing book about a historic monument that has been either neglected or maltreated in literature. Shakespeare, it is true, introduced it into his historical plays, but only slightly; Scott used it in "Peveril of the Peak" with an effect that mainly suggests what a magnificent background it might have made for another novel, had he been disposed to write one; but only these two masters of dramatic romance availed themselves, and that not fully, of its possibilities. One need scarcely concern oneself with Harrison Ainsworth, who employed the Tower for a "local color" that was not only too sombre, but too wide of the truth, or with the dry-as-dust historians who have used it as a peg on which to hang cumbrous compilations of facts and dates, or with the numerous handbooks that have given the letter but not the spirit of its story. To-day it is much harder than it was to recreate the human interest of the Tower. It has been modernised and vulgarised more than most places of historic importance. The enormities of its new building, its ticket turnstile, its refreshment room, and other improvements are a veil that blurs its significance to all but the keenest visions. Mr. Poyser's imagination, however, has proved itself equal to the task before it. If he does not forget the turnstile and refreshment room, he succeeds in making the reader forget them during his excursions into a living past. The plan of the book is simplicity itself. After a brief introduction, dealing mostly with Tower literature, ancient and modern, we have a historical sketch or panoramic survey of the great personages with whose careers its history is bound up. Tower history begins, strictly speaking, with the Conquest; but the protoplasm of the present structure was, Mr. Poyser points out, a Celtic fort on the river slope of Tower Hill, and this subsequently became a Roman stronghold at the angle of the London Wall which was nearest to the sea. The next chapter is entitled "A Walk through the Tower," and herein those episodes which are directly connected with individual parts of the fortress are treated in fuller detail. Tower Hill, with its grim associations, is the next to receive attention; and, finally, the church of All Hallows, Barking, where Laud and many another celebrity who met

THE PRESS ON "ANATOLE FRANCE IN ENGLISH"

¶ MR. JOHN LANE has pleasure in announcing the success which has attended the publication of THE WORKS OF ANATOLE FRANCE IN ENGLISH. Three Volumes are now ready:—

THE RED LILY ... ... A Translation by WINIFRED STEPHENS.
MOTHER OF PEARL ... ... A Translation by FREDERIC CHAPMAN.
THE GARDEN OF EPICURUS ... A Translation by ALFRED ALLISON.

Demy Octavo. Each Volume Six Shillings. Bound in Crimson and Gold. Initials by Henry Ospovat. End-papers by Aubrey Beardsley.

"The best introduction a foreign reader can have to the writings of the most individual author of to-day. 'The Red Lily' will achieve with English readers the success it had in France."—Outlook.

"A man of exquisite and accomplished literary talent, like M. Anatole France, lays no very difficult tasks upon those who peruse his works. He is too cultivated to startle or dismay his readers. With Anatole France you are on excellent terms from the very commencement. He is after all one of ourselves, though a very talented member of an extremely distinguished class. . . . It is the humour of the author of 'The Sentimental Journey,' something gentler than the humour of Thackeray, and more refined than the humour of Dickens."—W. L. COURTNEY in the Daily Telegraph.

"Anatolians are wont to contend that M. France is untranslatable, and in a sense this is true, but it must be conceded that Miss Winifred Stephens has come near to attaining the impossible. If the translators of the succeeding volumes are equally successful, there will be little to complain of."—Bookman.

"One of the most charming stories of modern times, full of life, pregnant with rich thought, throbbing with a fine soul. 'The Red Lily' is a masterpiece."—Observer.

"Everyone knows that the Bodley Head can produce as attractive a book as anybody in the land. We must now all read all of Anatole France. The offer is too good to be shirked. He is just Anatole France, the greatest living writer of French . . . There is always a large public for translations. A hundred Englishmen will read him in English to one that will read him in French."—LEWIS HIND, in the Daily Chronicle.

"The publication of the first volume of a complete translation of the works of Anatole France is something of a literary event. The large handsome volumes, beautifully printed and attractively bound, are published at a low price. It is the first time that a living foreign author has achieved the distinction of a complete and careful translation, and we can hardly doubt that the undertaking will be successful."—Daily Mail.

"A collective translation in thirty volumes constitutes a ponderable monument of literary faith."—Nation.

"It is an admirably written story of 'l'amour,' full of experience of life and enriched by a dozen finely painted word portraits of social types."—Daily News.

"The translation of 'The Red Lily' is most admirably done. . . A marvellous new departure so far as the six-shilling novel is concerned. They are all of the excellence we are accustomed to associate with the half-guinea or the guinea book."—M.A.P.

"The besetting virtue of the Bodley Head is to give too much for the money. The translation by Miss Stephens is most conscientiously done. It bears throughout the marks of quite exceptional honest care and attention to detail."—New Age.

"The book's style is worthy of Anatole France in his most inspired moments. Choulette is a creation of the first magnitude."—Sunday Times.

"An extraordinarily cheap and handsome translation of his works. 'The Red Lily' is a wonderfully told story, lit up with flashes of wit and wisdom, and distinguished for at least one incomparable character, the saintly yet satyr-like poet, Choulette."—Truth.

"Anatole France is a writer whose personality is very strongly reflected in his works, and especially so in 'The Red Lily.' . . . To reproduce the evanescent grace and charm of Anatole France's is not to be lightly achieved, but the translator has done her work with care, distinction, and a very happy sense of the value of words."—Daily Graphic.

¶ FOR MOTORISTS—AND OTHERS.

THE PATH TO PARIS. By FRANK RUTTER.
62 Illustrations by HANSLIP FLETCHER. The Record of a Riverside Journey from Harve to Paris.
Crown 4to, 10s. 6d. net.
"An altogether delightful book."—Outlook.

STAINED GLASS TOURS IN FRANCE.
By C. H. SHERRIL. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.
"A very well written book with a very good æsthetic perception as to what is best in ancient glass."—Builder.

FRENCH NOVELISTS OF TO-DAY.
By WINIFRED STEPHENS. Essays on Bazin, Paul Bourget, Loti, Anatole France, &c.
Crown 8vo, 5s. net.
"The English reader who requires a guide to contemporary French fiction can find nothing better."—Nation.

THE DAUGHTER OF LOUIS XVI.:
Marie-Thérèse, Charlotte of France, Duchesse D'Angoulême. By G. LENOTRE. With 13 Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
"Exceedingly well done, and of a sort calculated to be exceedingly useful."—Manchester Guardian.

THE DIARY OF A LADY-IN-WAITING.
By Lady CHARLOTTE BURY. Being the Diary illustrative of the Times of George IV. Edited, with Introduction, by Francis Steuart. 18 Portraits. 2 vols. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.
"Will set the town talking as it talked seventy years ago."—Daily Telegraph.

¶ NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

JUST OUT.—A New Novel by HUGH DE SELINCOURT, Author of "The Boyle Marriage" and "The Strongest Plume."

THE HIGH ADVENTURE.
 A story of a young clerk in the British Museum who develops a distaste for the material views of human relationship. He stretches out eager hands towards an ideal which he can only vaguely formulate in his mind, and which ultimately ripens into an ideal love. The story is steeped in poetry and exhales the aroma of Maeterlinckian drama.

A MAN OF GENIUS. By M. P. WILLCOCKS.
"Miss Willcocks writes with such a keen consciousness of life as a whole (which is one of the attributes of the greatest), that it is a pleasure to read her work."—Outlook.

ASHES. By GRAZIA DELEDDA.
"A truly great work."—Westminster Gazette.

THE DOOR OF DARKNESS.
By MAUDE ANNESLEY.
"Very interesting, and holds the reader's attention from the outset."—Westminster Gazette.

A MISTAKEN MARRIAGE.
By F. E. MILLS YOUNGE.
"An attractive and human story."—Times

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON AND NEW YORK.

death on the neighbouring scaffold lie buried, is described in a concluding chapter. In the course of his narrative, Mr. Poyser lays stress on a fact that is apt to be forgotten, namely, that up to the time of Queen Elizabeth the Tower was as much a palace as a prison. The Plantagenet and Tudor monarchs found it most convenient as a refuge in times of popular disturbance. It served as a place of pageants and other festivities, not less than of imprisonments, executions, and tortures, and it is this intermingling of the light with the shade in its social history that renders it so fascinating a study. The Gascoyne map of the Tower Liberties in 1597, which is reproduced towards the end of the volume, is a most useful key to the history of the ancient structure, and Mr. Fulleylove's drawings give a faithful picture of the Tower as it appears to-day. The latter are, moreover, typical of the late artist's refined and scholarly talent.

* * *

Although the sub-title of Mr. H. Bryan Binns's "A Century of Education" (Dent, 5s. net) describes the book as "the centenary history of the British and Foreign School Society," it gives an excellent picture of the progress of elementary education throughout England during the past hundred years. The British and Foreign School Society was founded by Joseph Lancaster in 1808 with the object of insuring that every child should be able to read the Bible. For many years the Bible was the only reading book used in the schools, but the Church soon objected to simple Bible teaching and the National Society was founded as an opposition organisation which would train the children in the principles of the Church of England. Trouble next came from the Jews who, after a time, also deserted the Society. Some time afterwards the Unitarians followed their example. On the passing of the first Elementary Education Vote in 1834, the Society received a tardy and meagre recognition by the allotment of £9,500, but the Congregational Union protested vehemently against the payment of money raised by taxes for religious education. These facts are representative of the squabbles that have been the curse of elementary education in this country, and the advocate of a purely secular system would find many arguments in Mr. Binns's pages. But despite the controversy that plays upon its surface the history of education presents many encouraging features. The gradual progress towards greater efficiency, the devotion of teachers, and the heightened feeling on the part of parents that they ought to provide their children with the best education within their reach, all these are evident in the volume. English education owes a great deal to the work of the British and Foreign Society, and this record of its work will be read with interest by all who care for educational reform. Appendices dealing with different aspects of the educational problem are contributed by Dr. Macnamara, Mr. Sidney Webb, Professor Foster Watson, and Mr. Graham Wallas.

* * *

Charity is said to cover a multitude of sins, and one may therefore extend some toleration to Mr. James Blyth's story of "Posh," the boatman who found a friend in Edward FitzGerald, as told in "Edward FitzGerald and 'Posh,' 'Herring Merchants'" (John Long, 4s. net). Mr. Blyth, whose novels are fairly well known to the public, seems a year or two back, after much hunting, to have "discovered" Joseph Fletcher, otherwise "Posh," in a beer-house at Lowestoft. He fixed up an acquaintanceship with him, only to discover that "Posh" had fallen on evil days. An appeal through the "Daily Graphic" and the Omar Khayyam Club produced a sum of money, the sale of certain letters by Edward FitzGerald to "Posh" supplied a little more, and this book is intended to help still further the old age of a man whose sole claim to consideration is based upon the fact that Edward FitzGerald had a most exaggerated impression of his worth. It seems a hard saying, but the effect of the present volume upon the minds of admirers of Edward FitzGerald will certainly be to leave an impression that they might better have kept their subscriptions in their pockets, and that the workhouse, whither "Posh" was inevitably tending when rescued by Mr. Blyth, would really have been the most fitting termination of such a career as is here presented. It is obvious that Mr. Blyth is quite out of sympathy with his hero, and he even admits that FitzGerald's infatuation is inexplicable. FitzGerald is not only the poet of the "one thing done divinely well," but he is one of the best letter writers in the English language. In the admirable series of letters issued by Messrs. Macmillan there are many entertaining references to "Posh" or "Poshy," as FitzGerald called his fisherman friend. "He is a much nobler creature than myself," he tells us in one place; he shares with Thackeray and Tennyson "a certain Grandeur of Soul and Body," he tells us in another; and the like ecstatic language is continued in the many letters to friends that may be found in the correspondence. From this point of view the book is a complete disillusionment. One may still revere the intense humanity of FitzGerald that desired to see in an uneducated man among his acquaintances all the essentials of a fine character; but "Posh" in no way lived up to his friend's ideal. It is hinted that "sack-loads of letters" from FitzGerald to "Posh" have been destroyed or distributed. One hopes that they have been destroyed, for, judging from the examples here provided, FitzGerald was quite at his worst when writing to the fisherman, although his intense humanity and kindliness of heart shine through the letters. Mr. Blyth, in his desire to do a kindness to a fellow-creature, has, doubtless, made the best of the material at his disposal, but, perhaps, that best was hardly worth a book.

* * *

Among new editions recently issued are Jane Austen's "Sense and Sensibility" and "Pride and Prejudice" (Chatto & Windus, 3s. 6d. net each volume), forming the first two of a collected edition of the complete works, with illustrations by Mr. A. Wallis Mills, and edited with a brief introduction by Mr. R. Brimley Johnson. The books are tastefully produced, though, in our view, the illustrations hardly come up to Mr. Hugh Thomson's charming pictures in Messrs. Macmillan's edition of the same author. Messrs. Bell have added to their admirable "York Library" a translation, in two volumes, of Goethe's "Dichtung and Wahrheit," under the title of "Poetry and Truth from My Own Life" (2s. net each). The translation is based on the work of Oxenford and Morrison, which has been thoroughly revised by Miss M. S. Smith, scarcely a sentence of the original version being left unchanged. In the same series there is a reprint of Calverley's translation of "The Idylls of Theocritus and the Eclogues of Virgil" (2s. net). Messrs. Bell are to be congratulated on the progress of their "York Library." It is one of the best of the many cheap series now in the market.

* * *

"Portraits of the Archbishops of Canterbury" (A. R. Mowbray, 3s. 6d. net) is the title of a handsomely got-up volume, to which Miss G. M. Bevan contributes short biographical notices of all the Archbishops from Dr. Davidson to St. Augustine. Necessarily the earlier dignitaries cannot be represented by actual portraits, but the deficiency is made up by photographs of tombs, with or without effigies, contemporary seals, coins, and illustrated MSS.; and the gallery is complete and continuous from Archbishop Arundel to Longley who died in 1868.

* * *

A Novel-Reader's Guide.—"The Singular Republic." By W. H. Koebel (Francis Griffiths, 6s.). A good story of life and adventure in South America.—"Gotty in Furrin Parts." By A. E. Copping (Chapman & Hall, 6s.). A racy and amusing sequel to the same author's "Gotty and the Governor." Mr. Copping takes his characters farther afield, but the skipper's dry humour loses nothing by the voyage.—"A Stormy Morning." By Lady Napier of Magdala (Murray, 6s.). The account of the heroine's love-affairs and other adventures in country houses is readable, but the book is loosely constructed, and many of the incidents improbable.—"Good-bye to Market." By R. Murray Gilchrist (Simpkin, Marshall, 6s.). A collection of well-written stories of village life.—"The Revolt of Beatrix." By Fred Wishaw (John Long, 6s.). A tale of State intrigue on the lines Mr. Anthony Hope has made popular.—"The Pitfall." By Sir William Magnay, Bart. (Ward Lock, 6s.), and "The Green Mummy." By Fergus Hume (John Long. 6s.). Two stories of hidden treasure with plenty of incident.

BUDDHISM:

Primitive and Present in Magadha and in Ceylon.

By REGINALD STEPHEN COPLESTON, D.D.

BISHOP OF CALCUTTA.

SECOND EDITION REVISED. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. (Inland postage, 5d.)

The book as now published in a Second Edition has been entirely re-written. Notice has been taken of such recent discoveries as have become known to the author; but the alterations are chiefly for clear ness and better arrangement.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

NOW READY.—10s. 6d. net.

A CHARMING GIFT-BOOK.

MEMORIES OF GARDENS.

By ALEXANDER INNES SHAND.

With a Memoir by Sir ROWLAND BLENNERHASSETT, Bart.

Portraits and Illustrations in Colour and Black-and-White.

To be had of all Libraries and Booksellers.

THE WEST STRAND PUBLISHING COMPANY, LTD.,
33, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

BOOKSELLERS.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 93, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

[And at READING and GUILDFORD.]

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

BOOKS. BOOKS. BOOKS.

Rare and curious Books for the collector. First Editions. Court Memoirs Medical, Occult, &c. Out of Print Books and everything that's a book supplied. No matter when published. State wants. 100,000 books on sale. Catalogues free.

HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

BOOKS WANTED. First editions of all kinds. Sporting, Naval, Military Coloured Plates by Alken, Cruikshank, Rowlandson, and others. Special list of 3,000 wanted. LIBRARIES PURCHASED.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

A NEW

"F.C.G." Froissart.

On WEDNESDAY NEXT, July 29, the

"WESTMINSTER GAZETTE"

will publish the first chapters of a series entitled

"F.C.G.'S" MODERN FROISSART,

describing in quaint mediaeval phraseology and with illustrations founded upon fourteenth century examples, the principal political events from the end of 1902 up to and including the General Election of 1906.

The series will be continued at intervals throughout August, and the Weekly Editions* of the "Westminster Gazette" will contain the chapters published during each current week. The story of the events familiar to us all in our recent history will be told as if written by Sir John Froissart himself, and, although a good deal of humour is introduced both in the text and the pictures, the narrative will be an interesting record of actual events.

* THE SATURDAY WESTMINSTER.

Offices: WESTMINSTER GAZETTE, Tudor St., London, E.C.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR

CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

HIGHEST QUALITY

TURKISH TOWELS

AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

The Week in the City.

THE MOVEMENT OF LEADING STOCKS.

	Price Friday Morning, July 17.	Price Friday Morning, July 24.
Consols 2½ per cent.	87 13/16 ...	86 13/16
German 3 per cent.	82½ ...	82
Russian 5 per cent.	96 ...	95⅜
London and North Western	134 ...	132¼
Great Eastern	64 ...	64
Great Western	119 ...	117½
Union Pacific	154⅛ ...	159
Canadian-Pacific...	172 ...	172½

THE week has been rather an interesting one in spite of the fact that the exodus of the rich from London and other money centres has begun. The Home railway dividends have been rather disappointing, and a good deal of anxiety has been caused by a slight, but sharp, fall in Consols—variously attributed to sales by the Indian Government, to the disappointment of State bulls, to the Irish Land and other new issues, and to nervousness about war or Old Age Pensions. The first of these causes is certainly wrong; but the second and third are probably the true explanation. Lord Cromer's speech caused more uneasiness in Berlin than in London. It certainly gives some support to the theory that he has associated himself with Harmsworth finance. The Brazil loan has had a cool reception. People here like neither the coffee valorisation nor the battleship programme. Generally, markets have been dull, but Americans have been going strong in spite of declamations about "derrickers."

THE HORSE OMNIBUS AND THE OMNIBUS HORSE.

According to Mr. Richard Tilling, who has been interviewed by the Press, the General Omnibus and Road Car Companies, which together owned not long ago 22,000 horses, now own only 13,000; and this number, he says, is still diminishing, as horse omnibuses are being replaced by motor omnibuses on all the routes. Possibly the process may be checked now that the amalgamation has been carried through. There is no doubt that it is the motor 'bus that has ruined the 'bus trade in London, and, so far as I can see, it might be more sparingly used and higher fares charged than for the horse omnibus, which is so much cheaper to run. It seems that for some time the London 'bus companies have stopped buying 'bus horses; but, strange to say, this class of horse was never dearer than it is now. The old price used to be from £34 to £36, but now it seems they cost £42. Mr. Tilling's explanation is that "the demand for trade horses is very brisk," but it may be that the supply has fallen off in anticipation of the falling off in demand, and that the horse-breeder has over-estimated the development of motor traffic. Indeed, it is stated that there were 10,000 fewer foals reared last year than the year before. It will be interesting to see what happens to prices if the London 'bus companies begin to buy horses again.

THE TRADE REVIVAL IN AMERICA.

In June pig iron production in the States fell to 1,088,000 tons, the lowest point for a long time, and actually less than half the production of June last year! Nevertheless there is confidence of a turn in the tide, for it is certain that the railway companies will have to employ their new capital in extensive repairs and improvements. Moreover, the total of idle cars on the railroads of the United States has been slowly but steadily decreasing for the last two or three months. This helps to explain the buoyancy of American railroad and Steel Corporation stocks during the last few days. Bank clearings, another good index of trade, have also been picking up.

CANADIAN PUBLIC EXTRAVAGANCE.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Government is being strongly assailed in Canada for its extravagance, and one of his supporters (a prominent financier of Toronto) who is in London tells me that everyone out there feels sure that his majority will be greatly reduced, if not entirely wiped out, at the coming elections. The case is put as follows by financial critics in Ottawa. In the year 1896 the Federal expenditure stood at 41,702,383 dol. For the year which closed on March 31st, 1908, the amount expended, so far as the Government has reported, was 108,778,000 dol. For the present year the Finance Minister, in his Budget speech, estimated that the outlays would be 119,236,000. The figures, therefore, stand as follows:—

	Dollars.
1896	41,702,383
1908	108,778,322
1909	119,236,000

The growth of expenditure can be better appreciated and more fairly compared with that of twelve years ago on a per capita basis. In 1896 the Dominion Government was spending at the rate of 8·14 dol. per head of population. In 1908 the rate was 18 dol. per head. In 1909 the rate will be 20 dol. per head.

THE GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC.

With public expenditure and debt growing thus rapidly, other large money-spending schemes are being pushed at Ottawa by the ruling clique, not all of whom have Sir Wilfrid Laurier's reputation for disinterestedness. One of these is the Government end of the Grand Trunk Pacific, i.e., that part of the road between Winnipeg and Moncton which the country has to build. The odd part of this scheme is that the Grand Trunk did not want it, and there was no call for it. "The thing was added," so I read in a Canadian newspaper, "for grafting purposes, to a sane proposition—the extension of the Grand Trunk from North Bay to the coast—which could have been carried through at an expense of not more than 12,000,000 dol. to the country." When this proposition first appeared the Premier solemnly assured Parliament that the entire cost would be 13,000,000 dol.—not a cent. more. Now the price is being more closely calculated, and the following figures, prepared by the Government itself, may give a fair idea of the impending outlay. The expense of the Winnipeg to Moncton line will be as follows:—

	Dollars.
1,803 miles, at 63,427 dol. a mile ...	114,393,763
Use of money during the five years' construction	10,009,454
Seven years' interest	26,124,676
Three more years in which the Grand Trunk Pacific is free of rent ...	11,196,290
Total	161,724,183

This covers only the cost of the roadbed and the interest that has to be paid under the agreement handing over the line to the Grand Trunk for ten years for nothing.

THE QUEBEC BRIDGE.

In addition to this sum of 161,724,183 dol., Canadian taxpayers are condemned to pay heavily on account of the Grand Trunk line through the mountains. The Government has guaranteed bonds on that section and has agreed to meet the interest for seven years. This liability comes to 9,689,400 dol. Then there is the taxpayers' contribution to the cost of terminals at Quebec, Winnipeg, and Moncton, which will call for 5,470,000 dol. more. But the most startling of the supplementary expenses connected with the Grand Trunk Pacific project, as engineered at Ottawa, is in consequence of the calamity to the Quebec bridge. The Quebec bridge scheme has been described as "the most ingenious of the many ingenious projects for the enrichment of private individuals at the public expense that the Laurier Government has devised." Briefly, the country was to find the money with which to build this bridge, and "private gentlemen, mostly politicians, were to own the structure and to enjoy the profits that were to be made as a result of its use by the railway companies." But part of the bridge fell down last year, and this has upset the calculations of the money-makers; so the country has to assume the following liability:—

	Dollars.
Cost of bridge up to March 1st, 1907 ...	5,422,238
Cost of completion	9,000,000
Total	14,422,238

The building of the line of railway, the granting of the free rental for ten years to the Grand Trunk, the interest on the Mountain bonds, and the cost of the Quebec bridge, brings the total expenditure on the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme up to 191,305,823 dol. This is not the whole story of recent Canadian finance; but it deserves the attention of investors; for it shows that Canadian Government loans will be plentiful in the future.

LUCELLUM.

Liver troubles

are speedily and effectually cured by LIVERETS. The great disadvantage of most liver medicines is that they have a distinctly debilitating effect on the health.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets

STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

Are especially compounded to overcome this evil. Prepared, as prescribed by an eminent physician, from purely vegetable ingredients, they thoroughly cleanse the liver of all impurities and leave it perfectly healthy. And the valuable tonic properties they possess, stimulate the liver while they relieve it, and, finally, make it sound and strong enough to enable it to perform its functions in a healthy, natural way. Of all Chemists and Stores, or Post Free, 1/1½, from

MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name MERIT'S LIVERETS, and the signature MERIT & Co., is on the package. Beware of spurious imitations.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it WILL BE REPLACED.

TANGYE
OIL ENGINE
AUTOMATIC
TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP
EXCEPT FOR STARTING.

TANGYES LTD
BIRMINGHAM.

THE INQUIRER

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF LIBERAL RELIGION

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS:

6/6 per year, to all parts of the World.

Published every Friday at

3, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

UNDERWOOD VISIBLE TYPEWRITER.

The Machine you will eventually buy

Every character in sight from Date to Signature

The only strictly high-grade visible writer

Especially Adaptable for Invoicing

Underwood Typewriter Co.,
120, Queen Victoria St., E.C.

ONE & ALL SEEDS

THE BRAND GUARANTEES ONE & ALL QUALITY.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

ONE & ALL SEEDS are reliable, pure, and guaranteed.

Each packet is dated with the year of issue.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS are complete Manures.

All are supplied in small quantities at reasonable prices.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Choice Varieties of Sweet Peas, with an Original Pamphlet on their Culture, by Richard Dean, V.M.H.—viz., Dorothy Eckford, white; Hon. Mrs. Kenyon, yellow; Prima Donna, soft pink; King Edward VII., crimson; Miss Wilmott, rich deep orange pink; Mrs. Walter Wright, mauve; Prince of Wales, fine rose; Duchess of Westminster, violet purple; Othello, deep maroon; Lady Grisel Hamilton, pale lavender; Duke of Westminster, purple; Navy Blue.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Annuals.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Perennials and Biennials.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables for Saladings.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables.

One & All Collection of Choicest Asters in 10 Varieties—2s. 6d. Giant Comet, white; Giant Comet, The Bride, white; Giant Comet, rose; Giant Comet, azure blue; Giant Comet, dark violet; Mixed Dwarf Chrysanthemum; Finest Mixed Bouquet; Mixed Victoria; Mixed Paeony; Perfection; and Betteridge's Quilled in mixed colours.

One & All Fertiliser No. 24 for general garden purposes. Half-rod packets 6d. bags, 7 lbs., 2/3; 14 lbs., 3/6; 28 lbs., 5/9; 56 lbs., 10/6; 112 lbs., 20/- Carriage Paid.

ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, LIMITED. Name and address of nearest Local Agent, Illustrated Catalogues, and other details, sent free by post on application to EDWARD OWEN GREENING, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education, Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.
Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

(For Leisure Hour Work, see the Bootham School exhibit in the Franco-British Exhibition, Education Building, Section J.)

Special terms for boys under 14 and under 13.

For copies of Prospectus and full particulars with regard to Scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

WEST HEATH SCHOOL, HAMPSTEAD.

On high ground close to the Heath.
A day school for Boys and Girls (about 100 pupils).

Principal: Mrs. Ennis Richmond.
Headmaster: Mr. F. V. Bindon (M.A. Cantab.).
Succeeding Mr. & Mrs. Rice, now taking up work at Bedales School, Hants.

Good Buildings. Playground. Large Grass Playing Fields.

A Boarding house will be opened in September in connection with the above under the immediate management of Mrs. Richmond and her son, Mr. Kenneth Richmond, as house master.

Michaelmas Term will begin September 22nd.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

NEW BOYS ARRIVE SEPTEMBER 17TH, OTHERS 18TH.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The South Wales and Monmouthshire Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts, 3, 4, 5 and 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

Superintendent ... Miss HESTER DAVIES.
Secretary ... ... J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.

The School is under the Management of a Committee appointed by the Council of the College. It is under Government Inspection, and the Committee is empowered to grant Diplomas in Cookery, Laundrywork and Housewifery, under the cognizance and with the approval of the Board of Education.

The Departments of the Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts are as follows:—

1. TRAINING SCHOOL OF COOKERY.
2. TRAINING SCHOOL OF LAUNDRY WORK.
3. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEWIFERY.
4. TRAINING SCHOOL OF DRESSMAKING.
5. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEKEEPING.

Further particulars can be obtained on application to the Superintendent of the School, at 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.

In the Cheshire Plain, four miles from Crewe. Opened in 1900. Modern Buildings, standing in 24 acres of grounds. Preparations for University Scholarships and Matriculation, or for Professional and Commercial life.

NEXT ENTRANCE EXAMINATION JULY 21st, AT THE SCHOOL.

For prospectus and particulars of admission on the Foundation, apply to the Head Master, H. L. JONES, M.A. (Oxon.), or to the Clerk to the Governors 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

BROMSGROVE SCHOOL, WORCESTERSHIRE.

AUTUMN TERM begins September 17th.

APPLY THE HEADMASTER.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.SC., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

MISCELLANEOUS.

PRIVATE ACCOUNT BOOK. For Country or City Gentlemen. Guaranteed to fulfil every requirement. Post free 10/6, or Particulars free, McQueen & Co., 1a, Moat Rd., Leicester.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

TOURS.

£6 6s. LUCERNE TOUR.

Nine days. Short Sea Route. No extras for Conductor or Gratuities.

£7 7s. TERRITET—MONTREUX.

No Night Travelling. Magnificent Hotels. One Day Paris. Return Tickets. Seven Days Territet. Short Sea Route.

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D.

5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. 4, Charing Cross, S.W. 25, Cannon Street, E.C. 84, Piccadilly, W.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

KINGSLEY HOTEL, Near the British Museum.
Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

THACKERAY HOTEL,
Opposite the British Museum.
Great Russell Street, London.

These well-appointed and commodious Temperance Hotels will, it is believed, meet the requirements at moderate charges of those who desire all the conveniences and advantages of the larger modern Licensed Hotels. These Hotels have Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every floor, spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard, and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.
Inclusive charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, From 3/6 to 10/6 per day.

Full Tariff and Testimonials on application.
Telegraphic Addresses—
Kingsley Hotel, "Bookcraft, London." Thackeray Hotel, "Thackeray, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

A LIBRARY OF PEACE AND WAR

WITH AN INTRODUCTION
BY
F. W. HIRST.

1/- NET.

THE
NATION PUBLISHING CO., LTD.,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:
HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son, Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.
BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott. Prop.

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing sea. 6/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny. Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Afternoon Teas, Tel. 647

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

SWANAGE.
"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.
WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell, Manager

1650

To every particular Member of Parliament,

The humble Addreſs of the Sope-makers of London that lately preſented their Petition to this Honourable Houſe,

SHEWETH,

THe Complaint of the Sope-makers in briefis, That by reaſon of an Exciſe laid upon their Materials, and after they have made them into Sope, They are forced to pay 4*s.* 8*d. per* Barrel Exciſe; by meanes of which, thoſe that make it in holes and corners, ſteal the Exciſe of the ſaid 4*s.* 8*d. per* Barrel, and ſo are able to underſell them that pay it; by meanes whereof their Trade is loſt and deſtroyed. For remedy of which, they humbly deſire the Parliament will be pleaſed to lay 12*d. per l.* Exciſe upon all the imported Materials that Sope is made of, and totally take off the foreſaid 4*s.* 8*d. per* Barrel; which they humbly conceive will bring in annually, an equal revenue to what hath riſen of late years, both out of the Exciſe of Sope, and the 6*d.* in every 20*s.* that the Materials have paid, whereby all that make Sope ſhall equally bear the burthen of the Exciſe; and in caſe the Parliament ſhall Judge the ſaid 12*d. per pound* Exciſe upon the materials, not to be enough, they leave it to their Judgements and deſcretions to lay ſo much more above the ſaid 12*d.* in every 20*s.* upon the Materials onely, as they Judge annually will fully make up the ſame.

And they moſt humbly deſire that the Parliament would ſpeedily put this their Juſt Sute to an abſolute and final iſſue, and call upon Colonel George Thompſon to make his Report in the premiſes.

Roger Pears

John Hayes	John Hardwick
John Lilburne	Lawrence Whitwel
Tho. Howlet	Symon Weedon
Thomas Woodſtocke	Robert Barfoote
John Hutcheſt	Caleb Phinnies
Robert Drinkwater	John Murdock
Edm. Halley	Rickard Cox
William Rudd	Edward Leader
Edw. Whitwell	Tho. Bromley
Ja. Baker	William Heſter
John Wolcot	Tho. Poultney

1650.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, JULY 25, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. III., No. 18.] SATURDAY, AUGUST 1, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 623
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—
The Danger with the Lords ... 626
The Growth of a Liberal Europe 627
Democracy and the Peace Movement 628
The Harvest of London Reaction 629
LIFE AND LETTERS:—
The Mob-Mind 631
"The Marathon" 632
An American Statesman ... 633
SHORT SKETCH:—
"The Meadow of the Dead" By Padraic Colum 634
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—
Naval Expenditure in 1909. By the Right Hon. Lord Eversley 635
The Harmsworth Brand--III. 636
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—
An Epilogue to an Unfinished Drama. By Ed. Bernstein 637
COMMUNICATIONS:—
The State of the Daily Press. By a Journalist 638
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
"Wanted, a New Scheme of Culture." By Cloudesley Brereton 640
The Indeterminate Sentence By the Rev W. D. Morrison and Henry W. Nevinson ... 640
Mrs. Humphry Ward's Battalions. By Mrs. Thomas Hardy 641
PAGE
"The New Spirit in Turkey." By T. Palmer Newbould ... 641
"The Art of Opening." By R. Mudie-Smith 641
A Seaside Hotel for Working People. By Lily H. Montagu 641
Lord Cromer's Speech. By the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie 642
"The Lost Liberty of the Road." By G. Cook, Geo. Edgar, J. E. Allen, and Henry S. Clough 643
Germany and England. By Arnold Lupton, M.P. ... 643
Do we Overeat? By R. W. J. 643
Coastguard Service. By Charles Sturge 643
POETRY:—
Sonnet—To an Empty Room. By J. Marjoram 643
THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 644
Books to be Read 644
REVIEWS:—
Poetry and Craftsmanship ... 645
The Decline and Fall of "Grove" 646
The Stuarts 647
A Seventeenth Century Mystic 648
"The Little Brown Brother" 648
BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
Old England 650
Nature Rambles in London ... 652
American Shrines in England 653
Nature Studies by Night and Day 652
Stories by Edgar Allan Poe... 652
The Imperial Drug Trade ... 654
A Novel Reader's Guide ... 654
THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 654

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The Sultan of Turkey has proclaimed the Constitution of 1876 as the only means of keeping his hold on Macedonia. This was endangered in two ways, by the Young Turkish movement and also in his eyes by the reform proposals of the Powers. The Young Turks made extraordinarily rapid progress last week, and before the Sultan proclaimed his Constitution, it had, in fact, been proclaimed for him in all the principal towns of Macedonia. It is doubtful whether the Adrianople or the Anatolian armies could have been depended upon to fight the Macedonian army; but even a successful civil war would have put the Sultan at the mercy of the Powers. The choice then was between yielding to the demands of Turkish reformers and risking his throne in a civil war with the prospect at the end of it of more European interference. The alternatives would have been hard for the founder of the most highly centralised bureaucracy in the world, but the defection of the Albanians, the ruling of the Sheikh-ul-Islam that the Young Turks in the army could not lawfully be treated as rebels, and lastly, the fact that the movement in the Macedonian army is strongly Nationalist as well as Liberal, were amongst the considerations that turned the scale in favor of a Constitution. The grant of Midhat's Constitution was followed up later by an iradé proclaiming an amnesty and the abolition of espionage; and the Sultan's Council has been reconstituted with Said as Grand Vizier. The telegrams from Turkey have been occupied all the week with scenes of congratulation, and amid the enthusiasm no one seems to have thought it necessary to ask for further guarantees that Midhat's Constitution will not be sent to sleep again as it was in 1877. But certainly the grant of a Constitution has already had a remarkable effect in obliterating the dislocations of race and creed. It is noteworthy that the new British Ambassador to the Porte, Sir Gerard Lowther, was received on his arrival with great enthusiasm. Great Britain has suddenly recovered her influence at Constantinople.

* * *

The House of Lords, disregarding the Constitutional rule which forbids them to amend Money Bills, have introduced two important changes into the Old Age Pensions Bill. The first is an amendment by Lord Cromer proposing that the machinery of the Bill shall come to an end on December 31st, 1915, though the rights of existing pensioners are to be respected. Lord Cromer was not deterred from moving by a solemn warning from Lord Rosebery that the House of Lords should avoid all responsibility for the measure, nor by the Lord Chancellor's forecast that the House of Commons would certainly regard the amendment as a breach of its privileges. Lord Lansdowne, however, supported it on the ground that the Pensions Bill was concerned with public policy as well as with money and therefore that the Lords were entitled to amend it. The Cromer amendment was carried by 77 votes against 45, the 77 including four Dukes and Lord Lansdowne. The second amendment by Lord St. Aldwyn removed the time limit to the disqualification of paupers, and it was agreed to without a division. There is no doubt that the action of the Lords infringes on the famous resolution of 1678, and it is probable that the Speaker will to-day rule it to be a breach of the privileges of the House of Commons.

* * *

Sir Edward Grey made a speech on the foreign situation on Monday thoroughly permeated with the Liberal spirit. Speaking on the reform movement in Turkey, he said that he welcomed the situation, hoped that the Christian nationalities would co-operate with the reforming Mohammedan party, and admitted that an internal progressive movement was better than the forcing of reforms from without. He welcomed the proclamation of a Turkish Constitution, and said that in Macedonia, England would preserve an expectant and sympathetic attitude. He denied strongly that the Anglo-Russian entente had, or should have, "any hostile point" towards any Power, or that we aimed at Germany's isolation. On the Congo question he thought that the question of trade must be separated from that of humanity. Forced labor must cease, but that implied a sufficiency of land for the natives. The Government still reserved its view as to annexation. In Persia our policy must be one of non-interference, but genuine movements on behalf of freedom would lack no sympathy from us, and we desired to see a Government resting on the confidence of the people. The speech has been very well received abroad.

* * *

The International Peace Congress, which opened its sittings on Tuesday, has been formally received by the King at Buckingham Palace, the King declaring, in answer to its Address, that the promotion of goodwill among the nations was the "surest and most direct means whereby humanity might be enabled to realise its noblest ideals." The Christian Conference, which preceded the opening meeting, was attended by many heads of the Anglican and Nonconformist Churches. The most definite statement of the Christian position was that of Dr. Horton, who insisted that the Church could no longer allow, far less bless, war, but must recognise that Christianity forbade it absolutely, and preached non-resistance. Lord Courtney, in an address of singular elevation of tone, insisted that the aim of the Peace Movement was to establish a law doing away with national violence on the lines of the law which did away with private violence. The time would come when the individual States of Europe would be able to carry their causes of disagreement to a supreme court of their creation. Mr. Lloyd George, speaking at the Queen's Hall, amid interruption from rowdy Suffragists, said that it was time to protest against the Christian communities spending £400,000,000 a year on preparations to kill each other. The German scare of to-day was paralleled by the French scare of yesterday. Germany and England exchanged fears, but German panic was more intelligible than British panic, for while we had the two-Power standard for our Navy, she possessed no such two-Power standard for her main force, which was her Army. The modern crusade should be the Peace Crusade, for Peace was now the "great holy purpose" uniting princes and peoples.

* * *

At Tabriz neither the Royalists nor the Parliamentarians have been able to gain further advantage, but Colonel Liakhoff is busy recruiting and arming Cossacks for the Shah's service, and a strong force has already left Teheran for Tabriz. Yet the Shah has only to withdraw the wild horsemen of Rakbin and the Orujtebid, and the town would probably submit without further resistance, for, as its leaders have explained, they have no quarrel with the institution of the monarchy. It is hardly possible to acquit the Shah of wilful vindictiveness in his policy of repression. Thursday's "Times" contained a long account of the formal apology made by the Persian Foreign Minister a fortnight ago, for the blockading of the British Legation at Teheran. The right of political asylum was thus vindicated without equivocation, yet this asylum has since been refused by the Legation at Tabriz under instructions from home. Sir Edward Grey explained, on Monday, that in future the asylum will not be given to people who use the Legations for political purposes, but only to those who are in danger of their lives. The distinction would seem to be a very unreal one in Persia now with the Shah in his present mood, and it has worked very badly at Tabriz. Sata Khan and his friends who were refused asylum at Tabriz were surely in danger of their lives, and there is good reason for thinking that had it been given, the town would have escaped the sufferings that have since overtaken it.

* * *

The Irish Universities Bill was read a third time in the House of Commons on Saturday last by a majority of 188, only nineteen hostile votes being recorded. It passed through the House of Lords on Monday, and was read a second time without a division after what Lord Lansdowne properly described as a course of fair and temperate criticism. Mr. Birrell, in taking leave of it in the Commons, met the charge that it was a denominational measure by saying that it was "intended to meet the educational needs of the people of Ireland, the large majority of whom were members of a particular denomination." This description was endorsed by Mr. Massie, who, in a very interesting article in the "Westminster Gazette," declares that though he would have preferred a "great Irish secular University," the Bill sacrifices "no Liberal principle." It provides an atmosphere for Catholics in much the same sense as Oxford or Cambridge provides an atmosphere for members of the Church of England.

* * *

The one blot of the measure is, we think, the arrangement under which students at Maynooth, the clerical training college, will be eligible for a degree, as Mr. Balfour said, "without having to put in one week's residence at the University." Such a provision must certainly weaken the intellectual character of the Irish priesthood. Undergraduates educate themselves even more than they are educated, and this natural training young Irish priests will lose under Mr. Birrell's scheme. Meanwhile, we strongly endorse the plea of the "Daily News" for the effective preservation of the Medical School maintained by the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland. This school will now be the one non-sectarian institution of the kind in Ireland. It has done admirable work, and it has the advantage of meeting the case of poor students who cannot afford an Arts' course. Such an institution should not be crushed by a heavily subsidised school attached to the new University, and British Liberals and Nonconformists have, we think, a right to ask that it should be saved.

* * *

The condemnation of Tilak has led to rioting in Bombay so severe that Australia actually telegraphed an offer to lend a regiment. The trouble began on the morning after the trial, when the bazaars and most of the Hindu shops closed, and by noon on the same day 20,000 cotton operatives had struck work—the first instance, we think, of the use of the strike as a political weapon in India. Rioting began later and continued for several days, and three times the mob had to be fired on by the military before it would disperse. Tilak is the most influential citizen in the Presidency, and his reputation has been made largely by Government prosecutions; but his importance would be the first reason for singling him out for punishment if the jury were right in holding that his writings were Nihilistic. But the motives of the prosecution are evidently not generally understood in India.

* * *

Some correspondence was issued this week with the Natal Government which the "Natal Witness" declared to be tantamount to a rupture between the Crown and the Colony. That is exaggerated language, but the passages were certainly the sharpest in a conflict that has been going on with little intermission for two years. The decision of the Imperial Government to pay Dinizulu's salary was described in a dispatch from the Natal Government as "belittling" to the colonial authority, and likely to lead to more trouble with the natives. A few hours after the receipt of an appropriately chilly reply from Lord Crewe, the Natal Government sent troops up to Usutu, apparently with the idea of fulfilling its threat that it would have trouble with the natives for the third time in two years. A less loyal way of continuing the argument could not have been devised, nor one that shed more discredit on the spirit of Natal's native policy. Happily, the Opposition at home have supported the Government in its contention about Dinizulu's salary, and though Mr. Lyttelton makes reserves in other points of controversy with the colony, there has been no attempt to turn the conflict to party advantage. As the correspondence and the debate in the Natal Parliament this week showed, there is much disgust in Natal with the contumacy of the Colonial Government. Natalians have begged us to remember that the Government does not really represent them. They call it a "bushrangers' Government," meaning that the electoral system gives disproportionate preponderance to the country vote. Mr. Moor, the Premier, for example, was elected for a county constituency by a smaller poll than the junior member for Durban had of a majority.

* * *

A POINT about the Natal Bill of Indemnity which was raised here last week was discussed by Mr. Seely in the South African debate on Tuesday. It had been suggested by Miss Colenso that the clause of the Bill legalising the proclamation of the Supreme Chief covered a proclamation of Colonel Mackenzie last December deposing Dinizulu, and that, therefore, Dinizulu would never recover his position whatever the result of the trial might be. In reply to inquiries from the Home Government Sir Matthew Nathan stated that Colonel Mackenzie had been given no authority to exercise the powers of the Supreme Chief, and it follows that the Indemnity Bill will not prejudice the status of Dinizulu. If Miss Colenso's view had been correct, the Government was ready to disallow the Indemnity Bill. As it is, the Government mean to advise the King to give his consent as the only means of getting rid of martial law in Natal. With the Royal assent to the Indemnity Bill will disappear the Government's only chance of influencing Natal's native policy or of discouraging the monstrous abuses of martial law of which the Natal Government has been guilty.

* * *

MR. BURNS, met from both sides of the House on Wednesday with stories of the abuses of motor traffic, admitted that public opinion was moving against the motorists, and promised to prepare a new circular to local authorities. We have great respect for Mr. Burns, but we must tell him at once that his remedy, even if it is carried out, is quite insufficient. He is an engineer, and, as such, he is, not unnaturally, a partisan of motor cars, whilst his Department and the Home Office have completely failed to regulate their use in the public interest. It is not a new circular but a new law that public opinion demands. This was practically, though not formally, the plea of strong Conservatives like Lord Halsbury, Lord Willoughby de Broke, and Mr. Walter Long. Mr. Long declared that one of the greatest evils of the traffic was its destruction of cottage gardens by dust showers, and the way in which it made life for the poor in rural districts "well-nigh impossible." Most speakers agreed that it was ridiculous to apply the same speed-limit to rural districts or stretches of straight, unfrequented roads and to urban or village thoroughfares, and that it was necessary to set up new standards of speed for different localities. THE NATION has been asked in many quarters to organise the general demand for fresh legislation. As a preliminary step, we may say that we shall be glad to receive from careful correspondents accounts of the driving of motors in various districts during the present holiday season.

* * *

THE trial of Mr. Sievier on a charge of blackmailing Mr. J. B. Joel, better known to the South African courts as Isaac Joel, has ended in a verdict of not guilty. This practically implies that the jury thought that Sievier did not extort money from Mr. Joel by the threat of publishing gross attacks on him, but that Joel aimed at trapping Sievier into committing this crime. The prosecutor admitted that he had done "a dirty trick" in using Mr. Mills to bring about the transaction with Sievier; the jury probably regarded this as almost an admission of having played a "dirty trick" on Sievier. The facts were obscure, and involved much hard swearing. Two comments occur. The first is what is to happen to the £5,000? We do not know whether the bright lexicon of Ruff contains such a word as "ought." If it did, we should have thought that the money should go back to its princely donor. The second is whether, after the finding of the jury, Mr. Joel is to remain an ornament of the turf. The verdict was eminently popular, and the court, as in most of these sensational trifles in which the law intervenes, was turned into a theatre. To-day Mr. Joel is one of the most generally disliked men in England; it will be remembered that he belongs to the set of financiers who engineered the South African War.

* * *

THE trial of endurance which we have agreed to call the Marathon Race ended on Friday week in a nominal victory for Dorando, one of the Italian competitors, and a real victory for Hayes, the American. Dorando ran the twenty-six miles from Windsor to the Stadium at Shepherd's Bush in 2 hrs. 54 min. 46 secs., Hayes's time being 2 hrs. 55 min. 18 secs. But Dorando—who, by the way, belongs to a Bersaglieri regiment, perhaps the finest long marchers in the world—entered the Stadium half dazed and at the end of his strength, fell again and again, and was helped to his feet and supported to the tape by friends and even by officials, who thus spoilt the race they had to judge. The Queen interpreted popular feeling by presenting a special cup to the young Italian on Saturday. Hayes was adjudged the winner, and to him the Marathon trophy was awarded. The cruelty of the test was denounced by many who witnessed its exciting finish, but it is desirable to maintain the physical standard in a great city-State like ours, and feats like those of Hayes and Dorando help to preserve it. On the whole, the American team secured a considerable triumph. They won eighteen events against our twenty-three wins in the Stadium, and established some astonishing records in strength and swiftness of foot. Their friends showed over-keenness in one or two races, and once or twice they seem to have been treated with some want of tact. But the American attack on Lord Desborough's fairness is ridiculous. America seems to over-emphasise our own fault of treating sport not as play but as a form of business.

* * *

THE tramwaymen's strike in Sydney, which ended suddenly this week, is interesting as evidence of the growing dislike among Australian workmen of compulsory arbitration. The subjects in dispute were insignificant, but the men (who are State servants) refused to submit them to arbitration as provided under the Industrial Disputes Act of New South Wales, and demanded a departmental inquiry. When this was refused, they went out on strike, although by so doing they rendered themselves liable to criminal prosecution and to civil action for damages against the union funds. A letter from the Parliamentary Labor Party advising them not to break the law by striking was suppressed, and public opinion throughout was strongly against the tramwaymen. The strike broke down through the ease with which the labor of the men was replaced, and as the Government threats to enforce the severe penalties of the Industrial Disputes Act were not enforced, their value has not been tested, though they certainly failed to act as a deterrent.

Politics and Affairs.

THE DANGER WITH THE LORDS.

It was characteristic of the House of Lords that, in Monday's debate on the Pensions Bill, it should by one amendment propose to limit the duration of the Bill to seven years and by another to strike out the time-limit of two years to the present exclusion of paupers from its benefits. But we shall take leave to say that the Peers will adhere to neither of these generous impulses. In the first place, they have not the power to insist on them, and in the second place, they will soon be convinced by Mr. Balfour that even if they possessed such a power, they will not be allowed, in the interests of the Tory Party, to use it. The constitutional position is quite clear. In the abstract the Lords retain the power to reject a Money Bill altogether. In practice they do not possess it, or, at least, they dare not exercise it with effect, for it is defeated by the old constitutional maxim that supplies only originate with the Commons. Thus the power of the purse, thwarted in 1908, can be reasserted in 1909. This is what happened in 1860 when the Lords threw out the Bill repealing the paper duties, and were answered by the present expedient of including all taxation in a single Bill, and this is what would happen to-day. In any case, the right to amend Money Bills is gone for ever. The resolution of 1678 declares it to be the "undoubted and sole right" of the Commons, in dealing with Money Bills, to "direct, limit, and appoint in such Bills the ends, purposes, considerations, limitations, and qualifications of such grants, which ought not to be changed or altered by the House of Lords." Erskine May held that these "conditions" and "qualifications" included the "duration" of all rates or public charges, the very point which Lord Cromer's amendment assails. If if be argued, as Lord Lansdowne argues, that the Pensions Bill is not a pure Money Bill, the answer is that it is far nearer that definition than was the Voluntary Schools Bill of 1897, when Lord Halsbury, in the sacred name of privilege, forbade the peers to take from the charges it imposed or to add one maravedi to them. The Pensions Bill was ushered into the Commons by a financial resolution, it is already linked by an express provision to the Budget of 1908, and it must enter into the entire scheme of the Budget of 1909. We shall be much mistaken, therefore, if the Speaker does not to-day rule the amendment to be a breach of privilege, and in any case the Government will move to disagree with it, and by irresistible pressure can sweep it away.

In point of fact no pressure will be needed, or rather it will be supplied by the real leader of the House of Lords, who is Mr. Balfour. Lord Cromer's amendment was the work of the man who has had no recent experience of Parliamentary Government, and shows, we are bound to add, singular incapacity for adapting himself to it. Those who have followed our recent Parliamentary history know perfectly well what the House of Lords is and what it is not. It is, as Profesor Lawrence Lowell well says, Conservative with a big "C" not with a little "c." "It has become for party purposes an instrument in the hands of the Tory leaders, who use it as a bishop or knight of their own color on the chess-board of party politics." Mr. Balfour, acting from across the corridor that separates the two Houses, like the unseen player who governs an exhibition of "automatic" chess, will at once advise the peers that the Cromer amendment is not in the game, and that the half-opened move must be retraced. For it shows, in the first place, the singular laxness of view, the want of political sense and knowledge, of the House of Lords. Supposing the amendment were carried. Does Lord Cromer or Lord Lansdowne imagine that in 1915 either a Liberal or a Conservative Government will dare to give up Old Age Pensions, or will even qualify or restrict the national gift of 1908? Both parties would, of course, be equally pledged to the maintenance of the Bill. The Treasury officials would call for a definite financial scheme, the local authorities would say that administrative uncertainty about the continuity of the pensions was intolerable, and public opinion would say that it was cruel. The only political effect would be to discredit the House of Lords and show how incompetent it is, in spite of its superficial show of wisdom and its capacity for large generalisation, when it touches a practical concern of the national life.

But Mr. Balfour will be still more concerned to check the House of Lords in any course which, while it reveals the naiveté of young recruits to Toryism like Lord Cromer, deflects that assembly from its appointed purpose of helping him back to power. This, and not the consideration of Bills or policy on their merits, is what the House of Lords is expected to do. Its business is to make Liberalism unpopular. Clearly it cannot fulfil this function by throwing out or mutilating obviously popular Bills. Now and then it is allowed to work its will on special subjects, like Scottish land, where its members have private interests, for Mr. Balfour, being a Scottish landlord himself, and no mere slave of logic, makes allowances for human nature. But this is the by-play of politics. The wearing down of the Government must be accomplished by the scientific method of hitting it through the House of Lords wherever the hit seems likely to please the people, or a section of the people, by dividing the Liberal ranks, by discrediting them through frequent rejections of Liberal Bills, by holding up to ridicule a big Parliamentary majority as a weak and beaten force, by suggesting that the House of Lords is against faddists, Puritans, teetotallers, Socialists, and all extremists and oppressors of the investing widow and the speculative orphan. This is what Professor Lowell means when he calls the Lords Conservatives with a big "C." They are not what Bagehot thought they were or might become, a revising body, with a certain unwritten mandate of conscience and intellect to keep things from going too fast, to give the democracy here and there a chance of second thoughts. And therefore we may at once assess the seriousness of all the Lords' interventions in politics by asking whether they advance or retard the purely partisan ends which the Tory wirepullers desire that the Peers should serve.

For this reason we are not concerned with the Cromer and St. Aldwyn amendments to the Pensions Bill. We confess that we are much more concerned with the growing disposition of the Lords to assert their power of revising legislation on the ground that, under the rule of the guillotine, it is insufficiently considered in the Commons. Here Lord Lansdowne is on stronger ground than the Cromer amendment affords him. There can be no doubt that the guillotine does tend to de-popularise and devitalise the House of Commons. The Lords complain that Bills come up to them late, and that they come up unrevised by the Lower House. Both complaints have a measure of truth in them. The Commons cannot neglect Supply, and ought not to neglect general criticism of politics. The Executive ought not to suppress the personality and work of the private member. All these things are happening, and yet the revision of legislation, rigidly parcelled out as it is by the closure, is most imperfect. The discussion of Supply has this year necessarily been cut down to the minimum of twenty days, and some of the great Departments have gone through the year almost uncriticised. The House, under the new impulse to activity and public spirit which the Liberal Government has awakened, works with immense zeal, but its "general sense," that great instrument of the Parliamentary power, and its function as the "grand inquest" of the nation, tend to be obscured. Great measures tend more and more to represent the uncriticised thought of their authors, that is to say, of the Executive and of the permanent officials, who work more and more obscurely under the new device of legislation "by reference." This process takes interest, independence, élan, and real power from the Commons. And there is always a danger lest, in a country like England, timid, and "fond of a lord," an ably managed and reformed House of Peers may absorb the moral and intellectual influence that should belong to the representative House. This is a peril of the future, and though the tasks of this Government are many, it is, we think, bound, before it goes, to fortify the House of Commons against the House of Lords. The Commons want larger powers of criticism and self-government than the rule of the closure allows them, and unless these are obtained, there will be a weakening of the central force in the Constitution.

THE GROWTH OF A LIBERAL EUROPE.

Sir Edward Grey has never made a better speech than he delivered on the Foreign Office vote last Monday. Without departing from his habitual dignity and restraint, he displayed a certain warmth and humanity of feeling, and in all his references, whether to Turkey, to Russia, to the Congo, or to Germany, spoke for the Liberal tradition which is frankly on the side of the people against despotism and financial exploitation. The speech has been praised in every capital of Europe, and those of us who have been among Sir Edward's critics in the past should be the first to thank him for an utterance which was an expression of the best impulses of English public opinion. His reference to the Congo was, perhaps, a little less explicit than the rest of the speech, but the circumstances are peculiarly delicate and obscure. So far as it is possible to follow the protracted debate in Brussels, it is difficult to be optimistic about the prospects of annexation. But Sir Edward Grey made it perfectly clear that the new fact of annexation will find him prepared to insist to the utmost on the observance of the conditions under which the Free State was originally founded. In his handling of the Persian situation, he expressed, in the clearest terms, his sympathy with the hopeful constitutional movement. Nothing is irreparably lost, even in Persia, and though the Shah is master of Teheran, the reformers are holding their own in the most populous city of Tabriz. Even if they are ultimately overpowered by disciplined troops, they have broken the long tradition of Persian passivity. It is proper to insist that we cannot actively intervene in this civil struggle. Our only criticism on the results of the Anglo-Russian Convention is, that while we have scrupulously observed our pledges of non-interference, Russia has been working on the side of despotism through agents whom she formally disavowed but really controlled. Our duty in this conflict is not to intervene, but rather to use our influence with Russia to impose on her an equal impartiality.

The sudden crisis in Turkey imposed a severe test on Sir Edward Grey's statesmanship. It required some imagination to grasp its significance, and some promptitude to adjust our policy to this wholly unexpected development. Hitherto, like every Foreign Minister since Lord Derby, he had proceeded on the assumption that Turkish misrule is quite incurable, that the Moslem reformers are a negligible factor, that our only task is to secure tolerable conditions for the Christians of Turkey, and that the best way to do this is to detach Macedonia, and, if possible, Armenia, from the direct rule of Constantinople. This was at once a logical and a humane policy, and from 1876 to 1908 nothing of importance had occurred to suggest an alternative. A close observer who studied Turkish life on the spot would sometimes raise a protest, and point out how this hostile attitude tended itself to discredit Turkish reformers and to arouse the very fanaticism which we dreaded. But so long as the Young Turks seemed to be living quietly in Paris on the memory of Midhat's achievements, they were outside the reckoning of practical politicians. In two weeks the situation has been greatly modified, if not entirely transformed. The Sultan has restored the Constitution of 1876, and, best of all, he has done this because he had no choice. He has yielded to triumphant force, and behind the arms of the revolted regiments of Macedonia there is now the formal sanction of religion. The elaborate structure of theocracy, which he has spent a lifetime in building, has crumbled away, and the army contentedly follows a revolutionary committee with a Positivist at its head. The ferment of revolt has unchained a fine and generous spirit in the Turkish masses. The mob in the capital pays visits of courtesy to the Armenian and Greek Patriarchs and the Bulgarian Exarch. In Salonica the Bulgarian guerilla chiefs, half bandits, half patriots, have abandoned the ten years' struggle in the mountains to dine with the rival Greek leaders in the mess-room of the Turkish officers. The bands themselves have melted away, and even Yildiz Palace has been cleared of courtiers and spies. History shows no precedent to such a revolution, and its best aspect is the tolerance, the chivalry, and the magnanimity of these young Turkish officers. They have saved their country alike from despotism and from disintegration at the hands of Europe, but in their triumph they show neither arrogance nor malice.

But even at such a triumph the spirit of criticism lies in wait. We may be sure that Abdul Hamid will plot revenge. It may not be difficult to play on the old instincts of fanaticism. The Parliament when it comes together in November, without a common language or a common culture, untrained and inexperienced, will encounter all the risks of personal, religious, and racial rivalry. It is easy to prophesy that it will fail, and easy to invoke the disastrous precedent of 1876. But the parallel is in two respects incomplete. The reformers of 1876 were a little clique of officials. They had the students behind them, but the army was quite indifferent, and there was no organised popular conspiracy. To-day there is a competent and energetic party of reform, and it has proved its power to control the army. In the second place it was only the Russian War which enabled Abdul Hamid to appeal to the racial and religious solidarity of the Turks. The Christians looked to Europe for salvation. The documents in Midhat Pasha's life made it abundantly clear that Abdul Hamid was from the first as false as Midhat himself was sincere in his work for the Constitution. Lord Derby had the same problem before him as Sir Edward Grey, but he acted with less decision. Then, as now, the choice lay between imposing special reforms on behalf of the Christians, and promoting the general renaissance of the Empire. Midhat Pasha fell because he insisted on the entrance of Christians into the military schools. To-day the Young Turks, with the same sure strategical instinct, demand their admission into the army. There lies the cardinal point. Midhat made one desperate effort to win British support and prove his sincerity. He offered to make the Turkish Constitution an international document, a pledge given to the Powers, a species of treaty which they would have the right to control. The Russian War and his own fall checked that project. It might well be revived to-day. In return for a general pledge of real equality in Parliament, the services, and the army, we might well consent to waive our special interferences in Macedonia and Armenia. These are questions for the future. Meantime, Sir Edward Grey has consented with a wise generosity to postpone the Anglo-Russian scheme for Macedonia. If Turkey will reform itself, Europe would only make mischief by interfering.

This crisis makes its own commentary on the rivalry between Great Britain and Germany which formed the other main topic of Sir Edward Grey's speech. Germany chose in Turkey as in Russia to "put her money on the wrong horse," that is to say, on the Palace. In both countries a revolution, only partly successful in one case, triumphant in the other, has strengthened British influence. It is the general play of such causes as these which creates the "isolation" of which she complains. She is for the despotism of the day; we are for the democracy which in due time surely arrives. While this contrast of method and temperament subsists between the Prussian and the Liberal spirit, there will always be a certain rivalry and antagonism in the realms of diplomacy and opinion. But it is of a wholly different rivalry that Lord Cromer and his school are thinking, when they talk of the probable war in the near future. We notice in this connection a peculiarly foolish and rhetorical article in the "Quarterly Review," which recalls the manner and methods of the Harmsworth school of patriotism. Every transient scare about German waiters and publicans, every Christmas Annual prophecy about a German landing on our shores, every Pan-Teuton dream about a Middle Empire stretching from Antwerp to the Persian Gulf, is here solemnly brought under review and painted in hectic colors of actuality. Does Dr. Schiemann refrain from any word of hostility towards England; that only shows his cunning. Does the campaign of Anglophobia die down; that only shows that its work is accomplished. The mechanism of the coming disaster is carefully explained. Germany is to invade France, while we are preoccupied in the Far East, raising meanwhile a Pan-Islamic movement in Turkey and India. But in such a case the French navy would reinforce our own; Japan is our ally in the East; Turkey is to-day Liberal and Anglophile; the Indian Moslems are determined loyalists. If this school really believed its prophecies, it ought to preach not patience but a preventive war. It ignores the parallel movement which is going on in Germany step by step with the drift to militarism—the growth of Social Democracy, which the ever-increasing burden of debt and taxation only intensifies. "The thing that has been is the thing that shall be," sings this article with a sort of lyrical refrain. One scare succeeds another, and the Jingo of to-day says of Germany what the Mid-Victorian Jingo said first of France and then of Russia. It is true, none the less, that the race of armaments is a real danger, and to danger it adds waste. There have been in this week two remarkable commentaries on this rivalry, first from Sir Edward Grey and then from Mr. Lloyd George. Of their effect we must not judge at once. Prince Bülow's "block" is far from solid, and its numerical superiority is slight. There is in these two facts the pledge of a constant if invisible check behind the scenes upon a reckless policy of armament and expansion.

DEMOCRACY AND THE PEACE MOVEMENT.

The day when peace-makers are subjected to perfunctory blessing as amiable visionaries is passing away, if we may judge by the serious impression made upon the public mind by the International Peace Congress held this week in London. Though wars, rumours of war, and preparations for war still occupy far too large a place in the thoughts and activities of nations, the ideal of international law, administered by an impartial tribunal, as an alternative to the arbitrament of arms, is coming well into the field of practical politics. Its realisation, however slow and gradual, seems assured to those who have watched through the long course of centuries the substitution of justice for force in a series of enlarging areas of human society, issuing in the establishment of stable peaceful government in a cluster of huge Empires and Federal States which, until quite recent times, had remained secular theatres of strife and bloodshed. The peace movement exists to give consciousness and reasoned direction to a gathering fund of human goodwill and community of interest throughout the world. It still counts among its staunch adherents comparatively few men of great public eminence. But the persistent enthusiasm of little groups of "pacifists" in all the civilised countries of the world has already accomplished much, not only in education but in realisation. For the dramatic display of armaments tends to conceal or to disparage the various achievements of international co-operation which the last two decades have brought to pass. Naturally we feel disappointed at the tardy progress made by Governments in utilising the Hague Conference and its Tribunal. But this ought not to hide the fact that we have had the manifest beginning of a great future instrument of international justice, while the growing willingness of nations to bind themselves by treaty to submit their differences to arbitration is a direct product of the same pacific tendency. Again, the internationalising of trade and travel, with its elaborate machinery of postal and telegraphic bureaux, its railroad and monetary systems, the growth of Congresses, Parliamentary, economic, scientific, humanitarian, artistic, and recreative, each with its little permanent framework, form a contribution to the art of international government even more important than the formal political arrangements of internationalism. Such cities as Rome, Paris, London, Dresden, the Riviera, and at least one country, Switzerland, have already become in thought, fact, and feeling, international places. Every decade brings new cities and areas of country into the same category.

In this real community of life and in the ever-growing stream of commerce have we not a sure source of sympathy and a sure bond of interests such as will in time make war a moral impossibility? And yet it would be foolish, in laying stress on these pacific facts and forces, to ignore dangers, some of which appear to spring from the very facility of intercourse among nations. Not merely among the more brutal and ignorant sections of our people, but among certain schools of thinkers and statesmen, the belief in physical force as the basis of government and the ultimate source of national security is so fixed that they regard internationalism as a flimsy barrier destined to collapse at once before the rush of popular passion or even before the stern dictates of statecraft. The spokesmen of these sinister views assure us that we are under a delusion in supposing that world-peace, even in the distant future, is practicable, or that the eternal hostilities of great nations and races can be over-ridden by cosmopolitan sentimentalism. The "Times," an habitual exponent of such philosophy, alludes to the peril arising from "race passions" and "race prejudices" which may "in a moment of uncalculating feeling force the hands of diplomacy." Now a just assessment of modern forces will reverse the order of causation here ascribed. It cannot be denied that the loose contact of masses of credulous, ill-educated people in great cities presents plenty of inflammable material for the appeal of war-makers. But the craving for war does not rise spontaneously in the masses. It is kindled by unscrupulous diplomacy, reckless finance, the pressure of the fighting classes and of criminal journalism. To a combination of two or more of these undemocratic forces, and not to any inherent disposition of democracy, each one of the recent wars must be imputed. The peril alike of armaments and actual war is traceable to the action of political and economic cliques, who, whether the forms of government are oligarchic, as in Prussia and Germany, or democratic, as in the United States or Great Britain, are apt to dominate the State and use it for their ends. A certain unreality which has attached to the Peace Movements in the past is, we suggest, attributable to a failure to fortify their appeal to moral and humanitarian sentiments by any adequate provision for dealing with the powerful interests, economic and social, which, in every state, support great armaments, instigate them, use and inflame the popular passion in the crises which they have provoked.

In this regard nothing can be more instructive than the juxtaposition of the two international Congresses which meet this week and next. In the early decades of Free Trade the conviction that the bonds of expanding commerce between nations must carry a swift and powerful sense of identity of interests and so secure world-peace, was widespread and genuine. The world is now united by a great network of railroads and steamship routes engaged in carrying goods from land to land. But so far from securing peace it appears as if militarism itself were claimed as an adjunct of commercialism, armies and navies existing to secure and improve markets and areas of investment for groups of manufacturers, merchants and financiers. The endeavour of Mr. Chamberlain to divert the anti-foreign passion generated in the country during the Boer war to politics and commerce, representing the trade of nations not as a co-operation but as an antagonism, did not achieve success. But it cannot be denied that large and powerful classes of our people have been inoculated with this poisonous doctrine. Now, although no great business interest may really be served by war, the creation of the standing menace of great armaments, and the diplomatic uses of this force, involving the risk of war, are profitable assets in some quarters of the business world. While two nations always stand to lose by war, there may be special and powerful classes within these nations which stand to gain, if not by actual war, yet by risking war. Thus, until nominally democratic nations can get fuller control over their foreign policy, there can be no security against the maintenance of these abuses, nor will any growth of general goodwill and humanity fostered by international intercourse do more than abate the danger.

While, therefore, we would not force upon the Peace Movement any merely economic interpretation of history, we would encourage them to a clear recognition of the fact that the problem of peace is nothing less than the problem of democracy, in its political, industrial, and moral aspects. Intelligent, contented, and powerful peoples are the real guarantees of peace, and internationalism, like every other government, must be broad-based upon the people's will. Many new assets for peace are discernible, the reduced pressure of population for outlets in most civilised countries, with improved mobility for those who wish to move, a wider identity of international interests in great business undertakings, the increasing damage and expense of wars, the ruinous scale of warlike preparations. These rational checks, however, we agree, will not suffice unless they are accompanied by changes in those ideals of national greatness and prestige which have lured nation after nation to destruction. These changes of valuations are necessarily gradual, but they need not be slow. Most of the groping of past ages towards partial peace has been blind, or at best but dimly conscious. With every rise in the intensity and the social area of consciousness the peace movement may gain an accelerating pace. It may even move on to a new plain of internationalism with more formal and more real guarantees of peace than hitherto were possible, until it lays the corner-stone of a true society of nations

THE HARVEST OF LONDON REACTION.

The London County Council Moderates have now been in office and in power for eighteen months. They have served half their term. In another eighteen months they will be called upon to render an account of their stewardship to those for whom they act in the capacity of trustees. What is their record? The simple answer is that they have falsified their trust. They have destroyed municipal institutions which have been built up after years of labor and the expenditure of large sums of public money, and they have destroyed them in order to placate the private interests which supported them at the last election. Who can claim that the victory which the Moderates won a year and a-half ago gave them a mandate to break up the Works Department, and to sell at a large financial loss the plant and machinery with which that great institution is equipped? What authority were the Moderates given to stop the steamboat service and to attempt to sell for £60,000 civic property represented by boats which cost London £210,000? The action of the Moderates in these respects raises a point which is absolutely new to local government, but is a constitutional issue of the first importance. Governments never destroy without mercy institutions that have been established by other Governments at great public expense. They may amend and they may modify, but they draw the line at annihilation. Party opposition to what is called "State Socialism" has never been taken the length of denationalising the telegraphs and abolishing the direct employment of labor in the Government workshops. In all great enterprises involving the use of large public capital it is an unwritten law that parties shall observe a continuity of policy. Unless this were done, indeed, effective and economical administration would be at an end. A Government would set up something which its successors would abolish, national capital would be wasted, and national resources would be crippled. The London Progressives can never re-establish the steamboats service, and it will take them many years to rebuild the Works Department. It seems to us that there should be some public safeguard against a policy of senseless destruction like that upon which the Moderates have embarked, otherwise we may wake up one fine morning to discover that a freak or a snatch vote has placed in power in London a party intent upon selling up the public libraries, the public baths, and institutions of public safety or public investment which have taken years of time and hundreds of thousands of pounds to establish.

The worst offence which the Moderates have yet committed is the destruction of the Works Department. The execution was accomplished in the small hours of Wednesday morning under circumstances which are characteristic of the rule of plunder through which London is passing. The Moderates pronounced sentence upon the Works Department before taking the evidence upon which they hoped to condemn it. The evidence itself was manufactured and tainted. The ruling party deliberately planned the starvation of the Department by the simple expedient of taking the big constructional works away from it and leaving only the small jobbing works. The result was that establishment expenses which ought to have been spread over a large volume of work were concentrated on a limited area of operations, increasing cost and reducing efficiency. It is absurd to suggest that the Works Department has monopolised County Council contracts. During the fifteen years it has been in existence the Department has received contracts to the value of about five and a-half millions sterling, a sum which represents not more than a tenth of the cost of the work actually done for the central authority. The contractors have always been given the lion's share. The Department has saved money for the ratepayers by the work it has carried out, but this saving constitutes, perhaps, the smallest part of its usefulness. The fact that an estimate from the Works Department was to be forthcoming was a guarantee of fair tendering. Contractors could not rig their tenders in the face of a possible offer from the Works Department. The Department also created standards of building, of wages, and of labor conditions. Its existence was a guarantee that the Council's work was performed economically and well. Now that the Department has gone all these safeguards disappear. The contractors will be able, whether they take advantage of the opportunity or not, to divide the Council's contracts amongst themselves at their own prices, and the old guarantee of sound materials and workmanship is lost. Almost any scandals are possible without a Works Department. Its abolition is a plain invitation to corruption to fasten on a service that has publicly and ostentatiously disarmed itself against it.

The treatment of this Department by the Moderates is typical of their general policy. If they hate the Works Department they loathe what is known as municipal trading. Their attitude towards the policy of steamboats shows that they are equally without imagination and foresight. They run a free ferry which costs the ratepayers £25,000 a year, and they refuse to run a steamboats' service because it fails to show a profit. Had the Moderates been wise they would have placed a service on the Thames this summer and would probably have made it pay. In spite of electioneering promises of "more trams and lower fares," the Moderates have declined to make necessary extensions and have attempted in several cases to increase the fares. So far as it has gone the experiment with a surface contact system of traction has proved an ignominious failure. Incapacity is written all over it. By a strange, though a just, coincidence nearly every step the Moderates have taken—nearly every "reform" they have initiated—has proved a justification and a vindication of Progressive policy. The allegation that the tramways accounts were cooked and faked was repudiated by the special auditors whom the Moderates engaged, and whose recommendations, so far as they represented any vital alteration in Progressive financial methods, were postponed until 1914 or 1915, when the Moderates will probably be out of office and forgotten. Another favorite electioneering accusation was that the tramways accounts did not really show profits. Yet two Moderate chairmen have appended their names to official documents declaring that substantial net surpluses have been realised.

In the routine administration of the Council's general services everything is made subservient to party considerations. Official reports that serve the party's ends are published to the four winds of heaven, whilst inconvenient reports are suppressed, and newspapers are deprived of the Council's advertisements if they dare to tell the public what is going on. Even the meetings of the Council itself are manipulated in the interests of secrecy. At a recent meeting this mean and unintelligent faction deliberately wasted time on trivial subjects for several hours so that a report in which the public were deeply interested—concerning the surface contact experiment at Mile End—should not be reached before the next morning's newspapers had gone to press. A more ignominious confession of weakness was never made. Pettifogging economies have been practised whilst large extravagances are committed. It is estimated that by fixing the price of the first Moderate loan lower than it need have been the majority threw away at least a quarter of a million sterling of public money. They wanted the loan to be over-subscribed in order to prove to the public that the change in control at Spring Gardens had repaired the Council's "shattered credit." The loan was about twelve times over-subscribed, the reason being that the price of issue was unprecedentedly low. Estimates are passed for the expenditure of thousands of pounds on flagstaffs for the schools, but the Moderates decline to feed the children out of the rates, and are compelled to admit shameful records of children being fed in stables, while the stewards of the richest and greatest estate in the wide world economise on London's penny postage stamps. They are discovering, however, that they need an unconscionable number of penny stamps to make up the produce of a penny rate, and the demands upon the ratepayer are no smaller than when the "wastrels" were in office. The Progressives gave the London ratepayer excellent value for his money. The Moderates spend as much as their predecessors; but London gets far less for the outlay. On the merest business grounds alone, therefore, apart from great questions of public policy, the ratepayers will be justified in ejecting the present majority from office at the first opportunity, and in stamping with their censure the ignoble clique of vestrymen who abuse even the feeble term of "Moderate."

Life and Letters.

THE MOB-MIND.

In the power of swift and easy communication of ideas and feelings, which is the salient characteristic of modern civilisation, we find our gravest peril as well as our surest source of progress. Denouncers of the levelling influence of democracy are apt to dwell, perhaps with some exaggeration, upon the facility with which the multitude exposes its inert, receptive mind to any novelty of fashion or opinion. There never was a time, we are told, so favorable to craze-mongers and faddists, to the sweep of new fanaticisms in politics, religion, or hygiene, to the wholesale suggestion of mere advertisement, and the irrational dominion of sheer fashion. It is worth while considering how far this is true, and how far it is the necessary defect of the widening of communications which is the virtue of our age. There are three conditions of modern societies which give increased force to the spread of new ideas. First comes that weakening of tradition and of custom as supreme arbiters of thought, taste, and conduct, which is the first fruit of a liberal education extended to large sections of the people. Next we would place the breakdown of the barriers of class and caste which formerly stopped or retarded the mobility of thought and feeling, and kept even fashion in ring-fenced preserves. The existence of whole peoples that can read and write, and are levelled to a common dignity of life by the forms of civil and political equality, is an entirely novel feature of social psychology. Finally, the development of a general apparatus, printing, electrical, and educational, for the simultaneous communication to the whole civilised world of news which formerly filtered slowly and with difficulty from centre to circumference, has revolutionised all the processes of public opinion and popular sentiment.

The bearing of these great changes upon the problem of individual responsibility is not adequately realised. Have we let loose in man a mere horde of gregarious instincts, of idle imitations—a mere mob-mind to be swayed by the emotional rhetoric of the interested demagogue, and by "the howling dervishes of journalism"—or are the same conditions of civilisation which wrought these changes awakening in the individual mind a reasonable judgment, capable of selection, rejection, and control? To many students of popular psychology it seems as if the close contact of modern city life generated a sort of social consciousness definitely hostile to reason, shifty, irritable, credulous, and violent. The dramatic revelation of these forces of unreason furnished by the Jingoism of our nation a few years ago, with its climax of Mafficking, in which all distinctions of class, sex, or personal dignity were flung aside in rabble orgies dignified as patriotism, leaves a feeling of profound disquietude regarding the future of democracy. Nor is it much comfort to be assured that the peril is graver in America than here. There, as Mr. Bryce has pointed out, the prestige of mere numbers overwhelms the individual, bearing down his personality and producing a submission which he compares with that of Oriental fatalism. "In the fatalism of the multitude there is neither legal nor moral compulsion; there is merely a loss of resisting power, a diminished sense of personal responsibility, and of the duty to battle for one's own opinions, such as has been bred in some people by the sense of an over-mastering fate."

The soberest minds in America are concerning themselves deeply with these phenomena of the mob-mind, and Professor Ross's little volume, "Social Psychology" (Macmillan & Co.), offers a suggestive and most illuminating treatment of the whole field of study. The interplay of numbers of minds operating upon one another at low levels by some process akin to, if not identical with, what we call infection, is not of course confined to mere crowded gatherings. Material contact, though it leads to certain more violent phenomena, is by no means essential. The stimulative suggestion of printed words plays an ever increasing part in grouping minds into separate "publics." In fact, the commercial art of journalism is more and more concerned with the formation and maintenance of such publics. Here, however, we come to a perception of the real nature of the struggle between a higher and a lower sociality, a mere horde-mind and a rational humanity. Turn to any field of profitable credulity, the advertisement of some drug or diet. It becomes less possible to build up a successful and an enduring trade without some growing percentage of specious merit in the article, and there is some growing tendency to apply loose but rational tests to the speciousness. As new grades of ignorant purchasers enter the market the merely irrational power of repeated suggestion holds them for a time. But even the savage islander grows gradually more critical of "last year's beads," and the most credulous community of farmers comes at length to sift and rationalise the virtues of the rival pills which mark their early experiments in personal hygiene. Even the substitution of the yellowest Press for an equally yellow platform or pulpit must bring some advance towards rationality. A Shanghai telegram is less provocative of violent reaction than a Trafalgar Square oration.

The immediate peril consists no doubt in the extraordinary rapidity of the extension of areas for the rapid play of new notions and the exposure of rich new virgin soils of credulity to the faddist, the fanatic, the sciolist, and the profit-monger. How to organise in the individual will a valid power of resistance to these sudden invasions of the horde-mind is the problem as it presents itself to moralists and statesmen, and its solution is the secular battle-ground between conservatism and liberalism. Timid or superstitious souls, distrusting reason as a governor of conduct, would look to a revival of authority and tradition in Church and State as the sole sufficient safeguard of conduct. They would, as far as possible, forbid all exposure to new currents of thought and feeling, believing that the old is better. Liberalism, upon the contrary, claims to temper and to check promiscuous receptivity by stiffening the individual judgment and rationalising the personality. Education is to be its instrument, and personal culture is to find its surest test in the increased resistance to gregarious imitation that it furnishes.

The paramount importance of this consideration is not adequately recognised in our educational plans. For, as Dr. Ross points out, "Up to a certain point education fosters the mob-mind by opening the mind to novel ideas before the critical faculty has been strengthened." When social sanity obtains its proper place as an educational aim, a revaluation of the sciences upon this basis will be made. "Hygiene, psychology, and sociology can ward off more folly than astronomy, physics, or geology. For body, mind, and society are the storm-centres of faddism, the breeding-ground of manias." Armed with these sciences can we confront with security the rush of new fashions, freaks, and formulae? Hardly. For, in the first place, these very sciences, of necessity the least exact, are continually generating their own fads and short-lived novelties; the intellectual footing they afford is none too firm. Moreover, as Professor Ross recognises, it would be a too hazardous adventure to turn every man adrift upon the sea of life with a box of scientific instruments to work out for himself a full art of navigation. If it is not wholly true that a little sociology leads to radicalism, depth in sociology to conservatism, it is certainly the case that with thoughtful sociologists a sense of the wisdom of customs and existing institutions tempers their rationalism. If man were a rational animal to the extent of ninety per cent. of his motives, political, industrial, and every other sort of social reform could proceed at a vastly accelerated pace as compared with the actual pace in history. But to feign this proportion of rationality is not to make it. The actual conservatism of man demands recognition by the most revolutionary of reformers, for its neglect has been the most wasteful factor in a false economy of progress. "To ask religion, government, law, or morality," writes Dr. Ross, "to make extensive and thorough-going changes in a single generation is to ask an army to form a new line in the face of the enemy," for habitual discipline is as essential to the march as the craving for victory itself. The consideration of such changes in the economy of social progress is particularly to be commended to friends of democracy at the present time, for the conversion of democracy from a word into a thing depends largely upon this clear-eyed intelligent assessment of the processes by which the horde-mind can be raised into a collective rational will.

"THE MARATHON."

If poetry is the devil's wine, mankind is no teetotaller. No pledge of truth or science or utility is binding that withholds him from that drink. Matter-of-fact people may exercise their local option till they are dry as dust themselves; mankind eludes them, and into the most prosaic of prohibition States he smuggles the bemused enchantment. His demands upon life are high, nor will he be put off by truth at any price. Let annalists and photographers do their worst; let philosophers strip appearances like an onion till they reveal the thing in itself; to mankind it is the labor of dullness lost, and he remains an artist, a poet, in the soul.

He will have it so, and especially in history there is no purging the drunkenness of his illusions. Our historians may write as badly as they can, they may dip their pens in ditchwater and quote authorities for every line; the reality that they seek is none the barer. Do what he would, Bishop Stubbs composed epics, the very German dramatises, and if you read a parish register, before you have gone ten lines the figures of the dead are moving upon a stage. For drama is man's own contribution to the world, and he demands it everywhere.

Take the story of Pheidippides, which the scholars have been fighting about all the week. Everyone knows it; that story is the one thing everyone does know for certain about Marathon and Pheidippides. Even Browning could not make it unpopular. To be sure, it was all a lie, a pure invention, the growth of slow centuries. No contemporary ever heard of it. If Herodotus had known it, he would certainly have mentioned an instance of happiness equal to the highest he could record—the happiness of Tellus, the Athenian, who lived to see gentlemanly grandchildren and then was killed in battle and buried by the State; or of Kleobis and Biton, the Argives, who dragged their old mother in a cart five miles uphill to service and died in the temple that night while asleep. The fate of Pheidippides resembled theirs, and was as happy; Herodotus could not have missed the story if it had been invented in his time. It certainly had not then been heard of. Six centuries had to pass before we come upon the trace of it, and then the names are uncertain and Lucian himself, who tells the story as we know it, calls the man Philippides. But such matters of fact, inaccuracies, and dubious origins, do not concern mankind. Here was the poetic situation, the touch of dramatic completeness, and men and women insisted that it should be true. Pheidippides met his proper death six centuries after he was dust, and he has been dying it ever since.

One would have thought the bare historic facts enough without embellishment. It was a moment of supreme need; the Persian host had crossed the sea, it had destroyed brave Eretria on the big island within sight of the hills above Athens; it had burnt the town and taken the survivors for slaves and concubines; it had driven a long line of ships hard against the sacred shore of Attica, and now was encamped in barbaric swarms scarcely more than twenty miles away. That was the way the tyrants had come back before, and one of the serpent brood was there to guide them still, having escaped the myrtled swords and the death due to tyrants. Unless help came from Sparta, where was bright Athens now? Let Pheidippides start, a postman by trade and always in training. Past Eleusis, past Megara and the rocks of Theseus he ran, across the isthmus where Corinth was asleep, over the pass into Argos, leaving the Lion Gate of Agamemnon on his left, over the steeper pass into Arcadia, and there, far in front, he saw the jagged peaks of Taygetus where Spartans practised war. A hundred and fifty miles he ran, and within forty-eight hours of the start he was there. He gave his message and had his answer. The Spartans were only too anxious to be of assistance; if Athens fell, their turn would certainly come next; but the army could not march till after the full moon; the decencies of religion forbade it. Five days still to wait before they even started—full eight days before they could arrive, though they marched like the Furies! What a message for Pheidippides to think of as he ran back home, had not Pan himself shouted to him climbing through Arcadia and sent his modest and helpful greeting to the city!

Moon or no moon, Athens must save herself. Alone she sent her sons to the battle, with none but gallant little Platæa to help; ten thousand of them in all—say, one to ten, or one to twenty, who could be sure? Then came the great day of history—the September day that saved Europe from the East and held back curled Assyrians and unalterable Medes and the heirs of Babylonish Nebuchadnezzar from the destruction of our free world. That charge over a mile of open ground, right in the enemy's face, the victory on both flanks, the slaughter on the beach, the sight of Pan, Theseus, and the Man with a Ploughshare openly fighting in the ranks; and then the hurried march home of panting citizens, "stepping out as fast as their feet could carry them," lest the enemy, sailing round Sunium, should be before them at the empty city (for treachery was at work and there from Pentelikon a shield was flashing its heliograph message to the invader); the arrival just in time to hold the harbours and watch the barbaric ships turn their prows and sink one by one below the horizon eastward of Ægina; the honors paid to the dead, the great burial mound and ten columns inscribed with their glorious names for all generations to read; the satisfaction of telling the Spartans all about it when they came at last—that was the real story of Pheidippides and Marathon, just the bald historic facts, and surely it was a story good enough without addition!

But mankind wanted one touch more to complete the drama—just the one touch of necessary perfection. The governors of the city must be seated on their thrones, awaiting the news of fate. Around them is gathered the whole city, shivering with apprehension. Watchers are on the citadel, looking to the east; all eyes are fixed on the dusty track from Marathon. It is afternoon and the anguish of suspense is hardly to be endured. Suddenly a little brown figure is seen running, running as only one man could run—our Pheidippides, who did the record to Sparta and has conversed with Pan! Life or death is upon his tongue—life or worse than death. He staggers into the city and up the street; he can spare no breath for words; right into the presence of the Archons on their thrones he staggers, he falls helpless at their feet, he gasps the two short words of joy and victory, and as he gasps he dies.

The rest of Marathon and its runner is forgotten. Only the thing that never happened is universally remembered, for that is the thing which the spirit of man demands, and most of the history that passes into the lives of men is of that quality, as fine as false. It is unlikely that a wolf suckled the Roman twins; it is certain that Cæsar never hesitated at the Rubicon. The Sibyl did not burn her books; Rome's greatest treasure did not leap into the chasm; we cannot be sure that Henry I. never smiled again; and Prince Hal, for certain, never lay in the Marshalsea. After Pavia, Francis did not write that all was lost but honor. At Waterloo, Cambronne did not exclaim that the Old Guard died but never surrendered, nor did Wellington give the order, "Up, Guards, and at 'em!" Of all such things, we may say that they are too good to be true, and we may also say they are too good to be untrue. They are the only history that counts for man. Even to our myths we add mythology, and by an accident of speech Cinderella's slipper will remain eternally of glass instead of ermine, since every child knows glass to be fit though impossible.

Our poor London crowd has been much abused for its behaviour at the Stadium race—"the Marathon," as they called it in imitation of "the Derby" and "the Leger." Nasty comparisons have been made to bull-fights and gladiatorial shows. We have been called "a community at length debauched by a cheap Press pandering to all that is unrestrained and feverish." "Hysterical" and "bloodthirsty" have been the mildest reproaches thrown at us. The gentlest of our censors has deeply regretted the scene, "especially, perhaps, for one's wife and sister." Well, there was certainly nothing of Marathon about the day. The fate of the world did not depend upon who reached Shepherd's Bush first from Windsor. When Sir Arthur Conan Doyle wrote that "after this supreme epic" (of Dorando's arrival) "all is anti-climax," and that if he were disqualified it would, indeed, be a tragedy, we may grant that he was overdoing it a little. But still we of the London crowd are not quite so yellow as we are painted. We don't want bullfights or gladiatorial shows. We are not particularly bloodthirsty or hysterical; we are not even entirely debauched by a cheap Press, and our wife and daughter are quite capable of looking after their own feelings. But, like the rest of mankind, we hunt the world for drama. If it is not there, we will invent it. And when the drama is there already—when the little Italian, with something of his country's glory to maintain or lose, comes staggering in and falls and falls again, what generous heart could keep as cold as self-righteousness, what judge remain so Rhadamanthine as to refuse him aid?

AN AMERICAN STATESMAN.

In the rogues' gallery of American politics "Fingy" Conners, the chairman of the Democratic State Committee of New York, that is to say, one of the decisive leaders of the Democratic Party in the wealthiest, the most populous, and the most civilised State in the Union, is a prominent figure. To say that he is the most prominent figure would be unjust. Not unjust to "Fingy," but to the picturesqueness of many of his rivals, unjust, for instance, to "Bathhouse John," that fine flower of Chicago politics, still more unjust to his townsman "Hinky Dink," of whose manners, appearance, saloon, character, and power, Mr. H. G. Wells has given us an understanding picture. Even in his own State "Fingy" is not unique. "Silver-Dollar" Smith, it is true, no longer rules his Bowery Ward, and Boss Tweed and his satellites have passed away. But "Big Tim" Sullivan remains, and "Charlie" Murphy and "Silver-tongued" Grady; the genus neither is nor ever will be extinct; and "Fingy" may at least claim to be a full-rounded specimen. As a name he has for some years past been vaguely familiar to students of American affairs. But how much that was representative of the underworld of Transatlantic politics lay behind his cheerful soubriquet probably very few were aware. Happily, that alert and audacious organ of the reforming intelligence of America, "Collier's Weekly," has lifted the veil. In a recent issue the rise of "Fingy" Conners is set forth in vivid and dispassionate detail. The only touch of malice in this sketch of a great career is that "Fingy's" photograph accompanies it. It was enough for Mr. Henry James to glance at the portraits of the Mayors in the City Hall to realise that the history of New York could not have been other than it has been. "Fingy's" photograph is not less illuminating. It should be printed on the menu of every Fourth of July banquet in the United States as the memento of a queer culmination of one hundred and thirty years of democracy.

"Fingy" Conners, the son of an Irish immigrant, was born fifty-one years ago. His father, after sailing most of his life on the Great Lakes, bought a public-house near the docks at Buffalo, in the very centre of a large Irish colony. "Fingy" inherited the saloon at an early age, and by the time he was five-and-twenty had made himself known as "the stoutest man in a free fight, the merriest roisterer on a spree, the toughest keeper of a tough saloon, in all the dock region." The Buffalo hoodlum of the 'seventies had to fight for the leadership of his gang just as much as the London hooligan of to-day; and it was "Fingy's" handiness with his fists that first made him a power. In his ramshackle saloon cocked up on trestles over a culvert, the Republican heelers of the ward—"Fingy" was a Republican in those days—planned and executed their ballot-stuffing, their "colonising" of voters, their rigging of the primaries. On election day "Fingy," at the head of his gang, would sally forth to see that the Democrats were properly clubbed into defeat. By that time he had lost his thumb and won his nickname. Several stories are afloat on the docks, but this is the accepted version: He and a playmate were boasting, back and forth, of their nerve. "Aw, I bet you," said the playmate, "you ain't got the noive to let me chop you fingy." "I'll bet you you ain't got the noive to chop it," said Conners. They got a cleaver; Conners laid his hand down on the block—and they both won. Down the street ran Jimmy Conners, waving the bloody stump and yelling: "He chopped me fingy! He chopped me fingy!"

Conners' saloon prospered. He bought a second. Politics and drink are usually inseparable. In England it is the big brewer who has the political pull. In America—this, perhaps, is the only point at which the Americans are more democratic than ourselves—it is the retail saloon-keeper. Conners, with his two saloons, his Irish parentage, and his exploits as a bruiser, became the boss of the longshoremen in his ward. But commerce for a while lured him from statesmanship. One of the periodic strikes flamed along the Buffalo docks. The lake steamer companies in those days hired their own longshoremen as they needed them. Conners hit upon the happy scheme of contracting to handle all the freight at the docks. He now controls all the processes of transferring freight from steamer to train, not only in Buffalo but at most of the other lake ports. From four to six thousand men are on his weekly pay roll. He bought up the local steamship agents; he sent his own henchmen to form unions among the longshoremen in his employ; if need were, he ranged through the docks like a Roman noble with his attendant cohort of gladiators, and broke up an incipient strike at the point of the bludgeon. In the 'nineties he tried to capture the grain-handling business, and for a time he succeeded. Whenever a grain-ship arrived at an elevator the custom was for the steamboat company to go to a "boss shoveler" and hire his gang of "scoopers." The boss shoveler kept a saloon, organised a force of workers, saw to it that they bought all their tobacco and drink over his counter, and hired out their labor to the companies at a rate that left him a handsome percentage of profit. Conners, when he entered the business, introduced a wage system under pressure, but the hold of the boss-shoveler and saloon-keeper over the men he strengthened until it became intolerable. Himself supplying all the liquor and cigars, he balanced each man's wages against his consumption of whisky and tobacco; and the man who took his full wages home on Saturday night soon lost his job. A strike followed; it was taken up by a politician whom Conners had offended; the clergy were enlisted; and after a violent struggle and many murders Conners was defeated and the grain business taken out of his hands.

With his freight-handling interests, however, continually expanding, and the other interests—newspapers, brewing companies, street railways, ice-plants—he has amassed, "Fingy" is a millionaire many times over. As he grew richer he passed from cowhide boots to brogans, and from brogans to kid boots with spats, and began to slough off the accent of the slums, a feat of which only the American self-made man is capable. He sold his saloons and took a mansion in the suburbs of Buffalo, ornamenting the garden with the word "Conners" spelled out in white rocks on the lawn. With respectability came political ambition. Up to a few years ago Conners was Republican or Democratic, as the whim took him. One of his papers supported the former party; the other the latter. "I plays bot' ends, an' I'm the middle and I can't lose. See!" he said. But the dawn of the twentieth century found Conners a convinced Democrat, bullying his way to the front, attracting the notice of Tammany, and pushing and being pushed into the State chairmanship of his party. It was in that capacity that he led the New York delegation of seventy-eight members at the Denver Convention. "No man I have ever met," says the writer in "Collier's," "looks more what he is. His full head of bristling, wiry hair, black in his youth, is quite grey. The face underneath is solid, and hard and tough beyond description—broad, overloaded with muscle rather than fat or puffy, reddish brown from the descending circulation of that full blood which fed his mighty young thews. His short, hooked nose, fine at the point, broad at the wings, sticks out from the plane of his face at a most aggressive angle. The chin is round, solid, and deeply dented. His heavy eyebrows are set high up above the eyes; and in the intervening space occurs a pad of fat which rolls over the eye-ball, covering completely the upper lid. His mouth in repose is wide, thin-lipped, tight shut, and turned down at the corners—a snapping-turtle mouth. When he is roused, when he opens it to roar, it gapes as round and menacing as the muzzle of a cannon, to show the short, scrubby teeth of the fighting-man. He dresses rather well in these days; he has passed from the era of diamonds to the era of London fabrics. When he tries to 'throw a front' his accent is passable, although his grammar stumbles and he betrays himself by ignorant handling of long words. But get him excited—especially rouse the fight in him—and the old, tough, dock-scrapper comes bobbing to the surface."

Short Studies.

"THE MEADOW OF THE DEAD."

The priest turned from the altar and delivered the Gospel to the people; he was a peasant and built on enduring primitive lines, but old age had overtaken him, and there was weariness and feebleness in his attitude and speech. He was translating the Gospel into the tongue of the people, and his labor gave the words a pathetic appeal. Earnestly and with effort he related the Gospel story, and the language he used, the speech of peasants and fishermen, brought one back to the Gospel age. He told the story of the Apostles' vision, the Saviour walking the waters, and the words, "Let fear not be on ye," seemed more intimate, more comforting in the endearing Irish speech. He preached for a while from the text, and then, without any lapse from earnestness or dignity, went on to speak about the crops, about the necessity for spraying the potatoes, about an offer made to the district through one of the Government Departments. Then he spoke for a while about the death of a man well known to all the people, a man who was of the priest's own blood and name. He returned to the Gospel text, and said again, feebly and heavily, "Let fear not be on ye."

The people did not disperse after mass; they waited about the village and near the chapel to attend the burial. The girls went into the houses in the village, and the young men stood together gossiping or telling stories. The devotees went into the house where the dead was laid out, and a few old men and women lingered in the chapel yard to repeat the traditional prayer on leaving mass:—

> "Christ, farewell, Mary, farewell!
> The Apostles keep me till I come again!"

It was a day that might have been consecrated to some village festival. The summer had come with warmth and light and ease, and the corn stood high in quiet attainment. The children were happy in their holiday dresses. Those beautiful Connacht children had nobler promise than the growing corn or the delightful day.

The coffin was borne out on men's shoulders, and the people fell into order and moved after the bearers. Their way was across fields to a churchyard that held many generations of their dead. And now the children pulled woodbine out of the hedges and plucked the foxglove that stood high in the ditches. The procession moved as though the people were taking part in some grave idyll. In that procession one could see a representation of the life and history of peasant Ireland.

Old men tramped resolutely on. They lived by earnestness and hope, and their bowed shoulders and hanging, uncouth hands brought a religious element into the funeral procession. They looked as if they had been moulded by a common force, but many of them had come back to their little patch of land from the streets of New York, from the dockyards of England from the factories of Scotland. Beside these old peasants walked men of a different world, their sons and nephews who were back from America for a season. These Irish-Americans looked prosperous and effectual, powerful of mouth and jaw. The people near the coffin were from the country towns; they were types of those who had profited by the social revolution. The young men of the peasantry looked keen and ready; they were exuberant on the surface, secretive in the depths. The young girls and the old women still wore the peasant shawl; amongst the women, too, there were returned emigrants, bringing with them dresses and fashions that were incongruous here. These women had marked individualities; they were the unconscious guardians of a civilisation that had been swept from all places except the hearth.

The coffin had been borne through the gate, and while the people were still crossing the fields they heard the lament for the dead. It rose suddenly, a savage abandonment to grief. Other voices joined in, and the caoine took on its rhythmical, monotonous form. The voice of the women became remote and unfamiliar, and then one heard the veritable cry that has gone up from every field in Europe and Asia, the cry that has a memory of all grief, the sorrow of fathers for their strong sons, the heartbreak of women for their husbands and homes, the desolation and despair of broken clans. The people entered the graveyard with that monotonous lament beating at their hearts. And now, in the beautiful Gaelic phrase, they were in the Meadow of the Dead. The grass was high and green over the ridges of graves and ash trees with youthful branches and leaves joyous in the sunlight grew above the dead. A woman left the throng and hurried amongst the graves calling out to her dead. Then many went amongst the graves, some hurriedly, some slowly and reluctantly. Clay fell on the coffin of the newly dead, but the sound was lost in a general lamentation. Old and young, men and women, wept for their kindred. Some, in the vehemence of their grief, broke branches from the trees, and the green boughs of the ash were strewn upon the graves.

It was no longer a lament for one man dead, it was a mourning for the dead generally, for the fact of death. So thought one who moved amongst the graves, an onlooker. Then one figure brought the sorrow to his heart as with a direct utterance. This was the figure of a girl who knelt by a grave. She was massively and nobly formed, and in her dark face there was an unrealised force, a slumbering passion. She belonged to the dark type that is called Spanish in the West of Ireland, which is Iberian perhaps, and belonging to the people whom the new-coming Milesians described as Firbolgs. She knelt by the grave of a young man, weeping silently, without the caoine. The onlooker passed; for him there were dead loves and dead kin, but they were too remote for tears. Nearer and more lamentable were the dead purposes and the dead resolves. Then he mourned for that part of himself that had fallen away; he wept, not for a dead love, but for him whose heart had expanded, not for dead kin, but for him whose heart had been filled with pieties.

PADRAIC COLUM.

Present-Day Problems.

NAVAL EXPENDITURE IN 1909.

THERE can be no doubt that most sedulous efforts are being made by certain organs of the Press and by speakers in both Houses of Parliament to insist on the necessity of an enormous increase of the naval shipbuilding vote in the next and subsequent years, in order to meet the prospective addition to the German Navy of big battleships and big cruisers of the "Dreadnought" and "Invincible" types. The "Times" has put this increase at not less than five millions a year. Other writers and speakers have suggested much larger figures. Mr. W. T. Stead has insisted on the necessity of building two big ships for every one built by Germany, which would mean an increase of about ten millions a year for the next four years, and Mr. Arnold Forster, who was for three years Secretary of the Admiralty, under the most extravagant of Boards, is so impressed with the emergency that he thinks it can only be met by a loan for exceptional shipbuilding after the example set by Germany. Certainly if there be any necessity for such great outlays the financial position of the country for some years to come will be gravely compromised.

Fortunately, Mr. McKenna has not committed himself to any such extravagances. In his recent speech on the shipbuilding vote for the present year he dealt with the future demands with a moderation which gave hope that no exceptional demand will be made on the Exchequer next year. After pointing out that England is at the present time, and will be for the next two years, overwhelmingly strong as regards the new types of big ships, and that in 1911, when the German efforts in the same direction will begin to tell, will have twelve such ships completed, as compared with nine German ships, Mr. McKenna said—

> "he thought that this was a sufficient predominance, even if we had nothing else, but we had a very considerable superiority of strength besides the "Dreadnought" type. . . . . Valuable as most people now agreed the "Dreadnought" was, as a new type of ship, no one would assert that the existence of this vessel nullified the existence of previous kinds of ships. These must be taken into account in striking a balance between the two Powers. What value were we to apply to battleships which existed prior to the "Dreadnought" type? When these types were compared with corresponding types in Germany, we were fully entitled to say that with the preponderance of twelve "Dreadnoughts" as against Germany's nine, the great superiority of the old types of ships would give to this country complete security in 1911."

This is almost precisely what I ventured to urge in a signed article in THE NATION in January last. I pointed out that in respect of battleships and armoured cruisers then existing, without reference to the "Dreadnoughts," the British Navy was immeasurably superior to that of any combination of naval Powers which could probably be brought against it, and that it exceeded that of Germany in the proportion of four to one. I stated that I had confirmation of this view from the First Naval Lord of the Admiralty, Sir John Fisher, who had also told me that he had reason to know that Admiral Tirpitz, the head of the German Navy, in a confidential report to the Emperor, had put the superiority of the British Navy at an even higher ratio. It was, I said, an indisputable fact that the German programmes of shipbuilding in 1898 and 1900 had in their result proved to be very grave failures. They had aimed at numerous comparatively small battleships armed by many guns of inferior calibre, in preference to big ships and big guns. Judged by the experience of the late war between Russia and Japan, these vessels were hopelessly distanced by the more powerful vessels and guns constructed in England. The explanation of the German programme of 1906 was to be found in the discovery by their naval authorities of this error, coupled also with the new stimulus provided by the British Admiralty in laying down the "Dreadnought" and the three "Invincibles," vessels so largely exceeding in size and armament even the larger types of recently constructed British battleships, and still more the German vessels of inferior size.

It is now, I think, beginning to be recognised that our Admiralty, in adopting this new type of big vessel, and in making so great advance in size over preceding vessels, committed a very great and far-reaching error. It put other Powers, and especially Germany, to a certain extent on a level with us as regards future efforts. On the assumption that these new types superseded all previous vessels, it made it easy for Germany to start on a new programme under conditions approaching to equality with England.

It appears, however, that many British naval officers of high authority dispute the alleged great superiority of the new types. They contend that vessels of the "Lord Nelson" and "King Edward," and even other types, armed with fewer 12-inch guns, but with more 9-inch and 6-inch guns, giving a greater weight of broadside, are not inferior in power, and might engage the "Dreadnoughts" on nearly equal terms. However that may be, these preceding vessels are of great value, and will remain so for years to come in spite of the existence of "Dreadnoughts." They cannot be left out of consideration in estimating the comparative strength of the two navies, either now or in 1911 and 1912, or in later years.

It should be recollected that the German programme of 1906 extends over a long period of years. It will not be completed till 1920. By the end of that year it is proposed that Germany shall have twenty-two big battleships and twelve big armoured cruisers of the new types. Two were to be laid down in the first year, three in the second, four in each of the next four years, and after that two in each year till 1917, and the ships will all be completed in 1920. The result will be that in 1911 there will be nine such vessels completed, in 1912 thirteen, in 1914 twenty-one, and in 1920 thirty-four. These vessels, a very formidable addition to the German Navy, are estimated to cost £68,000,000, of which thirty-two millions will be provided out of loans, and the other half out of monies voted annually by the Reichstag. In addition to these thirty-four vessels, it is proposed to retain in the service fifteen battleships and eight armoured cruisers now existing. The number of battleships will not exceed the number contemplated in the programme of 1900, though the majority of them will be of far greater size, and twelve armoured cruisers of the "Invincible" type will be added to the programme of that year.

The question arises, then, how England should meet this new development of the German Navy? It will be admitted by everyone that we cannot reasonably maintain the existing proportion of our battleships and armoured cruisers to those of Germany, viz., four to one. To do so would involve the construction by 1920 of 136 big vessels, and starting with twelve already completed or laid down, we should have to lay down twelve of such vessels in each of the next ten years. This would mean an annual charge of nearly £22,000,000 for new big ships, irrespective of other classes of ships such as cruisers, torpedo destroyers, and submarines.

Nor, I think, can it be contended that we should build in the proportion of two to one of the German ships. This would result in 1920 in a number far beyond the two-Power standard. If a proportion of twelve to nine, which Mr. McKenna says will be sufficient in 1911, be taken as sufficient also in 1920, having regard to other then existing vessels of types less in size, the number of big ships required to meet the thirty-four German vessels would be forty-four. Deducting the twelve already built or building, this leaves thirty-two as the number which must be commenced in the next ten years, or three in each year with two over. As many people might be alarmed at the prospect of Germany commencing four such vessels in each of the next three years while England would lay down only three, it may be well to make the number up to four for the first three years, and three in each of the following seven, when Germany will be laying down only two in each year. This will result in forty-five big British vessels in 1920, as compared with thirty-four German, and coupled with the other vessels of smaller types, the "Lord Nelsons," the "King Edwards," the "Formidables," and others, will give us an assured equality over any two other naval Powers, and a superiority over Germany as great as in 1911.

The most recent programme of France is to construct fifteen big ships by the end of 1919. Of these, six were to be laid down in 1907. In fact, only four have been commenced. It is impossible to contemplate a combination between France and Germany against us. The two-Power standard was devised when Russia had a formidable navy, and when there was possible, if not probable, danger of a combination between France and Russia, or between Germany and Russia. This danger no longer exists in consequence of the disappearance of the Russian Navy.

Let us suppose then that the Admiralty decide to lay down four big ships in each of the next three years, and three in each succeeding year till 1918, and let us assume that each such vessel will cost £1,800,000, exclusive of armament. Let us further assume that one-eighth of each of these vessels will be built in the first year, one-half in the second, and three-eighths in the third year. The finance of such a proposal will result in a charge to the shipbuilding vote of about £900,000 for 1909, £3,600,000 in 1910, and £2,700,000 in the third year. For the year 1909 there will also fall due one-half of the cost of the three big ships laid down in 1907, or £2,700,000, and one-half of the two ships laid down in 1908, or £1,800,000, making a total for the year of £5,400,000. If the same sum be provided for new constructions as in the present year, viz., £7,500,000, this will leave over £2,100,000 for the advance or completion of "Boadiceas" and torpedo destroyers and submarines commenced this year.

In 1910 the four vessels commenced in 1909 will entail a cost of construction of £3,600,000; £1,800,000 will be required for completing the two vessels commenced in 1908, and £900,000 for commencing four more big ships, a total of £6,300,000, leaving about £1,000,000 for other vessels. For 1911 £3,600,000 will be required for advancing the four vessels commenced the previous year, £2,700,000 for completing the four vessels commenced in 1909, and £900,000 for commencing four more vessels, a total of £7,200,000, leaving £300,000 for other constructions.

In 1912 three new ships only will be laid down, in place of four in the previous three years, but the completion of the four commenced in 1910 will require £2,700,000, the advance of the four commenced in 1911 will require £3,600,000, and the three new vessels will require about £700,000, a total of £7,000,000, leaving £500,000 for other work. In later years the requirement will considerably decrease. Three new ships will be built on the average in each year. The cost will be £5,400,000, leaving £2,100,000 for other purposes.

I have shown, I think, how such a scheme of construction, which is only a logical deduction from Mr. McKenna's statement, can be carried out without any addition to the shipbuilding vote for 1909 and the four subsequent years, and with a possible reduction of the vote in later years.

In 1920, on the above scheme of construction, the comparative strength of England, Germany, and France as regards battleships and armoured cruisers, omitting those which will be clearly obsolete, will be as follows:—

	Big Ships of New Types of 20,000 tons		Existing Battleships of 11,000 to 16,300 tons		Existing Armoured Cruisers of 9,000 to 14,800 tons
	No.	Tons	No.	Tons	No.	Tons
England ...	45	900,000	41	649,000	35	413,000
Germany ...	34	680,000	15	187,000	8	76,000
France ...	15	300,000	16	168,000	22	299,000

	Total
	No.	Tons
England	121	1,962,000
Germany	57	943,000
France	53	767,000

The naval strength of England will greatly exceed that of Germany and France together, and will be considerably more than double that of Germany. On the strength of these figures I cannot but think it will be admitted by everyone that it would be a grievous waste of money to pile up the numbers of these monster vessels by laying down more of them than I have suggested in 1909 and succeeding years.

EVERSLEY.

THE HARMSWORTH BRAND.—III.

WE have said that the Harmsworth method of running the Harmsworth papers is strictly modelled on shopkeeping. The remark is not really just to the shopkeeper. The law does not permit him to sell "flannelette" for flannel or to advertise "margarine" as pure butter. But there is nothing to prevent the adulteration or misdescription of the things of the mind. A firm like the Harmsworths can describe the mechanical nonsense it purveys as great fiction, it can mask its trade cunning as philanthropy, and label its passion for profit and circulation as public spirit. However, a good deal of direct dealing in non-literary goods is done under the Harmsworth system. Thus the children who take in "The Boys' Friend"—variously addressed by their "sincere friend," the editor, as "dear League members" and "dear young friends," and occasionally exhorted to exert their friendship by acting as child-touts for their sincere editor's newspaper—have been invited by the "Boys' Friend Novelty and General Supply Department" to buy almost every kind of article dear to boys' hearts at "wholesale prices." Another paper arranges with various tradesmen to set up its readers with goods at a discount of a penny in the shilling. Presents of jam, tea, and holiday excursions, which prove, on closer inspection, to be schemes for promoting the circulation of the papers, come within the various departments of the Harmsworth provider. "Good Words" is more ambitious. It deals in "girl evangelists," who, with other aids to faith, are supplied by the "Good Words Evangelists' Bureau." Recently "Good Words" purveyed another kind of article in the shape of suggestive literature, thoughtfully disguised as indignant comment on certain salacious novels. Dr. Horton publicly described this process a few weeks ago as that of "collecting the worst passages in the most immoral books it could find."

But "Good Words" is not the only religious organ issuing from the Harmsworth press. It had a rival in "The Weekly Dispatch." The "Dispatch" has had a long career in journalism, and in a sense it has survived its passage into the Harmsworth melting-pot. That is to say, it has not been killed outright, like "The Sunday Magazine," once edited by Dr. Guthrie. It has only been slain morally and intellectually. Most journalists and politicians of middle age remember the "Dispatch" under Mr. Ashton Dilke, Mr. Fox Bourne, and Dr. Hunter. It was an organ of serious Radicalism, a little dry, but thoroughly competent, appealing to people who cared for ideas and were accustomed to discuss them. What it once became under the Harmsworth management was a scandal even in the not too censorious world of Fleet Street. The scandal has been abated; the "Dispatch" is now a fairly colorless record of sport and trivialities. But during 1906 it was an open sewer. It is impossible to believe that its character was unknown to its proprietors. It shared with the "Daily Mail" some of its most precious possessions in romantic writers. And its most distinguished, most advertised contributor, Mr. Jabez Balfour, was reported in the newspapers as being the guest of Lord Northcliffe on his release from prison.

We have described generally the character of the "Weekly Dispatch" within the period we have fixed. But we must do its conductors the justice of noting that it never ceased to be a religious newspaper. A corner—a somewhat exiguous and obscure corner, it is true—was reserved for "The Sunday Hour." The corner was regularly filled by most of the popular preachers of the day, who may not have been quite accurately seized of the general aim and tendency of this estimable journal, and was adorned by pious counsel and prayers not devoid of unction. One of these aspirations was a petition to be shown "the glory of goodness, the true nobility of character." Unfortunately for the readers of the "Dispatch," their opportunities of envisaging "noble" character were obscured by the overwhelming mass of ignoble, not to say abandoned, character presented for their inspection. While Religion lurked modestly in its corner, Crime stalked at large over hundreds of columns and scores of pages of the paper. And one type of crime in particular. For months the special occupation of the "Dispatch" was to blazon forth cases of sexual disorder. The miseries of divided households, the squalid recriminations of faithless and embittered wives and husbands, the low secrets of dark natures, revealed in vile or reckless deeds, were raked forth from a hundred sources, the stories embellished with idealised photographs of the offenders, especially of the women.

Even the recorded facts were not enough. The "Daily Mail" some years ago took credit to itself for refusing, very properly, to publish the details of a low case. But its sister publication must not only report crime, and, above all, sexual crime, so fully that a visitor from Mars, gleaning his view of Earth from its pages, would probably conclude that five-sixths of her inhabitants were criminal lunatics; it must force its readers' imagination back to the most morbidly sensational of these offences by giving them a thinly disguised imaginative setting. This was the treatment of the unspeakable Thaw trial. As soon as this case was over, the "Dispatch" started a serial story, which it advertised with the accustomed zeal and circumstance of the Harmsworth journal, called "Evelyn." In illustration and text it repeated, with a thin veil of reticence, the details and texture of the original pattern of depravity. Nothing could more clearly reveal the purpose of the paper to live out of the appetites of the pruriently curious. All through the period with which we are dealing the "Dispatch," with page after page loaded with divorce cases and crime stories, advertised, by means of the firm's specially retained accountants, Messrs. Layton Bennett, the growing circulation of the journal. Seduced girls were allowed to write to the paper asking for husbands, and stating their qualities and accomplishments.

Not that the "Dispatch" was exclusive in its devotion to sexual offences. Average crime was not forgotten. When Mr. Balfour emerged from prison, he was snatched from all journalistic competitors by Lord Northcliffe, and led forth as the captive of that far-glancing spear. He began with a prolonged story of his own life in prison, luridly illustrated and stretching over the whole front page of the paper. The narrative, told with some measure and reticence by a man of unusual intelligence and power of observation, might have had its useful purpose for instructed ears. But that was not enough. A kind of "boom" was set up in Mr. Balfour's personality and unhappy story. Interest in the author was fed by a careful analysis of his character. Under the title "Crimson Crimes," he was set to re-describe in detail the most sensational murders of recent times, including those of "Jack the Ripper" and Deeming. This again was in the early vein of some of the Harmsworth weeklies, the vein of "Chips" and its worthy companions. A series called "Forgotten Fights" served to relieve these golden memories, and to open to the fortunate readers of the "Dispatch" those "heavenly riches—peace and love, trust and hope, goodness and moral strength"—for whose descent their editor prayed.

We desire to be fair, and we do not blame the Harmsworths for all the too notorious vices of Sunday journalism. It is possible that worse papers than the "Dispatch" of two years ago, or of last year, have been published in England. The Harmsworths originate nothing, good or bad. But at length the journal grew too notorious. Its character was suddenly changed, and the offence which seamed its columns like the scars of a foul disease was reduced to something like a tolerable proportion of its contents. But the prolongation of this feature, the continued advertisement of the commercial success of the paper, seem to forbid the theory that this odious adventure in journalism was other than a deliberate choice of method. There is no need to be pharisaic in order to divine and condemn its evil. Crime cannot be kept out of newspapers, and sensational crime will, from time to time, absorb the minds of the people. But to organise the reporting of it on the scale of the "Dispatch" of 1906-7, to open sexual disorder to the full view of the young of both sexes, to weave it into hotly and falsely colored fiction, to spread it out week by week, month by month, till the world seems soaked with it, is an offence of a grave order, and to entrap the simple by seasoning these actions with religious cant, is a graver offence still.

(To be continued.)

Letters from Abroad.

AN EPILOGUE TO AN UNFINISHED DRAMA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In the introduction to his book on the "18th Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte," Karl Marx refers to Hegel's remark that history repeats itself. "But," he says, "Hegel forgot to add that things occur the first time as a drama and the second time as a farce."

In some of its features the now adjourned Eulenburg trial has recalled this saying. The comparison with the famous trial against Count Arnim that occurred some thirty years earlier lies very near to hand. Prince Eulenburg at a certain time was to Prince Buelow what Count Harry von Arnim had been to the first Chancellor of the German Empire. From a friend he became, like Arnim, if not a rival, at any rate an obnoxious critic. In his case, just as in Arnim's case, it was the question of the Imperial policy in regard to France that occasioned his fall. And, having fallen into disfavor, Eulenburg finds himself a disgraced man in open court, as did Count Arnim. Here, indeed, the parallel ends. Arnim was, even according to the procès verbal, prosecuted for political acts, whilst Eulenburg stands before the judges accused of perjury and gross misconduct. Arnim's trial was a State trial, and was treated as an event of high political import. Eulenburg's trial, on the contrary, is a trial in the common criminal court, and would be treated as an everyday criminal affair but for the high rank and the former political position of the accused. Even when convicted Arnim remained a recognised member of the high Prussian aristocracy. The convicted Eulenburg will be looked upon by his own class as an outcast. In Arnim's case Bismarck himself came forward as the accuser. The unfortunate Brandenburgian squire could boast of having been slain by the hands of the all-powerful iron Chancellor. In Eulenburg's case, neither Prince Buelow nor even Count Holstein, the instigator of Herr Harden, who first denounced Eulenburg in the Press, had cause to enter the scene.

To him who judges after appearances this might settle the question of the inferior character of the Eulenburg case as compared with the Arnim case. Your correspondent does not share this view; but I am not going to argue this point here. Nor do I think it proper to speak of Eulenburg as a criminal before his trial is concluded. Undoubtedly the evidence until now is against him, and his ways of defending himself are far from being dignified. He denies things which to the unbiassed appear quite undeniable, and, to clear himself, he throws out innuendoes which he cannot sustain if pressed to a decided statement. But the habit of the British Press to suspend judgment until a case is ended in court seems to me most preferable to the partisan methods a large section of the German Press has displayed at this Eulenburg trial. Seldom, if ever, has public opinion been worked upon during a trial as scandalously as has been the case at this affair. When Bismarck resolved to prosecute Arnim he had, true, the reptile Press at his disposal, and many agencies swamped the Press with articles and paragraphs directed against the former ambassador. But there was a brutal frankness about it all, and the accusations remained absolutely political. This time the campaign has from the outset been one of personal revenge rather than with a distinct political purpose, and through a number of channels most damaging accusations of all sorts were levelled against the fallen diplomatist whilst he was in prison and could not answer them. He was already out of office when the campaign against him and his friends was started.

What has been his political crime? We are told that three to four years ago it was his influence that neutralised the endeavours of Herr von Holstein, the wirepuller of the Foreign Office, to push Germany into a forward policy in regard to Morocco. It is known what irritation was created in France by the language of the semi-official German Press and some Ministerial speeches on the Morocco question, and it is also known how suddenly Germany's attitude changed in this respect and the fanfare grew into chamades. The principal author of this change, they say, has been Prince Eulenburg. And at any rate it was this change of policy that caused the resignation, if not dismissal, of Herr von Holstein.

In the face of these facts, one is almost compelled to subscribe to the sentence of the "Berliner Tageblatt" that it was perhaps the most praiseworthy act of his political life that led to Eulenburg's fall. Democracy has no reason to range itself by the side of an Eulenburg. The accused Prince belongs to those privileged classes who are the sworn enemies of democratic reforms in Prussia, and nothing permits us to assume that, with all his literary and artistic accomplishment, he thinks otherwise about these questions than the majority of his caste. But neither has democracy reason to act as the tool of his enemies. Politically they are hardly better than he. Count Arnim fell because, as a class or caste-conscious reactionist, he, in contradiction to Bismarck, wanted Germany to support the monarchical intrigues in France. Eulenburg's private immorality has been exposed by those who knew of it for many years not because of a particularly revolting new misdemeanour, but because of his opposition to the policy of the "rattling sword." A short time after Count Holstein's dismissal appeared those mysterious lines in the "Zukunft," the weekly review edited by Herr Maximilian Harden, where the "harp player"—der Hafner—and the "sweet one" exchanged words about the highest in the Empire. By the harp player Eulenburg, the author of the famous "Song to Aegir," was meant; the expletive, the "sweet one," was the Secretary of the French Embassy, M. Lecomte, and the suggestion was that these two men helped French interests to the detriment of Germany.

In this light the matter has been represented to the public, and the exposure of Prince Eulenburg and his friends—the "Tafelrunde" of Liebenburg Castle—has been described by its authors as instigated by motives of high patriotism only. But one must be credulous indeed to believe it. Guilty as Eulenburg probably was, his exposure can only be regarded as the outcome of a desire for personal revenge. Much has been talked about the liberation of the German nation from the government by a camarilla. But this is all nonsense. It has yet to be shown how personal government can be altogether separated from camarillas. They will return in one shape or the other as long as the policy of the nation is in the hands of irresponsible persons instead of the nations themselves. The Eulenburg gang was thrown over to make room for another gang. That is the only immediate political result of the affair.

Indirectly and in coming years it may have other results beside. There is no denying the fact that it has shown everyone concerned in a most unfavorable light. You meet Pharisaism, cowardice, revengefulness, petty intrigue wherever you look on this page of the history of our time. It must strengthen the desire to change a political system that makes decisions of the greatest import for the welfare of the nations dependent upon the personal feelings and connections between high officials.

The social democratic Press has well understood this, and without showing any love for Prince Eulenburg, is almost unanimous in refusing to play the game of his enemies. But other Radical papers seem to have become the victims of a clever gang of intriguers. Perhaps the very crooked ways of the prosecutor have influenced their judgment. The trial has shown up many defects in our laws and habits concerning penal prosecution. The courts have failed in many respects, and the Press has assumed offices that ought to have been left to the courts. The one was the natural consequence of the other, and slowly people begin to see how much a thorough reform is needed in this matter. But this is a topic which requires more detailed observation.—Yours, &c.,

ED. BERNSTEIN.

Berlin, July 25th, 1908.

Communications.

THE STATE OF THE DAILY PRESS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your articles upon the Harmsworth Brand tempt me to make a few remarks upon the state of the daily Press in England, about which many people are troubled; and no wonder. Certain facts about that Press are obvious and disquieting. But vague disquiet will do no good. We must recognise the facts, and try to make the best of them. One obvious fact is that it costs a great deal of money, much more than it used to cost, to run a daily paper efficiently. It is, therefore, a very perilous adventure to start one, as the case of the "Tribune" proves. This being so, those papers are most likely to succeed which are started by men with a great deal of money and much experience in using it to the best advantage. That is to say, papers are likely more and more to fall into the hands of great organisers of business; and that is what is happening. These organisers are not villains; but they sell newspapers, as other organisers sell soap, with the object of making as much money as they can; and there is not necessarily any more harm in that than in other commercial enterprises, provided we all recognise the fact. But the trouble is that we do not recognise it, and that newspapers profess to be different from what they are. Whether or not the opinions of newspapers have had any peculiar value or independence I cannot say. It may be that in the past they have tried to commend themselves to their readers by the value and independence of their opinions. It is certain that the modern purely commercial newspaper does not do so, and that its opinions have no more value or independence than that of any other purely commercial enterprise.

If this were generally understood, these opinions would have no weight, and would do no harm. Indeed, these newspapers would probably soon cease to pretend to have opinions at all, since nobody would want to read them. But, unfortunately, it is not generally understood. The public have got into the habit of taking the opinions expressed anonymously in a newspaper more than the opinions of individuals who sign their names to what they write; and they continue to do this even in the case of the leading articles in purely commercial papers. Thus these articles have an influence which they would not have if it were generally understood how they are produced, and their influence is dangerous because it is based upon a delusion. The power of riches is increasing everywhere among us, and chiefly because we do not see how it is exercised. Rich men are not usually cunning villains who aim at power insidiously, but circumstances all favor their power, and it is only human nature that they should exercise it. Their chief way of exercising it now is by forming the opinions of the poor, and the Press is their chief instrument for doing this. If only the poor knew this, the Press would lose its power; but the poor do not know it. They recognise the fact that the Press has a power over them, but they think it is the power of independent intellect, not of money.

Now there are two ways out of this. The first that the pen should lose its power altogether, that it should cease to express opinions at all and only retail news; the second that it should really exercise the power of independent intellect. The first of these seems to me impracticable. People like opinions in newspapers, and newspapers therefore offer a means of exercising power through the expression of opinions which is sure to be made use of. There only remains the alternative that newspapers should exercise the power of independent intellect; which means that the men who write in them should have the power which is now possessed by their proprietors. As I am a journalist, I naturally wish this to happen; but I will try to prove that it would be good for the public as well as for journalists. There is only one way of contriving it, namely, that all expressions of opinion in a newspaper should be signed. If that were done, the public would, at least, be under no delusion about the authority of what they were reading. They would know that it was written by one man, that it expressed his individual opinions, and not the opinions of some vague entity with interests and aims beyond their knowledge. Of course, the individual journalist might have corrupt interests; but his chief aim would be to make his name, and he could only do this by the quality of his writing, whereas a newspaper can make its name by the excellence of its news, and may use that excellence to foist the most interested trash in its leading articles upon the public. At present, the anonymous journalist is in the power of the newspaper proprietor, that is to say, of the capitalist, because he is anonymous. However well he may write he makes no name, and, therefore, he is always tempted to say what his proprietor tells him to say rather than what he thinks himself. And there is no journalist so much in the power of the capitalist as the writer of leading articles, for even those who know the names of the anonymous art or musical critics upon a paper cannot identify them. The result is what might be expected. The quality of leading articles in daily papers is usually much lower than the quality of their other articles, and, unfortunately, it is the leading articles that have the greatest and most important influence upon opinion. For they are supposed to possess some mysterious authority, for the sake of which readers put up with their dulness and vagueness and diffuseness. Now there might seem to be no way out of this. For even if leading articles would be better signed, the newspaper proprietor is the man who settles whether they are to be signed. He has the power, which he exercises through his paper, and, naturally, he will not do anything that will transfer that power to his writers. But we have to remember that the proprietor's chief aim is to make money; and that fact, which now makes newspapers so dangerous, may be used to make them saleable. The power of money is a blind power, and chiefly exercised to get more money. The newspaper proprietor, to do him justice, is just as willing to make money by selling a good article as by selling a bad one, and if he can make more money by having signed articles in his paper than by having unsigned articles, he will do so. It it can be proved that signed articles are better than unsigned, and sell a paper better, then signed articles will prevail. I believe the daily Press in England can only be saved by this means, and that, otherwise, the journalist will become more and more the helpless tool of the capitalist, as the novelist would be of the publisher if all novels were anonymous. It remains, therefore, for journalists to fight as hard as they can for the right to sign their articles, and for the public to support them.

I may point out, lest I should seem to be rebuking you, sir, for your unsigned articles, that my chief arguments do not apply to a weekly paper, such as THE NATION, since that must recommend itself to its readers by the quality of its articles alone, and not by the quality of its news.—Yours, &c.,

A JOURNALIST.

July 30th, 1908.

Letters to the Editor.

"WANTED, A NEW SCHEME OF CULTURE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It would seem that if a new scheme of culture is required, there is also wanting a new theory of culture. Has not the whole idea of culture become too bookish, cloistral, and academic, a hothouse plant, in fact, because people have forgotten the origins from which it sprang, and which are, or should be, still some of its main sources of supply. The root of the evil seems to me that people unwittingly postulate culture as the sine quâ non of a man's leisure, a highly important point, but not, to my mind, the chief. Surely the really, fully, completely cultured man is the one whose culture pervades, and not only pervades, but arises out of, his life's work, as well as giving meaning and savour to his leisure. The man who has to leave his culture at home when he goes into the world reminds me too much of the pious business man who puts away his prayer book on Saturday night for the week.

I have lately been lecturing to an educational audience of some 8,000 people in America on this very subject, in connection with the idea of making education a preparation for livelihood as well as life, and the apparent approval shown by the audience of the ideas presented to them emboldens me to ask you to find a place for that part of my lecture which dealt with the formidable objection that the introduction of scientific technical training would endanger the amount of culture the child who leaves at sixteen should receive in the school. The whole argument hinges, it will be observed, on the principle that perfect culture, i.e., the man who lives a self-consistent life, and not in compartments, one cultured and the other not, must be made up of two elements, one general, the product of social environment, and the other special to his profession and calling, and that these two act and react incessantly on one another, inasmuch as the special is really the first kind in the making. Here is the actual analysis.

Now what is culture? Is it Latin or Greek, or mathematics or literature? Are not all these rather the vases and receptacles of a certain essence of culture, but is not our common culture something infinitely wider? Is it not really the ground-down indistinguishable fossil débris of all inventions and discoveries, mechanical, mental and moral, often as indistinguishable, as regarding its original elements, as the ground we tread on? Nearly all knowledge has begun, or begins, by being specialist and technical, whether it be the knowledge of the shepherd, the shipwright, or the medicine man. It goes through a second and more scientific stage when attempts are made to codify it and reduce it to a system, be it sheep-rearing, shipbuilding, or theology. The second stage is often overlapped by a third, in which it is taught in the schools, or may, through intercourse, be diffused among the general public. I would instance the three stages that arithmetic has gone through as a good example of how what was a mere necessity for counting grew, as the thinkers got hold of it, to a science, and concurrently passed into an element of general culture, as its knowledge was gradually diffused by the school or by social intercourse.

In its broadest sense, then, general culture represents the sum-total of the socialised results of human endeavour in the mechanical, mental, and moral fields. Can we, therefore, without peril, confine the idea of general culture to mere linguistic, or even, literary, knowledge, whose very vocabulary is largely composed of the half-forgotten formulæ of intelligent work, and exclude the arts and crafts which have contributed at least an equal third with the other two sides of human activity towards the building up of its present heritage? In a word, if we cut ourselves off from all participation in the oldest and most fundamental form of self-expression, how can we consider ourselves the possessors of perfect culture?

But while there is a sort of general basal culture, deep or shallow, narrow or broad, according to the education and upbringing of the individual, which is common to all, and is diffused by the home, the school, or the social milieu, there also emerges a special culture from the particular training that each receives, be it that of the future lawyer, doctor, artist, or craftsman, that has its own peculiar form and significance. Such a culture is only possible when the training has been an intelligent one, that is, when the recipient has reacted on his training, and has dominated his subject instead of allowing it to dominate him. In the case of the future craftsman, the aim would be to produce, for instance, trained intelligence, not mere dexterity, and, at the same time the educator would be careful to dovetail the special culture with the more general culture that the pupils receive. I contend, in all seriousness, that this special culture is the most precious a man can possess. It enables him to take joy in his life's work instead of looking on his means of livelihood as a necessary evil, as many do to-day, and find their pleasures in life in such "by-products" as "hobbies or golf." What should we not add to the sum total of the happiness and efficiency of a nation if we could materially increase the numbers of those who take a real interest in their work!

Now, frankly, what does general education exactly mean? If the history of medieval education proves one thing, it proves that all education was originally technical and professional. Such general education as then existed served as a mere preliminary to the professional end. Bologna and Salerno were monotechnical institutes, the one trained lawyers and the other doctors. Paris was a polytechnic, preparing for the law, medicine, and the church. Latin and, later on, Aristotle were the basal studies in all these cases, simply because it was in Greek and Latin that the lore of the three professions was embodied. By the way, it is of capital importance to note that it was the technical need of turning out a more finished doctor, lawyer, or theologian, that gradually extended the so-called general education to a later age. The growing needs of the technical rendered, in fact, greater the need for more general education, with the result that the bachelor of arts who took his degree at twelve in the twelfth century now takes it as late as twenty or twenty-one. So far, then from the technical cutting down the time for general education it actually lengthened it.

The Renaissance, which confidently believed it had discovered, in the recently recovered classics, a new heaven on which a new earth could speedily be founded, only confirmed the supremacy of Latin and Greek. The professional position was further obscured by the fact that the ancient tongues were henceforth employed for the education of the leisured and aristocratic classes, whose professional training was supplied by the grand tour they were supposed to make at the end of their school studies. The sense of a professional training in England has been further cloaked and masked by the fact that our training of the classes dirigeantes in the universities has been rather an ethical training, arising out of social intercourse, leading to a knowledge of men, than an intellectual training in mere book knowledge; in a word, a training in that most difficult of subjects, mancraft, so essential to all who enter public life.

It may be interesting to record that, at another meeting, a speaker made a most profound impression by pointing out that this training in mancraft was carried over by the early settlers to America, and the passionate attachment of American democracy to the general side of education was explained by the inborn feeling of the necessity for the liberal education that all democracies, if they are to survive, must possess for training their future citizens for political life. It is, indeed, curious, to see English ideals fished up in America after having evaded recognition for nearly 300 years.

You will note that these theories, which can easily take practical shape, would not only greatly widen the circle of culture, but that they also form, as it were, a bridge between the cultured and uncultured, who appear to-day so sharply divided.—Yours, &c.,

CLOUDESLEY BRERETON.

July 29th, 1908.

THE INDETERMINATE SENTENCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am much obliged to Captain St. John for his reply to my letter, but I fear he has not grasped the essential points of it.

A full reply to your correspondent would involve a discussion of the whole prison system, and your columns are not the place for that.

I do tell Captain St. John that Superintendent Scott does not know beforehand what will become of his "patients" when they are set at liberty. I tell him, further, that the Elmira Reformatory cannot be cited for the purposes of the present Prevention of Crime Bill. The Elmira Reformatory is intended in the main for juvenile offenders or men in early manhood, and not, in the first place, for old professional criminals of the type aimed at in the English Bill. Besides, if he will read the leaflets of his own society (The Penal Reform League) he will find that the indeterminate sentence does not exist at Elmira. All the prisoners in that prison are committed for a certain maximum period, which must not be exceeded. They are not committed for an indeterminate period. The Elmira system is the system I am advocating, that is to say, a maximum sentence with large powers of conditional liberation. Captain St. John must get up elementary facts before he steps into the arena of controversy.

Captain St. John also omits to notice what I have pointed out, that conditional liberation is not to take place, as he assumes, under the existing prison methods, but, as I have said, under a milder prison regime, in which the opportunities of arriving at a knowledge of the prisoner's real character will be greater than they are now. Besides, as Professor Prins (admittedly one of the most eminent authorities, both as to the theory and practice of penal law and prison administration) has pointed out, there is a fundamental difference between the case of a man under a fixed sentence, with conditional liberation to mitigate its length, and a man under a sentence of indefinite length, with liberation coming he never knows when, or, perhaps, never coming at all.

I do not know what Captain St. John means in the last paragraph of his letter. But I will close mine by repeating what I said last week. The only practical prison palliative (not remedy) in the case of the professional criminal is (1) a fixed period of detention covering the most criminal period of life, (2) a milder prison regimen owing to the length of detention, and (3) a wide latitude in the matter of conditional liberation, so that the duration of imprisonment in promising cases may be shortened. The Prevention of Crime Bill could easily be amended to embrace all these points. At present it is marred, as you have already pointed out, by a clause which is bad in principle and impossible in practice, I mean the clause which enables the authorities to detain a prisoner for ever if they think that, when released, the prisoner will relapse into crime. It is impossible for any human being to say beforehand of a prisoner in detention that he will, or will not, relapse into crime.—Yours, &c.,

W. D. MORRISON.

Marylebone Rectory, July 28th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In defending the introduction of the indeterminate sentence into our laws, Mr. Gladstone, as reported in the "Times," quoted a case which only illustrates one of the many dangers in his proposal. Speaking in the House, on June 12th, he mentioned the case of a man who had been sent to Broadmoor for a murderous assault upon his wife. After a time he was discharged by the authorities. He went out and murdered his wife. Now, this was a case much easier to judge than the ordinary man in prison, for mental disease follows more definite lines than moral failing, if we assume the man in prison has morally failed. What is more, the authorities who decided on the case were, presumably, far more competent to decide than the warders and other prison officials with whom the decision would chiefly lie under Mr. Gladstone's Bill. They were men of high education and special scientific knowledge. Yet they were wrong. In spite of all their science, and the comparative simplicity of the disease, they were absolutely mistaken.

Who, then, is to decide in the case of a man's soul, full of incalculable variety, subject to incalculable changes, conversions relapses, and every degree of hope and desperation? I can hardly imagine a measure showing greater ignorance of the human spirit, or likely to develop a more dangerous tyranny in the hands of the officials and experts who will administer it.

Or, look at it in another way; the more unjust a man feels his sentence to be, the less likely he is to conform to prison rules and win favor with prison officials. If, for instance, I had three times received so unjust a sentence as the Suffragettes are now serving for a political offence, I hope I should have the strength to break every possible rule, to reject the prison food, to tear up the prison clothes, and drive the chaplain out of my cell. Under Mr. Gladstone's indeterminate sentence I should probably be doomed to spend all my life in the Isle of Wight, while the habitual housebreaker in the next cell, dimly perceiving a sort of tame justice in his imprisonment, would soon earn his release by conforming to every regulation and joining in the hymns with unction.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY W. NEVINSON.

July 30th, 1908.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S BATTALIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Does Mrs. Ward well consider what her movement of antagonism to the Suffragists' movement means? She is really blocking the way to the production of splendid mothers in the future. The Suffragist movement is for benefiting men as well as women—the whole race in fact. She will hamper but not defeat them. Again, and again, advances will be made, and new ground obtained everywhere—but delay is an evil.

She can raise an opposing army easily. There are hundreds of women incapable of comprehending the matter and its very grave issues; there are unreflective idle, immoral excitement-seekers, and others, all delighted to join in opposition to something—having no heart pangs, because their hearts are atrophied, their mental status etiolated, whose lives are degraded, being darkened by selfishness caused by what the Suffragists so earnestly desire to banish for ever—slavery to men's opinions and judgments, lack of citizenship, of liberty. Pioneers of new movements for benefiting mankind are ever in a minority. Majorities are too often fools in bulk.—Yours, &c.,

EMMA L. HARDY.

Max Gate, July 28th, 1908.

"THE NEW SPIRIT IN TURKEY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Here is an interesting parallel:—

THE NATION, July 25th, 1908.

"With the Bulgarians of Macedonia they (the Young Turks) are now said to be negotiating. For the moment it is only the Greeks who appear—we hope only appear—to think that they have more to gain by keeping on intimate terms with the Palace."

"Le Courrier de Sophia," July 18th, 1908.

"Il semble que les dernières nouvelles, selon lesquelles la propagande jeune-turque en Macedoine se seraît servie de l'intervention du comité des bandes bulgares, ne se sont point confirmées. On a cependant des renseignements que des journaux, des brochures et des feuilles volantes ont été introduits en Macédoine par la Serbie et surtout par la Grèce. Dans ce but des officiers turcs se sont rendus à la frontière grecque. Ces renseignements sont dignes de foi, car une partie des officiers et prisonniers turcs en Macêdoine sont philhellènes."

Yours, &c.,

T. PALMER NEWBOULD.

Broadway Chambers, Ilford.
July 25th, 1908.

"THE ART OF OPENING."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The extremely interesting article in your last week's issue under the above heading tempts one to commend his or her favourite "openings." Surely the following example of the art is supremely good:—

"The ancient and famous metropolis of the North sits overlooking a windy estuary from the slope and summit of three hills. No situation could be more commanding for the head city of a kingdom, none better chosen for noble prospects. From the tall precipice and terraced gardens she looks far and wide on the sea and broad campaigns. To the east you may catch at sunset the spark of the May lighthouse, where the Firth expands into the German Ocean, and away to the west, over all the carse of Stirling, you can see the first snows upon Ben Ledi."—"Edinburgh," R. L. Stevenson."

Boswell's opening of Johnson's Life is sonorous and arresting:—

"To write the Life of him who excelled all mankind in writing the lives of others, and who, whether we consider his extraordinary endowments or his various works, has been equalled by few in any age, is an arduous and may be reckoned in one a presumptuous task."

Compare with this the brief pistol-shot opening of "A Sentimental Journey":—

"They order, said I, this matter better in France."

Satisfying openings in fiction I hardly dare begin to quote, but chief among these is that of "Don Quixote":—

"In a village of La Mancha, the name of which I have no desire to call to mind, there lived, not long since, one of those gentlemen that keep a lance in the lance-rack, an old buckler, a lean hack, and a greyhound for coursing."

Among the moderns, Hardy's opening of "The Return of the Native" impresses by its grandeur, and "The Autobiography of Mark Rutherford" by its poignancy. But the subject is larger than your space.—Yours, &c.,

R. MUDIE-SMITH.

9, Clifton Villas, W.,
July 29th, 1908.

A SEASIDE HOTEL FOR WORKING PEOPLE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I, through your columns, make an appeal to those of your readers who are interested in working boys and girls sent or taken away for a holiday?

While there are many homes for those who need convalescence and many isolated rooms where they can go alone, there is a great demand for what is practically a working people's hotel. That demand the "Green Lady" Hostel, at Littlehampton, of which the Countess of Aberdeen is president, supplies. It is a commodious house, standing in its own shady garden, near sea, river and open country, and it offers board and lodging at 10s. per head per week. Last year some 326 guests were received.

We are doing our best and giving our utmost to make the hostel self-supporting, but still need a sum of £500 to pay off our deficit and to provide for winter expenses.

At this season we would earnestly ask those to whom a happy holiday is ensured, to secure the hostel as a permanent possession to some hundreds of working girls and boys sorely needing a respite from hard work and enervating atmosphere.

Audited balance sheet and further particulars would be sent gladly to any applicant by—Yours, &c.,

LILY H. MONTAGU.

12, Kensington Palace Gardens
July 28th, 1908

LORD CROMER'S SPEECH.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There are doubtless many of our readers who, like myself, feel deeply grateful to THE NATION for its forceful and thoughtful words respecting the foolish and mischievous speech of Lord Cromer. We had learned to look upon Lord Cromer as a man permeated with wise and lofty conceptions of statesmanship, whose mission in life was that of an enlightened healer of the wounds and reconciler of the difficulties of nations; and it is very disquieting and saddening to find him occupied in adding fuel to the fires of international misunderstanding and enmity.

Happily, the speeches of Sir Edward Grey, Mr. Lloyd George, and Earl Percy have done something to relieve the situation created by Lord Cromer's unfortunate utterance. The mischief wrought by the stupid and wicked policy of sowing suspicion and hatred between England and Germany is not confined to the two countries directly concerned. Observe what is happening in Denmark. The people of that country, terrified by the prospect of war breaking out between England and Germany, are proceeding to burden themselves with increased taxation to such an extent that a thoughtful and observant Dane assures me that there will be no money to spare for schemes of educational and social progress for years to come. The Danish Commission appointed to consider the question of defence recommends extended military service, the construction of large fortifications seawards, off Copenhagen, and the erection of several small forts in the islets! Are we surprised at the folly of such undertakings in Denmark? The responsibility rests largely upon people in this country.—Yours, &c.,

W. Copeland Bowie.

London, July 29th, 1908.

"THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir, May I be allowed to point out one statement in Mr. Macdonald's letter in your issue of July 4th which can hardly be justified?

He says that "the motor car does not make the dust." Now it is obvious that as the tyre of a motor car comes into contact with the road, the rubber is forced out on all sides by the pressure on the wheel, and the creeping action thus induced causes much more disintegration in the surface of the road than would be produced by heavier loads on wheels which have no elasticity. The effect is increased by the fact that in motor vehicles all the driving force is between the tyre and the road.

I maintain that the motor car is responsible not only for the raising of the dust, but also for its actual creation, and if only a small part of the time and money now spent in new inventions with regard to machinery were only devoted to the improvement of the roads on which it runs, what a change we should see in the country!—Yours, &c.,

G. Cook.

Liverpool, July 8th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have followed the correspondence in The Nation on "The Lost Liberty of the Road" with sustained interest ever since the article appeared in your issue of the 6th ult.

Experts like Lord Russell, and your ingenious correspondent, Mr. Peter Macdonald, may prove to the satisfaction of themselves, and other motorists, that the car is a new and a safe delight, and the motorist—the real lover of his fellow man and the erring babe, who will patter about the village roadway—habitually saves the life of both by not running over them. But it does not need any expert knowledge of the inner mysteries of motor cars to say that they do run over adults, babes, the village dog, and the busy hen who strays on the road; nor does it need much insight to say that when they don't they often look as if they are going to do. Speedometers apart, they often seem to be going too fast; without being a civil engineer you can see the dust, and without having the trained and developed nose of the sanitary inspector you can smell the petrol.

I, too, am one of the out-of-date people who found pleasure in the country highway. Out at Leatherhead, the other Sunday, I stopped to ask my way of a cyclist, and in the conversation we held, he admitted he did not quite know where he was, as he had been avoiding the highway all the morning to escape the motor traffic; while an hour after, on the highway, a village resident, directing me, urged the fields and an additional two miles, rather than the direct highway and the motor nuisance People in the country, untechnical and possessing no knowledge of the beautiful mysteries of motor mechanics, all think alike. And, anyone who saw that highway, from the pedestrian's point of view, would agree. It was worse than walking along the railway, for, at least, trains only pass at intervals, and do leave a period without noise or perfume, while some highroads are filled with a never-ending procession of cars, clouds of dust, which have scarcely time to settle, and a scent which knows no end.

Letter-writing apart, the best suggestion in your correspondence is contained in the shortest note—"S. D. W.'s." Let us set about the "Long and uphill fight," and let the National Association your correspondent suggests be organised. The Nation and its Editor have the prestige which would form a happy nucleus, and I will draw lots with "S. D. W." as to who shall be the first annual subscriber. I think there are many modest users of the roads who would cheerfully subscribe their guineas for a sporting fight against the arrogance that rides panoplied on purple fumes.—Yours, &c.,

Geo. Edgar.

14b, Whitehead Grove, Cadogan Square, S.W.
July 27th, 1908

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—While agreeing most heartily with your general view on the "Lost Liberty of the Road," I venture to differ on one point. You say, and rightly, that the existing speed limit of twenty miles is not observed, and amounts, in practice, to twenty-five; but you infer from this fact that the speed limit ought to be abolished. I draw just the opposite inference. I would reduce it to fifteen miles an hour—a pace unheard of ten years ago. And I maintain that a motor car cannot travel at a speed of over fifteen miles without being a nuisance and a danger.

A second point, on which you did not touch, is taxation. Mr. Lloyd George should raise more than half a million from motor car licences next year. To do so equitably he should tax them on a double standard—weight plus power, e.g., 5s. for each hundredweight and 2s. 6d. for each horse-power.—Yours, &c.,

J. E. Allen.

1, Mitre Court Buildings, Temple, E.C.
July 28th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have been a subscriber and reader of The Nation from the first, and of The Speaker before it, but I find the temper of some articles on the motor question, and especially of the correspondence which they seem to invite, difficult to reconcile with its general position in Liberal thought. I am old enough to remember the outcry against the bicycle in the "cads on castors" days, and evidently the same spirit, minus the wit, is still with us. What possible use can there be in writing, and still less in publishing, such a letter as that from "R. W. I." in your present issue? He sets up an abstraction and then claims to know what is the "motorist's primary idea"; tells us that the "sights and sounds and smell of nature do not exist for the motorist," and "that country life generally has been destroyed not only for visitors, but for country dwellers." Then, by way of further enlightenment, we are informed that the motorist has to arm himself to the teeth, whatever that may mean, goggle himself to the eyebrows, and stuff his nose against the stink of petrol fumes. The truth and insight of this last statement may be taken as the measure of the others.

Greater ignorance and prejudice could hardly be packed in fewer words. The sting, as usual, is in the tail, for he says that the only people who would be injured by his suggestions of a prohibitive tax would be a "parcel of rich vulgarians."

This, at the time when the great increase in the number of cars on the road is due to their use by people of moderate means, who, in very many cases, previously had no vehicle of their own.

Many of your readers who are users of motors, regret the unavoidable troubles incidental to a new form of locomotion, and to a large addition of drivers who are new to the road, and are ready to support any reasonable measures for their mitigation and removal, but they are not greatly stimulated by such an attitude.

Surely the public interest will be best served if discussion is encouraged by people who, at least, have an elementary knowledge of the facts, rather than by those who can contribute nothing but abuse.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY S. CLOUGH.

July 29th, 1908.

[We publish equally letters from strong opponents of the motor traffic, as it is conducted to-day, and from strong defenders, like Mr. Clough. The controversy is a fierce one, and cannot always be conducted with perfect equanimity —ED. NATION]

GERMANY AND ENGLAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I wish to thank you for your excellent article in THE NATION, of July 25th, with reference to our military and naval expenditure. I should like to say, with reference to the manner in which noblemen who profess to know threaten us with a war with Germany, that these threats are part of the stock-in-trade of those who are interested in maintaining and increasing our huge expenditure on armaments. Every well-informed person, who is unbiassed, knows that a war with Germany is not a contingency that can be reasonably entertained, but those who profit by our huge expenditures have to get up a scare, so they pretend that Germany is a source of danger. In exactly the same way, the German military and naval authorities, when they want to get extra money out of the poor German taxpayer, get up a scare with reference to some other country, and then as soon as the votes have been passed the scare is allowed to die down until the next time that more money is required. The remarks which have recently been made with reference to danger from Germany are simply in view of the preparation of the Estimates for the Army and Navy. The same game has been played over and over again during the last fifty years, and there are always some greenhorns who are taken in. No German ruler who was not absolutely mad would seek a quarrel with England. Russia, Austria, and France would each require to be satisfied before Germany was allowed to profit by a victory over us, and also would have to be satisfied if Germany was defeated by us. France could not afford to allow Great Britain to be a province of the German Empire, and, were such a contingency probable, would find in Russia a ready ally, and Austria would find her opportunity.—Yours &c.,

ARNOLD LUPTON.

July 27th, 1908.

DO WE OVER-EAT?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your interesting article on this subject induces me to suggest that many people eat heartily without in the least realising that, while certain food may not be absolutely unwholesome, it may be absolutely innutritious. I think this is more or less true of American tinned, or canned, or "boxed" meats, the virtue of which must be largely spent by the process of over-cooking necessary to their preservation. The great thing is to make it "tasty," and this is accomplished by the use of condiments, which, of course, do not add to its nutritive qualities, but rather the reverse. Nor is it certain that the best cattle are used for preserving, the temptation being rather in the opposite direction. These meats are largely used by the working classes in this country, and one outcome of their use has been to bring the art of cookery into contempt amongst the wives of working men. The fatal ease with which a dinner of preserved meat may be served up, without recourse to the gridiron or the stewpan, is, I fear, the chief reason why this class of food is in general use amongst the working classes, and the cause of the laziness displayed by the women of these classes.

There is a widespread notion that meat stands at the top of the list of nutritious foods, whereas it is a good way down, and is excelled by cheese, lentils, and other food substances The sparing way in which cheese is used in most households is very odd, seeing that a navvy, sitting on the ground close to his work, will "put away" a pound or two and a half-quartern loaf, and resume his work like a giant refreshed. What is needed to be realised by most people is that cheese may be eaten as a meal, and not simply as a "digester," and its more general use in this way would help to protect us against the tyranny exercised over us by the American beef trusts. Whether we over-eat or not, I am certain we eat too much meat, either for health or comfort, and we shall do well to bestow more attention on fruit and vegetables, the former especially.—Yours, &c.,

R. W. J.

July 27th, 1908.

COASTGUARD SERVICE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Allow me to enter a protest against the proposed abolition of the Coastguard. While it is, no doubt, true that circumstances have changed since the Force was established, any saving likely to result from the suggested change would, in my opinion, be dearly bought at the cost of the loss of the very valuable services at present rendered by that body in connection with shipwrecks and as coast police generally. There seems no reason to suppose that the augmented Customs Force would undertake much of this work, at least on the more lonely parts of the coast where such help is especially needful.

These duties are analogous to the services rendered by the police in protecting life and property on land, and may with equal reason be a public charge. It is to be remembered that voluntary effort already discharges a substantial share of such work in maintaining the lifeboats.

I believe strongly that it is desirable and practicable to reduce our huge naval expenditure, but I hold that such reduction should begin at the right end, by calling a halt in the present ruinous competition in armaments, rather than by lopping off a humanitarian service now rendered by the Navy.—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES STURGE.

Stoke Newington,
July 27th, 1908.

Poetry.

SONNET.

To an Empty Room.

THE mirror gleams: "I saw, but will I tell?"
A pin: "She dropped me; pity my despair!"
A comb: "I glow—was burnished in her hair."
A rose plucked for her wafts: "Her lips did spell
What I will not repeat, who loved to dwell
Close to the little cross that nestled where Sorrow for Wrong, and Courage 'neath despair
In her warm blood leapt, leapt, unconquerable."

Swallows! rejoice to build beneath these eaves
Where jasmine clings—the Sun among its leaves
(All fluttered, for she pressed them back last night)
Traces in sweet deceptive light and shade
Her head, upon the pillow where 'twas laid,—
Her fingers, on the book where she did write.

J. MARJORAM.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

WE have heard a rumour that there exists an unpublished novel by Mr. George Meredith, which, according to present arrangements, will not be issued for some years after the author's death. Every lover of letters will be glad to hear that the list of Mr. Meredith's novels is not yet closed, however much he may regret the determination to postpone the publication of the work. It is a coincidence that Tolstoy has lately finished a novel, to which he has attached the same condition of posthumous publication.

* * *

MR. AUSTIN DOBSON'S essays about books are always pleasant reading, and many book-lovers will be interested to hear that he is preparing a new collection, which, under the title "De Libris," will be published by Messrs. Chatto & Windus. Like the late Frederick Locker-Lampson, another ardent bibliophile, Mr. Dobson found the atmosphere of the Civil Service favorable for the composition of some of the most charming vers de société in the language. Our readers will not need to be reminded of Mr. Dobson's unrivalled knowledge of eighteenth century art and letters and the charms of style which he brings to their treatment.

* * *

A TRANSLATION of M. Paul Sabatier's recent Jowett lectures on "Modernism" will be published early in the autumn by Mr. Fisher Unwin. The lectures give an excellent account of the origin and progress of Liberal Catholicism throughout Europe. The coming volume will contain, in addition to the lectures themselves, an introduction, full notes, and the texts of the chief Papal Encyclicals on Modernism. The translation is the work of Mr. C. Miles.

* * *

SINCE his appointment to the Chair of Modern History at Cambridge half a dozen years ago, Professor Bury has published a remarkable inaugural lecture on "The Science of History," a "Life of St. Patrick," which roused a good deal of controversy, and has contributed to the great "Cambridge Modern History" planned by his predecessor. In a coming work he returns to Greek history, a subject to which he has already contributed a valuable "History of Greece to the Death of Alexander the Great." The new book is called "The Ancient Greek Historians." It will probably be issued early in the autumn.

* * *

MR. JOSEPH CONRAD, whose collection of short stories, called "A Set of Six," will be published immediately, is at present engaged on a long novel which will deal with Russian Nihilism and its propaganda in the universities and throughout the country. As everyone knows, Mr. Conrad is a Pole, so that his knowledge of the subject is first-hand, and his impressions of the Russian revolutionary movement are sure to be of special interest. There is hardly another instance of a writer of foreign birth and training who has become so completely a master of English as Mr. Conrad.

* * *

WITHIN the past few years we have had several biographies of personages famous in the French Revolution. "The Princesse de Lamballe" by Miss B. C. Hardy, which Messrs. Constable have in the press, should prove an interesting addition to the number of such works in English. Madame de Lamballe was maid-of-honor to Marie Antoinette, for whom she had a great affection. After the flight of the royal family to Varennes she escaped to England, but hearing of the Queen's imprisonment, she returned to share the misfortunes of her mistress. She was brutally murdered outside La Force in September, 1792, and her head, fixed on a pike, was paraded beneath the windows of the Temple where Marie Antoinette was lodged. Michelet describes her as "a pretty little insignificant woman, devoid of ideas and conversation," though he admits that her terrible fate was undeserved.

* * *

THE first number of a new monthly journal to be run in connection with the Workers' Educational Association will make its appearance in October next. The title of the new venture is "The Highway," and one of its main objects will be "to secure the co-operation of University and workshop in realising a democratic ideal of education." The editor, Mr. F. W. Kolthammer, will have the assistance of an efficient staff, consisting alike of workpeople and University men, while foreign correspondents have been engaged in the chief European capitals. The democratising of the Universities is a crying need of our time, and by helping towards this ideal "The Highway" will do real service to education. We wish it a most prosperous career.

* * *

AMONG the color books to be issued in the autumn by Messrs. A. & C. Clack is a volume on New Zealand, by the Hon. W. Pember Reeves. Mr. Reeves had a brilliant career both as a journalist and member of Parliament in New Zealand, where he edited the "Canterbury Times" and the "Lyttelton Times," and was Minister of Education, Labor, and Justice. Within the past week he resigned his position as High Commissioner for the Colony, in order to take up the work of Director of the London School of Economics. The coming book will deal with the picturesque and outdoor aspects of New Zealand life, native stories and traditions being also touched upon. It will thus be in some sense supplementary to former books by Mr. Reeves, in which the historical and commercial sides of New Zealand were treated.

* * *

LIKE all other sciences archæology suffers in some degree from the tyranny of the specialist, with the result that no complete account of the history and bearing of archæological discoveries is accessible in English. This gap will, however, be filled by a translation of Professor Michaelis' work, "A Century of Archæological Discovery," to be issued in the autumn by Mr. Murray. The discoveries on classical soil naturally receive the largest share of attention, but Egypt, Lycia, Assyria, Babylon, and Palestine are also dealt with. Professor Percy Gardner, who contributes a preface, describes the book as "no dry summary, but rather a record of what the writer, watching all with the greatest interest, learned as the scroll of excavation and research was gradually unrolled."

* * *

MESSRS. LONGMANS have in the press a work called "Historical Letters and Memoirs of the Scottish Catholics, 1625-1793," which promises to throw some fresh light upon the ecclesiastical history of Scotland during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Its author, Father Forbes-Leith, has discovered at Blairs, Stonyhurst, and in other ancient Catholic archives, a number of unpublished papers of considerable importance, among them being the reports of the chaplains to the Highlanders who fought under Montrose. The history of Scottish Catholicism has been overshadowed by the great conflicts between Crown, Covenant, and Parliament, so that there is scope for much original research in this department of history.

* * *

MR. HEINEMANN announces that "The Life of James McNeill Whistler," by Mr. and Mrs. Pennell, is to be published during the coming autumn. Mrs. Pennell's biography of Charles Godfrey Leland was an excellent piece of work, and encourages us to believe that Whistler's brilliant, eccentric personality will be presented in a capable fashion, for Mr. Pennell is not only an artist of great gifts, but he and Mrs. Pennell remained close and devoted friends of Whistler to his death. Another important book to come from Mr. Heinemann is an edition of "The Midsummer Night's Dream," with illustrations by Mr. Arthur Rackham. The subject is admirably suited to Mr. Rackham's grotesquely fanciful art.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Medievalism: A Reply to Cardinal Mercier." By George Tyrrell. (Longmans. 4s. net.)

"The Twentieth-Century American." By H. Perry Robinson. (Putnam's Sons. 7s. 6d.)

"James II. and His Wives." By Allen Fea. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Shelburne Essays." Fifth Series. By Paul Elmer More. (Putnam's Sons. 5s. net.)

"A Week in the White House with Theodore Roosevelt." By W. B. Hale. (Putnam's Sons. 3s. 6d.)

"The Wild Geese." By Stanley J. Weyman. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

"L'Europe et L'Empire Ottoman: Les Aspects Actuels de la Question d'Orient." Par R. Pinon. (Paris: Perrin. 5fr.)

Reviews.

POETRY AND CRAFTSMANSHIP.*

Charles Beaudelaire, it is said, undertook to teach poetry in so many lessons. It would be rarely interesting to have the experiences of anyone who went through his course; and so learn authentically where a great poet drew the line between technique and inspiration. For, in spite of what is continually being said about the modern poet's fatal facility in technique, a reading of a considerable bulk of to-day's verse forces on one the conclusion that its crying fault is slovenly craft. Quite a deal of inspiration (there is, after all, no better word for it) seems to be traversing the brains of our poets; not, perhaps, such inspiration as produces great poems, but such as might well produce very pretty and agreeable poems which the world might find treasurable. But it rarely produces them. It is too often mated to a slack technique. This is where publication of some of Beaudelaire's lessons in poetry would probably be so useful. For it is comfortably assumed that once a poet has acquired a certain slickness of metre and rhyme, he is one of whom it may be said, Here, at any rate, is technique. But we forget that the poet's delightful use of le mot qui grise is also a matter of more or less exact craft, the cunning juxtaposition of words whereby their external beauty and the wealth of meaning stored within them interplay so as to arouse those indefinable feelings and elations which true poetry gives us. The poet who has learned his business knows fairly precisely how to evoke those pleasures. When Milton spoke of Hell's mansions being opened to "the peering day," he knew quite well that his choice of that word "peering" was going to make the line immortal. It is in this quarter that modern poetical technique is so culpable.

It must be admitted, however, that Mr. St. John Lucas's "New Poems" are little blameworthy on this score. He has learnt his business as a poet thoroughly, and he can manage with surety the subtler kinds of word-craft. It is possible without unfairness to take an example of his writing at hazard, which is not possible in most books of verse:—

> "O mother, we have left the dens and deeps
> To stand at last upon the wind-pure plain,
> Where, broad and beautiful, the highway sweeps
> Like a great hope towards thy starry fane."

Such a simile shows not only a poet's perception but a poet's craft. It is in the other direction that Mr. Lucas's want seems to lie. The emotional impulse of his poems lacks fire, and might often be accused of triteness. "Lazarus," for instance, is an ingenious piece, containing some admirable word-usage; but it never becomes quite so profound as one feels it ought to have been. But we must not be so ungrateful as not to thank Mr. Lucas for his pathetic "Ysumbras," and his finely imagined "Funeral March of a Mad Poet." In the latter, and again in "The Ship and the Raft," Mr. Lucas calls the poet a "mad man" who must, at any cost, have "freedom." We seem to have heard this before; but, considered closely, it looks a somewhat untenable summing-up of the man who, of all men, must reduce his emotions to form and his speech to measure. It is not a madman can do that; only one who is willing to submit himself continually to the strictest control.

Mr. Rowland Thirlmere, again, is a poet not only in his perceptions but in his craft. He is poignantly aware, in his own words, of "Beauty smiling like a bride," and has withal a lusty hatred of "Mammon's damned control." He gives us moreover much that can honestly be called poetry by virtue of his fine feeling for his material. It is difficult to display this in small extracts, but an instance may serve to indicate it. A girl's complexion, for example, is nicely phrased as "the creamy white wherein there lies the phantom of a rose"; which is almost as good as Herrick's "cream inspired with strawberries." Most of his best effects are obtained by illuminating the operations of nature with human emotion, which is one of the poet's most excellent devices. So, he makes the returning tide "suddenly outpour upon the ooze and sand of old desire new life." So he sees, and makes us see, an Alpine peak, "standing crowned with virtue." But Mr. Thirlmere has a fault, and a not inconsiderable one. It may be exemplified in the longest and most important poem in his book, "Mont St. Michel," an elaborately descriptive poem with many excellent linès and several passages of sustained beauty, concluding with some not very extraordinary reflections. Save for these latter, it is hard to strike finger on the fault in the poem; it can only be said that it lacks interest; and, unfortunately, that can be said of most of his book.

Mr. David Lowe follows the tradition of Scottish poetry in preferring to fill his verses with salt of humanity rather than with fantasy and deliciousness. The three ballads at the beginning of his volume are weak, not very clear as to their meaning, and vitiated with such slovenly technique as:—

> "His graphic fun was unalloyed."

Or

> "He moved like one lost in a theme
> Which from sub-consciousness had birth."

Most of his songs are in great need of a tune to make them passable; but the satirical "Glasgow Ditties" are delightful, and should have a salutary effect on the follies they lash, notably the misgovernment of Glasgow. There are also two "Comedies" in the book, dramatisations of legends of the Gaberlunzie-king James. Both are very good reading, and Burns or Dunbar would have approved of "Symon's Wife." But surely such stage directions as this betray a scanty grasp of dramatic technique:, "Alison shows great pleasure at the Gaberlunzie being safely housed in the loft, for her love, Friar John, has promised to visit her."

Quite a different kind of drama is Miss Gore-Booth's "Sorrowful Princess." Mr. Lowe is content to give us mere human nature, but Miss Gore-Booth would present human nature only as a vehicle for her mysticism. The mysticism, indeed, arrives, but all humanity has been crushed out of the play by that tremendous load. Miss Gore-Booth's former volumes have been noted by all who care for poetry, and this play also has no lack of poetry; but that hardly compensates for the woodenness of her characters. A maiden asks St. George who he is, and he replies, "I am St. George of Cappadocia"; this is as if Lord Morley, on being asked who he is, were to reply, "I am Honest John of Montrose."

English Socialism has produced little poetry besides that of Mr. Carpenter; and Socialists ought, therefore, to honor "E. Nesbit" for her "Ballads and Lyrics of Socialism," which will probably do more for her cause than a deal of pamphleteering and lecturing. And even if we consider this modest book as poetry and nothing else, we should be grateful for it. The movement of the "Marching Song," the nobility of "The Ballad of Splendid Silence," the sincere indignation and the tenderness expressed in many of these lyrics, are qualities which we do not find too often. Mr. Augustus Ralli, on the other hand, is one who would use poetry as a means of escape from life, not as an instrument to mend it. "The Morning of Life" is a series of tales connected by a somewhat time-honored machinery: they are supposed to be told for each other's amusement by a "score of jaded worldlings." The construction of the tales is fairly skilful, but they rarely present more than an appearance of poetry effected by

---

* "New Poems." By St. John Lucas. Constable. 5s. net.
"Mont St. Michel and Other Poems." By Rowland Thirlmere. Allen. 3s. 6d. net.
"Ballad of a Great City and Other Poems." By David Lowe. New Age Press. 2s. 6d. net.
"The Sorrowful Princess." By Eva Gore-Booth. Longmans. 2s. 6d. net.
"Ballads and Lyrics of Socialism." By E. Nesbit. Fabian Society. 1s. net
"The Morning of Life." By Augustus Ralli. Routledge. 5s. net.
"The Knocking at the Door and Other Poems." By Alice Maddock. Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.
"A Modern Judas and Other Rhymes." By E. Vincent. Kegan Paul. 3s. 6d. net.
"Songs of the Uplands." By Alice Law. Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.
"The Vigil of Brunhild." By Frederic Manning. Murray. 2s. 6d. net.
"West Country Verses." By Arthur L. Salmon. Blackwood. 3s. net.
"Talmudic Legends: Hymns and Paraphrases." By Alice Lucas. Chatto & Windus.
"A Painter's Pastime." By Margaret Thomas. Greening. 3s. 6d. net.

smooth metres and rhymes. The words are used as a prose-writer uses them, not as a poet should, who must seek to extract out of them all their concealed beauties and make them appear new and strange. Mr. Ralli seems to aim at the clarity and simplicity of Morris; but simplicity by itself will not make a poet unless first of all he possesses poetry to simplify.

Simplicity does better in "The Knocking at the Door," by Alice Maddock, for in at least two poems it has something to work upon. The ballad which gives the book its title, and "The Village Widow," are both agreeable poems, but there is not much else in this latest addition to Mr. Mathews' "Vigo Cabinet Series" worthy of notice, beyond that it is all unpretentious and sincere. Of "A Modern Judas and other rhymes," by E. Vincent, it is best to say at once that there appears no reason for the book's existence. The author will be modern whatever happens (he gives us "A Modern Judas," "A Modern Christian," and "A Modern Cassandra"), but, judging from this volume, he is unlikely ever to be a poet. His would-be Browningesque character-studies are devoid not only of poetry but of any insight into human emotional or mental operations. "A Misogynist" is a typical instance of his rhyming, a long, tedious production, painfully versifying all the cheapest, most obvious, and most childish arguments against woman that have oiled the tongues of every third-rate anti-feminist.

> "But not a girl that worked at school a few > Problems in lever, pulley, plane, and screw,
> Has, when adult, invented one machine,
> Saving her sex, to sew, to wring, to clean."

Or, becoming more profound, this:—

> "What opera, what oratorio,
> What modern drama bears a woman's name,
> Which any man of mark would care to claim?"

And who is to derive either pleasure or benefit from perusal of such stuff as this?

> "Warring, war; and wooing,
> Woo;
> Do not talk of doing;
> Do."

After this attempted cleverness it is pleasant to turn to Alice Law's "Songs of the Uplands." Her portrayals of bird-music in verse are not very successful, especially when she makes a robin say that the earth and its creatures belong to man, but to man the care of the creatures; a convenient sentiment for a sermon, but hardly appropriate in the bill of a robin. There is, however, at least one interesting poem in the book, an elegy on John Donne. Miss Law seems scarcely to realise the profound problem of Donne's nature, or that his love poetry is, perhaps, the most wonderful in our language, reaching from the red flames of desire to the height of super-sexual ecstacy. But the poem has much excellence, and contains these two fine stanzas:—

> "As a hot fire in earthen vessel urned
> Thy fevered heart within thee preyed on sin,
> But, even as fire, consuming while it burned
> Whate'er of earthliness it found within;
>
> "Then, seeking more expanse, its flames next beat
> Upon the vessel's blood-red sides, when, lo!
> The dull material whitens with the heat,
> And shines translucent with the radiant glow."

But Miss Law lays too much stress on Donne's "sin."

"The Vigil of Brunhild," by Frederic Manning is an account of that tragic queen's life put into her own mouth at the supreme moment of her existence. Mr. Manning says he chose a narrative form in order to present Brunhild's psychology in a broader fashion than would be possible in a drama; but we must be permitted to remark that very little of the woman's tremendous nature has managed to insinuate itself into Mr. Manning's pages. The poem, in fact, is not a moving one; and this is largely due to the uniform, unaltering suavity of its verse. The inventions and modifications of a long series of great poets have made blank verse an instrument of unexampled power and subtlety for expressing by its mere movement every conceivable emotion. But Mr. Manning uses none of them, save a few of the most commonplace inversions. As a result we have the fatal effect of a poem whose metre is entirely unrelated to its emotional processes. We must again note that other fault of technique, the omission to use words so that their implicit sense is as apparent as their explicit sense. Yet the poem is worth reading, in spite of these faults, if only for its subject.

Those who care for what we may call thorough dialect verse can be strongly advised to read Mr. Salmon's "West Country Verses." They are full of humour, pathos, and even tragedy, and they may without exaggeration be compared to the best dialect verse of Tennyson or Barnes. It is a kind of writing wherein human nature counts for everything, and all the artifices of poetry count for next to nothing. There is no question of Mr. Salmon's knowledge of, and power to portray, human nature. But the next volume on our list, "Talmudic Legends, Hymns, and Paraphrases," by Alice Lucas, has no excuse for lacking poetic artifices. Poetry whose basis is religion must be provided with all possible splendours, or the greatness of the ideas will suffer degradation by being put into language. The legends from the Talmud and Midrash with which this book opens are not poetised at all, but only versified; and what are we to say when the thunder of "lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors," is turned into these polite phrases?

> "Ye everlasting doors, be ye upraised,
> Ye gates of lofty height."

It is ill to meddle with the Psalms.

Miss Margaret Thomas is right in supposing that her poems show evidence of inspiration. "A Painter's Pastime" is the result undoubtedly of poetical impulse; but that impulse has not found a poet's craft to manage it. Would a painter's inspiration without technique be worth much? And a poet's inspiration avails no more than a painter's unless there be skill to match it. No doubt Miss Thomas writes with ease; but that by itself is no sign of mastery. Need of stern schooling in the craft of poetry is shown throughout her book; it would certainly prevent her from committing such absurdities as this:—

> "As ermine when contrasted with the snow > Grows dark, so the pale Prior paler grew."

The reader is not helped to realise the increasing pallescence of the Prior by having it likened to the apparent darkening of ermine when laid against snow.

THE DECLINE AND FALL OF "GROVE."*

In reviewing previous volumes of the new issue of "Grove's Dictionary" we have had to call attention to the bias they clearly showed against all the more recent developments of music. Grove, in spite of all his faults and his amateurish limitations, was a man of considerable breadth of judgment, and the first edition of his "Dictionary" showed on the whole a good deal of skill in the selection of contributors, and an evident desire to be impartial towards all schools of thought. He made his mistakes, of course—giving Mendelssohn, for example, fourteen times the space he gave to Bach; but if he wrote at immoderate length about his own idols, he was at all events broad-minded enough to recognise that he was not a fit and proper person to write about the idols of others. He probably did not greatly care for Wagner's music at that time; but he had the sense to entrust the article on Wagner to a thoughtful and competent student of him—the late Edward Dannreuther. In his old age, as we can see from a letter of his published in Mr. Graves's "Life," he was utterly puzzled and disgusted by some of Strauss's music; but had he been bringing out a new edition of his "Dictionary" then, he would, we may be sure, have recognised that he was the last person in the world to do the article on Strauss. His successor in the editorship is not so catholic in his sympathies, nor so reliable in his estimates of his contributors; and the new "Dictionary" suffers greatly in consequence.

What, we may ask, is the object of the new issue, if not to do for this generation what the earlier issue did, or attempted to do, for the last—to give it in every case the results of the most modern thought and scholarship?

* "Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians." Edited by J. A. Fuller Maitland. Vol. IV. Q-S. Macmillan. 21s. net.

Music and musical æsthetics change a good deal in the course of twenty-five years. The complaint of the general public is that, while these have changed, "Grove's Dictionary" has not merely remained unchanged but has become fossilised. Mr. Maitland exhibits a prejudice against everything most distinctly modern that we are sure Grove would never have publicly exhibited, even if he had privately felt it. Mr. Maitland, holding that the last great master was Brahms, and seeing no excellence in music except the kind of excellence that Brahms aimed at, is certainly unfair, throughout the whole "Dictionary," to everybody and everything that does not fit in with his ideal. Further, while he estimates highly the value of the music of Parry and other contemporary English composers, he is somewhat less than just to the music of composers of the other camp, such as Elgar. This being so, he would, had he possessed Grove's breadth of outlook, have taken care that fair treatment was given to every composer and every school of thought with which he personally was somewhat out of sympathy. He should not, of course, have opened the columns of the "Dictionary" to mere idol-worship. Writers could easily have been found, if not in England, then in France and Germany, to discuss the modern musicians sympathetically, yet at the same time discriminatingly; and if Mr. Maitland, writing upon Brahms, and upon friends like Stanford and Somervell, can persuade himself that his own sympathies do not take the edge off his discrimination, he has no right to assume that this would have happened in the case of other writers. Had he acted upon this principle, his own reputation and that of the "Dictionary" would stand higher than they do to-day. Mr. Maitland made a mistake in writing the Elgar article himself, instead of entrusting it to someone less prejudiced against its subject. He fails to bring properly up to date the older articles that deal with musical forms and principles, such as rhythm, sonata, symphony, subject, recitative, quartette, harmony, and melody. If all these things mean no more than they meant in 1880, why in the name of common sense go to the trouble of bringing out a new edition at all? A reprint of the old edition would have been sufficient.

What one asks from the new issue is information upon the developments of music during the last generation or so. Upon all these interesting topics the reader of the new "Grove" is either left in ignorance or is dosed with prejudice. The few lines given to composers like Debussy, Max Reger, and Bruckner, are almost worthless. Nor can it be pretended that these men are not critically discussed because of the danger of expressing opinions upon writers still living, or only recently dead. That danger does not deter Mr. Maitland from expressing himself enthusiastically upon living composers whom he happens to like—see, for example, the overdone eulogy of Miss Ethel Smyth's music. What he will not have is—one will not say eulogy, but sensible criticism, of composers and forms he does not like; so they are either passed over with the barest of mention, or sneered at, or, if they are treated at any length, are grievously mishandled.

The worst instance of this that has yet disfigured the "Dictionary" is the article on Strauss that appears in the present volume. From start to finish it is almost all prejudice, with hardly a sentence of genuine criticism. To say that in Strauss's ideal "musical beauty has no kind of place," that "Aus Italien" "is frankly landscape-painting in music," that Strauss "realised the fact that his eccentricities of style were a great attraction to the public," and "considered it his duty to startle his hearers with some new piece of independence (not to say impertinence) with each successive production," that his aim "is apparently to do nothing more than to follow the verbal suggestions of the programme, mostly by means of his wonderful command of orchestral devices," that conductors take up the works because of the interest there is in doing a difficult thing, that Strauss has now "turned his attention" to the task of "shocking Continental opera-goers," that "there is no injustice in mentioning this as the primary object" of "Electra"—an opera that has not yet been performed, and of which no one knows a note!—that "Salome" was written to gratify "the author's passion for notoriety," that Strauss "admits" that "his main object is to shock and startle," and to see nothing in "Don Quixote" worth mentioning but the imitation of the flock of sheep—all this is to state what is either untrue or misleading. The article, with its grudging praise and its exaggerated insistence on whatever is blameful, is a serious blot on the "Dictionary." And so with almost everything else in the work, dealing with modern ideals in music, that Mr. Maitland has taken under his own care. We have, for example, his stock jibe at "the lovers of ugly music"—as if any human being ever liked music that he thought ugly. Mr. Maitland would, no doubt, feel hurt if, after reading his eulogies of Parry, for example, we were to call him "a lover of dull music"; and if he expects justice to be done to his point of view, he should really make an effort to do justice to the points of view of other people. Our reasonable complaint against him is that he falls sadly short of the standard of impartiality a man should try to make his own when he becomes editor of a great "Dictionary" of this kind. As it is, the work is already for the most part out of date. With some rare exceptions, it contains nothing of real value to the thoughtful student of 1908 that he cannot already find in the earlier edition; and each successive volume deepens the impression that the "Dictionary" has now become what Grove certainly would not have wished it to become—a partisan organ.

THE STUARTS.*

In a book about the Stuart Dynasty we expect, primarily, those sad stories of the deaths of kings which Shelley found so enthralling. Mr. Samuel Cowan, however, by a veritable tour de force succeeds in making the untoward destinies and persistent ill-luck of the Stuarts uncommonly dreary reading. One lags heavily over these prosaic periods, seeking in vain for the raison d'être of such a compilation as that represented in these thousand and odd pages. With Wood's "Douglas" and the "Tales of a Grandfather," not to speak of Mr. Hume Brown's "History of Scotland," what need was there, one can but exclaim, for this very commonplace chronicle, the external attractiveness of which (unless avoirdupois be an attraction) hardly atones for the lack of good metal within? The portraits, enlarged from Miss Strickland's "Queens of England," are things horrible to behold, and ought never to have been included in a work of this kind.

When not repeating other people, Mr. Cowan has a trick of repeating himself. Why need we be told two or three times that Flodden was a great disaster to Scotland, or that many spurious documents conceal the truth about Mary Queen of Scots, of whom Mr. Cowan appears to be a somewhat intemperate champion. Of our James I. and Charles I., on the other hand, he takes the unflattering, conventional views which are, to our conception, anything but the correct ones. The best idea that seems capable of being formed of a character so contradictory as that of James I. is afforded by Scott in "The Fortunes of Nigel," and by Ranke in his "History of England." Ranke detects in James elements of genius, both as a writer and controversialist. Naturally thorough and acute, King James labored, not without success, to prove to his adversaries the untenableness of the grounds on which they proceeded, or the logical fallacy of their conclusions. Even in conversation he sought to turn away from particulars and to pass to general considerations, a province in which he felt most at home. "He considers virtue and religion as immediately connected and concerned with knowledge. The confusions in the world appear to him to arise, for the most part, from mediocrity of knowledge, while he finds the most material difference between virtue and vice in the greater inward truthfulness of virtue." King James was thus a pragmatist, and, considering how fruity and well weighed are his precepts of wisdom, it is extraordinary, indeed, how little his own practice corresponded with them. Ranke and Gardiner develop this contradictoriness in the character of James with extraordinary diligence and refinement. Macaulay, Bayne, Sanford, and the older school, using every scrap of antithetic color they could lay their hands on, made a wonderful specimen of pointillé out of the portrait. Mr. Cowan only succeeds in making his picture incoherent. Incoherency, indeed, in both the style and the content is the mark of the whole book.

* "The Royal House of Stuart." By Samuel Cowan. Two Vols. Illustrated. Greening & Co. 42s. net.

A personal history of the Stuart dynasty would have been well worth doing, in however pedestrian a manner. But Mr. Cowan is not content with this. He endeavours to give a current history of Scotland under the Stuarts from Robert II. to Anne. The rise of the family from the rank of High Stewards (or, to go back to the baser etymological beginnings, upper swineherds or wards of the stye) to the position of the Lord's Anointed over three kingdoms and one principality, is one full of historic achievement and historic significance. The early kings of this Scots race were, almost without exception, able, energetic, and magnetic men. They had monstrous difficulties of time and circumstance to contend against. The first six James's, for instance, were all crowned as children, and their reigns began with long minorities. If Mr. Cowan had confined himself to the personal histories of these early Stuarts he could have probably done better. But the early history of Scotland, its unequal struggle against its southern neighbours, and the exhaustion that ensued from the fatal anti-English policy of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, this, and the persistent turbulence and Corsican violence of its oligarchical ruling caste, make it a very confusing and unprofitable subject for most modern readers. To try and combine all this with a family history, to continue the history of Scotland down to 1707, and to exclude the history of expatriated branches of the Stuart family in Modena, Bavaria, Hanover, the Palatinate, and elsewhere, seems to us a most futile proceeding. These two massive volumes on "The Royal House of Stuart" want remaking on a different plan altogether, with other materials, other illustrations, and better workmanship.

A SEVENTEENTH CENTURY MYSTIC.*

It is a relief to turn awhile, from the contending schools of theology in our own day, to the theologian of the days of Milton, who has become known to us through the labor and enthusiasm of Mr. Bertram Dobell. Here is no rancor, no bitterness, the polemical note is singularly absent; what we have is the record—eager, impassioned, intimately personal, yet free from self-consciousness—of a devout soul's communion with God.

It is a relief, in another sense, to turn to Traherne's "Meditations." One enters into an atmosphere of faith and exultation that is very rare to-day. Doubt crosses his mind only as a shadow melting away, and pain is a root of bliss. The world is home, there is no grain of sand but bears this message, if we could but read it rightly. God is love; and love is the key to all divine and human wealth.

"Our wants are treasures, and if want be a treasure, sure everything is so!"

That is Traherne's spirit; he thinks of want as the gate of infinite satisfaction. The fact is that he realises the immanence of God, which half even of those who profess to believe in it only argue about, and do not realise. There is a black cloud of materialism between our souls and the spiritual realities, and terms like force and matter, heredity and environment, have still power to alarm us. Some of us really do not believe that there is any potter—the clay is left to its own devices. Others cling to the thought of a potter, who meant well. But, when we confront all the agony, all the shame, all the sin, can we say for certain that his hand did not shake?

To one like Traherne, most of us would have seemed like children to whom all the peace, and warmth, and welfare of home are open, but who refuse to cross the threshold, and stay outside in the cold, wrangling, perhaps, for the flimsiest, the most ineffectual, shelters. It is not that we cannot, but that we will not enter. We refuse to abandon the outer darkness of fear and selfishness and envy. We will not accept God's Fatherhood, or His infinity, the unspeakable gladness of communion with Him. We will not live the life of love, the life of which Paul spoke when he said, "All things are yours, for ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's."

This self-exile is what Traherne meant when he spoke of "the necessity of hating God and man" as "the greatest bondage that hell can impose,"and of ingratitude, a life surrounded by blessings which we refuse to enjoy, as hell upon earth. And this is why he perpetually urges love's value as the escape from all sin and pain.

"When you love men, the world quickly becometh yours, and you yourself become a greater treasure than the world is. . . . Nothing in the world was ever loved too much, but many things have been loved in a false way, and all in too small a measure."

One can well understand Mr. Dobell's grief when he came upon the sentence: "Hell is a part of God's kingdom, to wit, His prison. It is fitly mentioned in the enjoyment of the world, and is itself by the happy enjoyed as a part of the world."

But surely his comments misinterpret Traherne. The "enjoyment of the blessed" is not increased by the consciousness of the sufferings of hell, any more than a strong man's pleasure in physical well-being is rendered more acute by the fact that there are lepers in the world. Yet, since there are lepers, one may feel a certain satisfaction in the thought that there are leper settlements and methods for restraining the spread of the disease. Traherne believed in moral leprosy, and in a moral leper settlement, which he called hell. If, however, he had lived to-day, his leper settlement would have resolved itself into an institution for the healing of lepers. He did not realise that in the universe as he conceived of it, all punishment must be remedial, nor did it occur to him that a spirit like his own could not touch the hell he dreamed of without transforming it, if not to heaven, to purgatory. How much less could hell resist the touch of the all-encompassing love of God!

But his blunder was one, not of instinctive feeling, but of inherited thought. It is in other passages that we find the real Traherne. "It is in the nature of love to despise itself, and to think only of its beloved's welfare. Look to it, it is not right love that is otherwise! Moses and St. Paul were no fools—God make me one of their number. I am sure nothing is more acceptable to Him than to love others so as to be willing to imperil even one's own soul for their benefit." And again, "I can make merry at calamities, and while I grieve at sins, and war against them, and abhorring the world and myself, descend unto the abyss of humility, I there admire a new offspring and torrent of joys—God's mercies. Which accepteth of our fidelity in bloody battles, though every wound defile and poison, and when we fall, turneth our penitent tears into solid pearl that shall abide with Him for evermore"

* "Centuries of Meditations." By Thomas Traherne. (1636-1674.) Now first printed from the original MS. Edited by Bertram Dobell. Dobell. 5s. net.

"THE LITTLE BROWN BROTHER."*

Folklorists are familiar with the natural process by which a conquered race is made to appear despicable in their conqueror's legends, and how even its gods are abased and turned into malignant spirits. To despise him whom you have conquered is probably the fundamental instinct in "master morality," because this justifies your belief in the good work of subjugation, and establishes, picturesquely, before the world, your own superiority. We cannot expect, therefore, that the majority of novels written by white men on Asiatic or African native life should be little more than vigorous pieces of our civilisation's propaganda. But it is interesting to compare the different tone of the independent explorer with that of the white men who have set out to annex and subjugate some native territory. In the first case the natives' habits and institutions are examined in relation to their history, climate, and general family group; in the second case their characteristics are always painted merely as the dark, depressing background against which the conqueror's civilisation and ethics shine with resplendent lustre. In this novel of racial strife in the Philippines between the white man and the brown, we do not question the author's conviction or his moral sincerity. On the contrary, the value of "The Little Brown Brother" lies in its faithful representation of the frame of mind of the conquering white man when hope of profit and glory, as well as his moral duty, all urge him to take his "little brown brother" in hand.

* "The Little Brown Brother." By Stanley Portal Hyatt. Constable. 6s.

STORIES FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

JUST READY AT THE BOOKSHOPS.

A NEW, WONDERFULLY CHEAP POPULAR EDITION.

JOSEPH HOCKING'S
CHARIOTS OF THE LORD.

1s. net. 426 pages. Readable type. Crown 8vo, Illustrated, stiff paper cover.

"It grips the reader."—Daily News.
"Will be keenly relished."—Christian World.
"A fine swinging tale."—Morning Leader.
"It has a charming heroine."—Daily Telegraph.
"A rattling good story."—Scotsman.
"Not a dull page."—Dublin Express.

1/- NET.

A NEW, CHEAP, CLEAR TYPE, POPULAR EDITION.

SILAS K. HOCKING'S
THE AWAKENING OF ANTHONY WEIR.

1s. net. 432 pages. Crown 8vo, Illustrated, stiff paper cover.

"A true and telling account of the earthquakes and storms through which God brings many a man to his true life."—Life of Faith.

"Rachel's love-idyll is a pretty episode in the tale."—Record.

"The best story which Mr Hocking has written for many a day."—Contemporary Review.

"From beginning to end the book holds the reader."—Liverpool Courier.

1/- NET.

EYE-OPENING BOOKS.

A Series of Books on the Wonders of NATURE, Popularly Written and Scientifically Accurate.

ADVENTURES IN BIRD-LAND.

A Book for Boys. By OLIVER G. PIKE, Author of "Home Life in Bird-Land," "Woodland, Field, and Shore," &c. With 90 Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Author, and 100 Pen-Sketches by E. RICHMOND PATON. Cloth gilt, demy 8vo, 6s. net.

Just Ready.]

THE BOY'S OWN NATURE BOOK.

By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S., M.B.O.U., With an Introduction by the Hon. Sir JOHN COCKBURN, K.C.M.G., M.D. (late Prime Minister of South Australia.) With two folded Colored Plates, a Colored Frontispiece, and 64 Plates, containing over 150 Pictures reproduced from photographs taken direct from Nature by the Rev. S. N. SEDGWICK, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d

"Young readers of Mr. Westell's previous works will nevertheless find this, his latest book, full of quite new things."—County Gentleman.

"A charming book."—Sheffield Telegraph.

"Mr. Westell makes wonderfully plain what even very young people may learn in country wanderings by the careful use of eyes and ears."—Scotsman.

"The illustrations are excellent."—Morning Leader.

"Will give boys an increased interest in the things they see in fields and woods, or on the shore."—Daily Mail.

Recently issued by the same Author.]

EVERY BOY'S BOOK OF BRITISH NATURAL HISTORY.

A Reliable Guide to British Wild Life and Nature Photography. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

FIFTY-TWO NATURE RAMBLES.

A series of Open-Air Talks for Young People. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S., M.B.O.U., Author of "Every Boy's Book of Natural History," &c. With five Colored Plates from Drawings, and 100 other illustrations from Photographs. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

New Edition. Just Ready.]

THE BROOK AND ITS BANKS.

By the late Rev. J. G. WOOD, M.A., Author of "The Handy Natural History," &c. With 16 full-page Plates and numerous Illustrations in the text. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

BY MEADOW, GROVE, AND STREAM.

An Introduction to Nature Study. By HENRY HILTON BROWN, F.E.S. With 2 folded Colored Plates, Photogravure Frontispiece, and 171 Figures in Black and White, from Original Drawings by the Author. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

Just Ready.]

GLEANINGS FROM THE FIELDS OF NATURE.

By EDWARD T. CONNOLD, F.Z.S., F.E.S. With an Introduction by DAVID ANDERSON-BERRY, M.D., F.R.S.E. With Photogravure Frontispiece and 24 pages of Plates from Photographs, Photo-micrographs, and Drawings by the Author. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, Medallion on Cover, 3s. 6d.

HOW TO STUDY WILD FLOWERS.

By Rev. GEORGE HENSLOW, M.A., F.L.S., &c., Author of "Plants of the Bible," New Edition, with 12 double-page Colored Plates and 57 other Illustrations. Cloth Gilt, with Colored Pictures on cover, 2s. 6d.

Published at 4, Bouverie Street, London, E.C.
AND SOLD BY ALL BOOKSELLERS.

IS CIVILIZATION IN DANGER?

By RENÉ-L. GERARD.

SEE

HIBBERT JOURNAL

Single Numbers 2/6 net. 2/9 post free.

Other Contents of July Number—

Pluralism and Religion. By Prof. WILLIAM JAMES.

Science and the Purpose of Life. By Dr. FRIDTJOF NANSEN.

The Religionist and the Scientist. By the Rev. G. A. JOHNSTON ROSS.

"An Appeal to those at the Top"—and Something More. By SIR EDWARD RUSSELL.

The Right to Constrain Men for their Own Good. By PROF. W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE.

Religion and Our Schools. By Prof. JOHN DEWEY.

Enlightened Action the True Basis of Morality. By Prof. A. H. LLOYD.

The Romantic Element in the Ethics of Christ. By STANLEY GERALD DUNN.

The Problem of Immortality. By RUDOLF EUCKEN.

The Religion of the Sensible American. By President DAVID STARR JORDAN.

The Church of Scotland and Its Formula. By the Rev. A. J. CAMPBELL.

The Burden of Language in Religion: A Catholic Study. By W. J. WILLIAMS.

Discussions, Reviews, Bibliography of Recent Literature.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

WORKS by the late

OTTO PFLEIDERER,

Professor of Practical Theology in the University of Berlin.

Vol. I. Ready. Demy 8vo. Cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

Primitive Christianity.
Its Writings and Teachings in their historical connection.

Second Edition. Ready, two Vols. Demy 8vo. Cloth, 12s.

Paulinism:
A Contribution to the History of Primitive Christian Theology.

Ready, four Vols. Demy 8vo. Cloth, 24s.

Philosophy of Religion on the Basis of its History.
Vols. I. and II., History of the Philosophy of Religion from Spinoza to the present day. Vols. III. and IV., Genetic, Speculative Philosophy of Religion.

Ready, Crown, 8vo. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

The Early Christian Conception of Christ.
Its Significance and Value in the History of Religion.

Complete Catalogue and Lists free upon Application.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

Ready this Day the August BOOK MONTHLY. 6d. net.

Contents.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. A Summer Gossip about Books and Authors, with a Bouquet of Illustrations.
A REPRINT REFERENDUM. Which Indicates the Standard Books that are Most Popular.
CONSIDERED TRIFLES. Great Things in Literature from Little Things in Life.—By R. Cochrane.
A LONDON LETTER. La Belle Canadienne and Other Over-Sea Observations.—By the Editor.
OUR "BEST SELLER." How to Form a Little Shakespeare Library.—By E. Hallam Moorhouse.
THE HISTORY NOVEL. And the Right Mixing in it of Fact and Fiction.—By Georgiana Bruce.
LIGHT AND LEADING. New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.
THE GENERAL READER. Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best-Selling Books.
NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.
BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of July.
THE PERIODICALS. Contents of this Month's Reviews and Magazines.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London, E.C.

Mr. Hyatt's novel opens with a description of the entry of a column of American infantry into Calbayog, the capital of Lamu, one of the Philippines. The soldiers, very appropriately, are thundering out a prohibited marching song:—

> "Damn, damn, damn the Filipinos,
> Pock-marked, yellow-skinned ladrones,
> Underneath the Starry flag,
> Civilise them with a Krag,
> And return to us our beloved homes."

Appropriately, because the news of peace and of the coming withdrawal of the troops from Lamu, has made the soldiers feel that "they were being robbed of the fruits of their labors, and their fallen comrades were to go unavenged, because politicians, who risked nothing and suffered nothing, wished to have the credit of finishing the war." It is all the harder on the men since the natives fighting "merely to kill, not to gain any tactical advantage," like our late foes, the Boers, selfishly refused to "come out in the open," and since the soldiers had been looking forward hopefully to the day "when they should force the enemy to an unconditional surrender, and so be able to hang the leaders comfortably and at their leisure." This patriotic dream has been suddenly dissipated by the Civil Government, and it is a bad omen that even "the high gallows in the plaza, erected by some wise and energetic Spanish governor," had been hewn down thoughtlessly in the short burst of enthusiasm which followed the defeat of the Spaniards in Manila Bay. To the half dozen whites the first chapters introduce to us, the patriotic Americans, Major John Flint and George Soley, the honest editor of the "Manila Herald," and the English trader, Robert Westley, and his daughter, the bright English girl, Clare, and to Derek North, an officer and a gentleman, late of the Indian Staff Corps, this rose-water peace is infinitely depressing. For they are all whites who "know the East," who know that "the brotherhood of man is a theory, the color-line a fact," and that America's humanitarian policy in the Philippines has been "deplorably shortsighted," since the bulk of the natives are treacherous and lazy, and that their leaders are actuated merely "by sheer love of disorder, of brigandage, and of hideous cruelty." To these white people the American Government's policy of turning the mestizos or Manila half-breeds into Government officials is an absolutely fatal one, for the half-breeds, like the villain of the story, Antonio Anugar, only dream of "founding a republic in which they themselves would hold the reins of power, and so have unlimited opportunities of satisfying their cupidity and lust."

Such are the gloomy prognostications of the men who "know the East," and the plot of "The Little Brown Brother," is skilfully woven to ridicule the policy of pacification in the Philippines. Every page of the book is saturated with the racial antagonism of the conquering Imperialist. That is why it is of such interest, and demands consideration. There is the usual sentimental situation between the English ex-officer, Derek North, and the bright English girl, Clare, who rides after and fires eagerly at a "horrible pulajan," and we assist at the scene where Beauty encourages her warrior to do the "sportsmanlike" thing, and round up the "fighting pulajans" with Captain Cochrane and his constabulary. Derek North has left the army under a cloud, but Clare helps him back to the bright path of duty and honor:—

> "'There is the governor, my pet aversion, coming this way.'
>
> "Derek took the measure of the mestizo at a single glance—the stout figure, the heavy jowl, the sensual eyes, the self-conscious swagger.
>
> "'Don't speak to him,' he said, suddenly.
>
> "Clare flushed, then laughed uneasily. 'I—I can't help it,' she answered.
>
> "The governor lifted his hat with the elaborate flourish dear to his kind. 'Good evening, señorita,' he began, then looked inquiringly at the Englishman.
>
> "Clare muttered the words of introduction in a voice curiously unlike her usual distinct tones. The governor murmured his pleasure, but Derek merely raised his topee. He was not accustomed to seeing the women of his own color talking to half-breeds, and he listened with barely-concealed impatience to the governor's inquiries about Clare's health" (p. 80.)
>
> "Derek smiled. 'No, I was going to change at Cochrane's quarters. I hate walking about the town like a wild man.'
>
> "'How silly you are! I want to see you, though. I have never seen you in anything like a uniform. Go up and change now.'
>
> When he came back a quarter of an hour later in well-worn khaki, with canvas leggings, a shot-cartridge bandolier, and a short Winchester shot-gun, her eyes sparkled with appreciation. 'You look very nice,' she said. 'It suits you well. But why haven't you got a revolver?'
>
> "'I think these shot-guns are better,' he answered.
>
> "The girl knitted her brows. 'Yes,' she said, slowly, 'I suppose they are, and revolvers are awfully heavy, clumsy things. Still, I think you should carry one, too. Will you?' (p. 156.)

A tyro could foretell, from these passages, the course of events. While Derek is occupied with Captain Cochrane in toiling after the rebel leader, Papa Pablo, and his bloodthirsty pulajanes, who, as Clare puts it tersely, are "Hillmen—beasts, murderous, horrible brutes," the evil-looking sensual governor, Antonio Anugar, is hatching a "diabolical" conspiracy "with half the leading natives in the city, and most of them civil servants," to seize three or four of the southern islands, and spread a general rising through the group. Anugar only fails because Pete Jansen, who is commanding a Yankee coastguard vessel, betrays the wicked governor to the humanitarian Commissioner Furber, and then betrays Furber to old Enrique, a rival hill chieftain who happens to detest Papa Pablo and the pulajanes. Anugar, however, to point the Imperialistic moral, has gone so far as to incarcerate the English trader, Robert Westley, and to assure the bright English girl that she should "never, never see her father again, unless ——" she should be prepared to pay the unspeakable penalty. And, of course, Derek, who returns in the nick of time, goes "livid with wrath," and shoots the vile Anugar between the eyes with "the identical revolver Clare had bidden him carry." So much for Commissioner Furber's pacification policy! A policy which, according to the computation of the patriotic Major John Flint, results in a stifled insurrection and the death of between fifty and a hundred thousand peasantry, from sheer starvation and misery, and the economic ruin of the survivors.

We are asked to swallow these startling things in the latter pages of the novel, in order that the Imperialistic moral may be rammed well home on us, but we cannot stomach the American journalist, Mr. Soley, who, with all the facts in his hands, refuses to publish them on the ground that "they are too strong. It would raise a revolution in the States, or something very near it. . . . No, it is shameful copy, magnificent copy, but it's too shameful to put in print!" We fear that the editor can pull the long-bow more easily than the major can find the bull's-eye. And we would recommend Mr. Hyatt in the next patriotic novel he writes to construct his foes, the pro-natives, out of material more convincing than papier-mâché. Commissioner Furber is scarcely even a marionette; his portrait is painted in the Raw Head and Bloody Bones style. We have said that we do not question the author's sincerity. It is quite easy for us to place ourselves in Derek North's or Clare's shoes in Lamu, and we cheerfully agree that "Nature never intended that civilised man should travel in the island," and that "this wholly inglorious campaign against savages was not worth one white man's life." But it is amusing that an author fails to see the natives' side of the shield. Lack of imagination in a conqueror may be an asset, but it comes nigh stupidity in a novelist. The naïve tone of the story, with its reiterated accusations of "cruelty, passion for disorder, hatred of work," against the Filipinos, reminds us curiously of the Elizabethans' tone towards the "Irish savages." Mr. Hyatt might study with advantage the "Thirteen Stories" of Mr. Cunninghame Graham, and also the latter's "Hernando de Soto."

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

The work of the writer is made decidedly subordinate to that of the artist in "Old England: Her Story Mirrored in Her Scenes," the text by W. Shaw Sparrow, the pictures by James Orrock, R.I. (Eveleigh Nash, 24s. net). Mr. Sparrow seems to have felt it his duty to keep the reader's mind bent upon Mr. Orrock's illustrations, and to lose no opportunity of pointing out merits that might otherwise

MISCELLANIES. (Fourth Series.)

By JOHN MORLEY.

Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Contains Papers on Machiavelli and Guicciardini. John Stuart Mill, and other Pieces.

The Government of England.

By Prof. A. LAWRENCE LOWELL. In 2 vols. 8vo. 17s. net.

Westminster Gazette:—"An Englishman has written what we believe is acknowledged in America to be the standard book about the institutions of the United States; and an American now returns the compliment by writing what bids fair to be the standard book for English readers about the Government of England. . . . We have only to say in conclusion that we have seldom met a book which is so full and varied in its knowledge and illustrations, and at the same time so suggestive and philosophical in its ideas and speculations.'

Impressions of India.

By Sir HENRY CRAIK, K.C.B., M.P. Crown 8vo. 3s. net.

Standard:—"Contain not only a pleasantly written account of his travels, but also many remarkably shrewd observations on various aspects of the present political situation."

NEW AND CHEAPER IMPRESSION.

Personal Narrative of a Year's Journey through Central and Eastern Arabia, 1862-63.

By WILLIAM GIFFORD PALGRAVE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

The Eversley Tennyson.

Annotated by ALFRED, Lord TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM, Lord TENNYSON. In 9 vols. globe 8vo, 4s. net each. Vol. VII.—DEMETER, AND OTHER POEMS, Vol. VIII.—QUEEN MARY AND HAROLD. [August 7th.

The Logic of Will.

A Study in Analogy. By HELEN WODEHOUSE, D. Phil. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

AUGUST NO. NOW READY.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, 16s.

THE REMINISCENCES OF LADY RANDOLPH CHURCHILL. IX.—A Visit to Japan in 1894. By MRS. GEORGE CORNWALLIS-WEST.

TO BUILD A FIRE. A Story. By JACK LONDON, Author of "The Call of the Wild," &c.

MY KITTENS. By CARMEN SYLVA (Queen of Roumania).

THE SPELL OF EGYPT: AS REVEALED IN ITS MOUNTAINS. IV. By ROBERT HICHENS.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

MACMILLAN & Co., LTD., LONDON.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

THE CASE FOR FREE TRADE

is being pithily put from day to day in

"THE DAILY NEWS"

by

L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P.,

under the title

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE.

EVERY DAY ONE POINT.

All who wish to have ready to hand an apt reply for the Tariff Reformer should watch this series in

"THE DAILY NEWS"

daily.

What are the most hopeful Signs of the Times?——

The EDITOR of PUBLIC OPINION invites Essays on the above subject, and offers honorariums of £5, £3, and £2 for the three best Essays sent in.

FULL PARTICULARS to be obtained in this week's issue of

PUBLIC OPINION.

To be obtained of all Newsagents and Bookstalls, or it will be sent post free on receipt of 2½d. in stamps sent to the offices:—

31 & 32, TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, LONDON, E.C.

The Yearly Subscription to PUBLIC OPINION is 10s. 10d. a year post free for the United Kingdom, and 13s. a year if sent abroad.

pass unnoticed. We do not think this the best way to work on a book of this character, and we regret it all the more because Mr. Sparrow touches upon many interesting subjects. He begins by an introduction on "Art and Landscape as Social History," in which he justly claims that a mass of detail concerning our social history may be learned from a discerning study of the great English landscape painters. Then we have an account of passages in English history springing directly from the sea-coast and the sea, beginning with Cæsar's landing and ending with Grace Darling's rescue of the survivors of the steamer "Forfarshire," in 1838. This is followed by an excellent chapter on the influence of roads and bridges, in which Mr. Sparrow opposes M. Jusserand's view that the medieval highways were badly kept. The references to bridges and roads out of repair in medieval documents, Mr. Sparrow thinks, must be taken as evidence that their general condition was good, "for the usual and common things of life are not often mentioned in public documents of the early times." He cites Thorold Rogers in support of his contention, and the speed with which medieval troops were able to move is another argument in the same direction. There is an excellent chapter on "How They Built in Old England," and other subjects dealt with are the church, the feudal castles, forests, archery, the romance of the "grene wode," and the reign of the sheepfolds and shepherds. Had Mr. Sparrow been less closely bound to the illustrations his book would have been better reading. As it is he is often scrappy and occasionally trite. Mr. Orrock's pictures, of which there are eighty admirable reproductions, are the feature of the book. They have been chosen from out-door sketches covering fifty years of work, and are delightful reproductions of the spirit of English rural landscape.

* * *

The "Country in Town" Exhibitions at the Whitechapel Art Gallery have provided ocular demonstration of what is possible in the way of nature-study within the metropolitan area, and Miss K. M. Hall's suggestive and stimulating book on "Nature Rambles in London" (Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d. net), should further encourage the pursuit of this altogether healthy recreation. Miss Hall is the curator of the Borough of Stepney Museums, one of which is a Nature Study Museum; and here the inhabitants of the parish of St. George-in-the-East and others can investigate at first hand a fair proportion of the plant and insect life that is treated in those pages. The London parks supply the additional phenomena with which the book deals. The "Rambles" begin with the early spring, and extend practically over the whole year, Nature being described, as it were, season by season. Nearly every topic is touched on. Arboriculture receives special attention at the author's hands; she traces the life-story of several well-known trees from their first budding to the fall of the leaf and the dispersal of the seed. She has also some criticisms to pass on the unsuitability of certain trees selected for the adornment of our public thoroughfares, and on the wholesale maiming of their forms that too often takes the place of pruning, when they are discovered to be too cumbrous for their surroundings. The gardeners of the seventeenth century, the fruits of whose skill we enjoy to-day in our old parks, understood these things better; or perhaps they succeeded where we fail through their not having been in so desperate a hurry to see the triumph of their labors. In the nature nursery at Stepney there are beehives and bees, and these have given Miss Hall an opportunity for writing with knowledge and considerable freshness of style on a subject that has attracted authors so far apart as Maeterlinck and Lord Avebury. The problem of the London sparrow, the many feathered residents in St. James's Park, the science of the despised and little understood fungus, and the lore of the common spider are other themes that help to make the volume attractive to the general reader. Mr. Henry Irving's photographs of natural specimens are worthy of all praise, and Miss Beatrice Harraden contributes an appreciative foreword.

* * *

Mr. Alfred T. Story's "American Shrines in England" (Methuen, 6s.) is mainly intended for Americans who wish to visit or read about places associated with some of the men whose names are famous in American history. But the book will also be read with enjoyment by Englishmen who like to remember that many of those who helped to found the American Republic, or to mould its destinies, were of English stock. Six chapters are given to an account of the Washington family, Sulgrave and Brington, in Northamptonshire, Wormleighton, just over the border in Warwickshire, and Purleigh, of which Lawrence Washington was the rector, all being described in entertaining fashion. Ecton, the home of the Franklins, is next dealt with, and then we pass to Scrooby, in Nottinghamshire, associated with the Pilgrim Fathers, to Bucks, the home and burial place of William Penn, to Denbighshire, the county of the Yales, back to Southwark, whose cathedral holds John Harvard's monument, and to many another resort which patriotic Americans are likely to visit. Mr. Story makes a pleasant companion for these excursions. We have seldom read a series of biographical and topographical sketches of greater interest.

* * *

A disappointed collector of moths was once heard to remark that Nature had provided for everything and everybody except the specimen-hunter. The latter, however, if he be a true lover of nature as well, will find no such petty exception to the general beneficence of her scheme; he will, on the contrary, thoroughly endorse its perfect completeness. In the eight essays which comprise Mr. F. C. Snell's "Nature Studies by Night and Day" (Fisher Unwin, 5s.), the author succeeds in proving how very complete that is. The book is no dry-as-dust scientific treatise. It is intended for the general reader, who will find much to interest him therein, and, if he has read his Darwin, or has a first-hand acquaintance with the subjects dealt with, a good deal more. The essay on "Protective Coloration in Nature" treats of what is perhaps the most fascinating topic of all, viz., the relation of the colors of animals and insects to their habits of life and their surroundings, but the whole wealth of Nature and, what is not less important, her economy, is suggested by the chapter on plants asleep and awake "In Nature's Garden," by "The Life History of the Common Frog," and by "The Study of Fungi." The carnivorous habits of the common sundew have furnished the author with matter for some curiously interesting experiments. He has also written instructive and useful essays on "Clouds and Cloud Photography" and "Nature Photography by Night." Nature study is a pursuit that has recently increased its popularity to a very great extent, and this informative little book, accompanied by photographs of real illustrative value, should have the effect of stimulating interest in many subjects that have hitherto been looked at superficially or insufficiently understood.

* * *

The latest addition to Messrs. Jack's series "The World's Story Tellers" is "Stories by Edgar Allan Poe" (1s. net). It contains seven of Poe's stories, together with a good introductory essay by Mr. Arthur Ransome. In Mr. Ransome's view Poe will be remembered not so much by his detective stories as by his more weird and mystical tales. "They are not stories from which we can learn life: but they are the key to strange knowledge of ourselves. They leave us richer, not in facts but in emotions. We find our way by their help into novel corners of sensation. . . . . Like old melody, like elaborate and beautiful dancing, like artificial light, like the sight of poison or any other concentrated power, they are among the significant experiences that are open to humanity." But, allowing for the wonderful fascination of these stories, we have little doubt that Poe will also be remembered as the first story-writer to employ exact science as the basis of his tales of the marvellous. The vindication of Poe, as Mr. J. M. Robertson pointed out in a brilliant essay—perhaps the finest appreciation of Poe in existence—is that, even when treating the most weird and abnormal themes, he is always a realist in method. It is in this combination of imaginative power with realistic detail that his power lies.

* * *

The third edition of Mr. Joshua Rowntree's "The Imperial Drug Trade" (Methuen, 2s. net) hardly requires

ALBANY REVIEW.—AUGUST.

"The Country and the Lords," EDWARD JENKS; "The Revolt of Woman," HAROLD SPENDER; "Dante on the Baptism of Statius," A. W. VERRALL, Litt. D.; "From a Poor Man's House"—Concluded. STEPHEN REYNOLDS; "Invultation: A Study in Black Magic," JAMES HOOPER; "The Education of Young Birds," DOUGLAS DEWAR; "The Small Holdings Act in Operation," HUBERT BEAUMONT (Secretary of the Central Small Holdings Society); "Machiavellianism," G. LOWES DICKINSON; "Persia, Macedonia, and The Anglo-Russian Entente," W. A. MOORE; "The Poems of Mary Coleridge," F. MELIAN STAWELL; "At the Foot of the Scaffold: II." Mme. SAVINKOV (Translated by Mrs. Garnett). Current Events: Persia; Politics at Home; The Output of the Session; The Old Age Pensions Bill; The Prospects; The House of Lords; The Presidential Election in the United States.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO STREET, W.

A NEW "F.C.G." Froissart.

On WEDNESDAY NEXT, July 29, the

"WESTMINSTER GAZETTE"

will publish the first chapters of a series entitled

"F.C.G.'S" MODERN FROISSART,

describing in quaint mediaeval phraseology and with illustrations founded upon fourteenth century examples, the principal political events from the end of 1902 up to and including the General Election of 1906.

The series will be continued at intervals throughout August, and the Weekly Editions* of the "Westminster Gazette" will contain the chapters published during each current week. The story of the events familiar to us all in our recent history will be told as if written by Sir John Froissart himself, and, although a good deal of humour is introduced both in the text and the pictures, the narrative will be an interesting record of actual events.

* THE SATURDAY WESTMINSTER.

Offices: WESTMINSTER GAZETTE, Tudor St., London, E.C.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR

CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

Financial Review of Reviews.

AUGUST. 1/- nett.

Special Articles:

HOW IRELAND WOULD BE FINANCED UNDER HOME RULE.
By J. G. SWIFT-MACNEILL, K.C., M.P.

THE DANGERS OF STOCKS QUOTED AT A PREMIUM.
By GEORGE WITHERS.

WHAT IS A TRUE RESERVE FUND?
By PHILIP TOVEY.

Also Topics of the Month, Analysis of Companies' Accounts and New Capital Issues; Four Years' Prices, Dividends and Yields of 5,000 Stock Exchange Securities. 300 pp. 1s.

Publisher, 2, Waterloo Place, Pall Mall, S.W.

BOOKSELLERS.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 93, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
[And at READING and GUILDFORD.]
MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

BOOKS. BOOKS. BOOKS.

Rare and curious Books for the collector. First Editions. Court Memoirs Medical, Occult, &c. Out of Print Books and everything that's a book supplied. No matter when published. State wants. 100,000 books on sale. Catalogues free.

HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

BOOKS WANTED. First editions of all kinds. Sporting, Naval, Military Coloured Plates by Alken, Cruikshank, Rowlandson, and others. Special list of 3,000 wanted. LIBRARIES PURCHASED.

UNDERWOOD VISIBLE TYPEWRITER.

The Machine you will eventually buy

Every character in sight from Date to Signature

The only strictly high-grade visible writer

Especially Adaptable for Invoicing

Underwood Typewriter Co.,
120, Queen Victoria St., E.C.

an introduction to the public. When the book was issued in 1905, it did not fail to attract the attention of every thinking man who was cognisant of the principal curse of the Chinese nation—the devastating traffic in opium—and its judicial handling of the facts, coupled with a quiet, but terrible, indictment of the one-sided findings of the Royal Commission of 1894, was studied far and wide. The new edition contains four supplementary chapters, grouped under the heading of "A New Era." Their office is to prove to the hilt what Mr. Rowntree has contended all along, namely, that China herself is doing her best to abolish the opium habit among her population. The Imperial edicts against the use of the drug are being stringently enforced, and though the extra-territoriality of foreign residents is a clog upon the wheel of her statesmanship, the action of our present Government, in so far as it concerns the poppy cultivation in India, and the importation of the drug from that country into China, has encouraged the reform. Not only the conscience-less Opium War in which we engaged, but the whole attitude of British statesmen towards this question constituted a reproach, for the removal of which our more recent policy, cautious as it is, will scarcely suffice. The principal statistics of the trade have been brought up to date in an appendix to this useful volume.

* * *

A Novel Reader's Guide.—"The Wild Geese," by Stanley Weyman (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.). The "wild geese" were those Irish soldiers who joined the armies of foreign States during the early eighteenth century. Mr. Weyman's romance is well constructed, and gives a fair account of the Ireland of the period.—"The Council of Justice," by Edgar Wallace (Ward, Lock, 6s.). A sequel to the same author's "The Four Just Men," written in the melodramatic style of its predecessor.—"The Song of Hyacinth," by John Oxenham (Methuen, 6s.). A collection of readable short stories of the magazine type.—"The Pursuer," by Morice Gerard (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.). A romance, its subject the foiling of the schemes of a gang of cosmopolitan financiers.—"The Leading Lady," by Archibald Eyre (Ward, Lock, 6s.). A child changed during infancy, a famous actress, a peer's son, and a bank robbery are the principal ingredients of a book which, despite its improbabilities, manages to hold the reader's interest.

The Week in the City.

The Movement of Leading Stocks.

	Price Friday Morning, July 24.	Price Friday Morning, July 31.
Consols 2½ per cent.	86 13/16	... 86 13/16
German 3 per cent.	82	... 82½
Russian 5 per cent.	95⅜	... 95⅜
London and North Western	132¼	... 132¾
Great Eastern	64	... 65½
Great Western	117½	... 119¼
Union Pacific	159	... 157⅞
Canadian-Pacific...	172½	... 175¼

The last account was a disastrous one in the Home Railway market. South-Western and South-Eastern fell six, Central London five, Brighton ordinary and deferred four, Great Central preferred three, and so on. American Railways were as buoyant as ours were depressed; for Illinois rose 8½, Union Pacific 5½, Southern Pacific 4½, and most of the Erie issues three. Canadian Pacific rose six, but Trunks barely held their own, and Hudson's Bay were low. Good judges whom I have met of late consider that prices in the American market have now reached an artificial height, from which a fall is probable. The Foreign market was depressed, partly by the revolution in Turkey, partly by the German scare. But the speeches of Sir Edward Grey and the Chancellor of the Exchequer have restored confidence, and there has been a fair amount both of speculation and investment business. The Stock Exchange grumbles; but the new issues (with the exception of the Brazil loan) have really been taken up wonderfully well.

The Railway Rate Controversy in the United States.

The controversy over the proposed advance in freight rates began with the publication in the middle of July of the correspondence between the Manufacturers' Association and Vice-President Brown of the New York Central. The letter of protest to Vice-President Brown stated that "the manufacturing and commercial interests have suffered fully as much as the railroads by the recent depression, and they are just as slow to recover from the effects." The letter added: "We do not deny the rights of the carriers to make rates, but we believe that any advances in the present rates would retard the return of normal conditions and delay indefinitely the era of renewed prosperity." The Vice-President's answer was that during the past eighteen months the converging lines of expenditure and receipts have suddenly been brought so close together "as to alarm shareholders and investors, and it is certain that, in order to pay fixed charges, taxes, and operating expenses, with even a very moderate return to shareholders, there must be either a moderate increase in freight rates or a very substantial reduction in wages of railroad employees." The "New York Evening Post" considers that "for the railroads to attempt to increase freight rates at a time when the demand for transportation has dropped off is, according to all known laws of supply and demand, indefensible." President McCrea, of the Pennsylvania, admitted as much in his statement that "the time was not opportune for an advance in all class rates." Then comes the question, "Why is it, that after ten years of the greatest prosperity in the history of the country, followed by only six months of trade reaction, the railroads are pleading poverty?" Vice-President Brown, of the New York Central, who is acting as the spokesman for the railroads that favor an increase in rates, answers, "The foundation for an increase of freight rates lies in the fact that for ten years there has been a continuous rise in the price of almost everything except freight rates. The demand on the part of the railroads for an increase in freight rates at this time is not based on the existing depressed business conditions." Of course not, it is based on the existence of high tariff and tariff-fostered trusts, which create artificial prices and raise the cost of transport

The Free Trade Movement in the States.

From this point of view it is worth noting that the two leading financial and commercial newspapers of New York—the "Journal of Commerce" and the "Wall Street Journal"—have both been dealing editorially with the Protectionist Tariff. Neither of them can be regarded as crusaders on behalf of Free Trade. They look at these questions with the eyes of the business community of New York. What do they see and what do they say? Here is the "Wall Street Journal" discussing "the things essential to national development on truly conservative lines." They are (1) the preservation of forests and the prevention of other forms of national waste in the exploitation of natural resources, (2) the reduction of the tariff so that American manufacturers will be able to sell their goods abroad, (3) a proper banking and currency system. The chief space is devoted to arguing the second of these three policies, and the "Journal" urges that breakdowns will, and must, constantly recur "so long as our manufacturing industries are so exclusively dependent upon the home market, as to pass from excess of orders in one quarter of the year to almost absolute stagnation in the next." Broad as the home market of the United States is, "it is not wide enough to give balance and continuity to our industrial capacity." But the world-market will never come so long as an excessive tariff "enhances the cost of production above the competition level in international trade." The "Journal of Commerce" says that the tariff was originally created in order to diversify industries, but that the arguments which could be urged for it then are no longer applicable. From all that I can hear there is a pretty general desire in the States for great reductions in the tariff, and this is one reason why Mr. Bryan's chances are thought to be rather good.

Lucellum.

"Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking."

Player's
Navy Cut
Tobacco and Cigarettes

Sold only in the original Packets and Tins, and may be obtained from all Stores and Tobacconists of repute 0487.

TANGYE
OIL ENGINE
AUTOMATIC
TUBE IGNITION.
NO LAMP
EXCEPT FOR STARTING
TANGYES LTD
BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE
RED WHITE & BLUE
Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

ONE & ALL SEEDS

THE BRAND GUARANTEES ONE & ALL QUALITY.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

ONE & ALL SEEDS are reliable, pure, and guaranteed.
Each packet is dated with the year of issue.
ONE & ALL FERTILISERS are complete Manures.
All are supplied in small quantities at reasonable prices.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Choice Varieties of Sweet Peas, with an Original Pamphlet on their Culture, by Richard Dean, V.M.H.—viz., Dorothy Eckford, white; Hon. Mrs. Kenyon, yellow: Prima Donna, soft pink; King Edward VII., crimson; Miss Wilmott, rich deep orange pink; Mrs. Walter Wright, mauve; Prince of Wales, fine rose; Duchess of Westminster, violet purple; Othello, deep maroon; Lady Grisel Hamilton, pale lavender; Duke of Westminster, purple; Navy Blue.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Annuals.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Perennials and Biennials.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables for Saladings.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables.

One & All Collection of Choicest Asters in 10 Varieties—2s. 6d. Giant Comet, white; Giant Comet, The Bride, white; Giant Comet, rose; Giant Comet, azure blue; Giant Comet, dark violet; Mixed Dwarf Chrysanthemum; Finest Mixed Bouquet; Mixed Victoria; Mixed Paeony; Perfection; and Betteridge's Quilled in mixed colours.

One & All Fertiliser No. 24 for general garden purposes. Half-rod packets 6d. bags, 7 lbs., 2/3; 14 lbs., 3/6; 28 lbs., 5/9; 56 lbs., 10/6; 112 lbs., 20/- Carriage Paid.

ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, LIMITED. Name and address of nearest Local Agent, Illustrated Catalogues, and other details, sent free by post on application to EDWARD OWEN GREENING, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS

BIRKBECK BANK
ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.
2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.
2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

Liver troubles

are speedily and effectually cured by LIVERETS. The great disadvantage of most liver medicines is that they have a distinctly debilitating effect on the health.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets
STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE.

Are especially compounded to overcome this evil. Prepared, as prescribed by an eminent physician, from purely vegetable ingredients, they thoroughly cleanse the liver of all impurities and leave it perfectly healthy. And the valuable tonic properties they possess, stimulate the liver while they relieve it, and, finally, make it sound and strong enough to enable it to perform its functions in a healthy, natural way. Of all Chemists and Stores, or Post Free, 1/1½, from

MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name MERIT'S LIVERETS, and the signature MERIT & Co., is on the package. Beware of spurious imitations.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY of BIRMINGHAM.

FACULTY OF MEDICINE,

Associated with the General and Queen's Hospitals for Clinical Teaching.

SCHOOL OF DENTISTRY.

In conjunction with the Birmingham Dental Hospital.

THE WINTER SESSION OPENS OCTOBER 5TH, 1908.

The University grants Degrees in Medicine, Surgery, and Public Health, and a Diploma in Public Health; also Degrees and a Diploma in Dental Surgery.

The Courses of Instruction are arranged to meet the requirement of other Universities and Licensing Bodies.

For Prospectus and further information apply to—
GILBERT BARLING, M.Sc., F.R.C.S., Dean.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education, Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.
Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

(For Leisure Hour Work, see the Bootham School exhibit in the Franco-British Exhibition, Education Building, Section J.)

Special terms for boys under 14 and under 13.

For copies of Prospectus and full particulars with regard to Scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

NEW BOYS ARRIVE SEPTEMBER 17TH, OTHERS 18TH.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

BROMSGROVE SCHOOL, WORCESTERSHIRE.

AUTUMN TERM begins September 17th.

APPLY THE HEADMASTER.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE, CARDIFF.

The South Wales and Monmouthshire Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts, 3, 4, 5 and 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

Superintendent ... Miss HESTER DAVIES.
Secretary ... ... J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.

The School is under the Management of a Committee appointed by the Council of the College. It is under Government Inspection, and the Committee is empowered to grant Diplomas in Cookery, Laundry work and Housewifery, under the cognizance and with the approval of the Board of Education.

The Departments of the Training School of Cookery and Domestic Arts are as follows:—

1. TRAINING SCHOOL OF COOKERY.
2. TRAINING SCHOOL OF LAUNDRY WORK.
3. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEWIFERY.
4. TRAINING SCHOOL OF DRESSMAKING.
5. TRAINING SCHOOL OF HOUSEKEEPING.

Further particulars can be obtained on application to the Superintendent of the School, at 6, St. Andrew's Place, Cardiff.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

THE ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL.

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields; gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Next Term, Sept. 18th. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING.—Typewriting of every description high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

MISCELLANEOUS.

PRIVATE ACCOUNT BOOK. For Country or City Gentlemen. Guaranteed to fulfil every requirement. Post free 10/6, or Particulars from McQueen & Co., 1a, Moat Rd., Leicester.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

TOURS.

£6 6s. LUCERNE TOUR.

Nine days. Short Sea Route. No extras for Conductor or Gratuities.

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D.

5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. 25, Cannon Street, E.C.
4, Charing Cross, S.W. 84, Piccadilly, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class Eng[illegible]ily Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Incl[illegible]ms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published week[illegible] Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son, Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.

67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.

BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott. Prop.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

GREAT YARMOUTH.

HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny. Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Afternoon Teas, Tel. 647

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

READY IN AUGUST.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

HOLY ORDERS: The Tragedy of a Quiet Life,

By MARIE CORELLI.

The demand for MAX PEMBERTON'S LOVE THE HARVESTER is so great that a Second Edition is ready.
A Second Edition is also in preparation of THE EASY-GO-LUCKIES.

METHUEN'S POPULAR NOVELS.—6s. each.

NOVELS NOW READY.

SCARLET RUNNER	C. N. and A. M. Williamson
THE CROOKED WAY	William Le Queux
THE PASSION OF PAUL MARILLIER	Adeline Sergeant
HARDY-ON-THE-HILL	M. E. Francis
THE SURPRISING HUSBAND	Richard Marsh
LOVE THE HARVESTER	Max Pemberton
THE EASY-GO-LUCKIES	Maud Stepney Rawson
THE SONG OF HYACINTH	John Oxenham
A SET OF SIX	Joseph Conrad
THE RESULT OF AN ACCIDENT	Beatrice Whitby

FORTHCOMING IN AUGUST AND SEPTEMBER.

MR. APOLLO	Ford Madox Hueffer
ANTHONY CUTHBERT	Richard Bagot
CINDERELLA OF CANADA	Sara Jeannette Duncan
HOLY ORDERS	Marie Corelli
SPANISH GOLD	George A. Birmingham
HILL RISE	W. B. Maxwell
ARNOUL THE ENGLISHMAN	Francis Aveling
THE GREAT MISS DRIVER	Anthony Hope
MIRAGE	E. Temple Thurston
INTERPLAY	Beatrice Harraden
A DAUGHTER OF FRANCE	Constance Maud
THE HEART SMITER	Mary E. Mann
SALTHAVEN	W. W. Jacobs
OVER BEMERTON'S	E. V. Lucas
THE WIND IN THE REEDS	Kenneth Grahame
THE SPIRIT OF REVOLT	Philip Gibbs

A SUMMER TOUR IN FINLAND. By PAUL WAINEMAN. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by ALEXANDER FEDERLEY, and 16 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

Has recently completed a new tour of this country, from Helsingfors to Tornea, the most northerly town in Europe. During his trip the author collected a mass of personal impressions of the people, land and principal towns, from the wild scenery of the far north, where the peasant's hut is the most luxurious abode, to the old aristocratic homes in the south of Finland. The book is illustrated in water-colors by a well-known Finnish artist.

THE LORE OF THE HONEY BEE. By TICKNER EDWARDS. With 20 Illustrations from Original Photographs. Crown 8vo. 6s.

This is a history of bees and their masters, from the very earliest times down to the present. The wonderful communal life within the hive is touched on in all its varying aspects; and the reader is introduced to a class of men from all ages as quaintly original as their calling is inimitably picturesque. The book covers the whole field of ascertained facts in the natural history of the honey bee, as well as the romance of beemanship past and present, and nothing better could be put in the hands of the beginner in apiculture.

THE COMPLETE OARSMAN. By R. C. LEHMANN, M.P. With many Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"The book is copiously illustrated, and may fairly be said to be the best and most complete book on the subject."—Daily Mail.
"The volume contains the fruits of ripe experience, keen powers of observation, and illustrations of a master hand."—Sporting Life.
"Among the manuals of oarsmanship in our language there is not another so detailed and so helpfully done. It is a complete dissection of the art."—Outlook

THE YOUNG BOTANIST. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S., and C[illegible]ER, F.R.H.S. With 8 Coloured Plates, and 63 in Black-and-White, by C. F. NEWALL. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

In an original and concise manner the book sets out in tabular form full accounts of commoner British wild plants, their English and Latin names, where they grow and when they bloom, their form and str[illegible]lient features, medicinal uses, &c.

JAMES II. AND HIS WIFES. By ALLAN FEA. With 40 Illustrations, demy [illegible]. 6d. net.

Few people have a good word to say for poor King James, because he was a [illegible] Yet he had many good points, and had he appeared as a monarch at a less critical political period, his better qualities would [illegible] have been so entirely submerged by ill-luck. The writer (avoiding politics as far as possible) shows him as he was, with all [illegible] failings. Certainly his picturesque and dramatic surroundings, not to mention his misfortunes, make him one of the most interes[illegible]g characters of the seventeenth century. The author gives the finest and most authentic portraits, many of which have not hitherto been reproduced.

THE ALPS IN NATURE AND HISTORY. By W. A. B. COOLIDGE, M.A. With 20 Illustrations and 9 Maps and Plans, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

In this book, by one of the chief authorities on the subject, the political history of the Alps is lightly told, and the story of their exploration given. The Alpine pastures, glaciers, and great passes are fully described, while separate sections deal with the beasts, the birds, and flowers.

"Those who know the Alps will welcome much knowledge that makes the country more absorbing than ever, and newcomers will find the book delightfully illuminative."—Pall Mall Gazette.
"Into this book the author who knows the Alps best has put the best of his knowledge."—Manchester Guardian.

THE REVOLT IN HINDUSTAN, 1857-1859. By Field-Marshal Sir EVELYN WOOD, V.C., G.C.B. With 8 Illustrations and 5 Maps, crown 8vo, 6s.

"Among shorter histories this will henceforth take the first place in popular esteem."—Times.
"Read this simple and restrained narrative, and reawaken your pride in the courage and resource of your countrymen."—Daily Mail.

THE CITY OF GENOA. By ROBERT W. CARDEN. With 12 Illustrations in Colour by WILLIAM PARKINSON, and 20 from Photographs, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This book sets out briefly the history, life, and art of a city about which very little has been written in the English language.

THE ROMANCE OF NORTHUMBERLAND. By A. G. BRADLEY, Author of "Round About Wiltshire." With 16 Illustrations in Color by FRANK SOUTHGATE, R.B.A., and 12 from Photographs, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

This is a full and interesting description of the more romantic parts of a romantic country, dealing with the Roman Wall, the great castles, the towns and villages full of historical interest, the famous valleys, and the marches so renowned in Border song and story.

"A model of what such a book ought to be . . . picturesque and attractive."—Yorkshire Post.
"Mr. Bradley has happily caught the characteristics of Northumbrian scenery—sombre, impressive, and romantic in association."—Standard.

A BOOK ABOUT YORKSHIRE. By J. S. FLETCHER. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by WAL PAGET and FRANK SOUTHGATE, R.B.A., and 12 from Photographs, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Without being in any sense a guide-book, "A Book About Yorkshire" gives readers a full account of the Three Ridings, of the places and scenery of most note within their borders, of the legendary lore, and of the chief historical monuments.

"It covers the wide world of things worth seeing and saying as well as a single volume could."—Athenæum.
"This is just the book that lovers of English country and old associations will delight in . . . at once interesting and entertaining."—Spectator.

THE COURT OF RUSSIA IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. By E. A. BRAYLEY HODGETTS. With 20 Illustrations, 2 vols. demy 8vo, 24s. net.

"Very entertaining and never dull."—Times.
"May be warmly commended to the general reader."—Athenæum.

METHUEN and CO., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, AUGUST 1, 1908.

The Nation

VOL. III., No. 19.] SATURDAY, AUGUST 8, 1908. [PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK	659
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—
A Lesson from Haggerston	662
Free Trade as an International Policy	663
The Tradition of the Barricade	664
LIFE AND LETTERS:—
The Romance of America	666
In the Mediterranean	667
A Gr en Heaven	668
The Surplus of Summer	669
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—
The Harmsworth Brand - IV.	670
THE PERSONALITIES OF THE SESSION. By James Drysdale	671
MUSIC:—
The Error of Bayreuth	672
COMMUNICATIONS:—
Mr. Gladstone's New Way with Old Offenders. By Tighe Hopkins	673
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
"The Lost Liberty of the Road." By George Calderon, R. W. J., and S. D. W.	674
The German Gymnastic Fetes. By Observer	675
Mrs. Humphry Ward's Battalions. By (Mrs.) Florence Travers	676
Another "Marathon Race." By Andre de Bavier	676
Haggerston and After. By F. W Soutter	676
"The Tempest" Crux. By N. W. Hill	676
POETRY:—
Joy and Pleasure. By W. H. Davies	676
THE WORLD OF BOOKS	677
Books to be Read	677
REVIEWS:—
A New Historical Method. By Prof. Dill	678
Through Fellowship to Faith	679
The "Complete" This or That	680
The Land of Invasions	680
Romance as it is Written	680
BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
Many Mansions	682
On Cumbrian and Cambrian Hills	684
The Castles and Keeps of Scotland	684
Outposts of Empire	684
The Babees Book	684
The Monthly Reviews	684
THE WEEK IN THE CITY	686

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

A FRIGHTFUL motor car accident took place on the Brooklands track on Bank Holiday. A Mercédès car, going at the rate of over 100 miles an hour, overturned, and the young mechanic was killed. The coroner at the inquest said that the high speeds "pandered to a degenerate taste." The same papers which recorded this death told of a cyclist knocked down and seriously injured at Reigate by the driver of a car who did not stop to see whether he had killed or merely maimed a fellow-creature; of a clergyman killed at Towyn (both legs broken and one ear torn off); and of a five-year old child killed instantly, at Mold, in his mother's presence. Next day a motor omnibus got out of control near Leamington and "seriously injured" many people; a cyclist came into collision with a car on Egham Hill, and was "not expected to live"; a car smashed up a coach full of Yeomanry at Wroxham; and two men were "terribly injured"—probably to death—near Aberdeen, the car driving off, and no one being able to identify it; on the next day again a man was committed for trial at Shipley, near Horsham, for running over and killing a girl of seventeen. It is in view of such a state of outrage that we venture to ask those of our readers who are interested in this question to observe the conduct of motor cars, during the holiday season, in their neighbourhood, and to be so good as to report to us on the following points:—

1. The speed of the cars and the conduct of their drivers.

2. The dust nuisance and the injury to roads.

3. The opinions of various classes—magistrates, house-owners, farmers, and cottagers.

4. Their view of the form which remedial legislation should take.

* * *

THE International Free Trade Congress was brilliantly opened at the Caxton Hall on Tuesday. It has included Continental Free Traders of the distinction of Professor Brentano, Dr. Barth, and M. Guyot. It was addressed by Mr. Churchill, and the Cobden Club dinner in its honor was dignified by a speech from the Prime Minister. Mr Churchill's speech was an eloquent exposure of the intimate relation between peace and free international exchanges. There was, he said, not a single Free Trade doctrine which did not add to the store of goodwill and mutual trust between peoples, not a single Protectionist proposition which did not diminish it. The Protectionist looked to pure national self-concentration; the Free Trader to an inextricable interweaving of the affairs and interests of the nations. The idea of union was winning all over the world as against that of isolation, and the prosaic bonds of commerce were stronger factors for peace than all other pacifying instruments. Mr. Asquith's main point was the unchanged economic necessity of a Free Trade system for these shores, a point which Mr. Russell Rea well emphasised by saying that while there was a Protectionist movement in England, Free Trade was "fixed, settled, established." The Prime Minister further insisted that Free Trade was perfectly compatible with social reform, and that three years of Free Trade policy had already yielded the abandonment of borrowing for normal expenditure, the remission of millions of taxes, and an unexampled reduction of the National Debt. A very useful point was made by Herr Gothein in showing that the Free Trade vote in Germany was 4,405,000, and the Protectionist vote not more than 5,164,000. But, perhaps, the most remarkable movement towards Free Trade is in America, where both parties are now united in calling for a reduction of the tariff. We shall recur to this subject next week.

* * *

PERHAPS the most valuable of the many powerful and original papers read at the Congress was contributed by Mr. Franklin Pierce, of the United States, who declared that the high tariff was the direct cause of the creation and maintenance of the 400 odd combinations in restraint of trade, and that the States in getting rid of the absolutist rule of George III., had only substituted government by Oil Kings and Steel Kings, whose system was, in its way, as oppressive as that of the Tsar. Controlling politics through their contributions to the campaign funds of the parties—the great manufacturers subscribed five million dollars to the Republican funds in the contest of 1896—the trusts in return exact from Republican politicians the most rigid adherence to their commercial interests; while their influence on American life hopelessly materialises it. Mr. Ehrich pointed out that 300,000 freight cars were lying idle in the States, even after the return of hundreds of thousands of laborers to Europe. Germany and the States, the two leading Protectionist countries, had, he insisted, suffered most from the depression; England, the Free Trader, least. We observe that no attempt has been made in the British Protectionist Press to rebut the remarkable and, indeed, overwhelming testimony adduced at the Congress as to the multifold social oppression and the universal industrial depression accompanying Protection.

* * *

Hard on the news of the working agreement between the Great Northern, the Great Central, and the Great Eastern Companies, comes the news of an arrangement between the London and North-Western and the Midland Railways. The scope of the new combination is said to be smaller than that of the agreement between the Great Northern and the Great Central. The latter pooled the entire traffic of the two companies, but it is stated that the Midland and the North-Western scheme will only cover the receipts from competitive traffic. The agreement is said to provide for "a long period of years," and there is a possibility of the Great Western joining in. The shareholders are promised "considerable economies in working expenses," while the public are, as usual, tempted with "increased facilities" in passenger and merchandise traffic. The capital involved in the two lines is the enormous sum of £321,000,000, and it seems inevitable that the Lancashire and Yorkshire Company should also be affected by it. Thus two great railway combines now aim at sharing or competing for the business of the North and the Midlands. Nothing is said as to asking Parliamentary sanction for the North-Western-Midland agreement. But we cannot doubt that the Government, in the interests of the trading community, will take early and most serious note of the new railway situation. We imagine that the Railway Commissioners, or the Board of Trade as a Department, must intervene, and that a Bill will be necessary. Before many months are over we may have a demand for railway nationalisation as a mark of the end of competition in English railways and the opening of the American system of railway trusts.

* * *

It was evident from the first that the Turkish revolution owed its wonderful success, not to any sudden upheaval of discontented elements, but to the work of a powerful subterranean organisation which had carefully laid its plans in advance; but it is only during the last few days that the outside world has been able to gather an adequate impression of the strength of the forces at work. Salonica, and not Constantinople, is now the seat of Government, and from there the Young Turks direct the administration of every part of the country through local committees, which impose their will upon the authorities. The Constantinople committee has only just been put on its feet, but already it has succeeded in capturing the whole of the Press, in making a clean sweep of the Palace, and in overturning a Cabinet. Never, surely, has a revolution achieved so much with so little apparent effort, and with clean hands. The chief strength of the committees lies in the adhesion of the army, and as long as the troops continue to obey the commands of the revolutionary officers, there is little chance of a reactionary movement. Nevertheless, as one of the Young Turkish leaders has declared to the correspondent of the "Temps," the committees do not intend to abdicate until the regular working of the Constitution and the Parliament are assured and the Turkish people are securely on the way to national regeneration.

Meanwhile, the material prospects of the new movement have been much improved by the resignation of the aged and weak Said Pasha in favor of the more vigorous and Liberal Kiamil, who is the new Grand Vizier. The new Government is unusually able and trustworthy. It includes both an Armenian and a Greek, the two able Christian races without whom the Government of Turkey could not go on. The Ministries of War and Marine are to revert to the constitutional system, and the Sultan's special power of appointment is to go. The remarkable enthusiasm for the British Ambassador in Constantinople continues.

* * *

The failure of the general strike proclaimed by the Confédération Générale du Travail should act as an encouragement to the French to develop the trade union system on English or German lines. The hopes of the Federation were based, not on the organisation of the French trade unions, which is notoriously bad, but on the chance that the "ferocious measures of repression" taken by the Government a week ago would produce the atmosphere of excitement favorable to the violent action of a community of determined men. The facts about these "ferocious measures" are still somewhat uncertain. The original dispute at Villeneuve St. Georges, a suburb of Paris, was not an important one, and the sympathetic strike of the builders of Paris was proclaimed for twenty-four hours only. It was in the procession of these strikers to Villeneuve St. Georges that the collision with the troops occurred. In the fighting, which was extremely fierce, five civilians were killed, and a dozen or more soldiers seriously injured. After the proclamation of a general strike, the French Government had the executive of the Federation arrested, but another one was immediately appointed. There is a strong demand in France for the repression of the Federation, to which it is to be hoped M. Clemenceau will not be so foolish as to yield.

* * *

On Thursday a trifling blow was struck by the Union of the Syndicates of the Seine, in revenge for its expulsion from the municipally endowed Bourse du Travail, from which the larger Confederation was shut out two years ago, as a natural consequence of its marked Anarchist tendencies and propaganda. The electricians of Paris left their work for a couple of hours at a quarter past eight, just when the restaurants in the most brilliantly lighted city in Europe were full of diners. The result was a brief and partial plague of darkness, for the gas-workers did not join the electricians. Newspapers which did not possess an independent electrical plant were unable to appear, or were much handicapped in their work. We do not know whether "L'Humanité," the very able Socialist organ, was affected. Paris was alight again before ten o'clock.

* * *

Haggerston has been lost to the Liberal Party, Mr. Rupert Guinness, the heir of Lord Iveagh, being elected by a majority of 1,143 over the Liberal, Mr. Warren, of 1,881 over the Socialist, Mr. Burrows, and of 157 over the Liberal and Socialist combined. With one exception the constituency has been Liberal since 1892, though in 1900 the majority was very narrow. Mr. Warren was unknown in the constituency, and, in this respect, both Mr. Guinness who, with his wife, had sedulously nursed it since the General Election, and Mr. Burrows, a famous and attractive figure in London Socialism, had the advantage of him. The Labor Party gave no support to the Socialist candidate, but the defeat, apart from the coal-and-blanket-policy of the Conservative, tells a plain tale of the discouragement which attends a division of forces.

* * *

The first experiment in field training for the Territorial Army, which opened on Bank Holiday, appears to have been successful. About 20,000 men were collected on Salisbury Plain, and large bodies assembled at Lydd and elsewhere. The men are said to represent the pick of the Volunteers, with most of the older men eliminated, to be intelligent and interested in their work, in the new guns provided for them, and in the part they now play in the new and larger system of organisation by brigades and divisions. The artillery in particular appears to be a workmanlike force, beyond the expectations even of friendly critics. The weakest body, in physique and numbers, appears to be the London division, and some of the town battalions are also described as physically poor. The force, on the whole, seems likely to provide a fully sufficient nucleus for defensive purposes, and the argument for conscription, based on the hope that it would fail, is in abeyance. The main objection is its costliness. We regret to see some foolish remarks attributed to Lord Lucas, the new Under-Secretary for War, in addressing an encampment of the Public School Brigade. Lord Lucas is reported, we hope wrongly, to have spoken to these boys of the "glories" of fighting, and coming home covered with decorations, and he added that "distinguished soldiers" would tell them that they had "a jolly fine time in active service—that the only drawback to soldiering is peace time." "Distinguished soldiers" —e.g., the Duke of Wellington—who happen to be honest men, say, of course, precisely the reverse.

* * *

The great fires in British Columbia are the most serious that even British Columbia has ever known. A region more than 100 square miles in extent has been devastated by the flames. Fernie, a considerable mining town of 6,000 inhabitants has been destroyed, besides many mining villages, and thousands of women and children are without shelter or food. The casualties are not as high as were at first reported, but something like a hundred lives have been lost. The immediate danger is starvation. When forest towns like Fernie are destroyed, it means that not only are the houses wiped out in a few hours and the people left homeless, but the wage-earners are left without employment, with the hard winter drawing nigh. Even to provide for immediate requirements is a difficult problem, but the people along the Pacific coast are aware of the necessity, and a vast quantity of supplies are being rushed into the stricken district by every train.

* * *

Mr. Stead has published an interview with M. Stolypin in the "Times," which performs a somewhat dubious service to the Russian autocracy. Mr. Stead strangely describes the Russian Prime Minister "as the best type of an English Whig." We can imagine the shade of Fox expressing energetic objection to the inclusion of M. Stolypin in his old party. M. Stolypin made many excuses for the reign of terror which he has initiated, the excuses of the man who "regrets" "the necessity for capital punishment" and steadily pursues it. But his admissions, and those of his adjoint, M. Makaroff, were much more significant. Thus these officials confessed that 14,000 people had been exiled by administrative order, and great numbers—not, perhaps, 300,000 —expelled from their native Provinces by local Governors. M. Stolypin thought that fifteen executions a month might be nearer the truth than fifteen a day, though figures stating that there had been at least four public executions a day from 1905 to 1907 by order of the fixed court martials alone, setting aside the field court martials, have been supplied by the St. Petersburg papers. M. Makaroff also admitted that 240 executions had taken place last year. He ignored Mr. Stead's request for the better treatment of M. Tchaikovsky, and gave no definite promise that he would be brought to trial. The position of the Jews M. Stolypin thought "very difficult to alleviate." It is necessary to add that, though M. Stolypin would not promise to do justice in Russia, he was willing to let the Salvation Army enter it.

* * *

The accident to Count Zeppelin's airship was an accident, and indicated no defect in its mechanism. It need not happen oftener to a motor car with a balloon, which is what an airship is, than to a motor car on wheels. The German Reichstag has voted him £25,000 as a consolation prize, though he has still to fulfil all the three conditions laid down. These were, first, that the airship should be capable of keeping afloat for twenty-four hours and travelling 600 miles, that it should be able to alight and rise from land and water, and that it should be able to manœuvre at a height beyond the reach of bullets. In spite of accidents Count Zeppelin's airship may be held to have satisfied the first two conditions; but the fulfilment of the third, which is the most difficult, and, in some ways, the most important of all, is still exceedingly doubtful. His airship owes its greater manœuvring power and speed to the rigid aluminium envelope in which the gas chambers are enclosed, but this advantage is purchased by an increase in weight and size, which may yet be fatal to its becoming the generally accepted type. The English designers fell into the opposite mistake of making their balloon gear too flimsy to stand a stiff breeze, a defect which will, doubtless, not be repeated in the new design. But the successor to "Nulli Secundus" has not yet made its public appearance, though it should do so very shortly now.

* * *

We regret to observe the death of Mr. William Lavino, who succeeded Mr. de Blowitz as Paris correspondent of the "Times." Mr. Lavino had not M. de Blowitz's genius and flair for news, but he was a thoroughly able and extremely well-informed journalist, and his relations with the French Government were probably quite as close as those of his brilliant predecessor. He did good service in promoting the Anglo-French entente, and in interpreting for English readers the policy of the Church Separation Act. He indulged in no coquetries with Royalist or Imperialist parties or movements, and in character, in method, and in accomplishment, he represented the best type of the old English journalism, a type now almost dead.

* * *

In Ireland the event of the week has been the Oireachtas or Gaelic League Festival and Assembly. The Oireachtas was founded to encourage and display the native culture, the poetry, the music, the oratory, and the story-telling of the Gael. It is held in Dublin annually during the first week of August. It is primarily a literary and musical festival, but since the League adopted the industrial policy, an exhibition is held in connection with the festival. The industrial exhibition this year shows an advance in technical skill, and this advance is most notable in the wood-work section. During Oireachtas week the delegates from the various branches of the League in Ireland and abroad meet to discuss questions of policy, and to elect a governing body for the ensuing session.

Politics and Affairs.

A LESSON FROM HAGGERSTON.

THE loss of the seat at Haggerston will, we hope, impress the Government with the necessity of looking both to its organisation and to its electoral policy. If the letter we publish elsewhere be well-founded, there has been some serious neglect. Sir Randal Cremer's approaching retirement and Mr. Guinness's pushing candidature, advertised by its persistence and by its peculiar method, were both known months before the election came about. Why were they ignored, as similar facts have been similarly ignored elsewhere, and an able Liberal candidate thrust into the field a few days before the poll to plead his case not only against a rich, "nursing" candidate, but in the face of a competent and high-minded exponent of Socialism, familiar to the London democracy? The consideration of facts such as these belongs to the business of electioneering. We cannot reckon that even a constituency of the type of Haggerston will always return a Radical or a Socialist candidate. We could make such a calculation with certainty of an industrial quarter in Berlin or Paris, but not in England. The British workman does not follow a continuous line of political development, as to which we can be sure that though he may travel a little slower or a little faster than his fellows, he will never deviate far from its main direction. He may be caught by adroit "slumming," or by the lure of interested trades, or a tide of sentiment may sweep him far out of the bounds of his interests or his main intellectual vision. His political view is hardly steady enough to make him a Socialist; tradition and Free Trade, and his instinct for freedom and progress, keep him to Radicalism or a Labor Party, where he is reminded often enough of his faith, and where he is attracted to large and simple issues. But if he is neglected, and if his ideas are distracted, he may very well yield many a prize to reaction. In the South of England he is distinctly liable to these reversions, and yet Liberal neglect of the South since the election has been conspicuous. The sooner members of the majority realise that they are not coming back to Parliament unless they work hard to get back, the better for Free Trade and Liberalism.

There is the more reason for this counsel when we remember the very active propaganda of Protection that is going on from John o' Groats to Land's End. The Protectionist campaign began the day after the General Election. It has been much simplified and coarsened. Its sentimental, Imperial, side is practically abandoned. It was significant that even Mr. Austen Chamberlain made no attempt to defend a preferential amendment to the Budget, while Imperialist organs like the "Morning Post" practically ignore preferences, and concentrate on the more palpable bait of a protective tariff for British industries. This was the line of Mr. Guinness at Haggerston, and it is the inevitable consequence of the discovery that the protective policy of the self-governing colonies is a deep-rooted conception of their national life, and that preferences to the Mother Country are mere surface play. It is the crude old Protection which is now being preached in England, without a veneer of "science" or a perceptible vein of Imperial sentiment. It furnishes something like a creed for the half-baked and the ill-informed, something warmer and more definite than the chill abstractions of Mr. Balfour's political philosophy. Toryism has again an idea, and a bad one, to work on—a new supply of inferior grist for its mill. And there is no disguising the fact that this rank atavism in our politics corresponds with a growing want of enterprise and method in our business. Men who have inherited large commercial interests, and have given up a good part of the last decade to sport or travel, or the kind of dignified half-work which means either that they are ashamed of "the shop," or have lost their zest for it, readily grasp at the notion of reviving a neglected business by the simple process of excluding foreign competition. It is the idleness and snobbery, the lackadaisical conservatism, of England that call for Protection, even when her brain and better manhood refuse it. On these lines, if we are not mistaken, much misdirected energy is being applied to the perversion of our working people. We hear from many quarters of a steady output of canvassing and speech-making for Protectionist candidates, pursued in the leisure hours of the well-to-do and extending to all parts of the country, without effective reply from the Liberal or the Labor organisations. This movement is undoubtedly aided by the notion that the Liberal Government attacks "property," and by the serious fact that there is a singular slackness in some departments of our industrial enterprise. Speculation is not active, the country is not being rapidly developed—for instance, less than fifty miles of railway were last year added to our mileage—and the sceptical and helpless mood which a Protectionist movement generates is doing sensible injury to our trade and to our political life.

This is not a matter for the Liberal Party to consider alone. The Labor Party is equally interested. It did not promote or encourage the last two "split" candidatures. Its leaders, we imagine, divine well that the general cause of social reform must for the present be served through the medium of a Progressive Government, and that Protection, linked to old Toryism, must at at all costs be kept out of power. But they must also begin to realise that Liberal energies are flagging before the many divided battles that have been fought at the by-elections, and that this slackening of zeal transfers votes, not to their representative, but to the Tories. All winning parties tend to go down from the moment of their realised success, all beaten parties to rise from the hour of their heaviest fall. At the last election it happened that both Liberalism and Labor got rather more strength than they had a right to expect, and now both must expect to suffer in proportion. But it is the commonest wisdom for them to apply themselves to minimising the reaction from 1906. This task they can only achieve in a measure of concert. Why should such a general cohesion be withheld? There is no longer a Whig Party; the relapse of the Free Trade Unionists into Toryism forbids its revival within the bosom of Liberalism. At their best Liberalism and Labor represent the more generous and elevated mind and disposition of the British people; they have to work out together, in view of the present disposition of social forces, the problems of peace, Free Trade, unemployment, the reorganisation of the State on its educational side, the revision of its taxation, the reformation of its industry, the re-settlement of the people on the land. Middle-class Liberalism is the only scientific instrument of these changes, as it is the only power that can stop the frightful disintegration which Protection would produce. If this force is wise, it will make large concessions to the Labor Party, definitely assigning them seats where the industrial vote is preponderant and thoroughly organised. We would make over seventy, and in time a hundred, seats to such a party with confidence that good would ensue. But such advances must be reciprocal, and they must be guaranteed by broader and more courageous views of statesmanship than have hitherto guided the counsels of the Labor Party. Labor can, if it pleases, go down with Liberalism, for it shares all the dangers, all the sources of weakness in the fibre of our workers, which contribute to a Liberal decline. But the two armies can easily keep the field together. With Scotland, Wales, the mining districts—secured to Radicalism by the mean opposition to the Miners' Bill—and the North of England, all generally steady for progress, and with Ireland always democratic, the defection of the South of England will not be fatal, and we may well hold the British constituencies for social reform and against Protection. But the years are passing. Half the term of the Government is over, and while its work is only begun, it is time to examine and adjust the conditions which govern the renewal of its power.

FREE TRADE AS AN INTERNATIONAL POLICY.

By a wise and happy continuity the Peace Congress of last week was followed this week by a Free Trade Congress held within the same walls. The essential unity of these two great causes was expressed by Mr. Winston Churchill in an illuminating phrase of his opening address, "The bearing of Free Trade on international relations is peace." Since a new apple of discord was flung on to our political arena by Mr. Chamberlain five years ago, the controversy has run too exclusively on national lines. Perhaps it was inevitable that this should have been the case. For those who forced this issue naturally made their appeal upon a separatist view of the commercial intercourse of nations, and offered to plan a fiscal policy upon a purely national basis with complete disregard to the goodwill and the interests of other nations. Nor has it been easy, in the closeness and the heat of the political strife, to disentangle the issue from this narrow setting, and to survey its more momentous aspects. Indeed, to do this requires us to unmask the insidious fallacy that the commercial development and prosperity of other nations, such as America and Germany, are in themselves a menace and injury to our commerce and industry.

The Cobden Club, which planned this Congress, has performed an invaluable service in gathering the testimony of so many eminent business men and economists from the leading commercial nations of the world in denunciation of this baneful heresy. Our Protectionists sometimes seek to disguise the naked meaning of their enterprise by the distinction they draw between Free Trade and Free Imports, alleging that not merely do these two policies differ vitally in theory, but that, as Free Importers dealing with protected nations, we habitually get the worst of every act of intercourse in which we engage. For this reason, if for no other, it is instructive to have the direct evidence of well-informed members of protected nations regarding the effects of that experiment which we are urged to undertake. The full daylight thrown upon the operations of foreign tariffs in various foreign countries, new and old, large Empires and petty States, by the careful papers and speeches at this Conference, will serve alike to confirm and enlarge among Free Traders their faith in their principle, and to disclose more exactly the nature of the dangers and corruptions which everywhere spring up under the shadow of a protective tariff. From France and Germany, from the great democracy of the United States, and from our own self-governing Colonies, come overwhelming proofs of the damages inflicted upon the peoples of these countries by enhanced prices of the necessaries of life, by the fostering of trusts and combines, and by the encouragement of every form of industrial oligarchy and economic bondage. Perhaps the most instructive lesson for our people is that furnished during the last decade by the United States and Canada, of the utter impotence of a powerful political party committed to Free Trade to release its people from the fatal coils wound about its body by the groups of business men once empowered to fill their private purses from the public funds and from the pockets of their fellow citizens. The betrayal of Free Trade by the Liberal Party of Canada, rightly apprehended, forms one of the most tragic, as well as the most ignominious, incidents in recent political history. In the testimony of our foreign visitors the most striking feature is the contrast between the invincible logic and justice of the cause they represent, and their practical impotence to redress the evil of a protective tariff once built into the fabric of their national finance. Their confidence in the ultimate triumph of the Free Trade principle in their several countries, founded, as it is, upon the actual and rapid growth both of commercial and moral interdependence among nations, is fully justified by a wide interpretation of historical forces. But we in this country must strain every effort to preserve our path of national progress free from this terrible obstruction.

One criticism passed by some of our foreign Free Trade friends upon our tariff controversy deserves respectful consideration. It is to the effect that we have trusted over-much to the ancient Free-Trade weapons of half a century ago, neglecting to fortify our cause sufficiently with arguments directed to the changed condition of the industrial system. Half a century ago Free Trade was an important plank in a platform of political and economic liberation, summarised by the simple phrase of laissez faire laissez aller. Now this formula, and the general policy it involves, are not false to-day, but they are no longer adequate. Two new and related features of industrial life have come into prominence; first the displacement of the effective principle of competition by capitalistic combination over large fields of industry and commerce; secondly the recognition forced upon every civilised State of the inability of large masses of the working populations to secure decent conditions of life and work by individual or even by collective foresight and bargaining, without the assistance of the State. This being the modern situation, it would be foolish to defend Free Trade on the old absolutist logic of "the simple system of national liberty," and to denounce Protection, as, we regret to see is done by some of our American and French Free Traders, on the ground that it is merely one segment in the vicious circle of Socialism, the whole of which is equally repellent to them. Protection is not Socialism, but its deadliest foe, as, indeed, Dr. Barth reminded us when he alluded to the solid Free-Trade attitude of the entire Social Democratic Party of Germany. For State Socialism, wise or foolish, with all its perils and its possible corruptions, aims at the welfare of society as a whole. Protection, on the contrary, permits a small section of business interests to exploit the instrument of State for their private profit. The mere fact that the public machinery is utilised in both cases is no ground for identifying two processes which are opposed both in their purposes and their results.

The debates served to give prominence to two important points of practical policy, one distinctly British, the other of international significance. So far as the immediate battle for Free Trade in this country is concerned, a prime need is the adoption of an aggressive and constructive policy. If we stand with folded arms during a long period of commercial depression and working class distress, asking the people to wait patiently for the fulfilment of our larger pledges of social reform until the National Exchequer can afford the large expenditure it involves, and concentrating all our efforts on economy, we shall be serving very ill the Free Trade cause, as all who follow the lavish promises of the Protectionist campaigners are aware. As an integral part of the defence of Free Trade it is essential that no time be lost in applying, through the graduation of the income tax, and other modes of direct taxation, an instrument of progressive revenue which shall meet the urgent requirements of our time, and at the same time offer a Conservative Government, when it may return to office, an easier and better way of finding money than the thorny and precarious path it has been led to contemplate. The other point brings us back to our starting point, the relations between Free Trade and peace. There can be no reasonable doubt that the greatest of all securities of peace for our Empire, exposed in so many quarters to the enmity and hostility of rival empires, has been the certainty felt by foreigners that we should preserve the open door, at any rate, so far as we kept control over our several colonies and possessions. Though the Protective policy pursued of late by our self-governing colonies has broken this confidence, and visibly impaired our Imperial relations with more than one foreign Power, nations like Germany and the United States were in large measure reconciled to our territorial supremacy by the knowledge that their merchants were allowed equality of trading opportunities. Now, as Dr. Barth well reminds us, the fear lest this condition of equal access should be cancelled, at a time when the struggle for external markets grows ever keener among the advanced manufacturing nations, is an active and a natural support of naval increase in Germany. It thus reacts, by the fatal logic of international antagonism, upon our own naval expenditure. Here is one concrete example of the basic truth that Protection, alike by weakening the actual bonds of commercial intercourse, and by sowing tares of menace and suspicion among nations, is the deadly enemy of that cause of peace and internationalism which is the cause of civilisation itself.

THE TRADITION OF THE BARRICADE.

The general strike proclaimed by the French Confédération du Travail for Monday last was a fiasco, and everyone is explaining after the event how impossible it was that it should end in anything else. But they were much less certain before the event, and for the good reason that the Confederation was not acting on ascertainable facts about the strength of their position, but plunging on a psychological theory of French politics. For a variety of reasons the idea of the general strike has never appealed to English trade Unions. But the practical reasons against it here, so far from carrying weight with the French Confederation, served rather as the motives of its action. An English trade unionist on the Committee of the Federation before the strike was declared would have wanted to know about the state of the funds, the strength of the discipline, and the proportion of workmen on the books of the Unions. But if he had pressed these inquiries, he would have been laughed at as a pedant, or denounced as a traitor according to the degree of his influence outside. Discipline? That is for those who hold the fort, not for the storming party. Numbers? They only dilute conviction and induce the paralysis of compromise. Funds? Fat men never make revolutions, as Cæsar knew, but only the lean and hungry sort. The theory on which the Federation acted was that a majority that would stick at no violence had the best chance of success in making a revolution; and it has often worked successfully in France, where the tradition of revolution by barricades is still strong. It might have worked again, had the indignation produced by the "massacre" at Villeneuve St. Georges brought the masses into the right psychological state. Fortunately for French Socialism it did not, and the failure of the strike should serve to strengthen the Constitutional wing of the Party against what is really an anti-Socialist revival of Bakunin's anarchism. Constitutional Socialism arose out of the ruins of the Commune and the triumph of Marx over Bakunin; and its capture by the physical violence party, even though their tactics had been momentarily successful, would inevitably have been followed by a reaction that would have thrown the movement back for a generation.

Neither in its theory nor in its organisation has the Labor Federation in France anything in common with the Federation of English trade-unions. For a whole generation, from the Acts of 1871 to 1875 to the legal decisions of the Lords in 1901, out of which grew the modern Parliamentary Labor Party, trade unions in England had a decided interest in being non-political. Numbers were everything, because numbers meant money, and money was their only weapon. The French unions never had the English regard for discipline. They are, except in the north, loosely organised. Their strikes have rarely been a patient trial of strength and endurance, nearly always a violent demonstration by a comparatively few active spirits, with an inflammable majority in the background. In consequence, their leaders, instead of being delegates to carry out the will of their societies, literally lead the attack, and never quite know how many will follow them. In the French Federation of Labor every society, irrespective of its size, has an equal vote; and its members, unrepresentative of the unions for which they stand, are still more unrepresentative of the views of labor as a whole. If the number of Socialists in the English Parliamentary Labor Party is enormously out of proportion to the number of Socialists among their constituents, one can readily understand how in France extremists like M. Griffuelhes and his friends of the Federation have become official spokesmen of the French trade unions, although perhaps not one in a hundred would subscribe to their views. The wonder is that the French Parliamentary Socialist Party has not as a whole protested against the pre-eminence in trade unionist councils of anarchistic views, so compromising to the success of its own constitutional methods. M. Guesde, leader of one section of the Socialist bloc, has so protested. But M. Jaurès, who has most to lose, has not merely not opposed, but has induced the last Conference at Nancy to pass a resolution, the effect of which was to make the Federation and the Parliamentary Socialist bloc independent powers, on terms of benevolent neutrality. M. Jaurès even went further, and although he must have known that it would bring him into violent conflict with the German Socialists—as, in fact, it did later at the Stuttgart Conference—got a resolution passed that to prevent a war of aggression Socialists in the army should mutiny, and Socialists outside proclaim a general strike, and resort to armed insurrection. This is Hervéism, only slightly diluted, and M. Jaurès probably weakened his position in the country by the concession to it. Why should the sanest and greatest of Parliamentary opportunist Socialists have taken this course? Perhaps it was that he despaired of a French trade union system as rich, powerful, and well disciplined as the English and the German. Perhaps, too, being a Frenchman, he knew the strength of the barricade tradition, and in the uncertainty of knowing whether the English or German weapon would be ready to his hand, he refused to deny himself the use of the weapon that France had made her own.

But the ideas of the Federation are not by any means confined to France. Almost every country has a new Impossibilist movement of greater or less importance. Italy has her revolutionary trade unionism pioneered by Labriola, Ireland its Sinn Feiners, India its Swadeshi movement and its small Nihilistic party. The weapons that it is proposed to use, and the degree of violence, vary with the country and the climate, but the ideas at the bottom of them are the same. There is the same desperate anxiety to find a short cut, the same intolerance of the slow-moving masses who retard the rate of advance, the same mistrust of Parliamentary methods, with their eternal succession of compromises as the condition of any progress, however slight, the same impatience of laboriously unpicking a knot which it seems so easy to cut. Take, for example, the doctrines of M. Hervé, which are an application to the struggle against militarism and war of the methods by which M. Griffuelhes hopes to obtain the economic millennium. How interminable the way through peace that lies through Hague Conferences and reforms of international law, the diffusion among nations of better knowledge of each other, the wearisome Parliamentary fights against swollen estimates and question-begging experts, the ceaseless combating of the Jingo spirit and its pullulating brood of falsehood! How tempting to some temperaments M. Hervé's short and simple plan of military working with the flat denial of any value to the national ideal in every form! The English and German temperament is less exposed to the temptation than the French, yet even in England one sometimes sees signs of yielding. If there are no avowed Impossibilists here, there is a group of men among Socialists affiliated to the English Labor Party prepared to run the risk of wrecking the union of the Labor Parties in order to preserve the pure Socialist milk free from the taint of a trade union compromise. Those who make it a reproach against Liberals that they are too exclusively concerned with the machinery of Government forget that the alternative to this constant "tinkering" is violent revolution.

Life and Letters.

THE ROMANCE OF AMERICA.

It is an old truth that while the caricature of strangers does not rankle, that of friends and relations is apt to give offence. The reason is that it touches with ridicule points of personal dignity which lie sensitive beneath the surface. This is true of nations. The wild extravagance of "John Bull" and "Jean Bonhomme," though doubtless helping to feed ignorant hatred or contempt for the foreigner, does not embitter feeling. But the relations between two nations of the same stock, language, and institutions, with memories of a violent severance to sharpen criticism, are far more seriously affected by what they think and say about one another. The process of cross-caricature which has been going on between England and the United States, from the time when Dickens crossed "the pond" up to the present day, has been a constant source of soreness, especially on the side of America, as is the coldness with which our public has received the victories of the American athletes in the Stadium. For while many of the offensive pictures in the American portrait of an Englishman, such as his unsociability, glumness, emotional torpor, and a certain brutality of tone and bearing, do not actually give us offence, indeed, are perhaps felt as complimentary, it is quite otherwise with the English portrait of a typical American. The notion of America as a raw land of eager, vulgar, unscrupulous "hustlers," hunting for dollars in order to expend them in ostentation, where politics is nothing but a corrupt scramble for office and for "graft," where literature rarely rises above low-grade journalism, where science is enslaved to mechanical invention, still rules the minds of the main body of the middle-classes.

Though every intelligent Englishman who has really acquainted himself with the country and its people by travel, conversation, or reading, is aware of the serious distortion of such a picture, its falseness is supported by two curiously different sorts of testimony. The English "tripper," or casual visitor, is the least observant of men. The conditions of his travel impress upon his mind merely the crudest and most superficial images of a sort of life which is in no true sense the life of America. The impulsive sympathy, which in French or German visitors would generate some measure of understanding, is too apt in him to give place to emphasis of those obvious differences in external life and manners that touch his national feeling and his personal prejudices. It is the very fact that Americans speak the English language and present so many familiar English characteristics that stirs in English visitors this zest for hypercriticism, which is directed towards Americans as quasi-Englishmen. Impressions thus got are often supported by the vivid talk of Americans, who, half-consciously, lay themselves out to stagger their English acquaintances by a dramatic rendering of the defects and diseases of their country. Hardly any American ought to be taken quite so seriously as most English readers take Mark Twain and Mr. Dooley. It is not, however, profitable to discuss how far the falsification of America is attributable to English slowness or to American humor. The important thing is to realise the harm it does, and, if possible, to undo it. For in the future civilisation of the world, as far as we can forecast it, the true interests of England and America march together more surely and more closely than those of any other nations.

This is the sentiment, a just and sane one as we conceive it, which animates the effort of Mr. H. Perry Robinson to explain for English readers "The Twentieth Century American" (Putnam). We are not sure that Mr. Robinson does not overstep his object in the zeal of his advocacy of a political alliance between the two great Anglo-Saxon nations. For it is doubtful whether, in the present trend of national ambitions and immediate interests, such an alliance would yield the fruits of universal peace. But we have nothing but praise for the skilful manner in which the author sets himself to forward a harmony of thought and feeling between England and America, by explaining and removing so many of the common elements of misunderstanding. One source of trouble, upon which he justly lays stress, is the notion, widely prevalent in this country, that the good-humored indifference, tempered by friendly recognition of distant relationship, which is the current British attitude towards the United States, is reciprocated by that country in its mental attitude towards us. Now this is not the case. In English history the American "rebellion" is merely a bygone incident, the War of 1812 a dim and trivial memory, the "Alabama" affair, and our attitude in the Civil War, matters of no deep significance. But in American history these things bulk immense. More than half of the most dramatic portion of that history shows England the enemy, and though these memories do not, save in a section of Irish-Americans, leave active bitterness, they leave a sensitive background of national feeling. But not less important is it to realise how the quite recent developments of American commercial and political ambitions affect their feelings towards this country. America is the nouveau riche on the most magnificent scale. The youngest of the great nations, she is eager to become world-reputable, and she is animated by the Anglo-Saxon notion of gentility expressed in the cultivation of the sporting spirit.

Shallow critics, like Matthew Arnold, dwelt upon the lack of "distinction" in America, and found there only a dull level of mediocrity. There never has been a nation so possessed with a fury of individual and national distinction, so eager to make careers and to make history. Nor is this distinction comprised, as is often alleged, in "making a pile." Mr. Robinson, an educated Englishman with twenty years' residence in America, strongly supports the contention of Professor Münsterberg that commercial success and money-making in America are not expressions of low covetousness and materialistic instinct. They rather constitute the avenue of individual achievement, the realisation of personal distinction, which the environment from which America is now emerging has impressed for a couple of generations upon its life. "The American," wrote Münsterberg, "works for money in exactly the sense that a great painter works for money; the high price which is paid for his picture is a very welcome indication of the general appreciation of his art, but he would never get this appreciation if he were working for the money instead of his artistic ideals. Economically to open up this gigantic country, to bring the fields and forests, rivers and mountains, into the service of economic progress, to incite the millions of inhabitants to have new needs and to satisfy these by their own resourcefulness, to increase the wealth of the nation, and, finally, economically to rule the world, and within the nations to raise the economic power of the individual to undreamed-of importance, has been the work which has fascinated the American."

The romance of America has lain of necessity in the plane of industrial development in the past. Nor is she likely to retire from business. But hitherto her own country has been large enough to absorb her energy and her romantic ambitions. This, however, could not last. Her immense fund of vital energy could not be contained within these limits, spacious though they were. Ninety millions of the most energetic, adventurous, sentimental, restless, and imaginative people the world has ever seen, have cast their individual and collective cravings for self-expression and power into dreams of a world-destiny, bolder and more eager for fulfilment than any which has occupied the minds of empire-makers in the past. Mr. Roosevelt is rightly discerned as the epitome of this new spirit; America at once the great war-power and the supreme peace-maker, setting her own house in order upon a basis of humanity and justice, and imposing her autocratic order upon disturbed peoples throughout the American continents, a democracy at home, an imperial power in the Pacific, America the majestic possessor and the magnificent bestower of a civilisation in which disinterested culture, commercial prosperity, enthusiasm for competitive sport, and peace secured by gigantic armaments, shall be welded into stable harmony—such is the vision. This America and her prophet are well-wishers of humanity, but they are not anxious to fuse America in any cosmopolitan union. They want to see America separate and first, first in wealth and trade, in education and in intellectual achievement; and, above all, first in the use of world-power, a sportsman, a soldier, and a gentleman among the nations of the earth.

In the realisation of this "manifest destiny" the British Empire stands out as their great rival, a friendly rival perhaps—but still a rival. Mr. Robinson does well to remind us that America is less friendly to this country than we are towards her, for the knowledge of the truth on such a matter is our best security. Few who know Americans as Mr. Robinson knows them, not merely the cultivated cosmopolitan American of New York, Boston, or Washington, not the business classes of the East, but the motley crowds throughout the vast Republic, will question the accuracy of his conviction that, "if any pretext should arise, the minds of the masses of the American people could more easily be inflamed to the point of desiring war with England than they could to the point of desiring war with any other nation." At once sensational, sensitive, and sentimental, this prairie-mind of the American democracy is a source both of peril and of hope. For the danger which exists at present is one which education and the growing co-operation of the two nations in a hundred pacific enterprises is peculiarly adapted to dispel. These amicable relations exist now in countless spheres of activity, commercial, scientific, humanitarian and educational. It is to the quiet growth of this practical and spiritual concert that we would look for the present scope of co-operation rather than to a formal political alliance, which might, if it fell under the dominion of certain forces, as a discerning American has said, become no better than "an Anglo-Saxon alliance for the vulgarisation of the world."

IN THE MEDITERRANEAN.

To Mr. Clarkson of the Education Office it was a moment of great mental excitement. The ship was entering the Straits of Gibraltar. Other passengers, proud of nautical experience, had repeated since breakfast that she was making for the Gib. To Mr. Clarkson she was about to pass between the Pillars of Hercules. All his life he had longed to sail that classic sea, to behold the coasts that Virgil knew, to touch the very waves once ploughed by the keels of epic wanderers and heroes. Within the narrow length of that purple Mediterranean, all that was to him most valuable in the world's history had been thought or enacted. Outside the strict limits of its shore were uncouth things, unmeasured and unredeemed. Here was the one scene where human faculty had reached perfection; here was the Mother Church of human intelligence, outside which no salvation could be found. On the one hand he now saw the red mountains of Africa, drawn like a veil before barbaric degradation; on the other hand was Spain, and the city he called Gades, and the homes of shy Iberians. The sea was purple flecked with white. He was entering the very gates of a temple where every stone and spring bore the touch of immemorial sanctitude. To him it was a moment of the highest mental excitement.

"Take your entrance for the sweep on the run," said a Jewish voice close beside him.

"I beg your pardon. What sweep? What run?" said Mr. Clarkson, with eyes fixed on the ghosts of Tyrian galleys.

"Two shilling for a draw in the sweep on the ship's run," said the voice. "I'm the auctioneer."

"Oh, if two shillings ends it," said Mr. Clarkson with alacrity, "here you are!"

The voice passed on, and he looked along the deck. The first-class passengers, comforted by having emerged from the Bay, which Mr. Clarkson thought of as the stream of Ocean, were stretched on deck chairs reading novels and magazines, and some of the ladies were doing fancy work, while stewards went from one to another offering cups of beef-tea to bridge over the yawning gulf between nine o'clock breakfast and half-past one lunch.

Turning to a dignitary of the Church who was reclining next to him, and from time to time explaining the points in "Tit Bits" to his wife, Mr. Clarkson remarked: "If you had your choice, wouldn't you rather have been Ulysses than anyone who ever lived?"

"Ulysses?" said the clergyman with some astonishment. "A most unsettled life, if I remember right, and not altogether free from blame in certain respects which we need not further particularise."

"We are now," Mr. Clarkson continued, "on the very scene of that passage which has always appeared to me one of the greatest in literature, where Ulysses called to his men not to die without knowledge of the unpeopled land beyond the sunset. 'Remember whence you are sprung,' he said; 'you were not born to live like cattle, but to follow valor and knowledge'—it is impossible not to add, 'like a sinking star.' And so they rowed on till night saw the other pole with all its constellations, and in the far distance a dim mountain appeared. Then three times round went their gallant ship, and the sea closed over them. Commentators always assume that Dante intended the Mount of Purgatory by that dim mountain, but really I see no sufficient reason to suppose it, do you?"

"Ah, as to that," replied the clergyman, "I haven't quite made up my mind yet about Purgatory. It is a point rather difficult of satisfactory solution. But you must excuse me from discussing it now, for between the eighth and seventeenth Sundays after Trinity I make a rule of allowing my mind to relax. Even the best field, you know, must lie fallow at times."

"Yes, indeed," said his wife. "I have to keep a careful watch upon the archdeacon. He reads and reads. He's always reading, and even when he's not reading he's working his brain."

"Now, Mr. Clarkson, I'll take you on at Bull," said the bright voice of the girl who sat next him at dinner. "It isn't Sunday to-day, so the captain can't object to us taking up the deck."

"'Considerate la vostra semenza:
Fatti non foste a viver come bruti.'"

Mr. Clarkson repeated to himself, as he began to throw flat discs on to a board marked with numbers. "It is really Virgilian. But then I have often thought Virgil was not properly a Roman poet, but the first Italian."

"Oh, Mr. Clarkson," cried the girl, "you've got a Bull instead of ten! Now you'll have to go back to the very beginning. Hooray! I mean, I'm so sorry!"

But Mr. Clarkson had ceased to play. The great mass of Gibraltar was just becoming visible as they rounded Tarifa. There it stood, dim in misty heat, shaped like a couchant lion, true doorpost of the ancient world.

"Rotten hole!" said the young man beside him, carefully adjusted his Zeiss glasses to look at it. When he had gazed for a time, he put the glasses carefully away and again said, "Rotten hole!"

"You mean it is no longer invulnerable, owing to the increased range of artillery?" said Mr. Clarkson; "but I should have thought 'rotten' too strong a word to express the situation."

"I mean it's a rotten hole to be stationed in," the other replied with some asperity. "No sport, barring a bit of fox-hunting in the cork woods, over there."

"Spanish foxes any good?" said an older man, turning his glasses to the woods indicated, as though expecting to see the Spanish foxes running about. "Poor sport these foreign foxes seem mostly. Not had the training of our foxes at home."

"It is doubtful how far acquired mental characteristics are hereditary," observed Mr. Clarkson, not wishing to be excluded from the conversation of sportsmen.

The older man looked at him for a moment, and then slowly repeated, "Foreign foxes not had the training of our foxes at home. Same with dogs. There's no man in the country works so hard as an M.F.H. Always training, training, training. Always looking after this and that. No end to his labor. Perhaps he gets six weeks or so clear from middle of May to end of June. Then he's at it again practising the puppies. Talk of a laboring man! My word, a laboring man isn't in it with an M.F.H.!"

"I've always heard that sporting hounds are peculiarly unintelligent," said Mr. Clarkson, sympathetically.

"Unintelligent!" growled the older man. "My word, I'd rather be a hound than an archbishop! Wouldn't you, sir, wouldn't you?" he asked, defiantly.

"Well," said Mr. Clarkson, anxious to soothe, "the choice had hardly occurred to me before, either contingency appearing so remote. But, no doubt, a hound's existence has its compensations."

"Rather be a hound than an archbishop!" repeated the older man, moving slowly away. "By Jove, I should rather think I would!"

"Oh, look!" cried Mr. Clarkson, eagerly, "a flying fish! What a glorious creature! Isn't it like a Japanese toy?"

"Don't think much of sea fish," said the young officer. "They're no better than rabbit-shooting."

"But how marvellous that extension of fins into wings!" said Mr. Clarkson. "What a pity mankind didn't follow the same process, and develop wings instead of arms!"

"Oh, we're good enough for most people as we are," said the girl, throwing down the Bull discs and walking away.

In the evening the great rock stood black and solemn as they slowly left it behind, and the light on Europa Point was greenish white against the sun-set. The passengers celebrated their first concert on board, followed by an informal dance. During the concert a lady who had become conspicuous for leaving scent bottles and shawls on various chairs, fixed her fervent eyes on Mr. Clarkson while she sang:—

"Less than the dust upon thy chariot wheel, Less than the rust that never stained thy sword."

"I was sure you loved music," she said, clasping her hands as she sat beside him afterwards.

"I do, indeed," said Mr. Clarkson. "I like Bach best, because his music is that of the morning stars when they sang together. But I enjoy even comparatively inferior compositions like the thing you sang so well just now. While I listened it set me wondering."

"Wondering? Oh, wondering what?" asked the lady, with half-closed eyes.

"I was wondering," he answered, "how far it was possible for a lyric poet or composer to express a dramatic situation so entirely alien to his accustomed surroundings. It is a question that really involves most imaginative work."

"Oh," said the lady

"It is the same with dancing," Mr. Clarkson continued, as the band struck up the first waltz. "Originally, I suppose, it was a dramatic expression of triumphant joy or yielding and peaceful emotions. I often wonder how much of those feelings are retained in its present form."

"Don't you dance?" asked the lady.

"It is one of the great regrets of my life," said Mr. Clarkson, "that I was not allowed to learn."

"Oh," said the lady, and her partner led her away.

A man came and informed him that a hotel in Jamaica was the best place to go to if you wanted to be done well, and that he himself would once have gone to the bottom of the Gulf of Mexico had not the ship been made of Swedish steel. Escaping with the silent wish that Swedish steel had never been invented, Mr. Clarkson sat long in the bow and watched the dark water of that historic sea, while over his head Orion and all the ancient stars moved in their courses. But, though surrounded by the long-expected scene itself, he was, somehow, restless and uneasy. The throb of harp and fiddle reached his ears, and his spirit kept time to the rhythm of the dancing feet. The memory of some peculiar scent seemed to hang about him. When he tried to see only the Pleiades, he saw a woman's eyes intently fixed on his, and a hand resting upon the arm of a chair. He several times repeated the great salutation to Italy in the Georgics, and then, feeling a little calmer, he thought he would go to bed, as it was getting quite late.

The dancing had ceased some time before, but as he went down the deserted gangway he heard footsteps pattering after him.

"Please, sir," said a panting steward, "there's a lady passenger on the companion would like to speak to you a moment."

Mr. Clarkson's heart gave one great leap. Never had he run so fast since he won the Consolation Race at school. She was standing at the top of the stairs.

"Is it possible?" he gasped. "I mean, the steward told me you wanted to see him. Perhaps you've lost something?"

"Oh, no, no, no! Not you! Not you!" she cried, and vanished.

As he brushed his wavy hair before getting into his bunk, Mr. Clarkson perceived that it might now almost be called grey, and somehow he could not recover his first joy in the memories of antiquity, though he heard the Mediterranean herself lapping against the ship's side till he slept.

A GREEN HEAVEN.

Mr. G. L. Gomme in his interesting book on "Folk-lore as an Historical Science," quotes from a seventeenth century Puritan preacher an account of the strange creed of a poor old simple-minded man. "On his deathbed, being demanded what he thought of God, he answers that he was a good old man; and what of Christ, that he was a towardly youth; . . . and what should become of his soul after he was dead, that if he had done well he should be put in a pleasant green meadow." Both the seventeenth century divine and the modern writer, from their different standpoints, regard this old man as a "pagan." The preacher exclaims in wonder that he had lived for sixty years in "a parish where there had been preaching almost all his time." Many preachers we know were laboring in England during the period covered by this old man's life. The sermon quoted from was preached in 1659. The Puritan preaching, however, if the old man ever attended it, had evidently made little impression upon his mind. Such religious ideas as he possessed he had derived from the Catholic symbolism, then vanishing in England, but lingering on upon church windows, and in the traditional speech of the people. The comment of the modern writer is in the same vein. "This is a passage which shows not a departure from Christianity either through ignorance or from the result of philosophic study or contemplation, but a sheer non-advance to Christianity, a passage which shows us an English pagan of the seventeenth century. The two first articles of this singular creed depict an absence of knowledge about the central features of Christian belief, the last denotes the existence of knowledge about some belief not known to English scholars of that time." He adds the further remark: "This seventeenth century pagan depended upon himself for his faith. He worked out his own ideas as to Heaven and God and Christ."

But let us examine the old man's creed a little more closely. With its first two articles we are not here concerned. He conceived of God, dimly and obscurely, no doubt, as "a good old man," the "Ancient of Days" of the Bible, "with garment white as snow, and the hairs of his head like the pure wool." So the Creator had been continually represented by Christian iconography all through the Middle Ages. The Padre Eterno is so depicted at the present day in Italian wayside shrines. His mental image of the Saviour was evidently that of a youth "goodly to look at," friendly and helpful, a cheery face to meet at the end of a long day. This seems a lingering on of the idea of "the beautiful shepherd," the boyish, beardless figure of the Catacombs, which in the Middle Ages had given place to the images of the agonised sufferer and the awful judge. However imperfect as theological conceptions, these are Christian images left in the old man's mind as the result of a long tradition. With regard to the third point, the "pleasant green meadow" is simply a translation of the "Paradisi semper amœna virentia" of the old Prayers for the Dying. It was just precisely what Christian men on their deathbeds had for centuries been bidden to hope for. It was no pagan survival, but a dim reminiscence of the ancient language of the Church.

Christianity came from the parched, torrid East, often a shadowless and weary land, a barren and dry land where no water is. All pleasure, all delight, is symbolised in the East by a garden. Man's unhappiness was caused by the loss of a garden where he was placed at first. "He shall feed me in a green pasture; He shall lead me forth beside the waters of comfort," was the delightful image of all refreshment and peace. The Bible is full of the pleasantness of springing water and green grass. "The parched ground shall become a pool and the thirsty land springs of water; in the place of dragons where each lay shall be grass with reeds and rushes" (Is. xxxv. 7). The "Golden Legend" thus describes the Paradise which Adam lost. "Paradise was made the third day of creation, and was beset by herbs, plants, and trees, and is a place of most mirth and joy. In the midst thereof be set two trees, that is, the tree of life, and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. And there is a well which casteth out water for to water the herbs and trees of Paradise. This well is the mother of all waters . . ." Around the regaining of this lost Paradise, this green "place of refreshment, light, and peace," the whole Christian drama revolved. "To-day thou shalt be with Me in Paradise" it was said to the thief.

The ancient liturgies carry on this imagery of Paradise in the commemoration of the dead. "Bring them in and collect them in a place of greenness, by the waters of comfort, in the paradise of pleasure, where grief and misery and sighing are banished," they pray. Here is the old man's "green meadow." It belongs to the earliest Christianity. It is in those prayers, which it is impossible to hear or read unmoved, which in the Catacombs brought sweetness to the beaten slave. These prayers were said from Spain to Malabar. The expressions occur constantly "in the paradise of joy," "in the tabernacles of light," "in quiet dwelling places." The ideas always are light, greenness, quiet. The form in the present Roman Mass is, "To these, O Lord, and to all who rest in Christ, grant a place of refreshment, light and peace." We cannot wonder that these delightful images made a profound impression on the people everywhere. This impression is quite universal in Christendom. The ordinary Russian prayer for the departed is, "Grant him, O Lord, a quiet place, a grassy place." The scene of the Van Eyck triptych of the "Adoration of the Lamb," at Ghent, is precisely "a green meadow" starred with gentian and with narcissus. It will be remembered that the great poets of heathendom were seen by Dante in "un pratodi fresca verdura" (Inf. iv. iii.). In the medieval doctrine even the pagans who "had done well," whatever else they lost, did not miss their "green meadow." There was water, too, in that first circle of Dante's hell. "Un bel fiumicello" surrounded the "noble castle" in which they dwelt. Mr. Gomme, in a footnote, says, "One is reminded of the famous Shakespearian emendation, whereby Falstaff, on his deathbed, "babbled o' green fields." Shakespeare knew the Christian tradition thoroughly, and it is very probable that the poet imagined the dying man as repeating snatches of the commendatory prayers. The tradition survived in English Puritanism. It is found, for instance, in Dr Watts.

> "Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood
> Stand dressed in living green;
> So to the Jews old Canaan stood,
> While Jordan rolled between."

The present writer remembers as a child delighting in these lines. The whole hymn has in it the true enchantment of poetry.

In Protestant countries, as the old offices were no longer used, and the Apocalypse was read by the people in the vulgar tongue, the idea of the golden city, for the most part, took the place of that of the green meadow. But the latter image is surely the more appealing. God made the country and man made the town. Amid some baking wilderness of bricks and mortar it is a refreshment even to think of a green alpine meadow starred with crocuses. Amid the deafening noises of the arid streets, the quiet of the country seems the very blessed "requies" of the old prayers. "Herbs and flowers and trees" are the most beautiful and health-giving things the mind can conceive. The scent, for instance, of lavender, of a bean field in flower, of July lime trees, may well seem something escaped from Paradise, a proof to men that the lost garden still exists on earth. The popular hymns of the day may describe their scenes of garish splendour, but there must be numberless simple souls who still think of heaven in the old world way. There are exiles from the country "in London, that town built ill," there are inarticulate peasants like the poor old "seventeenth century pagan," there are rogues and vagabonds, not very familiar with printed Bibles, who still cling to the hope of the green meadow. Such a one was a gipsy woman who told the cleryman that she had dreamed of heaven, and that it was "a girt green field."

THE SURPLUS OF SUMMER.

In the sun-speckled orchard there is the soft frou-frou of wings, followed by the sound of a peck at some moderately hard substance. From among the leaves of a tall tree depends the rounded tail of a blackbird, whose body is hidden in a breast-plate of green. Fallacious breast-plate, for at the tiny smokeless crack of the rifle down comes the owner of the tail. Almost every pear of this early tree, and of other trees yet far from ripe, is scored or hollowed by the beaks of these marauders. The little rifle can make but small inroad against them, for at each crack, tiny as it is, they grow more wary. It is almost always a young bird that falls, the wily old cock being particularly difficult to account for. He cries warning to his offspring from afar, and if they will not heed, more or less leaves them to their fate, whereas the hen is liable to make fatal fuss over the fall of one of her chicks. Plead mercy for her those who have no orchards just now harried at every moment of the day by hordes of blackbirds completely sworn off from other food.

In spring our blackbird is almost entirely ingratiating. The cock sings with sad beauty from the freshly bursting bough, and they are both immensely busy among the worms and grubs—mostly, it is true, among the worms, but how many of us remember that these are friends and not enemies of agriculture? We rejoice in the blackbird then, and even take pains to prevent the irresponsible boy from destroying its eggs. It is left to the jays, if we do not shoot them, to keep the breed down somewhat by eating every egg or birdling they can find. But in spite of the jay and of other natural checks, the blackbirds increase mightily every summer. A second laying quickly replaces the lost clutch, and the unmolested bird seldom fails to rear two healthy broods of five apiece. Every ebon songster of spring is now the leader of a dusky troop, from which perilous autumn and winter must select the strongest and wariest for the work of propagation next year.

A similar and often more welcome surplus is evident in most directions. Two pairs of flycatchers came to us in spring. Now there are two, if not three, broods on the wing, and an interesting family of three about to leave a late nest. In all manner of places we see the low-sitting bird waiting for a pounce, or its long-pointed wings flashing after the invisible, twisting prey. The long flight southward, the unknown dangers of an African winter, and the return next year, will inevitably reduce our score or so of flycatchers more or less to the two pairs that have been our average portion for twenty years past. Yesterday we looked below the coping of a dry wall at the three nestlings of the second brood of wagtails. The first brood has entirely vanished long since. Their parents, having fed them first and last with a myriad flies and grubs, gave them in some way to understand that there was no longer room for them about the homestead, and so they have moved on. But whither? Has not every farmyard its pair of pied wagtails that has similarly reared and banished a brood, if not two? We cannot think with equanimity of the tremendous weeding-out that must fall upon these exquisite and useful birds.

The tiny down-lined cup in the elm tree has scattered its little goldfinches into the thistle field, where they are joined by other broods, till there is quite an army fluttering like butterflies among the purple blooms and blowsy ripe heads. Here, too, are the red linnets and the cole tits almost beyond counting, though we knew but one pair of the latter in spring. Greenfinches and chaffinches are at times seen with the sparrows in thousands ravaging the standing corn, sometimes mobbing a hawk and sometimes paying penalty. Again it is the actual young surplus that is cut down. Nature takes the line of least resistance, and among the easily caught, easily plucked, and tender to eat birds of the year, the hawks, and even the crows, spend the fat time of late summer and autumn. The young greenfinch is provided by nature as a means of teaching the young hawk its business. And the young partridge, too, we think, as we come upon a circle of brown feathers in a hollow at the top of a bank, that the hawk often chooses for plucking his kill. But a moment's examination dissipates our fear. It is written that dog shall not eat dog, but here undoubtedly a hawk has struck down a hawk and eaten it to the last scrap. The circle, measuring scarcely a foot across, is full of the feathers of a young kestrel, the flight feathers with juicy barbs roughly forming the outer ring, then layer after layer of the inner clothing, out of the centre of which has been picked to the last scrap the carcase and tender limbs.

There goes one of the potential enemies of the voles, whose summer progeny, and progeny's progeny, have, in spite of restrictions, riddled their part of the field with clean round holes in the ground and secret tunnels in the grass. Never mind. The young weasels will want some, till the unreasoning keeper traps them and sets them up in his "larder." Last night, too, the young owls were proclaiming their sharp stomachs, if yet feeble beaks, all round the house as we lay in bed. One on the elm, one on the roof, and one by the barn called their tu-whits to one another more quickly than a ball could fly round a circle of expert catchers, till a parent with a long, querulous admonition bade them all be silent and follow him to another place. The vole balance will not lack adjustment so long as these winged cats are about. Some of these "mice" will have already become food for the young foxes, for our vixen has gotten herself five of these that gambol in the bracken and round the bushes of their natal field, scarcely at all to the dismay of the rabbits, with whose multiplication the fields teem. In the day time you will only see the tiny ones of the latest apparent litters (there are later ones still in several stages in the stops that the does keep so secret). But as the cool of afternoon draws on, larger and larger rabbits come forth from their holes and begin their gambols and their extended foraging that shall before dusk dot the banks all over with creatures nineteen-twentieths of which were non-existent at the winter solstice. An overwhelming proportion of the surplus will be non-existent before another breeding season begins, the manner of their removal being far more varied and dramatic than the killing of as many human heroes in the pages of Homer. Some for the fox, some for the stoat, some small ones for the owl, some for the thundering gun, some for the quiet rifle, some for the ferret, the cat, the poacher's lurcher, the wire, the motor-car, the mowing machine or reaper, till the hardy or lucky remainder of next year's horde sees again the young grass and hears the cry of the returned chiffchaff.

Heat expands and cold contracts. This axiom of indifference when applied to physics seems to us like tragedy when applied to the hordes of living summer beings that must be reduced to a tenth by the winter. It seems to be another phenomenon, the atoms being not merely pressed together but picked off and destroyed. We will not put it higher than "seems," for we have seen the dead thrush build up the living hawk, and for all we know, the vanished rabbits of one year may account for the fecundity of the next. The manure heap has its tale of increase not merely in the worms that batten in its rich decay, but in dozens and dozens of snakes' eggs glued in a kind of double chain, usually coiled into bunches of extra large white grapes with shells almost as tough as leather. With marvellous secrecy the great snakes whom every unreasoning farm hand kills at sight, have assembled almost under the very windows, and have placed their eggs here where alone they can germinate. The heat of this summer and of last winter is converting the liquid contents of each into scaly, efficient seven-inch serpents with all the false menace and more than all the grace and beauty of their parents. The farmer has only to turn over his mixen one day this month to destroy all this generation of "varmints." But with all the will to do so, the golden days slip by one by one, and the risky expedient of the old snakes succeeds. The hundreds of small snakes escape from the leathery egg-shells, and no one sees even a tail of all the serpentine vitality with which the dung heap teams. Just as certainly do the warble maggots slip from under the very thumb of the farmer on the backs of his cattle, to destroy more hides and drive frantic more heifers and bullocks next year. That is to say, one in every ten of them will survive frost and rain on the bare ground, in order to produce ten warbles next year.

Present-Day Problems.

THE HARMSWORTH BRAND.—IV.

"My idea of the newspaper of the twentieth century," said Mr. Harmsworth, now Lord Northcliffe, to the "North American Review," "may be thus expressed in brief: Let us suppose one of the great American newspapers under the control of a man of the journalistic ability of Delane, the greatest of the former editors of the London 'Times,' certainly the greatest political editor in the history of journalism, backed by an organisation as perfect as that of the Standard Oil Company, and issued simultaneously each morning in (say) New York, Boston, Chicago, Pittsburg, St. Louis, Philadelphia, and other points in America; or at London, Liverpool, Manchester, Bristol, Edinburgh, Belfast, and Newcastle, in Great Britain. Is it not obvious that the power of such a paper might become such as we have not yet seen in the history of the Press? And would not such a journal effectually revive the waning influence of the newspaper upon the life and thought of the nation?"

There is no want of assurance in the proposal to girdle the thought of a country with a web woven by a single hand. But what seriousness lies in the suggestion to encircle it with the immortal conceptions of "Chips" or the "Daily Mirror"? It is rare to find in the weekly Harmsworth papers an appeal even to the untrained thinking of our slightly educated people, with whom the seeds of new knowledge fall on a not too kindly soil. Messrs. Chambers, Cassell, Lloyd, and Mr. Stead, with his series of penny reprints, may claim to have done something to popularise culture. Mr. T. P. O'Connor, with his special gifts of style and feeling, has shown how a popular weekly may be run, not merely without offence, but with a vivid and delightful appeal to his readers' imaginations. What have the Harmsworths achieved or attempted? They did make an effort to issue a few standard novels at cheap rates; but it was abandoned, we suppose, for want of commercial success. Having announced that they did not intend to go into the publishing business with works by contemporary authors, they are now following the example of Nelson, Newnes, and others in issuing a series of sixpenny novels of no special literary value by living writers. They have certainly labored hard to discover and mine new veins of profitable custom. They issue special stories for miners or factory hands, and diligently canvass the districts which they seek to cover, trying by careful plébiscites to find the exact measure of their readers' tastes, pushing, with persistent and able calculation, the first copies of their ventures, or the more attractive numbers, till the sight of the paper is thoroughly fixed in the memory. They have laid special plans for the capture of boy readers and women readers, usually following rather than leading. Thus Messrs. Pearson's "Home Notes" was speedily capped by their "Home Chat." The fiction magazines of Newnes and Pearson were similarly imitated, but not improved in quality. There has also been an immense development of the boys' journal, which is a blend of the cheap American colored supplement and of the old crime story of the "Jack Sheppard" type. But examine the character of this work and compare it, for example, with good secondary boys' literature of the character of Mayne Reid's novels or "The Swiss Family Robinson," excluding masterpieces like Andersen's fairy tales or "Robinson Crusoe." This is the torrent of unmeaning splutter with which a "splendid" school story opens in "Pluck":—

> "A bas les Anglais!"
> "Coke!" yelled Specs, the ventriloquist. "Go and eat coke!"
> "Ar bar layz Onglay!"
> "A bas les Francais!"
> "A bas le Tucker!"
> "I'll punch your head, Specs Wickfield!"
> "Ar bar ler Tom Tucker!"
> The shouts were terrific, and the shouters hot and flustered. They were also in factions, and friction did not appear unlikely for the near future.
> It had all come about through Tucker's brother sending him a copy of the exhibition edition of the "Daily Mail." (Note the advertisement of one Harmsworth publication by another.)
> "Dry up!" yelled Dick Ross. "Dry up, Tucker!"
> "What about the entente cordiale?" shouted Specs.
> "What did Specs call me a Sioux cannibal for?"
> "Because you said you were a Frenchman, ass!" cried the ventriloquist for himself.
> "So I am!"
> "Rats!" yelled Dick. "Piffle! Ow!"
> That was the last straw. Tucker, chief of the Raggers, smote Dick Ross on the end of his nose, and Dick Ross smote back again. Tucker closed one eye for a time.
> It was all over after that.
> "Ar bar laiz Onglay!" yelled Holt, jumping on Renton's chest. Ar bar—— All right, you beast! All right, you rotter!"
> "Ha, ha, ha!" shouted Specs. "Ha, ha——"
> He changed notes a trifle, and concluded with a gurgle.

Much the same criticism applies to the women's papers issued by this firm. Some are harmless; they cover the housewife's, or the home servant's, daily task, and fill her hour of relaxation. But the stories are dosed with the commonest kind of sentimentalism, served with crime as a piquant sauce. For the rest two main interests are dress and forms of gambling. The latter gives rise to endless devices of perverted ingenuity. There are guessing matches, such as hitting on the number of births in a town in a month, presents of money or dress for finding some trivial secret hidden in the columns of the paper, competitions for discovering missing words or lines, the collection of tram tickets, with winning numbers, a form of lottery in which more than one child lost his life. The limerick craze, which the Harmsworths promoted, though they did not start it, ran through England like an infectious fever. The recent memorial on gambling in the Press stated that tradesmen's Christmas takings were diverted to post offices for sixpenny "limerick" orders, and that young workmen and students spent their time and living money upon them. The editor of "Answers," debasing the moral and the literary currency in a sentence, described one of his guessing competitions as "an easy chance of winning gold in a skill contest." "Skill" was almost equally banished from the "limerick" prize-giving. No true judgment of literary merit was possible when the competitors were counted by the score of thousand, and the judgment on their work had to be passed in a few days or hours.

Some of the most deceptive of these lures is that of free Continental tours offered to young women, whose places in a "competition," extended over weeks and months, and whipped up by every art known to the Harmsworth form of Americanised journalism, are determined by a plébiscite of readers. A most conspicuous example of this advertising dodge has just been rounded off by the "Daily Mail." Its main features were borrowed from the scheme of the "Buck-eyed Daisies," a party of American girls who lately visited these shores. Twenty such "guests" of the "Daily Mail"—twenty out of some hundreds of competitors—start this week on a three weeks' tour. What have they done to secure the prize—for themselves and for the "Daily Mail"? For themselves they have done nothing which could not have been achieved for perhaps one-sixth of the cost in money and labor; for the "Daily Mail" they have done a great deal. The total number of votes polled by successful and unsuccessful competitors was 20,565,437. These "votes" have taken six months to collect. During this period these ingenuous young ladies, and scores of other girls, have been conducting a free canvass for subscriptions to the "Daily Mail." Twenty have in return got their three weeks' tour, and a few more receive a meagre consolation prize of £10 or a week's holiday in London. The great majority get nothing at all for their months of touting for subscriptions, save a happy consciousness of having added to the circulation of the "Daily Mail," and correspondingly to its advertisements. The "votes" were recorded on coupons cut from the "Daily Mail." A single coupon, sent signed to the office, would, of course, secure one vote, but the main staple of the scheme was to offer 1,000 votes in exchange for a year's subscription to the paper, fixed at 13s., or 500 votes for a six months' subscription. Even if every vote were secured at this rate, and thousands must have been obtained on single issues at one halfpenny a-piece, the twenty million votes would stand for a sum of over £13,000. In return for this the proprietors offer to a handful of their amateur canvassers the value, say, of some £40, with a "tip" of £10 to another handful. The winning girls obtained from 565,000 to 458,000 votes, representing a value in coupons, reckoned at 13s. per 1,000 copies of the "Mail," of some £360 and £290. Every effort was made to pile up votes. Relatives and tradesmen plied friends and customers with circulars appealing to them to subscribe to the "Mail" for three or six months or a year, and pile the resulting votes on to their candidate's mounting list. How self-respecting people can use such methods for giving their sister or their cousin a trip of three weeks abroad, passes our imagination. It would be interesting to hear what the "Daily Mail" reaped in new admirers and advertisers as the result of this experiment in philanthropy. It would be harder to measure the good that can accrue to these young women from the feverish excitement of their foolish speculation in pleasure.

Thus, then, are the simple caught in the cheap tradesman's prettily painted net. To this measure has the noble art of printing come, the art of communicating ideas and knowledge, and making the intellectual stuff of the world go round from shore to shore. Thus is power used and abused, leaving to those who think and feel the sure knowledge that such methods can give those who employ them no real influence over the hearts and minds of men and women, and only a passing, if blighting, force over the whims of their idle hours.

(To be continued.)

[We willingly correct an error in our list of Harmsworth publications. The "Country-side," we are informed, has always been the property of the company whose title heads the paper, and the publishing arrangement which it had with Carmelite House ceased sixteen months ago. The "Country-side," we may add, is an interesting and pleasantly written paper, dealing with natural history from a popular point of view.]

THE PERSONALITIES OF THE SESSION.

A TRAIT of this Parliament, and of its abounding vitality, is its peculiar method of settling accounts with itself. At the close of each Session it rushes to take stock of the next. Tasks once accomplished are done with; men, in Balzac's phrase, are used as post-horses—to carry affairs on from one stage to another. This, after all, is only a surly way of acknowledging the not uncheerful fact that towards the close of its third Session the Parliament of 1906 is still stretching out eager hands towards the future, still looking forward with unabated fervour to fresh schemes of social reconstruction.

Besides, there are special reasons this Session for taking stock of the future rather than of the past. Owing to the changes in personnel and modifications of policy brought about by the death of the late Prime Minister, the leading figures of the Ministry have chiefly been engaged in doing one another's work. Thus, Mr. Asquith's Budget, with which should be included the Old Age Pensions Bill, has been in the hands of Mr. Lloyd George. Again, at the Board of Trade Mr. Churchill has been dexterously picking up the threads of an administrative web designed by a brain not less ingenious than his own. With all his industry and quickness of apprehension Mr. McKenna still finds it expedient to fortify his statements on Naval policy with the authority of his advisers. Some minor knots in the educational tangle have been unravelled by Mr. Runciman, but for his solution of the major problem we are bidden to wait till the autumn. Indeed, it is only of the newcomers among the second team that we can yet speak with certainty, for there can be no doubt that Colonel Seely, Mr. Masterman, and Mr. McKinnon Wood have all more than justified their promotion. Nominally in the second line, Dr. Macnamara keeps his place some points ahead of certain of his colleagues, who are nominally in the first. Another of the marked personal successes of the Session has been Mr. Herbert Samuel, whose impeccable demeanour in his piloting of the Children's Bill has been pleasantly relieved by some brisk reprisals against Mr. Balfour and Mr. Long in the Old Age Pensions debates. But, after all, the great political feat of the Session has been the passage of the Irish Universities Bill—a triumph which only one man in Great Britain could have compassed. And that man is Mr. Birrell.

And what of the chief newcomer—what of the Prime Minister himself? Here again one must ask the future to answer. Thus far, Mr. Asquith has been dealing with a programme bequeathed by his predecessor, and he has felt himself, I imagine, under a peculiar obligation to carry out every article of the testament. Otherwise, with his well-known views concerning the freedom of discussion, it is scarcely conceivable that he would have attempted to do so much in a single Session. Twitted the other day by Mr. Balfour with his former attacks on the guillotine, he replied that he repented and retracted nothing of those earlier declarations. To tell the truth, Mr. Balfour's challenge rang rather hollow, not only on account of its source, but still more because of the prevailing sense of the good faith of the Minister against whom it was aimed. In various ways Mr. Asquith has already given proof of the sincerity of his concern for the liberties of the House of Commons. To abandon the all-night sitting, as a coercive weapon against a small minority may, in itself, be no great thing. But that this should have been done in Mr. Asquith's first Session as Prime Minister shows at least the conciliatory bent of his Parliamentary management—an art, it may be noted, always rated among the higher qualifications of leadership, till in an evil epoch its use passed out of fashion, not to say out of memory, under the slovenly rule of Mr. Balfour.

Apart from some new developments in reaction, such as the movement against the Miners' Eight Hours Bill, the Opposition remain where they were. Their successes in the bye-elections bring them no moral stimulus, and do nothing to heal their divisions. With Mr. Long, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, and Mr. Lyttelton to act as his intellectual foils, Mr. Balfour might be expected to stand in the eyes of his party in a position of isolated and supreme splendor. And so he does. But strange to say, with all his arts of conciliation, his successful attempt to recapture the lost sympathies of the House, his unwearied diligence and finely wrought eloquence, which he concentrates on the congenial task of destructive criticism, despite, too, many professions of devotion, his followers throughout this Session, as in preceding years, have night after night left him unsupported save by a meagre circle of kinsfolk and intimate friends. This is the more remarkable since they all seem to be Protectionists now. Colonial Preference, to be sure, has been dropped, but the hand that struck a last furtive blow at that discredited cause in the recent Budget debate was not Mr. Balfour's, but that of his hypnotised sentinel, Mr. Austen Chamberlain. Possibly other and deeper causes of disunion are at work, involving, it may be the fate of the earlier Birmingham structure of a democratised Toryism.

JAMES DRYSDALE.

Music.

THE ERROR OF BAYREUTH.

ONE sometimes comes away from Bayreuth wondering whether, after all, these performances do not lower Wagner in some ways as much as they exalt him in others. If Bayreuth were to do the really sensible thing, it would bestow its chief pains on the music. To some extent it does this already—it gives us an orchestra that for purity and beauty of tone, unanimity of ensemble, and poetry of interpretation, could not be matched anywhere else on earth; and it generally puts the orchestra under a conductor who, like Richter or Muck, is worthy to have so magnificent an instrument to play upon. But even here Bayreuth sometimes does an irrational thing, as when it gives the orchestra into the hands of a mere well-meaning amateur like Siegfried Wagner, who the other day, for example, quite destroyed the beauty of the melodic contours of a good deal of "Lohengrin." The most serious complaint against Bayreuth, however, is that the singers are too often below the standard one expects in an opera house that claims to be bent on showing the world how Wagner should be given, and that draws hundreds of people, year after year, thousands of miles to endure the discomforts of life in this little town, in the belief that at last the real Wagner is to be displayed to them.

Frau Cosima and her associates have their little prejudices and preferences, and few of them work for the general public good. This singer is to be retained to the end of time because she sang well some years ago; this other is shelved because he has said or done something that is lèse majesté against Wahnfried. This year, for instance, we had in Frau Reuss-Belce a Fricka with, indeed, a good sense of style in her acting, but a voice so acrid as to be positively painful to anyone with an ordinarily good ear; while Burgstaller was barred from singing Parsifal because he had committed the heinous crime of taking part in the New York performance of the work. Two or three singers at this year's festival have been grievous disappointments. Dalmores as Lohengrin was in every way ineffective. Max Dawison, after giving us an Alberich that had several good points, though they were marred by his addiction to the German habit of half-speaking the music instead of singing it, gave us a Telramund that was at times grotesque; all melodic outline was lost in the torrent of verbal noise he poured forth. It is surely not to listen to performances like these that people go all the way to Bayreuth.

This, then, is Bayreuth's mistake. It ought to recognise that whatever else goes wrong, the music should issue from the singers' mouths in a perpetually beautiful form. The music is the first factor, let the wilder Wagnerians say what they will. If that is good, the ear and the eye will tolerate a little imperfection in other departments; if that is bad, nothing will reconcile us for the loss of this pleasure—no amount of declamation, no amount of stress upon dramatic points or upon supposed profundities of philosophical meaning. But Bayreuth cannot see this, and it fails to see it because, like Wagner himself, it over-estimates the importance of another factor in opera—the scenery. It gives to this all the attention it fails to give to the singers. The results, of course, are wonderful in their own way, but this is not always the way that is best for the opera as a whole. No one could wish for more beautiful stage pictures than the scene of the hall of the Grail, or that in the second act of "Lohengrin," or the sliding canvases that accompany the "Umwandlungs" music in "Parsifal." But the genuine musician has the uncomfortable feeling that his admiration for some of these stage pictures is blinding him to the imperfection of the music that accompanies it, or to the imperfections in the manner of performing this music. In the Grail scene, for example, so splendid is the setting, and so full of solemn religious symbolism is the whole ceremonial, that it is only with an effort that one remembers how commonplace some of the music is, or notices with what unsubtle solidity of tone the men sing their parts at Bayreuth. The purely musical sense, here as elsewhere in Wagner, is in fact being distracted and duped by the pictorial sense.

The device is, of course, perfectly justifiable if you accept the Wagnerian formula in toto. Wagner wanted to say so many things that music by itself is hardly competent to say, that he necessarily has to attain his end at times by other than musical methods. No one knew better than he that in the theatre a lower standard of musical structure is accepted than in the concert-room. We complain of our writers of symphonic poems that they try to tell stories in music instead of writing music that is self-consistent and self-poised; but we forget that Wagner is constantly doing the same thing. In some of the preludes to the acts of the "Ring," for example, the motives are tacked together to tell a story in a way that has merely a literary but no musical justification, and with an audacity that no symphonic poem writer has ever dared to imitate. Wagner well knew that, as we watch something going on on the stage, or sit staring at the drop-curtain, waiting for it to rise and reveal its picture, our purely musical sense is not at its most critical; it is half-drugged by other suggestions. What we all revolt against in time is this calling in of the art of the scene-painter or the scene-shifter to cloak the defects in the art of the musician. And it is because Bayreuth, as a rule, does so much more for the stage setting than it does for the music, that one comes away from it with one's admiration for Wagner slightly lowered in some respects, with a sense of the impurity of some of the means by which he has held us engrossed for so many hours. In any combination of the arts into which music enters, it takes the first place. Good music will make bad poetry tolerable; the best poetry in the world will not make bad music tolerable. The music in Wagner, then, ought to be the first thing. It ought to stand in no need of the scene-painter to eke out its deficiencies; and how many pages are there not in the "Ring" and "Parsifal" the weakness of which would at once be disclosed did not the splendor and the variety of the scenic setting cover them! Vast and glorious as the works are, there is too much dependence upon machinery in them. It is the error of Bayreuth that, by the very perfection and magnificence of its staging, it makes the critical mind too conscious of the part the machinery plays in the total effect.

Communications.

MR. GLADSTONE'S NEW WAY WITH OLD OFFENDERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I note with interest that there has been plenty of talk about the Home Secretary's Bill "to make better provision for the prevention of crime, and to provide for the prolonged detention of habitual offenders." There will be more, I hope, before the measure is passed or rejected. We cannot in the present situation hear too much concerning prison and the treatment of prisoners. Anything is worth discussing that costs over half a million of money a year; and when, as in the case of the prison system, the annual half-million is as good as thrown away, discussion becomes a kind of necessity.

Much is in some quarters expected of the new Bill. Let us see what are its chief provisions in respect of the person branded as the habitual offender. He is convicted of a new crime, and sentence of penal servitude, we will say, is passed upon him. If, in the jury's opinion, the delinquent is an habitual offender, a professional criminal, a recidivist—the name matters little—the Court may inflict a farther punishment—may, in fact, double the dose. As the Bill puts it, the Court "may pass a further sentence ordering that on the determination of the sentence of penal servitude he be detained during His Majesty's pleasure," an ominous phrase hitherto associated only with Broadmoor. The second sentence is described by the Bill as "preventive detention." The habitual offender is one who has been four times convicted, or who, in the belief of the jury, has been "leading persistently a dishonest or criminal life." Having done time at Portland, Parkhurst, or elsewhere, he is to be transferred forthwith to some other prison, "which the Secretary of State may set apart for the purpose." In this place he will still "be subject to the law for the time being in force with respect to penal servitude as if he were undergoing penal servitude"; but the rules of the convict establishment will be modified "in the direction of a less rigorous treatment." It is a trifle vague, but we are left in little doubt that the powers of the penal servitude prison are to be in full force in the background. Here, then, the old offender is to remain until "there is a reasonable probability that he will abstain from crime, and lead a useful and industrious life, or that he is no longer capable of engaging in crime."

Once at least in every three years the Secretary of State will take into consideration "the condition, history, and circumstances" of the prisoner, "with a view to determining whether he shall be placed out on licence." Again: "The Directors of Convict Prisons shall report periodically to the Secretary of State on the conduct and industry of persons undergoing preventive detention, and their prospects and probable behaviour on release, and for this purpose shall be assisted by a committee at each prison . . . consisting of the governor of the prison and such other persons as the Secretary of State may appoint. Every such committee shall hold meetings at such intervals of not more than six months as may be prescribed." These, on a careful reading of the Bill, strike me as its most important parts.

Let me examine the definition which the Home Office or its advisers have given us of the habitual offender, the professional criminal so-called. He is a person against whom four convictions stand on record. I submit that this case is not necessarily as bad (and is very seldom as bad) as it looks upon the sheet. Before dismissing him offhand as a professional criminal, liable to be shut up for a quite indefinite time under conditions which are not explained, I want to know a good deal about this person who has done four separate stretches. It is a serious thing to decide about a man, that he lives, has lived, and means to live, by crime. I want to know what his offences were, and in what circumstances he committed them. I want to know in what manner he was punished for each of these offences. I want to know what chances he had to quit the crooked road for the straight one each time that he came out of prison.

My point, to make it plainer still, is this: Every time that we are trying for a crime a man who has been twice convicted, we are also trying (though we can seldom be brought to admit it) both the prison system to which he has been subjected and the whole social system of which he is a member. It is conceded—the question, indeed, is scarcely at this date open to argument—that the prison system is a failure, complete, ludicrous, contemptible. What is not so generally conceded (because this is a thing disgraceful to us all) is that society helps the hurtful work of prison by refusing a decent opening to the prisoner on discharge. By all means let us admit that there are such persons as professional criminals. But let us at the same time admit that both we and our prisons have had no small share in the making of them. The one thing we should refuse to admit is that, the prison system and the social system being what they are, the professional criminal is an irreclaimable. There are plenty of persons with four convictions behind them who would very willingly amend their ways.

I next observe that this unfortunate "habitual" is to be transferred, as his penance progresses, from a prison of one sort to a prison of some other sort. "Not at all!" says the complacent critic of the scheme; "his place of 'preventive detention' will be a kind of hospital or reformatory." I find nothing of hospital or reformatory in the Bill! The first sentence, which may be one of many years, will be served throughout under the system which has notoriously failed to justify itself. All prison is bad. It is bad and unwholesome for anybody to be permanently in a condition of disgrace, and disgrace and degradation are the state of the convict during every hour of his confinement. A fine notion truly it was that you were to reform wrong-doers by cropping their heads, rigging them out like mountebanks, sealing their mouths, tasking them at any sort of uncongenial labor, and rubbing it into them at every moment of their dreary, vulgar, and useless existences that they had put themselves beyond the pale of decency, and were fit for nothing better! But this is penal servitude; this, and nothing less. Read the confessions of any member of the intellectual class who has been through it. Wilde's "De Profundis," granting it not wholly sincere, is the most tragical book in the language. "We are clowns," he says, writing from a cell in Reading Gaol, "whose hearts are broken." Yet it seems clear, on any reading of the Bill, that the convict is to carry with him into his place of "preventive detention" something at least of the atmosphere of penal servitude.

Now I can imagine a place—a prison even, if it must be—in which an influence might be directed upon the old criminal hand such as he has never known, and never could know, at Portland. And here, of course, comes in the supremely important point: What is the system to be, what are the conditions of life to be, in the prison of preventive detention? In proportion as it resembles the convict establishments the new place of detention must fail; in proportion as it differs from them it may succeed. The one great lack in the established system is the human or humanising element. No man was ever yet made better by being taught utterly to despise himself, but in the whole social organism there is no other situation so absolutely despicable as the convict's. "We are the zanies of sorrow," says Wilde. Grotesquely clothed, coarsely fed, meanly employed, kennelled within bare walls, searched from head to foot each time he enters or quits his cell, driven in gangs at the word of command, his hand ever tremblingly or sullenly at the salute, and spied upon waking and sleeping, the convict is made to feel himself in every fibre of his being the pariah and leper of the world. And we wonder smugly that he comes out of prison unreformed. We talk smugly on platforms and in the newspapers of the irreclaimables whom we have sought in this way to reclaim. One place where I should like to hear this gross and silly system talked of, not smugly, but in the proper style, is the pulpit. The pulpit, however, is pertinaciously and feloniously silent on the subject.

It is clear, I trust, that all this must be pretty thoroughly reformed if the Home Secretary's experiment is to avail anything. I confess I do not quite see by whom it is going to be done. One thing seems eminently advisable, that there should be as little interference as possible by the autocrats of the old school. Unless the routine of life in the new place is once again to resolve itself into discipline and task work—the elemental features of penal servitude—we want no governor of the drill-sergeant pattern, drafted from the army or the navy. Nor do we want a personnel such as the convict service has trained—admirable as that personnel is for the duties of keeping order and handling large bodies of men crushed for the most part into abject docility. A man passing out of penal servitude would need first, I should think, to have renewed in him some dim sense of self-respect, some sense of responsibility, some feeling of kinship with men not pariahs and lepers, some consciousness of normal life and its privileges as well as its pains; he would need to be mentally and morally toned up; and all this supposes and demands on the part of his mentors gifts which are not acquired in the convict service.

It would be extremely interesting to know what tests are to be applied in the cases of prisoners petitioning for release. Who are the psychological experts of the Home Office who will decide whether the burglar placed in circumstances in which burglary is impossible to him is fit to be returned to society? What is called good conduct in prison is merely of the passive kind. It means doing certain things which you are compelled to do, and abstaining from certain other things which you are forbidden to do. The old hands in prison are, in general, the best behaved. What manner of conduct will earn the ticket-of-leave in the prison of preventive detention? What is to be the criterion of repentance?

Lastly, what is to become of the man who, in the fullness of time, succeeds in obtaining his discharge? The day is not distant when it will be recognised and insisted on that the State owes something to the ex-convict whom it has kept for many years in prison. He has been struck down, and in many instances his family have been struck through him. He must change his identity before he can get on to his feet again. Most men punished in prison are punished worse when they come out of it. To help in rehabilitating the men whom it has helped to break is the bounden duty of the State. The new Bill betrays no recognition of this duty.—Yours, &c.,

TIGHE HOPKINS.

August 4th, 1908.

Letters to the Editor.

"THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Having suffered the misfortune for some weeks of not seeing THE NATION, in your last number I came across a letter from which it appears that "S. D. W." has been proposing the foundation of a national association for fighting the tyranny of motor-cars. I quite agree that "THE NATION and its Editor have the prestige which would form a happy nucleus," but it would be a pity not to concentrate all our forces, and such an association has already been formed under the title of the "Road Union," with secretary and offices at 47, Victoria Street, S.W., where the fighting vigor of your correspondents would be able to mingle with the gathering energies of an indignant people.

The season when so many scatter to the country is a very fitting one for an impulse to the movement; it is in the country that we suffer most, and it is in the country that, to my mind, the real remedy is to be found. The indignation is there, and needs only organisation to find effective expression. May I beg all your readers who are interested in the matter to put themselves in communication with the Secretary, to subscribe to the funds of the Union (for there are considerable expenses to be met, as in any organisation); and then, when they get to the country, to spread the light wherever they go, distribute leaflets, and get members; but, above all, to found, if they can, centres in the towns and villages which will rally the people and get something effective done on the spot; whatever (within the bounds of legality) suggests itself to the imagination; something better than retiring with cart and bicycle into the ditch when a car hoots in the distance; something better than tamely enduring pecuniary loss by the dust nuisance without making any effort to get the rich people who cause it to pay for it.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE CALDERON.

August 5th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am too old a hand at newspaper controversy to resent criticism, or even abuse, but I like fair play. Your correspondent, H. S. Clough, says I have set up an "abstraction," whereas I consider my previous letter was full of concrete facts, well within my own knowledge. Surely he will not deny that motors are killing or maiming innocent people every day of the week, that they smell abominably, and create clouds of dust wherever they go. Let me mention a circumstance which occurred to me since my letter was written. Passing along a favourite road so "arcaded" with trees as to form an avenue, or grove, for some distance, I was confronted by a motor, painted a violent red, and thundering along at twenty miles an hour at least. The dust created was so dense as to completely obscure the atmosphere for some distance, and, owing to the over-arching trees, it could not escape, and it was some minutes before it finally settled. When it did settle, the leaves of the trees were thickly coated. But who cares for trees, which have neither votes nor voices?

Mr. Clough speaks of the outcry against the bicycle on its introduction. I, too, am old enough to remember this, and I must be honest enough to confess that I joined in it. But I sympathise with cyclists now, seeing they are amongst the readiest victims of the motorist, who smashes up them and their machines. I except the motor-cyclist, who is only a lesser horror than the motorist himself, and deserves all he gets.

I am greatly touched by the announcement that "people of moderate means," who couldn't afford to keep a "vehicle of their own," are able to indulge in the less costly luxury of a motor. The motor as the "poor man's friend" is the most novel argument I have yet seen in its favor; but I stick to my opinion that the owners of motors are "a parcel of rich vulgarians," who deserve no mercy at the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he sets out on his quest for hen roosts to rob.

Even house agents are beginning to realise that noise and smell and dust are not a necessary adjunct of country life, and are careful to state in their advertisements of houses off the main road that they are "away from motors." —Yours, &c.,

R. W. J.

August 3rd, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In your issue of the 18th ult. you were good enough to insert a short letter of mine, suggesting that The Nation should take the lead in organising a national association for regaining the at present lost liberty of the road.

In that letter I made no pretence of knowing much about motors from the inside point of view. I was never inside one but once. I was then persuaded by a friend, an enthusiastic motorist, to accompany him two or three miles along a wide level road, and we never exceeded in pace some fifteen miles an hour. I admit that even that pace was as exhilarating as a glass of champagne so long as one saw nothing outside the car. It so happened, however, that I did look around me, and then I saw that we were smothering with dust the men, women, and children we were overtaking or meeting. Then, I confess, I felt ashamed of myself, a weakness I should, no doubt, soon have got over had I bought a car. My friend, for instance, one of the kindest and most considerate of men by nature, looked on the discomfort we were inflicting on those outside the car as incidents not to be thought of when set against the advantages of motoring.

But to my purpose. Will The Nation lead in this good work, the regaining of the lost liberty of the road? If so, I will come at once to its aid with a contribution of £25 towards its fund, and an annual subscription of ten guineas, for, if necessary, ten years at least.

The Association formed, the measure needed to secure its aim will have to be thought out and adopted.—Yours, &c.,

S. D. W.

Sutton Coldfield,
August 4th, 1908.

[We are much obliged to our correspondent for his offer. At present we do not propose to start a new organisation. We are asking for detailed and local information, with which we will deal when it is fairly complete.—Ed., The Nation.]

THE GERMAN GYMNASTIC FÊTES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The accusation of want of sympathy and partiality levelled at the English during the progress of the Olympic Games here by the representatives of various foreign nations—accusations which, however unjust, found a ready echo in the foreign Press—should set Englishmen a-thinking whether their attitude during the duration of the games was all that could have been desired, whether it was not tinged by too great a bias for English athletes, and took too little count of the susceptibility of the strangers within our gates.

To read some of the London newspapers, as I did, abroad, gave one the idea that the gathering was an English one, with foreigners nowhere, so redundant was every line with glowing accounts of the prowess, the superior skill, endurance, &c., of the English competitors.

A curious corollary to this attitude is provided by the silence of all the London newspapers regarding the great German Gymnastic Fête, recently held in Frankfurt-on-Main, from the 18th to the 23rd of July (the greatest gathering of athletes ever held anywhere), when no less than 50,000 gymnasts (Turner) from all parts of the Fatherland, from the United States of America, Austria, Switzerland, Belgium, and Holland, with contingents of varying strength from German South-West Africa, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Odessa, Bucharest, Cairo, Mexico City, and Melbourne foregathered within the hospitable walls of this ancient town, to meet in friendly rivalry or good fellowship.

On Sunday, the 19th, 44,000 of these athletes marched through the gaily-decorated streets under volleys of cheering and unparalleled scenes of enthusiasm, and were passed in review on the square in front of the Opera by the Kaiser's son, Prince Oscar, the Americans, Swiss, and Austrians receiving tremendous ovations.

The exercises, which continued until Wednesday, the 23rd, in team and individual competition, comprising over 3,000 participants, provided most excellent sport, and were marked by feats of daring, skill, and strength which it would be difficult to surpass.

The first prize in the "Fuenfkampf" (five exercises) went to Berne, the German Gymnastic Society of London receiving the eleventh, and the first prize in the "Sechskampf" (six exercises) went to Munich. Fencing and wrestling also took place. A swimming and diving competition in the Main, for which there were about one hundred entries, concluded the sports, which then gave way to excursions en masse down the Rhine to Heidelberg and as far as Paris.

No untoward incident, no accusation of unfairness, no lack of popular sympathy marred this great and unique festival, which, in a sense, came nearer the ideal of the ancient Olympic Games than its London competitor; 80,000 to 160,000 was the daily attendance, and this great festival, by a most "singular coincidence," found no mention whatever in a Press which usually is most eager to snap up and print for the consumption of its readers any tiddle-taddle from the Fatherland.

Truly a remarkable omission.—Yours, &c.,

Observer.

August 5th, 1908.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S BATTALIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—As a humble unit of Mrs. Humphry Ward's battalions, I must protest against the tone of Mrs. Thomas Hardy's letter in your current issue. She assumes that those opposing the franchise for women must be incapable of comprehending the question and its grave issues. It is just because we see a little further than the Suffragettes that we oppose them, and the terms of our manifesto make this abundantly clear. As to our battalions being composed of "unreflective, idle, immoral, excitement-seekers," I have not encountered any such amongst them. The Suffragettes who try to break up peace meetings, support the drink trade, break windows, and threaten the use of bombs would seem to have the monopoly of these characteristics. As to "atrophied hearts and darkened and selfish lives," it is just of these we complain when we see Suffragettes neglecting their abundant opportunities of helping the helpless in the wide spheres of public work now opened to them, to rush, in the ardent spirit of self-advertisement, from election to election, denouncing that party which alone has promised them help.

Women would show more true citizenship in qualifying themselves as guardians and members of borough and county councils, and giving their best services in the way of local government to their country than in spending money like water in organising processions and embroidering banners, to spread sex antagonism and gather noisy crowds to jeer at their platform oratory. Mrs. Hardy sees in the Suffragist movement "a way to the production of splendid mothers in the future." This is a dark saying, especially when coupled with the assertion that the influence of that poor creature—mere man—is to be banished for ever.—Yours, &c.,

(Mrs.) Florence Travers.

Tortington House, Arundel, Sussex.
August 3rd, 1908.

ANOTHER "MARATHON RACE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The very interesting article in this week's Nation, entitled "The Marathon," reminded me of a curious story in Swiss history.

After the defeat of Charles the Bold by the Swiss at Morah (1476) a youth of Fribourg ran from Morah to Fribourg to bring the news to his countrymen, and died from exhaustion on arriving. The branch of linden tree he carried in his hand is said to have been planted on the spot where he expired, and to have become the very old tree everyone can see at Fribourg in the middle of the "Place des Ormeaux."

Hoping that this incident, which is not generally known, may interest your readers.—Yours, &c.,

Andre de Bavier.

Château de Dully, Vaud, Switzerland,
August 3rd, 1908.

HAGGERSTON AND AFTER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—As a regular reader of your paper, and as a spectator at the election decided last Saturday, I shall be glad if you are able to insert the following brief criticism.

Somewhere about a year ago the late Sir W. R. Cremer publicly notified his determination not to seek re-election.

This, coupled with the fact that he had reached a great age, made it imperative that the necessary steps should have been then taken to secure the adoption of a candidate worthy to be his successor, so that the electorate might have an opportunity of making his acquaintance, and so be led to work to secure his return. Had ordinary circumstances prevailed in Haggerston, nothing less than this would have sufficed to hold the seat, but with the son of a wealthy peer as the Tory candidate, whose "nursing" of the constituency, in the deepest and broadest sense of the word, was well known, this and much more required to be done.

As a further spur to Progressive and Liberal effort there came the selection at a very early date of a Socialist candidate, who by his past record of much honorable work threatened to be what he eventually became—a formidable competitor for the seat.

And what answer did the Liberal, Radical, and Progressive Party give to these two challenges? None—absolutely none. Result, another seat given to the enemy by the ineptitude of our leaders to "organise," and, through organisation, lead the higher forces in the nation to victory. Haggerston does not stand alone. In Mid-Devon, Worcester, and Hastings the Free Trade Party were found absolutely unprepared to face the enemy, and went into the battle simply to be slaughtered.

This may be considered by some persons "glory," but it is not "war." These repeated manifestations of want of organised effort are provoking much angry comment. The rank and file of the party and the man in the street are beginning to ask why is it that sloth, indolence, and such like selfish considerations are permitted to lead the party to defeat. Mr. Warren had just five days to know and be known, and he was expected, under such conditions, to be able to retain the seat. Given such conditions, it would have been better by far to have left the battle to the Socialist and the Tory.

I see Mr. Guinness is claiming the victory for Tariff Reform; he would have been less than human had he not done so. How far this claim can be made good is an open point.

Votes for women. Of course, once again the leaders of this movement will claim the victory as theirs. This is decidedly open to serious disputation, and what I have to say upon both points must be reserved for your next issue —Yours, &c.,

F. W. Souiter.

32, Etterby Street, Stanwix, Carlisle,
August 5th, 1908.

"THE TEMPEST" CRUX.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—If Miss V. Churchill will turn to The Nation of February 29th she will, I do not doubt, perceive that the parallelism I cited from Terence proves almost to a certainty that Shakespeare wrote "labors," and not "labor," as some have maintained, in the context.

As to Herr Lummis, it would be well, perhaps, if the reverend gentleman took an early opportunity to glance at the twelve pages of notes bearing on this much-disputed passage in the Furness edition before airily alleging that there "is no crux at all" to be got over! True, the difficulty has been well nigh eliminated by the comments of successive editors and writers from Theobald downwards, but that is not to say that the sense was from the first clear and unambiguous as the Pfarrer seems to imply. Nor can anyone's discernment be very keen who calls "the lines from Terence":

Omnes mihi labores fuere quos cepi leves

"wide of the mark":

"my labors
Most busy, least when I," &c.

The imitation must appear most palpable to any unbiassed reader who will take the trouble to compare the citation in full, though it certainly does not amount to plagiarism.

It is impossible, however, to regard Pfarrer Lummis as voicing modern German Shakespearean criticism, which has ever taken high rank both in England and America, as the names of Schlegel, Tieck, Elze, and Delius will testify.—Yours, &c.,

New York, July 15th, 1908. N. W. Hill.

[The correspondence on this subject must now cease.—Ed., The Nation.]

Poetry.

JOY AND PLEASURE.

Now, Joy is born of parents poor,
And Pleasure of our richer kind;
Though Pleasure's free, she cannot sing
As sweet a song as Joy confined.

Pleasure's a Moth, that sleeps by day
And dances by false glare at night;
But Joy's a Butterfly, that loves
To spread its wings in Nature's light.

Joy's like a Bee that gently sucks
Away on blossoms his sweet hour;
But Pleasure's like a greedy Wasp,
That plums and cherries would devour.

Joy's like a Lark that lives alone,
Whose ties are very strong, though few;
But Pleasure like a Cuckoo roams,
Makes much acquaintance, no friends true.

Joy from her heart doth sing at home,
With little care if others hear;
But Pleasure then is cold and dumb,
And sings and laughs with strangers near.

W. H. Davies.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

IN the world of books there is no more delightful haunt than a second-hand bookshop, unless it be a bookstall in a retired street upon a fine day. If you are a millionaire there are the famous dealers who will, at moment's notice, hand you over a Caxton, a First Folio, a Grolier, or even a Mazarin Bible. Less fortunate people find the neighbourhood of Charing Cross Road the most likely place to pick up a bargain. For them there is at least one pleasure denied to their wealthier rivals. Herrick sang the praise of "a sweet disorder in the dress," and although there may at times be an advantage in buying books from a shop where they are carefully arranged and catalogued, a certain amount of disorder in their disposition whets the true book-hunter to a keener zest. First of all there is the element of chance. You never know how great a treasure may be lying close to your hand. Then there is the joy of discovery, and finally the thrill of suspense while the price is being decided upon. The joys of book-collecting have been celebrated by scores of pens, and the books upon the subject, if not so many as might be expected, run to a very considerable number. One of the best of them, "The Book-Hunter," by John Hill Burton, has just been issued in a cheap edition by Messrs. Routledge, with some additional notes by Mr. Slater, the unwearied editor of that excellent work of reference, "Book Prices Current."

* * *

DR. HILL BURTON was an Aberdonian who was called to the Scottish Bar in 1831, and spent most of his life in the service of the Prisons Board for Scotland. He was a writer of great industry and learning. His "History of Scotland," in nine volumes, is considered one of the best and most impartial in existence, and his "Life of David Hume" has long been a standard work. He wrote, besides, a "History of the Reign of Queen Anne," a series of "Narratives from Criminal Trials in Scotland," a capital account of Scottish adventures in foreign countries called "The Scot Abroad," and a number of books upon law, political economy, and Scottish biography. But his most popular work is "The Book-Hunter," a series of "sketches of the ways of book-collectors, scholars, literary investigators, desultory readers, and other persons whose pursuits revolve round books and literature." It is full of quaint anecdotes, flashes of kindly humor, and shrewd practical advice on the purchase and care of books.

* * *

THE reader who is content to dismiss bibliography as a mere erudition of title-pages may be brought into a better frame of mind by the following account of the science which Burton quotes from Peignot. "Bibliography being the most universal and extensive of all sciences, it would appear that all subjects should come under the consideration of the bibliographe; languages, logic, criticism, philosophy, eloquence, mathematics, geography, chronology, history, are no strangers to him; the history of printing and of celebrated printers is familiar to him, as well as all the operations of the typographic art. He is continually occupied with the works of the ancients and the moderns; he makes it his business to know books useful, rare, and curious, not only by their titles and form, but by their contents; he spends his life in analysing, classifying, and describing them. He seeks out those which are recommended by talented authors; he runs through libraries and cabinets to increase the sum of his knowledge; he studies authors who have treated of the science of books, he points out their errors; he chooses from among new productions those which bear the stamp of genius, and which will live in men's memories; he ransacks periodicals to keep himself well up to the discoveries of his age, and compares them with those of ages past; he is greedy of all works which treat of libraries, particularly catalogues, when they are well constructed and well arranged, and their price adds to their value. Such is the genuine Bibliographe." This, adds Burton, reminds one of the old Roman jurists, who briefly defined their own science as the knowledge of things human and divine.

* * *

OF book collectors Burton writes with enthusiasm. He smiles at their eccentricities, but does it in such a sort that one sees he loves the whole tribe, from the highest to the lowest. He divides them into "the black-letter man, the tall copyist, the uncut man, the Early English dramatist, the Elzevirian, the broadsider, the pasquinader, the old-brown-calf man, the Grangerite, the tawny-moroccoite, the gilt-topper, the marble-insider, and the editio-princeps man," as to the objects sought, while as to the manner of pursuit, he adopts the effective and comprehensive division into the private prowler and the auction haunter. Each of the latter methods, he tells us, has its merits, and calls for its special qualities and sacrifices. "The one demands placidity, patience, caution, plausability, and unwearied industry. . . . The auction-room, on the other hand, calls forth courage, promptness, and the spirit of adventure. There is wild work sometimes there, and men find themselves carried off by enthusiasm and competition towards pecuniary sacrifices which at the threshold of the temple they had solemnly vowed to themselves to eschew." Burton's book is, of course, familiar to all seasoned book-hunters. Those of a younger generation should be grateful to Messrs. Routledge for issuing it in this cheap form.

* * *

How far the trade in second-hand books is injured by the many cheap series now on the market is a question difficult to answer. We are inclined to believe that, apart from fiction, the average reader likes to have his books in good editions, even if he first makes their acquaintance in a cheap series. In the meantime, publishers keep on bringing out fresh series. The latest to be announced, Nelson's Shilling Library, is a remarkable enterprise. A few years ago Messrs. Nelson started a library of sixpenny classics, which met with great success. This was followed by a series of copyright novels at sevenpence, which is enjoying a huge circulation. The new series, the first volumes of which will be published in October, will consist of copyright works other than fiction, and among the early volumes there are Dean Hole's "Memories," "The Life of Dean Stanley," by Mr. Rowland E. Prothero; "The Life of Gladstone," by Mr. Herbert Paul; "Scrambles Amongst the Alps," by Mr. Edward Whymper; "Collections and Recollections," by Mr. G. W. E. Russell; and "The Life of Sir John Nicholson," by Colonel L. J. Trotter. Any of these will be excellent value for a shilling.

* * *

DURING the autumn Messrs. Chatto & Windus will publish "Notes on the Science of Picture Making," by Mr. C. J. Holmes, the Slade Professor of Fine Art at Oxford, and one of the most brilliant of the younger school of art critics in this country. The book is described as a practical manual of the tradition of good painting in the past and of its possibilities in the future. Mr. Holmes has been led to write the book owing to the dearth of works intended to assist the young artist at the critical time when his formal training has just ended. The same publishers, who have during recent years given special attention to books for children, announce two new volumes that are likely to be welcomed in the nursery and the play-room, "Anne's Terrible Good Nature and Other Stories," by Mr. E. V. Lucas, and "Margery Redford and Her Friends," by Mrs. M. H. Spielmann. Mr. Lucas has already given proof of his ability to write an excellent tale for children.

* * *

A NEW novel by Maxim Gorki has just been announced. It is called "The Soldiers," and describes the life of a Russian soldier during the Japanese War and the revolutionary movement.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"An Autobiography." By Herbert Spencer. Cheaper Edition. (Williams & Norgate. 2 vols. 12s. 6d. net.)

"By the Roman Wall: Notes on a Summer Holiday." By Maria A. Hoyer. (Nutt. 2s. 6d. net.)

"The Forewarners." By Giovanni Cena. Translated by O. A. Rossetti. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

"L'Intellectualisme de Saint Thomas." Par P. Rousselot. Collection Historique des Grands Philosophes. (Paris: Alcan. 6 fr.)

"En Allemagne: De Hambourg aux Marches de Pologne." Par Jules Huret. (Paris: Fasquelle. 3 fr. 50.)

"L'Eté de Guillemette" Roman. Par Henri Ardel. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 3 fr. 50.)

Reviews.

A NEW HISTORICAL METHOD.*

Of the ability and industry of Dr. Reich there can be no doubt. His literary fecundity is marvellous; and his vivacity and unconventional habits of thought must be admired even by those who cannot accept his methods of historical inquiry. The present work has evidently cost the author much thought and labor, and in many parts it is stimulating and interesting. But, like many of his generation, Dr. Reich seems to work too hastily, and he cares too little for finish of style and art of arrangement. He has such a passion for historic discovery that he shows a dangerous contempt for the artistic marshalling of materials. His second volume seems to us much better than his first, and we cannot help thinking that if he had given two volumes to Roman history, and elaborated his work, he would have been surer of permanent recognition.

Dr. Reich is avowedly revolutionary in his historical methods, and his ambition is to do for history what Bopp did for philology or Savigny for jurisprudence. He must not complain if his performance is judged by the standard of his ideal. Such a conception of one's mission, of course, demands that the methods of predecessors shall be severely scrutinised. The possession of the true faith logically involves the extirpation of heresy. And Dr. Reich has dealt faithfully with the "philological historians" who have vainly imagined that the secret of the past must be read by painful scrutiny of its remains rather than by daring intuition. Maintaining, with excellent judgment, that there is no science of history, Dr. Reich claims the discovery of certain "indirect methods," supplementing our "poor sources," a cultivated divination, a penetrating perception of great "psychological laws" which may, apart from direct evidence, enable the gifted student to reach assured and, we may add, sometimes astounding results. But the neophyte who enters on this most fascinating line of inquiry must divest himself of many old superstitions of learned history. He must train himself to take wide views, and for that purpose he should have lived in many lands and got to the heart of their social and civic life. Antiquity can only be interpreted by the man who has found a key to its mysteries in the analogies or contests of modern Europe and America. Dr. Reich, perhaps, is not sufficiently alive to the dangers of such analogies; and, although Gibbon and Grote may have been helped in their practical experience, it seems a strong thing to rate the opinion of Napoleon I. on "the historicity of Lycurgus" above that of the mass of German scholars.

With such a conception of a new way of writing history, it is little wonder, perhaps, that Dr. Reich should devote so much space to exalting the discovery. Yet one cannot help feeling that, in the first volume at least, dissertations on method tend to overshadow historic narrative. He seems to regard the dissertation as more important than the narrative; and, in fact, he appears to be sometimes giving us a monograph to illustrate his theory of method. The result cannot be regarded as happy. We constantly get fragments of history imbedded in rather fanciful searches for "psychological causes" and "correlations," ancient and modern, combined with amusing vituperation of those who have not the author's clue. The reader will learn quite as much of the psychology of Dr. Reich as he will of the "history of the Western nations." It might be suspected that he is more intent on impressing us with the magical powers of his method than on giving us an orderly survey of his great subject. And it is startling to hear that "the study of direct sources" is not the true work of the historian, though Dr. Reich, to do him justice, often violates his own precept. It is not research and acumen in weighing evidence, but comprehensive ideas, the power of throwing out "great historic reconstructions" which make a master of the craft.

This conception of history leads often to startling results. The author tells us that he spent twelve years on the problem of Lycurgus. And this section occupies one quarter of a volume of 500 pages! Its justification is that it is the crowning illustration of Dr. Reich's method. He demonstrates by his "indirect processes" the "psychological" necessity of Lycurgus to account for a system like the Spartan. And he is also enabled to develop his theory of "music" States, whose citizens move in an unerring rhythm. We also have a rather imaginative recovery of the "sources" of the Messenian wars by methods which, if generally applied, would pleasurably extend the area of history. Yet for any real conception of the working of the Spartan constitution, of the fascination which it exercised even on Aristotle and Plato, of the grey barrack life which went on monotonously for centuries on the Eurotas, we must go to the despised pedants who were content to study their sources. In the same way our author disdains to treat in detail other important fields. Draco's legislation is dismissed in a couple of not very illuminating lines. The great reforms of Cleisthenes are described as "gerrymandering" the Demes. The artistic glories of the time of Pericles hardly occupy a page; the building up of the Athenian Empire about the same. Four pages are crowded with a hurried sketch of the Peloponnesian war. The great interest of Greek art seems to lie in its origines. The power and glamour of the old homes of prophecy, of Dodona, Abæ, and Delphi are never described. The oracles are treated as a machinery invented to curb the ambition of exuberant personality in "music" States. Such a theory is enough to make Plutarch turn in his tomb. The great Tyrants, who played such a brilliant part in the development of Hellenic culture, at Samos and Athens, at Corinth, Megara, or Sicyon, are barely referred to. A section of two pages is all the space Dr. Reich can afford to the colonial expansion of Greece, which diffused and added fresh brilliance to her culture from the sea of Azof to the mouth of the Rhone, and the magical power of Greek legend and religion in moulding and consecrating the primeval State, in penetrating with creative impulse all Greek literature and art, in its lingering charm on the religious imagination down to the last Neoplatonist votaries of Eleusis, passes strangely unnoticed.

Dr. Reich truly says that the historian should not be a mere passive vehicle for transmitting the record of the past. The dull transcript of "sources," without effort of reflection or imagination to give life and movement to the story, however it may pose as scientific, is a mere bloodless ghost of history, which would have moved the scorn of Thucydides, Tacitus, or Gibbon. On the other hand, to maintain that the chief business of the historian is the discovery of "correlations" of great facts by "psychological" and "indirect" methods, or by means of fanciful modern analogies, shows a complete misconception of his office. He will, indeed, seek for the sources of institutions, so far as his evidence permits; but most certainly history is not a frenzied effort to explain institutions or events by means of "psychological" guesses, masquerading as scientific hypotheses. To claim objective certainty for fantastic solutions of problems often insoluble, and to hurl anathemas at the doubter, is to introduce the methods of the Vatican into the domain of scholarship.

History, in fact, in Dr. Reich's hands, becomes a mystery, of which he is the sole exegetes. One key to it is "Caphalism"; without that mystic clue Mommsen, it appears, failed to penetrate to the "psychological" root of Roman institutions. The Greek city State was not evolved from rudimentary forms: it was a work of art, the creation of one man, a "musical" product called forth by the necessities of age-long struggles with great powers in the Ægean. The student must master the distinction between "music" and "apotelestic" States. And yet the distinction seems troublesome even to its discoverer. For, although all Greek States are "music" States, it appears that Athens, as compared with Sparta, was "apotelestic." And we have a hard nut to crack in the impressive formula, "Athens worked for symmetry and Sparta for rhythm." It is also startling to find that Hebrew Monotheism was the result of fierce conflicts with inland powers. Alcibiades would have been astonished to hear that, in urging on the Sicilian expedition, he was continuing the policy of Pericles; and the author of the Phædo might have forgotten his urbanity if he had been told that Socrates made a mistake in not devoting himself to politics. It is gratifying to learn that a study of the English polity will teach us more than Thucydides of the Periclean régime. The study of modern England has certainly taught Dr. Reich some curious things about England herself. The "rhythm" of our system—for we are a "music" State—accounts for the excellence of our poetry. Our public schools are the source of our national love of inductive reasoning. High emotional drama, in spite of our Spartan discipline, is impossible in England, because English nerve cannot bear its tension.

* "General History of Western Nations." By Emil Reich. Macmillan. Two Vols. 15s. net each.

In preparing a second edition of his interesting work the author should banish such unpleasing forms as Lybiaus, Japygi, Merminadas, Eurypontidæ, Clytidæ, Lebadia, Alendæ, Helimus.

SAMUEL DILL.

THROUGH FELLOWSHIP TO FAITH.*

THE volume under review is a popular handbook in the philosophy of religion—a guide in our quest for God, taking the real nature of personality, human and divine, as a clue.

No disparagement is intended in using the word "popular." Huxley did not disdain to write a school book on physiography, Spencer a manual on the study of sociology, and S. R. Gardiner a history of England for those who aspire to matriculation. So we welcome from a professor of psychology a manual on the central mysteries of the soul, brief and untechnical, true so far as it goes, and preserved from error through its author's familiarity with a wider field. Some who would not read John Caird may find here the substance of such books as "The Fundamental Ideas of Christianity" freshly re-stated.

Some of its rather dashing style is, doubtless, American; we are not able to forget that the author comes from that New England, whose stimulating air seems to breed optimists—wise and foolish—from Emerson and Whittier, Longfellow and Holmes, down (if the masters will forgive it) to Mary Baker Eddy, and all forms of "New Thought." This book has their capacity for ready generalisation. They do not seemed to be plagued as other men are, these thinkers who summer by the beaches of Maine. It would, for instance, require a knowledge given to few to feel oneself really warranted in saying, as it is said here, that "In no age in human history have men been so urgent and insistent with questions on the nature and purposes of God." We have heard the same thing stated of several other ages, such as the first century, or the thirteenth, or the seventeenth. There is also a fearless habit of ignoring the time-honoured "parts of speech." Professor Jones uses "mid air" as an adverb, "childhood" and "automaton" as adjectives, and "spite" as a preposition; and it cannot be denied that these liberties give a certain incisiveness to the style, which is, after all, what a teacher most needs. There are certain other Americanisms, such as "belongs in" and "back of," and there are a few inaccurate quotations. Tennyson wrote "drew (not comes) from out the boundless deep," and Browning, when his Rabbi Ben Ezra asked:

> "Thy body at its best,
> How far can that project thy soul on its lone way?"

looked for the opposite answer from that for which it is used in the text; he meant that the body could not project the soul far. "Truth deep seated in his mystic frame" is not in "In Memoriam," either in word or in meaning.

But a book so good should not miss on minor counts its well-deserved praise. Its teaching that personality is meaningless in isolation, and that society and communion are vital to it, the beautiful and winning description of the way to God by one who has trodden that way, may be of untold value to many an inquirer; the sincerity of the author, his happy gift of vivid phrase, above all, the soundness of his thought, leave a reader grateful and convinced.

Like a wise lecturer, Professor Jones begins each chapter on a stimulating note, which at once catches the reader's interest. Sometimes the teacher's desire for emphasis tends to over-statement. The author wishes to say that outward "nature" only really exists through the social consciousness, and is not thinkable apart from it. He says, "Destroy the social fabric, and all that we now call nature would vanish like a shadow when the object which causes it is gone. . . The world of order, law, and beauty is not something which exists apart, something which is there before consciousness." The meaning is correct and quite simple, but it would have been better to say that the order, law, and beauty of the world would have been unperceived but for man, and are mental attributes, not that the world would have vanished and been unperceivable.

The argument of the book finally leads us to Christianity in its mystical form, where the ship of the soul rides freely and easily at anchor, not unmoved nor fixed in stillness, but secure on the wave, because the anchor grapples the firm rock of the nature of things. There is a well-drawn distinction between "negative and affirmative mystics"; between those who, in the presence of the Eternal, ignore or despise the temporal, and those who find in the temporal the Eternal; between the hermit ascetic and the practical saint. This is a distinction often forgotten, and seldom so clearly defined. It is more plainly and simply put here than by Edward Caird in his treatment of the same subject in the "Evolution of Religion." In thus clearing out of the way every external authority purporting to save the believer the trouble and risk of finding the truth, Dr. Jones has naturally to inquire what are the tests to apply to spiritual guidance. His treatment is full of common sense and caution, but it would have been well to confess a little more clearly that in the end there are no infallible tests, that infallibility does not exist in a world of human beings, even though we do our best to test our impulses by the consensus of all good men.

Only a cautious supplementary use is made of telepathy, in which, however, the author believes. A generation hence it may prove the strongest line of argument for one who is pleading for the spiritual unity of the race, and for a spiritual consciousness at the back of the universe. If personalities have no meaning in isolation, and if the union of man with God is realised through human fellowship, what can be more reassuring than experimental path-finding in the unseen? When the murder of Mr. Perceval in the corridor of the House of Commons was seen in Cornwall by an entire stranger, we have an inkling of some knowledge on the tablets of a common mind, if not of some personal message or messenger.

On the lines of this book there is an assured future for religion. Once lead a man to feel that in the merging of personal interests in those of others we are joining ourselves to God in a life at once human and divine, he enters on an experience which solves in practice every theological puzzle that he cares about. We may use many metaphors. We may liken humanity to blossoms on a tree, receiving from the tree its life and its constant nourishment, and handing back to the tree the produce of its flower-like activity, and to the forest of trees the seeds of the future, whilst all the time preserving a real and fragrant individuality. Or we may regard it as a note in an organ, which must only sound when it is wanted as part of the harmony, and only causes confusion if it acts in wayward and individual fashion. Or we may liken it to electric lamps run from a central power station, and showing, in lovely diversity, a manifestation of the same current. Or we may follow Wordsworth in his "Ode to Duty," and liken ourselves to satellites, which do not break the cosmic order or set off on a wandering path lost in space:—

> "Thou dost preserve the stars from wrong,
> And the most ancient heavens through thee are fresh and strong."

But, naturally, the metaphors from living things come the nearest in their likeness to the life divine.

* "Social Law in the Spiritual World." By Rufus M. Jones, M.A., D.Litt., Professor of Philosophy in Haverford College, U.S.A. Headley Bros. Cheap edition, 2s. 6d.

THE "COMPLETE" THIS OR THAT.*

There are certain sports and certain pastimes upon each of which someone or another might conceivably write a complete book. Golf, Cricket, Mountaineering, and Photography are examples. An intelligent man might possibly master any of these subjects. Certain other sports and certain other pastimes are not nearly so amenable. Take Angling. On that craft two gentlemen, one ancient and the other modern, have written professedly complete discourses; but the work of the ancient is out of date, and that of the modern is ridiculous. The man who can truthfully describe himself as being a Complete Angler never has been, is not, and never will be. That is because there are so many fish in season simultaneously. To understand one fish, such as the brown trout, you have to pursue him daily for three or four seasons; and you have to test his habits with many lures, to know the dates upon which each of two or three hundred flies is due, and to be skilled in the subtle effects of weather. If you are to be expert in all this, how are you to become equally learned about the salmon and the sea-trout, the seasons of which are concurrent with those of the brown trout? With the coming of autumn the difficulty increases. Grayling, jack, perch, and other fish are in season during autumn and winter; you cannot study all of them at once; therefore, should you essay to expound in a single volume the art of capturing them all, you are bound to make many a blunder.

Our chief grievance is over Mr. Teasdale-Buckell. Other gentlemen having, at Messrs. Methuen's invitation, written complete books on the subjects we mentioned at the beginning, he has continued the series by a book called "The Complete Shot." We regard it with dubiety, but more in sorrow than in anger. No man is entitled to call himself a complete shot. How, then, can any man write a book which would justify the name? The task is impossible. This is painfully evident on noticing, for example, that Deer in Scotland are dismissed in a chapter of three pages. If Mr. Teasdale-Buckell had known as much about deer as he knows about certain subjects, he would, we may be sure, have written about them with similar or at least proportionate fulness. There are other respects in which, obviously for the same reason, the work is scrappy. We think of Mr. Teasdale-Buckell's failure in the attempt to justify the publisher's title with real sympathy. He is not a graceful writer, and sometimes we come upon a phrase, such as "extremely moderate," which indicates a lack of interest in words; but he has great knowledge of dogs, guns, the theory of shooting, grouse, partridges, and pheasants, and, as is especially shown in the chapter on grouse, he is an original and acute thinker on the national history of those birds and beasts with which he is thoroughly acquainted. Within his proper domain Mr. Teasdale-Buckell is instructive and highly interesting, and, happily, his proper domain is much the greater part of his subject-matter.

THE LAND OF INVASIONS.†

A good summary of Indian history as a whole was a thing much wanted, and anyone who has ventured on such a task deserves well of the country. The history of India has been written in detachments. You must go to the Sanscrit scholars and to Mr. Vincent Smith for its early history. You must still go to James Mill (whom Mrs. Steel calls John Mill) and Elphinstone for the greater part of the middle history, antiquated and dreary as their works may seem. For the British occupation there are plenty of authorities, but nearly all of them are devoted to special episodes or particular sides of the main question, such as Clive, Warren Hastings, the Mutiny, the frontier wars, the land question, or industrial development. Outside the "Gazetteer of India" and Sir William Hunter's other work it has been difficult to obtain an insight into Indian history through the ages, from the traditional invasion of the Aryans down to such a recent point as the Mutiny. That is what Mrs. Steel has attempted to give in one small volume, and the mere attempt would prove her courage.

There could be few more difficult and less grateful tasks. One of the strangest things about India is that, though she has been always unhappy, she has had no history. From first to last she has produced hardly any history of her own. Nearly all that we know about her past must be inferred from her sacred books, or snatched from fragments of Greek visitors, or from Chinese notebooks, or from the chronicles of Mohammedan and English conquerors.

The Indian proper seems to have been always incapable of history, perhaps because he is indifferent to time. If you ask a Hindu villager about age, the answer will probably be, "Many years, many years," whether it is his own age or the age of some immemorial ruin. Nor can we wonder that the dates of Indian history are lost in the vagueness of a dream, when the whole existence of this world is to them only the beating of a pulse in eternity. But for Alexander's invasion, and Asoka's columns, and a few traveller's notes, we know hardly anything about India in the ordinary course of history till Islam began to creep or sweep into it from the north-west, about the time of our Norman conquest, and even after that we know little but episodes.

Mrs. Steel has made the best possible use of the little that there is. She has diligently compiled from the works of all the best historians who have treated of the various ages, and almost the only fault one could find with the result is the omission of her authorities. If in another edition she would give us a list of the writers whom she has used or would recommend for each of the main periods, she would raise the value of her own book for everyone who wants to take so important a subject seriously. The thing could easily be done without interfering with the text. The other fault we would find is that the style is often rather romantic, exclamatory, or interrogative. We know it is done to make the book interesting, but we do not really gain by the conjecture that "Princess Fortunata's kisses must have been sweet that night," or by the comment:—

> "Harsha offered daily to the sun a bunch of red lotuses set in a pure vessel of ruby, and tinged, like his own heart, with the same hue. Could Oscar Wilde have done more? Strange, indeed, how the cycles of culture come round and round."

It is not necessary; but in spite of these little graces, so natural in one of the best story-tellers of the day, Mrs. Steel succeeds. In 360 pages she has succeeded in composing a genuinely interesting history of India, and we believe that no one else has done anything like it. There have been hardly half-a-dozen exceptions to the rule that, as soon as a writer touches the fascinating theme of India, he becomes dull; and this dulness is especially surprising among the historians, though, apparently, we must forgive it in economists. Whether it is that most of the historians have been blunted by a life of routine, or have treated the subject as something too remote from common interest, or have been overwhelmed both by its vastness and obscurity, we cannot say. It has been so, and only now has a writer come with the intention and power of breaking the spell of dreariness.

ROMANCE AS IT IS WRITTEN.*

It is one of Ireland's minor misfortunes that she has never produced a great historical novelist, a genius who could bring home to us the drama of her national life. Every page of her history has the picturesqueness of ill-fortune. And not only Catholic Ireland was brought low by the turns of the wheel of civil strife, but large bodies of her conquerors also, Norman lords, Elizabethan planters, Royalists, Huguenot immigrants, even Cromwellian settlers, were ruined by the ups and downs of England's policy. It is, however, unreasonable to ask that a country so unsettled as Ireland, and shorn time after time of its natural leaders, should have given birth to the unifying genius of a Walter Scott, and the careers of Goldsmith, Sheridan, and Burke all demonstrate that the opportunity of Irish talent

---

* "The Complete Shot." By G. T. Teasdale-Buckell. With Fifty-three Illustrations. Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.

† "India Through the Ages: A Popular and Picturesque History of Hindustan." By Flora Annie Steel. Routledge. 4s. 6d.

* "The Wild Geese." By Stanley J. Weyman. Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.

STORIES FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

JUST READY AT THE BOOKSHOPS.

A NEW, WONDERFULLY CHEAP POPULAR EDITION.

JOSEPH HOCKING'S
CHARIOTS OF THE LORD.

1s. net. 426 pages. Readable type. Crown 8vo, Illustrated, stiff paper cover.

"It grips the reader."—Daily News.
"Will be keenly relished."—Christian World.
"A fine swinging tale."—Morning Leader.
"It has a charming heroine."—Daily Telegraph.
"A rattling good story."—Scotsman.
"Not a dull page."—Dublin Express.

1/- NET.

A NEW, CHEAP, CLEAR TYPE, POPULAR EDITION.

SILAS K. HOCKING'S
THE AWAKENING OF ANTHONY WEIR.

1s. net. 432 pages. Crown 8vo, Illustrated, stiff paper cover.

"A true and telling account of the earthquakes and storms through which God brings many a man to his true life."—Life of Faith.

"Rachel's love-idyll is a pretty episode in the tale."—Record.

"The best story which Mr. Hocking has written for many a day."—Contemporary Review.

"From beginning to end the book holds the reader.'—Liverpool Courier.

1/- NET.

EYE-OPENING BOOKS.

A Series of Books on the Wonders of NATURE, Popularly Written and Scientifically Accurate.

ADVENTURES IN BIRD-LAND.

A Book for Boys. By OLIVER G. PIKE, Author of "Home Life in Bird-Land," "Woodland, Field, and Shore," &c. With 90 Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Author, and 100 Pen-Sketches by E. RICHMOND PATON. Cloth gilt, demy 8vo, 6s. net.

Just Ready.]

THE BOY'S OWN NATURE BOOK.

By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S., M.B.O.U., With an Introduction by the Hon. Sir JOHN COCKBURN, K.C.M.G., M.D. (late Prime Minister of South Australia.) With two folded Colored Plates, a Colored Frontispiece, and 64 Plates, containing over 150 Pictures reproduced from photographs taken direct from Nature by the Rev. S. N. SEDGWICK, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"Young readers of Mr. Westell's previous works will nevertheless find this, his latest book, full of quite new things."—County Gentleman.

"A charming book."—Sheffield Telegraph.

"Mr. Westell makes wonderfully plain what even very young people may learn in country wanderings by the careful use of eyes and ears."—Scotsman.

"The illustrations are excellent."—Morning Leader.

"Will give boys an increased interest in the things they see in fields and woods, or on the shore."—Daily Mail.

Recently issued by the same Author.]

EVERY BOY'S BOOK OF BRITISH NATURAL HISTORY.

A Reliable Guide to British Wild Life and Nature Photography. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

FIFTY-TWO NATURE RAMBLES.

A series of Open-Air Talks for Young People. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S., M.B.O.U., Author of "Every Boy's Book of Natural History," &c. With five Colored Plates from Drawings, and 100 other Illustrations from Photographs. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

New Edition. Just Ready.]

THE BROOK AND ITS BANKS.

By the late Rev. J. G. WOOD, M.A., Author of "The Handy Natural History," &c. With 16 full-page Plates and numerous Illustrations in the text. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

BY MEADOW, GROVE, AND STREAM.

An Introduction to Nature Study. By HENRY HILTON BROWN, F.E.S. With 2 folded Colored Plates, Photogravure Frontispiece, and 171 Figures in Black and White, from Original Drawings by the Author. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

Just Ready.]

GLEANINGS FROM THE FIELDS OF NATURE.

By EDWARD T. CONNOLD, F.Z.S., F.E.S. With an Introduction by DAVID ANDERSON-BERRY, M.D., F.R.S.E. With Photogravure Frontispiece and 24 pages of Plates from Photographs, Photo-micrographs, and Drawings by the Author. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, Medallion on Cover, 3s. 6d.

HOW TO STUDY WILD FLOWERS.

By Rev. GEORGE HENSLOW, M.A., F.L.S., &c., Author of "Plants of the Bible," New Edition, with 12 double-page Colored Plates and 57 other Illustrations. Cloth Gilt, with Colored Pictures on cover, 2s. 6d.

Published at 4, Bouverie Street, London, E.C.
AND SOLD BY ALL BOOKSELLERS.

FREE TRADE LITERATURE.

THE LIFE OF RICHARD COBDEN.

By LORD MORLEY. With a Photogravure Portrait from the original drawing by LOWES DICKINSON Jubilee Edition. Two vols., cloth, 7s. New Popular Edition, 1 vol., cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

FREE TRADE EDITION.—This Edition is specially suitable for propaganda purposes. In parts. 6d. each.

Speeches on Questions of Public Policy.

By RICHARD COBDEN. Edited by JOHN BRIGHT and JAMES E. THOROLD ROGERS. With a Preface by JAMES E. THOROLD ROGERS, and Appreciations by J. E. THOROLD ROGERS and GOLDWIN SMITH, and 2 Photogravure Portraits. Fifth Impression. 2 vols. Large crown 8vo, cloth (uniform with the Jubilee Edition of Morley's "Life of Cobden"), 7s.

THE RIGHT HON. LLOYD GEORGE in his speech at the meeting of the Universal Congress of Peace said:—"I was very interested to read one of the speeches of Richard Cobden delivered in 1853 at a peace meeting in Manchester. I advise you to read that speech. There is not an argument they advance about Germany now, that they did not advance about France then."

The Political Writings of Richard Cobden.

New Edition. With Preface by LORD WELBY and Introductions by SIR LOUIS MALLETT and WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT. With Frontispieces. 2 vols. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s.

Richard Cobden and the Jubilee of Free Trade.

By P. LEROY BEAULIEU, HENRY DUNKLEY ("Verax"), DR. THEODOR BARTH, the RIGHT HON. LEONARD COURTNEY, M.P., and the RIGHT HON. CHARLES VILLIERS, M.P. With an Introduction by RICHARD GOWLING. Uniform in style with the Jubilee Edition of "Richard Cobden." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

British Industries Under Free Trade.

Essays by various writers. Edited by HAROLD COX. Large crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE HUNGRY FORTIES.

An account of Life under the Bread Tax, from the letters of living witnesses. Edited by MRS. COBDEN UNWIN. Illustrated. 3s. 6d.

NOTE.—An Edition in Paper Covers specially prepared for propaganda purposes is issued at 6d. Special quotations for large quantities.

Please write for a copy of Mr. FISHER UNWIN'S complete Catalogue, containing particulars of many other important books on Free Trade. Sent post free to any address.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

1s. NET. AUGUST NUMBER READY. 1s. NET.

THE INTERNATIONAL

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS:

THE TECHNICAL AGE. By DR. RODOLPHE BRODA.

THE PRESENT AND FUTURE OF AERIAL NAVIGATION. By J. LEDEBOER.

THE PROGRESS OF POLAR EXPLORATION. By DR. J. HENNING (Berlin).

RAILROAD REGULATION IN AMERICA. By CARL S. VROOMAN (New York).

BRUSSELS SUGAR CONVENTION. By DR. RODOLPHE BRODA.

PRESENT-DAY SLAVERY IN MEXICO. By CHARLES MALATO (Paris).

LABOUR CO-PARTNERSHIP. By F. MADDISON, M.P.

OLD AGE PENSIONS IN AUSTRALIA.

THE AIMS OF INDIAN ART. (Illustrated.)

THE DANGER OF WAR BETWEEN ITALY AND AUSTRIA. By F. TELLMAN.

EVOLUTIONARY VISTAS. By EMIL REICH.

Correspondents' Reports from France, Germany, Austria, Italy, America, India, The Far East, South Africa, etc., etc.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

lay outside Ireland. We fear, indeed, that, while Irish energy for so many centuries has been consumed in active political strife, expatriated, or enlisted in the service of England, we are not likely to see an Irish renaissance till a fresh departure is made with an era of self-government. And yet if Ireland had only produced a Balzac in the Famine period instead of a Lever to please the taste of English circulating libraries! But Ireland has ever been stronger in romanticists than in realists, and it is one of the crowning ironies of her literary history that the genius who has best exposed "the subordination of Irish institutions, Church, schools, manufactures, trade, commerce, ideas, traditions, and language to England's needs" should have been an Englishman—Swift.

The scene of Mr. Stanley Weyman's novel, "The Wild Geese," is laid in a remote quarter on the Kerry coast, and his period is 1718—a generation after the battle of the Boyne, when the Penal Laws were in full swing. What a subject are the Penal Laws for a patriotic Irish novelist of creative power, with historical insight and artistic instinct! The period when Swift was writing his "Modest Proposal," when the ditches were crammed with the dying, when the roads were filled with swarms of wandering, starving wretches, the dispossessed and beggared, when the food that saved the peasant from starvation was blood drawn from the cattle and mixed with bruised sorrel. A period when the Irish Catholic leaders had expatriated themselves in flocks, and when active recruiting in Ireland for the Spanish and French armies was carried on with the approval of the English Government! To get rid of the fighting men, and to ruin Irish industries and commerce, that was the policy of English statesmen that was to be answered two generations later by Irish Protestants and Catholics standing for the first time in line. In the hands of a realist of grim and courageous spirit this period—1718—might yield us a most sombre study. How has Mr. Stanley Weyman treated it? In the facile spirit of a hollow and mechanical romance, a spirit destitute of reality, genuine feeling, and imaginative grasp. There is nothing Irish in the novel, either in character or feeling, as might be expected from a method that essays to reproduce the ingenuity of Dumas without the salt of his freshness.

When the sloop of the French smuggler, Captain Augustin, runs into Skullhaven and lands Colonel John Sullivan, returned from long service in the Swedish army, and his close-tongued and discreet body-servant, William Bale, we recognise that the author is opening his romance with the regulation moves. Scott used the Odyssey, the "wanderer's return" motive, for all it was worth, and G. P. R. James and his school worked it to death. Colonel John, who, for the convenience of the plot, is made into a Protestant, has been appointed by old Sir Michael the guardian of the beautiful and spirited girl, Flavia McMurragh, with full powers over the estate, as the dying man has had good reason to distrust her cubbish brother, the McMurragh. We thus find, at the start, the machinery of the novel of intrigue in full swing. What we look for next is a "conspiracy," one of those futile and impossible little Jacobite conspiracies of stereotyped romance, with Flavia, as the queenly heroine, throwing herself into the arms of the smooth and calculating English villain, Asgill, whose design is to use her cubbish and weak brother as a catspaw to gain for himself the McMurragh estates and the queenly heroine. Of course, the motive of the quiet and resolute hero, Colonel John, who is destined to thwart the villain's game, must be misunderstood by the flashing-eyed Flavia, or there would be no intrigue à la Dumas, with cloaked figures, duels to the death, midnight whispers in oak galleries, counter-plots in the yew pleasaunce, &c. Mr. Stanley Weyman has too much experience in the concoction of popular romance to let Captain Augustin and his sloop, "The Cormorant," disappear over the horizon, for obviously the French sailors can lend a hand in abducting the leading conspirators, Monseigneur and the Spanish seaman, Admiral Cammock, when Colonel John unfolds his master stroke of counter-plot. A Spanish galleon, a sea-mist, an upset boat, a looming tower, where the Colonel is imprisoned for seventy hours without "water, food, or fire," with an engrossed deed of gift, which, of course, the heroic old soldier refuses to sign—all these are well-worn theatrical properties which are on loan one day from the author of "Prince Rupert of Hentzau" to Mr. Stanley Weyman, and vice versâ on the next. We can forgive our author the creation of the opera-bouffe Irish household of tradition, with the lazy, good-humoured Uncle Ulick, and old Darby, the butler, with his "Glory to God," and "True for you," and "Ay, sure," and the buckeens, and the beggars of Maristown, and the general garnishing that Lever used in his pictures of Anglo-Irish households, but we cannot forgive him his caricature of an Irish girl in the person of Flavia. In conception and in expression Flavia is the heroine of a shop-walker's dream—a fair creature constructed to thrill the imagination of a stockbroker's clerk. It is cruel of Mr. Stanley Weyman to plant this stereotyped piece of girlhood down in the West of Ireland, 1718. He should have kept her strictly for home consumption. We append a specimen page of her heroics with Colonel John:—

> Colonel John had adopted the wrong course with her. He had been hard—knowing men better than women—when he should have been mild; he had browbeaten where he should have forgiven. And so at his last declaration, "There must be an end," she rose to her feet and spoke. And speaking, she showed that neither the failure of her attempt on him, nor the bodily struggle with him, horribly as it humiliated her in the remembrance, had quelled her courage.
>
> "An end!" she said, in a voice vibrating with emotion. "Yes, but it will be an end for you! Children, are we? Well, better that, a thousand times better that, than be so old before our time, so cold of heart and cunning of head that there is naught real for us but that we touch and see, nothing high for us but that our words will be measuring, nothing worth risk but that we are safe to gain! Children, are we?" she continued, with deep passion. "But at least we believe! At least we own something higher than ourselves—a God, a Cause, a Country! At least we have not bartered all—all three and honour for a pittance of pay, fighting alike for right or wrong, betraying alike the right and wrong! Children? May be! But, God be thanked, we are warm, the blood runs in us——"
>
> "Flavia!"
>
> "I say the blood runs in us!" she repeated. "And if we are foolish, as you say, we are wiser yet than one"—she looked at him with a strange and almost awful steadfastness—"who in his wisdom thinks that a traitor can walk our Irish soil unharmed, or one go back and forth in safety who has ruined and shamed us! You have escaped my hand! But I know that all your boasted wisdom will not lengthen your life till the moon wanes!"
>
> He had tried to interrupt her once—eagerly, vividly, as one who would defend himself. He answered her now after another fashion: perhaps he had learnt his lesson. "If God wills," he said simply, "it will be so; it will be as you say. And the road will lie open to you. Only while I live, Flavia, whether I love this Irish soil or not, or my country, or my honour, the storm shall not break here, nor the house fall from which we spring!"
>
> "While you live!" she repeated, with a dreadful smile. "I tell you, I tell you," and she extended her hand towards him, "the winding-sheet is high upon your breast, and the salt dried that shall lie upon your heart."

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Laymen who take upon themselves to write seriously and persistently upon religious themes in this country have always to encounter a certain sub-current of suspicion, almost of resentment, in the public mind. We much doubt whether Mr. Gladstone's proclivity in this direction did not impair his political influence, and we are certain that the scientific reputation of Dr. Lodge is seriously endangered by it. It may be admitted that the method of theologising practised for so many years by Mr. Lilly is in form both less dogmatic and less argumentative than that of the other writers we have named, but we do not feel sure that his meandering culture would not have been more acceptable if it had run in any other channel. In most Englishmen there resides a matter-of-fact critic who says, "This fellow has been saying just this sort of thing in a dozen slightly different ways for the last twenty-five years: what does he mean by it?" This feeling is, no doubt, wholly unwarrantable, but it helps to account for the comparatively narrow circle of those who treat Mr. Lilly seriously as a contributor to modern thought. But certain special characteristics of Mr. Lilly's writings contribute to this estimate. The title, "Many Mansions" (Chapman & Hall, 12s. 6d. net) itself is an excellent one, as indicating both the matter and manner of this volume of comparative religion sentimentally rendered. After a long chapter,

READY IN AUGUST.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

HOLY ORDERS:

The Tragedy of a Quiet Life

By MARIE CORELLI

The demand for MAX PEMBERTON'S LOVE THE HARVESTER is so great that a Second Edition is ready. A Second Edition is also in preparation of THE EASY-GO-LUCKIES.

METHUEN'S POPULAR NOVELS.—6s. each.

NOVELS NOW READY.

SCARLET RUNNER	C. N. and A. M. Williamson
THE CROOKED WAY	William Le Queux
THE PASSION OF PAUL MARILLIER	Adeline Sergeant
HARDY-ON-THE-HILL	M. E. Francis
THE SURPRISING HUSBAND	Richard Marsh
LOVE THE HARVESTER	Max Pemberton
THE EASY-GO-LUCKIES	Maud Stepney Rawson
THE SONG OF HYACINTH	John Oxenham
A SET OF SIX	Joseph Conrad
THE RESULT OF AN ACCIDENT	Beatrice Whitby

FORTHCOMING IN AUGUST AND SEPTEMBER.

MR. APOLLO	Ford Madox Hueffer
ANTHONY CUTHBERT	Richard Bagot
CINDERELLA OF CANADA	Sara Jeannette Duncan
SPANISH GOLD	George A. Birmingham
HILL RISE	W. B. Maxwell
ARNOUL THE ENGLISHMAN	Francis Aveling
THE GREAT MISS DRIVER	Anthony Hope
MIRAGE	E. Temple Thurston
INTERPLAY	Beatrice Harraden
A DAUGHTER OF FRANCE	Constance Maud
THE HEART SMITER	Mary E. Mann
SALTHAVEN	W. W. Jacobs
OVER BEMERTON'S	E. V. Lucas
THE WIND IN THE REEDS	Kenneth Grahame
THE SPIRIT OF REVOLT	Philip Gibbs

A SUMMER TOUR IN FINLAND. By PAUL WAINEMAN. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by ALEXANDER FEDERLEY, and 16 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

Has recently completed a new tour of this country, from Helsingfors to Tornea, the most northerly town in Europe. During his trip the author collected a mass of personal impressions of the people, land and principal towns, from the wild scenery of the far north, where the peasant's hut is the most luxurious abode, to the old aristocratic homes in the south of Finland. The book is illustrated in water-colors by a well-known Finnish artist.

THE LORE OF THE HONEY BEE. By TICKNER EDWARDS. With 20 Illustrations from Original Photographs. Crown 8vo 6s.

This is a history of bees and their masters, from the very earliest times down to the present. The wonderful communal life within the hive is touched on in all its varying aspects; and the reader is introduced to a class of men from all ages as quaintly original as their calling is inimitably picturesque.

THE COMPLETE OARSMAN. By R. C. LEHMANN, M.P. With many Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"The book is copiously illustrated, and may fairly be said to be the best and most complete book on the subject."—Daily Mail.

"The volume contains the fruits of ripe experience, keen powers of observation, and the reflections of a master hand."—Sporting Life.

"Among the manuals of oarsmanship in our language there is not another so detailed or so helpfully done. It is a complete dissection of the art."—Outlook

THE YOUNG BOTANIST. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S., and C. S. COOPER, F.R.H.S. With 8 Coloured Plates, and 63 in Black-and-White, by C. F. NEWALL. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

In an original and concise manner the book sets out in tabular form full accounts of all the commoner British wild plants, their English and Latin names, where they grow and when they bloom, their form and structure, salient features, medicinal uses, &c.

JAMES II. AND HIS WIVES. By ALLAN FEA. With 40 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The writer (avoiding politics as far as possible) shows James as he was, with all his failings. Certainly his picturesque and dramatic surroundings, not to mention his misfortunes, make him one of the most interesting characters of the seventeenth century. The author gives the finest and most authentic portraits, many of which have not hitherto been reproduced.

THE ALPS IN NATURE AND HISTORY. By W. A. B. COOLIDGE, M.A. With 20 Illustrations and 9 Maps and Plans, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

In this book, by one of the chief authorities on the subject, the political history of the Alps is lightly told, and the story of their exploration given. The Alpine pastures, glaciers, and great passes are fully described, while separate sections deal with the beasts, the birds, and flowers.

"Those who know the Alps will welcome much knowledge tha makes the country more absorbing than ever, and newcomers will find the book delightfully illuminative."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Into this book the author who knows the Alps best has put the best of his knowledge."—Manchester Guardian.

THE REVOLT IN HINDUSTAN, 1857-1859. By Field-Marshal Sir EVELYN WOOD, V.C., G.C.B. With 8 Illustrations and 5 Maps, crown 8vo, 6s.

"Among shorter histories this will henceforth take the first place in popular esteem."—Times.

"Read this simple and restrained narrative, and reawaken your pride in the courage and resource of your countrymen."—Daily Mail.

THE CITY OF GENOA. By ROBERT W. CARDEN. With 12 Illustrations in Colour by WILLIAM PARKINSON, and 20 from Photographs, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This book sets out briefly the history, life, and art of a city about which very little has been written in the English language.

THE ROMANCE OF NORTHUMBERLAND. By A. G. BRADLEY, Author of "Round About Wiltshire." With 16 Illustrations in Color by FRANK SOUTHGATE, R.B.A., and 12 from Photographs, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

This is a full and interesting description of the more romantic parts of a romantic country, dealing with the Roman Wall, the great castles, the towns and villages full of historical interest, the famous valleys, and the marches so renowned in song and story.

"A model of what such a book ought to be . . . picturesque and attractive."—Yorkshire Post.

"Mr. Bradley has happily caught the characteristics of Northumbrian scenery—sombre, impressive, and romantic in association."—Standard.

A BOOK ABOUT YORKSHIRE. By J. S. FLETCHER. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by WAL PAGET and FRANK SOUTHGATE, R.B.A., and 12 from Photographs, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Without being in any sense a guide-book, "A Book About Yorkshire" gives readers a full account of the Three Ridings, of the places and scenery of most note within their borders, of the legendary lore, and of the chief historical monuments.

"It covers the wide world of things worth seeing and saying as well as a single volume could."—Athenæum.

"This is just the book that lovers of English country and old associations will delight in . . . ."—Spectator.

THE COURT OF RUSSIA IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. By E. A. BRAYLEY HODGETTS. With 20 Illustrations, 2 vols. demy 8vo, 24s. net.

"Very entertaining and never dull."—Times.

"May be warmly commended to the general reader."—Athenæum.

METHUEN and CO., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

mainly bibliographical, on "The Sacred Books of the East," we wander off into gracefully eclectic presentments of "messages" and "saintly" aspirations, in which the great religions of the world are brought into beautiful mysterious union as the diverse poetic renderings of one deep divine truth. Kant and Spinoza are worked (we had almost said "roped") in to give a sort of philosophic cement to the airy fabric, and after a somewhat bitter denunciation of the pessimism of Schopenhauer, we end upon a note of Catholic orthodoxy in a brief examination and rejection of the biblical criticism of Pfleiderer. Now, comparative religion is an immensely important and a comparatively new field of study, and it seems to us a great pity that it should be cultivated sentimentally before it has been explored scientifically. Mr. Lilly might have performed a valuable service as an intellectual middleman if he had carried into the rest of his book the expository spirit of the opening chapter. But, though he occasionally reverts to this method, he is nearly always lured away into a tone of ecstatic reflection or carried into a maze of literary recollections. So, for instance, after a stiff bit of straight-ahead statement of Spinoza's philosophy, we are told that "Dr. Flint is well warranted in saying 'His system is one of the most original which the history of philosophy presents,'" and for many pages we float from the authoritative dicta of one writer to another until the entire tide of jottings of this particular note-book is emptied out before us. Most of the volume is composed in this fashion. Many of the passages quoted are admirable reading; there is local order in their grouping, but there is no really intellectual attempt to support the notion of a study of comparative religions. Indeed, we never came rightly to understand what Mr. Lilly signifies by religion, though he dogmatises very confidently, and erroneously, about its origin when he says, "It is perfectly clear that the religious sentiment in man was first awakened by the great objects of nature, especially the sun." Just as little real instruction appertains to his view of the origin of dogmas, "Religions produce dogmas naturally, just as trees produce flowers and fruits." Somewhere or other in the volume we have all the hares, theological and philosophical, started for our hunting—none of them is run to earth. There is plenty of mixed learning, not ill put together, and all set in a somewhat saccharine quasi-liberalism, as if, after all, it was a volume of fly-papers to entice back wayward thinkers into the true fold of a Catholicism whose true history knows no toleration towards most of the men and creeds for whom Mr. Lilly manifests such exuberant sympathy.

* * *

Mr. Henry Salt's experiences "On Cumbrian and Cambrian Hills" (Fifield, 3s. 6d. net) are worth reading, in that they express very truly the spirit of the real mountain pilgrim. The latter must not be confounded either with the gymnastic mountaineer, whose sole obsession is rock-climbing, or with the unseeing and unthinking tourist who "does" a mountain by the easiest way up because he is told it is the thing to do; your true pilgrim is the nature-lover, who can appreciate the message and the mystery of the hills, and who is not specifically a climber or a non-climber. There is a difference between the physical features of Cambrian and Cumbrian hills. The grandeur of Snowdon and its neighbouring peaks impresses one more than any individual mountain in the Fells, where, to be appreciated, the mountains must be looked at collectively rather than singly. But both contain sufficient interest for the pilgrim who thoroughly explores them, and as an inducement to do so he could have nothing better than this little book, which tells him so eloquently of their features, their wild life, their sights and sounds. In a chapter entitled "Slag heap or Sanctuary?" Mr. Salt denounces the desecration of Snowdon by the Summit Hotel, the railway and copper mines, and pleads for the nationalisation or municipalisation of our famous hills. It is certainly an inconsistency on the part of the present public, which is prone to busy itself with the creation of new beauty-spots, that it should pay so little heed to the preservation of those that exist.

* * *

For the English or American visitor who crosses the Scottish Border Mr. Frank Roy Frapie has written a good guide-book to "The Castles and Keeps of Scotland" (Bell, 7s. 6d. net). He claims that his is the only hand-book on the subject, and by gathering together a great deal of material hitherto only to be found in a great many separate books, he has certainly done a useful service. His book is arranged in the form of an itinerary, so that the histories of the castles in each district are grouped together. Mr. Frapie is an American, and, like most of his countrymen, he is keenly alive to the romance of history as embodied in the "sundry fortresses, towers, peels, and other houses of strength built by the princes and barons of old time in the highlands, islands, inlands, and borders of the ancient and God-fearing kingdom of Scotland." There is a good index, which adds to the value of the book as a knapsack companion.

* * *

The latest volume in Messrs. Jack's "Romance of Empire" series bears the title "Outposts of Empire" (6s. net), and is written by Mr. John Lang. It deals chiefly with Gibraltar, Malta, and the British West Indies. Following the plan of the series, the book does not give a detailed history of any of these places, but its aim has been "to extract from their history a portion of the romance with which each is saturated." In this endeavour Mr. Lang is very successful. The sieges of Gibraltar are clearly and picturesquely described, while the accounts of different episodes upon the Spanish Main and the adventures of Morgan, the buccaneer, Admiral Benbow, Vernon, and Rodney will, we suppose, be enjoyed by the boy readers for whom the book is intended. There are twelve illustrations by Mr. J. R. Skelton, vigorous in composition though rather crude in coloring.

* * *

"The Babees Book" appears in the New Medieval Library (Chatto & Windus, 5s. net), and consists of a number of documents which Miss Edith Rickert has rendered into modern, or mainly modern, English from the early texts collected by Dr. J. J. Furnivall about forty years ago. It should be noted that the term "babee" signified not what we understand by a baby, but a child old enough to understand the maxims inscribed for his or her guidance in these curious prose and verse documents. From them there would appear to be a striking resemblance between the "good manners" of our forefathers and those commonly accepted by ourselves. It is an interesting fact that most of the English words denoting good manners are of French or Latin origin, while the few of Saxon origin are those which describe bad manners; the reason being that "politeness" was first learned out of French or Latin books. Miss Rickert has preserved a good deal of the quaintness of the original texts by her retention of archaisms, which, in several cases, moreover, have the merit of being more expressive than the modern form. A "giggelot," for instance, strikes one as a happy portmanteau phrase for a giggling girl. The seven illustrations are reproduced in photogravure from illuminations in contemporary MSS.

* * *

"The Nineteenth Century and After" for August opens with an article by Colonel Lonsdale Hale on "The Insecurity of Home Defence To-day." Colonel Hale is concerned at the knowledge which German officers have of English topography, and cites several examples of that knowledge. He speaks of the surprise of an Irish Catholic priest who found in Germany people who knew the large town which was his cure of souls quite as well as he himself did. According to Colonel Hale, "there is just now prevalent in the whole of the armed forces of this country a not unnatural feeling of military leaderlessness. They feel that the control of the military armed strength of the nation is in the hands of civilians only." Colonel Hale does not go so far as to demand that the Secretary of State for War should be a soldier, though his article points to the demand which shows an equal ignorance of the British Constitution and the temper of the British people. "The Roman Empire: A Lesson on the Effects of Free Trade," by Prince di Teano, reaches the conclusion that "Italy was ruined economically and abandoned by her inhabitants principally through the formation of the Roman Empire, and in consequence of the greatest experiment of Free Trade in the history of mankind." This is certainly a novel reading of history. Mr. S. M. Mitra traces the history of the Indian Press. He thinks that when other legislative

MISCELLANIES. (Fourth Series.)

By JOHN MORLEY.

Demy 8vo. 7s.6d. net.

Contains Papers on Machiavelli and Guicciardini. John Stuart Mill, and other Pieces.

The Government of England.

By Prof. A. LAWRENCE LOWELL. In 2 vols. 8vo. 17s. net.

Westminster Gazette:—"An Englishman has written what we believe is acknowledged in America to be the standard book about the institutions of the United States; and an American now returns the compliment by writing what bids fair to be the standard book for English readers about the Government of England. . . . We have only to say in conclusion that we have seldom met a book which is so full and varied in its knowledge and illustrations, and at the same time so suggestive and philosophical in its ideas and speculations."

The Eversley Tennyson.

Annotated by ALFRED, Lord TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM, Lord TENNYSON. In 9 vols. globe 8vo, 4s. net each. Vol. VII.—DEMETER, AND OTHER POEMS, Vol. VIII.—QUEEN MARY AND HAROLD.

Impressions of India.

By Sir HENRY CRAIK, K.C.B., M.P. Crown 8vo. 3s. net.

Standard:—"Contain not only a pleasantly written account of his travels, but also many remarkably shrewd observations on various aspects of the present political situation."

NEW AND CHEAPER IMPRESSION.

Personal Narrative of a Year's Journey through Central and Eastern Arabia, 1862-63.

By WILLIAM GIFFORD PALGRAVE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

The Logic of Will.

A Study in Analogy. By HELEN WODEHOUSE, D. Phil. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

AUGUST NO. NOW READY.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, 16s.

THE REMINISCENCES OF LADY RANDOLPH CHURCHILL. IX.—A Visit to Japan in 1894. By MRS. GEORGE CORNWALLIS-WEST.

TO BUILD A FIRE. A Story. By JACK LONDON, Author of "The Call of the Wild," &c.

MY KITTENS. By CARMEN SYLVA (Queen of Roumania).

THE SPELL OF EGYPT: AS REVEALED IN ITS MOUNTAINS. IV. By ROBERT HICHENS.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

MACMILLAN & Co., LTD., LONDON.

ALBANY REVIEW. — AUGUST.

"The Country and the Lords," EDWARD JENKS; "The Revolt of Woman," HAROLD SPENDER; "Dante on the Baptism of Statius," A. W. VERRALL, Litt. D.; "From a Poor Man's House"—Concluded, STEPHEN REYNOLDS; "Invultation: A Study in Black Magic," JAMES HOOPER; "The Education of Young Birds," DOUGLAS DEWAR; "The Small Holdings Act in Operation," HUBERT BEAUMONT (Secretary of the Central Small Holdings Society); "Machiavellianism," G. LOWES DICKINSON; "Persia, Macedonia, and The Anglo-Russian Entente," W. A. MOORE; "The Poems of Mary Coleridge," F. MELIAN STAWELL; "At the Foot of the Scaffold: II." Mme. SAVINKOV (Translated by Mrs. Garnett). Current Events: Persia; Politics at Home; The Output of the Session; The Old Age Pensions Bill; The Prospects; The House of Lords; The Presidential Election in the United States.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO STREET, W.

WEATHER MYSTERY.

For information on the present mysterious weather phenomena, send 6½d. for the British Weather Chart and supplement. The recent afterglows, excessive heat-waves, violent thunderstorms, and remarkable barometric oscillations, akin to similar phenomena 25 years ago, in 1883, and also in 1859, point to a great Telluric Outburst in the Polar regions, connected with the Gegenschein.

London: R. MORGAN, Publisher, NORWOOD.

IS CIVILIZATION IN DANGER?

By RENÉ-L. GERARD.

SEE

HIBBERT JOURNAL

Single Numbers 2/6 net. 2/9 post free.

Other Contents of July Number—

Pluralism and Religion. By Prof. WILLIAM JAMES.

Science and the Purpose of Life. By Dr. FRIDTJOF NANSEN.

The Religionist and the Scientist. By the Rev. G. A. JOHNSTON ROSS.

"An Appeal to those at the Top"—and Something More. By SIR EDWARD RUSSELL.

The Right to Constrain Men for their Own Good. By PROF. W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE.

Religion and Our Schools. By Prof. JOHN DEWEY.

Enlightened Action the True Basis of Morality. By Prof. A. H. LLOYD.

The Romantic Element in the Ethics of Christ. By STANLEY GERALD DUNN.

The Problem of Immortality. By RUDOLF EUCKEN.

The Religion of the Sensible American. By President DAVID STARR JORDAN.

The Church of Scotland and Its Formula. By the Rev. A. J. CAMPBELL.

The Burden of Language in Religion: A Catholic Study. By W. J. WILLIAMS.

Discussions, Reviews, Bibliography of Recent Literature.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

Much Reduced Edition. Now Ready, 2 vols., cloth 12/6 net.

HERBERT SPENCER AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

From First Press Opinions.

"It is not to much to say that we close this book, the most interesting, and certainly one of the most important we have ever opened, feeling better, wiser, and humbler for having thus hastily read it."—Academy.

"It is a book for all men and for all time. The statesman, the inventor, the litterateur, the man of theory, and the man of practice will find alike, within the covers of these two massive volumes, an almost inexhaustible treasury of interest and constructive thought."—St. James's Gazette.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

attempts to control the utterances of the Press have failed it is difficult to be hopeful of success from the new law. In "Wordsworth, Coleridge, and the Spy" Mr. A. J. Eagleston tells the story of the curious report made to the Home Secretary in 1797 by a Dr. Lysons, of Bath, that some suspicious characters, believed to be foreign spies, had taken a house at Alfoxton, in the Quantock Hills. The detective who investigated the report wrote that "the House was taken for a Person of the name of Wordsworth," who was associated with a Mr. Coleridge, "reckoned a Man of superior Ability." The Abbé Dimnet writes on "The Neo-Royalist Movement in France," which he describes as "an intellectual rather than a political manifestation, but, as such, it has taken a development which can no longer be left unnoticed." Other articles of interest in the number are "Shakespeare and the Waterways of North Italy," by Sir Edward Sullivan; "French Canada and the Quebec Tercentenary," by Mr. Arthur Hawkes; "The Bastille," by Mrs. Frederic Harrison; and "A Workman's View of the Remedy for Unemployment," by Mr. James G. Hutchinson. Mr. Hutchinson regards the imposition of import duties on manufactured goods from over the sea as not within the range of practical politics, and declares that workmen like himself, who remember the old days of Protection, will not "even lift a finger to help to bring them back again." His remedy for unemployment is an economy of the outlay on drink, which would, if "wrested from the clutches of the trade that furnishes the lowest average of employment, and pays the least percentage in wages to its employees in accordance with the capital used in its business," and expended upon clothing, boots, &c., "be sufficient to pay a living wage of 30s. per week, or £78 per year, to 794,444 workmen, and afford them constant work all the year round."

* * *

Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace has place of honor in "The Contemporary Review" for an article on "The Present Position of Darwinism." He refutes the various attempts made to show that Darwin's explanation of organic evolution is an unsuccessful hypothesis, and urges that almost all students of Nature "have found in the theory of Darwin, in his many stimulating books, and in those of his friends and followers, the only intelligible clue to the mighty labyrinth of Nature." Mr. Harold Spender writes on "Next Year's Finance," calculating that the deficit next year will be £10,000,000, including £3,000,000 to £4,000,000 which will be required for the Navy. He discusses such means of taxation as land, graduation of income tax, a super-tax on incomes over £5,000, and licences. Finance is, in Mr. Spender's view, the field on which Liberalism will win victories again. "If the Liberal Party bring to bear on it some of the mingled daring and caution of the great masters of finance in the nineteenth century, they will have established firmly the foundation of progressive government for the twentieth." Mr. H. G. Wells explains his position in regard to Liberalism and Socialism in an article called "My Socialism." Bishop Montgomery sums up the results of the Pan-Anglican Congress, Mr. Stephen Paget and Mr. Stephen Coleridge continue their duel on "Experiments on Animals," and the author of "The Policy of the Pope" discusses "The Abbé Loisy and Modernism."

* * *

Prince Alfonso de Bourbon writes in "The Fortnightly Review" on "The Fight Against Duelling in Europe," and is able to show that the anti-duelling leagues have done remarkably good work during the past seven years. Professor Churton Collins's treatment of "The Literary Indebtedness of England to France" is an excellent piece of comparative criticism. Professor Collins points out that French influence on English letters is especially marked in the departments of epistolary literature, memoir-writing, aphorism, imaginary dialogue, criticism, and the delightful Ana literature. Mr. Angus Hamilton deals with "The Persian Crisis," and reaches the conclusions that Persia is not ready for constitutional government, and that the re-establishment of a modified autocracy, even if accompanied by increased taxation, would be generally acceptable. Mr. Robert S. Rait gives some recollections of David Masson, Mr. G. R. Askwith, in an excellent article on "Sweated Industries," shows how unconsidered are many of the objections to a minimum wage system.

The Week in the City.

The Movement of Leading Stocks.

	Price Friday Morning, July 31.		Price Friday Morning, Aug. 7.
Consols 2½ per cent.	86 1/16	...	86 7/16
German 3 per cent.	82½	...	83
London and North Western	132¾	...	134
Midland Def.	56¼	...	57
Union Pacific	157⅝	...	160
Canadian-Pacific...	175¾	...	175⅞

The news from Turkey has not been quite so reassuring the week, and there have not been many movements of prices. Consols have been weak, and the Home Railway Market has not been much stimulated by the news of the agreement between the London and North-Western and Midland Railways. Some lugubrious speeches have been contributed at brewery meetings, and it has been freely intimated to shareholders that they are in danger of being "ruined" if the Licensing Bill should pass. One of these concerns, which has a large amount of tied-house property, may be worth referring to. Before the Licensing Bill its ordinary shares dropped, in the course of a few years, from over 200 to about 40. Their price is now 20; but the shareholders were told they would be half-ruined if the Bill got through. This, I venture to say, on the authority of one who is quite conversant with the company, is more than absurd. The stock probably stands below its real value even on the assumption of the Bill passing. And in any case the really heavy loss was incurred long ago. To tell a man whose property has already fallen from £200 to £20 that he is in danger of being half-ruined is rather ridiculous, and speeches of this sort deserve to fall flatter than the stock.

The Railway Pool.

Another railway pool, which may be fraught with seri ous consequences to the trades of the North, has just been announced, and is officially confirmed. This is, of course, the agreement between the Midland and the London and North-Western. It is to be hoped that people will not invest money on the faith of this agreement, for it is very difficult indeed to see how any substantial economies can result except by a reduction of facilities which will injure traders and traffic. Moreover, it will be the duty of the Board of Trade and of Parliament to protect the public against the raising of fares and charges. These developments of railway policy will have to be closely watched. "Too long," writes one City journalist, "have reckless competition, absurd excursion fares, and unnecessary services of trains at competitive points held sway." Competition between the railway lines to the North has undoubtedly reduced freights and fares; and it is difficult to see why journalists should allow themselves to be enthusiastic about the creation of monopolies with a view to screwing up charges on traders and passengers. In Scotland the railway companies have just notified an arrangement for raising freight charges. It will be interesting to see what attitude will be adopted by the new President of the Board of Trade.

Anxiety About Brazil.

Well-informed people in the City are decidedly nervous about Brazilian finances. The Brazilian Agent in London has assured the Press that Brazil really wants the three battleships. If that be so, there is every likelihood of trouble; for the Argentines have already begun to make counter preparations. Even if the Brazilian Government's intentions are peaceful, this new embarrassment coming on the top of the Coffee valorisation scheme is bound to end in financial difficulties. Brazil, it must be remembered, is a very loose federation—so loose that in one of the States there is, it is said, a large German population which steadily refuses to pay taxes to the Rio officials.

Lucellum.

AN EXPLANATORY NOTE.

"SERVITUDE"

It is a matter of common knowledge that Miss IRENE OSGOOD, the authoress of "SERVITUDE" (of which the publishers, Messrs. Sisley, Makers of Beautiful Books, Charing Cross, W.C., are issuing the Fifth edition of 1,000 copies)) is offering TWENTY POUNDS in Three Prizes (£10, £6, £4) for the THREE BEST CRITICISMS of her new Novel—long or short, favourable, or the reverse—showing that the writers have read the book through, that may reach her publishers by August 30th from readers of the novel. Her action in inviting these criticisms from the public will be better understood when certain professional critiques of "SERVITUDE" are contrasted. What guidance is a writer who has resolved seriously to devote herself to the profession of letters to derive from opinion so conflicting, and is she not, under the circumstances, justified in asking her readers to draw her attention to the qualities in her work which have made it such an instantaneous and triumphant success, or to point out for her instruction any artistic blemishes which they may have detected?

For, while the "Morning Post" in a long review of the book remarked, "'Servitude' is really a very notable achievement in the creation of 'atmosphere,'" and concluded in the following terms, "The story of devotion and adventure which is pursued through these thrilling pages would in itself recommend the book to the lover of keen and vibrant romance, but the setting is of such unusual lustre and such 'curious workmanship' that the most lasting impression comes from it. 'Servitude' is a book which is likely to provide more than a nine days' wonder." The "Athenæum" stated that "Mr. Marmaduke Pickthall would have made something noteworthy of such stuff" (the scene, date, and action of Miss Osgood's novel), and adds: "Her hero, a mysterious British nobleman and ex-naval officer enslaved by the Moors, is little more than an altruistic punching machine: her heroine, Miss Betty Langridge" (there is no person of that name in Miss Osgood's book, but that by the way), "of Virginia, is a stock figure that sets the other figure a-punching. On p. 140 an Arab get a blow 'which caught him full on the kidneys.' The date of the story is 1815 or thereabouts, yet the low-comedy characters use recent Cockney slang, even so modern a catchword as 'What oh!'" (very frequent in the eighteenth century novels—also by the way) "enlivening their sallies." In the midst of her confusion comes a review from the "Dundee Advertiser," which says: "It is not difficult to understand why 'Servitude,' by Irene Osgood, has so soon run into its third edition" ("Servitude" is now in its 5th edition). "It is a book which was bound to be an instantaneous success. From the first sentence the reader's attention is gripped by the splendour of the author's imagination and the power with which she forces her ideas upon the mind. . . . It is a remarkable piece of work. The whole drama of life is given. . . . Every player enacts his part admirably, and the story is piloted towards its climax by the hand of a master writer. The book is a magnificent success for Irene Osgood." It is Miss Osgood's hope that her amateur reviewers will show in their critiques that, unlike the "Athenæum" reviewer, they have read her book, and that she may derive guidance and instruction from their papers. In the meanwhile, it may interest the public to read one amateur critique which reached her from a lady doctor—a stranger to her—who was not competing for one of the criticism prizes.

"Dear Madam," she writes, "I regret to say I have just come to the end of your book, 'Servitude.' That sounds somewhat ambiguous, I'm afraid. What I mean is that the book engrossed me so much that I hated to see myself coming gradually nearer and nearer to the end of it. Until I read this book, I always, without the slightest difficulty, named 'For the Term of His Natural Life' as my favourite novel, but I cannot say so now, unless I bracket together 'Servitude' and 'For the Term of His Natural Life.' You must forgive me for troubling you with this note, but I felt I wanted to thank you for the immense pleasure and interest I have received from your work. . . . You must have worked very, very hard. The more I think of it, the more wonderful I find it."

SERVITUDE (5th Edition) is obtainable at all Libraries and Booksellers, price 6/-

"SERVITUDE": Some not very sensible comment has been made in one or more journals on the fact that in the GLOSSARY appended to MISS IRENE OSGOOD'S novel, "SERVITUDE," certain very easy French words, which occur in the book, have been rendered into English. The reason of this was not to slight the intelligence of readers who know foreign languages, but to assist those who are totally ignorant of any tongue but their own. Of such people there are many thousands amongst the novel-reading classes, and no Glossary would be complete which did not contain all the foreign words in the book. How fully this opinion is justified is demonstrated by the reviewer of The Athenæum, who in ridiculing Miss Osgood's glossary points to "debris" as one of the words she superfluously includes. He ought, of course, to have written "débris." Now if her glossary can instruct the reviewer of such a journal as The Athenæum in correct French, how much more useful must it be to people of smaller linguistic pretensions!

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

THE CASE FOR FREE TRADE

is being pithily put from day to day in

"THE DAILY NEWS"

by

L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P.,

under the title

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE.

EVERY DAY ONE POINT.

All who wish to have ready to hand an apt reply for the Tariff Reformer should watch this series in

"THE DAILY NEWS"

daily.

Crown 8vo, pp. xxx. + 341, cloth extra, 5s. net; large paper, 10s. net.

CENTURIES OF MEDITATIONS

By THOMAS TRAHERNE.

Now first printed from the Original Manuscript.

"We doubt if there are any other 'Meditations' in existence which breathe such radiance and humanity, or which reveal a nature of more nobility and lovableness."—Observer.

"Mystic, poet and saint, as Mr. Dobell describes him, Traherne shows himself in these pages to be possessed of a very beautiful, almost lyrical style. The book is an addition to English literature."—Evening Standard.

"A new classic."—Morning Leader.

BERTRAM DOBELL, Charing Cross Road, London.

A NEW

"F.C.G." Froissart.

The "WESTMINSTER GAZETTE" is continuing at intervals throughout August, the publication of

"F.C.G.'S" MODERN FROISSART,

describing in quaint mediaeval phraseology and with illustrations founded upon fourteenth century examples, the principal political events from the end of 1902 up to and including the General Election of 1906.

The story of the events familiar to us all in our recent history will be told as if written by Sir John Froissart himself, and, although a good deal of humour is introduced both in the text and the pictures, the narrative will be an interesting record of actual events. The Weekly Editions* of will contain the chapters published during each current week. The first chapter appeared in the "Westminster Gazette" dated July 29th. Back numbers containing the series can be obtained on application to the Publisher.

The "WESTMINSTER GAZETTE"

* THE SATURDAY WESTMINSTER.

Offices: WESTMINSTER GAZETTE, Tudor St., London, E.C.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY of BIRMINGHAM.

FACULTY OF MEDICINE,

Associated with the General and Queen's Hospitals for Clinical Teaching.

SCHOOL OF DENTISTRY.

In conjunction with the Birmingham Dental Hospital.

THE WINTER SESSION OPENS OCTOBER 5TH, 1908.

The University grants Degrees in Medicine, Surgery, and Public Health, and a Diploma in Public Health; also Degrees and a Diploma in Dental Surgery.

The Courses of Instruction are arranged to meet the requirement of other Universities and Licensing Bodies.

For Prospectus and further information apply to—
GILBERT BARLING, M.Sc., F.R.C.S., Dean.

University of Manchester,

Chancellor—The Right Hon. the Viscount MORLEY of BLACKBURN, O.M.

Vice-Chancellor—ALFRED HOPKINSON, K.C., M.A., LL.D., B.C.L.

Registrar—EDWARD FIDDES, M.A.

Bursar—SYDNEY CHAFFERS, M.A.

The SESSION 1908-9 begins on the 6th October.

There are Eight Faculties in the University—Arts, Science, Law, Music, Commerce and Administration, Theology, Technology and Medicine—in all of which degrees are conferred. There are diplomas—Dentistry, Public Health, Veterinary, State Medicine, Engineering, Electrical Engineering, Mining, Applied Chemistry, and Technology. There are also a University Diploma and Certificate for Teachers. A large Training College, with Demonstration Schools, is associated with the University.

The Teaching Staff consists of 43 Professors and about 160 Lecturers, Assistants, and Demonstrators. A number of ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS are offered for competition annually in May.

There are special facilities for research, and Graduates of other Universities may study for research degrees, and are eligible for certain research Fellowships.

All degrees and all Departments of the University (except Engineering) are open to Women Students.

The Registrar will supply, on application, prospectuses of any of the above Faculties or of any of the following:—

Dental Department.
Department of Education.
Pharmaceutical Department.
Public Health Department.
Engineering Department.
Mining Department.
School of Architecture.
Fellowships, Scholarships, and Exhibitions.
Special, Popular, and Evening Courses.
University Extension Committee.
Advanced Studies in the Faculties of Arts and Science, and Technology.

The Examination Papers set at the last Entrance Scholarship Examination (price 6d.), those set at the last Degree and Diploma Examinations (price 1s.), and the University Calendar, 3s. (by post 3s. 5d.), may be obtained from Messrs. Sherratt & Hughes, 34, Cross-street, Manchester, and at 60, Chandos-street, London, W.C., or any bookseller.

BROMSGROVE SCHOOL, WORCESTERSHIRE.

AUTUMN TERM begins September 17th.

APPLY THE HEADMASTER.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

NEW BOYS ARRIVE SEPTEMBER 17TH, OTHERS 18TH.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

THE ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL.

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields; gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Next Term, Sept. 18th. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

BOOKSELLERS.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 93, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

[And at READING and GUILDFORD.]

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

BOOKS. BOOKS. BOOKS.

Rare and curious Books for the collector. First Editions. Court Memoirs Medical, Occult, &c. Out of Print Books and everything that's a book supplied. No matter when published. State wants. 100,000 books on sale. Catalogues free.

HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

BOOKS WANTED. First editions of all kinds. Sporting, Naval, Military Coloured Plates by Alken, Cruikshank, Rowlandson, and others. Special list of 3,000 wanted. LIBRARIES PURCHASED.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

TOURS.

£6 6s. LUCERNE TOUR.

Nine days. Short Sea Route. No extras for Conductor or Gratuities.

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D.

5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. 25, Cannon Street, E.C.
4, Charing Cross, S.W. 84, Piccadilly, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son, Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.

67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.

BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott. Prop.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

GREAT YARMOUTH.

HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor.

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop. J. E. Dowthwaite.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny. Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.

ROWNTREE'S CAFÉ, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Afternoon Teas, Tel. 647

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

ANDERSON ANDERSON & ANDERSON LTD.

CATALOGUE POST FREE

THE WATERPROOFERS. THE RUBBER HOUSE

ANDERSONS'

ANDERSON, ANDERSON & ANDERSON, Ltd.

53 GOLD MEDALS AND AWARDS.

GOLD MEDAL SHOOTING OUTFITS.

INDIA RUBBER, WATERPROOF and OILSKIN MANUFACTURERS.

NOTE OUR TRADE MARKS.

The "BREADALBANE" CAPE AND KILT.

WATERPROOF THIGH-KNEE LEGGINGS.
No. 16 .. 15/6
No. 10 .. 13/6

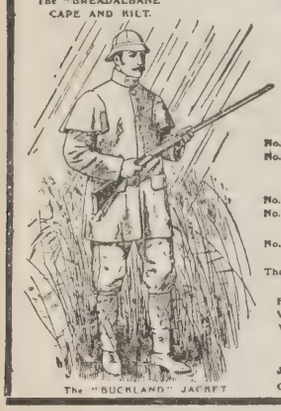
The SHOOTING INVERNESS.
Worn with Thigh-Knee Leggings forms an efficient Waterproof Shooting Costume.
No. 16 .. 70/6
No. 10 .. 47/6

SHOOTING INVERNESS.

The KNOCKABOUT HAT
No. 16 8/6
No. 10 7/6

The "ROUGHANTOUGH" GAMEKEEPERS' WATERPROOF
Very Strong and Tough. For Rough Work.
No. 6 Material:
Sizes 48 inches to 55 inches long, 42/-
Extra large, 44/6 47/-

The "ROUGHANTOUGH"



The "BUCKLAND" JACKET

The "BREADALBANE" SHOOTING COSTUME
(Cape and Kilt or Apron.)
Costume Complete:
No. 16.—Fawn Cashmere 70/-
No. 10.—Paramatta, lined Check ... 47/6
Separately:

Capes—	36	39	42	45 ins. long
No. 16 ..	35/-	37/-	39/-	41/-
No. 10 ..	23/9	25/-	26/3	27/6

Kilts—30, 33 and 36 ins. long.
No. 16 .. 35/- No. 10 .. 23/9

The "BUCKLAND" SHOOTING COATS AND JACKETS.
For Fishing, Shooting, General Wear. Well Ventilated, Storm Cuff and Fly. With Hooks to shorten into Jacket for Wading. Roomy Pockets for Cartridges.
JACKET 34 and 37 ins long .. 47/6
COAT 45. 50. 53. 56 " ... 57/6

The "BUCKLAND" COAT

DATALOGUES POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

ANDERSONS'

ANDERSON, ANDERSON & ANDERSON, Ltd.

GOLD MEDAL FISHING WATERPROOFS

RUBBER, WATERPROOF and OILSKIN MANUFACTURERS

THIRTY-ONE PRIZE MEDALS AND AWARDS.

The "BUCKLAND" JACKET. 47/6
Well Ventilated. Storm Cuffs and Fly. With Hooks to shorten to Semi-Jacket for Deep Wading, preventing draggling in Water. 34 in. and 37 in. long.

The LADIES' "BUCKLAND."
Dark Fawn Fishing Costume.
Jacket 47/6
Skirt 31/6
Gaiters 6/11

The "BUCKLAND" COAT. 57/6
For Fishing, Shooting, General Wear.
Well Ventilated, Storm Cuff and Fly. With Hooks to shorten into Jacket for Wading.

OVERALL TROUSERS
(Double Seated).
For Boat Fishing, &c.
With Waterproof Flap behind the Fly Front.
In strong Double Texture.
Twill, No. R14 .. 25/-
Black Rubber .. 21/-
Fawn or Blue Black .. 32/6

STORM CAP.
(Ventilated).
Black Rubber, 2/9, 3/9, 6/6.
Double Texture 6/6, 8/6, 10/6.

THE "HAMPSHIRE."
33 in. or 36 in. long.

No. 1	No. 2	No. 3	No. 4
25/-	21/-	15/6	10/6

THE 'KNOCKABOUT' HAT.
No. 16, 7/6.
No. 10, 6/6.
Folds small for pocket.

OVERALL SKIRTS.
(Double Seated).
For Boat Fishing, &c.
In strong Double Texture.
33 in. long 21/-
36 in. " 23/6
39 in. " 26/-
Oilskin 15/6

ANDERSONS'

ANDERSON, ANDERSON & ANDERSON, Ltd.

53 GOLD MEDALS AND AWARDS.

GOLD MEDAL SHOOTING OUTFITS.

INDIA RUBBER, WATERPROOF and OILSKIN MANUFACTURERS.

NOTE OUR TRADE MARKS.

SHOOTING CAPES.

Inches long	36	39	42	45
No. 18. Fawn Cashmere	35/-	37/-	39/-	41/-
No. 10. "	23/9	25/-	26/3	27/6

Special Lines in Tweeds .. 21/- 27/6

LEATHER CARTRIDGE BELTS.

To hold	25	30
Best Quality, with Sockets	8/-	9/-
Good Quality, with Clips	5/-	6/-

LEATHER LEGGINGS.
The "Putter" (as illustration) 8/9 to 27/6
The "Newmarket" 8/9 to 13/6

"BALFOUR" WATERPROOF KNICKERS.
Perfectly Ventilated.
Strong Fawn Cashmere 30/-
Double Seats 5/6 extra.

STUBBLE AMSLETS.
Waterproof Canvas 5/6 4/6

WATERPROOF CANVAS LEGGINGS.
Brown or Grey, Leather Ankles 8/6
BUSKINS, Tweeds, sizes 14 to 17 5/6 6/6 6/6

The "PAYNE-GALLWEY" GAME AND TOURING BAG
Various Materials 8/9 to 10/-

LEATHER FACED GUN COVERS.
In Strong Grey Waterproof Canvas 9/6

DECOY PIGEONS.
True Models. Hand Carved and Painted.

CARTRIDGE BAGS.
Made for 50, 75 or 100.
The "Lovat."
Brown Waterproof Canvas
7/- 7/9 8/6
The "Argyle."
5/- 5/9 6/6
The "Bisley."
3/6 4/- 4/6

Patt. B. In Brown Canvas, Leather, bound only 4/6 6/- 7/6

WATERPROOF GAME BAGS.
The "Payne-Gallwey." See illustration above.
The "Shooters' Own." Specially Light. Net front. Brown Waterproof Canvas 10/6 13/6

1. Flying, 8/6 2. Looking up, 7/6 3. Pecking, 7/6
Woodes and Inflatable Ducks and Drakes, 12/6
CARTRIDGE MAGAZINES

"MILLS" TELESCOPIC SEAT
Aluminium Bronzed 25/-
Bright 21/-

The "Highland" (as illustration). Strong Brown Waterproof Canvas.

Leather Lined.	Net Front.
No 1 18 ins.	16/6
No. 2. 20 ins.	18/-
No 3 22 ins.	19/6
No. 4 24 ins.	21/-

The "Anderson" as illustration. Made for 50, 75, 100 or 150.

Cowhide.	Lined	Waterproof.
12/6	14/6	17/6	22/6
Super Grey Waterproof Canvas.
9/6	11/6	15/6	16/6

FOLDING SEAT STICKS.
A .. 7/6 Brown Canvas
B .. 9/- Solid Leather
C .. 11/- Oak Body, Covered Leather
D 10/6

To hold 200 300 400 500
.. 25/- 32/6 37/6 42/-
.. 37/6 43/6 48/6 54/-
To hold 100 64/- 72/6 80/-
Canvas 15/6, Leather 24/-

ANDERSONS'

ANDERSON, ANDERSON & ANDERSON Ltd.

GOLD MEDAL YACHTING OILSKINS

RUBBER, WATERPROOF AND OILSKIN MANUFACTURERS.

THIRTY-ONE PRIZE MEDALS AND AWARDS.

SWIMMING COLLARS.
Grey Rubber, with Striped Stockinette Cover, 5/-

"Osborne."

"Sandringham."

AIRPROOF LIFEBELTS.

33in.	36in.	40in.	44in.	48in. long
9/9	10/6	12/-	13/9	15/3

SOILED LINEN BAGS.
With Brass Handle and Padlock, 34ins. deep.
Strong Brown Canvas 7/8
Waterproof Canvas 10/6

CANVAS.
For Yachting, Boating and Travelling.
Brown or Grey, 36in. by 14in. 27/6
Brown or Grey, 50in. by 12in. 25/6
Brown, 22/6 and 19/6

THE "QUARTERDECK."
Pure Rubber, Leather Lined, Leather Feet and Soles, 52/6, with Hobs, 55/-
Superior quality Leather Lined Knee Boot, 75/-

OILSKINS FOR GENTLEMEN

	Coats.	Jackets.	Trousers.	Waiters.
"SANDRINGHAM," Silk, for Strength and Coolness	47/6	37/6	25/-	7/6
"OSBORNE," for Lightness and Durability	29/6	24/6	15/6	6/6
"HURRICANE," for Strength and Resistance	25/-	21/-	12/6	4/6
"ROUGHSEA," for Rough General Work	15/6	12/6	7/6	5/6
"CRUISER," for Pleasure Cruising, Boating, &c.... Heavy	13/6	10/6	6/3	2/6
Light	9/6	7/6	4/3	1/9

OILSKINS FOR LADIES.

	Coat.	Jacket.	Skirt.	Hood.	Hood with Cape.
"SANDRINGHAM"	50/-	32/6	27/6	7/6	9/6
"OSBORNE"	35/-	25/-	18/6	5/6	7/6
SOU' WESTERS				7/6 and 6/6

"Sandringham," Yellow only. All Others, Yellow or Black.

LADIES' RUBBER LEG BOOTS.
"J.W.L." (lined wool) 22/6
"Snowdrifts" (lined wool) 16/6
"Highland" (lined net) 12/6
"Norfolk" (lined wool) 11/6

37, QUEEN VICTORIA ST., E.C.
70, QUEEN STREET, CARDIFF.

LONDON.

58-59, CHARING CROSS, S.W
23, CASTLE STREET, SWANSEA.

Or from every high-class Dealer in the United Kingdom.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, AUGUST 8, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. III., No. 20.] SATURDAY, AUGUST 15, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK 691
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—
The Way to an Anglo-German Agreement 694
The Revolution in Railway Policy 695
How to Regain the Liberty of the Road 696
LIFE AND LETTERS:—
The Deformed Transformed 697
The Name of Gentleman ... 698
The End of the Land 699
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—
The Harmsworth Brand—V. 701
SHORT STUDIES:—
A Revolutionary. By the Rev S. Henry 702
SCIENCE:—
The Problem of Flying. By George M. Minchin 703
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—
The Merciful Tsar. By An Englishman in Russia ... 704
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
"The Lost Liberty of the Road." By Cassandra, L. Marshall, Henry S. Clough, J. Colquhoun Reade, and S. Hine 705
The Art of Opening. By the Rt. Hon. Robert Farquharson 706
Liberalism and Labour. By Arthur Ponsonby, M.P. ... 707

PAGE
Heaven as Town or Country. By A. Clutton Brock 708
Some Fruits of the Free Trade Congress. By Charles Hancock 708
The Indeterminate Sentence. By Captain Arthur St. John 709
The Dilemma of a Liberal Lawyer. By Ignoramus ... 709
Similes. By S. Parnell Kerr 709
POETRY:—
The Moor Grave. By John Galsworthy 709
REVIEWS:—
Medievalism 710
Shakespeare and Common Sense 711
Catharine De' Medici 711
Macan's "Herodotus"... ... 713
A "Stirring" Novel 713
BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
The Swiss Democracy: The Study of a Sovereign People 714
The Biography of James Annand, M.P. 716
The Cities of Valladolid, Oviedo, &c. 716
Official Guides to Health Resorts 716
The Photographic Handboek 716
The P. and O. Pocket Book.. 716
The Living Masters of Music 716
Lotus Leaves 718
The Perfect Garden 718
THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 718

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The King, on the way to Marienbad, has been received by the Emperor William at Cronberg and by the Emperor Francis Joseph at Ischl. The first visit was of an informal and family character, though it is to be followed by a State visit of the King and Queen to Berlin; the latter had a rather more public and ceremonial aspect. The embraces which passed between uncle and nephew, and their brief social intercourse at the Castle, struck observers as particularly cordial, and the tone of the responsible German Press, following that of the "Frankfurter Zeitung," has been markedly friendly, and suggests that approaches to an Anglo-German arrangement have been made from this side. The King would necessarily be a powerful instrument in forwarding such an agreement, especially as the German Press, and German public men in general, persist in assigning to him personal responsibility for the present estrangement.

* * *

It is, we think, unfortunate that this presentment of the King as his own Foreign Minister is heightened by Sir Charles Hardinge's presence at Cronberg and Ischl, and his interview at the latter place with Baron von Aehrenthal, the Austro-Hungarian Minister for Foreign Affairs. This, again, follows the remarkable and really unconstitutional precedent of the Reval visit, at which both Sir John Fisher and Sir John French assisted. In the semi-official report of the interview, Baron von Aehrenthal and Sir Charles Hardinge are described as "two statesmen." Sir Charles Hardinge is not, however, a statesman in our sense of the word. He is a permanent official, whose duty it is to report to Sir Edward Grey and to the Cabinet, and to help carry out any policy on which these powers agree. The subject of the Aehrenthal-Hardinge conversation was said to be the position of affairs in Turkey, which closely affects Austria's position in Bosnia-Herzegovina, her railway policy, and her interest in Salonica. Whether in these respects her views march with those of a reforming Power like Great Britain is doubtful, but it is stated that the two Cabinets agree on a "sympathetic, waiting attitude" towards the constitutional movement. The King, in proposing the Emperor's health at the gala dinner, confined himself to personal compliments. It is notable that the French Press of all shades welcomes any pacifying tendencies which the Cronberg visit may have brought about, though the "Temps" is inclined to minimise them.

* * *

Russia and Great Britain have wisely dropped their Macedonia reform proposals, which had lost all sense after the revolution, though the Russian note rather ominously insists upon Russia's intention to reassert her treaty rights unless a substantial improvement is effected in Macedonia. While at Ischl, English and Austrian diplomats agreed to adopt towards Turkey an attitude of "benevolent expectancy," Germany also has expressed her desire not to interfere. It only remains for these Powers to be as good as their word, for it is notorious that their intrigues went far to ruin the constitutional movement of 1876, and the present revolution cannot but seriously affect their ambitions. Austria is the most involved because a constitutional agitation has already begun in Bosnia-Herzegovina, and the dream of opening a road to Salonica must fade in the presence of a reformed Turkey; hence Austrian official pessimism. The reformers have begun sweeping the offices clean, and among others, the St. Petersburg and Paris ambassadors have been recalled, and the Vali of Hedjaz dismissed who throve on the plunder of the Mecca pilgrims. The public departments are crowded with sinecure holders, and thousands have already lost their posts, which may create difficulties in the near future. The Young Turks have themselves taken in hand the control of the police, and they have successfully checked disorderly demonstrations. The Sultan himself has contributed to the building of the Parliament House, and the election preliminaries have begun. The greatest internal problem at present is the satisfaction of the nationalities. The Salonica Committee is still negotiating with the Bulgarian "Internal Organisation," but there have been some bickerings between Greeks and Servians and Bulgarians.

* * *

The published result of the Lambeth Conference is an "Encyclical Letter" addressed by the Primate to "the faithful in Christ Jesus." The letter and the following Conference resolutions cover eight columns of the "Times," but their substance is somewhat elusive, and the phrasing is studiously vague and kindly rather than strongly mandatory or comminatory. The document clearly represents an episcopal effort at "smoothing," and contains no note of infallibility. It declares in general terms the special new development of the Church—which it defines as "the whole society of Christian men throughout the world"—to be the growth of the "spirit of service." This is shown specially in semi-religious, semi-secular growths like medical missions, organisations for developing social responsibility, such as the University "settlements," the Christian Social Union, the "sisterhoods," and the Church of England Men's Society. Under such forms the Primate expects the Church to "go forward in the service of mankind under the conditions of modern life."

* * *

When the Encyclical comes to disputed points of dogma or conduct, its language is highly opportunist. It leaves much to local option. Thus it admits its inability to offer any general statement or advice on the subject of marriage with a deceased wife's sister, and the only solution it propounds for differing views on the Athanasian Creed is to suggest a new translation, "based on the best Latin text," and practically to leave its use open to individual churches. It pronounces categorically and firmly against the "artificial restriction" of birth, and thinks that innocently divorced persons who have re-married should not be refused the sacraments of the Church. As to guilty parties, they are not to receive the "blessing of the Church" on re-marriage, but nothing is said as to their exclusion from the sacraments. The Church is not to recognise any form of divorce save for adultery or fornication. On Christian Science, or "ministries of healing," the door is kept partly open. The anointing of the sick is not "forbidden" and not "recommended." On education the Encyclical pronounces against secular or merely moral instruction, and calls, not intolerantly, for dogmatic teaching. It approves the idea of arbitration, but acknowledges "the moral gains sometimes won by war."

* * *

Nor is any definite line taken as between the Catholic and the Protestant positions. We do not suppose that an obscure paragraph dealing with substitutes for the sacramental bread and wine implies that reservation of the sacrament is not forbidden in cases of "absolute necessity." As to reunion, the resolutions are clearly intended to cover the Church's complete failure to secure the recognition by Rome of the Anglican Orders. The most definite and cordial pronouncement is made in relation to the Orthodox Church, the least progressive of all the Christian communions. Among the non-episcopal churches the only communion as to which reunion on any terms is suggested is the Presbyterian Church. Finally, the Encyclical affirms "the essential place of the historic facts stated by the creeds in the structure of our faith," which, again, may be considered a vague affirmation of belief in the Virgin Birth. The general criticism of the Encyclical would seem to rest on its uncertainty of tone, and the fact that it deals less with the causes than with the effects of social and moral trouble.

* * *

We have reason to believe that the Committee of the House of Lords which is considering the plans for reforming the constitution of that body has arrived at a number of highly important conclusions, which will probably be embodied in its report. The scheme of reform which they contain is probably Lord Rosebery's, but Lord Lansdowne is a member of the Committee, and if he assents great weight must attach to these recommendations, and a Conservative Government may not improbably adopt them and carry them into law. Briefly, the proposal is to limit the number of members of the House of Lords, and to base membership first on public service, and secondly on an extension of the principle of representative peers. Thus peers who had served in Liberal or Conservative Ministries, or who had been members of the House of Commons, would at once be eligible for the Upper Chamber. To this nucleus of experienced members would be added a corpus on the representative principle. We are told that the idea is to limit the total membership to about 180 peers. Such a scheme strikes us as able, for it disposes of some popular objections to the present House of Lords, and gives it a certain aspect of modernity. It would, of course, be highly and dangerously Conservative in tendency, and would offer no guarantee against the present overwhelming preponderance of Conservative peers.

* * *

The United States fleet reached New Zealand on Sunday, doing the 4,000 miles across the Pacific in sixteen days. At Auckland it received an extremely cordial reception, both official and popular, and the New Zealand Press left no doubt as to the meaning of the enthusiasm and the junketings. One or two papers did homage to the common glories of British literature and history, but most quite bluntly welcomed the fleet as a manifestation of the strengthening of white against yellow power in the Pacific, and suggested an Anglo-American in place of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. Australasian dread of Japanese power is very real, and the hatred of Asiatic labor is a strong link between the white democracies on either shore of the Pacific. These facts were completely ignored by the "Imperialist" statesmen who framed the Anglo-Japanese treaty, and they lend serious importance to the visit of the American fleet. It is not twenty years since the United States began to look to the Pacific. Already they have stretched a chain of interests and sympathies right across that ocean, and are assuming there that naval representation and leadership of the white race which we abandoned when we made the alliance with Japan.

* * *

It looks very much as though, with the revolution in Turkey, the tide had begun to turn against the Shah. There has been very severe fighting at Tabriz, where Turkish blood is strong, since Friday, and Sata Khan, the Constitutionalist leader, has held his own against the Shah's agent, Rahim Khan, the robber chief. The resistance of Tabriz is of very great importance, because so long as Tabriz holds out the revolutionary movement may flame out again in the rest of the country. According to the "Telegraph," it has begun to do so already, and the influential Mullahs of Kerbela and Nejef have formally denounced the Shah. The Shah is hard up for funds, and has pawned the Crown jewels. The Russian papers paint his situation as desperate, as a result of Turkish events, which, without doubt, have put new heart into the Constitutionalists, while they have stirred up Persians abroad to press for the restoration of the Parliament, and the frontier provinces to threaten to go over to the Turks.

* * *

An open breach between Finland and the Russian Government cannot long be delayed. The new Finnish Diet, the successor of that dissolved in April, met on Wednesday week, and re-elected the former Speaker, Mr. Svinhuvud, a prominent Young-Finn and an outspoken advocate of Finnish rights. The Speech from the Throne was a calculated censure of the last Diet's "entirely false impression of Finland's relations to the Empire, and the obligations they involve on the Finnish people." The Speaker replied with a vigorous assertion of the vital importance to Finland of her independent administration and direct access to the Sovereign, and a condemnation of recent measures as a pernicious violation of Finnish rights. Between M. Stolypin's Imperialism and the Diet's Nationalism there is little room for compromise, and unfortunately when the conflict comes the Duma will back M. Stolypin. That he can rely on the Church's support is, of course, still more certain. The Orthodox prelates have been giving a taste of their quality by petitioning the Government to forbid Orthodox Russians to relapse to other creeds, to prohibit other sects engaging in propaganda, and to divide the lands of heretics and aliens. All this is in strict harmony with the Russian Imperialist doctrine that religion is a matter of nationality, not a concern of the individual conscience.

* * *

The Foreign Office have finally settled the terms of a modus vivendi with the United States on the Newfoundland fishery question, pending a settlement of the material disputes by the Hague Tribunal. Such an arrangement would have been concluded last year but for the folly of Sir Robert Bond. The fishery for 1908 is to be conducted on the principles governing it in 1907.

* * *

We suggest that journalists of the type of Mr. Blatchford, of the "Clarion," should give their authority for statements such as those which we observe in the last number of the "Clarion" "The (German) arrangements," says Mr. Blatchford, "are of a nature only suitable to attack upon a near coast. When the Germans practise embarking 200,000 men in haste, when the tonnage of the shipping makes it necessary to pack the troops closely, it is evident that no long sea voyage is intended." It is not long since a canard of this kind was blown into the air. If Mr. Blatchford desires to retain any character for accurate observation or serious writing, he should inform his readers when and where the Germans ever practised embarking 200,000 men, either "in haste" or at leisure, and whether he has any knowledge whatever of the tonnage of shipping used for such a purpose. Until such evidence is forthcoming we shall prefer to regard the story as an invention. As a counterblast to Mr. Blatchford, always a Jingo on foreign policy, Mr. Keir Hardie, who represents the practically undivided opinion of the Labor Party, declared, on Thursday, that the Hyndman-Blatchford attitude was repudiated 'with unanimity" by the trade unionist and Socialist movement, which was prepared to work with the German Social Democrats in resisting an Anglo-German war.—We observe, by the way, that Mr. Lloyd George, interviewed by the "Neue Freie Presse," declared for an Anglo-German agreement for the mutual reduction of naval shipbuilding.

* * *

The Mile End Guardians have been found guilty of receiving bribes from Calcutt, the contractor, in return for securing him contracts at prices which excluded other tenders, and fleeced the hard-pressed ratepayers of that very poor constituency. The sentences were exemplary, but not, we think, too severe, for they strike at what, we are afraid, is a rather common offence among Guardians and smaller public bodies, especially in London. Hirst, the publican and ex-Mayor of Stepney, was sentenced to two years' imprisonment and a fine of £250; other offenders received sentences of imprisonment ranging from six to fifteen months, coupled with smaller fines. The offenders were deprived of citizenship for seven years, a proper disability. The whole gang were fairly described by the Attorney-General as "Calcutt's quarterly pensioners." We suspect that a similar prosecution would have succeeded against at least one other public body in London

The problem of navigating the air has again been advanced by some interesting experiments made by the American aeronauts, the Wright brothers, whose beautifully-constructed aeroplane has made a series of short, rapid flights in the neighbourhood of Le Mans. The Wright machine is to be bought by a French syndicate if it succeeds in making two successful flights over a course of fifty kilometres. This condition has not yet been fulfilled, for at the end of a flight in which six miles were covered in 8 min. 13 sec., Wilbur Wright pulled the wrong lever, and damaged the left wing of the aeroplane. But its ease of manipulation and power of quick turning astonished all who observed them. The expert, M. Peyrey, declared that the Wright brothers were "the first men who had succeeded in imitating birds."

* * *

The power of the agitation for the public control of motor-driving is shown by the attitude of the "Times" towards the "Four-inch Race" promoted by the Royal Automobile Club in the Isle of Man. This race has the exclusive purpose of discovering the highest speeds attainable by four-inch cylinder cars, using an unlimited amount of petrol. One of these cars has already attained a speed of eighty-three miles an hour on the Brooklands track. That is to say it has travelled at over four times the legal speed limit. The Four-inch Race, therefore, is simply an incitement to the owners and drivers of this type of car to exceed even this "record" speed, and to set up a new defiance of the law, involving fresh risk of death or injury. We hope that Mr. Burns will prohibit the race, using every power that the law places in his hands for such a purpose, and we shall then see whether the Royal Automobile Club will dare to contest his decision.

* * *

The Marquis di Rudini, who died on Friday last in his 70th year, was one of the most respectable, though not the strongest, of the somewhat dubious race of Italian politicians who followed the generation that had unified Italy. Sprung of a wealthy Sicilian house, he went into politics early. When he was only twenty-six, as Mayor of Palermo, he put down a reactionary rising, and was Minister of the Interior at the age of thirty. He was twice Premier in 1891-3, when he renewed the Triple Alliance, and in 1896-8, after Adowa, when he made peace with Abyssinia and re-established more cordial relations with France. On both occasions he succeeded Crispi, and his opposition to Crispi's policy of corruption and ruthless repression at home and extravagant adventure abroad, together with his personal integrity and his expressed sympathy with the abolition of the corn duty and the relief of the tax-exhausted poor, made men think that he was the statesman to cleanse Italian politics, and introduce some of the healing social reforms called for by the devastating industrial revolution through which the country was passing. But his tenure of office was a complete disillusionment. The financial and political scandals continued; di Rudini vacillated weakly between Right and Left; the reforms did not come, and when bread riots broke out in the South in 1898 the Government's incompetency magnified a scuffle in Milan into a revolt. The Milan troubles caused his fall, and he never again held office, though he did good service in resisting Pelloux's dictatorial attack on Parliamentary rights. He was an honest, rather cynical, man, who inherited some of the traditions of Cavour, but was never strong enough or earnest enough to be true to the best in himself.

Politics and Affairs.

THE WAY TO AN ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

The King's interview with the Kaiser and the announcement of a State visit to Berlin in the autumn are, we hope, outward and visible signs, faint but real, of a new spirit, or, rather, of a return to the old traditional friendship between Great Britain and Germany. So far as the two peoples are concerned, there has been no general response to the malevolence of the Yellow Press. No one can tell how much ill seed, widely and loosely thrown, takes root, but we hope that countering influences have prevailed. On the German side, the Navy League, a more aggressive and pushful organisation than ours, has certainly lost much of its anti-British edge during the last twelve months. There has been a battle and a split; the South Germans threatened to secede altogether, and the North Germans were divided. So in the end the violent spirits were removed from their offices, and the League is now fairly quiescent. As for newspaper animosity our Tory Press has been more venomous than the German. When the "Times" began to adopt the tone and method of the "Daily Mail," even instructed Germans thought that there must be a backing in high quarters for an anti-German campaign. Probably, by this time, every German journalist has seen the announcements that the two journals now draw inspiration from the same fountain. He should also know that serious and powerful forces are arising in this country determined, in spite of fifty Lord Cromers, to make war between Germany and England impossible.

It must be admitted that our Government has been slow in reaching the conclusion that some sort of special arrangement with Germany is necessary. Nor is this altogether surprising if we think only of political sympathies. The policy of the German Government, both internal and external, is at almost every point the contradiction of what we in England mean by the term "Liberal." An average English Conservative would be a German Liberal; an average English Liberal would often vote as a Social Democrat in Germany; an average Radical or Labor man, if he opened his mouth freely in Berlin, might become an article for export. The want of what may be called political correspondence between the two nations may be illustrated by two comparative instances, one of home, the other of foreign policy. The Conservative policy of the present German Government towards the Polish peasants is to expropriate them with public money and credit, in order to re-establish Prussian landlords and re-colonise the province with loyalists. The Conservative policy of the late English Government for Ireland was to expropriate the English landlords in Ireland with public money and credit, in order to convert the native Irish tenants into peasant proprietors. Again, in Turkey, the policy of our late Government, as well as of our present Government, was to bring about reforms; the policy of the German Government has been for many years to back the Sultan in his resistance to civilising and renewing forces. But these tremendous differences of official policy—wherein we see the chasm that divides a representative democracy from a semi-constitutional State—should not be allowed to conceal deep underlying identities of interest. Germany comes second to Great Britain among the Great Powers of the world in foreign trade and commercial enterprise. The merchants of Berlin and Hamburg and Bremen are in intimate association with the merchants of London, Liverpool, and Hull. The banking and insurance organisations of England and Germany are so inextricably interwoven and so interdependent that a rupture is hardly possible or conceivable. Our exports to them and theirs to us are so enormous that a suspension would instantaneously throw hundreds of thousands of working men and women out of work. And in the present anarchic state of the laws of naval warfare a war with Germany would practically put an end to the North Sea trade. Not only would floating mines render navigation hazardous in the extreme, but the rule that the peaceful shipping of belligerents is liable to capture would transfer a vast quantity of idle shipping at knock-down prices to neutral capitalists.

Therefore, in seeking means of definite approach between the two countries, as a sequel to the amiable, but necessarily vague, compliments exchanged at Cronberg, let us go back a little to the origin of the doctrine as to marine warfare which, more than any other material cause, stands against an arrangement for the reduction of naval armaments. Jefferson tells us, in his memoirs, that during the negotiations of 1784, which concluded the War of American Independence, the Commissioners of the new Republic proposed, at the suggestion of Franklin, to insert an article exempting from capture by the public or private armed ships of either belligerent, when at war, all merchant vessels and their cargoes (whatever their flag) that were merely employed in peaceful commerce. Jefferson's comment is instructive. "It was refused by England, and unwisely in my opinion. For in the case of a war with us their superior commerce places infinitely more hazard on the ocean than ours; and as hawks abound in proportion to game, so our privateers would swarm in proportion to the wealth exposed to their prize, while theirs would be few for want of subjects of capture." He goes on to say that the American Article, which England rejected in 1784, just as our enlightened delegates rejected the same American proposal at the Hague last year, provided also against the molestation of fishermen, husbandmen, and of others following peaceful occupations in unfortified places, as well as for the humane treatment of prisoners of war. Failing in England, the new American Government sounded the Ministers of other nations. "Old Frederic of Prussia," writes Jefferson, with sublime indifference to grammar, "met us cordially and without hesitation, and appointing the Baron de Thuleymeyer, his Minister at the Hague, to negotiate with us, we communicated to him our projet, which, with little alteration by the King, was soon concluded."

Possibly this reminiscence may help our statesmen to reconsider, in the light of modern conditions of commerce and warfare, a policy that is, in reality, obsolete.

But we have no doubt that the substantial pressure towards an agreement on armaments will come from finance. This, we imagine, Germany will be the first to feel. The German Treasury is now endeavoring to frame a measure for raising 400 million marks of new taxation (some £20,000,000) in order to balance revenue and expenditure. Even that gigantic sum will be insufficient. The customs duties cannot be raised, as a number of commercial treaties have been concluded on the basis of the recent tariff, and the attention of the Government is therefore confined to direct taxation and excise. But the individual States consider that they have a monopoly of direct taxation, and the most that the Imperial Government is likely to propose is an increase and extension of death duties. The main brunt of the reforms will fall upon the lower middle and working classes, in the shape of additions to the duties on beer, tobacco and spirits. But anyone who knows anything of Germany will readily see that any action that raises the price of beer and cigars will be, to the last degree, unpopular. When the German Government is brought face to face with the alternative of handing over the control of the Reichstag to a majority of Social Democrats or of reducing its naval expenditure, who can doubt that the first alternative will be even more disagreeable than the second? And similar considerations will weigh heavily in Downing Street. Old Age Pensions in themselves can be financed without much difficulty, especially if moderate reductions can be effected in the Army and Navy. But if the Admiralty and War Office are to be run on the basis of a panic policy towards Germany, and a loose rein given to the new Territorial organisation, the next Budget may provoke a serious reaction. The fact that the Government will have the support and encouragement of the Opposition and of the Opposition Press in a rapid course to political suicide, will not, we imagine, prevent them from taking, while there is yet time, steps to keep the two great issues of foreign policy and warlike expenditure in rational relation to each other.

THE REVOLUTION IN RAILWAY POLICY.

The railway question is rapidly forcing itself to the front as the greatest of our internal economic problems. It hardly needed the recent working agreement between the London and North-Western and the Midland lines to accentuate its gravity. But that vast combination, following hard upon the amalgamations that are bringing all the North British roads under a single harmonious direction, is a vivid proof that what is nothing less than a new situation in our national transport policy has arisen. It is a situation equally complex and momentous, and it deserves the best thought that our Parliament and our people can give to it. Were popular discussion of economic subjects more habitual with us, the impending crisis in the British railway system, long discerned by a few, would be by now a commonplace of national debate. Its main features have been shaping themselves for many years past, and the need for bringing them into perspective must soon prove irresistible. The fact can no longer be disguised that the English railways are in a bad way, and that a few years from now their internal management and their relations to the State and to the trader will be as contentious an issue in British as they long have been in American politics. The market values of their stock have shrunk by millions of pounds; the return upon the enormous capital invested in them barely averages three-and-a-quarter per cent.; the shareholders complain of decreasing dividends; the directors complain of a vast increase in rates, of a growing difficulty in raising money, and of the new demands made upon them by their employees; the shippers complain not less vigorously that the freight charges on the British lines are among the heaviest in the world; and, taking the kingdom as a whole, railway construction and extension have almost come to a standstill, or advance with timid and petty strides. The result of these conditions is that the railway companies, under an inexorable economic pressure, are consolidating their interests and eliminating competition. The movement is a natural one, and on very many grounds we approve it. But it is important to realise that it threatens the final breaking down of the peculiar compromise which hitherto has governed the attitude of the State towards these great public utilities.

There are, roughly, three main lines on which the railway policies of the world have proceeded. Either the State, as in Germany, owns and operates the railways, or, as in America, it tries the experiment, always a fatal one, of leaving them to their own devices, or, as in Great Britain, it attempts to combine private ownership with a larger or smaller degree of governmental control. On this latter basis the British railway managers have built up a system which, for speed, comfort, convenience, and, above all, for safety, ranks, and justly ranks, with the best that any country has evolved. Constructed by private capital under the protection of the Legislature, managed by private individuals under the scrutiny, more or less effective, of a Government department, the British railways represent what is probably the happiest blend that the circumstances permit, of individual initiative acting and expanding beneath official supervision. It is a relationship not without its great virtues. Hardly one of the more serious defects of the American system can flourish under it. There can be no "one-man control," no raising of fresh capital or issue of stock without the sanction of the Board of Trade, no cut-throat competition of the unrestrained character with which Americans are familiar, no arbitrary fixing of freight and passenger rates, no evasion of responsibility for accidents, and no over-riding of minority shareholders. Such are some of the negative advantages which the British plan of modified State control was expected to secure, and, by comparison with the experience of America, has, in fact, very largely secured. But to compare the British lines with the American, from the standpoint of public policy, is to compare them with one of the worst systems that is anywhere in operation. In actual practice the theory of the British scheme is heavily discounted by the strength of the railway interests in Parliament, by the virtual impossibility of an individual trader obtaining any redress against exorbitant rates, by the unorganised condition of British agriculture, by a general want of flexibility and progressiveness in English railway management—the statistical departments, in particular, are almost wholly behind the age—by the prevalence of competition to a degree which, though it spares us its worst iniquities, is still an excessive and needless burden on shareholders and shippers alike, by the abuse of proxies at the meetings of the companies, and by the ever-increasing complexity of railway rates and the proportionate difficulty—practically the impossibility—of supervising them.

What it comes to is that the British system of partial State regulation, while successful at many points, in safeguarding against accidents especially, has now all but exhausted its mandate. It has rescued the country from the manipulations of a Hudson or a Harriman, but it has not yet hit upon the mean which will assert the supremacy of public interests without imposing too great a load upon the railways. Moreover, it is but too clear that with every year that passes the State is losing ground while the railways gain it. Such combinations among the companies as have recently taken place are admittedly in the line of industrial progress, and if—it is a large "if"—the economies that should be effected are devoted to the improvement and extension of the railway system of the country, traders will have no tangible ground of complaint. But such combinations have also the effect of greatly increasing the power of the railways as against the power of the State; and a small interlocked federation of companies controlling all the trunk lines in the Kingdom and most of the branch lines would form a monopoly against which the present weapons of the Railway Commissioners and the Board of Trade would effect little. Yet this, or something like it, is the situation which is being formed; and we have only to glance at America, where some half-dozen men hold the common carriers of the country in the hollow of their hands, use them as chips in the game of Wall Street finance, and make them the centre of a vast ramification of private industrial and financial interests, to realise that it is a situation full of public peril. It is true there are many safeguards in Great Britain that the United States does not possess, and that no railway monopoly here would be likely to prove as unscrupulous, as corrupt, or as domineering as the American "magnates." None the less the State must arm itself betimes. It cannot, in our judgment, effect very much more in the future than in the past, so long as public control is dissociated from public ownership.

HOW TO REGAIN THE LIBERTY OF THE ROAD.

This journal has some reason to congratulate itself on the change of front which has followed its appeal, made a little over two months ago, for a restoration of the "Lost Liberty of the Road." Since that article appeared in The Nation, the Press, checked as it has been by the heavy bribe of motor-car advertisements, has been compelled to open its columns to a recital of the intolerable grievances of the public, now widely scattered about the pleasantest places in this pleasant land of England. The newspapers have been driven to this attitude by the series of frightful deaths from motor cars with which the holiday season has opened. The Brooklands "accident," as it is conveniently called, appropriately headed the list. For institutions like the Brooklands track are largely the seat and origin of the trouble with motor cars. In such places all over the civilised world the great motor firms encourage the lawless passion for high speeds, and incite their clients to fresh triumphs of recklessness, and new demands for the costly mechanism that makes them possible. Thanks to the turn which has thus been given to the motor trade, its more commercial uses have largely been obscured, and we have the passionate cult of a dangerous and highly exclusive amusement set up as the chief mark of the industry. Nothing could be more vicious, and no steps for the recovery of the British people's rights to their roads can be of value unless this aspect of the question is steadily kept in view. We cannot banish the motor car, though the motorist would do well to remember that a referendum on that point would yield an overwhelming majority for abolition; the problem is how to govern this new power, which is now an almost unredeemed curse and nuisance to man, and harness it to his real service. One point is perfectly clear. The Government will be forced to bring in an amending Bill next year. Mr. Burns is a man of the people, and he will be required to protect them from a kind of tyranny which is none the less serious because it has arisen freshly and quite unexpectedly, and as an apparently normal consequence of a simple application of the laws of mechanical science. It is already clear that if the Government does not act, it will be faced by an organisation in every town and country district in Great Britain whose members will make their votes at the next election dependent on explicit answers to definite points of grievance.

Let us see therefore, where the trouble lies, and in what direction we may seek a remedy. We take it that the present state of things is unbearable. Two columns of letters in each day's issue of the "Times," are tolerable primâ facie evidence of that fact. The experience of average pedestrians and horse-users all over urban and rural England is a better guide still. It is possible to move even the governing classes when a walk along Piccadilly is no longer tolerable, and the safe crossing of a West End street has become a feat of skill. But the grievance of the well-to-do townsman is almost trifling when compared with that of the countryman. The motor car has made life in wayside houses and cottages miserable just at the time of year when it should be most enjoyable. It is the quiet, really valuable, people—the laborers, the tired town workers—who have especially suffered, and to them we must join residents in the country who are not rich enough to own parks, or whose houses abut on the highways. Both the enjoyment and the use of rural England have thus been curtailed in the interests of a Philistine form of excitement. Cars have been constructed to run very fast and to turn with ease, characteristics which are in themselves largely responsible for the dust nuisance, for the noise nuisance, and for the absolutely unpardonable destruction of the roads. No reform, therefore, which fails to give relief on these points can be of much real service. The seat of mischief resides in the large, heavy, low-built car, thundering along, following with ease the many twists of the English bye-way, churning up the surface with its body, or scattering the dust with its exhaust. This is the mechanical difficulty. But the moral trouble is not less serious. There is a "motor-car mind" which has been rapidly developed on the basis of the high-speed vehicles. It is as if a class of average mortals had been suddenly dowered with a kind of supernatural power over the rest of mankind. Give a certain number of people, not especially distinguished for refinement or consideration, a sudden power of dominating their fellows, and driving them to the wall, and you may have a kind of bullying force quite as cruel as that of the French Marquis in Dickens's "Tale of Two Cities," who drove over the peasant's child on his way from the Court of Louis XV. The motor car has the speed of every other conveyance on the road. It makes everything give place to it. Its conductor does not acknowledge the rule of equals, the mutual "giving-way" to which horse-users are accustomed in narrow or crowded roadways. He has the faculty and the habit of going fast, of not stopping, even, as it now and then turns out, for dead children. The view of the man in the motor car is so different from that of the man in the cart, or on the bicycle or the footway, that it is impossible to accommodate the two attitudes without a powerful measure of restraint for the one individual and protection for the other. The problem is not one of mere "considerateness." The fairly considerate driver has an instrument at his disposal which cannot be freely used under present conditions without inflicting misery and damage on his neighbours. Like his "inconsiderate" brother, he covers foot passengers with dust, ruins the cottagers' flowers, and occasionally runs over their chickens. It is the reaction of the car on the driver, and of the driver on the car, which makes the difficulty.

Having looked at the root of the evil, we may now, with the help of our correspondents and of the writers to the "Times" and other papers, suggests some directions in which remedies may be sought. Let us suggest one note of caution. The motor car interest are already seeking to use this agitation as a means of getting rid of the speed-limit. This would be fatal. No doubt the tendency of the present law is to fix the attention of the police on the less frequented stretches of road, where fast driving is safest, and to leave the villages and urban districts almost defenceless. But it will not do to get rid of the speed-limit altogether. It is, at all events, a warning that the roads were not built for a new type of train, and that warning must be retained. There are, however, certain ways in which amelioration is to be sought, and we propose to specify them without at once deciding which is the most promising. They are:—

1. The creation of a specially low speed-limit for frequented areas, such as villages and their approaches, town streets, and the more populous thoroughfares..

2. The enforcement of regulations as to the construction of the cars. Probably the most efficacious would be the compulsory raising of the height of the body of the car from the ground; fines for stench and for the escape of noxious gases should be rigorously enforced.

3. The linking of the owner in full responsibility with the driver. Punishments for cruel and callous conduct should be clearly defined, so that the thoroughly reckless man might know that a charge of manslaughter might hang over his head for conduct which richly deserved imprisonment, and that its penalty would be enhanced if he ran away from his victims.

4. The withdrawal of a licence to follow a repeated conviction for dangerous driving, and (on a third conviction) the confiscation of the car.

5. The re-erection, if all other methods fail, of the old conservative system of toll-bars, with fees on a scale high enough to compensate the local authorities for the destruction of their roads.

6. Generally, the aim of these measures would be to force the motor trade out of the groove in which it has become fixed, and into channels where it may become useful to humanity.

Life and Letters.

THE DEFORMED TRANSFORMED.

The instability of human things has been lamented to commonplace, and that we know not what a day may bring forth is thought a natural theme, not for joy, but for sorrow. Man's mind is heavily biassed to the apprehension of evil, and a change of fortune commonly signifies a decline. It is seldom that our barometer is set fair, seldom that we care to tap it when it hesitates at change, and if we surreptitiously tap the barometer of a friend, it is in the expectation that it will fall. Every lodging-house keeper and pavement artist has seen better days, but no woman who has risen from penury to a back parlor proclaims that she has seen worse. It has been counted a sign of wisdom in the sage to call no one happy till he dies, for the fated wheel may turn, and the melancholy foreboding of man anticipates a wheel ever gravitating with catastrophe.

Perhaps it is the apparent happiness of childhood, joined to the foreknowledge of other people's death, which thus inclines the world to mournful prophecy. If the man did but remember the immense and inconsolable sorrows of a child, and if he ceased like the animals to contemplate his neighbour's latter end, he might perceive the fair elevations of fortune equally with her declivities. At times we think it would be wisdom to call no man unhappy till he dies; for within the limits of one's existence the unending ladder of chance may lead upwards as well as down, and Micawber appear no less a sage than Solon. "To live long," Goethe wrote in one of his later letters, "to live long is to outlive much—men we have loved, hated, or regarded with indifference—kingdoms, capitals, even the very woods and trees we planted in our youth. Why, we outlive ourselves, and are grateful if a few of our powers of body and soul remain to us." We outlive ourselves, but it is possible to outlive the weaknesses of body and soul as well as the powers. Augustus was a fragile youth when in the Proscriptions he displayed a coldness of cruelty very surprising to historians who have never watched the ways of children with flies or frogs; yet he survived his early self into a golden age of bland and considerate benignity, and the one drama written on his life celebrates a forgiving disposition. Had Nero escaped in the drainpipe to live another forty years, who can tell whether he might not have contrived better illuminations for the circus, or have desisted from torturing the senatorial concert-halls with his thin and rusty voice? All men deplore the corruption of the body and the degradation of the soul; but that the body should live at all and the soul be capable of incalculable resurrection is creation's perpetual wonder.

As though to counteract the despairing gloom of man's commonest philosophy and to prove that redemption, though slow of foot as penalty, may be as sure, time now and again flashes upon us some signal example; and in our age none has been so startling, none so legible, as the last month's history of the Turkish Empire. For centuries the Turk has stood outside the pale, a thing forbid, irredeemable as Faustus, though the blood of Christ were streaming across the sky. Thirty years ago the leading Englishman described the Turkish race as the one great anti-human specimen of humanity. He spoke of their fell satanic orgies. He declared there was not a criminal in a European gaol, nor a cannibal in the South Sea Islands, whose indignation would not rise at the recital of what the Turk had done. For short, the greatest writer of that time summed up the Turk as "unspeakable," and unspeakable the Turk remained. The passing years only accumulated the horror of his crimes. Step by step he descended the inhuman abyss, and the ineffaceable wickedness of his nature stood personified in the ruler who claimed the consecrated succession to his Prophet. The massacre of Armenians followed the massacre of Batak; the massacre of Macedonia took its turn, and red Sultan stood beside black Congo in the universal abhorrence of mankind. For short, the greatest poet of the time summed up Abdul Hamid as "the damned," and damned he long remained.

The strange thing is that the worst that could be said was true; Gladstone, Carlyle, and Mr. William Watson were perfectly right; the Turk was unspeakable, Abdul was the damned. And yet within a month, what a millennium! What a short cut to the thousand years of joy! Of all the many schemes of reform, the reform least contemplated was the reform of the Turk himself. Now where reaction clutched disruption by the throat, a Committee of Union and Progress extends a smiling reign. The market-place of Monastir breathes to unwonted airs of freedom's Marseillaise; racial assassins join the dance of human brotherhood, and if on the streets of Salonica righteousness and peace have not kissed each other, there has been a great deal of kissing between unrighteousness and war, which is a much more astonishing embrace. Far-off Jerusalem stirs her sacred bones; for the first time since Titus there is joy upon Mount Zion, and for the first time since the Crusades the Holy Sepulchre is hung with thanksgiving.

Call no man unhappy till he is dead. The lost soul who lurked in Yildiz, watchful and fearful as a poison spider, feeling at each thread, now emerges into the blessed sunshine amid the cheers and blessings of a devoted people ever ready to forgive. The doors are flung wide open, daylight peers into hell, and out there crawls a shattered and blood-stained shape, graven with cruelty and enfeebled by terror, but human still, and possessed of capacities beyond the calculation of astronomers. Who can say? To be sure, a millennium often ends in bloody farce, but if ever there was an opportunity for joy in heaven it is now, and the secret of one Church's power is that she has never called a living spirit lost, nor is there any indeterminate sentence in her laws.

But the unhappiness of time's revenges is their irony. One would have thought the resurrection of Turkey a drama sufficient in itself for any generation, but the dramatist who stages human history has set it against an ironic background that displays unequalled skill, but tinges the scene with bitterness. It is thirty years almost to a day since the Turk received his title of unspeakable, and our country's voice, led by the greatest Englishman, acclaimed as mankind's deliverer a certain "divine figure from the North." As England refused the duty, it was the privilege of Holy Russia to free the Christian peoples from unendurable oppression. Up to a certain point, by one way or another, the thing was done, but into what kind of a ghoul has that divine figure from the North now shrunk! The fell satanic orgies for which Mr. Gladstone denounced the Turk have changed their scene to the Caucasus, the Baltic Provinces, and the streets of Kishineff and Odessa. To Mr. Stead alone must be left the defence of the Tsar and his agents, for, to repeat Mr. Gladstone's words, there is not a criminal in a European gaol nor a cannibal in the South Sea Islands whose indignation would not rise at the recital of what they have done in burning villages, execution yards, and torture chambers. That is the irony of time's revenges, and the Sultan himself, with the ability that no one denies him, appears to have perceived this peculiar aspect of the situation; if, indeed, the following draft of a letter addressed to a divine figure in the North comes from his hand. It purports to be dated from Yildiz Kiosk last Sunday, and runs:—

> "In the name of God, the merciful, the compassionate. My illustrious Friend, and Joy of my Liver, I write to you in peace, wishing peace for your soul. For many years past, even for more than thirty years, you and your father and your grandfather before you have striven, with God's help, to guide me in the way of righteousness. You have poured great armies into my kingdom; you have advanced to the walls of my holy capital; you have slaughtered many thousands of my subjects for my soul's peace. You have accounted me unworthy to rule my people unaided; you have joined the cry of 'bag and baggage'; you have appointed agents to check my misdeeds; you have set an assessor to watch my Inspector-General; you have refused me leave to expend my own money; you have united with others in collecting terrible fleets to make me shiver in my guilty bed. For this solicitude I repay you the thanks of a humble and converted spirit.
>
> "It is written in our Scripture, 'He who accepts guidance, accepts it only for his own soul; and he who errs, it is against his own soul that he errs; nor shall one burdened soul bear the burden of another.' O my soul! O my lamb! You have freed me from my burden, and I call unto you to free your own burdened soul. Deep in repentance, I cry unto you to repent, for surely your hour will come.
>
> "Before the creation of the world, saith the Prophet, the Lord said unto the angels, 'I am about to place a Viceregent in the earth.' And the angels said, 'Wilt Thou place therein one who will do evil and shed blood?' And the Lord said, 'I know what you know not.' O my son, doubtless you are the Lord's Viceregent in the earth, seeing that for all these years you have been bringing my erring spirit into the right way. Will you then do evil and shed blood? O my soul, evil things are said of you. You have filled your land with cruelties and abominations such as I myself committed while I went astray. Therefore repent, as I have repented, who am a worm and no man; for every soul shall taste of death.
>
> "In our book that is called the Book of Overwhelming it is written, 'When the sun is folded up and the stars fall, when the mountains are moved and the camels with young are neglected, when the wild beasts crowd together in their fear and the seas surge with waves, and souls are mated to their bodies again, and the books are spread, and the heavens shall be flayed, and hell be set ablaze with fire, and Paradise brought nigh, then shall the soul know the things that it has done.'
>
> "O my son, O my friend, think upon these things and repent as I have repented, for God is merciful, is compassionate.
>
> "The meek in spirit,
>
> Abdul."

And in that prayer even Christendom may join, for thus it is that out of the eater cometh forth meat.

THE NAME OF GENTLEMAN.

"The name gentilis as expressing non-Roman, was taken to themselves by the conquering invaders from the North as an honorable epithet, synonymous with free, noble, and victorious." In considering the modern meaning of "gentleman" it is profitable to recur to the simple statement of Selden, so as to escape at once from the sentimental associations of the term "gentle," which are so misleading in connection with gentleman. How kindness, courtesy, nobility of manners, have grown round the concept, and still with difficulty clung to it in its modern vulgarisation, is an interesting witness to certain virtues of the feudal order, but it is well to remember that the historical roots lie in race and family, in stock. For this belief in ancestral prowess, transmitted through the generations, and ever blossoming afresh in personal distinction, has played a peculiar part in English history. The nobility and the cleavage between them and the Commons are familiar factors in the history of most peoples, but the gentry as a subnobility has been, if not a unique, at any rate a more distinctive feature in our social system than in any other. In what other language, we proudly ask, is there any true equivalent for the word "gentleman"? There is a certain humor in the very pride with which we put our question. For so amorphous and so shifting is the term in modern use that it would be little short of a miracle were any French or German word formed to contain its almost fortuitous concourse of attributes. In truth it had a fairly well-defined meaning as a mark of status through the Middle Ages, designating the middling landowners or small squirarchy of England.

Not till the eighteenth century was there much loosening of the rigor of this union of birth and acres as the basis of gentility, for even the "poor gentleman" was younger son of a landed house. But two forces were beginning to impair the integrity of the concept—learning and riches. Until comparatively modern times the only occupation, apart from cultivation of the soil, consistent with the character of gentleman was the profession of arms. But when war ceased to be chronic, and younger sons needed careers, the learned professions of the Church and the Bar became permissible, and the energy of these classes began to stamp scholarship as consistent with gentility, an admission rare before the time of Elizabeth. Henceforth a gentleman was in some sort or degree not only landowner, soldier, sportsman, but scholar. A rally was made at the "learned professions," and a long halt might have been attained had it not been for an encroachment from a very different quarter.

The antagonism between gentleman and tradesman was persistent and deep-rooted, but it could not stand the pressure of modern forces, and Dr. Johnson was fain to give assent to an already well-established fact when he admitted that an English merchant was a new sort of gentleman. The rich merchant-adventurer of London, Bristol, and Liverpool was not to be denied, and the goldsmith, turned banker, was followed through the eighteenth century by the "clothier," the "brewer," the soap-boiler, who, with the "Nabob," began to graft themselves upon the more impecunious gentility by luring them into matrimonial and business alliances. So the connotation of the word began to fall to pieces: the struggle against the "vulgarity" of trade was kept up in some quarters, but the merchant, trading wholesale, and the manufacturer who did not make things with his hands, rapidly won their way into gentility. But even here there was no settlement. The present problem presents itself to the aspiring "retailer" how to qualify for gentleman. It can be done in one of three ways—by retirement with a time limit, by living in "genteel" style at a sufficient distance from the shop, or, best of all, by merging his personal connection in the anonymity of a joint-stock company. There are these three ways of social salvation for the shopkeeper.

But there is evidently no foothold here in the descent. Class after class puts in its claim and enforces it by assertion and by customary use. Official documents may still embody an obsolete standard by which gentility is tainted by no "occupation," to which the loose logic of middle-class society gives some countenance by reserving a class of "independent" gentlemen assumed to be "living on their means." But the railway, the omnibus, the public-house, make havoc of such pretences, and "gentleman" and "lady" there attain their fullest democratic significance. In the village life of southern England, where the new rich have seized and resuscitated some of the obsolescent privileges of the feudal aristocracy, one may indeed find traces of the ancient sentiment for the "quality," the admiration of the old laborer for the insolent young squire. "He's a real gentleman; he don't think no more of me nor you than of the dirt under his feet!" But even in the South the tide of democracy is sweeping away the reverence for "betters."

Now that everyone is on the way to be a gentleman, will the very name disappear from use, and, if so, is it matter for regret? It will have served its historic purpose, yielding a nucleus round which have gathered through many ages ideals of character and conduct, blends of nobility and insolence, of pride and service, of valor, grace, ostentation, leading, and oppression. How full a justice has been done to the ideal in the literature of our own and other nations is admirably shown in the anthology just published by Dr. Smythe-Palmer, entitled "The Ideal of a Gentleman" (Routledge & Sons), with its engraved frontispiece of that most noble and most finished type, Sir Philip Sidney. As we read the glowing testimony to the character of gentleman from poet, courtier, moralist, divine, soldier, lawyer, as facet after facet of the dazzling jewel is exposed to our gaze, we are driven perforce to ask ourselves, not whether such ideal is attainable, a foolish question, but whether in any real sense this model of courage, courtesy, meekness, service, generosity, restraint, has ever been the working model for any class of Englishmen at any time in our history. The sober fact is that this complex of human virtues, Christian and Pagan, never was and never could be comprised in one personality. The nearest attempt at a full portrait in our literature was the monstrous image of Sir Charles Grandison, the "Christian Gentleman," "such as ladies ought to admire." None of the great line of Englishmen whose memories burn brightest in our history, and who evoke our genuine admiration, is thus composed. Neither in the grouping of qualities nor in their respective values does the actual ideal of an English gentleman conform even approximately to the type of elevated manhood here conveyed. The importation of the definitely Christian virtues, in particular meekness, forgiveness, charity, are either alien from the English ideal of gentleman, or must be assigned an utterly subordinate position. For the gentleman is an aristocratic creation; what is noble, beautiful, and attractive in him is based upon and requires the limitation of a caste, a dominant society within the nation: as a national ideal of personality it is incapable of realisation. In this caste conception, manners and external behaviour, a code of honor differing from any code of Christian ethics, associated with wealth and leisure and the opportunities of self-assertion, play a part of paramount importance. Exclusiveness is of the essence of this ideal, as, indeed, the most precise definition of a gentleman, furnished by Aristotle, signified, 'αρετή καὶ πλοῦτος.

At root the conception of a gentleman has always remained a class and a pagan one. It has never been elsewhere so truthfully rendered as by Malory in the famous lament:—

> "Ah, Sir Launcelot," said he, "thou wert head of all Christian knights! and now, I dare say," said Sir Ector, "that Sir Launcelot, there thou liest, thou were never matched of none earthly knight's hands; and thou wert the curtiest knight that ever beare shield; and thou were the truest friend to thy lover that ever bestrood horse, and thou were the truest lover of a sinful man that ever loved woman; and thou were the kindest man that ever strooke with sword; and thou were the goodliest person that ever came among presse of knights; and thou were the meekest man and the gentlest that ever eate in hall among ladies; and thou were the sternest knight to thy mortal foe that ever put speare in the rest."

The extension of the term gentleness to the scholar, the apothecary, the shopkeeper, has been a foolish degradation of a fine and serviceable term. Due primarily to that inveterate and pervasive snobbishness, which is our most distinctive national character, it has succeeded in emptying the word of all significance. The amiable notion that, when democracy is realised, every man will be a gentleman, could hardly be possible in any other country. Surely Dickens, with his "Nature's gentlemen," ought to have exploded it for his own countrymen. The ancient rebel rhymester with his "When Adam dalf and Eve span" pricked the bubble of gentility. The ordinary drudge who still characterises a gentleman as one "who doesn't have to work for a living" is right. Parasitism everywhere lurks under the old conception of gentility: remove this condition, and the only meaning left is one of flabby sentimentalism trading on some false implications of "gentle" which have no real relation to the character. Now that the words have lost their serviceable meaning, the sooner we get rid of "lady" and "gentleman" the better. "Man" and "woman" are good enough for all sound purposes. By their adjectives you shall know them. Any hankering after the respectability of the more decorative language may surely be stifled by reflecting that the nouns will continue to carry with them the obligation of hearing, like Lady Camper, if not using, "ladylike" and "gentlemanly."

THE END OF THE LAND.

All night the two great beams of light wheel and flash from the Lizard lighthouse, the southernmost point of England. Built upwards to the clouds, they search the sky with goblin arcs, clear alike of shore and sea. Only at one point the pencil ray cuts first the Marconi mast and then the white Lloyd's signalling station, which each spring momentarily into fire, the first a long streak of flame, the second a ball, glowing as if at white heat. Wheeling lights under a huge canopy of sky, with this alternate flash of circle and line, poised high over a sea now turbulent, now peaceful, never quite at rest: such is the first vision of the approaching vessel as, beating up channel in the darkness, she suddenly discerns the shores of home.

In the day time the lighthouse reposes, content with its labors: exhibiting just that repose, with the latent sense of power behind it, which is congruous with all its surroundings. For in this wild coast and high headlands and tall black cliffs, sinking sheer into deep unquiet seas, however serene the weather in the unclouded summer days, there is always behind the languors and soft airs a sense of power but half concealed—of power vigilant, sleeping, unsubdued. That power is in the sea which laps so quietly the little soft bays of white sand, or breaks in quiet white ripple and foam round the base of the black cliffs. At any moment some sudden rage may seize it from far off deep places, and the rocks be lashed in feverish fury, and the sand scattered and torn, and the quiet ripple of waters be transmuted into the sullen voice of the angry untameable ocean. That power is in the soft airs also, now moving so lightly over the harvest fields, or just lifting the petals of the expanding flowers. For, to these also, change beyond human foresight or control will send the tempest sweeping over the desolate land, tearing and fretting at all the effort of man's labor. And the power is burnt (as it were) into the very ground, in these black cliffs of sullen rock all jagged and splintered, which break but cannot bend: serpentine and granite, the oldest of all the earth's products which lie exposed to the rain and wind, born directly of the central solar fires, and destined one day (it is said) in fire to be consumed.

The way to this remote place leads over wild moorlands, covered with short coarse grasses and heather and bracken, sharply cutting off this little oasis and assemblage of man's kindly company from all the land beyond. At the end the moorlands have been in part subdued, and the heath and fern give place to corn fields set between tall hedges, set high above the encompassing waters. It is difficult to set down in words the beauty of the place in these hot August days, when the harvest has reached its completion; here in long light yellow ears of barley with blue flowers embedded in a field of feathery grey; here in the wheat now under the influence of this hot unclouded sun, glowing, with a kind of redness at the heart of it, as if some of that sun's fierce flame had become imprisoned there; here in the sheaves set in long lines over the brown stubble, all under an enormous harvest moon which turns night into day, or in the daytime itself. Such is this high upward end of the long shoulder of land flung straight outwards into the English Channel, with everywhere, over the waving corn and gathered sheaves, the background of boundless blue sea.

It is a community living apart, only linked with the land beyond by the daily omnibus over this desolate region, or by the visitors that pour in from all the land during the summer, for the joy of standing on the ultimate shores of England. It is a community much occupied with the sea and its various harvest; many fishermen, or at service in the coastguard or lighthouse or signalling stations; most of the men voluntary members of some lifeboat crew or rocket workers in a land where any sudden fog or storm may swing great ships helpless upon its inhospitable shores. Just below the Lizard point is the ridge upon which the "Suevic" a few months back drifted in the mist, for long afterwards a show sight there. A little up the coast are the Manacles, with the bell-buoy on them, the last grave of so many great ships. There is scarcely a rock which rears its black head above the blue sea that cannot boast its tale of dead. The people here are said to be descendants of the old wreckers, whose doings often conspired with the forces of destruction, but their record to-day is splendid with many heroisms of risk and rescue. They are a sturdy, fine, healthy race, the children conspicuously different from the white children of the cities; religious, like all those whose abode is in dangerous and solitary places; in times of order selling their polished serpentine or providing food and drink for the tourist who blinks round their abode; in times of testing ready for the signal which at any moment may demand the sudden service of a more than human encounter with furious, inhuman things.

But to-day all the elements proclaim tranquillity and content. The hedges are composed of rocks and earth and green growing things, with paths along the tops of them, for in Cornwall the footpaths are not between the hedges, but upon them. The little rough Cornish lanes wind downwards from the highlands to the little coves at the bottom of the cliffs, at their sides a glory of wild flowers, pink campion and yellow coltsfoot, blue scabious, millfoot, and wild parsley. There are hedges of wild fuchsia, all crimson at sunset; a riot of butterflies, often dancing in great companies together, orange and white and crimson and blue. The lane will end in a tiny clean white beach of sand, sparkling with the mica which has been washed down from the old rocks. And the sea beyond presents such hues and dyes as are rarely revealed in these greyer northern climes, from turquoise and silver to ultramarine and sapphire and deep purple, slashed with green and black under the sombre black cliffs, flashing in a sheen and glitter which conceals all color, as it vanishes on a far horizon.

On such long summer days the big ships sail close inshore till you can almost look down upon their decks from the cliff station above. That highway is never deserted: there are huge ocean liners coming and going, sometimes a battleship or destroyer, heavy tramp steamers and vessels still set in a crowded tangle of white sails: and little tug boats, inquisitive and alert, and tiny ships with one large white or brown sail. The streaks of grey smoke on the horizon reveal the passage of great craft, whose presence is certified by the changing flags of Lloyd's signalling station: all very busy and very content as they pursue their journey to and fro over a sea of glass and crystal. One discerns, indeed, a certain jauntiness of attitude about these ships which sail to-day so close inshore, under an iron coast where a few hours of tempest could make them pay dearly for such hardihood, and shatter them into ruin and death.

For in few places is the contrast so compelling as in this wild and remote rock peninsula where the land ends, between the serene and savage aspects of a Nature whose inner springs of action and hidden meaning remain still inscrutable. The contrast between the Lizard head in one of these still summer days or under the enormous moon, with the sea friendly and quiet and satisfied, and the same region in the heart of wild storm, with the booming and clamor of huge breakers smashing on to a tortured rocky shore, is the contrast between the triumph of the forces of Violence or of Repose. These angry, black, fire-scorched cliffs never soften like the red sandstone or round into smooth contours like the chalk: they groove and fracture into sharp edges and splinters of jagged stone: the very sand which is their ultimate destiny is made up of little crystals and rough granulets, resistent to soft, smooth things. The sea tugs and tears at them, but they never yield themselves to her embraces: the warfare is desperate, eternal. And in such a warfare man and all his desires and energies is but an incident: irrelevant, and, as neglected, negligible. That is the impression—and no cheering one—from the vision of the shore and sea in open conflict, with humanity here, caught between, tortured, shattered, pounded to pieces, but still, in the final judgment, not reckoned at all in the unending conflict. There are places on the world's surface where Nature appears definitely warring against man, a malignant spirit: sworn to do him injury and ill content until he is enslaved as a prey, or driven forth as a fugitive. There are places (again) where this same Nature appears as a benignant spirit, overcoming the effort of mankind towards decay: by setting tall grasses in the scarred ruin of his handiwork, and laying a carpet of flowers over the last resting-places of his dead. But here Nature appears as neither hostile nor kindly, but as profoundly and ultimately indifferent, turning its eyes away, or with no intelligent vision, but eyeless sockets set in an empty skull, acquiescing in the procession of dead and irrational forces towards no intelligible goal. Man finds her when the world is quiet and all the winds are favorable, and sails gaily into his desired haven: he finds her (again) when the world is troubled and the winds contrary. He is flung, uselessly resisting, on this iron coast. His cries pass unheeded in the noise of the tumult of sea and sky: there is no one to hear, no one to care, no one desires his injury, no one desires his welfare, he has fallen by chance, the victim of chance forces, in a universe whose blind indifference to all that he longs for appears more intolerable than a governance by the spirits of Caprice or Disdain.

Such, at least, are the first impulses of the sight of these harsh, cruel cliffs, beaten by this furious indifferent sea, the scene of so many lamentable disasters to big ships—disasters in their essence senseless, because unreasoning and unreasonable. Casual wanderings and misdirections in the mist and rain, or the wrong reading of a signal bring sudden destruction to so many innocent lives, which the turn of the screw or a chance gust of wind might have established in safety again. One needs —in such moments of questioning—the evidence of the existence of other spirits in the world: of man's compassion, attested by the frequent lifeboat stations with the white boards and long lists of rescues safely effected in circumstances of grave danger, of man's intelligence and foresight, in those great warning beams which wheel and flash from the Lizard lighthouse all the long night over the waste of waters, to tell the approaching vessel of safe passage on the journey home.

Present-Day Problems.

THE HARMSWORTH BRAND.—V.

Our readers will have gathered what special qualifications are possessed by a firm like Messrs. Harmsworth for carrying on a newspaper of the character and traditions of the "Times." We are not referring to some grosser occasional episodes in their history, like the running of the "Weekly Dispatch" in 1906 and 1907, or the publication of an improper story like the "Rajah's Mechanical Doll" in a number of "Chips," or even to their continuous and regular exploitation of the popular interest in crime. Here they were followers rather than pioneers. The true measure of the unfitness of the Harmsworths for the best journalism is to be found in the general standards of culture and feeling which they set up, in their system of regulating the individual work of their contributors. The essential quality of a paper like the "Times" or the "Spectator" resides in the freedom of its workers, and the relationship of mutual respect and tolerance which subsists between them and the editorial head. When Lord Northcliffe talks of using the Delane tradition in order to promote a great newspaper trust in this country, he does not understand the A B C of his proposition. No man of his type can establish or maintain a really great newspaper. He has not the knowledge, or the qualities of mind and temper, necessary to such a task. It is true that a thin veneer, a plausible pretence, of culture is given to a paper like the "Daily Mail," and that a few special contributors are well paid and are given prominence in its mechanical scheme. But the foundation of the Harmsworth system is the creation of a great profit-making machinery, the essence of which is an appeal, not to the intelligent or the thoughtful—and they belong to all classes, in England as elsewhere—but to the multitude, on the plane which brings in the greatest number of adherents to each special publication. This discovered, the changes may be rung on a few simple motives, and the commoner mind led through its passions, its love of sport, the fascination of crime, the gambling instinct, the amusements of the vacant, its impulsive inconsistency, its love of cheap, coarse thrills, its indifference to facts and inability to weigh arguments. The general level of the editorial mind which governs the Harmsworth publications may be gathered by the ludicrous issue called the "History of the World," which described Louis XVI. as an "Emperor of France," and from the ignorance of common facts even of contemporary history which has from time to time been shown by the "Daily Mail." The general Harmsworth appeal is, in a word, to the uneducated by the half or the quarter educated. No able body of men, independent, self-confident, fortified with special knowledge and long reflection, will consent to pass under the Harmsworth harrow, to write down to the Harmsworth conception of what journalism should be, to find the common denominator of taste and sentiment and culture to which the Harmsworth publication descends. Good journalism, like good literature, naturally seeks to be original, to be adventurous, to be individual in its method and form of expression; above all, to be free. Delane's treatment of his staff was on these principles. Inheriting a tradition of some years' standing, and eager to extend and fortify it, he dealt with men abler, or, at least, far better informed, than himself. He conducted a paper for the governing world by the medium of his personal tact and delicate instinct, and his feeling of what was due to original work. He had to cultivate accuracy, weight, special knowledge and literary power, and to find a staff able to convey these qualities. Is the organiser of "Home Chat" or the "Daily Mail" likely to fill the place of the great mentor of the "Times" in the days when it was a power in the land?

But, indeed, it is necessary to examine the foundations of the financial success of the Harmsworth combine in order to see from what its ruling spirit derives. Here is an account of the working of the two great Harmsworth companies, the Amalgamated Press and the Associated Newspapers, and also of two of the most successful of the individual enterprises of the firms—namely, the "Evening News" and "Answers," when they were separate companies. No candid student of journalism would, we imagine, say of either of these concerns that it possessed any literary value whatsoever. Yet it will be observed that their success, to use the advertising slang, has been "phenomenal," and that the combination which includes the most distinctly non-literary group of publications returns its 40 per cent. dividend, as against the more modest 10 per cent. which accrues from the newspaper proper:—

Amalgamated Press, Limited,

formerly Harmsworth Brothers, Limited, formed in October, 1896. Capital, £1,000,000, 500,000 5% preference shares offered at par. 500,000 ordinary shares taken by vendors. Took over businesses of the "Answers" Publications, Ltd., Periodical Publishing Co., Ltd., Pandora Publishing Co., Ltd., and the Geraldine Press. Acquired "Answers," "Home Chat," "Forget-me-not," "The Sunday Companion," "Sunday Stories," "The Marvel," "The Boy's World," "Home, Sweet Home," "Chips," "Union Jack," "Comic Cuts," "Comic Home Journal," "The Wonder," and "Pluck." Combined circulation stated at 3,000,000 weekly.

Profits Certified in Prospectus:

To 31 May, 1896, £107,120.

Results:

	Net profit.	Dividend.	Reserve.
Year to 31 Oct., 1897	... £174,066	... 20 per cent.	... †£25,000
,, ,, 31 Oct., 1898	... 177,643	... 22½ per cent.	... 15,000
,, ,, 31 Oct., 1899	... 181,107	... 25 per cent.	... 10,000
,, ,, 31 Oct., 1900	... 230,623	... 30 per cent.	... 25,000
,, ,, *31 Oct., 1901	... 236,671	... 35 per cent.	... 25,000
,, ,, ‡31 Oct., 1902	... 249,172	... 40 per cent.	... 25,000
,, ,, 31 Oct., 1903	... 266,223	... 40 per cent.	... 26,000
,, ,, 31 Oct., 1904	... 253,156	... 35 per cent.	... 25,000
,, ,, 31 Oct., 1905	... 255,519	... 40 per cent.	... 25,000
,, ,, 31 Oct., 1906	... 256,615	... 40 per cent.	... 25,000

	Net profit.	Dividend.	Reserve.
Year to 31 Oct., 1907	... 257,338	... 40 per cent.	... £25,000

* £77,866 allowed for depreciation, before arriving at net profits.
† Carried forward.
‡ Company's name changed.

"Evening News," Limited,

formed December, 1896. Capital, £250,000, 25,000 5% £5 preference shares offered for subscription at par. 125,000 £1 ordinary shares taken by vendors.

Profits Certified in Prospectus:
Year to 31 Aug., 1895 £14,018.
,, ,, 31 Aug., 1906 25,357.

Results:

	Net profit.	Dividend.	Reserve.
14 months to 31 Oct., 1897	... £29,410	... 10 per cent.	... £4,000
12 ,, ,, ,, 1898	.. 32,393	... 17½ per cent.	... 4,000
,, ,, ,, ,, 1899	.. 36,959	... 20 per cent.	... 6,000
,, ,, ,, ,, *1900	... 48,316	.. 22½ per cent.	... 5,000
		(and bonus of 1s. 6d. per share)
,, ,, ,, ,, 1901	.. 43,278	... 25 per cent.	... 5,000
,, ,, ,, ,, 1902	... 44,040	... 25 per cent.	... 5,000
,, ,, ,, ,, 1903	... 44,654	... 25 per cent.	... 5,000
,, ,, ,, ,, 1904	... 44,815	... 25 per cent.	... 6,000

Carried forward at 31 Oct., 1904, £6,287; working and reserve capital, total £89,653, at 31 Oct., 1904.
* War period.

Associated Newspapers, Limited,

formed in April, 1905. Capital, £1,600,000, £500,000 5% preference shares, £600,000 ordinary, carrying a 7% cumulative dividend, £500,000 deferred shares. The preference and ordinary shares offered at par, deferred shares all going to vendors. Company formed to acquire the "Daily Mail," "Illustrated Mail," "Overseas Mail," "Evening News," and "Weekly Dispatch."

Profit Given in Prospectus:
£152,000 per annum.

Results:

	Net profit.	Dividend on Deferred.	To reserve.
Year to 31 March, 1906	... £159,787	... 8 per cent.	... £20,000
	Carried forward, £6,275.
,, ,, 31 March, 1907	... 161,400	... 10 per cent	.. 20,000
,, ,, 31 March, 1908	... 155,300	... 10 per cent.	... 40,000

"Answers," Limited,

formed in June, 1893, to acquire the weekly periodical, established in 1888. Capital, £275,000, £100,000 ordinary shares taken by vendors, £125,000 7% preference shares, and £50,000 £1 ordinary shares offered for subscription, the latter at 10s. per share premium.

Certified Net Profits Given in Prospectus:

Year ending 31 March, 1890	£1,097
,, ,, ,, 1891	5,305
,, ,, ,, 1892	11,793
,, ,, ,, 1893	23,949

Results:

	Net profits.	Dividend.
Year to 31 May, 1894	... £30,059	... 15 per cent.	... £838 carrd. frwd.
,, *1905	... 35,457	... 20 per cent.	... 6,492 to reserve.
,, 1906	... 47,806	... 22½ per cent.	... 8,000 to reserve.

* Name changed to "Answers" Publications, Ltd.
Several other publications included.

On these figures we have one remark to make. Our readers will observe the notable increase in the net profits of "Answers," which in one year leapt from £1,000 odd to £5,000, and in two more years to nearly £24,000, largely due to the missing word gamble, which was afterwards declared to be illegal. But we will take Lord Northcliffe himself as the interpreter of the secret of his triumph. It was expounded in an interview which appeared in the "Sketch" of July 18th, 1894, in which Mr. Harmsworth, as he then was, was described as the "founder and editor of the 'Answers' publications," the basis and stand-by of the Harmsworth fortunes:—

> "After rather more than a year's hard work, the circulation had gone up to 78,000 per week. At that time there was a mania for prize competitions. A bold stroke was necessary, and we made it. We offered one pound per week for life to the man, woman, or child who could guess on a postcard the amount of the Bank of England's return for a certain week. The effect was electrical. From 78,000 the circulation went up to 205,000 copies weekly in six weeks. My office was inundated with postcards from people who wanted to win the prize. The competition became the talk of the kingdom, and when the eventful day arrived on which the notice was posted the Bank of England was surrounded by a surging crowd. The excitement was tremendous."

What was the effort of founding the Roman race—Romanam condere gentem—after this?

(To be concluded.)

Short Studies.

A REVOLUTIONARY.

He seemed genuinely glad to see me, bigoted parson though I was. It may have been because he was carrying a ladder. It was a solid piece of workmanship, and ran to a dozen or more rungs. A better excuse for breaking one's journey might exist, but this is sufficient in a country lane. When within vocal distance he propped the butt of it against the patient earth and, linking his arm in a rung, awaited my advent with his hat off. The latter fact I attributed to cranial considerations rather than respect for the Church. He attended occasionally, but, as he politely admitted, felt like a fish out of water, or a giant at an infants' school.

"No fear of people breaking their necks on that," I said, complimenting him on his work. Whatever our professional regrets we may not be offended or alarmed if the world is learning to walk without crutches.

"I dunno," he answered, indifferently. "They might fall hoff it. There 's a variety o' ways o' gettin' drownded besides skatin' on bad ice. Do our level best (an' only a rogue 'd do less), accidents 'll happen. The 'ole includes the part."

"I didn't know you were such a pessimist!" I rejoined, making a mental note of the axiom.

"Neether did I! You should paten' th' discovery! But there's a difference between misfortunes an' mindin' 'em. It's not what takes place or don't take place as matters so much, but 'ow you 'old your 'ead. For myself, I 'ave read the noosepapers, not to mention the 'Oly Bible, until I'm as seasoned as a cor'ner. Nothink ever troubles me, thank the Lord!"

He replaced his hat with every sign of independence and satisfaction.

"But we should care," I reproved, glad of the opportunity of preaching, "when the circumstances are such. Gallio's is an unhealthy state of mind."

"Care away then, sir!" he permitted, like a bishop bestowing his blessing. "I'd be very sorry to 'prive you o' the pleasure. As for un'ealthy, I don't find that it interferes with my happetite by day or my sleep by night. Nor 'ave I 'eard as it stops anyone doin' their best. Trust 'em! Th' Almighty sees to that every time. Not that I objeck to other people worryin'," he added, generously. "They might be only worse if they didn't. Everyone to their tastes. Pers'nally, which needn't 'fect nobody, I get on better without it."

His weather-beaten face shone with amusement or good nature or both.

"Are you always so cheerful?" I asked, wonderingly, forgetting my previous imputation.

"Sundays hexcepted!" he laughed.

As vicar of the parish I could not let this pass unchallenged; so I asked him to explain himself.

"Because Sunday is the one day o' the week when people make a p'int of bin miserable. I don't say but what they're down an' glum enough other days spite of everythink God an' man can do to buck 'em up; but on Sundays it's like a livin' funeral. The change is too big an' sudden to be 'olesome for anybody. Nature don't stop on the Sabbath so far as I can make out. That's why there's such a many su'cides between Saturday night an' Monday mornin'." (This was statistical news to me.) "It throws 'em out o' gear, if you understand me. The very childher are fretful an' cantankerous because they can't move 'and or foot. They don't know what's the matter with Sunday, but they're perfeck sure somethink is. Things 'ave bin workin' round a bit o' late, no thanks to the goody-goodies, but still the sill'ness goes on."

"And how do you propose to cure it?" I asked, sarcastically. "By shutting up the churches?"

"It'll cure itself," he evaded, "in time. When people are stiflin' they'll get into the fresh air some'ow; an', by God! sir, the hatmosphere is pretty close an' sultry at this very minute. Fash'nable fans won't do much longer."

"You're a revolutionary!" I informed him.

"I'm anythink you like to call me," he answered, agreeably; "but no man, woman, or child 'll be any the worse for me. I'd ask the first p'leeceman I met to lock me up if I was dangerous! No, sir, the churches don't 'fend or bother me, for a very good reason, but they must now take their chance with the rest. Messers Illfallible an' Co. is dead."

Not while the speaker is alive, I could not help reflecting.

"There is a sin known as self-sufficiency," I simply reminded him. "And, again, 'they that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak.' There's a lot of misery and unhappiness in the world."

This strange being actually laughed. I recoiled.

"An' you call yourself a priest!" he exclaimed, vigorously. "That's not the way to lighten our darkness, sir. I'd sooner go to a comedian for my religion. Some people 'll b'lieve anythink you tell 'em. Pull a long face an' every little lookin'-glass in the neighbrihood 'll do the same. I could blubber myself as much as any old woman sometimes, but I know my place better, I 'ope. I may be a 'alf-an'-alf sort o' poor creature even to this day, but I'm no longer stone blind. It's a cheap world for nothink. An' I 'ave common sense enough to see that a hexter wet blanket isn't o' much service to the community. Yesterday I over'eard a pig squealin' for all he was worth because he objected to be turned into bacon. Did you ever know such a thing! If he could ha' reasoned 'bout the matter same as you or me he'd ha' bin only too delighted. Or when a mother, 'bout whose soft character there can be no doubt or question, is puttin' her own child to bed, ten to one he 'owls as if he was bin killed. Am I, therefore, to look grave an' sor'ful? Catch me!"

"But there is such a thing as compassion."

"There was," he corrected, "but we're learnin' somethink diff'rent an' better to-day. We don't want to melt away altogether. I'll join Church or State in lynchin' the devil, but I'm not goin' to slobber over plain natural facts. An' what's 'alf the so-called sympathy in the world worth?" In his effort to answer this delicate problem with the help of his finger and thumb, he nearly let the ladder fall on me. "Scratch-me-an'-I'll-scratch-you! That's all it is, sir. It's pure selfishness at the bottom. A man pities you, for example, if you get blinded by lightin', or lose your old cow. W'y? Because he couldn't bear these things happen to hisself. It's a conspir'cy like. Or if your wife goes an' dies people come with pocket 'andkerchers, whether you want 'em or not, until you feel like a pillar o' salt. The 'ole groanin' business is sickenin'. Stow it, I say. It's a plain insult to th' Almighty. I'm talking now o' growed people who ought to know better. They 'aven't a reel leg to stand on, these mock-mourners. Any'ow, sympathy's 'bout the worst thing you could offer 'em. It only makes 'em fancy theirselves, when it's sp'ilt enough they are a'ready. Death an' so on is a regular part o' the business, an' it's 'igh time we gave up screamin'. If th' Universe isn't grand an' good enough as it is, all the tinkerin' in th' world won't improve it, don't tell me!"

"What about ladders?" I asked, significantly.

"They're all right if you don't try to get to 'Eaven with 'em," he answered, shortly, shouldering the specimen in question, and walking away with it like a man who had lost much valuable time.

S. Henry.

Science.

THE PROBLEM OF FLYING.

There is no branch of applied science which has made such rapid and striking progress as aerial navigation. It is only a few years since Lilienthal in Germany made his pioneer attempts to glide through the air by attaching to his body a bird-like structure with huge wings, launching himself forward from the top of a hill, and trusting to the upward pressure of the air on the wings to maintain him in gradually descending flight down the slope. The attempt to solve the problem in this way ended in the death of the experimenter; but it may be regarded as the starting point of the aeroplane machines with which we have now become familiar.

Broadly speaking, machines for carrying heavy loads in any desired direction through the air may be divided into three classes—the common Balloon, the Aeroplane, and one which is a kind of combination of both, namely, the Dirigible Balloon. The first may now be regarded as very ancient—as antiquated, almost, as a battering ram. If it is able to reach a desired goal, it can do so only by rising or descending from one stratum of air to another until it finds a current in the desired direction. All this means the throwing out of ballast and the escape of gas, so that for all practical purposes, excepting that of military observations, we may leave the common Balloon out of account.

There remain the Aeroplane and the Dirigible, and as to the relative merits of these for commercial or military purposes, experts are divided in opinion, and the doubt must continue to exist for a year or two longer.

The principle of the Aeroplane can be understood easily by any ordinary reader, although the exact physical and mathematical principles involved are known very imperfectly. If a rigid heavy flat surface—say a square piece of board—is held in the air in a position inclined to the ground, and is by some means driven along horizontally with any considerable speed, the board will be lifted upwards in spite of its weight; and if the speed with which it is driven forward is very great, a very considerable weight can be carried. The part played here by the air which surrounds the board is a very complicated one. The motion of the air at the under side is very different from that of the air at the upper side, and the air pressure on the former much exceeds that on the latter. The upward thrust of this excess of pressure causes the lifting of the weight, so that the rôle of buoyancy of the air on the common (hydrogen-filled) balloon is here taken by the upward pressure thrust caused by the very motion of the plane itself.

So far as the lifting of a load is concerned, the moving plane surface is satisfactory. But there is another consideration of infinite importance. The point on the under surface at which the total pressure-thrust is applied may (owing to gusts in the air) take such a position that the plane will turn over sideways, plunge downwards head-foremost, or in some other way depart from its steady motion—that is, the Aeroplane may not possess stability. The very essence of a successful Aeroplane is stability, and many devices have been adopted to insure this. But it is absolutely impossible to say at the present moment whether a really trustworthy result has been obtained or not.

The Aeroplane which just now occupies the foremost position in navigation consists not of one plane surface, but of two placed parallel to each other, one above the other, and braced together by light rigid rods—like a rectangular box with all its sides removed and only the top and bottom retained, these being braced together at the corners. In each of these rectangular planes the length of one side is six or seven times that of the other, and the machine travels through the air in the direction of the shorter side—contrary, perhaps, to expectation.

Considerations of stability render this form preferable to a single plane surface. Examples are furnished by the machines of the brothers Wright, of Ohio, Mr. Henry Farman, the French Captain Ferber, and others. To Sir Hiram Maxim belongs, probably, the credit of having first used this double plane form; and the employment of the two planes which the operator, by pulling certain cords, can render slightly non-parallel secures in the Wright machine a control of stability; steering is effected by a large vertical rudder placed at the back, and rising or falling by a horizontal rudder at the front. The machine is driven forward by means of a light petrol motor, which sets a screw-propeller in motion, as in ordinary ocean navigation, and the speed that may be attained is probably greater than that of an express railway train.

Apart from stability, that which has rendered this machine so successful is the employment of very light petrol motors, previous machines of the same kind having been handicapped by the use of steam engines with heavy boilers, furnaces, water, and coal—all of which are now dispensed with.

Thus, if stability in rough weather can be attained, the Aeroplane navigates the air as successfully as a bird. But, in order to secure stability, it will not suffice to trust to the skill of an operator, however ready he may be; he can never hope to possess the instinctive and instantaneous perception on which the bird acts. In other words, the stability of the Aeroplane must be automatic, or inherent, in the machine itself—and nothing like an adequate proof of the attainment of this has yet been given by any constructor.

There is a scientific fascination about the Aeroplane which does not belong to any other airship; but it is altogether wild to talk of crossing the Atlantic—a feat which could be performed if our aerial ocean would only consent to remain steady for two or three days. Over and above such considerations, we are compelled to ask, what material advantage does mankind hope to gain by such machines? Rich invalids might benefit by prolonged residence in the upper air, and people whose sole thought is of racing might like to scorch in some atmospheric Brooklands and relieve a sorely afflicted Earth of their presence.

There remains the Dirigible Balloon, such as that of Count Zeppelin and those possessed by France. "Zeppelin IV.," whose recent destruction has supplied a valuable lesson on machines of this class, was a structure of gigantic dimensions. Its balloon part, or gaseous chamber, was, roughly, a cylinder having a length of about 150 yards, and a diameter of over fourteen; this cylinder was of the kind called "rigid," being constructed largely of an alloy of aluminium, to secure lightness and strength; but how far this immense envelope deserved the epithet of "rigid" the storm in which it was caught demonstrated. The gas which was contained in this chamber was hydrogen, so that an enormous lifting power was secured, and the driving was done by two motors, each of more than 100 horse-power, the two together weighing about half a ton.

There are certain very obvious elements of weakness in this machine. Firstly, there is the continuous and unavoidable escape of the hydrogen, which entails loss of buoyancy and some bad results besides. Then the enormous length of the body renders any real rigidity impossible, for there is always the condition that the structure must be very light; and in a troubled atmosphere the long body may be subject to violent forces in contrary directions, acting at different parts, and having a breaking or bending effect on the comparatively brittle framework. These objections do not apply to the same extent to the French Dirigibles or to our own type, the "Nulli Secundus," because their bodies are not of the "rigid" kind, and are not nearly so bulky as that of the "Zeppelin."

As regards the English Dirigible, "Nulli Secundus," there was nothing objectionable but the name, which was unduly boastful. The fate that overtook "Zeppelin IV." was nearly the same as that which destroyed "Nulli Secundus"; and to sudden and violent storms all kinds of airships will be dangerously exposed, especially if they attempt long voyages. "Nulli Secundus" was, in her day, a really striking success, and the accident which destroyed her furnishes no reason for sneers at her constructors.

That Count Zeppelin will succeed in travelling a thousand miles and remaining afloat for twenty-four hours we may accept as almost certain; that he will be out of the range of projectiles, even launched from the ground, is not so certain. But it would be ridiculous that, when he succeeds, there should be either frantic jubilation in Germany or serious uneasiness in England. We do not require to imitate the gigantic structures of Zeppelin; a fleet of one hundred of them could not land a military force of any value for the purpose of invasion; and even if it succeeded in making an appearance, it could be fatally checked by a few Dirigibles of a smaller and more handy kind. Prudence compels us to possess a fleet of such ships, although it is not really likely that they will be required to repel invasion. Our own military department is capable of constructing the needful ships, and it is to be hoped that there will be no niggardliness on the part of the Government. There is a constant want of sympathy with scientific invention to be found in the heads of English Government departments; we cannot forget that the late Lord Goschen, when he was First Lord of the Admiralty, deprecated the construction of submarines by England, giving as the amazing reason that "submarines are essentially the weapons of the weaker power." There was common sense somewhere, and we have got the submarines. Doubtless we shall also get the Dirigibles—or the Aeroplanes if they should prove to suit our defensive needs better; but for anything like panic because "England is no longer an island" there is not the smallest justification.

GEORGE M. MINCHIN.

Letters from Abroad.

THE MERCIFUL TSAR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Tolstoy's passionate protest against capital punishment and his plea for greater mildness in the administration of the law are having their effect in Russia, though no newspaper dares to print in entirety the letter of the greatest of living writers, and though provincial papers which publish even less of the letter than the censor allowed the St. Petersburg papers to publish are punished by drastic fines. I say that the letter is, nevertheless, having its effect because I see in the "Russian Banner," the organ of the "Black Hundred," that, at the solicitation of Dr. Dubrovin, the notorious head of that notorious organisation, the reactionists condemned for Jew-killing on the occasion of the Briansk "pogrom" last August, have been graciously pardoned by the Tsar.

All of these Jew-baiters are, I believe, ruffians of mature years, but I suppose that the Emperor has some good reason for pardoning them, and for consistently refusing to pardon the youths of eighteen and nineteen, members of revolutionary organisations, who are executed almost every week for attempts to kill unpopular officials. A short time ago in Pskoff, a schoolboy, well under twenty, called Falevitch, was condemned to death for an attempt to murder a detective called Yerenin. About the same time a peasant called Usoff, nineteen years of age, was hanged in Kharkoff for an attempt to murder a Lieut.-Col. Rybalk. If there was ever a case in which the Tsar should have exercised his prerogative of mercy it was this. Usoff was an amiable, enthusiastic youth, whose only crime—it was, of course, a most grave crime—was this attempt at murder. Moreover, he alone, of all the hundreds of young men who have perished on the revolutionary side during the last three years expressed some kind of regret for his action. Further, he consented to make his confession before death and allowed himself to be persuaded by the priest to write to his father a letter saying that his own foolishness had brought him to the gallows. It is not clear that he also repudiated his revolutionary doctrines, for in the printed copies of the letter there are gaps, marked by asterisks. In any case, twenty minutes after he had been induced to write this letter he was taken out and hanged. Before his body was cold his executioners rushed with this private communication to the printing office of the "Kharkoff Government Gazette," which printed it, triumphantly, so as to show that one revolutionist, at least, has quailed on the steps of the gallows.

A book, a terrible book, could be compiled from the last letters of Russian revolutionists condemned to death, but among all these dark epistles it would contain few that would be more touching than this simple letter of Usoff. He does not turn "King's evidence," he does not betray any of his companions or blame anyone but himself, and the tone is so naïve so unaffected and heart-rending, that, by circulating it and crowing over it, the Government has done itself much more harm than good. The newspapers quote it, not as an awful warning to young revolutionists, but in order to ask their readers what are they to think of a government which could perpetrate such a brutality.

The letter begins, in a simple, peasant fashion, with a series of cheerful salutations. "Hail, father! How are you doing? How is your health?" Then, growing suddenly sad, the boy goes on as follows:—

> "Up to this moment I am alive and healthy, but in less than an hour I shall no more exist in this world. Then, father, I pray you, do not curse me, but remember me in your prayers, which are so acceptable before God. Father! this evening I went to sleep and did not think that my last hour had come, i.e., that death awaited me. But lo! at nine o'clock they suddenly called me, whither, I knew not. They brought me to the office where prisoners for Siberia are received. Then there came to me a priest, and he asked me did I not wish to see him? I said that of course I was glad to see him, and with a clean heart I welcomed him. And lo! when I had made my confession and had received the Holy Communion, he begged me to please write you a letter, which I am now doing at the present moment, i.e., before my death.
>
> "How can it be, father? Seven months have I been here, and now, suddenly they have resolved to hang me. . . . But, nichevo (no matter). Our Lord said that he who took the sword should perish by the sword. This has happened to me. Within twenty minutes I go to meet death. Nobody here will save me, neither friend nor enemy, and I do not want to be saved, because I have seen enough of the sorrows of the people, and to see them no longer is the best way out of it. It's the Government's business. Now, father, forgive, forgive me for ever! No more, after this, shall I write you letters, never again shall I see your sweet smile. Father! I beg you to have a mass, even if it be but one mass, said for my sinful soul. And also ask forgiveness for me of all my relatives and friends. And of mother, even though she be only my step-mother, I humbly, humbly beg pardon, because I often said that she was the ruin of me. But that is not true; I was ruined by my own folly. Forgive me! Write a letter to me in the other world! I have no more time—they are waiting for me. . . Your son, now a corpse. Michael Petroff Usoff. . . . 12 o'clock at night."

Even to mention the hard lot of political prisoners not yet condemned to death, after such a tragedy as this, may seem like an anti-climax. But it is not so. The fate of such prisoners is, as a rule, worse than that of the executed. To prove my point I do not need to quarry the archives of SS. Peter and Paul, or any other fortress-prison. I need only take, at haphazard, a contemporary instance, as I did in the case of Usoff. One day in February last the police suddenly surrounded the Agricultural School in Pskoff and arrested the Director and sixty-five of his pupils on suspicion of being connected with some revolutionary plot. It is now August, but no charge has yet been made against them, and, meanwhile, they are treated with shocking inhumanity. The Director has died in prison, and all of the sixty-five boys, some of whom are only fifteen years of age, are crowded together in one room, a room built to accommodate only thirty-nine persons—and this despite the fact that there are many vacant rooms in the prison. The boys have to sleep two in a bed, and the atmosphere of their cell has been described by Russians (who are not at all a fastidious people in the matter of ventilation) as "impossible" and "putrid." This is not surprising, for the present summer is so damp and enervating in this part of Russia, that even the Tsar finds his spacious palace on the seashore intolerable, and has been compelled to spend most of the summer in yachting excursions. The atmosphere in Pskoff prison is not improved by the excrementa, which poison the air for days and days in the room where the schoolboys are confined. This fact is taken from the "Pskoff Life," which would be very unlikely to give false evidence on this point, as any exaggeration would be instantly followed by suppression. The boys are not allowed to take exercise, so that twenty of the younger ones are seriously ill, some of them so ill that they cannot move. A "feldsher" (a doctor's assistant, generally an old soldier, with a smattering of medical knowledge) "attends" to them, and perpetually scolds them, saying, "Are you not ashamed to waste the country's money in this way on medicine?" Some of these sick children—what else are they?—who have been sent to the prison hospital have been placed there among patients who are suffering from contagious diseases, such as tuberculosis, and even syphilis.

Here is a final case. On June 30th a boy called Somul, seventeen years of age, was released on account of the desperate state of his health. He is suffering from tuberculosis, caught in prison, and the doctors are doubtful of his recovery. As for the other boys, they are not allowed to read books or to see visitors, and they are now deliberately starving themselves, and have been without food for two days.—Yours, &c.,

St. Petersburg, Aug. 7th, 1908. AN ENGLISHMAN IN RUSSIA.

Letters to the Editor.

"THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I cannot help being much amused by the wails in the Press over the "lost liberty of the road." Vous l'avez voulu! Years ago I was amongst those who foresaw what was bound to happen, and when we went to ask a Secretary of State to issue regulations for the numbering of motors we were overwhelmed with vituperation and ridicule by the whole of the English Press, with the exception of the "Yorkshire Post." The "Times," in a leading article, asked whether it could enter into the mind of even a County Councillor to wish to affix a number to a harmless vehicle which would be mainly used by country gentlemen travelling to one another's houses. Had there been no numbering the death rate for the last five years would have gone up 100 per cent.

Last year a critic said that no well-constituted Englishman grudged his life or that of his family to promote the rise of a British industry. Over large tracts of country smoke has killed all the trees and fouled the public buildings, and the public has been, and is, acquiescent. Many of our rivers have been turned into sewers, and the attempt to clean them is met with a determined hostility by the most powerful unions of industry that exist. The "gentrie bleats" as of old. Magistrates have always been remarkable for their timidity, agriculturists are inarticulate, and the public at large is as powerless to deal with any evil as it is apathetic and feeble-minded. The manufacturing interest can combine, and knows what it wants; all of them possess motors, many of which are in the hands of men in whom, as Sir James Crichton-Browne remarked, homicidal mania is rapidly developed. This is the fourth year of my own experience of a motor, and my own driver is only held in check by constant warnings from myself. I insist on his crawling past carriage or horse or dog or when he goes through a village or past a cross-road, and on his never forcing a pedestrian into the hedge.

All my sympathies have been, and are, with the pedestrian, the deaf, the blind, the child, and the dog. "Calidus juventâ," I, like Tommy Onslow, drove a coach and two at nine miles an hour in London. Now I creep down St. James's Street in terror at the impending crossing, and remember with satisfaction that my will is made. You will ask me, Sir, what are my suggestions and advice to the public. They are "to live this day as if their last." The air is gone, their rivers are, except where the Rivers Boards exist, going from bad to worse, and their right to the road, or rather, their safety on it, is gone. They must comfort themselves with the thought that a new industry is being developed. No palliatives will be of any avail. The motorist flaunts his ὕβρις in the letters he writes and in his speech. Argument, logic, compassion, the rights of others, are all to him dead letters, and any railway track is safer to walk on than a main road between large towns.

Parliament and the Government departments are hostile to the desire of the local authorities to fix a speed limit through all populous districts. The proposal to abrogate altogether the speed limit if carried will double the number of casualties. The hooter is of little use when the car is turning a corner at twenty miles an hour and a high wind is blowing. You have placed a rifle suddenly in the hands of a savage, and you have no Crusoe to lecture him regarding its use. I apologise to Friday for this simile, who was a Bayard compared to the motor driver of to-day.

Personally, I have been very fortunate, and my record of accidents is not such as to trouble my conscience. A cyclist frightened a pheasant, which flew across my car and was killed. Remembering a bygone story of the Bench regarding a pheasant in spring, I told my driver to pick it up, but he returned to tell me that the cyclist had already gone off with it. On another occasion I ran over a cockerel, and paid the owner 2s., who assessed its value at that amount and ate it at dinner that evening.

There is only one remedy for the evil—a complete change in human nature. When your correspondence ceases there will be a consensus of opinion in favor of a mutual protection society to assert the right of forty-three millions of people to the road, and possibly to take steps at the next general election to press sane legislation on candidates. There will then be more correspondence. Lord Montagu of Beaulieu will write a letter in big print, to be followed by others in small print. The elections will take place, the candidates will promise their careful consideration to the views expressed by the society, and during the contest will impress upon their drivers that the people in the road are more than men and brothers on this particular occasion, that they are constituents, and must for at least a fortnight be spared until they have recorded their votes. More must not be expected. Those who complain to-day must comfort themselves with the thought that the England they are living in is an Arcadia of peace and happiness compared with what will be its condition in ten years' time.—Yours, &c.,

CASSANDRA.

August 11th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I was much interested in your article on "The Lost Liberty of the Road." I see, also, that even footpaths have been invaded by the motor. They manage these things better in Germany. Here in Berchtesgaden, also in Thuringia, and doubtless in other parts of Germany, the Amtsbezirk selects what roads may be used by motors; all others are strictly prohibited. It certainly seems as if the local authorities who have to maintain the roads should have some voice in the way they are used.—Yours, &c.,

L. MARSHALL.

Berchtesgaden.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As "R. W. J." complains that he has not had fair play, may I be allowed to say that my letter implied that "the motorist" in his letter is an abstraction, a puppet dressed in his prejudice and staged with suitable scenery? I have never said that motors do not make dust, nor that motors are now kept by people who could not afford another kind of vehicle, but that many people of moderate means now use them who previously did not own a vehicle. As an increasing number of doctors are using them for their daily work, I suppose "R. W. J." will insist in including them in his "parcel of rich vulgarians."

My point is that it is necessary at present to bear in mind that hard cases make bad law, and that this matter can no more be settled by an appeal to prejudice than the older one of the bicycle. The readers of THE NATION look for it to be treated with the same gravity and knowledge as any other.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY S. CLOUGH.

August 10th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As I own two motor-cars, and hold an R. A. C. driving certificate, no one will consider me an enemy to motoring. I think, however, that an end should be put to the manner in which many motorists heedlessly annoy the rest of this world.

If the following changes were made in the Motor-Car Act I think a great improvement would be caused:—

(1) Speed limit thirty miles an hour instead of twenty on an open road.

(2) Speed limit ten miles in all towns and villages.

(3) Imprisonment, without option of a fine, for all gross cases of driving to the danger of the public.

(4) Confiscation of the car, and its retention for a period not exceeding six months, for a second or other conviction for dangerous driving.

(5) Withdrawal of driving licence, after more than one endorsement, for a period to be fixed by the magistrates.

I think by these regulations the "road hog" would soon be exterminated, while the careful driver would not be affected.

The majority of motorists have, I think, little notion of the feeling non-motorists entertain for reckless drivers.—Yours, &c.,

J. COLQUHOUN READE.

Crowe Hall, Sutton, Suffolk,
August 10th, 1908.

[We shall be glad of further suggestions on the lines of our correspondent's interesting letter.—ED., THE NATION.]

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Apropos of the correspondence taking place in your pages at present on the "Lost Liberty of the Road'" I think the following quotation, taken from Dickens' "Tale of Two Cities," so very much to the point that I should be obliged if you will kindly give it a place in your columns. Why should free peoples in these days submit to a tyranny of the wealthy, as ruthless and brutal as that of the French aristocrats towards the peasantry in the days before the Revolution?

> "The man drove as if he were charging an enemy, and the furious recklessness of the man brought no check into the face, or to the lips of the master. . . . With a wild rattle and clatter, and an inhuman abandonment of consideration not easy to be understood in these days (!) the carriage dashed through streets and swept round corners, with women screaming before it, and clutching children out of its way. At last, swooping a street corner one of the wheels came to a sickening little jolt, and there was a loud cry from numbers of voices, and the horses reared and plunged. But for this latter inconvenience the carriages were often known to drive on and leave their wounded behind—and why not? A tall man in a night-cap had caught up a bundle from among the wheels—'Killed!' shrieked the man, in wild desperation extending both arms above his head, 'Dead!'
>
> "The Marquis took out his purse. 'It is extraordinary to me,' said he, 'that you people cannot take care of yourselves and your children. One or other of you is always getting in the way. How do I know what injury you have done to my horses? See, give him that.' But the man only called out again with an unearthly cry, 'Dead!'"

—Yours, &c.,

S. HINE.

Edinburgh, August 10th, 1908.

[We are obliged to hold over several letters on this subject.—ED., THE NATION.]

THE ART OF OPENING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Like many others, I have been greatly interested in your article on "The Art of Opening," which seems exactly what a leader in such a paper as THE NATION ought to be. Something suggestive and mentally stimulating, setting us all thinking and screwing up our memories to furnish other instances of the good start which often is the making of a book or poem, in catching the eye, and seizing the attention which is to be held later on by what follows. A good opening sometimes reminds me of the overture to one of the old-fashioned English operas: where we get an aural glimpse of the set melodies which form the pièce de résistance of each act, and where the marble halls in which fancy is to invite us to dwell flit for the moment past our ears, and the scenes that are brightest may charm us for a few bars, before we are officially invited to enjoy their full fascination. Great admirer as I am of Sir Walter Scott, I am bound to admit that his novels are surrounded by a stiff zareba of prosy prose, which we must surmount before we reach the enchanted land of chivalry and romance beyond. But whenever he approaches the lyrical drama, he touches the right note at once, and his openings have something of the overture quality. For instance, what can be better than this?—

"The way was long, the wind was cold,
The minstrel was infirm and old;
His withered cheek and tresses gray
Seemed to have known a better day.
His harp, his sole remaining joy,
Was carried by an orphan boy.
The last of all the bards was he,
Who sung of Border chivalry:
For, well-a-day! their date was fled—
His tuneful brethren all were dead;
And he, neglected and oppressed,
Wished to be with them and at rest."

Now does not this give a perfect picture of a poor old deserted and forsaken man, flung on the barren shore of poverty and neglect by the advancing tide of modern civilisation?

And is not this a suggestive word picture of a bit of Highland scenery?—

"The stag at eve had drunk his fill
Where danced the moon on Monan's rill,
And deep his midnight lair had made
In lone Glenartney's hazel shade.
But when the sun his beacon red
Had kindled on Benvoirlich's head,
The deep-mouthed bloodhound's heavy bay
Resounded up the rocky way;
And faint, from farther distance borne,
Were heard the clanging hoof and horn."

The first verse of "Marmion" seems to me about as good as it can be made:—

"Day set on Norman's castled steep,
And Tweed's fair river, broad and deep,
And Cheviot's mountains lone.
The battled towers, the donjon keep,
The loop-hole grates where captives weep,
The flanking walls that round it sweep,
In yellow lustre shone.
The warriors on the turrets high,
Moving athwart the evening sky,
Seemed forms of giant height;
Their armour, as it caught the rays,
Flashed back again the western blaze
In lines of dazzling light."

Surely there is a wealth of suggestion here for anyone to whom the romantic days of old-world feudalism, and the antiquarian charm of the clash of steel, and the wild echoes flying after the trumpet's note, appeal with vivid interest.

One of your correspondents referred to Dickens. He is generally a good "opener." But for a crisp start he never did anything better than the first line of the "Cricket on the Hearth":—

"Kettle began it."

And Byron gave a good send-off to Don Juan in these words:—

"I want a hero, an uncommon want."

We might fill your entire paper with similar contributions from our reading and recollections, but probably by this time you are heartily sick of the whole subject, and would like a change.

So I will give you one, and that is to quote lines in poetry or prose most descriptive of various personal or social conditions. For instance, what can give a more complete idea of deafness than this from Hood's "Miss Kilmansegg and her Precious Leg"?

"She might have worn a percussion cap,
And been knocked on the head without hearing the snap."

And then blindness.

"Dark, dark for ever
Is our earthly home."

(Unknown.)

And Milton's:—

"Too thick a drop serene has quenched those orbs."

And does not this make you shiver?—

"At Agnes Eve, and bitter chill it was;
The owl, for all its feathers, was a-cold."

(Keats.)

Next Shakespeare:—

"Poor naked wretches, wheresoe'er you are,
That bide the pelting of this pitiless storm,
How shall your houseless heads and unfed sides,
Your loop'd and window'd raggedness, defend you
From seasons such as these?"

But Burns runs him hard:—

"When biting Boreas, fell an' doure,
Sharp shivers through the leafless bower,
When Phœbus gi'es a short-lived glower,
Far south the lift,
Dim darkening through the flaky shower
Or whirling drift."

And the same poet's address to the toothache is painfully realistic:—

"My curse upon your venomed stang,
That shoots my tortured gums alang,
And through my lungs gi'es sic a twang
Wi' gnawing vengeance,
Tearing my nerves wi' bitter pang,
Like racking engines."

Surely we were never reminded of a hopelessly wet day, better than by Longfellow:—

"The day is cold and dark and dreary,
It rains and the wind is never weary;
The moss still clings to the mouldering wall,
And with every gust some dead leaves fall:
Some days must be dark and dreary."

Now for something more bright and jovial—a bit of baccanial revelry worthy of Omar Khayyam, and perhaps the best quoted lines in the English language:—

"O for a beaker full of the warm South,
Full of the true, the blushful Hippocrene,
With headed bubbles winking at the brim,
And purple-stained mouth;
That I may drink and leave the world unseen,
And with thee fade away into the forest dim."

But I expect you are now getting bored, and are looking suspiciously towards the waste-paper basket. Perhaps, however, some of your other readers will give this hare a run.—Yours, &c.,

ROBERT FARQUHARSON.

Fingean, Aboyne, Aberdeenshire,
August 11th, 1908.

LIBERALISM AND LABOR

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am glad to see that THE NATION has used the result of the Haggerston election to call attention once more to the too frequent occurrence of a divided battle which ends in the return of the Tory.

Let us hope that, by a careful testing of the various methods for meeting this danger which are offered by proportional representation, second ballot, and alternative vote, the Government will include in their Electoral Reform Bill some scheme for dealing with this unsatisfactory state of affairs by legislation.

But in the meanwhile cannot something be done, and in view of the fact that a Reform Bill will probably meet with rough handling from the House of Lords, ought not something to be done to unite the army of progress against the heavily subsidised forces of Protection and Toryism?

It is important to remember that there is no distinct line of cleavage among the Progressives. The Left Wing of the Liberal Party shades off through Labor into Socialism, and what is required, to my mind, is a change of policy at headquarters, not only directed towards the better organisation of Liberalism in the country, but more especially with a view to abandoning the attitude of suspicion and hostility towards the Independent Labor Party which has characterised the régime since the General Election, for one of conciliation, compromise, and even encouragement.

This latter was the policy adopted by the Chief Whip before the General Election. Not ostentatious alliance, for that is not possible, but the judicious selection of seats that might be left to Labor, reciprocal concessions, the determined avoidance of three-cornered fights, the careful choice of an advanced Liberal candidate where Labor was strongly represented in the constituency but had no candidate; in short, a diplomatic policy of deliberate co-operation whenever possible. It required undoubtedly judgment and skill to deal with delicate situations and confer with dissentient local associations. But the Chief Whip of the time realised that, not by accentuating the differences in constructive policy, but by unity and agreement in attack, the best results from the constituencies could be obtained. The consequence was that, without hindrance or internal discord, the voice of progress was able to find expression to the fullest extent throughout the country at the election.

I will not enter into the question as to who has been to blame for the growth of antagonism between the two sections that has arisen since January, 1906. It is sufficient to know that it exists, and that the Tories have to some extent succeeded in fanning the flames by alarming moderate Liberals with their highly-colored and ridiculously over-drawn pictures of the dangers of Socialism.

There is talk in the Liberal ranks at times of fighting Socialism as a method of dealing with this difficulty. Nothing, in my opinion, would be so fatal. Socialism is not our enemy. The few Socialists in the House of Commons vote nine times out of ten with the Government, and when they do not it is only because they are eager to quicken the pace, and on these occasions many Radicals join with them. Our enemy still remains, and will remain for years to come, a deeply-rooted prejudiced, retrograde Toryism, which has at its disposal vast wealth and powerful influence with which to win over the still unthinking and indifferent portions of the electorate. To fight Socialism, which cannot be detached from Independent Labor, which, in its turn, cannot be detached from Trade Union Labor and Radicalism, will produce a rift widening in time to a chasm right through the party of progress. It is true that this chasm may in time form itself from the natural tendency of political forces, but it would be a fatal mistake to engineer such a split, a mistake which our real enemy would greatly rejoice in, as it would inevitably result in their supremacy again, perhaps for another generation.—Yours, &c.,

ARTHUR PONSONBY.

Shulbrede Priory, Sussex,
August 8th, 1908.

[We cannot too strongly express our complete agreement with Mr. Ponsonby's letter.—ED., THE NATION.]

HEAVEN AS TOWN OR COUNTRY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your article on "A Green Heaven" is interesting. There seems to have been a conflict of ideas about heaven, as to whether it is town or country, from the time of the early Church to the present day. Gibbon, in his fifteenth chapter, remarks that: "A Garden of Eden, with the amusements of the pastoral life, was no longer suited to the advanced state of society which prevailed under the Roman Empire. A city was therefore erected of gold and precious stones, and a supernatural plenty of corn and wine was bestowed on the adjacent territory." And then there is the story of a poor woman dying in a London slum, who, when the splendors of the New Jerusalem were described to her, said she would rather go somewhere in the country. No doubt the Jews conceived their first idea of Paradise when they were a country people and in their own land. This idea may have changed when they were in captivity, and came to think of Jerusalem as the most sacred and desirable place in the world; and the new idea may have been confirmed, even after the return from captivity, in the minds of Alexandrian Jews. It is difficult to see why the idea of a country Paradise should be more pagan than that of a new Jerusalem; except that to us, with our ugly modern towns, the beauty of a country Paradise is nearer to an earthly beauty that we know. The conflict of the two ideas is probably sharper in modern and Protestant England than in other countries and times; because, on the one hand, we are by nature a country people, many of whom live in ugly towns which they dislike and make nothing of; while, on the other, being Protestants, we are more familiar with the text of the Bible, and particularly with the Book of Revelation, than most Catholics. Thus it is against our will and instinct that we accept the Revelation conception of heaven; and there is a constant tendency among our simple people to depart from it. It would be worth while for someone to collect descriptions of heaven from our poets. I think the idea of a country Paradise would be found to predominate among them. In the poem in Blake's preface to his Milton the two ideas are combined. The Jerusalem which he would build "in England's green and pleasant land" seems to be a country town, like the pleasant towns in "News from Nowhere." But the poem is only half religious, and half an anticipation of Ruskin and Morris. The "Land of Dreams" is altogether a country Paradise:—

> "O what land is the Land of Dreams?
> What are its mountains, and what are its streams?
> O father! I saw my mother there,
> Among the lilies by waters fair."

These instinctive and undictated ideas of another world, especially when they come from a great poet, are interesting and delightful, even if they have no authority.—Yours, &c.,

A. CLUTTON BROCK.

Farncombe, August 8th, 1908.

[We should be glad to have any information as to popular thought on this subject which our readers may have collected.—ED., THE NATION.]

SOME FRUITS OF THE FREE TRADE CONGRESS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is to be hoped that the success of the recent Free Trade Congress will lead to a more vigorous attack being made on the great dangers incidental to the Protective system. The evils of land monopoly have led to the overcrowding of our cities and to the importation of a larger proportion of the food of the people which might have been largely produced at home, if only we had the petite culture in operation here such as exists in France.

In your able article on the Congress in current number you rightly lay stress on the dangers and corruptions which "everywhere spring up under the shadow of a protective tariff." That danger has already begun to operate in this country, and is being unscrupulously used at by-elections. Those who wish to exploit England on the American Trust system are already at work in various ways to secure what they are pleased to call "Tariff Reform." The speeches of the Prime Minister and of Mr. Winston Churchill must have dispelled any idea or fear that protective duties are necessary to the carrying out of social reform. On the contrary, it was conclusively demonstrated at this Congress how Protection lowered the moral level of public life and impoverished the worker for the benefit of a few speculators. The evils of the Trust system, "shown up" in so masterly a way by Mr. Franklin Pierce (U.S.A.), are just as bad—as prejudicial to the worker and the nation—as are those connected with our own land system. The Congress was also remarkable for the papers and addresses by M. Yves Guyot, ancien Ministre, who has written so ably, effectively, and persistently on the results of Protection in France, and by Herr Commerzienrat Leo Vossen (of Aix la Chapelle, ("Royal Councillor of Commerce"), an eminent German authority on these subjects. M. Guyot's proposal for a commercial convention on the basis of the abolition of la surtaxe d'entrepôt and a reduction of 50 per cent. of the duty on wines by England is a matter which may well be considered, discussed (say), first, by the Chambers of Commerce of the two countries, in order to find a terrain d'entente. (This latter is the view I venture to throw out.) According to M. Guyot's own showing, this proposal of his would seem to be not quite on all fours with the "do ut des" principle as yet adumbrated; for he goes on to say: "There is no doubt that the suppression of this additional tax on bonded goods (surtaxe d'entrepôt), which only produces a yearly average of 1,550,000 fr., and which serves no purpose except to embarrass importers, would be obtained without difficulty." But a reduction on wine by 50 per cent. might have a serious effect on the revenue of this country, especially if it were extended, as it would possibly have to be, to all foreign and Colonial wines.

Herr Leo Vossen's proposal for an Anglo-French-German Zoll-Verein, which, in his view, should be the bridge leading to an European Commonwealth, was introduced in a very striking speech. He expressed his strong conviction —and he has just been all round the world on a voyage d'études—that the time will come when Europe will be compelled to consider the question how to avoid being "crushed between the mill-stones of East and West." It may well be hoped that the formation, on the last day of the Congress, of an International Permanent Committee, under the auspices of the Cobden Club, will tend to the adjustment of real difficulties between European nations.—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES HANCOCK.

Reform Club, S.W., August 11th, 1908.

THE INDETERMINATE SENTENCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have again been late in seeing Dr. Morrison's letter, but hope you will allow me to apologise for having expressed myself clumsily, and, I am afraid, offensively. I did not understand that Dr. Morrison was advocating the Elmira system, and am glad to hear that he is in favor of it. But I should like to emphasise the following facts:—

(1) That a main feature of the Elmira system is that its administrators are trusted, and, to a great extent, successfully trusted, to judge how their "inmates" are likely to behave after release.

(2) That they still keep touch with those who have been released before the expiry of their maximum sentences, and can recall them. This is perhaps what Dr. Morrison means by conditional release. If so, I apologise for having misunderstood him.

(3) That the Elmira system differs from our prison system, not only, if at all, in mildness, but in being actively educative. One of the results is that it gives the chance, denied by our prison system, of judging of the moral and other progress of those subjected to it. Something of this sort is intended by Dr. Morrison, I now see, in his "milder régime."

(4) Superintendent Scott and some others who have practical experience of the limited "indeterminate sentence" (for so it is called) in the United States, advocate the removal of the maximum limit so as to have a really indeterminate sentence.

Further, I see no reason why the Elmira system—which is there applied to male first offenders between the ages of sixteen and twenty—or some modification of it, should not be tried with all or most offenders, for whom some kind of confinement seems to be necessary.

I hate controversy, and I am not writing to advocate unlimited sentences; but I am anxious to insist that what we have to ask for, and work for, is positive educative efficiency in our treatment of offenders.—Yours, &c.,

ARTHUR ST. JOHN.

7, Holly Village, Highgate, N.,
August 6th, 1908.

THE DILEMMA OF A LIBERAL LAWYER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am a Liberal solicitor, who assisted the Governernment to power. I am in favor of temperance reform, but not solely at the expense of those people who happen for the time being to be interested in licensed premises. For the greater part of my life I have been a total abstainer, and so was my father before me. I have conveyed property to purchasers of licensed premises, and I have advised clients to lend money on mortgage of licensed premises. Some say I should have refused to assist the Devil, but I have no guilty conscience. Being a solicitor, I did not know the law. No solicitor ever did. It is only laymen who "know" the law, and they only after the event. The Licensing Bill threatens my mortgage clients with the loss of some of their money, and my owner-of-licensed-premises clients with the loss of all their money. I am in a dilemma. Am I to desert my clients or my party? The Liberal solicitor, like the Liberal publican, is becoming a Rara Avis. Can any other Liberal solicitor advise me? Does any other Liberal solicitor find himself in the same difficulty?—Yours, &c.,

IGNORAMUS.

August 8th, 1908.

SIMILES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the interesting review, entitled "Poetry and Craftsmanship," which appeared in your issue of August 1st, your contributor quotes, with approbation, a simile from Mr. St. John Lucas's "New Poems":—

> "Where, broad and beautiful, the highway sweeps
> Like a great hope towards the starry fane."

and adds: "Such a simile shows not only a poet's perception, but a poet's craft." But does it? Surely a simile, to be successful, must liken an abstract thing to a concrete thing, or a concrete thing to a concrete thing; it must never liken a concrete thing to an abstract thing. In other words, the thing adduced in illustration must always be capable of being visualised. And the reason for this is plain. The object of a simile is to sharpen an impression. Now, you cannot sharpen an impression by praying in aid the abstract; you must call up before the mind a concrete image. Thus Mr. Lucas wishes to sharpen the impression produced by the words, "Broad and beautiful, the highway sweeps,' and he attempts to do so by likening the highway to a great hope. But he fails, because you cannot visualise a hope. If, on the other hand, he had been writing of a great hope, and had likened it to a broad highway, sweeping towards the stars, he would have splendidly succeeded, because the simile instantly presents to the mind an image which sharpens, in an extraordinary way, the original impression.

Literature, both prose and poetry, teems with instances of this (as I venture to think) inflexible rule of rhetoric. We all know the magnificent similes of Scripture: "The shadow of a great rock in a weary land"; "Thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." From the poets I quote three instances, entirely at random. The first is Shakespeare's:—

> "Was it the proud full sail of his great verse > Bound for the prize of all to precious you?"

The second is Wordsworth's:—

> "Truth fails not; but her outward forms . . .
> . . . drop like the tower sublime
> Of yesterday, which royally did wear
> His crown of weeds, but could not even sustain
> Some casual shout that broke the silent air
> Or the unimaginable touch of Time!"

And the third—well, everybody knows the third. It contains one of the finest similes, and is, perhaps, the finest sonnet ending in literature:—

> "Then felt I like some watcher of the skies,
> When a new planet swims into his ken,
> Or like stout Cortez, when with eagle eyes
> He stared at the Pacific—and all his men
> Look'd at each other in a wild surmise—
> Silent, upon a peak in Darien."

—Yours, &c.,

S. PARNELL KERR.

3, Essex Court, Temple, E.C.
August 6th, 1908.

[A further letter on "Haggerston and After" is held over till next week.]

Poetry.

THE MOOR GRAVE.

I LIE out here under a heather sod,
A moor-stone at my head; the moor-winds play above.
I lie out here—in graveyards of their God
They would not bury desperate me who died for love.
I lie out here under the sun and moon;
Across me bearded ponies stride, the curlews cry.
I have no little tombstone screed, no "Soon
To glory shall he rise!"—but deathless peace have I.

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

Reviews.

MEDIEVALISM.*

In the Lent of the present year Cardinal Mercier, Archbishop of Mechlin and Primate of Belgium, addressed a Pastoral Letter, which has received the special commendation of Pius X., to the clergy and faithful of his diocese. His Eminence is a dignitary illustrious, not only for his rank, but for his attainments and character. Till recently he was Rector of the University of Louvain, and, though a scholastic, he had the apparently deserved name of a man of comprehensive mind and wide sympathies, desirous of incorporating the new with the old learning, and alive to the intellectual and moral needs of the age. That a prelate of this type should have made himself responsible for such a Pastoral can only be explained on the hypothesis by which Swift accounted for the conduct of the Irish bishops of his time. The Government, he said, appointed divines in every way qualified for their office. The misfortune was that on the journey between London and Dublin these good men were kidnapped by highway robbers, who, crossing the Irish Channel in their stead, personated their victims, enjoying their emoluments and masquerading in their sees. Only on some such supposition can the contrast between the Louvain professor and the Cardinal Primate be explained. A substitution has been effected on the journey between Brussels and Rome. M. Clemenceau or Signor Giolitti is detaining the excellent Mgr. Mercier in the dungeons of the Grand Orient, and has deputed a Brother of that Lodge to represent him and to speak in his name.

The Belgian Cardinal takes, as the representative of the tendencies which he denounces, not a Belgian, but an English priest, Fr. Tyrrell. The position of this distinguished man in the Church of his adoption is no secret. It is, in his own words, "all but hopeless." Forbidden to exercise his ministry or even to approach the sacraments, yet deterred by conscientious scruples from re-version to the Reformed communion, he remains "suspended in mid-air." A few years since he was the trump card of the Anglo-Roman body. Waverers—and they were many—were despatched to him by its heads to be confirmed in their allegiance—the Church, it was argued, which numbered him among its clergy must surely stand abreast of the best culture of the time. Now—odisse quam læseris; it is the hour of the assassins of the whisper and the pen. And reply is prohibited. The several censures have been pronounced by Rome against those who write, or even speak, in favor of Modernism or Modernists; Catholics are forbidden to read such writings, or to engage in such discussions under sin.

> "Is it generous," he asks, "to attack men by name who can defend themselves only by what you consider a rebellion against legitimate authority? to strike those who are bound hand and foot? If you foresee such rebellion, are you not responsible for it? If not, do you not take advantage of your adversary's helplessness? Or is it noble to attack me before a public whom you can forbid to read my reply?"

Judge the Pastoral, however, as severely as we may, it is probable that it will be welcomed with something like enthusiasm by the influential and increasing section of the Church against which it is directed. For it has provoked a rejoinder which is, in truth, a masterpiece of controversy. Since Newman there has been no such dexterous sword-play; since Stevenson no one has written such prose. And Fr. Tyrrell's reasoning is as conclusive as his style is finished; his treatise will live as literature when the survival with which it deals is dead. For, whatever may be the future of the Modernist movement in the Roman Church, this is certain—that the system against which it is a revolt, Traditionalism, Medievalism, Integrism, call it what we will, is near at hand. It is possible that, in the civil war now devastating the Church, the Vatican may be the conqueror. It may succeed in silencing its opponents, driving some to secession, some to scepticism, while the greater number, waiting for better times, cover under exterior conformity interior disaffection and smouldering unbelief. But from Modernism there is no turning back, and for this reason: the positions summed up under this head are matters of fact, not of opinion. It is in vain, indeed, that we endeavour to rid ourselves of speculation; a philosophy, held consciously or unconsciously, underlies the simplest human statement and act. But > "it is the historical and not the philosophical difficulty that inspires the reconstructive effort of the Modernist pure and simple. It is the irresistible facts concerning the origin and composition of the Old and New Testaments; concerning the origin of the Christian Church, of its hierarchy, its institutions, its dogmas; concerning the gradual development of the Papacy; concerning the history of religion in general—that create a difficulty against which the synthesis of scholastic theology must be and is already shattered to pieces. Gladly as I welcome the more living and flexible syntheses of the Philosophy of Action, yet, in so far as they ignore or evade any of these inconvenient facts or attempt to dictate to history, I have no patience with them. I will not listen to any argument ex inconvenienti: 'things are what they are, and their consequences will be what they will be.'"

Once this standpoint is reached, it is reached for good and all; the mental attitude natural to, and becoming in, childhood argues ignorance or insincerity in the grown man. "I do not believe," wrote Lord Acton after the Vatican Council, "that there is a single educated Catholic who thinks the Pope right and Döllinger wrong." Mutatis mutandis, the saying holds to-day. Some bend to the storm; a few speak to their brief, or, regarding the issues at stake, rather as politicians than as thinkers, make the sophistication of their understanding a pretext to cover the weakness of their will. But intelligent and sincere assent and adhesion—this is not found. Cardinal Mercier boasts of the comparative immunity of Belgium from the plague of Modernism, and in the same breath exhorts his diocesans to provide themselves, in the first place, with the Encyclicals of Pius X., and, in the second—the order of priority will be noticed—with a copy of the New Testament, the contents of which, evidently presuming it to be unfamiliar to Belgian Catholics, he proceeds to enumerate. As Fr. Tyrrell remarks, it is not surprising that those who have not read the New Testament should be undisturbed by New Testament criticism; nor are we greatly moved by the statement of his Eminence that "the representatives of the philosophical and theological schools of our universities, and of our free faculties and seminaries and religious congregations have unanimously and spontaneously declared and proved, by a document signed by each of them, that the Pope has, by his courageous Encyclical, saved the faith and protected science."

> "What would be the lot of the unfortunate professor, or teacher, or seminarist, or student, or monk, or nun, who by refusing to sign such a declaration, were to be exposed to the petty persecutions prescribed by the Encyclican in question, and eagerly put in execution by all the bigotry, jealousy, ambition and sycophancy now let loose on the Church to her shame and humiliation? Do we not all know how those unanimous and spontaneous expressions of adhesion and satisfaction are, if not ordered, yet at least 'expected' of every bishop under pain of Rome's displeasure—and how promptly they have been forthcoming? Have we not learned and blushed over the secret of the spontaneous unanimity of the French episcopate on certain recent occasions—over the double insincerity of those who could exact and accept, and of those who could proffer, a lip-service, as to whose value not even the simplest are deceived?"

The Roman system of government has many great qualities. One gift, however it has not—and for a Church it is the essential gift—Truth. It is this "all-permeating mendacity," as Fr. Tyrrell calls it, which is the explanation of the widespread and increasing disaffection which is undermining the Roman Church to-day. It affects the teaching, the measures, the men. The dealings of the Vatican with the French Government, and even with the French hierarchy, the Montagnini scandal, the elaborate organisation of espionage and delation set up by the Encyclical Pascendi, will be recalled in this connection. The parallel with secular diplomacy is inapplicable.

> "We are prepared for these miseries in the secular State, whose ends are avowedly temporal and earthly. But we do not expect to find the Church of God governed by methods that are associated with the most cynical forms of Oriental despotism, and that make it impossible to trust the word of an ecclesiastical official who may be speaking, for all we know, only from his 'communicable knowledge,' or in this capacity or that capacity, or under this or that mental restriction, or may even be boldly lying with all the licence of a diplomatist—and all this in the name of Christ and in the cause of Christianity. . . . Those Modernists who put their trust in the spread > of truth will labor in vain unless they first labor for the spread of truthfulness; nor are they faithful to their 'method of immanentism' if they hope for an intellectual before a moral reform. What would it avail to sweep the accumulated dust and cobwebs of centuries out of the house of God; purge our liturgy of fables and legends; to make a bonfire of our falsified histories, our forged decretals, our spurious relics; to clear off the mountainous debts to truth and candor incurred by our ancestors in the supposed interests of edification; what would it avail to exterminate these swarming legends of lies, if we still keep the spirit that breeds them? In a generation or two, the house swept and garnished would be as infested as before. The only infallible guardian of truth is the spirit of truthfulness. Not till the world learns to look to Rome as the home of truthfulness and straight dealing, will it ever look to her as the citadel of truth."

* "Medievalism: A Reply to Cardinal Mercier." By George Tyrrell. Longmans, Green & Co. 4s. net.

Fr. Tyrrell is chilled, he tells us, by "the inhumanity, the naked severity, the relentless rationality" of Protestantism. Idols of the Cave is our answer. But, were it otherwise, who would hesitate to accept them, were they the price of truth?

SHAKESPEARE AND COMMON SENSE.*

Professor Raleigh has written a pleasing monograph on Shakespeare, and has published a diverting lecture on Dr. Johnson. Now he has combined results in this very agreeable little cento of Johnson's Notes on Shakespeare. Whosoever desires to have Johnson to himself for an hour without an interpreter (no Boswell, at any rate, but only a few preliminary quips by the Professor), cannot do better than turn to these notes. "They are written informally and fluently; they are packed full of observation and wisdom; and their only fault is that they are all too few." If we are to live contentedly with books at all at their present rate of increase, it is plain that criticism must play a larger and larger part among the necessary activities of literature, and, within this category, it is obvious that Shakespeare criticism is going to occupy a large and still larger segment. Books on Shakespeare will soon begin to oust those upon the Bible or Homer from their position of supremacy. The state of Shakespeare criticism at a given time is accordingly symptomatic, and it is not unamusing to try and discover, by feeling its pulse, some of the critical tendencies of the day During most of the last century Shakespeare criticism was traversing a lyrical and romantic period, deriving immediately from Coleridge, in which everything was remote, obscure, profound, unverifiable, and, above all, improbable. For a criticism even to appear clear was sufficient cause for it to be damned irrevocably as shallow. The nearer a criticism could approximate the record of an anemometer in the supreme agitation of a violent gale, the profounder its truth was inevitably, if obscurely, recognised to be. Common sense was felt to be an impertinence in the case of a genius that was manifestly so super-normal as that of "the Stratford actor." As an emotionalist he was regarded as hors concours, and all ordinary tests and criticisms were manifestly irrelevant.

Then came a school of pedantic realists and researchers, who expended all their efforts upon the attempt to marry this miracle of transcendent literary creation to the unimpeachable biographical record of a successful suburban tradesman, whose solitary hobby was money-lending. From this amazing incongruity there are two possible means of escape, and we shall, in the twentieth century, see both of them eagerly exploited. There is one group of persons (whom their adversaries, with the amenity that has become traditional in Shakespeare controversy, refer to us as "dancing maniacs"), who say, "Yes, the work of Shakespeare is miraculous, almost as miraculous as the psychology of the pundits who ask us to believe that it was the work of a provincial actor who could barely write his own name"! There is another robust and less fantastic school, who say that the "miracle" has been prodigiously exaggerated. They go so far as to say that sagacity should count for something in Shakespeare criticism, after all.

The Oxford Professor (O whirligig of Time!) has thrown in his lot with these stolid folk, and cried, "Hurra for Johnson!" To him, as to many of us, the rigid romantic pose has begun to be fatiguing. These lyricists and romantics are in little danger, it may be, of the pitfalls that waylay the plodders, but in their love of an O altitudo they are in constant danger of "falling upward, as it were, into vacuity." As a corrective to this, how many simple souls must have thought of the commonsense Doctor (oh, for an hour of honest Sam. Johnson!), only to be put off by that aggressively insistent phrase of Macaulay's, "It would be difficult to name a more slovenly, a more worthless edition of any great classic" than Johnson's of Shakespeare. It was in 1903, in his "Eighteenth Century Essay on Shakespeare," that Mr. Nichol Smith first discovered that neither Macaulay nor his accreditors can have ever honestly worked and tested the edition in question. Johnson's pioneer remark as to the relativity of the folios alone is sufficient to convince an impartial reader that this conclusion is a justifiable one. Who, for instance, that has worked upon the folios will fail to recognise the guinea stamp upon this remark in Johnson's preface? Theobald "speaks sometimes indefinitely of copies, when he has only one. In his enumeration of editions he mentions the two first folios as of high, and the third folio as of middle authority; but the truth is that the first is equivalent to all others, and that the rest only deviate from it by the printer's negligence. Whoever has any of the folios has all, excepting those diversities which mere reiteration of editions will produce. I collated them all at the beginning, but afterwards used only the first."

This is the very ecstasy of sobriety—the supreme distinction of Johnson's edition, which leads the newest criticism to say that we may neglect the earlier eighteenth century editions of Shakespeare, but that if we neglect Johnson's we shall do so at our peril. The head and front of Johnson's offending, as Professor Raleigh points out, was that he wrote and spoke of Shakespeare as one man may fitly speak of another. He claimed for himself citizenship of that republic in which Shakespeare is admittedly preeminent. He dared to say that Shakespeare was at times slovenly, or even absurd, and that he scamped his last acts. From the most worthless material the romantics will "fashion a new hasty altar to an unknown God." Johnson refuses to burn his morsel of incense on this Julian's altar. The romantics may give us a thrill on a good day, when they are genuinely in the vein. But you cannot be sure of them. "Those who approach the study of Shakespeare under the sober and vigorous guidance of Johnson will meet with fewer exciting adventures, but they will not see less of the subject." The conclusion we draw from these various coincidences is that, upon the threshold of a new century, Shakespeare criticism is in the process of giving itself a good shake. The microscope and the megaphone seem to have had their day (for the moment), and what we want is a little plain talk—Johnson's in preference to most. Shakespeare, as Lamb said, is "a manly author," and Johnson's is essentially a manly criticism, man to man. Some recommend small doses of the plain text, Shakespeare's own. Alone with Shakespeare! Think of it—it might well give the imagination a start.

* "Johnson on Shakespeare." Frowde. 2s. 6d. net.

CATHERINE DE' MEDICI.*

"My aim," says Miss Sichel, modestly, of this and her preceding volume, "has been no more than to paint portraits—to draw the central figure of Catherine as I see her, with such other persons in the drama as were interwoven with her destiny, standing out against a multi-colored background and throwing strong shadows upon it." The age is, beyond all others, suitable for such a portrait painting: in a time where no one is quite commonplace, because no one is quite sane. And in this volume, of more dramatic incident than the previous study of the earlier period, though of similar dominant atmosphere, the author reveals herself once more as a portrait painter of genius. She exercises an easy command over her material, selecting the essentials, discarding irrelevances. She possesses a style pliant and fastidious, with a power of summary and analysis all the more effective for the restraint with which it is utilised. The tale is allowed, generally, to tell itself: in a story of the play of personality and spirited development and decay, lifted before all men's eyes with a kingdom for a background, of far more compelling interest than the flights of the novelist's imagination.

* "The Later Years of Catherine de' Medici. By Edith Sichel. Constable & Co. 15s.

It is the story of a drama and a tragedy, advancing securely towards a sure end, concentrating the third act (as it were) in an August night in Paris, when the madness of the central figures is communicated to the whole crowd, ringing the curtain down on a cold December morning with the assassination of the chief figure of the massacre by the king, who a month later was himself to fall by the hand of an assassin. Miss Sichel has little need of artifice in the telling of the astonishing story of St. Bartholomew's Eve. She shows it in a now accepted historical verdict—as no deliberately planned act of policy or vengeance, certainly as inspired by no religious zeal. Catherine was probably as near an atheist as the world has ever seen. Dardiani reports a conversation of two Catholic gentlemen after the massacre. "'How on earth,' said they, 'can you trust the Queen Mother, seeing the tragedies that we all know she hath enacted, as much on one side as on the other? It will not do for either to think that religion has anything to do with it, for the good lady believes in none, however much she fears God—in the same fashion as the Devil fears Him.'" Nor was there—in this particular case—premeditation. For ten years, indeed, massacres had been contemplated, as a means of cutting a knot which had become otherwise irremovable. The principles of Machiavelli, imported with a Medici from Italy, and adapted, without passion or pity, to a country ripe for their application, might have justified—more than in the case of most historical crimes—this, the most violent of all. Year after year the land had been torn to pieces by civil wars from which there appeared no refuge. Catherine desired peace beyond all things: peace either with Huguenot or Catholic triumphant, alike indifferent. But peace was the one thing which appeared for ever impossible. She would have massacred Catholic as readily as Huguenot if peace were easier on those lines. Attempts were made to justify the Bartholomew as if it had thus been an act of calculated statecraft. "The King," said Tavannes, "finding himself between wars, was compelled to choose the least perilous, and to set God upon His side. If the Huguenots had escaped, they would have caused the death of a million of poor people." Why not kill them all—or the fighting leaders of them—and so, in one desperate moment, purchase that peace which was imperative if society were to endure?

But Miss Sichel has little difficulty in showing that the theory of deliberation is untrue. She exhibits the massacre as an act of panic fear, in an atmosphere of delirium: where the rejoicings of that fantastic wedding and the horror of its close were all set in a region of terrors and feverish dreams. "The country," she declares, "was not only disaffected, but distraught. Misery prevailed throughout. It seems to us, as we read the diaries of those days, that there were then more natural portents, more terrible droughts and famines, more seasons of abnormal heat and cold, more comets, more floods, more earthquakes than the world has ever known since." Civil war had made men's minds familiar with death, and turned the abnormal into the customary. Wolves invested the provinces. So did the plague. In the general disorganisation lepers were allowed to roam about unhindered, spreading their terrible malady. "A band of peasants travelled to Paris and demanded audience of his Majesty. Their mission was brief, but significant. If he wished to continue the war, they said, they humbly begged him to cut their throats at once, 'without making them so long languish in misery.'" In the midst of such an atmosphere, where death appeared familiar, and it was necessary to kill swiftly lest one were killed, the leaders of the factions crowded into Paris in the dog days "for the mad marriage of Henri of Navarre and Marguerite." Falsehood was current coin—the air, heavy with distrust, was favorable to crime, and men lived inhumanly, in fear of one another. "Nobody," wrote a contemporary, "was restrained by bonds of kinship or affection: every man misdoubted every other, and each one stood with his hand to his ear that he might know the quarter whence the dreaded noise would come. All the world was affrighted."

"The wedding will be blood-red" was the prophecy of the people of Paris. The wedding is fantastic enough: with the bride refusing to make her responses and the ceremony only proceeding by the King laying his hand on her head and forcing her to bend in affirmation: while the walls of Notre Dame are still decorated with the banners of Jarnac and Montcontour. Then followed the attempt on Coligny: the warning of the King against Catherine by the wounded Admiral: the extraction of this warning from the King: panic, fury, madness. "I had, as it were, a heavy hammer in my head," wrote Anjou, "and she likewise: and we, for the nonce, determined nothing, except by some means or other to dispatch the Admiral." The first plan was to kill half a dozen of the leaders: the King, after long resistance, broke into insanity. "'Since you choose to kill the Admiral, I consent. But then you must also kill all the Huguenots in France, so that not one shall be left to reproach me after it is done.' With a violent movement he wheeled round upon Catherine: 'You have willed it—well then, kill them all, kill them all!' he cried. The foam was upon his lips—he was practically out of his mind." Till the last moment they are convinced of the reality of a Huguenot conspiracy: that it was a wild race which band of assassins should begin. Early in the morning, everything having been arranged, the three—Catherine, Anjou, Charles—are cowering at a window of the Louvre, possessed by the belief that at any moment the palace may be attacked, and some dire fate, they knew not what, overtake them. "As we were considering the consequences of so great an enterprise," wrote Anjou afterwards, "to which, to say the truth, we had till then hardly given real reflection——" Even at the eleventh hour they sent to stop the murder of the Admiral. The answer Guise returned was "Too late!" There followed an intoxication of blood—Charles raving, a gibbering lunatic; Catherine and her ladies mocking the bodies of the dead; pilgrimages, processions, rejoicings. When sanity at last returned, the shadow was lifted from Catherine, but settled down in enduring cloud on the rest. "She looks a younger woman by ten years," is the testimony, "and gives me the impression of a person who has come out of a serious illness, or escaped a great danger." But the Court "tried their usual distractions—dressed, gossiped, jested: in vain; they could not forget." One day a cloud of ravens settles on the Louvre, filling all men with fear. Every night for many nights at the hour of the massacre all are awakened by a horrid tumult in the air and a concert of voices, crying, groaning, howling, blaspheming. The Furies began to hunt the King. He died a month before his twenty-fourth birthday: his last words, "I rejoice that I have no male child to wear the Crown after me." Anjou, made king, assassinates Henry of Guise: is in turn assassinated. St. Bartholomew is fearfully avenged. Catherine dies in the midst of the turmoil, her passing almost unnoticed in the general upheaval and fury of the time. It is a death more squalid and cold than the retribution of the other guilty persons: after superhuman labors, seeing all her efforts crumbling to dust, and the fortunes of her house guttering towards an end. "A few of her servants and some of her family wept for her—and so did the King—a very little," is the entry in a diary of the day. Her bones were huddled into a common grave at Blois. Paris declared that if her body were brought there, they would drag it to the banks of the Seine and throw it in. "She has done much good and much evil in her day," said the preacher in the Church of Saint Barthelemi, "more evil, I think, than good. I make no doubt of this. Ought the Church to pray for her?" he asks. It is a doubtful question. "I reply that if you will, of your charity, give her now and then a Pater and an Ave you may do so. If not, it does not much matter."

Miss Sichel is severe in her final summary: more severe perhaps than the reader will incline to be who has followed the record of that long loveless life from its pitiful beginnings to its shabby end. "She died weak, weary, deserted, deep in debt—every aim that she had made for defeated, every feeling that she had cherished crossed and thwarted—the most sincerely hated woman in Europe." "She had really loved but twice in her life: first the husband who had never cared for her: then the son who repaid her devotion by a cold and unrelieved brutality." It is impossible not to feel compassion for her, the author admits, and yet "our very compassion," she asserts, "is mixed with dust, and well-nigh chokes us in the parched and arid atmosphere surrounding her." She came, a bride of fifteen, into an alien Court, to find the husband whom she would love deserting her completely for another. She was thrown into a world not moral or immoral, but unmoral, which had endured that ultimate tragedy, the death of public opinion, in the overthrow of all accepted standards of good and evil. She labored, while others played and revelled and gambled away the throne of France for a moment's pleasure. She worked, indifferent, in an atmosphere where religion itself had become merely the cloak for selfishness, avarice, and ambition. "What could a poor woman have done," said Henri IV. afterwards, "with her husband dead and five little children on her hands, while two families were striving to seize the throne, our own and the Guises? I am astonished that she did not do even worse." Physical pluck never deserted her. She was a cynic: in an age that fought furiously for religion, and had ceased to believe in good, Miss Sichel interprets her as the child of the Renaissance and Reformation, in the worst sense of the words. "From the Reformation she derived its abuses—its degradation of religion into politics—its gross polemic materialism, the more pernicious for priestly vestments. From the Renaissance she inhaled its stagnant Paganism—its cold curiosity, its stupid blindness to aught but the senses, its foolish worship of a golden calf set up in a boundless wilderness." Yet she loved her children with the love of a tigress for its whelps; she toiled terribly in a Court and kingdom abandoned to rioting and decay; she sought for peace and tranquillity and good government amid a dying house and a land scarred and tortured and desolate. "Scarcely," says Correro, "has she time to eat or sleep, so great are her harassing cares. She runs here and there between the armies, doing a man's work without a thought of sparing herself." "Yet all who fail to get what they want scream and scold," he adds, "and throw the blame upon the Queen-mother . . . and she is beloved by no one in the land." There is a pathos about the confession still appealing in its simplicity from the midst of this amazing, impossible age. "I am so much accustomed never to possess an unspoilt joy," wrote Catherine five years before her death, "that it does not seem so strange to me as it would do to another. God will be pitiful to me who have lost so many. He will not let me see more of them die. That is what I pray of His mercy—and that He will allow me to depart, as befits my age."

MACAN'S "HERODOTUS."*

All students of Herodotus will welcome this long-desired completion of Dr. Macan's monumental work. These three splendid volumes, if they do not perhaps contain anything so remarkable in the historical criticism of Herodotus as the theory of the battle of Marathon, set forth in the earlier instalment of the work, are no less helpful and instructive, as witness the severe inquiry into the chronology of the two crowded campaigns which constitute the Expedition of Xerxes. For this the last three books of Herodotus are our main authority, and, as Dr. Macan says, "despite the elements of poetry, rhetoric, anecdote, moralising, error, and sheer ignorance which they contain, will reward a searching examination at the bar of historical criticism." Indeed, the father of history is subjected to some damaging cross-examination by his editor in introduction, commentary, and appendices, though Dr. Macan nevertheless maintains that "the most stringent application of historical and critical methods to the text of Herodotus leaves the work irremovable and irreplaceably at the head of European prose literature, whether in its scientific or in its artistic character." A considerable part of the introduction is devoted to a support of the view, more slightly argued in his previous volumes, that Books VII.-IX. were composed before the others (perhaps for an Athenian audience), and were originally intended to be complete in themselves. The tentative publication of the first draft of the story of the Persian War perhaps gave Herodotus "the means and opportunity for those more extensive voyages, the results of which are conspicuous in the earlier books." The detailed arguments for this view are too lengthy for discussion here, but they are as convincing as the nature of the problem will allow. This, of course, has a further important bearing on the question whether Herodotus's work as we have it is complete. If the last three books were the first to be composed, and Herodotus added the six earlier books as a panoramic introduction to his story of the Great Expedition, then it is probable also that this story "is complete and finished in the author's conception and creation." Here again the reader must be referred to Dr. Macan's elaborate and detailed argument.

The passionate lovers of Herodotus, however much they rejoice in this vindication of his fame as a historian, will delight still more in Dr. Macan's warm though judicious admiration for those other transcendent qualities which are a perennial source of joy to the readers of Herodotus. "The surpassing candour and simplicity of his mind" allow us to see mirrored in his history a picture of contemporary Greece—and such candour and simplicity have never perhaps been united with such consummate literary art, and such keen and shrewd interest in men and events. Besides the mere pleasure in the narrative, it must not be forgotten that these sidelights, thrown in floods upon the Hellenic and non-Hellenic worlds of dawning civilisation, are by no means the least valuable portion, from the historical point of view, of the whole work. "The incidental fact, which occurs, so to speak, in an alien stratum, is historically all the more acceptable for being unnecessary to the object immediately in view." To read Herodotus is to read a great prose epic interspersed with the most delightful myths and the most amusing stories; it is also to immerse oneself in the life and thought of early fifth century Greece, when the Hellenic race was bubbling over with the joyous optimism of youth and hope, and when the most splendid chapter of human art, literature, and philosophy was just beginning. Herodotus is the sunrise of prose as Homer is the sunrise of poetry. We can and ought to enjoy them both without a commentator. But none the less we may well be grateful to the real scholars and antiquarians who have elucidated what is obscure, and illustrated from other pages and records what the master craftsmen have omitted or barely touched.

* "Herodotus." Books VII., VIII., IX. With Introduction, Text, Apparatus, Commentary, Appendices, Indices, Maps. By R. W. Macan, D.Litt. Three Vols. Macmillan & Co. 30s. net.

A "STIRRING" NOVEL.*

Miss Irene Osgood has obviously enjoyed herself immensely in writing "Servitude," and her enjoyment is infectious. What most people require from a novel is to be thrilled, diverted, and, if possible, just a trifle shocked. The public has a fund of primitive feeling quickly responsive to anything in life or art which is pleasurably sensational. It demands exciting incidents, stirring situations, bright colors, and the bustle of novelty, and it is rare to find its critical sense awake to even palpable absurdities. Irresponsive to beauty of form, repelled by pure poetry, people seek from art sensations which the popular theatre and the hippodrome most successfully appease. It was so in medieval times, when the populace demanded from the miracle plays costly dresses, magnificent shows, supernatural machinery, legions of stage devils, and a realistic pasteboard heaven. It is useless to condemn these crude but healthy tastes, which are as natural as a child's love of a rattle. And these are holiday times, when even the most exacting of us prefer a "stirring" novel to one that is subtly and finely true to nature. "Servitude" does not appeal to our finer taste. It is a highly picturesque performance, like ginger "hot in the mouth," showing considerable descriptive skill and crude force of imagination. The subject—the sufferings of the Christian captives in Algiers in 1815—is actual enough, and Miss Osgood has treated it with a vigorous flow of buoyant spirits and a defiantly unconventional tone and temper that carry the reader triumphantly through a plot unreal and stagey, but always dramatically interesting or entertaining.

When the Tuscan brig, "Stella Marina," is taken by the Barbary pirates, Soliman Rais and Tre Quarte Morto, there is humour in the fact that the six passengers made captive are a Jamaican planter and his wife and their slave Sambo, an Austrian mine-owner, and an English manufacturer and his wife. Mr. Holden, the Londoner, at this date "was employing little children of eight and nine in his works at Hoxton," and the rate of infantile mortality was thereby high in the district; the Austrian was an owner of "large mercury mines in Transylvania," and the convicts he leased from the Austrian Government lasted scarcely three years; while Mr. Lewis, the Jamaican, was positive "that the black folk on the plantations were much better off and much better fed than the English laborers." There is also humour in the fact that at the date the story opens, 1815, the British Government had long been a faithful ally of the Dey of Algiers, since it was to the English shipping interests that Mediterranean commerce should be preyed on by the Corsairs. The bloodthirsty Ali Khoja gives the English Consul at Algiers, McDonnell, many reasons why the Mohamedans at Algiers are superior to the Christians—viz., because they do not drink or gamble, because they are brotherly to their co-religionists, are frugal, shelter the Jews, follow the teaching of their religion, and "treat women with respect." But all this does not prevent the unhappy British captives on landing from being mobbed, hooted, spat at, and reviled as Christian dogs by the excited and triumphant populace. The fate of the captives has also its diverting side. Mrs. Holden, the manufacturer's stout, red-faced wife, is at first carried off to the Cheik-el-beled's prison, or house of female correction, while her husband, struggling in the grasp of two gigantic negroes, is shouting, "Remember your marriage vows, Sarah! Remember your marriage vows!" But when Sarah produces her marriage lines from a bag hung round her neck, both she and her husband are recognised as subjects of "King Giorgio," and are set at liberty. Mr. Lewis, being an American, is put up for auction and sold to a Coulougli, who keeps him in chains in his counting-house, and punishes him frequently with a cane. Mrs. Lewis, who has been a cruel mistress to Sambo, is disposed of to an old Moor, who employs her in fattening his four daughters—Haidee, Namaur, Zuelpha, and Fatma—for the marriage market on barley meal dumplings dipped in oil. Haidee, in spite of the rod that Mrs. Lewis is charged to wield, refuses to grow any fatter, and the latter is severely bastinadoed for her failure. The Austrian mine-owner is sold for three hundred pounds to an Algerian speculator, who, after demanding three thousand pounds ransom from his relatives, yokes him to a plough along with another Christian slave and a mangy mule. He sleeps in the fields with the jackals, is beaten daily, and is given so scanty a ration of black bread that he is driven to steal the corn out of the manger. But, as the author sardonically remarks, in one respect the Christian slaves were better off than many poor free men, because their owners were always genuinely solicitous about their slaves' health, which represents a cash value.

* "Servitude." By Irene Osgood. Sisley's, Limited. 6s.

The discerning reader may have divined from the foregoing outline that Miss Osgood's handling of her picturesque material, though entertaining, is crude. "Servitude," in fact, is artistically a hybrid—a grandchild of Marryat put to school with Ouida, and brought up in an American boarding-house—this may faintly suggest the weird mixture of strains in the novel. Of course, the charm and the tiresomeness of the American girl in life lies in the freshness and incongruity of her judgments, and the heroine of "Servitude," Miss Betty Langhorne, a beautiful Virginian girl who is staying at the British Consulate in Algiers in 1815, is a purely modern figure, quite out of tone with her environment. The author has studied carefully the literature of her subject, and, aided by her local knowledge, she has constructed cleverly a dashing and vigorous picture of old-time Algiers. But, though her characters—European and Oriental—are quite human, their mental attitude and bearing are startlingly modern, and the clash between the subject and treatment tears the illusion to pieces. The hero, "William Brown," the enslaved captain of the Tuscan brig, falls in love with the beautiful Betty, and, inspired by his passion, performs the most startling feats of derring-do under the noses of the terrible Agas Bashirs and the ferocious janissaries. Betty herself has to seek refuge from the licentious Dey, Omar Ben Mohammed, and is concealed for days by Brown in a cave outside Tangiers, the identical cave that had sheltered Cervantes! When she is finally captured and carried off to the villa of the Grand Harem, "whose gardens were Love's nurseries, but also the stalking-grounds of unbridled passion," there is a dazzling scene between Betty and the black slaves and a bevy of the Dey's sultanas—a scene which, in its color and glitter, makes us tremble for Ouida's laurels. There is also just the requisite spice of coarseness which makes our public eager after a novel, in Mrs. Jones' lamentations that, though she has been torn away twenty years ago from her fiancé, an East India chaplain, the Rev. Archibald Jones, in this place of Oriental voluptuousness she has always been completely overlooked and shelved. Let not our readers be alarmed. The beautiful Betty, after some thrilling moments, escapes from "the hands of the Dey, the worst libertine and cruellest tyrant in the world," and is finally united, in all the bloom of her American innocence, to "William Brown," who turns out to be an English nobleman, Lord Tullamore. The plot, as we have said, is the weakest element in the book, which is redeemed, to a great extent, by the lifelike painting of the daily sufferings and cruel tortures of the enslaved Christians. Miss Osgood has an active imagination, an unconventional humour, and a heart quickly roused to pity and indignation. If she can only chasten the crudity of her art and subdue its extravagance, the strong human sympathy which characterises "Servitude" may capture for her, in turn, the circle of critical readers.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

SWITZERLAND has been studied by many competent English-speaking observers, from Grote to Dawson; but the most appreciative readers of former books on the subject of her public life will admit the fresh merit of that which Mr. Hobson has edited from the materials left by Henry D. Lloyd, "The Swiss Democracy: The Study of a Sovereign People" (Fisher Unwin, 6s. net). That lamented writer, whose personality was as lovable as his work was fearless, brought to his study a zest of interest in which no previous inquirer could have surpassed him. For him, Switzerland was in a manner the vindication of democracy, inasmuch as her people have solved or are solving the problems before which democracy in his own country stands baffled. His investigations were eagerly directed to finding how the machine actually works; how far the public interest holds its own against private; how far capital is made servant, and the community master. The result is a book which most helpfully supplements all previous accounts in English of Swiss political experience. Others have described the institutions: Lloyd studied the fruits. He shows a natural but never misleading partiality towards the democracy whom he found representing so steadfastly the democratic spirit; and in his sketch of their history we learn little of the period of Swiss mercenary service in the armies of surrounding nations. He was unduly ready, too, to endorse Daendliker's claim that the Swiss were the first people to put humane restrictions on warfare. The principle is really as old as Cyrus. But he never exaggerates the enlightenment of the Swiss people; and in his study of contemporary Swiss experiments in municipal and State ownership he is scrupulously judicial. The facts of the case as to the nationalisation of the Swiss railways are here given with perfect clearness and fairness; and explicit record is given of the failure alike of the voluntary and the compulsory schemes of Unemployed Insurance. As regards the former, it is noted that "the most striking fact in the experiment is the very large proportion of the subscribers who come upon the fund, over sixty-three per cent. in 1901. The great majority of the subscribers belong to the building trades, most of them being builders' laborers"—a fact worth noting in connection with the unemployment problem in Britain. It is further interesting to learn that in Switzerland the question of Old-Age Pensions is not a pressing one, by reason of the fact that "the Swiss burgher can look to his commune for an assistance in old age which involves no sense of personal degradation, but is taken as a right of citizenship." An outstanding feature of the whole survey is the strong approval given to the institution of the Referendum, in which Lloyd saw the one valid cure for the corruption and "bossing" of politics in the United States. He undoubtedly makes out a very strong case, which should be carefully studied by every serious politician in this country. While,

WERNER LAURIE'S LIST.

Occultism and Common Sense.

By BECKLES WILLSON.

Crown 8vo. Preface by Professor Barrett. 6s. net.

The fault of the writers who have hitherto dealt with Spiritualism and Occult phenomena generally, is that their prepossessions destroy the value of their conclusions, and to a certain extent, the interest of their writings. When, therefore, a Man of the World comes along with an absolutely open mind, and sets about investigating all the various phenomena, his opinions at the close are certain to prove entertaining. "Occultism and Common Sense" is a clear and candid summary of a most vital and absorbing question which agitates the soul of man. The author reaches conclusions and sets them forth in clear and direct language.

Do the Dead Depart? And Other Questions.

By KATHARINE BATES.

Author of "Seen and Unseen." 6s. net.

The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism, Fraudulent and Genuine.

By HEREWARD CARRINGTON.

Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

Proofs of Life after Death.

By R. J. THOMPSON.

A Collation of Opinions as to a Future Life by the Most Eminent Scientific Men and Thinkers of the Day.

New Edition. 7s. 6d. net.

"More interesting than anything Gaboriau ever wrote."

True Stories of Crime.

Illustrated. By ARTHUR TRAIN. 6s. net.

The Abbeys of Great Britain.

16 Illustrations. By H. C. DIXON. 6s. net.

Modern Marriage and How to Bear It.

By MAUD CHURTON BRABY. 3s. 6d. net.

Cookery Up-to-Date,

A Practical Handbook of What to Eat and How to Cook It.

By MAY LITTLE.

First-class Diploma, late Staff Teacher at the National Society's Training School of Cookery, London.

Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

New Novels.

The Methods of Mr. Ames.

By the Author of "The Adventures of John Johns."

The Life Class. By KEIGHLEY SNOWDEN.

A Laughing Matter.

By SHAN F. BULLOCK.

Author of "Robert Thorne, the Story of a London Clerk."

The Future Mrs. Dering.

By THOMAS COBB.

Author of "Mrs. Erricker's Reputation."

Mr. Saffrey's Disciple.

By L. PARRY TRUSCOTT. Author of "Catharine."

The Tavistocks, By E. ACEITUNA GRIFFIN.

Author of "Lady Sarah's Deed of Gift."

The Wild Widow.

By GERTIE DE S. WENTWORTH-JAMES.

Before Adam. By JACK LONDON.

Author of "The Call of the Wild."

T. WERNER LAURIE, CLIFFORD'S INN, LONDON.

THE AUTHORITATIVE WORK ON THE BRAIN.

EDUCATION, PERSONALITY, AND CRIME.

By ALBERT WILSON, M.D.

With about 100 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

Dr. Albert Wilson's important work has been received by the press, the experts, and the thoughtful public generally with a chorus of praise as befitting the magnitude of the work and the authority of the writer. The book should find a place in the library of every Doctor, Clergyman, Social Reformer, Justice of the Peace, in fact all who have the social welfare of the community at heart.

Bright Fiction for Holiday Readers

BEAU BROCADE	BARONESS ORCZY.	6s.
THE CARDINAL AND LADY SUSAN.	LUCAS CLEEVE.	6s.
ROLLIN STONE	ERNEST SUFFLING.	6s.
THE MEETING OF THE WAYS ...	J. D. BAXTER.	6s.
A SUBURBAN SCANDAL ..	GURNER GILLMAN.	6s.
THE AVA MINING SYNDICATE ...	CECIL LOWIS.	6s.
MRS. FITZMAURICE ON LEAVE	GABRIELLE FITZMAURICE.	3s. 6d.
THE PRODICAL CITY ..	TRISTAM COUTTS.	6s.
BRENDAVALE	E. BLACK.	6s.
ZOE'S REVENGE	M. Y. HALIDOM.	6s.
WORKERS IN DARKNESS	HARRIS BURLAND.	6s.
GOD IN SAN DAM	F. BLOUNT MOTT.	6s.
HEATHER O' THE RIVERS	W. HAROLD THOMSON.	6s.
ROSE CAMPION'S PLATONIC	ADAM LILBURN.	6s.
THE MYSTERIOUS ABDUCTION	G. S. GOODMAN.	6s.
SEMIRAMIS	EDWARD PEPLE.	6s.

When Bound for Your Favourite Resort

ASK AT THE STATION BOOKSTALL FOR

GREENING'S SHILLING SERIES

Strongly recommended to holiday-makers as they are bound in a neat cloth style and of handy size for slipping into the pocket. Only works of undeniable merit find a place in this series.

THE SCARLET PIMPERNEL. BARONESS ORCZY.
I WILL REPAY. BARONESS ORCZY.
A SON OF THE PEOPLE. BARONESS ORCZY.
FROM THE BOOK BEAUTIFUL. GUY THORNE.
SEEN AND UNSEEN. E. KATHERINE BATES.
THE DEGRADATION OF GEOFFREY ALWITH. MORLEY ROBERTS.
OSCAR WILDE. The Story of an Unhappy Friendship. ROBERT H. SHERARD.
PORTALONE. C. RANGER GULL.

The Publishers have just added to the above series

THE DUPE. By GERALD BISS.

of whom the "Daily Telegraph" said: "Guy Boothby never wrote with a more vigorous abandon."

TO SUFFRAGETTES AND OTHERS.

THE VICTIM AND THE VOTERY,

By WILLIAM CAINE.

Should be read by those who approve and those who disapprove of the "Votes for Women" cult, as it will furnish shrieks of laughter for the scornful, and even raise a smile on the face of the most advanced Suffragette.

Price One Shilling net. Paper Wrapper.

No One Visiting Cornwall should be without

FROM ST. IVES TO LAND'S END,

written by MR. A. G. FOLLIOTT-STOKES, and containing map and twenty-two photographic illustrations.

To be had at all booksellers and railway bookstalls. 1s. net.

GREENING & CO., Ltd., 91, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

however, he very candidly acknowledges the few drawbacks he recognises in the working of the institution in Switzerland, he, perhaps, does not fully recognise the weight of the question whether a system which, on the whole, succeeds very well in a country where cantonal life, with its habit of direct popular deliberation and legislation, supplies a special basis, could possibly work as well in the great populations of the large countries, long accustomed to purely representative methods. The argument that the Referendum would make an end of the party system was, of course, no objection to it in the eyes of Lloyd. He treats this, in fact, as one of the important gains from the practice. It is needless to say that Lloyd's half-prepared material has been no less sympathetically than ably handled by Mr. Hobson, who so modestly disparages his own work. Out of a quantity of disconnected notes he has shaped a coherent and powerful treatise.

* * *

A VERY warm-hearted appreciation of the late "James Annand, M.P." (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier, 2s. 6d. net), who died within a few weeks of his election for East Aberdeenshire in 1906, is contained within the biography written by Mr. J. L. McCallum. The son of a farmer and blacksmith in Buchan, James Annand left his father's calling to become a schoolmaster, and subsequently a journalist and editor on the Liberal side. He transferred his services from the "Newcastle Chronicle" to the "Newcastle Leader," which he turned into a vigorous, if rather narrow, exponent of Radicalism of the old laissez faire type. His special gift was leader writing, in which he excelled by reason of his clear, emphatic style, his power of hard hitting, and the sincerity and simplicity, and, on the whole, the thoughtfulness of his political creed. Lord Morley, whose association with Newcastle brought him much in contact with Mr. Annand, had a warm admiration for his character and talent. In 1892 he unsuccessfully contested Tynemouth, and in the khaki election of 1900 he was beaten by Mr. Anstruther at St. Andrews Burghs; but at his third attempt—in East Aberdeenshire—he converted a Tory majority of seventy-three into a Liberal one of 1,830. Mr. Annand regarded Socialism with marked disfavor, as the substitution of one kind of tyranny for another, and vehemently opposed the idea of an eight-hours day secured by law. On the other hand, he advocated the abolition of the House of Lords, and was a Free Trader and land reformer of the Cobdenite school. In his appeal to his party to return to the fundamental principles of Liberalism, as he conceived them, he perhaps showed himself to be more of a political philosopher than a practical politician, but his sincerity ennobled the rugged outlines and instructive independence of his character. There is a very full description of the East Aberdeenshire campaign in these pages. The book also contains an interesting account of Mr. Annand's journalistic career, including many extracts from his literary output and lectures on political and other subjects, and an introduction by the late Mr. J. W. Crombie.

* * *

MR. A. F. CALVERT'S latest volume in the Spanish Series (John Lane, 3s. 6d. net) treats of the cities of Valladolid, Oviedo, Segovia, Zamora, Avila, and Zaragoza. Since the total space allowed is only 162 pages, and all these places are of first-class historical importance, the chapter devoted to each is necessarily a trifle sketchy and unsatisfying; but assuming that the author was bound to deal separately with every one of them instead of grouping two or more under one heading, the result is perhaps as interesting as one should expect. Valladolid naturally comes first, as the erstwhile capital of the medieval kingdom of Castile and the city where Cervantes lived and Columbus died, and of this Mr. Calvert gives a fairly vivid historical sketch, followed by a more perfunctory account of the "show" buildings. The same arrangement is adopted with regard to the remaining five cities. All of them, one may mention, figured at one time or another as royal residences. Zaragoza can make special claim to this distinction, since its position as the capital of Aragon was never disputed, as was that of the others in their provinces. It was, moreover, foremost among the cities of the Peninsular in offering resistance to the establishment of the Inquisition. To Avila belongs the rather less enviable achievement of having sheltered Torquemada, the Grand Inquisitor, who made it his headquarters. On the other hand, it is also the shrine of Santa Teresa. The glimpses into Spanish history provided by this volume are interesting enough to make one regret the severe space limitations imposed, especially as more than half the volume is taken up by the somewhat ordinary photographic illustrations. There are more than four hundred of the latter, and some might easily have been spared.

* * *

WE have received the Official Guides to Llandrindod Wells, Leamington Spa, Malvern, Woodhall Spa, Bournemouth, Seaford, and Skegness; also those to Inverness, East Grinstead, Weybridge, Walton and Chertsey, Surbiton, Kingston-upon-Thames, Beckenham, Lewes, Horsham, and Chichester. These volumes, which are clearly printed on art paper, and embellished with photographic illustrations, are issued by the Health Resorts Association with the authority of the Urban Councils or Corporations of the various places. Nelson's Guides to "York and Selby," "Torquay and Exeter," "Falmouth, Truro, and the Lizard," "Ilfracombe, Lynton, and Lynmouth," "Aberystwyth," "Scarborough, Bridlington, and Whitby," "Plymouth, Devonport, and Western Dartmoor," "Hastings to Bexhill," "Bettws-y-coed and Snowdon," "Llandudno," and the "Wye Valley" (Thomas Nelson, 6d. each net), have also reached us. In these the information given in Baddeley's well-known series of "Thorough" guides is presented in condensed form, and each volume contains several photographic plates, a large map of the district in three colors, and small maps and plans. Intending travellers will find them useful and handy for the pocket.

* * *

PHOTOGRAPHIC literature for every class of operator is so plentiful nowadays that one might be pardoned for doubting whether any further publication on the subject is required. In "The Photographic Handbook," however, which is a volume in the series of "Country Handbooks" (John Lane, 3s. net), we have a little book which is sufficiently comprehensive to appeal to advanced workers, and, what is infinitely rarer, sufficiently lucid to be understood by all. Written in a severely practical spirit by Messrs. C. Harrison and J. C. Douglas, its scope includes nearly every process in existence, from the most elementary one to the latest resource of artistic photographers, namely, ozobrome printing. To the average amateur the opening chapter on lenses conveys a good deal of scientific information which he is not in the habit of troubling himself about, but which, nevertheless, will help to explain many failures that have hitherto seemed unaccountable to him; and, considering their brevity, the chapters on carbon and gum-bichromate printing are models of clear instruction. The purely chemical aspect of the subject is prominent in this ably compiled little manual, and the several formulae given should prove a reliable guide to anybody who is anxious to dispense with the ready-made solutions provided so temptingly by photographic dealers. Diagrams and reproductions of Mr. Douglas's own photographs illustrate a most business-like text.

* * *

THE third issue of the "P. and O. Pocket-Book" (Black, 2s. 6d. net), contains several additional features, chief among which are a new series of maps, illustrations in color by Messrs. W. L. Wyllie, Talbot Kelly, and others, and some interesting descriptive articles by Mrs. Steele, Walter Del Mar, and Le Comte Charles de Lesseps. A very daintily got-up little volume, this combines literary and artistic quality with enough solid information to satisfy the most inquisitive voyager. The tables of sea distances, coinage values, &c., to be found at the end, are very complete, and the flags of the world's mercantile marine are reproduced in color.

* * *

M. CLAUDE ACHILLE DEBUSSY is one of the few living French composers whose art is tolerably familiar to English music-lovers. His name is often to be found on our concert programmes, and he shares with his gifted compatriots, Saint-Saens and César Franck, the appreciation of all who can distinguish what is subtle and original from the hackneyed and meretricious. Granting, therefore, that it expedient to write a book on an artist who has just reached

BOOKSELLERS.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 93, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
(And at READING and GUILDFORD.)
MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.
Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

406 pages, 8vo, cloth, 3s. post free.
HEAVEN AND HELL:
Things Heard and Seen.
By EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.
JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER wrote:—"There is one grand and beautiful idea underlying all Swedenborg's revelations or speculations about the future life. His remarkably suggestive books are becoming familiar to the reading and reflecting portion of the community."
LONDON: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury St.

A NEW "F.C.G." Froissart.

The "WESTMINSTER GAZETTE" is continuing at intervals throughout August, the publication of

"F.C.G.'S" MODERN FROISSART,

describing in quaint mediaeval phraseology and with illustrations founded upon fourteenth century examples, the principal political events from the end of 1902 up to and including the General Election of 1906.

The story of the events familiar to us all in our recent history will be told as if written by Sir John Froissart himself, and, although a good deal of humour is introduced both in the text and the pictures, the narrative will be an interesting record of actual events. The Weekly Editions* of will contain the chapters published during each current week. The first chapter appeared in the "Westminster Gazette" dated July 29th. Back numbers containing the series can be obtained on application to the Publisher.

The "WESTMINSTER GAZETTE"

* THE SATURDAY WESTMINSTER.

Offices: WESTMINSTER GAZETTE, Tudor St., London, E.C.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR
CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.
By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."
—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

BOOK BARGAINS.—Balzac's Droll Stories, illustrated by Doré. 12s. 6d. Foote's valuable medical work, Plain Home Talk. 7s. 6d. Burton's Arabian Nights, unexpurgated, 17 vols., illustrated, £13. Garnier's English Landed Interest, 2 vols., 6s. 6d. (published 21s.). Hart's Female Pelvic Anatomy, colored plates, 17s. 6d. (cost 42s. net). Cruickshank's 400 Humorous Illustrations, 4s. 6d. (published 16s.). Pepy's Diary, 4 vols., 15s. (published 30s.). Fennimore Cooper's novels, 32 vols., 42s. Thackeray's complete works. 26 vols., 45s. (cost £4 12s.). Chaffer's Pottery and Porcelain. 28s. 6d. (cost 42s.). Trall's Sexual Physiology and Hygiene, 3s. 6d. Art of Extempore Speaking, 2s. 6d. 100,000 books for sale and exchange. Please state wants. Catalogues free.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)
Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.
A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.
PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS
Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY.
EVERY FRIDAY, 2d.

PUBLIC OPINION

EDITED BY
PERCY L. PARKER.

¶ "Public Opinion" provides the busy man with a lucid summary of what is happening in the different fields of human activity and focusses within reasonable compass something of that teeming interest which comes from being in touch with many phases of life.

Dr. W. H. FITCHETT says:—
"Most interesting and valuable; a matchless bit of journalistic work."

Sir HUBERT VON HERKOMER says:—
"Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise."

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum.

SPECIMEN FREE ON APPLICATION.

31 and 32, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

the prime of life—for M. Debussy is only forty-six years old—Mrs. Franz Liebich is fully justified in including him among the "Living Masters of Music" (John Lane, 2s. 6d. net); his lyrical drama of "Pelleas et Mélisande" and his "Nocturnes" are likely to live, and as a song-writer he has shown gifts that rank him with the greatest in this form of composition. In her sympathetic analysis of his art Mrs. Liebich compares him with the impressionist painters, especially with M. Henri le Sidaner. "It appears," she writes of his songs, "as if, having grasped the general purport and trend of a poem, he recorded his impression in music with a series of gleams and sudden lights, which partial impressions are derived from the main theme or thought. It is in his songs that the parallel between his art and M. Henri le Sidaner's exquisite color impressions is most clearly perceptible." Analogies between painter and musician are apt to be dangerous, but in this case the comparison seems to be just. M. Debussy's elaborate system of harmonics and tonality has a good deal in common with the chromatic method of Le Sidaner, Monet, and the painters of his school. The difference between M. Debussy's inspiration from nature and that of Wagner is well brought out in this little volume, and it is made quite clear that the former, unlike so many modern composers who have been content to follow the Wagnerian trail, looking neither to right nor to left, is indebted rather to Bach, and through Bach to the Primitives, than to any later example. A brief account of M. Debussy's critical writings completes a picture of the man which, if not complete, is sufficient for the purpose.

* * *

"Lotus Leaves," by Israfel (Nutt, 3s. 6d. net), is not so strange a piece of book-making as the headings to its chapters might lead one to suppose. The first part consists of a series of word pictures of Algiers, Tunis, and other places of the East where the Western traveller likes to roam. This is followed by sundry musical essays, some of which have already appeared in periodicals, and the connection between the two, not at first obvious, is meant, as it seems to us, to be established by the uniformity of style and sentiment throughout the whole. Fromentin has spoilt one in regard to prose paintings of the desert, and, apart from this, some of Israfel's redundant and rhythmical periods are not quite convincing. One is never quite sure whether the thing described has any real relation to the thing seen, or whether the author is a musician trying to write or a writer striving to interpret music—a hopeless task—in words. But the appreciations at the end of the book are good of their kind. That of Mischa Elman, elusive as it is, deserves to be widely read.

* * *

Mr. Walter P. Wright's "The Perfect Garden: How to Keep it Beautiful and Fruitful" (Grant Richards, 6s. net), is a volume of "practical hints on economical management and the culture of all the principal flowers, fruits and vegetables." It gives useful lists of the best varieties, advice on such matters as grouping, general design, color for the different seasons, glass houses, garden auxiliaries, &c., and ends with a series of plans that will be of great value to those who intend laying out a garden. Mr. Wright's enthusiasm tends now and then to lead him to a certain luxuriance of diction, but this fault, if it be a fault, will easily be pardoned by all true gardeners. For his real knowledge and mastery of his subject they will have nothing but praise.

The Week in the City.

The Movement of Leading Stocks.

	Price Friday Morning, Aug. 7.		Price Friday Morning, Aug. 14.
Consols 2½ per cent.	86 7/16	...	86 7/8
German 3 per cent.	83	...	83
London and North Western	134	...	134 3/4
Union Pacific	160	...	162 1/4
Canadian-Pacific...	175 5/8	...	176 3/4

Corrected by index numbers, which enable us to substitute for gold prices the purchasing power of gold, the Board of Trade returns for July are practically as good as last year—a remarkable fact considering the prodigious diminution in the imports of the United States. Our cotton and woollen manufacturers are no doubt relying more on the home demand; and that demand has been augmented by the halving of the sugar duties. Perhaps the most cheering item of the July returns is the import of raw wool and cotton, which is larger than in the corresponding month last year in weight, though not in value. The returns of pauperism now show a distinct improvement. As to the prospects of trade it is difficult to speak. A fortnight ago the number of idle cars on the railroads of the United States, which had been diminishing for some time, again increased, and there has been another curtailment in the production of the American cotton mills, which would indicate that speculation and hope have been in advance of business. The same apparently is true of copper. The price alike of copper and of copper shares had been rising for a month, when at the beginning of the week a setback occurred. The rise, it is said, has been due partly to a small revival of the electrical industries, partly to a belief that there will be another trade boom in the autumn as a consequence of good crops in Canada and the States. Some alarm has been caused in the City by the embarrassments of the Brazilian and Sao Paulo Governments in connection with the coffee valorisation scheme, which has now come practically to a stop for want of credit. Hence the project of two big loans, which it will be very difficult to float.

German Credit.

One was not surprised to see German bonds rise a point after the King's meeting with the Kaiser and the announcement of a State visit to Berlin. Since Lord Cromer's speech there has been a good deal of nervous feeling, and whenever German loans have risen a little sales have followed from Berlin. But the near prospect of a naval arrangement for the limitation of "Dreadnoughts" offers a double advantage to German credit. First British capitalists will become willing to invest in the State and Imperial loans, and secondly, the output of new loans (which has been a direct consequence of excessive naval expansion) can be restricted. At present German loans are artificially low, for even Italy can borrow at a cheaper rate. Much, however, will depend upon the nature of the arrangement. If, for instance, the present rate of expenditure is stereotyped instead of being reduced, the financial embarrassment of the Kaiser's Government will continue, and another loan may be expected before long. The new German and Prussian loans are 4 per cent. at par.

The Turkish Bondholder.

Talking of Germany and loans, one naturally passes on to Turkey. One of the telegrams announces that an important function of the new Turkish Parliament will be the issue of a new loan. But what about the old debt and the Turkish Customs, which are mainly in the hands of the Commission? Will the Young Turks submit to foreign surveillance? Altogether, the financial outlook is by no means clear, though the elements of a sound and healthy reconstruction of the administrative fabric are there, if only men could be found to do it.

The Midland Agreement.

A highly-colored report of the wonderful advantages to accrue to the public from the formation of this new railway monopoly has been issued by the London and North-Western and Midland directors. Apparently there is no intention of going to Parliament, and the directors believe that they will be able to effect wonderful improvements without injury either to passengers or traders. At any rate, they say so, and give a list of new facilities, the principal one being that tickets to certain places will be available by either route. No doubt for a time certain economies may be effected without much injury to the public, especially as the Board of Trade will be watching things closely. But after a time we shall expect to see the usual results that follow on the disappearance of competition—stagnation, reduced services, and the complete disappearance of enterprise.

Lucellum.

Ah, fill the Pipe:—what boots it to repeat
How Time is flying underneath our Feet:
Unborn To-morrow and dead Yesterday,
Why fret about them if to-day be sweet!
Omar-Khayyám (modernised).

A Pipe of

PLAYER'S NAVY MIXTURE

makes

Yesterday a pleasant memory,
To-day a time of sweet enjoyment,
and its anticipation
Tomorrow brings peace of mind and contentment.

SOLD IN TWO STRENGTHS:

MILD, 5d. per oz. MEDIUM, 4½d. per oz.

JOHN PLAYER & SONS, Nottingham, will forward Testing Samples post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

0443

The Imperial Tobacco Co. (of Great Britain and Ireland) Limited.

TANGYE OIL ENGINE

AUTOMATIC TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP EXCEPT FOR STARTING

TANGYES LTD BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

ONE & ALL SEEDS

THE BRAND GUARANTEES ONE & ALL QUALITY.

ONE & ALL SEEDS are reliable, pure, and guaranteed.
Each packet is dated with the year of issue.
ONE & ALL FERTILISERS are complete Manures.
All are supplied in small quantities at reasonable prices.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Choice Varieties of Sweet Peas, with an Original Pamphlet on their Culture, by Richard Dean, V.M.H.—viz., Dorothy Eckford, white; Hon. Mrs. Kenyon, yellow; Prima Donna, soft pink; King Edward VII., crimson; Miss Wilmott, rich deep orange pink; Mrs. Walter Wright, mauve; Prince of Wales, fine rose; Duchess of Westminster, violet purple; Othello, deep maroon; Lady Grisel Hamilton, pale lavender; Duke of Westminster, purple; Navy Blue.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Annuals.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Perennials and Biennials.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables for Saladings.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables.

One & All Collection of Choicest Asters in 10 Varieties—2s. 6d. Giant Comet, white; Giant Comet, The Bride, white; Giant Comet, rose; Giant Comet, azure blue; Giant Comet, dark violet; Mixed Dwarf Chrysanthemum; Finest Mixed Bouquet; Mixed Victoria; Mixed Paeony; Perfection; and Betteridge's Quilled in mixed colours.

One & All Fertiliser No. 24 for general garden purposes. Half-rod packets 6d. bags, 7 lbs., 2/3; 14 lbs., 3/6; 28 lbs., 5/9; 56 lbs., 10/6; 112 lbs., 20/- Carriage Paid.

ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, LIMITED. Name and address of nearest Local Agent, Illustrated Catalogues, and other details, sent free by post on application to EDWARD OWEN GREENING, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

Liver troubles

SHOULD NEVER BE NEGLECTED.

The principal duty of the Liver is to extract the bile from the blood, and carry it direct to the digestive organs. Therefore, if the Liver is disordered, it cannot perform its duties properly, and the result is, the blood becomes overloaded with bile, which causes Lassitude, Debility, Irritability, and may develop into Dropsy.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets
STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

will speedily and permanently cure all liver troubles, because they thoroughly cleanse the Liver of all impurities, and stimulate it to easily perform its functions in a natural healthy manner. MERIT'S LIVERETS are prepared from purely vegetable ingredients only, as prescribed by a prominent physician, and have no debilitating effect upon the health. Price 1/1½ and 2/9 of all Chemists and Stores. If unable to obtain, send direct to

MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name MERIT'S LIVERETS, and the signature MERIT & Co., is on the package. So beware of spurious imitations.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY of BIRMINGHAM.

FACULTY OF MEDICINE,
Associated with the General and Queen's Hospitals for Clinical Teaching.

SCHOOL OF DENTISTRY.
In conjunction with the Birmingham Dental Hospital.

THE WINTER SESSION OPENS OCTOBER 5TH, 1908.

The University grants Degrees in Medicine, Surgery, and Public Health, and a Diploma in Public Health; also Degrees and a Diploma in Dental Surgery.

The Courses of Instruction are arranged to meet the requirement of other Universities and Licensing Bodies.

For Prospectus and further information apply to—
GILBERT BARLING, M.Sc., F.R.C.S., Dean.

UNIVERSITY OF LIVERPOOL

SESSION 1908-9.

The Autumn Term commences on Tuesday, October 6th, 1908.

Prospectuses and full particulars of the following may be obtained on application to the Registrar:—

FACULTIES OF ARTS, SCIENCE, MEDICINE, LAW AND ENGINEERING
UNIVERSITY TRAINING COLLEGE FOR TEACHERS
SCHOOL OF ARCHITECTURE
SCHOOL OF COMMERCE
INSTITUTE OF ARCHÆOLOGY
SOCIETY FOR UNIVERSITY EXTENSION
SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE AND OF TRAINING FOR SOCIAL WORK
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC HEALTH
SCHOOL OF TROPICAL MEDICINE
SCHOOL OF VETERINARY MEDICINE & SURGERY
SCHOOL OF DENTAL SURGERY
SCHOOL OF PHARMACY
INSTITUTE OF COMPARATIVE PATHOLOGY
DEPARTMENTS OF BIO-CHEMISTRY AND EXPERIMENTAL MEDICINE
HALLS OF RESIDENCE FOR MEN AND WOMEN
EVENING COURSES FOR THE DEGREE OF M.A.
EVENING LECTURES AND LABORATORY INSTRUCTION
JOINT MATRICULATION BOARD

Fellowships, Scholarships, Exhibitions, Special Grants and Prizes.
University Calendar (Price 1s., post free 1s. 4d.)

P. HEBBLETHWAITE, M.A., Registrar.

BROMSGROVE SCHOOL, WORCESTERSHIRE.

AUTUMN TERM begins September 17th.

APPLY THE HEADMASTER.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

THE ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL.

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields; gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Next Term, Sept. 18th. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

NEW BOYS ARRIVE SEPTEMBER 17TH, OTHERS 18TH.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

EDUCATIONAL.

WEST HEATH SCHOOL, HAMPSTEAD.

On high ground close to the Heath.
A day school for Boys and Girls (about 100 pupils).

Principal: Mrs. Ennis Richmond.
Headmaster: Mr. F. V. Bindon (M.A. Cantab.).
Succeeding Mr. & Mrs. Rice, now taking up work at Bedales School, Hants.

Good Buildings. Playground. Large Grass Playing Fields.

A Boarding house will be opened in September in connection with the above under the immediate management of Mrs. Richmond and her son, Mr. Kenneth Richmond, as house master.

Michaelmas Term will begin September 22nd.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.SC., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING. — Typewriting of every description high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

TOURS.

£6 6s. LUCERNE TOUR.

Nine days. Short Sea Route. No extras for Conductor or Gratuities.

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D.

5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. 25, Cannon Street, E.C.
4, Charing Cross, S.W. 84, Piccadilly, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son, Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.
BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott. Prop.

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor.

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop. J. E. Dowthwaite.

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Afternoon Teas, Tel. 647

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

SWANAGE.
"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

ANDERSON ANDERSON & ANDERSON LTD.

CATALOGUES POST FREE.

INDIA RUBBER, OILSKIN, & WATERPROOF MANUFACTURERS,

THIRTY-TWO GOLD MEDALS & AWARDS.

THE WATERPROOFERS.

NOTE OUR TRADE MARKS.

THE RUBBER HOUSE.

SHOOTING.

MOTORING.

WATERPROOF PIECE GOODS AND HOSPITAL SHEETING.

SPORTING.

OILSKINS.

WATER PROOFS

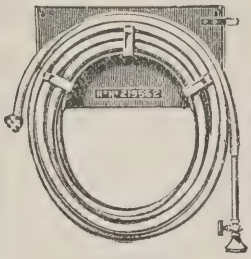
Two Qualities. All Sizes.

For all Purposes

HUNTING AND RIDING.

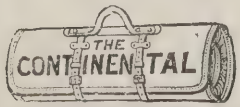
For all Climates

AIR BEDS, PILLOWS, CUSHIONS, &c.



HOSE AND HOSE FITTINGS.

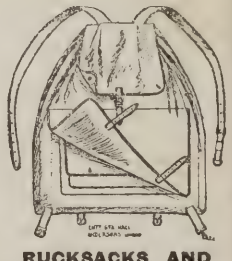
YACHTING OUTFITS.



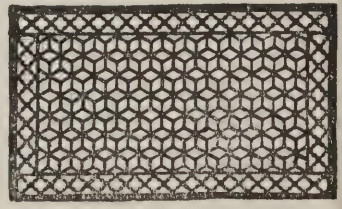
HOLDALLS, RUGS, &c., FOR TRAVELLING.

WATER BEDS, PILLOWS, CUSHIONS, &c., FOR PURCHASE OR HIRE.

SOILED LINEN BAGS.



RUCKSACKS, AND ALL KINDS OF BAGS, VALISES, &c.



MATS & MATTING.

37, QUEEN VICTORIA ST., E.C. LONDON. 58-59, CHARING CROSS, S.W.

70, QUEEN STREET, CARDIFF. 23, CASTLE STREET, SWANSEA.

Or from every high-class Dealer in the United Kingdom.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, AUGUST 15, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. III., No. 21.] SATURDAY, AUGUST 22, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	723
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—
Further Steps to Peace	726
The Poor Law and the Family	727
The Eastern '48	728
A Crisis in Coffee ...	730
LIFE AND LETTERS:—
The Mind of the Suburb	730
Careful Joy	731
Can Trout be Educated?	733
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—
The Harmsworth Brand—VI.	734
HOLIDAYS:—
In the Grampians. By C. H. Herford	735
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—
The Zeppelin Movement and German Nationalism. By Ed. Bernstein	736
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
The Lost Liberty of the Road. By Sir Edmund Verney, Henry Broadhurst, A. M. Anderson, J. H. Chatterton, E. B. M., A. J. Marriott, Fairplay, C. H., Francis Coutts, and Cyclist ...	738
Haggerston and After. By F. W. Soutter	740
A Propos de Bottes. By Thomas Seccombe	740
Nursing the Voters. By Edwin Hill	741
The Dilemma of a Liberal Solicitor. By Another Liberal and Teetotal Solicitor	741
"A Green Heaven." By Richard F. Jupp ...	741
The Work of the Industrial Law Committee. By Irene Cox...	741
Liberalism and Labor. By the Rev. J. E. Hand...	742
The Art of Ending. By Max Judge	742
James II.'s Statue. By Antiquarian	742
POETRY:—
A Somerset Lullaby. By Edward Sydney Tylee	742
REVIEWS:—
"The Heart of Darkness"	743
The Importance of Jewels	743
A Dictionary of the Gospels	745
A Singer on His Art ...	745
The Genius of Mr. Conrad	746
BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
The Trout-Waters of England	748
A Summer Tour in Finland	748
My Devonshire Book	748
Plainer Fare and Less of It	750
From St. Ives to Land's End	750
THE WEEK IN THE CITY	750

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The countervailing of the anti-German propaganda in this country has been energetically pursued during the week. The tour of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in Germany, though private and informal, cannot be dissociated from it, and it is notable that the Chancellor has, explicitly and with much energy, repudiated any want of sympathy between Sir Edward Grey and himself. We believe this to be entirely correct. Sir Edward Grey's policy has never been consciously anti-German, even though the pursuit of the understanding with Russia served to lower the Anglo-German temperature, and to suggest the policy of "penning-in." The Chancellor, who has been very well received in Frankfort and elsewhere, has certainly investigated the German system of industrial insurance, in some sides of which he has much faith. But Mr. Harold Spender, who accompanies him, admitted to the reporter of the "Tageblatt" that if an opportunity arose for promoting peace, it would be used, and Mr. George's language favors this reading. We believe that the prospect of an Anglo-German understanding is a good one, and that the Prime Minister's and Sir Edward Grey's sudden visits to town are not unconnected with it.

* * *

At Swansea, Mr. Churchill, in language of much power, ridiculed the idea of war, while declaring that the Government would not depart from a policy of effective security against invasion. He insisted that there was no collision of "primary interests" between Germany and England in any quarter of the globe, and no real cause of difference. War in such a situation would be a "hellish and wicked crime." Not ten thousand persons in Great Britain, excluding lunatics and the writers in the "National Review," desired it. Mr. Churchill quoted the saying of a German soldier, who was helping a French peasant to get in his crops during the occupation in 1870, and, when rebuked, replied, "War is all very well for the swells, but poor people have to help one another." We notice that Mr. Philip Snowden, speaking at Manchester on Saturday, joined Mr. Keir Hardie in repudiating Mr. Blatchford and Mr. Hyndman, who thus stand alone in the Socialist and Labor Parties. The "Daily Chronicle" has collected a large number of opinions from representative statesmen and merchants strongly deprecating the notion of an Anglo-German war.

* * *

Meanwhile the "Daily News," we think, mistakes the bearing of an important and very conciliatory article in the "Vossische Zeitung," which, properly regarded, is an excellent fruit of Mr. Lloyd George's visit. The "Vossische" refers to the "Telegraph" story of a hundred million naval loan, based on Mr. Stead's grotesque calculation of a British standard in "Dreadnoughts" of two vessels to Germany's one. The "News" assumes that the German paper announces and approves an Anglo-German understanding on this basis. But this is not the case. The "Vossische," assuming that there may be some truth in the story (there is none), asks whether it is necessary for two neighbouring nations to build such enormous fleets. That is a proper observation; it does not imply that the British Government has lost its head, and that Mr. Asquith has gone to school to Mr. Maxse.

* * *

It is rather curious that the idea of a Naval Loan, so long as it was confined to the Harmsworth Press, did not hold the attention of serious people at all, but the moment it was taken up by the "Westminster Gazette" and the "Daily Telegraph," they assumed there must be something in it. We observe that the editor of the "Evening News," interviewing his colleague of the "Observer," was urged by him to note the immense advantage which the German habit of borrowing gives to the German Admiralty, and how, if we followed suit and borrowed more than they did, these remarkable consequences would ensue:—(1) The European situation would be impressed upon the German mind; (2) they would realise the gravity of the contest; (3) their financial system would be in danger of dislocation; and (4) Great Britain would recover the Naval initiative in time of peace. To which we may add (5) there would be a very pretty slump in Consols, and British credit might be put on a par with German.

* * *

The object of a Naval Loan and a Naval programme is obvious. It is to prevent public and Parliamentary criticism of Naval Estimates, and to provide for a perpetual increase, which will be more or less withdrawn from the purview of Parliament. This is what actually happened under the system of loans for military and naval works, which was carried to such lengths by the late Government that it actually destroyed the operation of a Sinking Fund. A loan for useful and productive works may, in certain circumstances, be legitimate. But a loan for ships, which involve a heavy charge on the taxpayer for maintenance and repairs, is clearly wrong, and has provoked such powerful criticism in Germany that the Government there has promised to introduce a project of new taxation which will put an end to the necessity of borrowing. The notion that Mr. Asquith, who has exposed the folly of the system so often, and has taken such drastic action to stop it, would suddenly turn round and adopt it strikes us as ludicrous in the extreme. The same may be said of Mr. McKenna and Mr. Haldane.

* * *

The American fleet of sixteen vessels arrived at Sydney Harbour, one of the most magnificent refuges in the world, on Thursday and were received with an enthusiasm that strikes a British observer as almost rapturous. It is said that 250,000 people lined the cliffs, staying out all night, wrapped in blankets, so as not to miss the first sight of the incoming vessels on the winter morning. A large armed force was allowed to land by an express relaxation of the Commonwealth law, and the Mayor of Sydney, in welcoming the squadron, said that England, Australia, and America could defy the world. It is clear that the great American naval movement towards the Pacific has been as welcome to Australia as the growth of the Japanese Navy has been distasteful to her; indeed, the common views of America and Australia on the color question were plainly recited in the address. The sight of the American fleet will also stimulate the Australian desire for an Australian Navy, the momentous policy now being forwarded by Mr. Deakin.

* * *

The Turkish Government has issued its programme. It puts finance in the forefront, and emphasises the necessity for economy, improvement of tax methods, and the prudent but strict abolition of sinecures. The army and the navy are to be reformed and strengthened, and all creeds and races are to share the honors and burdens of national defence, as they are to be equal before the laws, and have an equal share in a reconstituted educational system. The Cabinet intends to preserve the friendship of all Powers, and it hopes that the new régime will ultimately carry with it the abandonment of the Capitulations. The past week has been one of difficulties. Strikes of dock laborers, printers, tobacco workers, and tramway men have broken out or threatened; the Committee, however, has settled them with its usual skill. On Sunday, Redjib Pasha, the Minister of War, from whom much was expected, died suddenly after two days' tenure of office. The negotiations between the Committee and the Bulgarian Internal Organisation have so far led to no result, and it is significant that the Committee is backing Sandausky in his electoral campaign, for Sandausky stands for a Macedonia within the Ottoman Empire, and denounces the Internal Organisation as a tool of Bulgarian ambitions.

* * *

Some French papers are preparing the world for the triumph of Abdul Aziz and the decline of Mulai Hafid by crediting Abdul Aziz with serious victories, and Mulai Hafid with outrages on British subjects. The victories are not confirmed, and the outrages are fictions. Abdul Aziz has apparently stopped in his march on Marakesh, where in any case he is pretty certain to be opposed by a strong force of Mulai Hafid's followers. His revival ceases to mystify when it is understood that it is due to French assistance. The French put the customs at his disposal—that is why they are so keen on keeping the ports out of Mulai Hafid's hands—and they have given him guns and gunners, and allowed him to enlist conveniently time-expired Algerian troops. The colonial party do not mean to let Morocco slip away from them, though their extravagances are a menace to European peace, and, as long as we encourage them, a serious difficulty in the way of an Anglo-German understanding.

* * *

The first session of the present Portuguese Cortes is practically over, and although the Parliament will, for the first time since 1904, have voted the Budget, it will have accomplished nothing of the elaborate reform programme laid before it. Senhor Pimentel, in the House of Peers, declares that the situation is worse than in February last, and foreign observers agree that the dynasty is in a perilous state. The scandal of the illegal payments to the Royal family has sullied the prestige of the monarchy, and fresh revelations every day sustain the popular indignation. One of the latest is the curious discovery that the payments were made in London. The illicit importation of arms intended for revolutionary purposes goes on steadily, and the officials do nothing to check it; many of the officials are known to be Republicans. Incendiary and train-wrecking outrages have greatly increased, and it is said that discontent is growing in the army and navy, whose loyalty alone prevented a coup d'état on February 1st. Even the severity of the censorship cannot conceal the gravity of the situation.

* * *

Those who see signs of a change in the spirit of German Social Democracy which will reflect more accurately than before the character of Socialists south of the Main can find confirmatory evidence in a quarrel now raging between the party executive in Berlin and the Socialist factions in the Bavarian and Baden Parliaments. Within the last few days the Socialist members of the Würtemberg, Bavarian, and Baden Diets have voted the Budget. The Würtembergers have done this before, but it is a new step for the Bavarian and Baden factions, and the "Vorwärts" condemns it as a betrayal of principles because a decision of Congress forbids the voting of a Budget—so as to protest against the capitalists' State organisation—save in exceptional cases. These exceptions have never been classified and the Badeners claim that their case was one of them, because their votes were necessary for the passage of a measure raising the pay of the State employees. The quarrel is complicated by the refusal of the Baden faction to give the party executive information of its intention, but the whole episode is not incorrectly regarded as indicating a weakening of the old stiff and intransigent tactics and a movement in the Reformist direction. It will be interesting to see what attitude the approaching Congress of the party adopts.

* * *

The Belgian Chamber has passed the Treaty and the Colonial Law which together transfer the Congo to the Belgian State. The majorities were large, and it was left to M. Destrée to express finally the humanitarian objections to the Act, even in its modified form—the slightness of Parliamentary control, the failure to annul forced labor, and to restore the natives their lands. It seems extremely doubtful whether the mere change of responsibility will, in such a form, do much good.

* * *

A frightful explosion took place on Tuesday at the Maypole Colliery, near Wigan. It was of tremendous force, and it was reported on Wednesday evening that a fierce fire was raging in the wrecked galleries. Over seventy men were in the pit, only three of whom were barely rescued, and the deaths are now set down at seventy-six. The coal is said to have been very dusty, and therefore dangerous, so that it is necessary to ask whether it had been properly sprayed, especially as the atmosphere over the British coalfields happened to be unusually dry, and a warning to that effect had been issued. There appears to be no reasonable hope that any of the buried miners can be rescued or are now alive. As usual, heroic efforts were made to reach them, and every peril of the deadly atmosphere was braved.

* * *

The tale of outrages by motorists, and of ineffectual action by the law, continues. On a road in Carmarthenshire a young laboring man was found with his head battered in and his ribs broken. The injuries were attributed to a motor-car, which was traced and then lost. On the same day a woman of 64, a child of six, and a woman of 75 were slain. At Newmarket a car drove furiously through a string of frightened racers, declining to stop, though pursued by enraged sportsmen. At Helston, a married woman, with nine children, was knocked down and died from shock, and at Oxford an "elderly unknown" man succumbed to a fractured skull and hemorrhage. The motor-cab which killed him was going at a slow pace. The coroner asked why it was not stopped altogether, and if so, whether the accident might not have been avoided. The driver answered "Yes," and the jury "exonerated him from blame." At Horsham a girl of seventeen was riding on the step of her brother's bicycle. A motor-car, going at twenty-five to thirty miles an hour, dashed into the bicycle, knocked the girl into the road and her brother into the bank, killed her, and ran over her body. Meanwhile, the county of Kent has been presented with a bill for £3,500 for tarring its roads as a protection against this traffic.

* * *

One of the most serious cases of negro lynching in American history took place last week in Springfield, Illinois, the birthplace of Lincoln, the liberator, and in some respects an American city of the best type, served by one of the ablest of American newspapers. The lynching was worse than the average Southern brutality, for general vengeance for a sexual crime was wreaked in the negroes' quarter, which was looted, and two blameless men were murdered. The negroes fled, and formed an armed camp, and the mob was so furious and ungovernable that the soldiers, who were in great strength, had to fire on it, and many were killed and wounded. Isolated and most cruel lynchings of negroes, such as steeping a man in kerosene and burning him in public, seem to be growing in the North, where the hatred of the black race is spreading, and is fed by industrial causes, and the competition of black with white labor. It is indeed saddening to think that the moral results of the war of emancipation are being wiped out. The redeeming feature is the strong action of the Governor of Illinois, who has summoned two hundred white men, promises a rigorous prosecution, and has opened Springfield as a city of refuge for persecuted negroes in the country districts.

* * *

The movement towards conscription has had a heavy blow from Admiral Sir Cyprian Bridge, who on Monday addressed to the "Times" a "Straight Talk about Compulsory Service." Sir Cyprian Bridge's special point is that conscription will be the ruin of our system of recruiting for the British Navy, which every European power envies and cannot imitate. He strongly contrasts the good relationship between officers and men in the two British services with the mere outward submissiveness between the same classes in the Continental armies and navies where compulsory service prevails. He endorses the view of Continental critics that barrack life deteriorates the peasants and workmen who undergo it, and predicts further reductions in the periods of service with the colors. He declares that conscription is incompatible with urban democracy, and that many of the most thoughtful Continental officers think it is out of date. Does any rational man, we wonder, imagine that all these difficulties can be faced in this country, and that on the top of them we can impose compulsory service for India and abroad, which is what Lord Roberts is really driving at?

* * *

The French in Indo-China are experiencing difficulties as serious as, and not unlike, our own in India. There is a good deal of unrest, and the native troops are said to be disaffected. At the end of June there was a conspiracy to poison a post of European soldiers and an attempt at mutiny at Hanoi. The nerves of the white residents are so badly shaken that they are calling, as usual, for "stern measures." The operations of pirates and the entrance of armed rebel bands from neighbouring Chinese provinces are partly responsible for the trouble, but it is generally admitted that the whole system of administration is rotten from top to bottom. The tax system is particularly bad, resting on numerous leased monopolies which check initiative, cripple industries, and stand in the way of development; the liquor monopoly is so arranged that it pays the contractors to bribe the natives to drink. The Japanese triumph, too, has had its effect, and Lieut.-Col. Barnard, writing in the "Temps," emphasises the necessity of giving a people who have always governed themselves a share in the administration. The French Government has strengthened the white garrison, but the new governor is commissioned to elaborate a programme of reforms.

* * *

The interest of the cricket season reached its height last week and this week, for it is now clear that Yorkshire will regain her supremacy among the counties. She has a new bowler in Newstead, most of her veterans are in form, and her policy of aiming at all-round excellence has again been approved by success. She beat Surrey by seven wickets, out-playing her conspicuously in bowling and fielding, the two points in which Yorkshire excels. But her victory was in the main due to the way in which her eleven plays as one man, a quality which she shares with the Australian Elevens. Surrey bats more brilliantly, but the wickets at the Oval are too perfect, and unfit the players for sun-baked or uncertain pitches. Moreover, the Southern team has for many years wanted a captain of first-rate merit, and an all-round player of the quality of Lohmann and Hirst. She now fights for second place with Kent, which she defeated brilliantly on Tuesday by an innings and 318 runs. Kent, so dangerous on its own ground, broke down completely before the new Surrey bowlers, Hitch and Kirk. Nor, indeed, can any team stand against Surrey when her batsmen are in form, and have a wicket to suit their method.

Politics and Affairs.

FURTHER STEPS TO PEACE.

It is surprising to find a Liberal paper willing to advocate the discredited and discarded policy of a four years' loan for naval expenditure on the basis of the Hamilton programme. The "Westminster Gazette" puts forward this proposal as a means of keeping the peace with Germany. We may be quite sure that whatever steps we take in this direction, they will not be in imitation of the course which in Germany has quickened the present emulation in shipbuilding, and which, on the mere ground of its financial dangers, she is about to modify. If a semi-absolutist State like Germany cannot stand the policy of paying for a prolonged bout of shipbuilding by loan, our own democratic Parliament is unlikely to stomach it. What purpose a loan would serve save that of depreciating Consols, that sorely tried security, and of alarming and irritating the Liberal Party, we are at a loss to imagine. It would certainly take the Naval Estimates from the view of Parliament at the moment when it is most necessary to keep them under criticism. It must enhance the power of the expert and diminish the power of the people. It is not Governments that save us from war, even a thoroughly peaceful Government like our own. Governments are not all-powerful. In this country they are subject to the fear of the military and naval adviser who threatens resignation when his advice is not followed, and they require, therefore, the constant check which public opinion supplies. Mr. Churchill well said at Swansea last week that he believed in the "essential goodness of great peoples." Certainly it is the fact that simple, unsophisticated folk, who work for their daily bread, and who, in all countries have a quarrel, not with neighbouring workers, but with the order of society in their own land, are, if they are truthfully informed, the enemies of war. It is on this force, outside and often hostile to Governments, that the friends of peace must rely, and it will never do to shut off from their representatives the power of challenging the war budgets.

What means, therefore, can we reasonably take to prevent the crime of war with Germany, in addition to the proposal to secure immunity for private property at sea? We agree with the "Westminster" that if things were as they ought to be, such a contingency would not even be discussed. We have no cause of war with Germany in any quarter of the world. We have no Continental rivalries with her, she has no colonial ambitions or adventures that clash with us. On none of the great oceans do the two countries come into serious contact. In war they could only clumsily injure each other. The few and weak German colonies would be useless to us; our self-governing dominions could never be ruled by her. Neither Power, we believe, could have a chance of success in invading the other, and it is mere hysteria to think that the weaker Naval Power would try a landing in face of the stronger. And there are as yet no conscious aims of exterior policy that are in conflict. We take it as a new sign of the perversity of the cultivated man when an old resident in England, a student of our affairs, like Professor Schulze-Gaervernitz, so distorts the conceptions of anti-Imperialists like Bright and Cobden as to imagine that they aimed, through their commercial policy, at world-dominion for Great Britain. Even our anti-Germans are possessed, not by the notion of the destruction of German power, but by fear that she means to overbuild our Navy and to lay us open to invasion. This point is undoubtedly serious, and for that reason we rejoice to read the articles in the "Tag" and the "Frankfurter Zeitung," which disclaim naval rivalry, and favor the reduction of the German battleship programme. If such a reduction can be secured, all, we are convinced, will be well. It is, we think, fair to apply to Germany the words which Cobden used to France in a situation in which she and England were steadily building against each other. "France," said Cobden, in 1861, "has no necessity for and no legitimate pretensions to, an equality with us at sea; nor is there in her history any precedent for such a policy." Germany, in the same way, cannot pretend to such an equality. She has nothing like our merchant shipping or our colonial possessions, our army is negligible as compared with hers, and we have only sea communication with the rest of the world as against her vast land frontiers. Therefore she can surely be content with a relationship of at the most two to three battleships in the new types, and if she insists on building more, she necessarily exposes herself to the question. Why and against whom are you building? And if she is open to reductions, we are certainly willing to make them on some such basis as three to two.

This would be a great advance, moral as well as material, for then we should have decisive evidence of German good faith, and a weapon of power against our own Jingoes. But we cannot rest content with mere preachments to Germany; we have our own case to consider. Our expenditure on force is still on a war basis. It has risen from thirty millions twenty years ago, and forty millions ten years ago, to fifty-six millions, exclusive of India, to-day. The Liberal Party must set its face like a flint against an addition to these figures, and, if necessary, carry its will into the division lobbies against estimates that exceed them. We may admit the primacy of the Navy's claims. Very well; let the two services decide their respective claims with each other. All that the party has to do in a time of profound peace is to decide on the aggregate. If the Admiralty asserts the costliness of the new types, and the necessity of persevering with them on account of their extreme power and value, and of the fact that naval battles will in future be contests between "Dreadnoughts," we may fairly ask that men, and coal, and repairs shall not be wasted on ships that have become obsolete or useless. The expenditure on personnel and repairs is most extravagant, and quite out of proportion to that of other navies, and if concentration on a few monster vessels is the new word in naval warfare, the "scrapping" of their predecessors is clearly called for. On this ground we urge the party to take a firm stand, and be prepared to meet all the consequences of its action, voting obstinately and fearlessly against increases. It need not be afraid of undue haste. Economy will be forced on Germany before it is seriously practised here. And Liberals should remember that in insisting on regarding the present estimates as a maximum, they are abandoning the old hopes of economy. There ought to be reductions in both services. There must be no increase in the total charges for both.

We hope, therefore, that before the progressive party loses power, it will have reversed the militarist tendencies of its two predecessors, and put war expenditure in something like its proper relationship to the civil services. If, in addition, we can stamp on the popular imagination a true conception of international dealings, and can blow into the air the idea that the rise of a great industrial nation on the farther shores of the North Sea is a menace to our prosperity, instead of its complement and guarantee, we shall have added something to the moral stock-in-trade of our nation. And we shall at the same time draw the teeth of German Jingoism, and of the selfish Bismarckian materialism which lives upon it. We "pacifists" may have all the faults in the world; but, after all, we are less expensive to our Admiralty than Mr. Maxse and his friends. The cost of their articles and speeches may be summed up accurately in the columns of the last two German naval programmes, and their reduction is in the main a question of the power of rationality and good feeling against such weapons. When, therefore, we have exercised all possible pressure on our own Government, when we have called on every form of serious opinion in England to discountenance an approach to war, we can, with a good conscience, appeal to our friends in Germany to do the like. The preservation of peace is, after all, a matter of the will of the German and British peoples: and when that is clearly and powerfully affirmed, and all provocative material removed, statesmen, be they never so perverse, must find means of expressing it.

THE POOR LAW AND THE FAMILY.

The next twelve months promise to be of critical importance in the history of social reform. By the adoption of a non-contributory system of old age pensions, the Government have initiated an entirely new departure in the attitude of the State towards the problems of poverty. To complete the first stage of their work will tax the resources of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the next Budget. But already a number of questions loom behind. The moment provision is made for the old by fixing a limit such as seventy years at which pensions are to begin, it becomes apparent that the problem of old age does not stand by itself. Some are old at sixty-five, some unfortunately at sixty or earlier. Sickness merging into permanent invalidity leaves a large class of workers incapable of providing for themselves for a greater or less number of years before the pension age arrives. Meanwhile, the fluctuations of trade visit the strong and the weak, the healthy and the invalid, the young and the elderly alike, and though no doubt the younger, stronger, and more capable are, as a rule, the last to be thrown out and the first to find work again, yet the weeks of "play" which intermittent unemployment involves cause a strain which is felt more severely in proportion to the number of mouths to be filled.

Now in the matter of sickness and of unemployment, as in the matter of old age, we are dealing with causes of poverty which are in the main beyond the control of the individual workman. True, if he were paid at the rate of a professional man's salary, he might insure against them adequately by private or by collective saving. True that, as it is, the skilled workman out of his moderate wages makes a gallant effort to meet the need. But the whole principle underlying the policy of old age pensions is that, upon the whole, the actual income which under our competitive system falls to the bulk of the wage-earning class is insufficient by itself to supply all that is required. It does not leave a sufficient margin over the immediate cost of household expenditure. Yet it is imperative, in the interests not merely of individual sufferers but of the healthy life of the community, that provision should be made against those causes of distress which tend to depress the poor below the level of ordinary civilised subsistence, and to turn them from efficient workers into unemployable paupers. The prime effort of the Government, we take it, will be to cut at these causes of poverty. The cost of the provision for sickness and invalidity cannot indeed be borne wholly by the State alone. The individual will have to co-operate, voluntary agencies will co-operate. But the State, having laid the foundation of the whole structure in its free gift to the aged, will lend its aid as well. We may look forward to a time when the entire wage-earning population will be rendered reasonably secure by a system of insurance against at least so much of acute poverty as arises from sickness and the advance of age.

Causes of poverty such as these naturally separate themselves out from those moral causes—idleness, drunkenness, incapacity in a multitude of forms—which constitute the essence of pauperism. In this sense any true solution of the problem of Poor Law administration must proceed by "breaking up" the question into its component parts. We quite agree, therefore, with the articles recently published in the "Times," and purporting to express the views of "many, if not most," of the Poor Law Commission, that the beginning of wisdom in this matter is to see that the problem is not single but complex. But it is still more important to recognise where the main dividing lines fall. In our view the fundamental division is by causes. There are economic causes of poverty which the State should, as far as its resources allow, obviate by providing, or helping the individual to provide, against the distress which they occasion. There are moral causes of poverty which are to be corrected, as far as possible, by a deterrent and punitive treatment. Along these lines we can conceive the creation, by successive stages, of a wholly new system of social legislation—old age pensions being the first step, and insurance against sickness and invalidity the second. The classification adopted in the "Times" rests on quite different ideas. It distinguishes the case of the child, the sick, the aged, and, finally, the able-bodied, and it hands over each to its appropriate authority. The child is to be taken, rightly we think, from the pauper school and catered for by the education authority; the sick is to be dealt with by the sanitary authority or the Health Committee; the able-bodied by a special body created for the purpose in place of the Guardians. These, as being an elective body, are to be dispossessed. Nor are they to be replaced by a committee of the town or county council. The Commissioners whom the "Times" represents have apparently no belief in the elected representatives, nor have they any liking for the variations and experiments of localities. All is to be uniform, up to date, expert, and official.

But as to the "breaking-up" of the problem we naturally ask, since the family is one and the sufferers from a single economic disaster are many, how unity of treatment is to be secured. If the father of the family falls ill and thereby drops into the pigeon-hole of the health committee, what of his wife and children? Are they to be maintained while he is ill, and is he to be made to pay for his treatment, and if so, who is to decide whether he is able to pay or no? Questions such as these suggest, after all, a single authority as the keystone of the arch, and, indeed, we find in the end that the problem is not so much broken up as we supposed. The place of the Board of Guardians is to be taken by a kind of court and a judge, at least a judicial officer. Before him, it appears, the applicant has to come in the first instance. He hears his case and decides on it. He may order out-relief to the family, or he may break it up, sending the father to a penitentiary workhouse, the children to a residential school, and the mother wherever he thinks proper. The ratepayers may appeal against his decision, but the family itself may not. All it can do is to reject the relief altogether, and even this may be forbidden if it is deemed by one or other of the authorities interested to be making itself a nuisance.

We are not quite sure that we fully understand the scheme. The articles explaining it are compressed, and, in places, obscure. We doubt whether the Commissioners interested have been wise in adopting this manner of familiarising the public in advance with proposals the objections to which occur readily while the supporting arguments are not set forth with any fullness. In point of fact, the advantages for which the Commissioners look are not very clear. Undoubtedly, for example, it would be an excellent thing to force all pauper children from pauper associations. In considerable measure this is already being done. Can it be carried further without the breaking up of families, and is this intended or not? We are not denying that there may be cases in which it would be better that the family should be broken up. We are only arguing that if this is the price to be paid, we ought to know beforehand what it is. It does, in fact, suggest itself at times, as we read the articles, that what is called the breaking-up of the poor law problem means in reality a breaking-up of the family, and this is a solution which, for our part, we would sacrifice much to avoid. To us it is not made less repugnant by its dependence on the irresponsible judgment of an expert. We have not that glorious confidence in the trained official which for some enthusiasts is the key to all social reform. We do not think that the poor would come readily before a court armed with arbitrary powers over the destiny of an entire family. We think that all that are most self-respecting among them would strain every nerve and encountering every suffering to escape the meshes of the new machine, even more painfully and at greater cost of health and of child-life than now. Nor do we think that the ratepayers would readily acquiesce in the dispositions of an irresponsible authority for which they would have to find the money. In a word, we do not think the abolition of local self-government and the distribution of its functions among paid officials the solution of the social problem. We await further explanation before we condemn this or any other scheme, but we must hope that something rather more human and less mechanical will be the final outcome of the Commission.

THE EASTERN '48.

The Mohammedan world has never presented a more interesting spectacle than it does at this moment, and to men of a liberal mind its awakening is not the less sympathetic because it is so largely a protest against European exploitation. For it is something much larger than a national and revolutionary movement which is transforming Turkey. The revolt of the Young Turks repeats, with an immeasurably greater degree of competence and courage, the uprising which won for Persia a frail constitution, and it sprang from the same roots. In both cases a people has emancipated itself from a native despotism, but in both cases the motive which brought at the eleventh hour a novel and desperate determination, was a sense that the despot was playing the game of the encroaching foreigner. The Persians feared that the Shah would sell them to Russia, and prepare, partly by conscious treason, but more by sheer incompetence and national bankruptcy, a period of European tutelage, if not of direct conquest or occupation. The Turks realised as clearly—and their perceptions were sharpened by the Anglo-Russian understanding—that the anarchy in Macedonia which the Sultan would not cure by statesmanship must have ended before long in the total loss of their European possessions.

There is nothing new in this dread of the hostile but powerful foreigner; what is new is the sense that his real ally was the native tyrant and all the underworld of the Palace and the secret police. Hitherto the reaction against foreign pressure had been inspired only by a blind and instinctive hatred, a mood of panic which was rather inaccurately ascribed to fanaticism. The Moors would murder a European "missionary of civilisation" because they dreaded his telegraphs, his steel rails, and even his medicines, as so many instruments of "pacific penetration." Only four years ago a European walking through the streets of an Albanian town might watch the tribesmen silently spitting on the ground as his shadow fell upon them. The Armenian massacres were in the main an attempt to exterminate a race which seemed to be serving as the agent and pretext for European encroachments. But all the while, among the more reflective Moslem peoples, a more fruitful process of thought was going on, which took the form of a very critical self-examination. One symptom of this salutary tendency was the great success which attended a movement inaugurated last year throughout the East by an influential Russian Mohammedan, Ismail Bey Gas-prinsky, a Liberal journalist, who edits a newspaper which circulates largely among all the Turkish-speaking peoples. His idea was to found a periodical Pan-Islamic Congress, whose duty it should be to examine the causes of the decadence of the Moslem world. The thoughts of scholarly men turned instinctively to the golden period of the history of Islam, when the Arabs were the most cultured and the most progressive race of the Mediterranean basin. Pious thinkers with some tincture of a modern education fell to examining the Koran and the traditions, and they found there some basis for a democratic doctrine, precisely as the Whig historians in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries found in the medieval law of England sanctions and precedents for their constitutional teaching. Other minds in Turkey, in Egypt, or in Russia, were busy with the problem of education or with the position of women. The practical men who have made revolutions have reaped what these thinkers had sown. There has been no sudden conversion, but rather a rapid resolve to act upon the conclusions formed during a long and unhappy period of self-criticism. The old ignorant rage against Europe has turned inwards, and instead of the former attitude of a fierce but uncomprehending resistance to an invading civilisation, there is now a proud determination to renew the old glories of Islam by returning to a lost tradition of culture, liberty, and justice.

It is even yet too soon to form a very confident judgment on the prospects of this movement. Hitherto its course has been almost as smooth as its triumph is complete, and it has surprised the most hostile judges into a sudden generosity. The tolerance, the good sense, the mingled firmness and moderation of its leaders are beyond all praise, and their hold upon the people appears to be absolute. In two vital respects it has the advantage of the less fortunate Russian revolution. The Russian people was able to apply pressure to its rulers only in the spasmodic form of a general strike. Formidable while it lasted, it could not be renewed. The Young Turks, on the other hand, have behind them a standing army, to which they can at any moment appeal. In the second place, the Turkish is a purely political revolution, untroubled as yet by the ideas of a class war, and free from the burden of a social programme which might menace the interests of the governing class. The Russian reformers had to espouse a programme of drastic agrarian reform in order to carry the mass of the peasantry with them; having won the peasantry, they presently found that they had alienated the gentry, and, as a consequence, the officers of the army, who remain loyal to the throne because they are tenacious of their lands. There seems to be in Turkey no risk for many a long year to come of a class war, or of a powerful reaction among the Turks themselves. The real danger, and it is sufficiently serious, will arrive when the Young Turks grapple with the claims of the alien races within the Empire—Albanians, Bulgarians, and Arabs. If, in their desire to build up a strong and united Empire, they reject the idea of federalism and decentralisation, they may have once more to face the task of repressing local rebellions. If, on the other hand, they trust the non-Turkish races so far, for example, as to grant Home Rule to Macedonia, they may find that centuries of oppression do not make a soil in which an idea of loyalty and an artificial Ottoman patriotism can suddenly take root. A Bulgarian province in Macedonia might very well attempt to imitate the precedent set by Eastern Roumelia.

Nothing has been more striking in the recent history of constitutional movements than the amazingly rapid interaction of popular forces across frontiers. The October constitution in Russia was followed at once by a workmen's demonstration in Vienna, which gave universal suffrage to Austria. Through the Caucasus the impulse penetrated to Persia, and set in motion forces there which prove to be much more robust than official cynics had supposed. The Shah's coup d'état brought him only a temporary success, and, if he is still supreme among his Cossacks in Teheran, in the much more populous and important centre of Tabriz it is the revolution which triumphs. The Persian movement had an echo, even before the Macedonian rising, in a long series of unorganised revolts in the Turkish provinces which border Persia. Once more the impulse has recrossed the frontier, for it was the proclamation of a constitution in Turkey which put heart into the anti-royalists at Tabriz. It would not be surprising if Russia, which gave the first signal for all these revolutions, were, in her turn, to feel the backwash of the wave which she set in motion. The sense of solidarity and emulation among peoples, which played so great in the events of 1848, is once more astir, and it is keenest of all in the East.

Hitherto we have been disinterested, if sympathetic, spectators of the re-birth of two peoples that seemed to have no future. But we shall be poor students of history if we fail to foresee, shortsighted statesmen if we neglect to forestall, the influence of these events upon Egypt and India. If the Turks can achieve even a partial success, it must go far to break the spell which has led the East to acquiesce in despotism. If they, Mohammedans and Orientals, children of a stock which ranks in the East as the least progressive and the least intellectual, can acclimatise liberty and adapt a Parliament, the Indians, inheritors of an older culture and their superiors in modern learning, will certainly claim the right to make in their turn a similar experiment. For if India has the same problem of many races and vernaculars, she has now, what Turkey hardly yet possesses, a common language and a common culture. To Egypt the application of the object-lesson is even more direct. The Egyptians are still nominally Turkish subjects. Save that their character is less sturdy—an inferiority which they will not admit—they are in every other respect in a better position to use the liberty which the Turks have won. If they should claim in their turn a constitution, can we be less liberal than Abdul Hamid? Can we declare that the only portion of the old Turkish Empire which shall not enjoy self-government is the portion where England has been engaged for a generation in a work of education? The Young Turks have set a standard by which all our concessions will be tried; in the end they may force the pace of our too leisurely programmes of emancipation. While the independent kingdoms of the East were corrupt and unprogressive, our paternal despotisms enjoyed the advantage in a comparison. The time may not be far distant when that advantage will be obsolete.

A CRISIS IN COFFEE.

Children connect Brazil with nuts, motorists connect it with rubber, and investors (of whom there are many in this country, holding Brazilian railway stock or Government bonds) know that such prosperity and credit as the vast and rather unwieldy Republic possesses is based upon coffee. The investor does not always take a very intelligent interest in the country where he has placed his savings; but he may be pardoned if he is a little puzzled and embarrassed when he learns from the financial columns of his newspaper that there is something wrong in Brazil. He reads about a coffee valorisation scheme that is not working as it should, and of Brazilian battleships which are on sale before they have been delivered to the purchaser. He sees a telegram from Rio stating that the town proposes to borrow fourteen millions sterling, and that the State of Sao Paulo requires fifteen millions sterling. In his City article he finds that Brazilian issues are lower, and that the decline is accounted for by vague references to the coffee valorisation scheme, or to the extravagance and corruption of the Brazilian Government. Certainly he ought to have the situation cleared up for him; and perhaps others, who have no special interest at all, may be glad to know something about the crisis—for that is hardly too strong a term—in Brazilian politics and finance.

This vast republic, consisting of twenty loosely federated States, has an area considerably larger than that of the United States; it measures 2,600 miles from north to south, and 2,500 miles from west to east. The present constitution has lasted nearly twenty years, for it was in 1889 that a revolution drove Dom Pedro from the throne. The difficulties of such a territory are enormous. In some of the tropical parts negroes predominate, and there is one large town where, reversing the rule of Johannesburg society, white men are not allowed to walk on the pavement. Out of a total population of fourteen or fifteen millions, some six or seven per cent. are wild Indians. Among those citizens who are white or whitish the Portuguese are, of course, the most numerous, and Portuguese is the official language. But the commercial and agricultural development of the country is mainly in German and British hands. The important southern province of Rio Grande is largely colonised by Germans, who have been settled there for generations. They are said to be almost independent of the central government, to which they refuse to pay direct taxes. Probably the existence of this large colony, together with the very important and growing trade between Brazil and Germany, accounts for the rumors so frequent in the City that the Kaiser is waiting for a favorable opportunity of intervening. This, according to some authorities, is the real explanation of Germany's naval programme, and well-informed people with connections in Rio assert that the naval preparations of Brazil (the three battleships and four cruisers now being built for the Brazilian Government in England) are intended not for an attack on Argentina but for a defence against Germany.

So much for the political side; but the crisis now impending is primarily commercial and financial. Fifty years ago, when Brazil was still a great slave State, sugar was by far its most important product. Sugar is still largely grown in Pernambuco, but it has been far outstripped by other products—coffee, rubber, tobacco, Paraguay tea, cotton, cocoa, and hides. The total exports from Brazil in 1905 were valued at over £44,000,000 or 396,000,000 gold milreis, and of this total 190,000,000 milreis, nearly half, were accounted for by an export of about eleven million bags of coffee. Rubber exports were valued at 128,000,000 milreis, so that these two articles together contribute more than three-fourths of the total exports from Brazil. A depression in both these industries is, therefore, almost fatal to Brazil's prosperity. Its most important province, Sao Paulo, is entirely devoted to coffee plantations; and coffee is also the leading industry in Rio de Janeiro and Minas. Para in the north is, of course, the rubber State. Rio Grande in the cool south is almost the only important part of Brazil which is unaffected by coffee and rubber, and there, as we have explained, the people are almost independent of the capital. The rubber crisis of last year is ascribed partly to excessive production, partly to the sudden slump in the motor trade which followed on the American crisis. This will, no doubt, right itself in natural course; and the same, no doubt, would have held good for coffee if Nature had not been interfered with. The play of demand and supply determines prices and production. If production is too large in one year prices will fall and some of the surplus energy will then be diverted to more profitable pursuits, so that ultimately production will diminish and prices recover. But the coffee-growers of Sao Paulo were unwilling to put their trust in Nature. They could not understand why the price of coffee should be from 50 per cent. to 100 per cent. lower than it was thirty or forty years ago; and after a long agitation for Government assistance they succeeded in persuading the State of Sao Paulo to embark upon the famous or infamous valorisation scheme. In September, 1906, an International Syndicate of Merchants and Bankers in New York, London, Havre, and Hamburg lent £3,000,000 to the State of Sao Paulo and received 2,000,000 bags of coffee as security, with interest at 6 per cent. and 2 per cent. commission.

It was easier to begin than to stop and it is calculated that the Government of Sao Paulo has already spent out of taxes and loans at least £15,000,000 in the purchase of coffee, which has been stored and warehoused in New York and at various places on the Continent. At least eight or nine million bags of coffee are now stored and held in this way, and the charge for interest and warehousing is already extremely burdensome for the unfortunate taxpayers of Sao Paulo. The Bank of France refused some months ago to lend any more money on coffee warrants, and this action has thrown the whole scheme out of gear. The banks and financial houses want their money back, and a desperate attempt is to be made to unload this huge debt upon the investing public. The existence of an enormous stock of coffee, which cannot be sold at anything like current prices, is a terror to the whole coffee trade, over which it hangs like the sword of Damocles. Unfortunately for the holders of the coffee the new crop is a very large one, and will be more than sufficient to supply the world's demands. What precisely will happen it is impossible to say. If coffee valorisation ceases there may be a revolution in Sao Paulo; if it continues much longer there is a practical certainty that the State will become bankrupt.

Life and Letters.

THE MIND OF THE SUBURB.

Why does the picture of suburban life, presented by however kindly a critic, leave the reader at the end with a sense of dissatisfaction? That is the query, excited not only by works written in revolt, such as those of Mr. Wells or George Gissing, but also by the writing of Mr. Keble Howard in his "Smiths of Surbiton," or Mr. Shan Bullock in his latest novel, "A Laughing Matter" (Werner Laurie). Both of these are drawing a sympathetic picture, revealing a community of kind-hearted, aspiring persons, of comparatively simple tastes, with much enjoyment of life and its varying incidents. The infinite boredom of the horrible women of "The Year of Jubilee"—with its vision of Camberwell villadom as idle and desolate as Flaubert's vision of French provincial bourgeois life in "Madame Bovary"—has given place to a scene of busy activity—with interest in cricket results, "book talk," love-making, croquet and tennis parties for young men and women. And yet at the end, and with the best will in the world, one closes the narrative with a feeling of desolation; a revolt against a life which, with all its energies and satisfactions, has somehow lost from it a zest and sparkle and inner glow of inspiration which alone would seem to give human life significance. Civilise the poor, one complains, expand their tiny rubbish yards into green gardens, introduce bow windows before and verandahs behind; remove them from the actual experience of privation, convert all England into a garden suburban city—something, nevertheless, is wanting.

It is not the simplicity of suburban life which is at fault. Simplicity in writing, or in character, is as difficult of attainment as it is worth the attaining; and in so far as simplicity here exists—character cut on elemental lines, or occupied with elemental things—it provides an antidote to those complexities and cynicisms of other classes, which never can lay the foundations of a durable society. No one, except the vulgar, despises a Middle Class existence because it has substituted a high tea for an elaborate dinner, because it uses speech to reveal rather than to conceal thought, or because it refuses to torture itself with analyses and emotions which are the products of minds divorced from the ancient sanities of existence. The suburbans, like Walt Whitman's animals, "Do not fret and whine about their condition"—or their own souls; they would be none the more admirable if they did. Nor, again, is that narrow separation from poverty and the abyss a cause of any legitimate contempt, which makes for so many of them in their tiny two-storied villas the business of life an enterprise so hazardous and insecure. Rather is the observer conscious, where this struggle exists, that there has entered into the atmosphere the breath of salt wind, bracing if austere, which can provide a more heroic sustenance than the atmosphere where such tests and challenges are denied. One may compare, for example, Mr. Bullock's latest story of suburban life in some affluence with his previous volume, in which he traces the attempt of a "twopenny clerk" to provide for the needs of a family on an exiguous and precarious income. There was humor in the struggles of Robert Thorne, as of all similar millions of Robert Thornes, in his attempt to maintain his hardly-won standard of decencies and modest comfort—in the little boxes for the division of income, labelled "Necessities," "Outings," "Savings"—the first so rarely permitting any overflow into the second and third; in his revolt against the shabby clothes and difficulties created by unexpected illness, and the necessities of a clerk, who was also a man, wheeling the perambulator on Peckham Rye, or scrubbing the front door steps furtively after nightfall. But the humor was of the ancient, not the modern, significance; a humor not without tears in it, with admiration also at the courage and determination which could yet be content, and under such circumstances, with "the glory of going on and still to be." For here was the sense of battles, and battle, whether against deliberate foes, against the inimical forces of Nature, or the indifference of the crowd to the individual survival, is always stimulating and bracing.

But in "A Laughing Matter" this element is removed. The principal characters are in positions of comfort, if not of affluence: the houses are secure stuccoed or pseudo-Georgian edifices; and the breadwinners occupy positions of established security in the commercial or financial houses of the City. And it is when this position is attained—the goal of longing for all the thousands who see an earthly Paradise in such a desirable haven—that the atmosphere becomes suddenly stifling and difficult. It may be that such a condition is in itself unsuitable for mankind in the life of so uncertain and transitory a world: that existence which is occupied with sedentary labor in an artificially constructed aggregation of human beings herded in the same narrow grooves, is an existence of necessity carrying with it the seeds of futility and decay. Certainly the two chief accusations against the product of such an existence would be of an imperfect standard of value about the things which exist, and of a lack of demand for the existence of things at present unrealised. It is a wrong estimate of the significance—of rank, of birth, of wealth, of various material accumulations—which produce the more desolating ingredients of suburban life. Listen to the conversation in the second-class carriages of a suburban railway train or examine the literature and journalism specially constructed for the suburban mind: you will find endless chatter about the King, the Court, and the doings of a designated "Society"; personal paragraphs, descriptions of clothes, smile, or manner, a vision of life in which the heroic and trivial things are alike exhibited, but in which there is no adequate test or judgment which are the trivial, which the heroic. Liberated from the devils of poverty, the soul is still empty, swept and garnished; waiting for other occupants. This is the explanation of the so-called "snobbery" of the suburbs; there is curiosity, but curiosity about lesser occupations; energies—for the suburbs in their healthy human life, the swarms of happy, physically efficient children, are a storehouse of the nation's energy—but energies which fritter and scatter and degrade themselves in random activities—"random and meaningless sociabilities" which neither hearten, stimulate, nor inspire. So into a feud with a neighbour over a disputed garden fence, or a bustling and breezy church or chapel's mundane entertainment, or a criticism of manners and fashion, dress and deportment, will be thrown force and determination which might have been directed to effort of permanent worth in advance along the great ways of the world.

Beyond these incorrect standards of value there is the absence of vision. Suburban life has little conception of social services, no tradition of disinterested public duty, but a limited outlook beyond a narrowed and personal ambition. Religion—were that everywhere vital and compelling—would provide in part this vista of larger horizons; and when and where religion existed—even in its rigid conception of heaven and hell and a strait way of salvation—it offered some universes for contemplation beyond the orderly suburban road and the well-trimmed suburban garden. It is to be feared, however, that in the prevailing cloudiness about ultimate things which is developing in the modern world, religion has been tending more and more to resolve itself into social institutions, pleasant Sunday afternoons, or mild exercise of the less adventurous forces of suburban philanthropy. What remains? A public spirit in local affairs which is deplorably low, which sets a minute percentage of voters in Council or Guardian Elections, and accompanies a perpetual contempt for present municipal mismanagement with the resolute refusal of the personal effort required to make that management clean and efficient. An outlook upon Imperial affairs which is less a conception of politics than the acceptance of a social tradition: which leaves suburban seats securely Conservative not because the Conservative creed is there definitely embraced, but because Conservatism is supposed to be the party favored by Court, society, and the wealthy and fashionable classes. And too often this essential ignorance is supplemented by an arrogance which refuses advice and despises opposition. The result is a not too reputable product of modern civilisation: that dense and complacent "Imperial citizen" who despises the foreigner, and could set right or improve upon generals in the field or admirals on the ocean, and is satisfied with its universe and its limitations because it has resolutely closed all doors and windows through which there might appear the challenge of larger, other worlds. This is the suburban figure—with custom dominant, accepted and inherited students of judgment, contempt for the classes below it, envy of the classes above, and no desire for the adventure of romance amongst visible things or in the kingdoms of the soul. Against this type of honest man have warred the anarchists, the artists, the advocates of new moralities, the opponents of the accepted way. In revolt against the dominion of so questionable a type, we are perhaps inclined to forget the mitigating features: the good nature and ready generosity, the cleanliness of life, the still unbroken family tradition; all animated by that resolution, not so much deliberate as unconscious, to "make the best of it."

CAREFUL JOY.

Nothing can be done more than once, or, as Aristotle said more briefly, "Twice is impossible." No artist can repeat his triumph, no don can give the same lecture a second time, though he sometimes tries, and a novelist who "works his vein" through twenty volumes has written only one book in the end. That bar of impossibility is the spirit's preservative against imitations. When the thing has been made, the thriftless, but artistic, spirit of man breaks the mould and puts no replica on the market. Neither author nor disciple can reproduce the quality of excellence. "I only wrote my love poems once," said Goethe, and of all the laborious imitations of "Faust," who wants to hear another word, whether in the study or at His Majesty's?

The admirer's imitation is an unwelcome tribute; it is a gift horse that may be looked in the mouth, a wedding present that must be hid. To the admiring disciple it is so natural to speak like the master; it would be so easy, if it were not impossible; and we ourselves should admire it as evidence of affectionate humility, if only it were silent. That is what we feel, for instance, in the disciples and imitators of Walt Whitman. Some weeks ago we spoke of Edward Carpenter, the complete Anarchist, one of the guide-posts of modern thought, and master of a prose as lucid and helpful as a guide-post's so long as he is not trying to write like Walt Whitman's poetry. And now here is Mr. Henry Bryan Binns with his little book, finely entitled, "The Great Companions" (Fifield, 2s.). Whether he would call himself a disciple of Edward Carpenter, or a comrade, we do not know. But he imitates their common master with an enthusiasm that would be admirable if it did not imitate. He says:—

> "I heard the wind blow out of the West, singing the song of Democracy, crying to men over-sea the challenge of Man."

Among the Great Companions he includes Pioneers. We knew he would.

Of all writers, Whitman is the most dangerous to imitate, and, more than others, he burlesqued his own greatness. By his attempt to shake off the fetters of rule he once or twice reached a kind of excellence that can never be reached again, because it is too easy. It was the same with Ossian, who, in his day, also had imitators. Johnson's familiar criticism of Ossian applies: "Sir," he said to Sir Joshua Reynolds, "a man might write such stuff for ever, if he would abandon his mind to it." So a man might write Whitman for ever, but it does not follow that what he wrote would be read for ever.

It is queer to think how gladly we might have welcomed Mr. Binns if Whitman had not written. To be sure, in that case Mr. Binns would not have written either, or would have written in quite a different formlessness, but he has the stuff of a writer. If the authoress of the Odyssey was a feminine Homer, Mr. Binns is a kind of feminine Whitman. He is not so large and boisterous, not so rough and exuberant, but more delicate, more perceptive. Sometimes his sayings are fine and courageous. "Beware," he says, "how you ensure yourself and those you love against life and its perils." And again:—

> "They said, 'Beware lest you commit some crime or other.'
> "But I heard the sunshine saying: 'O ye of little faith! Beware how you refuse the chances of life in your fond worship of the devil ye call prudence!'"

We do not know why it is that people when they want to speak like Solomon or Isaiah always say "ye" instead of "you," or mix the two words up, but the advice is good. It is like the finest of Nietzsche's sayings, "Live dangerously." For the most part, however, the distinction of Mr. Binns is a certain delicacy of perception, and, to our mind, his highest attainment is the description of an English cricket match in time of revolution:—

> "Yesterday, indeed, good humour and politeness and the playing of the game seemed excellent things: but to-day, the great words are being spoken, to be a man, a woman, is what they demand. . . .
> "Let them play on! but the day is come, and with it work to be done that our hands ache for: to-day at last, we shall spend our blood!
> "For the red flag is flying, the pass-words are chosen, the revolution has commenced: but, since it is no game of battles, the gentlemen-warriors do not notice it: no, no! this is no game of battles!"

There is a definiteness, a sharp outline, about that such as we enjoy.

But all this panegyric on life and time, all the boisterous optimism with which Whitman sought to flood the world, may seem a little forced and weary, when his disciples keep working at the pumps. Certainly, deliberate joy is a trifle better than the deliberate despair of a century ago; but pleasure prepense is a depressing concern, and if you tell a child how happy it is, it will cry. That is, perhaps, what makes a Kindergarten so dreary in the midst of its theoretic smiles; for happiness cannot be consciously produced, but is a fugitive and cloistered thing, coming, as it were, by accident, or, like a Spartan lover, by stealth. A conscious and purposed delight in nature and existence runs us into affectations that somehow recall the studied simplicity which tricks out a new house with eccentric gables and ingle-nooks and beams that carefully display the mark of the adze. It recalls the non-intoxicating inn that is inscribed "Ye Skittel Hostelrie." It recalls the Balliol young men who carry scythes so elegantly and sometimes pretend to mow or plough in the foregrounds of Fred Walker's pictures. When Mr. Binns tells us, "It is under the sky one rests, lying among the leaves at evening upon the breast of the Earth, drinking in at every pore the peace of Her vast life," it is at the best only a tourist in nature that we see. Certainly, we are reminded of Emerson's sentence, "The incommunicable trees begin to persuade us to live with them and quit our life of solemn trifles." But we turn Emerson's page and find, "A dilettantism in nature is barren and unworthy. The fop of fields is no better than his brother of Broadway." After an outburst on the joy of nature it is refreshing to think of a child with spade and bucket when first it sniffs the stinking seaweed from the carriage window, and does not need to ask what happiness is.

"Vous vous écoutez trop, Monsieur," said Napoleon to an apprehensive general, and the warning is as much needed against deliberate happiness as against apprehension, anxiety, or the scruples of conscience. Wordsworth was aware of that danger when he wrote on the contrast between himself and the leech-gatherer, who gained an honest maintenance, roaming from pond to pond, from moor to moor; in a spirit how different from the poet's introspective sorrows and delights! Thoreau, who exposed himself recklessly to the peril, was saved as by laughter. "There is no odour so bad," he said, "as that which arises from goodness tainted"; or, again, "I am no more lonely than the first spider in a new house"; or, again, "As if one were to begin the day with long-suffering, and hire a man to hoe one's potatoes." Laughter is a good salvation. Mr. Binns knows that; the trouble is that he knows it just too well. "Come then," he says:—

> "Come, then, divine destroyer of care, brother of tears and song!
> "Come shake our hearts together in thine irresistible chorus!
> "Come, Holy Laughter!"

But no laughter will come if you call it holy, any more than it comes when the lecturer says, "Now I am going to tell you something really funny," and the audience sits as at a funeral. All this deliberate insistance on the joy and goodness of nature or man drives us into violent contradiction. It is worst of all, perhaps, when the optimist on principle comes to speak of death. Somehow or other, death must be fitted into the scheme all right; "When you are at last alive," says Mr. Binns, "you will accept all with confidence, and Death, too, will be acceptable to you, and Love, which is as Death is." And in another ode he hears his brother, the wind, shouting and singing "Death!" to the woods and him.

> "Out of the unfathomed spaces the unknowable impulsion of your birth, 'Death! death!' exulting, warning, to me, flying into the night you cry this word. . . Blithe answer make the birds among the branches: 'Welcome to Death!' they chirp and sing and quail not."

That thought may be consoling to the sportsman, and, certainly, much humbug has been written about the pain and woe of death. But a falser kind of humbug is written about death's pleasure, and we would rather be the black savage of the forest biting the earth and howling with sorrow for her dead child than chirp "Welcome to death" with the optimist in a plantation. "I know I had not begotten an immortal," said the Greek when he heard of his son's death; and the saying is fine, but, though not so optimistic as Mr. Binns, it leaves us chilly as a frost. Mankind is slowly learning to sympathise with sorrow, but still has difficulty in sympathising with a stranger's joy, and with indifference to sorrow or with a deliberate and contrived delight it has no sympathy at all. For what is joyful or beautiful or excellent is unconscious of its best.

CAN TROUT BE EDUCATED?

An entertaining problem of natural science arises in a notice, which we publish to-day, of a book on the trout waters of England. The reviewer indicates a belief that there are no such fish as "educated" trout. In doing so he challenges an understanding which is of immemorial vogue. Izaak Walton made no question that trout developed wariness in the process of being frequently angled for, and it would seem that practically all fishermen since his time have been of the same opinion. The assumption is manifest in the literature of the sport. Not all of the many books are before us as we write; but we are certain that nearly every one of them unreservedly accepts the understanding. Perhaps the writers instinctively felt that this was necessary if their chronicles were to be piquant. Is not a belief that the trout is critical essential in the pride which follows the capture of him? That appears to be the case. No sea fisherman exults in the taking of a large haddock; every freshwater fisherman does exult in the taking of a large trout. The two events are looked upon as essentially dissimilar. There is never any specific record of the seaman's catch; at the most it dumbly contributes to market-report statistics which gracelessly deal in tons. The landsman's catch is quite another affair. Besides being chronicled in many journals, it is almost certain to be the theme of a literary essay in one of them. This is because, while the capture of a haddock is a matter of course, the capture of a trout is an achievement in art. It is thought that, while the cod is so untutored that a child or a machine could take him, the trout is so well versed in the wiles of man that his downfall is the triumph of one intellect over another.

That this is so becomes evident on perusal of the angling pages in any number of "The Field." Week by week in that excellent journal you will find at least one grave gentleman, obviously well up in placid years, personifying a single trout, or two, or three, throughout the length of an elaborate column. He speaks of the fish courteously, circumspectly, with reserve, just as Sir Edward Grey, when it is absolutely necessary to speak at all, bears himself towards the Chancellor of the Emperor William or that dread being the Sultan. It is the narrative of a match of wits. That is it. Man has wits, and the trout had wits; and the man outwitted the trout. That is the subject-matter of the prose poems in "The Field" and elsewhere. Of recent years the writings have been becoming more and more exalted in consequence of a belief that the difficulty of catching trout has become greater and greater.

Now, the Education Question, wherever arising, is always ticklish. It stirs angry passions. When it is mentioned in relation to the children of England the Archbishop of This and the Minister of That fly at each other's wig Education in regard to the trout of England cannot with much assurance be deemed a topic more pacific. After all, it will be said, we do know a little about the human mind; but what can we know about the mind of a fish? Well, that is just what we wish to explain. Even if it were not necessary to back up our reviewer, we should, at this time of the year, be anxious to discourse on the question, over which a great deal of nonsense has been talked and written. What is to be said in refutation of the evidence adduced by our reviewer? If trout are educable, the most highly educated of all the tribes of them should be those of Lochleven, which have been angled for, often by as many as forty-four rods at a time, every day of every season, for over half a century; yet this year it is easier than it ever was to fill a capacious basket. This makes the fundamental assumption of most angling literature look foolish. After great and honest effort, we find ourselves unable to imagine a refutation of our reviewer's argument. If any reader offers one, we will gladly publish it.

Meanwhile the argument strikes us as the pricking of a bubble. If the trout of any water are educated, they must have become so through one of two processes. Either each of them must have gained knowledge of how to recognise a lure by being hooked and escaping, or those which have not had that experience have inherited the knowledge from their parents. Now, it is estimated that the chalk streams of Hampshire, in which county education of the fish is believed to have reached its highest pitch, contain, on the average, 25,000 trout to the mile; and not more than four anglers to the mile cast flies on them daily throughout the season. Thus, in order to educate the Hampshire trout by pricking them, each of the anglers would have to raise and lose forty fish a day, or 6,520 every season. We have only to read "The Field," in which every trout that rises to the most authoritative anglers is mentioned, to realise that of this educational work only a very small fraction is done. The alternative is even more obviously questionable. Artificial flies are not things in the natural environment of trout; knowledge of them by individual trout, therefore, is, with the extra wariness that may ensue, an acquired character; and acquired characters, it is now known, are not transmissible from one generation to another. There is, therefore, no warrant whatever for believing that any stream or lake has a race of educated trout.

How, then, are we to account for the general impression that trout are much more difficult to catch than they used to be? Partly we account for it by being unable to share it fully. It has been seen that sport on Lochleven has improved remarkably. On nearly all the waters of Scotland, and on many of those in England, the same tendency has been manifest within the last two or three years. Then, most of the literature of the subject, journalistic or bound in cloth, has its origin in Hampshire, and that county, though one of the best trout regions in the land, is a prolific source of misapprehension. Being within easy reach of London, it is the haunt of many anglers who write a great deal without fishing much, if at all, elsewhere. These good gentlemen honestly believe, for example, and often say, that the capture of a brace of Hampshire trout is a greater deed than the capture of a score on some wild northern river. They think that the Hampshire trout are particularly quick to detect the imposture of an artificial fly. It might be said that the very opposite of this is the truth. Being much more plentiful on the chalk streams than they are in less luxuriant places, aquatic flies are a larger item in the trouts' fare in Hampshire than they are elsewhere; the Hampshire trout rise at them, and at imitations of them, more freely than trout elsewhere do. The idea that trout fishing in the famous county is a specially high art is a delusion.

This brings us to the other part of our explanation; which is that within recent years the races of trout have been in some important places much intermixed. The general revival of interest in angling has led to the planting of alien trout here and there. The motive was good, and the results are not bad; but the results have not been everywhere what were expected. Full-grown trout of certain races do not feed on flies at all. Of these the brown trout of most Highland lakes are an example. Soon after weighing 1 lb. or so they give up flies and take to bottom-feeding. Such fish do not always change their habits when transferred to lowland waters; and, of course, if flies only are allowed on these waters, as is usually the case, the trout are often a disappointment. A more striking fact is that Lochleven trout, which of all immigrants are the most sought-for everywhere, are not invariably successful in exile. In their native lake, which all over is so shallow that aquatic insects abound in and on every part of it, they take flies very well; but elsewhere, perhaps because the insects are different, they cease to be what the fishculture men call "free risers," and even lose their sheen. Similarly, rainbow trout, which rise extraordinarily well until they are about three years old, do not rise at all afterwards. The syndicate in charge of Lochleven, which is the conspicuous triumph in the management of trout-waters, have been shrewd enough to have no aliens there. They "stock" year by year; but they do so with fish reared from native spawn. Wherever sport has really fallen off it will, as a rule, be found that the water has as many alien as it has indigenous trout. That, and not "education," explains the lighter baskets.

Present-Day Problems.

THE HARMSWORTH BRAND.—VI.

The special characteristic of evil being its infectious quality, it is natural to discover that the Harmsworth influence has reacted on the popular Press of to-day. Against the will and purpose of their directors, the rivals of Harmsworth are driven to cheapness of thought, lightness of tone, a jarring brevity and "snappiness" of treatment and expression, and to a thousand quick changes from one subject to another. The Harmsworth success, while it is partly due to a certain cleverness in whipping up the surface of things and presenting them as a pleasant daily confection, keeps the standard down. So you have more and more personal gossip, more photographic illustrations, more sensational stories, less continuous reflection in politics, less able and authoritative foreign correspondence. But there are some things, or rather some things in combination, which the Harmsworth Press possesses as a patent of its own. This is its avoidance of all the points which distinguish a paper with steady opinions and tendencies of its own from a journal that is a mere recorder of the empty clatter of man's life. What are the "views" of the Harmsworth journal? It has no views and all views. It can be Liberal and Conservative. The "Mail" can denounce the "stomach tax" in one issue, and applaud Protection in another; can oppose Chinese labor and support Chinese labor; can threaten to "roll France in blood and mud," and throw up its cap for the entente cordiale; can talk of English respect for the German character and desire for German friendship, and devote issue after issue to anti-German fiction and suggestion.

The explanation of this unceasing instability is the purely commercial aim of the Harmsworth directorate. They want all men and women, not some men, such as Liberals, or Democrats, or even Tories. And they are wanted as customers—to be kept to the shop, petted, talked to, and lured to come again. The Harmsworth firm take human nature as it is, or as they think it is. In foreign policy, the line is flag-waving, the common appeal to an islander's dislike and ignorance of other people, and distrust of their characters and virtues. For women—the special discovery of the Harmsworth Press, a prolific source of advertisement, and, therefore, a specially valuable class of customers—it is flattery, a clever study of their lighter interests, such as dress, snobbery, gossip, shopping, love, marriage, engagements, the thousand trifles of their home life. For the average man it is the holding up of success as the end of life, so that the Harmsworth papers are filled with articles on "How to Succeed," or "Secrets of Success." For mental food he is given a stream of little, easily remembered facts, which filter through to his fellows, and make matter for gossip in the home, in the train, in the public-house. For the parent, again, it is the pretence of publishing "pure, healthy fiction," with denunciations of smoking and swearing, and ancillary "leagues" and "clubs" for non-smokers and non-swearers, who, while keeping strict guard on their lips, may unhappily be led down the pleasant by-path of gambling and the broad road of interest in crime. It is in this mixed appeal, and undeviating pursuit of profit, that the inevitable moral contradictions of these interesting purveyors come in, so that the Harmsworth paper, making its thousands a year out of the turf, jostles on the bookstalls a sister journal which unctuously contrasts the "horse race" with the "Christian race," while Lord Northcliffe, who makes a handsome living out of guessing games, denounces the professional fortune-teller, and the directors of the "Weekly Dispatch" censure the propriety of a Drury Lane pantomime.

Apply the Harmsworth method to politics and you get the results that might be anticipated. Mr. Morgan Browne, in his onslaught on the "Daily Mail," quotes a supposed saying of the late Lord Salisbury that the paper was written by office boys for office boys. Its neglect of the best kind of directing mind is certainly remarkable in view of its material success, while among its regular workers the only man approaching a genius for journalistic writing that we remember was the late Mr. Steevens. Nevertheless, all its geese are swans, and the other day an average machine-made story in the "Mail" was grotesquely described as a tale which will "take its place among the great works of imaginative fiction for all time." An American critic remarked that Lord Northcliffe had not "the editorial mind." So far, indeed, as any reasoned expression of it is concerned, the Harmsworth paper ignores it. Following the American model, it has reduced the leading article to a few sentences of semi-detached commonplaces. But its ignorance is as remarkable as its slightness and lightness. Take its volte face on Chinese labor. In March, 1904, it was announced, in familiar language, that the King would "not disallow" the Importation Ordinance, but that it would not at present be brought into operation. The "Daily Mail" construed this as a refusal to ratify it, and announcing, with awe, that "his Majesty is to be warmly congratulated upon thus interpreting the nation's call," came out in opposition to an experiment that might have "the most deleterious effects on South Africa." But presently it found out its mistake. Then it discovered that the policy which had inspired "general satisfaction in England" spelt "bankruptcy" for South Africa, that the cry of "slavery" was a "worn-out slander," and the "Radical organisers" had "poisoned the minds of the constituencies" in leading them to suppose, in common, it appeared, with the "Daily Mail," that Chinese labor would be abolished. Indeed, so certain was the "Daily Mail" of its retention, that it assured its readers, of its own information, that if "C.-B." came into office "next day" he would continue it. Within the space of a few months the "Daily Mail" informed its friends (1) that Chinese labor would go; (2) that it was "poisonous" to suggest that it would go; (3) that a Liberal Government had determined that it should not go; (4) on the announcement that it was to go that Sir Henry had broken a pledge to retain it.

But in order to measure the character of the "Daily Mail's" treatment of public affairs, it is necessary to revert to a more serious matter, namely, the publication of false news. The Lever case was a proof of the levity of its conduct. In that instance a number of charges advanced day after day, with every circumstance of aggravation, collapsed without the smallest attempt to prove them. Apology and damages by the score of thousands of pounds were then wrung from the promoters as soon as their paper was stripped bare of defence or palliation. No apology, no reparation, was ever offered either to the private sufferers from the story of the bogus massacre at Pekin, or to the Chinese Government, which was consistently maligned throughout that episode. Yet it is hard to see the excuse for it. Shanghai, from which it proceeded, is one of the most doubtful "news centres" in the world. The tale professedly came from Chinese sources, which were never precisely revealed. The messages of Mr. Conger, which were ignored, threw the utmost doubt on the narrative, loose and unverifiable as its incidents were. Yet it was written up day after day. The fusillade of telegrams and sensational articles began in the first week of July, 1900, and on the 16th the paper, glorifying itself as the transmitter of special and specially costly news, published a full account extending over three columns. It never attempted to explain the origin of its obviously unreal and colored sensationalism. But the comment of the "Mail" is worth reproducing even to-day. Its "leader" of July 16th was entitled "Murder Most Foul." It opened as follows:—

> "The most awful crime of the century has been consummated. With the publication of the official despatches which is reported by our correspondent at Shanghai, China stands confessed before the world a murderer among nations. Her hands are dripping with the blood of the diplomatic agents whom it was the Empire's sacred duty to protect, and her dragon's teeth are ensanguined with the lives of the innocent women and children who sought and expected safety under the flags of the friendly nations whose legations ought to have been, but were not, a sanctuary to be protected with all the strength of the ancient Government to whom the Ministers of Europe were accredited. . . ."
>
> "This," continued the "Mail," "happened on the night of the 6th, and so far as the details are concerned, little can be expected to be added to the material available for the historian beyond the graphic narrative supplied by our special correspondent at Shanghai, which confirms and supplements the despatch which we received from the same correspondent on Friday last."

The "historian" did indeed need nothing more; but the moralist might add a reflection of his own on the manner in which this falsity was bolstered up for more than three weeks, varied with incitements against the "crafty and ferocious Mongolian" (on another page the theme was "the violation of oaths" by the Boers); with declarations that the "cry for vengeance" on a "fiendish race" "rose unbidden" to the editor's lips; with statements that "Chinese mendacity" (i.e., the denial of the false story of the massacre) and "duplicity" were "bye-words," and that the Viceroys would "dole out lies" even though they knew the "curtain must be speedily lifted"; with the hardy announcement, made on July 30th, a day before the full discovery of the truth, that there was "no scrap of evidence" that the Ministers at Pekin were alive; and finally with the bare recital, in a subordinate headline, that the women and children were safe, and the reproachful comment that the tardy British Minister, long consigned to a bloody grave, had spoken "at last." From the editorial pen, from the chaste author of "Murder Most Foul," not a word of retraction, apology, regret. But something more. On August 3rd, four days after the disclosing message, a further utterance proclaimed that there were "no limits to the impudence of the Chinese," and breathed a complaint that, not content with cutting off the Legations for six weeks, and doling out alternately good and bad news about their safety, the Chinese Government had added to the crime and the attack the "scarcely less grave offence of trifling with the feelings of the civilised world."

Such was the "Daily Mail"; such, as the Lever case showed, it is to-day. We may agree that all daily papers make mistakes, for speed is their mother, half-truth their father. But this kind of error, the slipshod incapacity to measure statements, the brazen attempt to fasten the paper's own faults on the party it had injured, the conscienceless and brainless attitude, constitute a danger to the public safety in a serious confrontation like that of Great Britain and Germany to-day, and of Great Britain and the Boer Republics in 1899. Let it be remembered that it was the "Mail" which informed its readers, within a few weeks of Magersfontein and Colenso, that the modern Boer would never stand up against the British soldier. To-day the peril is more serious. The "Daily Mail" has amply discredited itself; but it is read, and it enjoys the enormous power of self-advertisement which the Harmsworth combination uses unstintedly. Moreover, its mechanical cleverness and adaptability, its eye for the conventional and plausible, still catch the undisciplined intelligence, the timid, gregarious, imitative nature of the townsman, untaught to detect the cry of the hawker of cheap wares in the ring of its catchwords of country and Empire. But we must reserve a final dealing with these aspects of the paper's character for another article.

(To be concluded.)

Holidays.

IN THE GRAMPIANS.

Mile after mile, in sweeping curves, the little line climbs the long defile between monotonous mountain slopes, a rivulet and a road on either side. Three or four times a day a train of dark green cars (the very color fetches you to the August bracken) forges its way gallantly upward; three or four times a day a similar train runs lightly down. The northward train has but recently delivered at various wayside stations its heavy consignments of guns and sportsmen; and now, in exchange for these commodities, the southward train daily convoys huge cases of seasonably slaughtered grouse, which, to judge from the excited demand in the markets, the world south of the Grampians could far less easily spare. Stout palisades, significantly broken here and there, protect the line on either side, as if to remind us of other festive seasons, less profitable to railways, if less sinister to grouse, when the snowdrifts sweep down from the mountain wildernesses above into this gorge as into a natural gutter, and the sportsmen—though not the grouse—have long since returned to their proper habitat. Such is the main gate to the northern Highlands, the lowest and easiest pass across the mountain barrier of Mid-Scotland, the Brenner—or Dunmail Raise—of the Grampians.

Like these other two gateways, the Grampian Pass owes its impressiveness in but a small degree to palpable qualities of scenery. "The hills," says Mr. Baddeley in his well-known Guide, severely, "are remarkable neither for form, coloring, nor elevation." The sensational stimulus of rugged or beetling profiles, of the visible sublimity of towering peak and headlong crag, is rarely communicated. But no one who has walked through this lonely defile—for fifteen miles there is scarcely a house—will easily escape the obsession of a subtler kind of sublimity; the invisible mountain mass and power behind these monotonous slopes insensibly asserts itself, and he feels the presence of the unseen Hercules whose firmly planted, outstretched feet they are. He may even, as the solitude deepens, and the spectral twilight comes down upon the interminable defile, have glimpses of the more eerie mountain presences that made sport of Childe Roland as he rode to the Dark Tower, when

> "The hills, like giants at a hunting, lay > Chin upon hand, to see the game at bay."

Altogether, the Grampians do their business with us, to speak profanely, more through the agency of the imagination than of the eye. Even when you emerge, at Kingussie, from the long upland ravine, and the Spey from a brawling beck has become a babbling river, the giants still crouch in the background and keep their own counsel—a purple wall, without any very salient peaks or clearly articulated profiles, and entrenched from the curious invader behind ten miles of forest. Charts in the hotels at Aviemore and elsewhere give you the means of disintegrating that purple continuity into little fragments of outline standing for the famous heights whose names we learned at school. This shelving boss is Cairngorm, that shallow dome Ben Mac Dhui, and so on; but the process is dissection, an artificial separation of things normally united, and when the chart is put away, the eye restores the old intimate accord. East and West Scotland stand sharply apart in many things; but in none more strikingly than in the character and demeanour of the great characteristic mountains of the two regions.

How piquant the contrast between this shy, secluded, inhospitable republic of the Grampian giants and that civil and affable sovereign, Ben Nevis! With a fashionable watering-place at his feet, and an observatory on his summit, and an easy winding path all the way between, Ben Nevis, if king of British mountains, is a very constitutional king; he may reign, but it is man and man's convenience that govern; and when you have paid the Government's tax of one shilling per person, or three shillings for a pony, you are free of his domain, and may track it to its loftiest sanctuary in three hours. No such levity of modernism prevails in the Grampians. Fifteen or sixteen miles, some of them arduous, separate any one of the group of neighbour-heights, all over four thousand feet, from the nearest convenient lodging—whether Braemar in the south-east or Aviemore in the north. And while the grandeur of Ben Nevis, towering as it does abruptly from the seashore, is best realised from some distance, the grandeur of the Mac Dhui group can hardly be grasped but by penetrating into their inner-most recesses. Naturally, these austere conditions have their compensating advantages. Wildernesses of granite boulders, to be traversed gratis, repel unauthorised intruders of every class far more surely than a shilling and an easy road; and the mountain lover will, not improbably, meet nothing more human in these wilds than a storm or a mist. And the approach on either side imposes a certain test of physical endurance. Many tales are told of wanderings late and lone in the forest which covers the gradual northern slopes. Rothiemurchus, it is called, "the plain of the great pinewood"—a name not without something of the witchery which gathers about the haunted forest, Broceliande, of Breton romance. That Rothiemurchus is wholly primeval, completely left to the sway of whatever woodland gods there be, cannot be said; but the invading axe and pick of civilisation have made but short and perfunctory reconnaissances into its depths, and you pass, as in the proverbial city-precincts of the Wild West, within a few miles, if not from boulevard to squirrel-path, yet from a broad carriage-road spanning a fine new iron bridge, through the stages of rough cart-way and footpath, to a narrow, scarcely perceptible track through heather and boulders.

In the loneliest spot of the truly primeval forest you expect to discover charcoal burners. I did not, but, in default, lighted upon a sawmill; and though sawmills and sawmillers are infinitely poorer in the inherited charm of forest romance, they are by no means so obviously wanting in the stuff of which forest romance is made; and since romance is eternal, they wait their day. In the Rembrandtesque glory of swarthy gloom and lurid firegleam, the charcoal burner's scenery is no doubt unmatched. But a Corot would delight more in this wealth of bright and tender tones; the golden yellow of the timber sheds, the russet and amber of the stacks of bark: the glint and flash of revolving steel; and, poured out ankle-deep over the woodland ways, like a snow or foam of fine meal, the carpet of softly luminous sawdust; noiseless to the tread, retarding to the pace. If you have not the crackle of the flames and the odour of burning boughs, you have the long-drawn cry of the saw as it steadily forges its way through the heart of a pine, and the fresh aroma of the pine newly hewn.

And then the humanity! The charcoal burner, if he plays his legendary part aright, has to be taciturn and morose, a very bit of the forest in which his lonely days are spent. My sawmiller did not mingle and blend with his woodland in this simple obvious way. He stood out from it, framed as it were in a setting of different complexion, like his sawdust foam upon its ground of bracken and turf. A grave, elderly man, whose native Gaelic gave place, in communication with the Saxon, to an English only too flawlessly literary and academically precise; such language as Wordsworth was thinking of when he ascribed to his Pedlar speech,

"Such as grave livers do in Scotland use."

We fell into talk—of mountains and mountain ways, of the Saxon and the Gael, of the passing of the old and the rivalry of the new; on which things he discoursed with a pleasant blend of the canny shrewdness of the Scot and the mellow benevolence of old age. The superiority of the Highland to the Lowland, and of the Lowland to the South of the Tweed, was so obvious to him that opposite opinion, if offered, could be received with indulgent courtesy, and left to the maturing influence of experience and years to correct. The North, moreover, was poor, and, needing the gold of its inferiors, acted more tastefully in not reminding them too often of their inferiority. I casually mentioned the proverbial boast of the Aberdonians, that England would not be safe without two or three Aberdeen men at the helm. "They do say it," he replied, very seriously, "and it may be true; but they need not have given expression to it in worrds." And so, with a greeting in his grave, courteous fashion, he resumed his work, and I pursued my way into the recesses of the scarred wilderness called Cairngorm and Ben Mac Dhui.

C. H. Herford.

Letters from Abroad.

THE ZEPPELIN MOVEMENT AND GERMAN NATIONALISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—No foreigner, and certainly no Englishman, will have been astonished at the enthusiastic sympathy displayed by Germans of all classes and sections for Count Zeppelin after the destruction of his new and so successfully launched airship. There is something truly admirable about this undaunted and unwearied worker and his achievement, and although many others who have given proof of the same qualities have remained unnoticed and destitute, nobody will grudge the Suabian nobleman the countless signs of gratitude and veneration bestowed upon him by his countrymen, all the more because in acknowledging them he shows himself a man of singular tact. He shows no false modesty, and makes no appeal to Jingo instincts.

The same cannot be said of a good many of those who have taken the collections for the Zeppelin fund into their hands or have otherwise come forward as the patrons of the indomitable inventor. Almost from the outset a Jingo under-current could be noticed in the collections for Count Zeppelin, and not all the sums that have flowed in are perfectly voluntary gifts. This is the reverse side of all such movements in our days. No sooner are the masses carried away by some event than commercial and political faiseurs exert themselves to exploit it for some low purpose. One of the most repulsive occurrences of this kind has been the attempt of Herr Rathenau, the cunning director of the biggest electrical concern in Germany and the whole Eastern hemisphere, to form a committee for the supervision of the Zeppelin fund and its application. This somewhat too obvious endeavour to "boss" the enterprise of an inventor who, though a loyal German patriot, has yet something of the independent spirit of the South German in him, met with universal repudiation. But not in all cases has public opinion and its exponent, the Press, developed the same outspoken spirit.

People are by this time used to William II.'s impulsive telegrams, and read them with a good dose of salt. They also leave it to the satirical papers to point the moral when the Kaiser's eldest son wires to Count Zeppelin: "Shall visit you, if possible, one of these days. Your Excellency will endure this affliction with a lifted head." But when the Heir Apparent to the German Crown proclaims, in regard to the construction of airships, that "Germany must not lose her advantage," some call to order would surely not be out of place. We have quite enough of the race in armaments on land and sea; humanity needs no third race of that kind.

But shall we escape it, and how so? There are many agencies at work to push us on. The principle of the construction of steerable airships seems well-nigh to be solved, and the first thought is everywhere directed to their use in warfare. That in this respect innovations of any kind should remain the secret of a single nation is quite unthinkable. Invention is to-day a matter of experimental science, based on theoretical knowledge open to all civilised nations, and not of chance hits. Consequently, the question is, in the long run, mainly a question of finance. Nations that are bent on outdoing each other will spare no expense for the purpose as long as they can scrape the necessary money together. What is the use of Royal visits, and what are all the friendly assurances of Emperors worth as long as the nations are nursed in that spirit of rivalry in preparations of war?

How deeply people in Germany are impregnated with the idea that more, and not less, armaments are needed for the welfare of their country is shown by a publication before me, the author of which is a man of learning and an academical tutor. It is a treatise entitled "England and Germany: A Study in Economical Politics," written as a "festival paper" to the birthday of the Grand Duke of Baden by Professor Doctor von Schulze-Gaevernitz, Pro-rector of the University of Freiburg. Dr. Schulze-Gaevernitz is not unknown in England, nor is he imbued with inimical feeling towards her. In economics a disciple of Brentano, he spent some time in England studying the social conditions of its workers, and has recorded the results of his investigations in a book widely read in Germany and translated into English by Mr. Graham Wallas under the title "Social Peace." He shows himself there as an admirer of many English institutions, and of such social reformers as the Christian Socialists, the British Positivists, the schools of Carlyle, Ruskin, and Toynbee. Particularly he has done much to popularise Carlyle's social gospels in Germany. In the same book and elsewhere he has also insisted on the beneficial effects of Free Trade on England's industrial progress and the condition of her working classes.

The more serious is it that such a man should come forward at such an opportunity as an advocate of a further increase in the German Navy, and for that reason it may be of some use for English as well as for German democratic reformers to examine the line of his thought a little closer; for he is certainly not a preacher in the desert.

In the third page we come upon a rather debatable sentence. We are told that "he understands the great Manchester men of England as conceiving Free Trade as a means of British Dominion in the world." I think it can easily be proved that neither Cobden nor Bright nourished the Utopian thought that England could by any means—Free Trade or other—prevent the industrial progress of other nations. But it is not only our author who assumes they did. You find this notion held almost everywhere outside of England; and you will unhesitatingly admit that, this presumption once granted, nothing sounds more plausible than that England must of necessity resent the growth of Germany's trade and commerce. Schulze-Gaevernitz is fair enough to point out how much German aggressive protectionism —the dumping policy of the German syndicates—has helped to increase English resentment, and to create a movement for retaliatory duties. But this is only a plea for extenuating circumstances. The question at issue is very little affected by it.

Professor Schulze-Gaevernitz also pleads extenuating circumstances for the intrigues pursued, according to him, during the whole of the nineteenth century by British diplomacy to stay the political renaissance of the German nation, and against German colonial enterprises. He points out that there have always been in England people who disapproved of this hostility, and that by Free Trade England has benefited Germany much more than she has harmed her by diplomatic opposition. So far, so good. But when he defends those hostile diplomatists, and says that from the British point of view, as the "trustees" of their nation, they could only be blamed for not having been strong enough to prevent, in good time, the creation of a united Germany, he conceded far more than true reformers in England would, and will, admit.

For here lies the most dangerous argument in the chain of his deductions. After having described in an impressive way the astonishing growth of Germany's trade and commerce, and shown how dangerous a competitor Germany has become for England, he returns to the old question, and asks what might happen if England, unable to keep down the inconvenient upstart by economic means, should, at the eleventh hour, try to knock him down. Quotations from the "National Review," the "Observer," the "Outlook," the "Saturday Review," &c., facilitate the Professor's thesis that this presumption is more than a mere abstract speculation. Granted that they voice only the sentiments of a small minority, they are, according to our author, dangerous for Germany in this—that they point to a feasible and, consequently, enticing solution. The old peaceful Free Trade, he says, shows signs of senility. A new and rising Imperialism is everywhere inclined to throw means of political warfare into the balance of economic rivalry. Consequently, Germany must have a still stronger Navy.

> "We want the navy in order to confine the commercial rivalry of England within innocuous limits, and to deter the sober sense of the English people from the extremely threatening thoughts of an attack upon us. . . . The German Navy is a condition of our bare existence, indispensable, like the daily bread for which we depend, not only for us, but for our children."

Thus our professor. He bewails the hostility of the Social Democratic Party to naval armaments. He describes this opposition as the inheritance of the Manchester School, as a residuum of bourgeois sentiment. He points out that the Navy represents a liberal element in the State, friendly to commercial intercourse between the nations, and that the construction of battleships furnishes steady occupation to well-paid male workers capable of being organised and of maintaining families, whilst the fancy trades flourish on under-paid workers, to a great extent females, occupied only at seasons, and thrown afterwards as out-of-works upon the labor market. And, finally, he proceeds to prove that financially the German nation is well capable of paying for a much stronger Navy.

Here you have a specimen of a line of thought which inspires a considerable section of the German Intellectuals. I repeat that Professor von Schulze-Gaevernitz does not speak as an enemy or a detractor of England. It is only fair to add that he deprecates aggressive thoughts in regard to the purposes of the Navy he demands. Its purely defensive character must be upheld, so that, if the German Navy is to be increased in proportion to the increase of the British Navy, it may for that be smaller than the latter. But it must be strong enough to be able to prevent the conquests of hitherto independent parts of the Mohammedan world by others, and to secure Germany a share if the possessions of some decrepit Colonial Power should one day be liquidated. In the interest of the human race it is the right and the duty of the German nation to assert itself. "It is unworthy of a great civilised people to found its existence on the sufferance of a neighbour who may be well affected or hostile."

On this basis Professor Schulze-Gaevernitz thinks an understanding between England and Germany well obtainable, whilst, according to him, nothing endangers peace more than the pusillanimity of "pacifists," who take seriously the proposals for disarmament coming from a Power whose Naval Budget is four times that of Germany! British "pacifists" recommend only the disarmament of others. Vide the proposals of Mr. Stead after his return from Germany.

I quote this final remark as a further specimen of some oblique deductions that here and there disfigure the treatise. On the whole its tone and conclusions will offend no sober-minded Britisher. There is some reasonableness about it all. And if Professor Schulze-Gaevernitz could claim to speak as the interpreter of the powers that be, and warrant the future observation of the principles laid down, his exposé would rather help to reassure the alarmed spirits in both countries. But such a guarantee is impossible as long as irresponsible individuals and groups direct the foreign policy of the nations, and as civilised humanity allows things to rule her destinies instead of subjecting the movement of things to the direction of human reason and human interest. For thus it must be if the restriction of armaments is disparaged. Then, with the almost unlimited possibilities of modern technology, people will become the slaves of a movement which, one day, must by necessity lead to an explosion. It is all very well to admit that the German fleet need not be quite so strong as the British. The danger is in the race, and not in the disclaimer of the racers. And thus the endeavours to arrive at an understanding about a restriction of the armaments, or, in the meantime, a prolongation of the terms for the execution of the proposed naval programmes must go on, and will, in spite of the disparaging remarks of our professor, receive the strong support of the Socialist workers.

The peace sentiment a bourgeois sentiment! It is not the first time we meet this contention. It is almost on a par with the wisdom of the legend given out by our extreme Nationalists, that peace emasculates the nations.

Nobody knows better than Professor Schulze-Gaevernitz that four-fifths of the people live and work under conditions that leave little room for effeminacy, that modern industry demands from its workers in factory or laboratory the display of all the virtues that wars could possibly develop, without the brutalising influences of wars. The workers feel this very strongly. On Sunday last Breslau, the second town of the Prussian State, saw a peace meeting of its workers, the like of which has not been seen since the year of 1878. It was the privilege of the writer of these lines to address it, and I can say I noticed very little "effeminacy." Professor Schulze-Gaevernitz means well in his way, but it is not his method which serves the necessity of the hour. In the determination of the workers of the great Empires to oppose any war, in their hostility to any provocative policy, lies a better guarantee of a fair settlement of all the contentious questions that now are used to excite the nations against each other, the best available guarantee of peace and justice.—Yours, &c.,

ED. BERNSTEIN.

Schöneberg, Berlin,
August 14th, 1908.

Letters to the Editor.

THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It may interest your correspondent, Mr. J. Colquhoun Reade, and your readers to know that last Thursday the Bucks County Council passed a resolution requesting the Local Government Board to authorise a speed limit of ten miles an hour wherever there are continuous human habitations on either or both sides of a thoroughfare for a quarter of a mile.—Yours, &c.,

EDMUND VERNEY.

Claydon House, Steeple-Claydon, S.O., Bucks,
August 15th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In some of the resolutions I carried, two or three years back, in the Cromer U.D.C. and the N.C.C., I made the question of eyesight a condition of driving motors. It was especially stipulated that no one should drive who had lost the sight of one eye. I had good reasons to do so.

I will give my mite to help in any movement for the better control of the vile things.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY BROADHURST.

Cromer, August 15th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In my judgment, the evil is so clamant that a drastic legislative remedy is demanded, and what I suggest is that Parliament should be asked to pass a measure to the following effect:—

1. With regard to new cars—i.e., cars constructed after the passing of the proposed Act—it should be provided that they should be so designed as to be incapable of attaining a greater speed than twenty miles an hour. It seems to me that no adequate reason can be assigned for travelling on the public highways at a higher rate of speed. Government officials should be appointed to inspect every new car made in this country, with the object of ensuring that the construction of the car conforms to this suggested design. Further, foreign cars not conforming to this design should be prevented from entering the country. I would also suggest that in passing through towns and villages the maximum speed of a car per hour should be eight miles.

2. With regard to existing cars, it should be enacted that their rate of speed ought to be the same as that suggested for new cars.

3. As to penalties, I should support a proposal to visit a breach of speed regulations with a sentence of imprisonment without the option of a fine; while in the case of a car either imported or constructed in this country in violation of the legislative pattern, the appropriate penalty would include the forfeiture of the car, the loss being borne jointly by the owner and maker, unless the former proved his innocence, in which case the maker would be solely responsible.—Yours, &c.,

A. M. ANDERSON.

9, Great King Street, Edinburgh,
August 12th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—For the last thirty years I have ridden a tricycle probably 3,000 miles a year, but my nerves will no longer stand the hoot of a car coming up behind me, ordering me to get out of the way under penalty of death, because, unlike a bicyclist, I must have the best of the road. I have, therefore, been compelled to give my machine away, and take to field paths and places where "trespassers will be prosecuted."

I have just returned from a fortnight round the Lake district, and have discoursed with everyone I met on the motor nuisance, and I find that these monstrous things are hated there even more than in the South of England. The roads there now are the finest in the world, and the motorists know it. As in Switzerland, the inhabitants largely depend for their living upon visitors who come to view and stay in their lovely country, many bringing servants, horses, and carriages with them; but, I was told, they don't come now. Motors have come instead, rushing through, spending no money, and leaving nothing behind but a bad smell.

I see no help from our legislators. Mr. Balfour's chauffeur has been repeatedly fined. Mr. Asquith has a new car. The newspapers to-day announce that "His Majesty's 40-horse-power Mercèdes motor-car arrived to-day (Marienbad) in charge of Mr. C. W. Stamper." General Booth careers about converting the people in the new mode. Mr. Burns talks of the large capital invested in the manufacture, but omits to mention the ruin to harness-makers, farriers, and shoesmiths, and everyone I speak to repeats the parrot cry, "But they have come to stay."

I feel certain that nine people out of ten who don't use motor-cars would sign a petition to Parliament calling for restrictive legislation, which, I suggest, should be on the following lines:—

All hooters, gongs, bells, or other indication that one of these power-driven machines was coming, and that everyone using the road must get out of the way, should be prohibited.

A speed limit of twelve miles an hour on country roads, and eight or ten in towns and villages.

Post Office vans limited to ten miles an hour.

All vans conveying parcels or goods limited to six miles an hour.

Every person driving should, in addition to producing his licence, also produce an invoice or some form of certificate that would satisfy the police or the convicting magistrates, stating the value of the car, and not the driver only, but every person riding in the car, to be fined a sum not less than 5 per cent. of the value of the car, to be endorsed on such licence, and on the certificate of value, and doubled at every subsequent offence.

I base this last suggestion on the practice of companies insuring against accidents to motor-cars, as they, before issuing a policy, require the name of the driver, the number of his licence, and the make, value, and power of the car.

How such a petition is to be drawn up and taken round to every house in the United Kingdom I am not prepared at the moment to say; it would be a work of immense magnitude, and would cost a large sum of money, but, once started, I feel sure that volunteer canvassers would readily come forward, and, from the practice I have had in such matters, I feel certain that the conversations that arise when asking for a signature would arouse such a feeling of indignation that no Government could resist what would, I am sure, turn out to be the will of the people.—Yours, &c.,

J. H. CHATTERTON.

10, Mundania Road, Honor Oak, S.E.,
August 13th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—While thanking you heartily for your efforts to control motor annoyance, there are some details your article and correspondence pass over.

1. The size of the cars. Very many are as large as hay carts or carriers' wagons, of which the speed is four to five miles at the outside. A motor car requires more than half the road unless it slows down, and drivers will never do this.

2. Why are country roads outside villages to be abandoned to the motorist? Surely pedestrians and cyclists have rights on them. The motor man is there merely for his amusement. Any speed beyond ten miles an hour interferes with other traffic.

3. The noise of the hooters should be controlled; it is purposely made as startling and disagreeable as possible.

Once subject motors to the same rules as other traffic, and all nuisance and danger cease.—Yours, &c.,

E. B. M.

August 15th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am at an utter loss to understand how any individual who wishes to be considered reasonable can ask for a higher speed than twelve miles an hour as a maximum on any road, at any time. What does Mr. Colquhoun Reade mean by an open road? Old people and children have a right to the fair use of any road either by day or night. What reasonable chance has a pedestrian on any ordinary road between two motors coming from opposite directions, even at a twenty-mile speed? Nor do the motorists allow themselves a fair chance at such a rate, especially if there be some other vehicle between. No motor can very well be seen or heard at a greater distance than half a mile at most, perhaps a quarter is nearer the mark. Your readers can work it out as to the time necessary to get out of the way.

As to speed in towns, I last night (Friday, 14th) witnessed a very narrow escape of five pedestrians near Clarence Gate, Regent's Park, who had every reason to consider themselves perfectly safe. A motor was going at about ten miles an hour from Allsop Place up Park Road. Opposite Clarence Gate, where those turnings meet Upper Baker Street, another vehicle came in sight of the motor driver. Although his pace, ten miles, was moderate to what some go on these dangerous roads, there was only one way of avoiding a collision, that was by suddenly swerving to the wrong side of the road, with the result I have spoken of.

I have just spent a month in France, and Paris is worse than London, owing to the many roads that have the characteristics of the roads I am speaking of near Clarence Gate. In Dieppe they have some excellent regulations, but, as it is, they only lull you into false security. In that town the law directs that the speed shall not exceed ten kilometres, and this rule is obeyed by nine-tenths of the drivers, but the other tenth do as they please. —Yours, &c.,

A. J. MARRIOTT.

249, Ladbroke Grove, Notting Hill,
August 15th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Apropos of your campaign against the misuse of motors, might I suggest that a good deal of the difficulty of fast driving through villages might be got over if the village authorities were to make shallow channels right across the road, at distances of about 100 yards one from the other, the depth of the channel to be about four inches, with gently sloping sides? Vehicles passing slowly over these would not be at all seriously incommoded, whereas if a motor were to go over them rapidly it would break its springs. I believe some of the French villages have adopted this expedient, and that it works satisfactorily; it certainly prevents any motor going rapidly through the village, and the inconvenience to other traffic is very slight.

You have probably heard the following reply to an examiner's question. It is illustrative of the widespread recognition of the danger of motor cars:—

Examiner: What is the difference between the quick and the dead?

Small Boy: The quick is them as gets out of the way of motor cars, and the dead is them as doesn't.—Yours, &c.,

FAIRPLAY.

August 14th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Surely if the public are ever to get back the use of the public roads it will not be by raising the speed of motor-car travel from twenty miles to thirty miles per hour, as suggested by Mr. Colquhoun Reade? Are we not now suffering from high speed? And are not these speeds higher now than in the pre-Motor Car Act days?

The reason is not clear, but I have seen the suggestion by others than Mr. Reade that it is absurd to restrict the speed of a machine capable of such high "going" as a motor car. But the argument is equally applicable to the horse. He could get along much quicker than he does, but we don't have pleasure riders and drivers galloping about the roads. Why? Because it is dangerous and not permissible. In short, the speed of the horse is restricted to what is safe and convenient for the public. The same rule should be applied to the motor car. There is but one criterion—public safety, public interest. Another fallacy is that the opposition to high speeds is likened to the opposition to trains. There is no analogy. The latter are on special tracks, and high speeds may promote public interests. Motor cars run on roads, and unless by running at high speeds they can promote the natural efficiency of mankind as a whole, there is no raison d'être for high speeds. We know, as a matter of fact, that they do not promote well-being—quite the contrary. High speeds of trains are conducive to the efficiency of mankind, motor cars are the contrary; therefore, fear not to impose a low maximum speed limit. Fifteen miles per hour is ample. It is certain to be exceeded, and common sense will turn a "blind eye" to it when no danger or inconvenience arises, but the public must have protection, and a low speed limit is the only way to secure that the wayside shall be convenient for all—motors, vehicles (horse), and mankind.

To the excellent suggestions for reforming the design of the motor car, I suggest that they should be taxed (Imperially) according to the amount of damage they are assessed to do the road, the comparison to be with horse vehicles, the cars, &c., to be classified according to their uses. The cars would thus recoup, to some extent, the public for the cost of repair when the latter exceeds that of a horse vehicle. Motor and horse car would then be on the same basis.—Yours, &c.,

Sevenoaks, August 16th, 1908. C. H.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The best way would be for the Royal Automobile Club to call a conference, at which all grievances could be raised, and a committee appointed to consider the best means of remedying them.—Yours, &c.,

FRANCIS COUTTS.

88, St. James's Street, London,
August 17th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—You ask your readers for suggestions: Is it not time that a monster petition asking a remedy for the intolerable danger and nuisance to which 90 or 95 per cent. of the British public are now subjected by the selfish enjoyment of the comparatively few, were got up and presented to the House of Commons at the beginning of the next Session? I venture to think that the outraged feelings of the people of this country whose safety and convenience have been so ruthlessly disregarded would produce a larger number of genuine signatures than has ever been presented to Parliament.—Yours, &c., "CYCLIST."

Horsham, August 17th, 1908.

[We are compelled to hold over many letters on this subject.—ED., NATION.]

"HAGGERSTON AND AFTER."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Thanks, many thanks, for your leading article. It was badly wanted, and it will serve. In March, 1907, the electors of Haggerston sent Rupert Guinness to Spring Gardens with 900 votes more than they sent Sir W. R. Cremer to St. Stephen's in 1906. It is worth noting in passing that for L.C.C. purposes women have votes. The advantages accruing from Mr. Guinness' return to the L.C.C. were not all on one side.

At Spring Gardens he would have to vote. His votes could be used as a test of his words, his pledges and their worth. Once again did London Radicals and Progressives have their enemy at their mercy.

And to their shame, be it said once again, they did allow him, nay, encourage him, to escape. As at Peckham, so at Haggerston. For fifteen months Mr. Guinness has given a steady support to the anti-democratic policy of the Moderate Party, and votes innumerable has he recorded against London's best interests.

Neither by central or local association has his action in this regard been effectively challenged, and no attempt has been made to bring to the knowledge of his constituents his many retrograde votes.

Boats not on the Thames; their crews thrown out of employment; their families wanting food. One of the men responsible for all this is Mr. Guinness. His reward a seat in the Imperial Parliament! Why? Because London possesses no organisation capable of bringing offenders of this type to book.

The failure to use such splendid material for reprisal and punishment is the proof of this statement. In this regard London stands alone, not in splendid isolation, but in a state of abject degradation and despair. In not one of the large towns would such a state of things be possible.

In the recent five-day contest it was not possible for this side of the work to be properly done, although it must be frankly admitted a good deal which might have been done was not even attempted. Had there been a prospective Liberal candidate in the field from the time it was known he would be wanted the votes of Guinness upon the L.C.C. would have been to him material of the most effective kind.

To come to the Tariff Reform question, here again it must be admitted that the enemy has been given a walk-over. Ever since the General Election all kinds of influences have been at work for Tariff Reform continuously. And on the Free Trade side, with the exception of one or two spasmodic and meagre efforts, nothing has been done. Haggerston is the home of small masters and much home-work, and given these conditions of a rise in prices coupled with a depression in trade, you get one of the most favorable soils for the propagation of the Protection heresy. Result, natural and obvious. One has to go back to Lewisham in November, 1903, to find a darkness as profound as now reigns in Haggerston.

The cause of Free Trade has to face another danger which it is idle any longer to conceal; I allude to the open and fierce opposition of the Socialist Party to Free Trade. To them it is simply a "red herring," to be treated with derision and contempt. They cannot be brought to see that the alternative is not between a Free Trade and a Socialist Government, but between a Government pledged to Free Trade or one pledged to introduce Tariff Reform as their first measure. This dual difficulty only increases the need for a more vigorous propaganda and an active, live organisation.

I promised to say something about votes for women. Very few words will suffice. Outside the Haggerston gas works, from the van bearing the sign of the Women's Freedom League, I heard these words hurled at the Liberal candidate, who was at that moment addressing a meeting there. The woman speaker said: "With Mr. Warren we have no quarrel. As a man he is an extremely nice person, but we are here to ask the electors of Haggerston not to send a Liberal to Parliament, because the present Liberal Government have broken every pledge they made when seeking power, and the working men of Haggerston will be quite justified in now withdrawing the trust as expressed at the last election." I read in a Manchester paper that Mrs. Despard, speaking at the peace meeting in Trafalgar Square on the very day Haggerston was polling, said: "If it were not for the Boer War, they would be already enjoying old age pensions and many other privileges."

As a mere man, who has always been in favor of women having the vote, I am constrained to ask what is the practical value of Mrs. Despard's expression of regret in face of the fact that her organisation spent the whole of that self same week in Haggerston helping to put into Parliament a supporter of the party which plunged this nation into the Boer war?

Two nights before the poll Mrs. Pankhurst, in a speech which occupied over two hours, was instancing the need of female sanitary inspectors as one of the reasons why women should possess the vote. There happened to be in the crowd an elector of a London parish where for over seven years the Liberal and Progressive Party men, be it noted, have been striving to get a female inspector appointed. They have failed. Why? Because in that parish the women upon Division III. have, by large majorities, voted for the Tory and Moderate candidates, who have been opposed to any female being so appointed.

This elector put these facts in the form of a question to Mrs. Pankhurst, asking her to state the grounds of her belief that the women qualified to get on Division III. are in favor of such measures of social reform. He failed to obtain any answer.

Again are we brought face to face with the one overwhelming fact—increased educational effort, persistent, thorough, and unflagging, combined with a real live organisation, are the need of the moment, if the party and its programme are to live through the troubled sea upon which they are now afloat. Why cannot this need be met?—Yours, &c., F. W. SOUTTER.

32, Etterby Street, Stanwix, Carlisle,
August 12th, 1908.

A PROPOS DE BOTTES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Why does your article upon "Shakespeare and Common Sense" let off Professor Raleigh à propos of his unpardonable heresies on the subject of Dr. Johnson's boots? "Very little is known," he observes, "about Dr. Johnson's boots." Now, Sir, apart from its historical presumption, this rash and negligent statement is a severe reflection upon the Oxford school of English literature, more especially in connection with the subsequent remark of the Professor that this is a topic which demands and would well repay (indeed it would) the expert labors of academic research. A school of thinkers, it appears, has risen in Oxford who hold that all boots were interchangeable in Dr. Johnson's day, and of this school it would appear that Professor Raleigh has constituted himself champion. Johnson's note upon a passage in "King John," it is maintained, leaves no doubt whatever on the point. The passage in question runs as follows:—

> "Slippers, which his nimble haste,
> Had falsely thrust upon contrary feet."
> (Act iv., Sc. iv.)

and the Doctor's comment runs thus:—

"I know not how the commentators understand this important passage, which, in Dr. Warburton's edition, is marked as eminently beautiful, and, in the whole, not without justice. But Shakespeare seems to have confounded a man's shoes with his gloves. He that is frighted or harried may put his hand into the wrong glove, but either shoe will equally admit either foot. The author seems to be disturbed by the disorder which he describes."

And on this evidence, Sir, we are seriously asked by the faculty of letters at the oldest of our English Universities to believe that Johnson wore his boots indifferently and with no attempt at, nor even idea of, discriminating right and left, which seems to involve the theory that there was in England a transition stage during which, below the belt, at any rate, all sense of right and left was ignored. One can hardly fail to perceive here another deliberate and malicious slight aimed at the literary character of the eighteenth century.

The view taken, I need hardly demonstrate to readers of The Nation, is a wholly erroneous one, and is based upon a failure of discrimination, not on Johnson's part, but upon that of his irresponsible critics. The philosophy of "straights," it would perhaps surprise Dr. Raleigh to hear, supplies a complete refutation to his injurious attack upon the civilisation of one whose politeness enabled him to act with complete success, upon occasion, as mentor to Lord Chesterfield himself.

The lowest organisations of footgear, such as slippers (it should be superfluous to point out), are made without heels, and are interchangeable. For other reasons, the most highly organised forms of footgear, such as waders and jack-boots, are also made on the "straight" principle. The jack-boot, for instance, which was at one time peculiar to the tribe of postillions, would have lost half its utility, so great was the friction of the right calf against the pole, had not the legs been interchangeable. But in the intermediate forms of shoe, or "low," "high-low," the tasselled Wellington (dear to the heart of Jos. Sedley), and the "lesser people" of the boot tribe generally, no such lawless state of indifference can have ever prevailed; and it is absurd to suppose that Johnson was oblivious of distinctions which were made in medieval armour and were universally observed by the whole race of cordonniers from the time of St. Crispin downwards. Johnson slightly confuses counsel, it may be confessed, by using the word shoe as a synonym for slipper, an effeminate word for which he experienced a contempt similar to that he felt for the word "liqueur," and for the French character. But to rear upon this incurious aberration a superstructure of error so gigantic as this, should, I think, elicit a protest from all earnest students. I have felt compelled, therefore, &c.—Yours, &c., Thomas Seccombe.

Acton, W., August 19th, 1908.

NURSING THE VOTERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Is there not something very humiliating to our ideas of British liberty that, in order to get our votes, it is necessary that we be nursed? What class of our free and independent voters are most susceptible to this cajolery? The issues are so plain to most of us that even if our candidate is plumped down upon us at an hour's notice, we know what we have to vote against. One man is sure to be a supporter of the Lords and more taxes on the poor. No doubt three-cornered fights complicate the issue, and call, as you say, for more of the spirit of compromise. But the susceptibility to nursing is a sign that the democracy, especially in London, is devoid of even a feeble measure of intellectual grasp of issues, which are dinned into their ears every day of their lives.—Yours, &c.,

Edwin Hill.

Leamington, August 8th, 1908.

THE DILEMMA OF A LIBERAL SOLICITOR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—As we all of us make mistakes at times, one cannot blame "Ignoramus" for having, when advising his clients who were interested in licensed houses, overlooked Sharp v. Wakefield, although many an articled clerk was familiar with it.

I do not think, however, that he need trouble himself very greatly about the fate of his clients. The "slump" in the licensed property market has done them far more harm than ever the Licensing Bill can do, unless they have been exceptionally reckless on the financial side of their investments, for which, of course, "Ignoramus" can in no way be held responsible.

If, however, the Licensing Bill does not pass—and it may not if all Liberals don't unite in support of it—we shall, next year, have high licence duties, which will not do as much for temperance, but will do a great deal more harm to licensed property.

If, therefore, I were in the position of "Ignoramus," I should advise my clients not to be frightened into realising their properties at a great sacrifice, but to hold on, remembering that things seldom turn out to be as bad for us in reality as we have imagined in anticipation.—Yours, &c.,

Another Liberal and Teetotal Solicitor.

Leeds, August 18th, 1908.

P.S.—Is the Liberal solicitor becoming a rara avis? In this city, out of 220 solicitors at least fifty-six are Liberals, or one in four.

"A GREEN HEAVEN."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I suggest that the primitive liturgical prayers, cited in the article bearing this title, which prayers, as the author truly says, are to be found in all the early liturgies, refer rather to Paradise, the place of rest, than to Heaven, the abode of glory?

No description of Heaven, except the apocalyptic one, is to be found in the Scriptures, and the Seer of Patmos, though he mentions a pure river clear as crystal, and speaks of the tree of life, never alludes to green meadows—his Heaven is a celestial city with streets of gold.

But as the word Paradise means, if I am not mistaken, a park or garden, the idea of greenness may be associated with it most fitly, and, if my memory serves me rightly, in some of the early liturgies prayer is made that the departed may have their abode in the green pastures beside the still waters.

Paradise, to which our Lord invited the penitent robber, was clearly not the same place as Heaven, for Christ did not ascend to the latter till forty days after His resurrection, while His words to the dying brigand at His side were, "To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise."

It was a misfortune that when Protestantism swept away the doctrine of Purgatory the belief in Paradise was not restored. As the "Church Quarterly Review" well said many years ago, the Protestants simply eliminated Purgatory and set before mankind two abodes to be entered into at death, Heaven or Hell—a most unfortunate mistake, seeing, to quote Dr. Johnson, that few men can be considered good enough to enter the one or bad enough to be incarcerated in the other.—Yours, &c.,

Richard F. Jupp.

Lathland House, Wellington Road,
West Hartlepool, August 17th, 1908.

THE WORK OF THE INDUSTRIAL LAW COMMITTEE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I, through your columns, draw attention to the annual report, just issued, of the Industrial Law Committee? This society was formed in 1898, in response to the desire expressed by many social workers for a fuller knowledge of the protection afforded by law to women and children engaged in industrial work. The ten years' experience of the Committee has proved that many unnecessary evils in industrial life are borne without complaint because the workers concerned do not realise to how great an extent the law is able to protect them, and fail, through ignorance or fear, to claim the help which is theirs by right.

It is the aim of the Committee to make such needless suffering impossible, and to this end they seek to come into touch with district visitors, nurses, teachers, and other social workers, and to give them information regarding the industrial laws of the country, in order that they, in turn, may be able to instruct the women and girls who look to them for sympathy and advice. The information alluded to is given largely by means of lectures, and the Committee are fortunate in being able to secure experts, among whom are some of H.M. Inspectors of Factories, to deliver these lectures for them.

Proof of the need which exists for such educational work is afforded by the fact that after almost every lecture complaints referring to matters never previously recognised as illegalities are sent in by members of the audience.

As typical instances of complaints received may be cited the cases of a laundry girl whose hand was badly crushed, and who lost two fingers in a machine mangle; of a boy working in a shop daily from 8 a.m. to 10.30 p.m., and sometimes much later; and of dressmakers' assistants obliged to work in a basement room lighted and ventilated only by a grating opening into the street, and having an earthen floor constantly damp.

The Industrial Law Committee greatly desire to extend their lecture work, and are only hindered from doing so by lack of funds.

They feel assured of the sympathy of all those interested in industrial questions, and venture to hope that such sympathy may take practical form in the increased financial support which they so greatly need.

Subscriptions may be sent to the Secretary, Industrial Law Committee, York Mansions, York Street, Westminster, S.W.—Yours, &c.,

IRENE COX,
Secretary Industrial Law Committee.

August 11th, 1908.

LIBERALISM AND LABOR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As a speaker and canvasser at Haggerston for Mr. Warren, I cordially thank the Editor of THE NATION for his outspoken leader. This, with Mr. Arthur Ponsonby's letter, should teach the party that time passes quickly, and to-day work must be done in the constituencies to enable the Liberal and Labor forces to triumph at the coming General Election.

Regrettable circumstances caused the Liberal candidate at Haggerston to enter into the contest an untried and unknown man. This must not be permitted in future if our majority is to be held together. Victory must be organised to-day for the fight of to-morrow. Liberalism and Labor are not opposing forces, and every effort should be made by the Whips of the party to heal any threatened opposition or prevent any possible cleavage between Liberalism and Labor. We Liberals have nine points out of ten in common with organised Labor, while with Toryism we have none. Toryism seeks to lay the country under the tyranny of Protection and trusts and augment the existing armed forces of the Crown.

If Haggerston election had to be fought by the party the whole forces of militant Liberalism should have been drafted into the constituency and concentrated on victory at the polls. Yet on the election day the Tories possibly had from fifty to seventy motors steadily at work. As a contrast the Liberals had under half a dozen, and there were none to fetch up out-voters to the poll. The agents fought like lions, but the party responded like lambs. Speaker after speaker in the House of Commons and in the leading Liberal Club in London shirked their duty of supporting Liberalism. Defeat, they said, was a foregone conclusion. This, as a worker, I absolutely demur to. The seat was a Liberal seat, and if concentration had been determined upon, and the election fought with half the spirit of Peckham, our candidate would have done far better. It was bad tactics to have hastened on the election when time was invaluable to us; still worse tactics to fight only the Tory candidate. When a fight is determined upon, it is the duty of the party to fight all opponents, Socialism included. Failing a Labor agreement, there must be mercy to none. A fight once entered upon, it is cowardice to carry it on half-heartedly, and a base betrayal of Liberal ideals before an astonished country.—Yours, &c.,

August 18th, 1908. J. E. HAND.

THE ART OF ENDING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Unconsciously Mr. Parnell Kerr suggests a more appropriate relief from the recent discussion on the art of opening than that provided by Mr. Farquharson—to wit, the art of ending, which, as we know from the "Path to Rome," is indeed a much more difficult matter.

I would go much farther than Mr. Kerr, who remarks that is, perhaps, the finest sonnet-ending in literature. I would venture to claim for it the distinction of being the most final line of any form of literature. It ends everything, that line. It is ultimate. Where is the prose-ending which so absolutely gives the note of having reached the one and only conclusion proper to the matter? I am sure a discussion on the art of ending would be much more fruitful than your recent article and correspondence.—Yours, &c., MAX JUDGE.

"Silent upon a peak in Darien,"

7, Pall Mall, August 19th, 1908.

JAMES II.'s STATUE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Would some of your readers kindly tell me what became of the statue of James II., by Gibbons, which stood in Whitehall till removed for the great Canadian arch at the time of the Diamond Jubilee?

'Twas said it would be re-erected after the celebrations, and for some time it lay in the garden of a house near by. Then one day I missed it, and cannot hear of it since.

That, and the statue on University College, Oxford, are said to be the only two of James II. in England.—Yours, &c., ANTIQUARIAN.

August 12th, 1908.

[The statue in question has been re-erected at the West Front of the Admiralty, facing St. James's Park.—ED., NATION.]

Poetry.

A SOMERSET LULLABY.

THE dimpsey dark's a-falling, the birds are in the nest!
The little stars are crowding now the zun is gone to rest.
While the girt beg chap was looking they didn't dare to play;
Now they run like happy children when the Dapper's gone away.
Zo go to sleep, my deary dear, a-snuggled in my arm;
Snuggled down in coopy-ouse you'll never come to harm.
Zafe and warm in hidey-hole while Mammy watch do keep,
And the stars look through the windy pane to zee ye off to sleep.

The Squire's cheeld's got a rattle, and a zilver coral ring;
But a can't zee its Mammy for she'm gone to zee the King.
'Tis tended by a maykin, and cheweth on a bone;
But you'm my lucky laddie with a Mammy of your own!
Zo go to sleep, my deary dear, a rocking on my knee!
And thank the Blessed Lord you baint a Child of Quality!
Aye, thank the Lord, who laid ye on our cottage hearthen stone,
With a Daddy as do love ye, and a Mammy of your own.

Sleep sound, my Husk o' Honey, my Sheaf of Golden Carn!
My Bird as can't flutter yet, my Rose wi' ne'er a tharn!
Give gold and sparkling jewels to them that's proud and high!
I've got a secret treasure no money could not buy!
Zo sleep and suck, my Pearl of Pearls, a-tugging at my breast!
The worser ye do use me, the better I shall rest!
Aye, tug and tease and tussle, and bless ye for the pain;
For if them busy lips grew still I'd never sleep again.

EDWARD SYDNEY TYLEE.

Reviews.

"THE HEART OF DARKNESS."*

George Grenfell's name will always be connected with the Congo, both for his explorations and for his labor as one of the founders of the Baptist Mission, to which nearly all travellers on the great river have been so much indebted. He may be said to have lived right through the Congo history of modern times. For he went to Central Africa in the early 'seventies, at a time when Victor Hugo was justified in his characteristic saying that in the region of the unknown Africa was the Absolute; he lived there for over thirty years, travelling far into unexplored lands of the interior, witnessing much of the horror and also of the virtue of native life as it then existed, and greeting with joy the international arrangement for its development under the philanthropic superintendance of King Leopold; and he died only two years ago, "a disheartened and disillusioned man," as Sir Harry Johnston says, having outlived the ruin of all his hopes. To those whom a wild instinct draws to savage and unknown lands, or who like to see the English nature in its most generous and unselfish type, the story of such a life must be of the highest interest, none the less on account of its tragic disappointment.

But the distinguished author of these volumes, himself perhaps more closely identified with Central African science and exploration than anyone now living, has not limited his work to a mere narration of Grenfell's life. The mission side of the biography has been almost wholly omitted, being left, we understand, for other hands; but upon Grenfell's own accounts of his travels and observations Sir Harry Johnston has built up what is, in reality, a very complete history of the Congo, with careful descriptions of its main districts, tributaries, and inhabitants. In this task, apart from the Grenfell papers, he has chiefly been assisted by Mr. Lawson Forfeitt, who, we believe, after twenty years of Congo climate, is still working for the Baptist Mission at his famous station near Matadi, where the cataracts of the Lower Congo begin, and by Mr. Emil Torday, the young Hungarian explorer, who served five years under the Congo Government, chiefly in the Katanga district, and is well known to British anthropologists by his admirable collections of savage arts, which are now exhibited in the British Museum. The book is, therefore, in reality, the joint production of four among the highest authorities on Central African travel—men who will always be remembered in African history, not only for their scientific explorations, but for their sympathetic knowledge of the native tribes before the forces of exploiting civilisation fell upon them. The volumes are very copiously illustrated, chiefly by Grenfell's own photographs, but some of Sir Harry Johnston's accurate drawings are included.

It is impossible here even to indicate the subjects that compose a work of such range. There are chapters on the course of the great river itself and on many of its tributaries; on most of the districts within the enormous basin which they drain; on the anthropology, the arts, religions, folk-lore, and languages of the people; on the botany and natural history; on coinage, commerce, and diseases. If anyone wants information on this great territory, which is estimated at more than half the size of our Indian Empire, he will very likely find it here. The whole work forms a valuable addition to the records of primitive man, which observers like the authors have been only just in time to collect. For if the present systems of exploitation continue unchecked for another fifty years, the whole of the Dark Continent, from the Cape to the Sahara, will have become a great breeding farm for black labor under the direction of European managers, who will control the hosts of indistinguishable laborers for the advantage of capitalists in England, Germany, Belgium, France, and Portugal. Under such conditions the still existing customs, religions, and arts of the natives themselves must necessarily disappear, unless the tribes develop a new power of combination and resistance.

It must not be thought that the methods of commercial civilisation, horrible as they are, have superseded an idyllic era of peace and joy. We will leave out of account the Arab slave trade, which was somewhat similar in its foreign and commercial character, but surpassed in its cruelty and destruction the worst records of the present Portuguese slave traders or the agents for King Leopold's rubber tax. Let us glance only at the recognised customs of the natives themselves, and we shall find them so horrible that we cannot wonder if Grenfell welcomed the formation of the Free State as the dawn of a millennium, and continued, though with increasing misgivings, to believe in its beneficence for more than ten years. Cannibalism, which is probably still common, but is practised in secret and with a sense of shame and fear, was almost universal thirty years ago, and regarded with no more compunction than beef-eating in England. Captives and slaves were openly fed and purchased for the table just like cattle, and in many tribes the bodies of the dead were habitually dug up again and eaten, unless the graves were carefully watched. Among the so-called rebels of the Batetela, just east of the Lunda district which Grenfell explored, cannibalism is still quite ordinary. A certain proportion of the slaves which they capture or buy to sell again to the Portuguese agents are set aside for provisions, and the present writer has known two or three men who, by some good fortune, have escaped the cooking-pot at the last moment. But even worse than this ordinary kind of cannibalism and the sale of human cattle for slaughter was the widely diffused custom of burying men and women alive in the same trench with the rotting corpse of a chief, so that he might not go companionless into another world. Indeed, the cruelties of African burial ceremonies form a chapter in man's history which it is hardly endurable to read.

The pleasure of cruelty disappears very slowly among mankind, and can still be found in almost every civilised family. But, we suppose, it can be seen nowhere now quite so frankly expressed as in Central Africa. To the untutored savage there the sight of pain gives real and unconcealed delight. It makes him laugh for joy, and if the pain is caused by deliberate tortures the satisfaction of watching it is increased. All civilised torturers probably feel the same kind of pleasure in executions, floggings, pulling out of nails, and other prison practices, to say nothing of the pleasurable tortures inflicted on animals. But in Europe the pleasure is usually concealed under some other name, such as political necessity, duty, law, or sport. To see the thing in the simple nakedness of cruelty one has now to go to Central Africa, or to read such a book as this.

The wonder of the world is that, side by side with these hideous qualities, mankind should have developed even such elements of music, beauty, and imagination as are found in Central African arts and legends. In beautiful handicrafts the natives do not rank very high, but the effort after beauty is almost always present, and all have the instinct for music. They have invented many kinds of drums, harps, and pipes, and all day and night they will play the primitive piano, which Sir Harry Johnston calls a "metallophone," because he could find no general word for it, though the present reviewer has heard it called the "ochisanji" quite commonly in the South-West and at the mouth of the Congo. The chapter on religion, fetish, and folk-lore, too, though they are touched with the gloom of Africa, are sometimes enlivened by the charm of a child's close sympathy with animals, and the form of many of the fables quoted seems to support a suggestion recently made that the "Uncle Remus" tales were derived originally from slaves exported from the Congo basin through the Angola slaving stations. But, as we said, we cannot hope in a review even to touch the surface of a book that raises so many points of interest, and must be read by all who wish to realise one of the greatest problems now confronting our own and other European countries.

* "George Grenfell and the Congo." By Sir Harry Johnston. 2 vols. Hutchinson. 36s. net.

THE IMPORTANCE OF JEWELS.*

Mr. Clifford Smith, in a work very imposing in appearance, very finely illustrated, and, what in these days is much rarer, very well and carefully written, has revealed a good deal of the significance and human interest attaching to jewels, and which the history of jewellery has stored up. Not only has he studied the subject himself very patiently and thoroughly, but he has had the good fortune to interest in his work a large number of the owners of the best-known collections in this country, in America, and on the Continent, with the result that his book has a character of great thoroughness, and the illustrations are always the best and most representative of their kind. One suggestion, indeed, we are tempted to make at the outset. The history of jewellery contains, as we have said, a whole store of human interest, and this interest Mr. Clifford Smith reveals successfully enough; yet the attitude he has taken up is not entirely satisfactory. He is, it seems, satisfied to think of jewels as ornaments or marks of distinction, and that only. "The love of ornaments," he says, "prompted by vanity, is inherent in the human race." Jewels, he thinks, have been worn "to give prominence to individual parts of the body by means of glittering, beautiful objects, which involuntarily draw the eye of the spectator in the desired direction." They have also been the means of "establishing a distinctive mark of rank and dignity" on the wearers. The human motive in either case is the motive of vanity and the love of display; but do such motives adequately explain the attraction which gems and jewels have already exercised?

* "Jewellery." By H. Clifford Smith. Methuen. 25s. net.

Is there not something more deep-seated and belonging to the thing itself, from which, as an after consequence, its ornamental value has proceeded? Let the reader look long and intently into the heart of a ruby or sapphire, and, as he does so, consider his own sensations. He will find the same feelings stirred in him as is stirred when he looks into the recesses, shadowy or sunlit, of a thick-foliaged wood, or when he gazes fixedly into green depths of transparent water. These interior views or aspects of things, which absorb the vision without being themselves exhausted, awaken in the gazer's mind a sentiment analogous to their own nature. They awaken, that is to say, the interior or introspective mood, that mood called also receptive or intuitive, because it is capable of passively receiving impressions which are beyond the reach of active intellectual operations. This is the gift of which mystics, seers, and prophets have been in all ages the chief exponents. It belongs to the East more than the West, and to women more than men; at the same time, in a diluted form, and as one strand among many, it is a perquisite of human nature, and helps to complete the sum of its faculties. To a greater or less extent, it is possessed, probably, by most people, and whoever possesses it is conscious of the emotional pleasure which it affords and prizes those objects or views of things by which it is stimulated. The depths of the sea and the depths of forests have been the homes of most of what is mystical and occult in human history. But, in the same history, gems have also played an important part. The stimulating of the receptive mood and the art of divination have been fostered by crystal gazing or staring into gems from time immemorial. We are not conscious of the trance of the medium or adept, we daresay, when we look at a precious stone, for mediums and adepts are still more or less the exception among us. But still our mood differs from theirs less in kind than degree. To some extent the introspective faculties of our mind are played upon by the intensely inward capacity of the stone, and this it is which explains the attraction it has for us, and explains, too, we may be quite sure, when we consider the nature of its history, the attraction it has always possessed for mankind. That another, an ornamental value, should have grown out of this natural and inherent value was, of course, inevitable. To possess and to show others we possess what all desire to prize is, no doubt, a purport of natural human motive. But still it is, in the case of jewels, an after consequence. The first feeling was their preciousness for their own sake, and because of a secret effect they exercised on the mind; the second feeling was that "it were very fitting and right I myself should possess what is so precious." From this it followed naturally that the possession of such objects came to be regarded as a mark of high distinction, proper to persons of exalted rank or office, or, at the least, an indication of unusual wealth. And so we come to all those secondary or derivative motives, all of which are based in the same thought, that the possession of what is important make the possessor important. These, probably, are always the most obvious motives, nevertheless, they are themselves the consequences of the more primitive and inherent attraction. The importance of possessing these things, the consciousness of a personal honor or dignity conferred by them, never would have arisen but for the profound, instinctive sense of their value and beauty, resulting, as I think, from a certain inward affinity between their own aspect and a mood of the human mind.

So intimately are the two subjects of gems and jewellery involved that it is impossible to separate them, the jeweller's skill being devoted very largely to composing the setting or framework for the gem, while the stone's value is itself the excuse and justification for the elaborate pains expended on its exhibition. From whichever point of view we approach the subject, we find it necessary to assume a primitive value and sense of attraction residing in jewels, and unless this is examined and analysed the treatment accorded will inevitably seem not quite satisfactory or exhaustive. It is, perhaps, a drawback to Mr. Clifford Smith's work that it does not attempt an explanation of this kind. Failing this, its chief attraction consists in its historical examination of the jeweller's art as practised by the races of antiquity and throughout the period of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance. To the latter two epochs full justice is done, but the same can scarcely be said of the Byzantine era, which is dismissed rather cursorily in four or five pages. This is a pity Byzantine jewellery is the result of the serious preoccupation of the Greek genius with this branch of art. The taste of classic Greece took another and more intellectual direction. It was not until the foundation of Constantinople as the capital of the Eastern Empire that Eastern ideals assumed, under Greek guidance, a paramount importance in art. Long previous to that date the Greek race had scattered and spread and settled throughout Asia Minor and the Near East, living the Oriental life and assimilating Oriental ideas. The rise of Constantine's capital was the opportunity for the expression of those ideas. Byzantine art, as this art of the Eastern Empire is called, is, in fact, an amalgamation of Oriental motive and Greek taste. The gorgeousness and splendour, the richness of material and of coloring which characterises that art are unmistakably Oriental; but the refined arrangement, the perfect adaptation of means to end, the invariable simplicity and coherence of the whole effect are the usual indication of the superintendence of Greek taste and Greek knowledge. Jewellery, though a minor branch of art, is, of course, one which has always played a great part in Eastern life; but Eastern jewellery, pure and simple, always suffers from the usual disfigurements of Eastern art; it is always, that is to say, overloaded and barbaric. In Byzantine jewellery alone we have the utmost splendour and richness united to a perfectly discriminating sense for effect. Precious stones and gems are freely used; repoussé, open-work, and filigree exhibit the rich quality of the material, and cloisonné inlay or enamel provides a means for the utmost splendour of coloring. But the discipline and control of all this material are much more remarkable than the material itself. The reader familiar with Byzantine mosaics and Byzantine sculpture must often have been struck with that knowledge of clear, simple, and telling effects which, equally with their pagan forefathers, these Greeks of the later Empire possessed. The same knowledge is shown in their manipulation of gems and jewellery. The patterns are so arranged, in tiny discs, each one showing clear as a star, or slender chains of delicate beading relieved by smooth bands, that not one atom of enrichment is lost sight of or fails to make its full value felt. The consummate workmanship, but, far more, the consummate knowledge pertaining to Byzantine jewellery, gradually disappeared with the rise of the more barberous ideals of the Middle Ages, nor was that knowledge recaptured during the Renaissance. Nevertheless, this jewellery is the most perfect example that remains to us of this kind of art, and perhaps in the comprehension and closer study of it will be found the best hope for the development of the art in the future.

A DICTIONARY OF THE GOSPELS.*

Dr. Hastings has issued this second volume of his new dictionary with commendable promptitude. It sets out to be a preacher's dictionary, written by preachers for preachers, and, therefore, like a true book of children's stories, it cannot be criticised adequately except by the audience for whom it is designed. Their verdict is the only final one. The proper test of this dictionary will be found in the clergyman's study. If it serves the special and practical purposes of the preacher, its success is assured, no matter what any extra-clerical reviewer may choose to assert. But we should imagine that there can be very little doubt as to the reception of this dictionary. It has many merits. For one thing, it is competently edited. The editor's choice of contributors is perhaps more catholic than judicious; he has been more hospitable than discriminating. The index, too, might have been improved and enlarged with advantage. It is impossible, for example, to discover what articles any given contributor has written. But these are minor defects, which leave the excellence of the work unimpaired. Dr. Hastings claims to have included not only the contents of the four canonical gospels, but "every aspect of modern life, in so far as it touches, or is touched, by Christ." A perusal of the dictionary shows that in the main he has justified this claim, although, naturally, the treatment varies in thoroughness and precision. It would be an excellent thing for the clergy if they mastered the contents of this dictionary; an excellent thing, also, for the laity, who might have less to suffer in Sabbatical hours at the hands, or rather the lips, of their spiritual advisers.

To select individual contributions for notice is a trifle invidious, but among the more striking articles in this volume are several by Principal J. G. Simpson of Leeds, Mr. G. H. Box, Dr. John Kelman, Professor Souter of Oxford, Mr. G. Wauchope Stewart ("Love," "Oath," and "Originality"), Mr. A. N. Rowland ("Personality," "Religion"), and Dr. J. C. Lambert, one of the assistant editors. Dr. Lambert's work is uniformly careful and unpretentious. Mr. Box, who writes the article on the Virgin Birth, sums up as follows: "When subjected to the criteria properly applicable to it, such a tradition would seem to possess high claims to historical credibility." He thinks that the Lukan narrative "contains more original material" than the Matthaean, which is the reverse of the ordinary critical opinion. But the temper and method of the discussion are sound, whatever may be thought of its conclusions. Professor Bacon writes freshly upon "Logia," and Professor McFadyen's discussion of "Psalms" is in line with the best traditions of New Testament scholarship. The "Teaching of Jesus" is estimated by Dr. Vernon Bartlet, who has a strangely high opinion of Wendt's "Lehre Jesu" and Latham's "Pastor Pastorum." Owing to the incidence of the alphabet, the passion week of Jesus receives very elaborate treatment by a number of writers, and the various articles on this topic, as well as on the Eucharist, form one of the most valuable contributions to the whole volume. Unfortunately, the same praise cannot be given to a number of the critical articles. Mr. A. E. Burn's on "The Magnificat," and Professor Cooper's on the "Nunc Dimittis" are not adequate, and it would be scarcely unjust to call them rather disappointing. These happen to represent the more conservative side of the dictionary, but it is not their conservatism which provokes unfavorable comment; Professor James Orr and Dr. Geerhardus are equally conservative, yet their contributions show a thoroughgoing method which some of their colleagues fail to practise. Thus a number of the minor articles—e.g., on "Lazarus," "Mediator," "Pentecost," and "Pre-existence"—do little more than scratch the surface of problems common to faith and criticism alike. The bibliographies, too, might have been improved, with rare exceptions. Perhaps the least satisfactory of all the articles, when one considers its subject and size, is the last, by Canon Sanday on "Paul."

It would not be fair, however, to Dr. Hastings and his coadjutors to occupy more space with a chronicle of the shortcomings which are inseparable from any extensive undertaking such as a dictionary of this kind. The hits outnumber the misses. Taken as a whole, the dictionary will answer its purpose admirably. Few preachers will turn over its pages without gaining both instruction and impetus for their work, and, were it only for the impressive article on "Preaching Christ," by Professor James Denney, this volume would deserve the gratitude of the Christian Church. Professor Denney's paragraphs will not command universal agreement. They may prove strong meat for some. But no finer illustration could be forthcoming of the temper in which faith and criticism may be blended. Here we have the scholar and the preacher in one, and on a high level. The intensity of conviction which throbs through the article, and, indeed, through all the articles which this author has contributed to the Dictionary, is nothing less than a moral tonic for the Christian reader.

* "A Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels." Edited by Jas. Hastings, D.D. Vol. II. Labour—Zion. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. 21s. net.

A SINGER ON HIS ART.*

Sir Charles Santley's "The Art of Singing and Vocal Declamation" (Macmillan & Co.) is a straightforward, bluff, and sensible account of the great baritone's vocal faith. The little book is probably intended for students of singing, and if they catch its spirit they will have learned much; but, apart from the hortatory character of the volume, there is a deal of interest in Sir Charles Santley's opinions. Even in the introduction a most important point is made. Having pointed out that the exercise of scales, solfeggi, &c., is necessary for the singing of modern compositions, if only for the object of "equalising the quality and power of the voice, and of preserving it intact until age destroys its charm," Sir Charles Santley proclaims a fact that cannot be too often proclaimed: that florid music was not introduced to "show off" the technical ability of the singer. "The fioriture is a great assistance to declamation, whether in serious or comic music." The gradual and other music books used in the Roman Church abound in fioriture, and they "surely could not have been written to 'show off' the technical ability of the monks or priests whose office it was to sing them, but by holding the ear in suspense with attractive sound, to intensify the declamation of the text." Sir Charles Santley might have cited the example of Farinelli, who, from being an extraordinary virtuoso of singing, became a most superior artist, combining both styles so that he moved his audiences to tears. And then, again, there is the example of Caffarelli.

It would be possible, too, to prove from contemporary writings that the great fioriture singers of the middle of the eighteenth century were by no means mere mechanical virtuosi. Farinelli, Caffarelli, and Vittoria Tesi could do wonderful things with their voices, in comparison with which Tetrazzini's trill on a D in altissimo is as nothing; but what we forget now is that the florid singing of the eighteenth century was considered a natural style of expression. It moved audiences to frenzied excitement, and drew tears from their sensible eighteenth-century eyes. This could be done by no mechanical perfection alone. A clarinet or a flute can execute embellishments which are beyond the powers of a voice, but these wind instruments leave one quite cold. There is nothing in music made by instruments to be compared with the timbre of the human voice. When we want to praise the tone of a violinist, we say that he makes his instrument sing, and that is the highest praise we can give him; but even an Ysaye cannot make his violin quite human. The quality which was particularly admired in these great eighteenth century singers was the expression with which they sang the fioriture fashionable at the time. That expression gave it a human significance. Later on, when another style of music had come into being, and the florid embellishment lingered as a mere excrescence, a period of decadence set in, until nowadays we make a special class of coloratura singers, and do not expect anything else from them. We do not even understand how this florid music should be sung, for if it be only done equally and roundly we are satisfied. The ideal is now that the voice in such music should be as reliable and as steady as an instrument, and of this mechanical perfection Melba is our living example.

* "The Art of Singing and Vocal Declamation." By Sir Charles Santley. Macmillan. 3s. 6d. net.

Tetrazzini's art, with all its imperfections, is more in the style of the eighteenth century, as far as may be gathered from contemporary records, because the new singer does put human expression into her fioriture. Then Sir Charles Santley himself is an example. To hear him sing the runs in a Handelian air with proper emphasis and dramatic expression is to understand why that artificial type of music did not seem artificial to the eighteenth century amateur of music.

The practical use of florid exercises and so forth for modern singing is unquestionable, and Sir Charles Santley has done well to insist on the necessity of these exercises. The dearth of great Wagnerian artists to-day is entirely due to their training not having been received in the Italian school. The artists who first made their name in Wagner's music dramas had been accustomed to sing in the Italian style, and it is only of recent years that the curious type of singer who is hailed as an "artist" because he cannot sing has come into existence. No doubt the excellent singing in the performances of the "Ring" in English was due to the fact that our native singers had been trained in the Italian style.

Sir Charles Santley is properly severe on the pseudo-scientific teaching, which is so rampant nowadays. Sometimes a "professor" of this art goes too far in his quackery, as a recent case in the Law Courts proved; but in general there is too much confusion between the physical means by which a vocal effect is obtained and the vocal effect itself. You cannot teach a good style of batting by learned disquisition on the muscles which are brought into play. There are certain positions of the body which have been found best for certain strokes, but the proclaiming of the anatomical reasons for this does not help. All teaching of arts which have a physical basis is best done by imitation and by concentration on the desired effect. Thus, you cannot train a painter by giving him an account of the nervous system by which his eye, brain, and hand may be brought into close accord. Yet that is attempted by many modern professors of singing. Sir Charles Santley stoutly tilts against this pseudo-scientific method of teaching singing. Santley was a pupil of Manuel Garcia's and a friend while he lived, but in all the conversation between the two never a word was said "about larynx or pharynx, glottis or any other organ used in the production or emission of the voice." Garcia had the knowledge, but he did not parade it before his pupils. "My experience tells me," writes Sir Charles Santley, "that the less pupils know about the construction of the vocal organs the better; in fact, as I heard a master once remark, 'better they should not be aware they had throats except for the purpose of swallowing their food.'" More particular hints on singing are scattered up and down this informal little book, and a chapter on the "study of vocal works" is especially valuable, for it lays stress on the proper pronunciation of words, and contains some commonsense remarks on the mystery of breathing, which, the author says, is no mystery at all. Care is required "in arranging convenient and appropriate places to take breath, and in practising speech or song accordingly." Indeed, the student will find no short cut to perfection advocated in "The Art of Singing," but much sound and sensible advice, which has its special value in coming from an artist who has preserved his style and power of pleasing even to his seventy-fourth year.

THE GENIUS OF MR. CONRAD.*

While a "Times" critic has patriotically declared that Mr. Conrad's stories are "characteristically English by virtue of the humour that plays all about them and through them," another English critic has hazarded the suggestion that had "Mr. Conrad remained a Polish writer he might —who knows?—have given us novels to compare with 'On the Eve' and 'Virgin Soil,'" and has deplored that the author should have become denationalised and have written his books in English instead of in Polish. Both these criticisms, though complimentary to Mr. Conrad's powers, go wide of the main point—that it is impossible for a writer of genius to denationalise his spirit. Mr. Conrad's rare gifts may, indeed, have been fertilised by his cosmopolitan life, and have fructified through their transplantation into English soil, but anything less English than his ironic, tender, and sombre vision of life it would be hard to find. In fact, the "humour that plays about his stories" is essentially Slav in its ironic acceptance of the pathetic futility of human nature, and quite un-English in its refinement of tender, critical malice. No doubt Poland lost much when this writer, who has literature in his blood, cast in his lot with our merchantmen and sailed to the ends of the earth in English ships; but what is of especial interest to the critic is that he has been a liberating force to our English insularity. The horizon of his human valuations is not bounded by the special illusions our English society cherishes, and yet none of our writers have paid so impartial, so fair a tribute to the integrity of the Englishman on active service, and the straightness of our English rule overseas. Mr. Conrad, indeed, has a special affection for the Englishman's bluff code, practical creed, and simplicity of outlook; but let us not presume on this, or conclude on such slender evidence that his stories are "characteristically English," for they are nothing of the kind. They are Continental in their literary affinities, Slav in their psychological insight, and Polish in their haunting and melancholy cadence, and in their preference for dwelling on the minor. Let the reader consider the following example of Mr. Conrad's unflinching and sympathetic irony which bathes the little scene in an atmosphere remote from any to be found in literature on this side of the Channel:—

> On his twenty-fifth birthday two of his friends in the repairing shop where he worked proposed to stand him a dinner. He was immensely touched by their attention.
>
> "I am a steady man," he remarked, "but I am not less sociable than anybody."
>
> The entertainment came off in a little café on the Boulevard de la Chapelle. At dinner they drank some special wine. It was excellent. Everything was excellent; and the world—in his own words—seemed a very good place to live in. He had good prospects, some little money laid by, and the affection of two excellent friends. He offered to pay for all the drinks after dinner, which was only proper on his part.
>
> They drank more wine; they drank liqueurs, cognac, beer, then more liqueurs and more cognac. Two strangers sitting at the next table looked at him, he said, with so much friendliness that he invited them to join the party.
>
> He had never drunk so much in his life. His elation was extreme, and so pleasurable that whenever it flagged he hastened to order more drinks.
>
> "It seemed to me," he said in his quiet tone, and looking on the ground in the gloomy shed full of shadows, "that I was on the point of just attaining a great and wonderful felicity. Another drink, I felt, would do it. The others were holding out well with me, glass for glass."
>
> But an extraordinary thing happened. At something the strangers said his elation fell. Gloomy ideas—des idées noires—rushed into his head. All the world outside the café appeared to him as a dismal, evil place, where a multitude of poor wretches had to work and slave to the sole end that a few individuals should ride in carriages and live riotously in palaces. He became ashamed of his happiness. The pity of mankind's cruel lot wrung his heart. In a voice choked with sorrow he tried to express these sentiments. He thinks he wept and swore in turns.
>
> The two new acquaintances hastened to applaud his humane indignation. Yes. The amount of injustice in the world was indeed scandalous. There was only one way of dealing with the rotten state of society. Demolish the whole sacrée boutique. Blow up the whole iniquitous show.
>
> Their heads hovered over the table. They whispered to him eloquently; I don't think they quite expected the result. He was extremely drunk—mad drunk. With a howl of rage he leaped suddenly upon the table. Kicking over the bottles and glasses he yelled: "Vive l'anarchie! Death to the capitalists!" He yelled this again and again. All round him broken glass was falling, chairs were being swung in the air, people were taking each other by the throat. The police dashed in. He hit, bit, scratched, and struggled, till something crashed down upon his head. . . .
>
> He came to himself in a police cell, locked up on a charge of assault, seditious cries, and anarchist propaganda.
>
> He looked at me fixedly with his liquid, shining eyes, that seemed very big in the dim light.
>
> "That was bad, but even then I might have got off somehow, perhaps," he said, slowly.
>
> I doubt it. But whatever chance he had was done away with by a young Socialist lawyer who volunteered to undertake his defence. In vain he assured him that he was no anarchist; that he was a quiet respectable mechanic, only too anxious to work ten hours a day at his trade. He was represented at the trial as a victim of society, and his drunken shoutings as the expression of infinite suffering. The young lawyer had his way to make, and this case was just what he

* "A Set of Six." By Joseph Conrad. Methuen. 6s.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR

CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY.

EVERY FRIDAY, 2d.

PUBLIC OPINION

EDITED BY

PERCY L. PARKER.

¶ "Public Opinion" provides the busy man with a lucid summary of what is happening in the different fields of human activity and focusses within reasonable compass something of that teeming interest which comes from being in touch with many phases of life.

Dr. W. H. FITCHETT says:—

"Most interesting and valuable; a matchless bit of journalistic work."

Sir HUBERT VON HERKOMER says:—

"Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise."

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum.

SPECIMEN FREE ON APPLICATION.

31 and 32, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

Concerning Lafcadio Hearn.

By G. M. GOULD, M.D.

With 5 Illustrations. Price 8s. 6d. net.

An appreciation of Hearn's personality and work, presenting him in aspects which have hitherto received little attention.

The History of Co-Operation.

By GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

Illustrated. Popular Edition in One Volume.

7s. 6d. net.

"No other historian could have given us the story of the progress of co-operation in the way that Mr. Holyoake has done. Few can read the volume without being deeply interested."—Nation.

Democracy and Reaction.

By L. T. HOBHOUSE.

Cheap Edition. Crown 8vo. Paper Covers.

1s. net.

"The whole strain of Mr. Hobhouse's argument is positive and constructive and though he has the high merit of being an idealist, he has long been a close, exact, and direct observer of working politics from day to day."—LORD MORLEY in The Nineteenth Century.

A New "Handy Andy."

"PATSY"

By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE.

Author of "The Blue Lagoon."

6s.

FIRST REVIEW.

"'Patsy' is a rollicking story full of high spirits and fun. . . . A book of real humour."—Daily Express.

"PATSY"

The New Novel by the author of "THE BLUE LAGOON" is on sale at all Booksellers. Price 6s.

T. FISHER UNWIN. LONDON.

wanted for a start. The speech for the defence was pronounced magnificent.

The poor fellow paused, swallowed, and brought out the statement:—

"I got the maximum penalty applicable to a first offence."

I made an appropriate murmur. He hung his head and folded his arms.

The passage above cited is taken from "The Anarchist," a little story which is a gem of Mr. Conrad's art, and, indeed, an admirable illustration of our "cosmopolitan and friendless" author's talent for finding himself at home wherever his human material gives him scope for his ironical, picturesque observation of men. Give Mr. Conrad an aged cabman and a bony, disillusioned horse, and he will invest this prosaic subject (as he has done in "The Secret Agent") with a depth of human significance as arresting as Rembrandt's treatment of a group of beggars. Give him an advertisement of the B.O.S. Meat Extract Manufacturing Co., Limited, and his cosmopolitan vision transports us straightway to the Manaña cattle estancia in a South American estuary, where Mr. Harry Gee, the Americanised manager, collides with our unfortunate soi-disant Anarchist, the victim of a Parisian law court, who had managed to escape, by favoring fortune, from the convict settlement at Cayenne. The end of the story has that poetic cadence on the minor strings which, as we have noted, is part and parcel of our author's birthright. It is simple and ironically profound, is this poor Anarchist's refusal to return to Europe and to "them," which means the "victims of society" who were ready to "stick their comrade like a pig."

Four of the stories in "A Set of Six" are not studies on which the artist probably sets any high value, though all of them, if published anonymously, would betray themselves to the connoisseur's eye as indubitable Conrads. The least successful is "The Informer," another study of an Anarchist milieu, and we attribute its failure to the three chief characters—X, the great publicist conspirator and active inspirer of secret societies; Comrade Sevrin, "the most persistent, dangerous, craftiest, and systematic of informers"; and the girl Anarchist, with whom he is in love, not acting true to type, but being plausibly brought together for the purpose of the story. Much better is "The Brute," a tale of a mad ship, "the most evil-minded, underhand, savage brute that ever went afloat," who invariably kills somebody every voyage she makes. The narrator, a seaman, justifies his charge of insanity against the "Apse Family" by the terror she inspired among her crew whenever she broke loose, till finally she "overreaches herself in her last little game," and goes ashore off the Cape. The first story, "Gaspar Riuiz," a study of a heroic figure, "a strong man who perished through his strength" in one of the South American wars of liberation, though admirable in its character sketches, is lacking in subtlety of atmosphere; but this criticism does not apply to "The Duel," which is a masterpiece of style—a story which, in the unerring delicacy of its artistic strokes, is worthy of Turgenev. Mr. Conrad's serene impartiality, his mordant humour, his special faculty of depicting the change and movement of life, flowing on even while it arrests us with some sharply stamped aspect, then gliding away to form anew some strangely significant episode—all his rare qualities unite happily in "The Duel" to produce a perfect whole. The description of the first duel in Lieut. Feraud's garden (pp. 192, 193), the scene of Fouché's reception, in his Ministerial Cabinet, of General Baron D'Hubert (p. 240), and of the final duel in the pine wood between the exasperated adversaries, show the precision of a master's hand. So faultless is this story that indeed it creates the tests by which the companion stories reveal the nature of their achievement.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"The Trout-Waters of England," by Mr. W. M. Gallichan (T. N. Foulis, 2s. net), is designed to meet the needs of those, a constantly increasing class, who are anxious to catch trout, but are not sure where to seek them. It will be found serviceable. It dispels the general impression that there are hardly any good waters in England accessible to the public. Mr. Gallichan shows that there are scores of well-stocked streams and a few lakes on which one is free to fish, either on no consideration at all or on terms which are easily complied with. In fact, it is with these practically open waters, rather than with the trout waters as a whole, that his little book is concerned. He tells where they are, what sport each of them may be expected to yield, and in what hotels or farmhouses lodgings can be found. Our impression is that he does not exaggerate the fortune which anywhere awaits the angler. Not a few of the waters are known to himself, and his information as to the others has been obtained from persons who seem to be trustworthy. Like many an angler, Mr. Gallichan is prone to speak of the trout here or there as being "educated." By this he means that long familiarity with flies or other lures has made them cunning and difficult to entice. This is a facile assumption in favor of which there is no unquestionable evidence. Think of it in relation to Lochleven. For fifty or sixty years that splendid lake has been more severely whipped with flies and raked with minnows than any other water in the world. If trout can be "educated," surely, then, it is there that we should find education at its highest; surely, indeed, it should by this time be almost impossible to catch a Lochleven trout at all? This season, however, more trout have been taken from Lochleven than were caught in any other season on record. Nevertheless, one is not ill-pleased with Mr. Gallichan's work, which, whilst questionable as regards some of its incidental assumptions, is in its main purpose an honest guide.

* * *

The itinerary of Mr. Paul Waineman's "Summer Tour in Finland" (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net), was far more comprehensive than that followed by Mr. A. M. Scott in his "Through Finland to St. Petersburg," recently reviewed in these columns. Starting from Helsingfors, Mr. Waineman journeyed along the south coast as far as Viborg, thence ascended the Saima Canal and reached Imctra, famous for its falls; found his way by a zigzag route through Sordavala and Nyslott to Kuopio, then northwards to Uleaborg and Tornea at the top of the Gulf of Bothnia, whence he swooped southwards to Tammerfors, the Manchester of Finland, and to Abo, its former capital, finishing at Hango, the port of departure for Hull. The record of his experiences would, however, have read better had he told us of fewer things and arranged the order of their telling more carefully. What he gives us is really a collection of wayside notes and random impressions, thrown together without much regard to literary construction—a narrative in which the interesting description and curiously commonplace observation jostle each other. His impressions of the exciting journey down the Ulea cataracts, and of Finnish scenery in general, and his information as to the marriage and other customs of the country are excellent; while he tells us much that is useful about Osterbotten, the northern province which is far less familiar to travellers than is Southern Finland. But elsewhere the helter-skelter style, burdened with allusions to "buxom, bare-footed maids" and old woman faces "that Rembrandt would have painted," suggests the need of compression and elimination. We point out these failings, not because the book is not interesting in spite of them, but because it might have been much more so without them. Finland is a country of great and comparatively unexplored charm. Mr. Waineman has had exceptional facilities for studying it, for he is not merely a summer tourist; he has lived in the country in and out of season, and can hardly have failed to penetrate the surface of its character and social life. We feel, therefore, that he might have made more of his material. The book, however, is a pleasant enough production, and is very prettily illustrated by Mr. Alexander Federley's drawings and by many photographs of excellent quality.

* * *

"Samples of a great county, rich in many things, and of a people brave, courteous, and hospitable," is the description applied to "My Devonshire Book" (the Western Morning News Co., 3s. 6d. net), by its author, Mr. J. Henry Harris, and it fits this entertaining work. Open

THE AUTHORITATIVE WORK ON THE BRAIN.

EDUCATION, PERSONALITY, AND CRIME.

By ALBERT WILSON, M.D.

With about 100 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

Dr. Albert Wilson's important work has been received by the press, the experts, and the thoughtful public generally with a chorus of praise as befitting the magnitude of the work and the authority of the writer. The book should find a place in the library of every Doctor, Clergyman, Social Reformer, Justice of the Peace, in fact all who have the social welfare of the community at heart.

Bright Fiction for Holiday Readers

BEAU BROCADE	BARONESS ORCZY. 6s.
THE CARDINAL AND LADY SUSAN.	LUCAS CLEEVE. 6s.
ROLLIN STONE	ERNEST SUFFLING. 6s.
THE MEETING OF THE WAYS ...	J. D. BAXTER. 6s.
A SUBURBAN SCANDAL ..	GURNER GILLMAN. 6s.
THE AVA MINING SYNDICATE ...	CECIL LOWIS. 6s.
MRS. FITZMAURICE ON LEAVE	GABRIELLE FITZMAURICE. 3s. 6d.
THE PRODIGAL CITY ..	TRISTAM COUTTS. 6s.
BRENDAVALE	... E. BLACK. 6s.
ZOE'S REVENGE	.. M. Y. HALIDOM. 6s.
WORKERS IN DARKNESS	HARRIS BURLAND. 6s.
GOD IN SAN DAM	F. BLOUNT MOTT. 6s.
HEATHER O' THE RIVERS	W. HAROLD THOMSON. 6s.
ROSE CAMPION'S PLATONIC	ADAM LILBURN. 6s.
THE MYSTERIOUS ABDUCTION	G. S. GOODMAN. 6s.
SEMIRAMIS	... EDWARD PEPLE. 6s.

When Bound for Your Favourite Resort

ASK AT THE STATION BOOKSTALL FOR

GREENING'S SHILLING SERIES

Strongly recommended to holiday-makers as they are bound in a neat cloth style and of handy size for slipping into the pocket. Only works of undeniable merit find a place in this series.

THE SCARLET PIMPERNEL. BARONESS ORCZY.
I WILL REPAY. BARONESS ORCZY.
A SON OF THE PEOPLE. BARONESS ORCZY.
FROM THE BOOK BEAUTIFUL. GUY THORNE.
SEEN AND UNSEEN. E. KATHERINE BATES.
THE DEGRADATION OF GEOFFREY ALWITH. MORLEY ROBERTS.
OSCAR WILDE. The Story of an Unhappy Friendship. ROBERT H. SHERARD.
PORTALONE. C. RANGER GULL.

The Publishers have just added to the above series

THE DUPE. By GERALD BISS.

of whom the "Daily Telegraph" said: "Guy Boothby never wrote with a more vigorous abandon."

TO SUFFRAGETTES AND OTHERS.

THE VICTIM AND THE VOTERY,

By WILLIAM CAINE.

Should be read by those who approve and those who disapprove of the "Votes for Women" cult, as it will furnish shrieks of laughter for the scornful, and even raise a smile on the face of the most advanced Suffragette.

Price One Shilling net. Paper Wrapper.

No One Visiting Cornwall should be without

FROM ST. IVES TO LAND'S END,

written by MR. A. G. FOLLIOTT-STOKES, and containing map and twenty-two photographic illustrations.

To be had at all booksellers and railway bookstalls. 1s. net.

GREENING & CO., Ltd., 91, St. Martin's ane, W.C.

THE CASE FOR FREE TRADE

is being pithily put from day to day in

"THE DAILY NEWS"

by

L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P.,

under the title

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE.

EVERY DAY
ONE POINT.

All who wish to have ready to hand an apt reply for the Tariff Reformer should watch this series in

"THE DAILY NEWS"

daily.

A NEW

"F.C.G." Froissart.

The "WESTMINSTER GAZETTE" is continuing at intervals throughout August, the publication of

"F.C.G.'S" MODERN FROISSART,

describing in quaint mediaeval phraseology and with illustrations founded upon fourteenth century examples, the principal political events from the end of 1902 up to and including the General Election of 1906.

The story of the events familiar to us all in our recent history will be told as if written by Sir John Froissart himself, and, although a good deal of humour is introduced both in the text and the pictures, the narrative will be an interesting record of actual events. The Weekly Editions* of will contain the chapters published during each current week. The first chapter appeared in the "Westminster Gazette" dated July 29th. Back numbers containing the series can be obtained on application to the Publisher.

The "WESTMINSTER GAZETTE"

* THE SATURDAY WESTMINSTER.

Offices: WESTMINSTER GAZETTE, Tudor St., London, E.C.

BOOKS WANTED, 25s. Each Offered.—Brewer's Henry VIII., 2 vols., 1884. Burke's Armoury and Extinct Peerage, 1883. Borrow's Wild Wales, 3 vols., 1862. Eliot's Scenes of Clerical Life, 1st edition, 2 vols., 1858. Jerrold's Men of Character, 3 vols., 1838. Alice in Wonderland, 1865 or 1866. Stevenson's Edinburgh, 1879. Desperate Remedies, 3 vols., 1871. Churchill's Poems, 3 vols., 1844. Symond's Italian Literature, 2 vols., 1881. Swinburne's Atalanta, white cloth, 1865. Lorna Doone, 3 vols., 1869. James's Painters and their Work, 3 vols. Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863. Jackson's Old Paris, 2 vols., 1878. Freer's Last Decade, 2 vols., 1863. 100,000 books for sale and wanted. Please state wants.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

the volume where you will, and you will find bits of pleasant information—a piece of history, an anecdote, an example of native humour, a "pixie" story, or the expression of a prettily adoring sentiment. Mr. Harris has written much about the West Country, and he knows and loves it, as it was known and loved by Kingsley and Blackmore before him. He has, moreover, a whimsical turn of style and a store of humour. Between the Celt of Cornwall and the Saxon of Devonshire he draws a sharp distinction, while admitting that inter-marriage between natives of the two countries has done much to obliterate it; in the fusion of the two sets of characteristics he discovers perfection. All the principal towns in Devonshire are touched upon. In each he finds some quality that its neighbours do not possess. His estimate of the Devonian character, compounded of honesty and "slimness," of pride of place and tenaciousness of purpose, of love of sport, of Protestantism and Pagan superstitions, is probably as correct as any that could be made. The book is illustrated by thirty photographs, titled by quotations from the text—a plan that is not always happy in its results. Thus to label a very ordinary picture of Teignmouth, with its ugly, ultra-modern jetty the most conspicuous feature, "There have been romances on this water," is to invite ribald remark. But the text shows humour enough to balance the slight want of it in the naming of the illustrations.

* * *

"We are not all alike, and we never shall be, and with regard to food, though wide principles apply to all, we differ greatly when it comes to details." This sentence occurs in Miss Alice Braithwaite's "Plainer Fare and Less of It" (Richard R. James, 3s. 6d. net), and its truth is one that the average reader will do well to bear in mind while he is digesting mentally the rules for an improved physical digestion that the book lays down. Her counsels are largely based on the Buddhist philosophy of food, and their keynote seems to us to be contained in the second part of her title rather than in the first, which is to say that she preaches temperance in any diet that may be selected rather than exclusive devotion to a particular one. She supports, of course, the growing tendency to vegetarianism; but she is neither a rabid vegetarian nor a fruitarian, and to certain modern fads, greatly overdone, if not mischievous in themselves, she is strongly opposed. She reminds us that bread still deserves its reputation as the staff of life. Tea and coffee are banned as being little better, if more respectable, than alcohol. Her plan for the simple life, in which health, strength, and activity are combined with tranquillity of mind, is based on a two-meal day, assuming that no patient is willing to restrict himself to one. Needless to say, the custom that prescribes a late dinner is disregarded. The list of plain fare recipes at the end of the volume should be useful to reforming housekeepers.

* * *

In describing his long walk "From St. Ives to Land's End" (Greening, 1s. net) Mr. A. G. Folliott Stokes gently takes previous writers on the Cornish scenery to task for clinging to too frequented paths, and thereby missing much that is worthy of notice. His own route lay, broadly speaking, along the north coast of the Duchy, with occasional divergences into the interior, and his claim is that on the journey, as he made it, from St. Ives to Zennor, hence to Morvah and Land's End, one finds interests as absorbing as any encountered on the southern and more popular ways. However this may be, the pretty descriptive gift that served him so well in "A Moorland Princess" is here turned to the making of a very interesting nature ramble round and about the moors and dales, the tors and cromlechs and granite promontories of the country. He gives us a little bit of everything in his text, and includes a sketch of the fishing industry at St. Ives—from the pictorial standpoint—and instructions for skinning adders, a home-made map, and lists of flowers, birds, animals, and reptiles noted on the road. The book, which is not too long, is copiously illustrated by Mr. J. C. Douglas's photographs.

The Week in the City.

THE MOVEMENT OF LEADING STOCKS.

	Price Friday Morning, Aug. 14.		Price Friday Morning, Aug. 21.
Consols 2½ per cent.	86⅝	...	86⅝
German 3 per cent.	83	...	83¼
London and North Western	134¾	...	132½
Union Pacific	162¼	...	159¾
Canadian-Pacific...	176¾	...	175¾
Rand Mines	6 1/32	...	6 17/32

Everything has been very quiet, for nearly everybody who counts is holiday-making. Perhaps the most satisfactory thing to be recorded is the impression that seems to be gaining ground of a recovery in trade. The returns of pauperism and unemployment, which had been getting worse for some months, are improving again. A bumper harvest in Canada now looks like a certainty, and the rains in India have been so good and general that excellent crops seem to be certain. Excluding India, the world's harvest may only be an average one, and wheat prices may not fall very much lower, as stocks are light. But bread is pretty sure to be a good deal cheaper in the coming autumn and winter than it was last year. The United States are beginning to import more, and the heavy exports from Canada which must soon begin promise a revival in the shipping trade. Even South Africa is looking up, and the mining markets have been quite active. The Stock Markets have been fairly firm, and money is still as cheap or cheaper than ever. There is no expectation of any severe stringency in the autumn.

The American Market.

The buoyancy of the American market has been so remarkable that it cannot be entirely a matter of manipulation by the "derrickers" of whom we have heard so much. Let us see how it appears to a shrewd market operator on the other side:—

> "Under the influence of easy money, improving business prospects, a good harvest, and powerful inside support, prices have climbed to a still higher level. The advance has probably been more than conditions really warranted; but the market is in the control of a combination of unusually powerful operators, and as their interests are best served by an advancing market, it is but natural that they use their power to the utmost limit. But the most skilful manipulation could not have engineered a rise such as has taken place since last November unless there was some good foundation."

Here are some of the favorable influences. In the first place, the panic is far behind. Prices then fell much below intrinsic values because of extreme demoralisation, "and, unless history fails to repeat itself, they are likely to react above intrinsic values, because the pendulum invariably swings back violently before resuming its normal movements to and fro." Now that the storm is over, the financial atmosphere has cleared, and the commercial recovery has begun. There were no signs of general overproduction, such as prolonged the depression which followed the panic of 1893, and in many lines of merchandise there was a positive scarcity, particularly in agricultural products. The gaps have to be filled up, and, in the West at any rate, there is plenty of money and confidence. Probably the low rates of interest are the most important factor of all.

Foreign Bonds.

The demand for Foreign Government stocks is constant, and Japanese loans seem to be coming into fashion again, owing to a belief that the new Cabinet will make further reductions in military and naval expenditure. German credit stands to gain if a naval agreement goes through, and the various State loans are being freely bought in Switzerland and the Low Countries. But the supply is so large that a four per cent. investment may be possible for some time longer. Among speculative stocks Guatemala has been favored, probably because President Cabrera has just amnestied his political opponents. Turkey, on the other hand, is rather under a cloud. The bondholders are mainly German and French, and in Germany the Young Turks are regarded with much suspicion. Whether the bondholders will suffer or not depends partly upon the maintenance of the Debt Council, which is the one respectable fiscal authority in Turkey.

Lucellum.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

ONE & ALL SEEDS

THE BRAND GUARANTEES ONE & ALL QUALITY.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

ONE & ALL SEEDS are reliable, pure, and guaranteed.

Each packet is dated with the year of issue.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS are complete Manures.

All are supplied in small quantities at reasonable prices.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Choice Varieties of Sweet Peas, with an Original Pamphlet on their Culture, by Richard Dean, V.M.H.—viz., Dorothy Eckford, white; Hon. Mrs. Kenyon, yellow; Prima Donna, soft pink; King Edward VII., crimson; Miss Wilmott, rich deep orange pink; Mrs. Walter Wright, mauve; Prince of Wales, fine rose; Duchess of Westminster, violet purple; Othello, deep maroon; Lady Grisel Hamilton, pale lavender; Duke of Westminster, purple; Navy Blue.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Annuals.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Perennials and Biennials.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables for Saladings.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables.

One & All Collection of Choicest Asters in 10 Varieties—2s. 6d. Giant Comet, white; Giant Comet, The Bride, white; Giant Comet, rose; Giant Comet, azure blue; Giant Comet, dark violet; Mixed Dwarf Chrysanthemum; Finest Mixed Bouquet; Mixed Victoria; Mixed Paeony; Perfection; and Betteridge's Quilled in mixed colours.

One & All Fertiliser No. 24 for general garden purposes. Half-rod packets 6d. bags, 7 lbs., 2/3; 14 lbs., 3/6; 28 lbs., 5/9; 56 lbs., 10/6; 112 lbs., 20/- Carriage Paid.

ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, LIMITED. Name and address of nearest Local Agent, Illustrated Catalogues, and other details, sent free by post on application to EDWARD OWEN GREENING, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS

TANGYE OIL ENGINE

AUTOMATIC TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP EXCEPT FOR STARTING

TANGYES LTD BIRMINGHAM.

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

Liver troubles

SHOULD NEVER BE NEGLECTED.

The principal duty of the Liver is to extract the bile from the blood, and carry it direct to the digestive organs. Therefore, if the Liver is disordered, it cannot perform its duties properly, and the result is, the blood becomes overloaded with bile, which causes Lassitude, Debility, Irritability, and may develop Dropsy.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets

STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

will speedily and permanently cure all livery troubles, because they thoroughly cleanse the Liver of all impurities, and stimulate it to easily perform its functions in a natural healthy manner MERIT'S LIVERETS are prepared from purely vegetable ingredients only, as prescribed by a prominent physician, and have no debilitating effect upon the health. Price 1/1½ and 2/9 of all Chemists and Stores. If unable to obtain, send direct to

MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name MERIT'S LIVERETS, and the signature MERIT & Co., is on the package. So beware of spurious imitations.

THE INQUIRER

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF LIBERAL RELIGION

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS:

6/6 per year, to all parts of the World.

Published every Friday at

3, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

EDUCATIONAL.

University of Manchester,

Chancellor—The Right Hon. the Viscount MORLEY of BLACKBURN, O.M.
Vice-Chancellor—ALFRED HOPKINSON, K.C., M.A., LLD., B.C.L.
Registrar—EDWARD FIDDES, M.A.
Bursar—SYDNEY CHAFFERS, M.A.

The SESSION 1908-9 begins on the 6th October.

There are Eight Faculties in the University—Arts, Science, Law, Music, Commerce and Administration, Theology, Technology and Medicine—in all of which degrees are conferred. There are diplomas—Dentistry, Public Health, Veterinary, State Medicine, Engineering, Electrical Engineering, Mining, Applied Chemistry, and Technology. There are also a University Diploma and Certificate for Teachers. A large Training College, with Demonstration Schools, is associated with the University.

The Teaching Staff consists of 43 Professors and about 160 Lecturers, Assistants, and Demonstrators. A number of ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS are offered for competition annually in May.

There are special facilities for research, and Graduates of other Universities may study for research degrees, and are eligible for certain research Fellowships.

All degrees and all Departments of the University (except Engineering) are open to Women Students.

The Registrar will supply, on application, prospectuses of any of the above Faculties or of any of the following:—

Dental Department.
Department of Education.
Pharmaceutical Department.
Public Health Department.
Engineering Department.
Mining Department.
School of Architecture.
Fellowships, Scholarships, and Exhibitions.
Special, Popular, and Evening Courses.
University Extension Committee.
Advanced Studies in the Faculties of Arts and Science, and Technology.

The Examination Papers set at the last Entrance Scholarship Examination (price 6d.), those set at the last Degree and Diploma Examinations (price 1s.), and the University Calendar, 3s. (by post 3s. 5d.), may be obtained from Messrs. Sherratt & Hughes, 34, Cross-street, Manchester, and at 60, Chandos-street, London, W.C., or any bookseller.

BROMSGROVE SCHOOL, WORCESTERSHIRE.

AUTUMN TERM begins September 17th.
APPLY THE HEADMASTER.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,
R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.
Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

THE ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL.
Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields; gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Next Term, Sept. 18th. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

NEW BOYS ARRIVE SEPTEMBER 17TH, OTHERS 18TH.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE.

(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON).
The MICHAELMAS TERM BEGINS on OCTOBER 1st, 1908. The College prepares Students for the London Degrees in Science and Arts.
Twelve Entrance Scholarships, from £50 to £60 a year, and several Bursaries of not more than £30, tenable for three years, will be offered for Competition in June, 1909.
For further particulars, apply to the SECRETARY, Royal Holloway College, Englefield Green, Surrey.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.
Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.SC., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

BOOKSELLERS.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 93, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
[And at READING and GUILDFORD.]
MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.
Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.
School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'
BOOKSELLERS.
NEW AND SECOND-HAND.
All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)
Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.
A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.
PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS
Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

TOURS.

£6 6s. LUCERNE TOUR.

Nine days. Short Sea Route. No extras for Conductor or Gratuities.

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D.

5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. 25, Cannon Street, E.C.
4, Charing Cross, S.W. 84, Piccadilly, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son, Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 „ ... ... 6d. „

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.
BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott. Prop.

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor.

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop. J. E. Dowthwaite.

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Afternoon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties Catered for.

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

SWANAGE.
"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

READY ON AUGUST 27.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

HOLY ORDERS

(The Tragedy of a Quiet Life).

By MARIE CORELLI

The demand for Miss Corelli's New Novel is tremendous and though the first edition consists of 100,000 copies it is nearly exhausted, and a second edition is in the press.

Messrs. METHUEN have much pleasure in announcing that they have just published New Editions of Mr. KIPLING'S Four Famous Volumes of Verse. The Form is fcap. 8vo, and the books are bound in limp lambskin leather, with a special design. The four books are uniform with the similar Edition of Mr. Kipling's Prose Works, published by Messrs. Macmillan. The price is 5s. net each volume.

BARRACK-ROOM BALLADS.
DEPARTMENTAL DITTIES.

THE SEVEN SEAS.
THE FIVE NATIONS.

FICTION

ANTHONY CUTHBERT. By RICHARD BAGOT. Crown 8vo, 6s.

SPANISH GOLD. By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM. Crown 8vo, 6s.

MR. APOLLO: a Just Possible Story. By FORD MADOX HUEFFER. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE RESULT OF AN ACCIDENT. By BEATRICE WHITBY. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"Very delightful in every respect."—Liverpool Daily Post.
"A healthy, blameless, and simple-hearted tale."—Morning Leader.

A SET OF SIX. By JOSEPH CONRAD. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"A book for which one must be very grateful."—Daily Express.

THE SONG OF HYACINTH, and other Stories. By JOHN OXENHAM. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"The stories are always clever and entertaining."—Scotsman.

THE EASY-GO-LUCKIES; or, One Way of Living. By MAUD STEPNEY RAWSON. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"There is cleverness enough for half-a-dozen light novels in Mrs. Rawson's new story."—Manchester Guardian.

LOVE THE HARVESTER. By MAX PEMBERTON. With 8 Illustrations by FRANK DADD, R.I. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.
"It is a dainty story."—Evening Standard.
"An admirable companion in a rural saunter."—Globe.

THE SURPRISING HUSBAND. By RICHARD MARSH. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"Mr. Marsh has undoubtedly written a clever book."—Athenæum.
"The story is interesting and really powerful."—Morning Post.

HARDY-ON-THE-HILL. By M. E. FRANCIS. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"There is much to enjoy in Mrs. Blundell's novel."—Morning Post.
"The story well maintains our interest."—Westminster Gazette.

THE PASSION OF PAUL MARILLIER. By ADELINE SERGEANT. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"An excellent entertainment."—Westminster Gazette.

Forthcoming in September and October.

COUSIN CINDERELLA. By SARAH JEANNETTE DUNCAN.
HILL RISE. By W. B. MAXWELL.
ARNOUL THE ENGLISHMAN. By FRANCIS AVELING.
THE GREAT MISS DRIVER. By ANTHONY HOPE.
MIRAGE. By E. TEMPLE THURSTON.
THE SPIRIT OF REVOLT. By PHILIP GIBBS.
INTERPLAY. By BEATRICE HARRADEN.
A DAUGHTER OF FRANCE. By CONSTANCE MAUD.
THE HEART SMITER. By MARY E. MANN.
SALTHAVEN. By W. W. JACOBS.
OVER BEMERTON'S. By E. V. LUCAS.
THE WIND IN THE REEDS. By KENNETH GRAHAME.

GENERAL LITERATURE

GREAT RALEGH: being the Life and Times of Sir Walter Ralegh. By HUGH DE SELINCOURT. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
The life of Sir Walter Ralegh, soldier, author, statesman, courtier, explorer, illustrates in a remarkable manner the astounding vitality of the great time in which he lived. And in recording the romance of his career an attempt has been made to give a picture of the manners and mode of life, and an account of the great men who figured in it.

A GROUP OF SCOTTISH WOMEN. By Capt. HARRY GRAHAM. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
This book sketches the lives and characters of about a score of Scottish women, famous in the social, literary, or political world of a bygone age. Among those whose biographies are included in these pages are women of such widely different characters as Elizabeth, Duchess of Lauderdale, Lady Grisell Baillie, the martyrs of Covenanting days, Jane, Duchess of Gordon, Mrs. Grant of Laggan, etc.

THE LITTLE DAUPHIN. By CATHERINE WELCH. with 16 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.
Though the Dauphin, son of Marie Antoinette and Louis XVI., has been in France the subject of more than a thousand books, and his mysterious career has given a raison d'être for at least four monthly reviews, it is a remarkable fact that practically nothing has been written about him in England. In the present book there is given an account of his pampered childhood at the gorgeous Court of Versailles, of his cruel imprisonment at the Temple with that now legendary villain, the cobbler Simon.

THE HORSE IN HISTORY. By BASIL TOZER. With many Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.
Mr. Basil Tozer traces the Progress of that animal from very early times down to the present day. All the historic steeds come into the survey, and there are some interesting speculations as to the effect that the development of the horse has had upon the advancement of the human race.

A SUMMER TOUR IN FINLAND. By PAUL WAINEMAN. With 16 Illustrations in Color by ALEXANDER FEDERLEY, and 16 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
Mr. Paul Waineman who has recently completed a new tour of this country, has collected a mass of personal impressions of the people, land, and principal towns, from the wild scenery of the far north, where the peasant's hut is the most luxurious abode, to the old aristocratic homes in the South of Finland.

THE CAUSATION AND PREVENTION OF TUBERCULOSIS (CONSUMPTION). By ARTHUR NEWSHOLME, M.D., F.R.C.P. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

FRANCE SINCE WATERLOO. By W. GRINTON BERRY, M.A. With Illustrations and Maps. Crown 8vo, 6s.
The author of this book endeavours to tell, in a succinct and graphic narrative, the story of French history from the downfall of Napoleon to the present hour.

THE LORE OF THE HONEY BEE. By TICKNER EDWARDS. With 24 Illustrations from Original Photographs. Crown 8vo, 6s.
This is a history of bees and their masters, from the very earliest times down to the present. The wonderful communal life within the hive is touched on in all its varying aspects.

THE YOUNG BOTANIST. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S., and C. S. COOPER, F.R.H.S. With 8 Coloured Plates and 63 in Black and White, by C. F. NEWALL. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
In an original and concise manner the book sets out in tabular form full accounts of all the commoner British wild plants, their English and Latin names, where they grow and when they bloom, their form and structure, salient features, medicinal uses, &c.

JAMES II. AND HIS WIVES. By ALLAN FEA. With 40 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
The writer (avoiding politics as far as possible) shows James II. as he was, with all his failings. Certainly his picturesque and dramatic surroundings, not to mention his misfortunes, make him one of the most interesting characters of the seventeenth century. The author gives the finest and most authentic portraits, many of which have not hitherto been reproduced.

THE ALPS IN NATURE AND HISTORY. By W. A. B. COOLIDGE, M.A. With 20 Illustrations and 9 Maps and Plans. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
The Alpine pastures, glaciers and great passes are fully described, while separate sections deal with the beasts, the birds, and flowers
"Those who know the Alps will welcome much knowledge that makes the country more absorbing than ever, and newcomers will find the book delightfully illuminative."—Pall Mall Gazette.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, AUGUST 22, 1908.

READING ROOM INSTITUTION

The Nation

Vol. III., No. 22.] SATURDAY, AUGUST 29, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	Page
Diary of the Week	755
Politics and Affairs:—
A Message from Germany	757
The Future of Morocco	758
The Dark Side	760
The Civic Volunteer	761
Life and Letters:—
Panic	763
A Killing Competition	764
Irony	765
Short Story:—
The Pathetic Fallacy. By May Kendall	766
Open Questions:—
The Use of Public Libraries. By Dr. Ernest Baker	768
Present-Day Problems:—
The Harmsworth Brand. (Conclusion)	769
Communications:—
"There is no Conqueror but God." By R. B. Cunninghame Graham	771
Letters to the Editor:—
The Lost Liberty of the Road. By Douglas Fox Pitt, Charles Hamfeldt, James Tinto, Henry Holiday, W. G. Wickham, A Lawyer. W. Austen Bolam, New Forest, J. C. Paget, and "Pro Bono Publico"	772
"A Crisis in Coffee." By Chas. Evers	774
A Propos de Bottes. By G. W. E. R.	774
"A Green Heaven." By Sir Samuel Wilks and the Writer of the Article	774
Heaven as seen by Children. By John Higgins	775
Emden and Anglo-German Relations. By Arnold White	775
The Dilemma of a Liberal Lawyer. By C.	776
Poetry:—
"On your account I shall not Die." By Padraic Colum	776
Reviews:—
The Story of Dartmoor	777
William Penn	778
A City in Spain	779
The Visit of "Mr. Apollo"	779
Books in Brief:—
Edward Grieg	780
The Elements of Angling	780
Ordnance Survey Sheets	780
The Week in the City	782

The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The two-column article in last week's "Observer" on the naval problem may be briefly described as an invention. There is no truth in the assertion that the Government of the day contemplate a shipbuilding programme on a basis, so far as Germany is concerned, of "two keels to one" in the new types. There is no truth in the statement that the method adopted is to be a four years' programme, financed by a loan. The further assertions that such a programme involves the building of thirty "Dreadnoughts" and other vessels in proportion, and that this building scheme will cost fifty millions sterling over and above our present naval estimates, are therefore of no interest to anybody. We believe that we are correct in stating that the subject of a naval loan has never even been mentioned in the Cabinet. We are quite certain that if such a proposal ever arrives at this preliminary stage it will get no further.

* * *

Mr. Lloyd George returned from his German tour on Wednesday, and has supplied the Press with a vivid impression of his survey of the German system of industrial insurance. On the Peace side his visit, though it had nothing to do with any formal search for an Anglo-German agreement, has done much good, and the tone of his speeches, at once frank and cordial, is, we are sure, thoroughly approved and endorsed by the Prime Minister and by Sir Edward Grey. This is the more useful, inasmuch as the German impression of the Cronberg interview, unlike our own, was that it was not successful, and that Germany could only meet with a negative a direct British application to reduce the dimensions of her revised naval programme. Her position is that the building of a powerful fleet has more of a moral than a material purpose. For example, it has no remote connection with an invasion of England, but it is undoubtedly intended to fortify German diplomacy, and to give it some weight in such a confrontation as that of Algeciras. Nevertheless, the German Press has held out distinct hopes of what the "Vossiche Zeitung" calls a "fundamental understanding" as to the size of the respective navies of the two countries, and the "Frankfurter Zeitung" says that the man who reaches such an understanding will be "popular," because he will interpret the keen longings of two great nations, both of which are "pacifically disposed." There is, also, a hint that some ratio of naval strength may be set up after 1911 or 1912, which represents, of course, the culminating point of the German programme. This is a very different matter from the absurd suggestion that both countries shall "agree" to go on building against each other, and that neither shall take offence at its neighbor. This is the "agreement" which exists, and which sensible statesmen desire to supersede.—Meanwhile Herr Bebel has sent a message to the "Labor Leader," declaring that for Germany to think of war with England during her "great economic crisis" was to "cast out the devil by Beelzebub." He declares that the Socialist Party will do its utmost to prevent war, but deprecates British deputations to Germany, which would encourage the German Jingoes to think that England was afraid.

* * *

Mr. Lloyd George's views of the working of the German insurance system were distinctly favorable. He questioned officials, employers, and workmen, the last of whom were necessarily Socialists, and found them all agreed in supporting the principle and method of the system. The Socialists required extensions, thought the pensions too low, and wished the Government to enter on a crusade of preventive work directed against alcoholism and various forms of industrial disease. He was informed that, about 1910, the annual expenditure on all branches would rise to fifty-three millions (the Government finding five, or, practically, the cost of management), and that for this year the charge was thirty-four millions sterling. He adhered to our own non-contributory plan for old age, but thought that the German Government and people got an immense return for the State expenditure of two and a-half millions. We hope that the Government will, after further investigation, endeavor to place the whole problem before our trade unions and friendly societies, who will, of course, have to face the double problem of compulsion and State supervision. Mr. Lloyd George thought the trade depression in Germany extreme, and traced the universal reign of high prices to Protection.

* * *

The new order in Turkey has been winning the widest acceptance among the Mohammedans. The clergy at Constantinople are working hand in hand with the Committee; the troops in Hedjaz have arrested the recalcitrant Governor; the Kurds have given in their allegiance; and a network of Young Turk committees is being rapidly developed in Asia Minor. The work of clearing the departments of sinecure holders is continuing, and the Ministry, by loans and by the recovery of part of the booty of corrupt officials, has raised enough money to carry on affairs till the meeting of Parliament. The Austrian Government, by recalling its gendarmerie officers, has paid the Constitution a great compliment, and pulled the first brick out of the fabric built up in Macedonia by European intervention. The one serious domestic event of the week has been a great fire in Constantinople, which destroyed many hundreds of houses. Meanwhile the old Turkish régime has celebrated its one success in the arrival of the Hedjaz Railway at the holy city of Medina. It is expected to reach its final goal at Mecca in about two years. This Religious Railway, the only such enterprise in history, was specially promoted by the Sultan and the generally infamous Izzet Pasha, and has been fed by subscriptions from the whole Mohammedan world.

* * *

The most difficult political problem which confronts the Young Turks is the reconciliation of their own Turkish nationalism with the claims of the nationalities. Absolutism misgoverned, but it was loose enough, as the present Sultan said in opening the first Turkish Parliament, to permit subordinate nationalisms to live. Constitutionalism is finding that kind of tolerance a much more serious concession because it is itself a much more serious system of government. The Bulgarians, Greeks, and Young Turks have outlined their policies with regard to the nationalities, and the chief points of difference are the reorganisation of Macedonia and the language question. The Bulgarians are said to want Macedonia to be given the quasi-independence of Samos with its own parliament and militia; the Young Turks are willing to concede local government but insist on subordination to the central Parliament and authority. Both Greeks and Bulgarians want the language of the nationalities to be the language of instruction in both primary and secondary schools; the Young Turks want Turkish to be the official language which should be taught in all schools, and be the language of instruction in secondary and higher education. This last condition represents the diminution of a privilege enjoyed under the old régime, and the Young Turks would do well to modify it. On the other hand, the Bulgarian demand for Macedonian quasi-independence is manifestly inadmissible by men who have a strong sense of Ottoman patriotism and a deep feeling for Ottoman unity.

* * *

As we suggested last week, the stories of Abdul Aziz's victories, though circulated by the French commander in Morocco, turned out fables, and as soon as his army came into conflict with Mulai Hafid's lieutenant it was utterly routed. Many of his troops went over to the enemy, and Abdul Aziz fled, accompanied by French officers, and is now at the French military post of Settat. Tangier at once proclaimed Mulai Hafid Sultan, and most of the other ports have done likewise. The French papers recognise that there is now no alternative but to acknowledge the new ruler, who has promised to accept all public conventions and liabilities, though not to assume responsibility for Abdul Aziz's private extravagances. It is highly improbable that a new Conference, with all its combustible fuel, will be summoned, and ordinary diplomatic machinery should suffice to settle the question. An agent of the State bank has also been sent to Mulai Hafid. With the ports, i.e., the customs, in his hands the step was not to be evaded, though it is really a quasi-official recognition of the new Sultan.

* * *

Tabriz is wholly in the hands of Sata Khan, the Constitutionalist leader, and its anguman has resumed sittings. One of its first proceedings was to point out to the Consuls that loans raised without Parliamentary approval are illegal. Ain-ed-Dowleh, the Royal Governor, has arrived, with 1,200 troops, according to the "Times" correspondent, resembling some "broken-down Indian rajah's wedding party." The Tabriz Constitutionalists want the Megliss summoned and the Royalist leaders punished, and, so far as the Tabriz Royalists are concerned, are not leaving their punishment to the Shah. What the Shah thinks of these terms is suggested by his calling together a nominated council with the same powers, legislative and financial, as a Parliament.

* * *

The American fleet has left Sydney after a reception of unprecedented warmth and magnificence. The gathering of hundreds of thousands of people to welcome it into Sydney harbour was followed by junketing on a great scale. Mr. Roosevelt, in a cable to the Governor-General, insists that "the voyage is one of peace and of menace to no Power," but an officer of the "Connecticut" put his finger on the key to Australian enthusiasm when he said that the United States and Australia have identical interests in the preservation of the Anglo-Saxon States for their own peoples. The Australasian visit of the fleet has become in fact, though not in form, an anti-Japanese demonstration, and it is hardly likely to flatter Japanese susceptibilities. That is a serious matter at a time when the immigration negotiations between Japan and the United States are said to have reached a deadlock.

* * *

The closing stages of the annexation of the Congo have gone through with singular smoothness, and, if it be admitted that the job was either inevitable or worth doing, then it has been done in a manner not unfavorable to Belgium. So far as Belgium is concerned, the financial terms of the bargain are heavy, but not heavier than have been accepted almost without demur when this country has taken over the assets of chartered companies, while the Colonial Law gives the Belgian Parliament in some directions much greater control over the administration of the Congo than the British Parliament possesses over the administration of our own Crown Colonies. So far as the natives of the Congo are concerned, the situation remains just as before, with the one difference that their new ruler is both much more altruistic and more swayed by the common emotion of humanity. Belgium has now to evolve a new system, and it is for Europe to see that concrete shape is given to general assurances. Unhappily Leopold has, as part of his price, rendered a colonial deficit inevitable by burdening Belgium with a charge of £1,300,000 and the Congo with an annual charge for many years of £270,000, and rivetting the concessionary system upon the colony.

* * *

A mysterious murder was committed near a country house called Ightham Knoll, near Sevenoaks, on Monday afternoon. Mrs. Luard, the wife of Major-General Luard, an officer of some distinction, was found by her husband lying dead on the verandah of a summerhouse fixed in a wooded and very remote ravine. The murder seems to have taken place about half-past three, and death was due to two shots in the lady's head, fired from a small revolver. Before half-past two Major-General Luard left the house with his wife, parted from her at a spot close to the summerhouse, went on to a golf club to get his clubs, returned to the house, had tea with a lady friend of Mrs. Luard's, missed his wife, and, going to look for her, found her, at 5.30 p.m., lying dead, her hands violently stripped of the rings she usually wore, and her purse being missing. The revolver has not yet been found, and does not seem to correspond with the two large service weapons kept in the house. There were many tramps and hop-pickers in the neighborhood, but the murder seems to suggest knowledge of a very lonely resort, and of the habits of the dead lady.

* * *

Dr. Evans has contributed to the "Times" a brilliant account of the success of this year's excavations on the site of Knossos in Crete. The work has been mainly done on the dependency of the great palace which Dr. Evans calls the "Little Palace," though it had a frontage of 114 feet. The date of this building he fixes at the close of the middle or the beginning of the late Minoan Age, that is to say, about the seventeenth century before Christ. Many of the objects found were religious, one of them being a beautifully modelled vessel in the shape of a bull's head. Other objects were crystal bowls and boxes, a gold-mounted intaglio of lapis-lazuli, silver bowls and jugs, a store of bronzes, sacred axes, ewers, basins, and a bronze saw. In another part of the island Mr. Seager, an American explorer, has opened up some tombs filled with beautiful works in gold and stone, including a fine bowl of Egyptian workmanship closely resembling a bowl discovered in the tomb of King Sneferu, whose date is said to be 2840 B.C. These and other stores Dr. Evans refers to the early Minoan Age.

* * *

Sir Eyre Massey Shaw, for many years the head of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade, and almost its founder, died at Folkestone on Tuesday, at the age of seventy-eight. He saw the Brigade through the period when modern fire appliances took the place of the old manual pumps. He was a man of brilliant courage, of great skill and knowledge in the management of fires, and picturesque enough in figure and personality to become a London and social hero, duly celebrated in a Savoy libretto. As a disciplinarian he was perhaps a little to seek. Certainly his rule, successful as it was, did not fit in with the stricter organisation set up by the London County Council. He then resigned. None of his successors have achieved his popularity, or are likely to make so interesting a figure in the world.

* * *

The following is a record of the chief outrages committed by motors in the course of the week. A Birmingham lady, aged sixty-five, was knocked down by a motor car and killed. She came from behind a tramcar and "hesitated" in crossing. A young cyclist of twenty-eight was crushed by a car, and, though he "managed to crawl" out from underneath it, was badly injured and died. A Mrs. Hicks, of Penzance, about to mount one motor car, was knocked down by another and killed, in sight of her husband and family, after receiving terrible injuries. A motor car, driven through Warton, knocked down a Mr. Fairweather, an old Manchester merchant, broke his ribs, and "drove rapidly away." The motor was said to have been stolen. A child of eight, playing in the roadway near Netherfield, was run over and taken unconscious to Nottingham Hospital. A correspondent of the "Glasgow Herald," sitting in a garden in the Highlands, and hearing an "awful smash and grating of motor car wheels," saw a boy cyclist "lying on the road covered with blood," and his cycle "smashed up" on one of the wheels of the motor car. One of the ladies in the car said that "the boy had no right to run into their car," which, the correspondent states, gave no warning of its approach. The people who last week ran down and slew a Carmarthenshire laborer, and then drove away from his body, have not yet been discovered.

Politics and Affairs.

A MESSAGE FROM GERMANY.

It is a relief to find the jarring controversy between Germany and Great Britain turned this week into a really useful exchange of thought on the social condition of the greatest and most modern of central European States. The turn of debate is the more valuable as it happens to touch the two questions most vital to our own State economics—the effect of high Protection on a highly organised industrial community, and the great system of public insurance for the workers initiated by Bismarck. The latest of the series of invaluable reports on German life which we owe to Sir Francis Oppenheimer raises the first of these questions, and Mr. Lloyd George's brief report to the newspapers of his German tour opens up the second. Reading these two "documents" together, it is not difficult to gather from them a conclusion thoroughly in harmony with the democratic view of politics. Germany has certainly something to learn from our practice of free import and exchange, as against her intricate scheme of interference with the natural courses of trade. We, on the other hand—and this is no small reproach to the fellow-countrymen of Owen and Shaftesbury—are well behind her when we come to the protective organisation of the workmen's lives. She exposes her people to serious loss of efficiency owing to the toll she allows her landlords to take on their food; on the other hand, we have shown nothing like the care which she has bestowed on the problems of working-class sickness and infirmity. We can boast that we have kept clear of a wrong kind of State organisation; she can say that she has given her best brains the task of developing a right one. On the question of whether the elaborate nexus of food taxes, export bounties, public and private, and vast correlated syndicates, States within the State, manipulating the tariff to suit their friends and crush their rivals, has done good or harm, Sir Francis Oppenheimer, while freely acknowledging the steadying effects of the syndicates in times of rising and falling trade, has no doubt whatever. German Protection has, indeed, produced all the results which English Free Traders assert of it, and English Protectionists deny. In the first place, the industrials complain that it is agrarian, that it is "out of keeping with the demands of a modern 'Industrie Staat,'" the very interest in which its application here is invoked. It is a Junker and a pro-Junker policy, directed by the Chaplins of Germany, and imposing crippling disability on her organised industries and on the physique of her people. Secondly, its full direct consequences have fallen upon the home workers. For example, Sir Francis shows by comparing the average prices of wheat in Berlin and London before and after the high tariff of 1906, that when the duty on wheat was 35 marks, the excess price of Berlin over London per 1,000 kilos was a little over 35 marks, and that when the duty was raised to 55 marks, the excess price in Berlin, as compared with London, was 62 marks 3pf. He declares the rise in the price of food to be a distinct factor in the growing inefficiency of the German workman.

But the trouble does not end there. Increased food prices have forced the workpeople to struggle for increased wages, so that their natural movement towards a higher standard of existence is blocked by a continual struggle to repair the loss which the enhanced cost of living inflicts on them. Public officials, and all workers with fixed incomes, find their spending power contracted. Meanwhile, the rise in money, though not in real, wages reacts through the whole industrial fabric. The transport services have to increase their charges. The State, the greatest of employers, has to spend more in feeding its workers, and has therefore continually to seek new revenue—from railway travellers, traders, or consumers. Raw material becomes dearer, and as the tendency of German trade, and of all progressive industrial nations, is towards the production of highly finished articles, which, again, depend on a variety of unfinished products, all protected, and all, consequently, costly, the position of German industry in the world-market is seriously embarrassed. Protected agriculture hurts less protected industry; industry therefore requires more protection. The result is that everybody is protected, and everybody complains. The increased food duties did not even benefit the landlords; they only brought about a general speculation in estates, leaving the new owners burdened with their share of the universal system of high prices. Finally, the system of export bounties, whether organised by the State or by the coal and iron syndicates, has acted as a serious handicap to Germany's foreign trade. Thus the three syndicates who control the "heavy" industry have been in the habit of selling great quantities of their produce abroad at prices far below those prevailing in the home market. This is the practice of "dumping" which we so much resent. But its punishment has been exemplary:—

> "The policy," says Sir Francis Oppenheimer, "benefitted the foreign finishing industries, so that the German finishing industries, compelled to buy the same German raw material at higher prices, could no longer compete on the world's market. . . . Steel plates being thus exported to the United Kingdom, shipbuilding for German account there was materially promoted; in a tender to build a gasometer in Copenhagen a British firm cut out a German competitor because the Englishman could obtain the necessary iron more cheaply—from Germany!"

Much the same result accrued from the public premium on the export of sugar which preceded the Brussels Convention. The sugar bounties did nothing but good to us and little but harm to Germany:—

> "Not only was the home consumer compelled to pay dearly for sugar, which had long since been scientifically proved to constitute a very valuable foodstuff, and the purchase of which ought to have been put within the reach of the greatest possible number, but the manufacturers of confectionery and preserves complained bitterly that they were placed at a great disadvantage as against their foreign competitors, whose finishing trade procured German sugar at a greatly reduced price, so that any export abroad of the German manufacture was exceedingly difficult, if it was not impossible; while even on the German market the foreign goods were in a better position."

The net effect of the Protectionist system, stiffened as it was in 1906, is that in a period of depression which we share with Germany, and some of the causes of which are common to the two countries, she has to fight for recovery against high prices, while we have no such obstacle.

Thus far, then, the balance is very much in our favor. But the account changes when we survey the British and German systems of workmen's insurance in the light of Mr. Lloyd George's suggestive observation of them. We have clearly made a proper departure in setting up a non-contributory scheme for very old people, mostly agricultural workers and their wives, and our plan of compensation for accidents may very well rival the German system. But, after all, our scheme of old age pensions, though not without its effect as a relief of wages, was more an effort of pity and sympathy than a broadly conceived act of industrial statesmanship. It did not touch the great problem of unemployment, which so cruelly reacts on the health of the children as well as on the moral and physical force of the workers. It did not deal with disability, with sickness, with the town-worker's tragically early decline in health and vigor. With us these things come within the range of voluntary effort and organisation; and, as we have often argued, they are certainly not cases for State aid alone. But we confess that we read with some envy of the intelligent and comprehensive mechanism under which, for example, the German insurance system enables its officers to pack off a sick workman to a sanatorium, to transfer him, if his illness does not quickly yield, to a hospital, and finally, in case of a lingering ailment, to enrol him as a pensioner for disability. Mr. Lloyd George tells us that when clerks and widows and orphans are included, as they will be included in 1910, in the general scheme of State-aided assurance, a sum of fifty-three millions a year will be expended on recuperative work, under the departments of sickness, accident, and old age. The function of the State will, in the matter of money, be trifling, for its contribution of some five millions will do little more than pay the cost of organisation. But it gives its brains, it supplements, without superseding, voluntary contributions, it co-ordinates the efforts of workmen and employers, it supplies security, it is a guarantee against fraud and oppression. We are not surprised to find Mr. Lloyd George's quick intelligence attracted by such a vision of beneficent organisation. If the German plan is in any way to be applied to our own needs, the co-operation of the trade unions and the friendly societies will be indispensable, and will, of course, be readily sought. The question of unemployment, which the Germans do not touch, and of compulsion, which does not at once fit in with our character and institutions, must also occur. Notwithstanding these objections, we have long argued for some such step forward to industrial order, and we hope that the Government will see in it the crowning of their endeavours to redeem the lot of extreme old age.

THE FUTURE OF MOROCCO.

The triumph of Mulai Hafid is something more than the victory of one pretender over another for the possession of a barbarous throne. It means the success, surprising even to sympathetic observers of Morocco, after generations of degradation, of a consciously nationalist movement, against a Sultan who had become the tool of a foreign invasion. Nor is it only the fortunes of Abdul Aziz which have been ruined in the headlong flight to the coast. There end with his inglorious expedition the dreams of the French Colonial Party. No circumstance was lacking to emphasise the intimacy of the connection between the defeated Sultan and French diplomacy. His expedition was prepared under the shelter of the French warships at Rabat. The Sultan's harem travelled to Casablanca under a French escort. He owed such funds as he possessed to French complacency, and his advance was apparently successful, only so long as he was marching through the territory which General d'Amade has conquered and policed. The official French Press was convinced that he must triumph, and sang pæans which were echoed in the leading articles of the "Times," on his approaching victory. To-day the same Press reports his intention of taking refuge like the great Algerian patriot Abdul Kader, among the mosques and gardens of Damascus, and sadly admits that France and Spain must lead the way in "recognising" his successful rival. The Colonial Party has greatly miscalculated the long Moroccan crisis. Like Lord Cromer, it set out from the premise that Islam was hopelessly decadent, and only capable of opposing to Western Imperialism the futile resistance of an angry and unintelligent "fanaticism." They assumed that Mulai Hafid's patriotic army would melt away at the sight of a few mercenaries in uniform; he dismissed the Egyptian nationalists as a mere "handful of extremists." The one man in Paris who has been steadily wise and well-informed throughout this crisis has been M. Jaurès, and he owed the superiority of his insight to his sympathetic perception of the fact that a new spirit is awakened in Islam. Several months ago he said in the Chamber: "You are choosing for your violation of Morocco the very moment when throughout the Mussulman world there is rising a breath of liberty and progress, and men are declaring that the Koran can be reconciled with modern civilisation, with science, and with freedom." These prophetic words were spoken long before the revolution in Turkey had made the dullest expert wise after the fact.

The mistakes of French policy have all sprung from a single root—the dominance at the Foreign Office of a group of powerful financiers who were concerned only to push their monetary interests in Morocco. Trade, in the sense of the export of manufactures, is, as yet, relatively unimportant in Morocco, and France, whose exports are mainly of highly finished and artistic goods, is less dependent than any other industrial Power on semi-savage markets. Nor does she suffer, with her stationary population, from any necessity to find fields for emigration. Her main export is capital, always seeking investments at high interest in Russia, in Turkey, and now in Morocco. The foreign policy of a manufacturing nation, while it holds to Free Trade, is commonly democratic and popular in its sympathies. The goodwill of the nations with which it trades is an asset, and it is forced, if only from enlightened self-interest, to desire their prosperity, their freedom, and their advancement. It is quite otherwise with the export of crude capital. It depends rather on the goodwill of governments or despots than on the confidence of peoples, for it requires rather concessions than sales, rather opportunities for loans than the exchange of goods. Here lies in great measure the explanation of the apparently unnatural Franco-Russian alliance, and here too is the clue to the rather ignoble concession-hunting which has neutralised of late years the influence of France as a Liberal Power at Constantinople. In Morocco the immediate interests at stake have been those of the banks which had lent money to Abdul Aziz, and still more of the financiers who hoped to lend yet larger sums. It was, on a smaller scale, the history of the Egyptian bondholders repeated—with this difference, that the fear of Continental complications prevented the landing, in adequate force, of an army of occupation, and checked its operations when it did eventually land. The world was content to see in the bloody reprisals at Casablanca simply a punitive expedition to avenge an outbreak of xenophobia. It forgot that this outbreak was due to the proceedings of a group of financiers engaged in constructing a harbour, who had seized the customs house, and carried a light railway through fields, for which they paid no lease, and across a cemetery, where the spades of their navvies spared neither corpses nor stones. The expedition, once landed, proceeded to penetrate into the interior, avowedly with the object of cutting Mulai Hafid's communications. Abdul Aziz happened to be a weak and childish personality, dependent on the aid of European moneylenders and the advice of European adventurers. He won a reputation for "tolerance" and open-mindedness by purchasing pianos and bicycles, through "advisers" who assured him that pianos could be bought only by the dozen and bicycles only by the hundred. Meanwhile the serious affairs of state were in peculiarly venal and incompetent hands. French finance desired his success, because a sovereign so improvident could have ruled only on a basis of debt, and still more because a sovereign so unpopular must have relied on European backing. He had, in a word, mortgaged his country to the foreigner. Mulai Hafid, on the other hand, represents at least an aspiration after competence, stands for a more virile tradition, and bases himself on the national determination to resist even a disguised conquest by financiers and advisers.

Little as we know of this Moroccan nationalism, it is hard to refuse it a certain sympathy. It has given proof of a desperate, if ineffectual, courage in resisting the troops under General d'Amade, and of a certain statesmanship in uniting a people which has been for generations in a state of civil war. The election of Mulai Hafid by the clergy at Fez showed at least the beginning of some democratic impulse, or, rather, perhaps, a return to that primitive Mohammedan democracy, which combined personal rule with the ultimate supremacy of a popular opinion represented by the clerical caste. It is doubtful how far there is any constructive capacity in the movement. The Moors, descendants through some of their great families of the scholars and artists of Spain, are almost destitute even of Oriental culture, while modern learning has made even less progress among them than among the Persians. Their refusal to recognise the Sultan of Turkey as Caliph has kept them isolated from the rest of the Moslem world. But even ignorance and isolation are relative terms. Some echo, we may be sure, will reach them of the teachings of the new school in Islam. If Europe will but have patience for a few years yet, there may grow up among them an aspiration for enlightenment. A wise Power, which desired to lead but not to conquer, to trade but not to enslave, would found schools instead of sending punitive expeditions, and encourage the immigration rather of enlightened Mohammedan teachers from Tunis or Egypt or Turkey, than of dubious European adventurers. The renaissance of Moslem peoples sets to Christendom the largest problem in statecraft and sympathy which has faced it since Napoleon's dreams of Eastern Empire.

THE DARK SIDE.

Knowledge of the condition of the people of this country is scanty, remote, and largely conjectural. The forces which are making for the comfort or degeneration of four-fifths of them still lack any accurate estimate, and sensational appeals of churches or charities, the exaggerations of political parties, the enterprise of romantic fiction, are offered as substitutes for sociology. Those who are occupied with this, the most vital of all human problems, will clutch at any firm ground in this quagmire of uncertain statement, however limited and unfavourable in appearance such firm ground may be. Here, in bulky volume of table and statistic, as a kind of by-product of a Royal Commission, is the report of the Medical Inspectors who investigated certain selected districts of town and country. The object was a double one. The first, and (from the point of view of immediate reform) the most important, was the compilation of some comprehensive estimate of the various classes of mentally afflicted in specified areas, and of the provision which would be necessary for their humane and intelligent treatment. The second was the diagnosis of causes—the measuring of variations in populations living under diverse conditions, and the attempt to refer such variations to larger influences. The result is a series of investigations, lacking, indeed, the unity which would have come from a single observer and exhibiting undoubtedly the personal predilections of the remarkably able body of medical experts who undertook the work, but offering, nevertheless, much matter of interest, as a kind of series of dredgings, bringing up samples from a deep whose content and nature are still unknown. In the general survey, it is interesting to note that numbers all over the country tend to average towards a standard of one in two hundred persons mentally disordered and unfit for the normal business of life. This standard is (roughly) that erected in the rural districts and the larger urban areas of England. It is reduced to less than one-half—one in four hundred—in specially healthy artisan areas, such as the mining districts of Durham or a shipping and riverside centre such as Hull. It sinks to a similar figure (for some reason not entirely explicable) in such large cities with wide areas of poverty as Glasgow and Cork, and rises to half as much again in Dublin and the rural areas of Galway.

Most of the observers caution the reader from drawing too clear-cut deductions concerning the present from these figures. Their estimate of mental deficients is not an estimate of to-day but of yesterday, of the children of a generation whose prosperity or suffering has in part stamped upon the sensitive human mind of its descendants a living and perpetuating hall-mark of values. The cities—in their vast and unwieldly aggregations, as a new experiment in the life of humanity—are but the growths of a few decades. Not for many decades still to come, and until the proportion of city bred to country bred has greatly increased, shall we be able to reckon with any accuracy what change this city aggregation is destined to effect upon the bodies and minds of its denizens. But we can learn already what terrible and exacting payment is extorted for all neglect of the laws of human well-being. The whole of the report might be accepted as a text or vindication of law "fixed in adamantine rigor," as Carlyle once declared, "by the ancient elemental powers who are entirely careless how you vote." It is true of the individual. Ninety-five per cent. (in one investigation) of all the deficients are found to be "degenerative"—descended from insane or feeble-minded parents, or from physically degenerate parents. The origin of these latter is "always complex—a medley of tubercular disease, alcoholism, heart disease, syphilis, nervous and other constitutional disorders." Science is offering with a relentless empiricism, none the less minatory because detached and dispassionate, a demonstration of the old theological affirmation that the sins of the fathers shall be visited on the children.

But this is true also of the race. Social welfare is neglected, the poor are forgotten or allowed to fester in their misery, while those who direct the courses of human affairs are occupied with pleasure, business, or Imperial visions. A few years afterwards the price of this neglect is exacted, and the price is paid. In Wiltshire, for example—with its deplorably high percentage of lunacy and mental deficiency—this burden is ascribed directly as a "heritage from the past" to "the dwarfed outlook and poverty of the agricultural laborer in former days." "People are surprised to read of so high a proportion of insanity in agricultural districts," says the Superintendent of the County Asylum, "where hard competition, worry and anxiety, the modern causes of insanity, are almost unknown. But the matter is easily explained, and one has only to refer to the Poor Law records of sixty years ago to see and understand the life then led by residents in rural districts, and how their then surroundings and habits more or less bred insanity. . . . The depravity, starvation, and wretched surroundings and other evils of those days must be answerable for most of the imbecility and mental deficiency now apparent." It was the price paid for the Corn Laws, contributed as a Bill, which posterity is compelled to honor. Rural England has laboriously climbed out of the abyss; rural Ireland remains there. The report on Galway describes the realities of a life still unparalleled in Europe for sheer patient, unmeaning wretchedness and privation. "The people live under conditions of the hardest toil," runs the verdict, "yielding the most meagre results, in a state of poverty in which not alone is the food innutritious, but oftentimes insufficient, and their clothing inadequate. They cannot make provision for bad seasons, and the sum of these causes has a most injurious effect in producing the low forms of mental and nervous degeneration which are prevalent in the district." There is even here a special form of nervous disease noted, in which the individual, exhausted, and at length broken in hopeless effort, suddenly capitulates to the enemy." A condition of neurasthenia is very common. It is a state in which the breadwinner of the family suddenly abandons the effort to face his responsibilities, takes to his bed, and remains inert and passive for months, suffering from what is locally described as "the nervous fever," and which very often ends in mental derangement. Such a collapse is estimated as insane; to those familiar with the realities of that impossible life, it may seem rather like a sudden access of sanity in a region where no one who can see clearly will any longer acquiesce and endure.

Drink and overcrowding form the two attendant evils to which the vast majority of these deformities are ascribed. Eliminate alcoholism and congestion from the body of society, and the feeble-minded and mentally degenerate might become as rare as the once familiar figure of the leper. But some of these observers are disinclined to share the optimism prevailing concerning a steady, irresistible advance in human welfare. "While I think physical degeneration in the past has been conspicuous by its absence," is the report on the Pottery towns, "I am afraid, unless preventive means are taken, the course of events in the future will not be so favourable." "The towns are growing, women are being employed more than ever in factories, and are in consequence neglecting their homes and their families; men are becoming more lazy and ready to join the unemployed; tea and other injurious articles figure more and more largely in the diet of children." "All that is wanted," says a clergyman at Stoke, "is a little more food and a good deal more clothing for the children, more practical work for the older boys, and fewer public-houses for the men." In passing from a smaller urban area to a large city the change noted is "the increasing defective population of school ages, the diminished proportion of adult feeble-minded men, and the increase of feeble-minded women." On investigation of the casual wards, however—primarily to find the feeble-minded who have drifted there, but extending to the whole of these forlorn and drifting populations—many observers are struck "by the small number in which alcoholism could be looked upon as playing any great part—that is to say, any physical part in leading to their presence in the tramp wards."

Evidence is overwhelming concerning the inherited and congenital nature of these mental instabilities. Many of the family histories here outlined suggest a record as terrible and baffling as the record of the family which formed the subject of Zola's gaunt and relentless fiction. "Female, aged 11, in special school," runs the story of one. "The parents of this child are dead; both died of consumption and alcohol. She has five brothers, the youngest being seventeen, all alcoholic, and one sister, who is slightly mentally defective." The parents had been rich middle-class people. These feeble-minded marry; they have females above the normal; the happier majority die; the remainder struggle into cloudy existence to form an insoluble problem for the future. One reads here of "a chronic drunkard, aged thirty-three, congenitally feeble-minded, found to have had eleven children, all of whom are dead." "Records were obtained of ninety-three children as the offspring of eighteen mothers who were defective. Fortunately, most of the children are dead." In another workhouse it was found that sixteen of the feeble-minded women had together produced 116 children, mostly illegitimate, the greater number dying early or growing abnormal and degenerate. A civilisation which is too callous, too careless, or too sensitive to deal with such cases as these—the girls who form an easy prey to any man's lust, the alcoholics, who are convicted hundreds of times for the same offence, the degenerates, who choke up the prisons and "workhouses"—workhouses described as "the receptacles of every description of human wreckage, seniles, drunkards, epileptics, imbeciles, and acutely insane"—is a civilisation which has no warrant for trumpeting to the world the splendour of its actual achievement.

THE CIVIC VOLUNTEER.

The recent trial of the Mile End Guardians raises wider issues than that breakdown of local administration of which it is not the only symptom. It may be that the Mile End Guardians represent a survival of the old vestry spirit of former days, but their condemnation cannot be without effect in the way in which their office is regarded. It may tend to discredit still further the local honours for which these men strove; with some perhaps it will serve as an incentive to do their best to provide worthier substitutes for the people's choice. And such an effect indeed it needs must have upon those who realise all that the civic volunteer means to our national life.

Amongst the many points which distinguish our English political life from those of neighbouring peoples, not the least remarkable is the fact that the ordered life of the community is so largely dependent upon voluntary work as an essential part of the machinery, both of national and local government. Not only in Germany, but also in democratic France, one is in constant contact with paid officials. The Deputies of the Chamber, the Municipal Councillors, the Mayors, Prefects, and Sub-prefects, and a host of minor officials, are all paid officers. The contrast, in fact, between our own system and such a one as this is so great that people who perceive it hardly realise how little by little our English life is changing, even in respect to this voluntary side of local government Some of the older unpaid offices have already disappeared. These were, it is true, only survivals of a feudalism which exacted unremunerated service as a duty. But quite apart from such cases as these, the growing complexity of modern life has made it increasingly difficult to depend, as in the past, upon the free gift of the leisure of patriotic citizens to provide us with the machinery of government. In a day when only the rich and cultured had political influence, some of the difficulties which now present themselves were not felt. In the rush of modern life it is becoming increasingly hard for men to find leisure to give to such work, and if working people are to be represented by men of their own class these representatives must be paid, either directly or indirectly. One of the practical difficulties of County Council government at present lies in the fact that anyone who wishes to fulfil his duties as a representative effectively must not only spend a very large part of his time in the work, but in the case of country districts must devote many hours of leisure and no little money to travelling to distant places of meeting. Meanwhile the very growth of public work itself has involved an immense increase of paid officials responsible to the various local bodies. Nowhere is this seen more strikingly than in the change which followed the abolition of the London School Board. The County Council had then to take over not only the old Board Schools, but the oversight of the voluntary schools and of higher education. The change in machinery, however, was far larger than this increased work implies. The School Board had at the head of its paid service a clerk. It relied upon its own members for expert advice and for a very large amount of administrative work. Under the new authority, not only has the staff of clerks been increased by more than mere numerical additions, but new departments have been created, and the whole formed into a permanent organisation, capable of formulating an educational policy. A similar change has taken place in the merging of local vestries and boards of works, and their groups of tiny officials, in the Borough Councils.

It will be seen at once that this change has its good side. Too often in the past the old vestries were corrupt. They were dominated by petty cliques, and it was difficult to bring a wider public opinion to bear upon them with any effect; but in proportion as the new machinery becomes strong against such influences, it is also in danger of being less and less adaptable to new ideas. Bureaucracies are essentially conservative, and they resent interference from without. A new idea at length becomes regarded almost as an insult. Freedom of experiment, which is so essential to progress, is hard to attain under any official system. Rules and precedents, by-laws and red tape, leave all too little room for the expansion and expression of personality. One realises this if one has seen a man of originality chafing in this enforced inaction or slowly hardening and becoming less human in the grip of the great machine. Yet the change was necessary; it is impossible for a great community to depend upon the haphazard efforts of volunteers and the good-natured but spasmodic activity of untrained and unpaid workers. The truth is that we have need both of the trained official, with his systematic organisation, and of the volunteer. The one must provide the necessary machinery, the other the oil upon the wheels, without which the best machine comes to grief. But it is to voluntary work at its best that we must look for something more than this—the inspiration of new ideas, the means of wider contact with the unseen forces that mould our common life.

Looking back over the change that has come about during the last century, we cannot regret the disappearance of the private voluntary fire brigade and the transformation of our hospital system into national and municipal institutions. Our lifeboats still linger under the control of a private charity; but this is an instance of the way in which the methods of the Middle Ages continue in England, side by side with those of to-day and to-morrow. In all these things it is easy to see that greater permanence is needed than can be supplied by private enterprise. But while the organism of the State thus slowly grows, the spirit which first created these institutions must turn to new work. The civic feeling and the sense of duty which called into being the little corps of volunteers who manned the parish fire brigades; the care and foresight of the committees who first began the work for the training of the blind, the deaf and dumb, the cripple and the mentally defective, which is now undertaken by the public education authority—all these are needed still to deal with other problems no less vast.

In the Middle Ages men banded themselves together in religious guilds to make bridges along the line of the pilgrims' roads. No Government had yet undertaken such a task; but these men were the forerunners of the organised care of the community which came after. Even to-day, it may be, travellers pass and repass across the bridges that they built, though, for the most part, the regiments of progress have forgotten the work of the pioneers that went before them. The chivalry of public service to-day can scarcely be compared with that of the citizens who founded the brotherhood of the Misericordia at Florence, or created many of the philanthropic guilds of the Middle Ages. Yet the survey of the work of existing local authorities, marred as it is by so much pettiness of spirit, narrowness of outlook, party strife, and sectarian bitterness, is not wholly a disheartening one. The work is, indeed, too often hampered by self-satisfied ignorance, and sometimes even undermined by self-seeking and love of personal gain; yet it is illumined here and there by the light of lives given without grudging to the common good, the thought of minds too intent upon seeing their ideas take root to claim the fruit for themselves. These are the forerunners of the citizens of the future, combining in their commonwealth the Greek and the Christian notions of citizenship. We need to get back to the Greek ideal of the duty of the man endowed with many opportunities to perform a liturgy to the State: to give freely of his substance and effort, not to private charity, but to the public need.

But the Greek ideal, fine as it is, is not enough. We need, also, that sense of membership with one another which not only makes the strong wish to bear themselves the burden of the weak, but brings the good citizen to a sense of responsibility for the failure of his fellows, and makes him ready to atone for the evil about him by the free gift of his own life. In proportion as men of this type develop in the State, hope will spring up even for society's wastage, and the unpaid work which is so needful will never lack civic volunteers.

Life and Letters.

PANIC.

It is strange that the most terrific phenomenon of war should derive its name from the god of gentle shepherds. Pan was but an ancient being who loved the nomad sheep, and though the evil habit of punning on his name began before the Homeric Hymns and still continues, the name only means a feeder. His very worshippers felt the difficulty of connecting that pastoral nature with the hideous rout of battle. They tried to discover the origin of his warlike functions in the awful silence which inspires a lonely wayfarer with inexplicable terror upon the mountains. They saw him flickering along the front of battle, whether invited or uninvited, that day when he chased the barbaric host bleating to their ships in Marathon bay. They gradually made of him a power dæmonic and incalculable rather than benign. But it was only a case of primitive wisdom forgotten. Those who gave to the shepherd god the attribute of panic were wiser than their town-bred descendants knew. In towns they had not lived among flocks or known how sheep are caught by the infection of fear, even when their own familiar dog barks them to the fold, or the shepherd god tends them himself with rod and staff. And should anything strange or unknown move upon the pasture, for a second all the white faces are turned one way, here and there a silly foot stamps defiance, and then fear seizes them like one fool, and they are off in a panic of quivering tails.

Our pastoral fathers, when first they crept into Europe, knew something of ovism, and such, they knew, is the infectious terror inspired by the shepherd god. To transfer their observation from sheep to men was but a step; for in half their battles they saw how fear spreads like a pestilence, and in half their village meetings, too. So it was, as we cannot doubt, that the word "panic" became fixed in the languages of the West, and because the Greeks kept sheep on Helicon our counsellors are said to be panic-stricken when they behave like sheep in Fleet Street.

Of panics there are many kinds, and since we live by trade rather than slaughter, the panic of poverty has grown commoner than running. We have lately heard many accounts of the panics of loss in New York, but it is not so many years since the prudent and the poor could for themselves watch the thing in a London street as at a play. A whisper said the bank might shut its doors. There was not a ghost of truth in it, but in an hour the people came rushing to clutch what gold was left. Some came believing in the lie, some for fear the lie should cause a panic and they left out. They clasped their bank-books, cheque-books, receipts, and all they loved against their hearts. White-faced and struggling, they crammed the street, watching the fatal doors as souls from purgatory would watch the gates of heaven if the seats of the blessed were limited inside. Terror grew with numbers. How unspeakable if another entered first and took the last gold that was one's rightful due! They were kindly men—humble and sweet-tempered men and women for the most part, who would have shared a crust with the hungry. But if one who had entered that bank and received the solid gold had returned by the same door, they could have torn him to shreds for rage. True, there was plenty of gold to go round. Even if there had not been, a panic was the surest road to ruin. But that did not matter to the white-faced, struggling crowd; for panic possessed them.

It is the same in wars and revolutions. In Moscow, the patriots of the Black Gang were assembled by hundreds in a public square, swearing to shed their last drop of blood for the Tsar, and the last drop of his enemies' blood as well. From the balcony of Government House the governor applauded their loyalty and courage, when a voice cried, "Students!" and, like well-drilled troops at the word of command, the patriots shook and fled. No student was near, but, jostled by galloping sledges, slipping on ice, rolling each other in the snow, they ran, and the Governor was left applauding their courage to an empty square. Yet the Black Gang, honored by the Tsar, was not unused to blood. Many a Jewish family had they slaughtered already, hurling the girls and babies from the windows down to the pavements. They were not unused to blood, but panic possessed them.

Or it is the turning point of a campaign, and all is going fairly well till on a sudden the blast of infection passes over the faces of the men. They look at each other and then look round. Cattle are being driven away in the distance. One or two stragglers are fluttering out of sight like autumn leaves. The men are uneasy, they begin to leave the trenches, a few limp away, pretending to be wounded, others go to help them; more and more follow, the officers hasten to bring them back and do not return. The men who stay watch them anxiously; they are brave, they would stand if it were any good; but it is absurd to stop and be killed when others are escaping. In half an hour the road is blocked with guns, wagons, horses, bullocks, and all the crowding chaos of a retreating army, mingled in confusion with villagers, bedding, goats, and cottage furniture, for the enemy is what victors always are. If only one man in ten had faced his front, the enemy dared not have approached; but now he could slaughter sheep and men indifferently for thirty miles, since panic possessed them both.

One need not tell of the panic that seizes soldiers when some new form of death is flung among them and they scurry here and there like bewildered ants, to be steadied only by the deaths to which they are accustomed; or of the panic at a falling stone which on a night attack will convert a line of patient battery-mules into a shrieking rout of terrified Bacchantes. Beside the panics of loss and war, there are also the suspicions and superstitions that drive men similarly mad. How many victims fell to the Popish Plot? Or how many witches and warlocks did James I. hang and burn before a grateful people bestowed on him the title of Solomon? The Last Judgment has been a recurrent source of panic, and the valleys of the Caucasus are still peopled with German villagers whose fathers started from the Rhine to face the Judgment in Jerusalem as the safest place, but abandoned their fears between Elbruz and Ararat. Nor is it so many years ago since that expectation of imminent judgment so wrought upon a section of England that the present writer refused his birthday present, knowing it would be useless in hell; and fain would he claim that present now from the heirs of Dr. Cumming, whose thunders caused the panic.

One may notice that to these panics of loss, fear, suspicion, and ignorance there are reverse or opposite moods, which we may call possessions, if they are not panics. Such was the infection that possessed Europe at the preaching of the Crusades, when even children set out by thousands together for the redemption of the Sepulchre. Such was the madness of greed that speculated with tulips in Holland, with John Law in Paris, and in London with the South Sea Company, when shares were offered in "an undertaking of great advantage, but nobody to know what it is," and in five hours the promoter was entrusted with £2,000, but was afterwards seen no more. Such a reversion of panic was that madness on Salisbury Plain last year, when the cavalry in peace manœuvres rushed upon each other with fearless intent to kill.

But outside the common lines of panic and these queer perversions, there is yet another kind which infects many faint-hearted people now. Like common panics, it is bred of selfishness on suspicion. It contains a fear of loss, and, worse than cowardice, it even parades its fear of danger, and affects to shudder if a German battalion embarks in a tug. But the fear is not quite genuine. It is mixed with the desire of a new and dangerous sensation, just as some people like to feel their flesh creep and to make the flesh of others creep as well; or as a child enjoys the thrilling terror of the bogey-man, knowing in its heart who holds the turnip behind the sheet. Or, if the terrors of their panic are real, have they no shame that they go quavering to the world, "Two keels to one! Two keels to one!" Call themselves patriots! They dare not trust the country to meet an inexperienced rival on the sea unless their odds are two to one in battleships. They sing their "Rule, Britannia" and their "Hearts of Oak," but they think so little of our sailors that they count any German conscript worth two of the men who rule the waves. Only on an assurance of two "Dreadnoughts" to one, they say, can they possibly sleep peacefully in their beds. If the one object of these poor panic-stricken souls is to sleep peacefully in their beds, they had better go to bed at once and leave the preservation of their slumbers to men of stronger nerve, and to the navy whose courage and capacity they alike insult. Where would they be sleeping now if Drake and Hawkins had bleated, "Two keels to one! Two keels to one!" when the Spaniards came looming up the Channel?

A KILLING COMPETITION.

There is something rather startling and even a little mysterious in the mania for slaughter which the Incorporated Society for the Destruction of Vermin has succeeded in exciting during the past few months. With infinite trouble, at some cost in money and energy, with the aid of several periodicals, and thanks largely to the support of some of the most eminent names in literature, Lord Avebury and his friends have just succeeded, after twenty years of work, in inducing the House of Lords to take steps to check the slaughter of birds for the purposes of decoration. So slowly and painfully does a humane idea make its way even in a country which prides itself, with some justice, on being exceptionally sensitive about the sufferings of birds and beasts. Yet it is only necessary to suggest the wholesale destruction of sparrows and rats to call forth the enthusiastic and practically unanimous support of public opinion. A certain warfare against the undue multiplication of prolific creatures there always must be, and only a very foolish humanitarian would attempt to interfere with it. The balance of nature is only preserved by the slaughter of insects by birds, and of birds themselves by other birds and "vermin." The cat and the terrier are as necessary within the ranks of man's recognised allies as the owl and hawk outside them. But even to a mind which calmly accepts the fact of this continual, but natural, war of species against species, there is something revolting in the enthusiastic and unsparing campaign of extermination which is being organised to-day. The rat, for example, is a creature for which it is difficult to feel much sympathy. Useful as he is as a scavenger in a primitive community, he probably serves no good purpose in a modern and sanitary town. But, none the less, the logic which has doomed him to extermination is as feeble as the methods by which he is being slaughtered are cruel. The case against him, which was presented by Sir James Crichton Browne and his colleagues, was that he is proved to be a formidable carrier of disease. Even if all their theories are accepted, there is still no medical case against the rat in this country. He has been associated only with two diseases, the bubonic plague, and an exceedingly rare and obscure malady known as trichinosis. The plague is obsolete in Europe. Trichinosis, which is unknown in England, has been traced to the rat only in certain cases in which pigs had been fed on the carcases of slaughtered rats, and afterwards used for human food. The moral would seem to be rather to abstain from so peculiarly disgusting a diet than to exterminate the rat. But one element in this campaign seems to have been the fact that the companies which sell the new rat virus had an interest in promoting it. These companies advertised largely, a sure way of securing "a good Press," and in a similar campaign in India wrote to a journalist to assure him that they would make it "worth his while" to take part in the campaign against the rat. It is not so much the demerits of the rat as the commercial interests of his enemies which have doomed him to destruction by a lingering and very painful death.

Triumphant over the rat, these organisers of victory are now preparing to make war upon the sparrow. A correspondence in the "Times" has set forth once more the familiar indictment against him, and the case seems likely to go by default. The now familiar method of a "national killing competition" will be invoked against him, and village lads will collect sparrows' heads as they collect Harmsworth coupons or cigarette wrappers. The sparrow is by no means so unpopular as the rat. To town-dwellers at least he has become a very intimate friend. His gaiety, his insouciance, his genial contempt for mankind, win him something more than toleration in dull streets where he alone condescends to represent wild life. The cockney child, who knows no other uncaged bird, is quite prepared to idealise him, despite his dull plumage, his common-place flight, and his cheerful but quite unmelodious note. But somehow this general friendliness to the sparrow in no way deters correspondents of the "Times" from describing the various devices of their invention, by which, as one of them put it, he may "perish miserably." The case against him is not yet complete. But the medical scare and the profitable virus are alike about to be invented. His record as a disease-carrier is now to be investigated, and the laboratory which studies that question will doubtless discover how best to inoculate him with some exceptionally painful malady.

There is undoubtedly some case against the sparrow. He feeds greedily and wastefully on ripening corn. The farmer who does not choose or cannot afford to be generous, who will not say as Burns said to the field-mouse—

> "I doubt na, whyles, but thou may thieve;
> What then? poor beastie, thou maun live," and does not believe that he will "get a blessin' wi' the lave," proceeds at once to decree his extermination. It is always difficult for a farmer who sees his fields or orchards ravaged in autumn to remember that he might have had no crops at all unless the birds, which now take toll of his produce, had protected it from weeds and insect pests through the spring and early summer. But there is good evidence to show that the sparrow's devastations in autumn are balanced by his beneficent activities through the earlier months of the year. Even Sir James Crichton Browne, the most pitiless adversary of the rat, is impressed by the case for the sparrow put forward by Mr. Joseph P. Nunn after sixteen years of special study. He has even come to the conclusion that the sparrow is "the most valuable of all our indigenous birds," for the seeds of harmful weeds and the eggs of various insects are its favorite diet. The chances are, then, that even in its present immense numbers the sparrow is rather a blessing than a curse. If it is true that his numbers have immensely increased, it is not difficult to assign the reason. England is becoming the playground of the rich, and their pleasures make the gamekeeper the chief arbiter in the survival of species. The gamekeeper has destroyed the owl, the kestrel, and the sparrow-hawk. The consequence is that rats and sparrows multiply. At this point medical science, which has been engaged ever since Plato's day in ministering to the follies of the rich, steps in with a proposal to exterminate sparrows. The next consequence will of course be the inordinate multiplication of weeds and insects. That, in its turn, will bring us to the necessity of poisoning them also, until the earth itself will be inoculated with diseases warranted to destroy all wild vegetation and every creeping thing. A humanised world in which mankind alone survives with a few racehorses, some pheasants, and a breed of guinea-pigs for vivisection, is the ideal at which destructive science is ultimately aiming. There is an odd case in history to warn us. The Parisians exterminated their sparrows during the siege under the pressure of sheer hunger. Next year they complained of a plague of every species of insect and fly. Meanwhile, the prospect which this "national rat and sparrow killing competition" opens out threatens to make the country even more uninhabitable for beings of average sensibility than motor-cars themselves. While they are taking their toll in human life on the high roads, the village boys, with sticks and stones, catapults and air-guns, will be beating the hedgerows for the scalps of sparrows. It means the sudden end of all the efforts made by schools and "Dumb Friends Leagues" to check the natural cruelty of children, and the demoralisation of the next generation by a form of "sport" at least as ignoble as rabbit-coursing or pigeon-shooting. The advocates of this "killing competition" make no secret of the fact that they regard the slaughter of sparrows as "fun," a sport suited to the tender years and light purses of those who cannot hunt tame deer or "break-up" hares. As a Mr. H. G. Tomlinson put it in the "Times," "Plenty of trustworthy volunteers would easily be found for the work, and enjoy it." The killing of sparrows is to be undertaken, not as a painful necessity and a measure of self-preservation reluctantly forced upon us, but as an enjoyable and congenial sport provided by country gentlemen for village lads. We agree with Mr. Salt that, even if the case against the sparrow were stronger than it is, the "moral and intellectual damage" wrought by this organisation of cruelty would be a more serious loss to the country than any material ruin which the sparrow can inflict.

IRONY.

Like the villain of melodrama, Irony dissembles: saying one thing, it usually means the opposite. Its employment as a figure of rhetoric is various. We find it under the pens of grave, important signiors, such as Gibbon; of elegant reprovers of their times, such as Addison; of wielders of the plaited scourge, such as Swift; of whimsical and meditative gossips, such as Lamb. The preacher and the orator make use of it. It has a cousin at several removes, held in affection by us all, in the form of a good-tempered raillery known as Banter. It is of nearer kin to Innuendo, which insinuates. It owns a terrible brother of the "dreaded name" of Sarcasm, that rends as with fangs. They are all, with others of the family, in the regular service of Satire.

When Lamb, writing to a friend in Botany Bay, says (we quote from memory), "Your hemp, I take it, is one of your chief industries," we recognise the banter he excelled in, with a spice of the oblique, the innuendo. When Sydney Smith, discussing with the Chapter of St. Paul's the proposal to pave the path around the Cathedral with wood, remarks confidingly, "If we lay our heads together the thing is done," we recognise the same method, with an added relish of his peculiar and very frolicsome wit. When he advises the Bishop of New Zealand to assure the native chiefs that there will be "cold curate and roasted missionary on the sideboard," he touches what Bain calls the "cannibal humour" that Swift had developed with proper ferocity in the communication on boiled baby. When a gentleman in Parliament is told by a gentleman on the other side of the floor that "he did his party all the harm in his power—he spoke for it and voted against it," we perceive the innuendo in about as direct and deadly a mode as it is capable of. When Addison exhibits Sir Roger de Coverley in church, we are conscious of that irony of delicate malice which Thackeray (possibly misled by Macaulay) so strangely mistook for the tenderest humour. When Junius addresses himself to the Duke of Bedford (and minds, as he does not always mind, his grammar),

> "My lord, you are so little accustomed to receive any marks of respect or esteem from the public, that if in the following lines a compliment or expression of applause should escape me, I fear you would consider it as a mockery of your established character, and perhaps an insult to your understanding—"

we have the irony, at its artistic best, of pure malignity. When De Quincey presses the claims of murder as a fine art, we feel that his ironic humour will only just go down with us, that it only just makes the situation tolerable. When Gladstone, rising to answer Disraeli, who had manifestly lingered over dessert, said icily, "The right honourable gentleman has apparently had access to sources of inspiration which have been denied to me," he had recourse to a figure of speech which, politely styled periphrasis, contains the quick, dagger-like thrust of sarcasm.

Irony, the learned tell us, was the method of Socrates with the Sophists. It is the method of all who seek to lure on disputants to their discomfiture. It ramifies, however, very widely in literature. The world's masterpiece of sustained irony is, of course, "Don Quixote," which, if a satire, is also very much more. Fitting examples would be too long to present, but, as a happy instance of irony within irony, the reader might be directed to the scene where the bachelor, Sampson Carrasco, plays with the Don concerning the veracious history of him by Cid Hamet Benengeli. It is interesting, by the way, to compare Cervantes' treatment of Don Quixote, Addison's treatment of Sir Roger, and Sterne's treatment of Uncle Toby. In his direst plights the "flower of chivalry" is a dignified gentleman. Buffets and worse his creator suffers him to undergo, but he himself makes us always regard him as the knight errant, merely born out of due season. Knowing him crazy, we yet tender him honour and a deep affection. This is the supreme art of Cervantes. Addison, we feel, is never quite sincere with us about Sir Roger. He has not his tongue in his cheek, as Swift has, when Gulliver "defends his country" against the charges of the Emperor of Brobdingnag. He does not fool Sir Roger as Toby Belch fools Aguecheek, and as all the persons in the play fool Malvolio, and as Shakespeare himself fools Justice Shallow. But when we understand the true cast of Addison's mind, and realise the bent of his genius, we are moderately sure that he is in the main making jest of the gentle knight. He will not say that he regards him as, on the whole, a rather silly old gentleman: that is not Addison's method. But this is the innuendo or insinuation throughout; and we end by thinking that if Addison is not deliberately making game of his hero, he is in some degree making game of us. There are readers who will resent this view of Addison, but we believe it to be a just one. Now, Sterne's Uncle Toby is also in large measure an ironical portrait, inasmuch as that unrivalled strategist of the bowling-green is sometimes admittedly a trifle on the weak side when it comes to distinguishing hawks from handsaws. But no one shall persuade us that Sterne did not dote on Uncle Toby as the rest of us have doted on him ever since. The sheer sincerity of the creation (coupled, of course, with the absolute success of it) is its eternal passport to our hearts.

Rabelais, who flings on the colour with a lavish hand, is very skilled in the broader and more comic uses of irony, bringing to his immense art all the aid of his astonishing vocabulary. Glance at the scene of the trial of Judge Bridlegoose, in the matter of the subsidy-assessor Toucheronde, against whom the Judge had pronounced a sentence "which did not seem very equitable to that centumviral court." Bridlegoose explains and defends his giving of judgment by a cast of the dice.

> "I posite on the end of a table in my closet all the pokes and bags of the defendant, and then allow unto him the first hasard of the dice, according to the usual manner of your worships. . . . That being done, I thereafter lay down, upon the other end of the same table, the bags and satchels of the plaintiff (as your worships are accustomed to do). . . . Then do I likewise and sembably throw the dice for him, and forthwith livre him his chance."
>
> "But," quoth Trinquamelle, "my friend, how came you to know, understand, and resolve the obscurity of these various and seeming contrary passages in law?"
>
> "Even just," quoth Bridlegoose, "after the fashion of your other worships; to wit, when there are many bags on the one side and on the other, I then use my little small dice (after the customary manner of your other worships), in obedience to the law. . . . I have other large dice, fair and goodly ones, which I employ in the fashion that your other worships use to do when the matter is more plain, clear, and liquid; that is to say, when there are fewer bags."

Throughout the whole of the scene, which extends to five or six chapters, the ironical jest is kept up in the gravest manner. A more richly humorous example is the banquet given by Bishop Homenas to Pantagruel and his suite, where the talk is in praise of the thrice-sacred decretals. One after other, on the spur of the moment, Friar John, Ponocrates, Eudemon, Carpalim, and the rest, invent a story of wonders achieved through the sacrosant decrees; and at each recital, Homenas, getting steadily tipsier, proclaims a miracle, and clamours to the waiting-maids to fill him another brimmer of "light." Gymnast takes up the running:—

> "At Cahusac, a match being made by the lords of Estissac and Viscount Lausun to shoot at a mark, Perotou had taken to pieces a set of decretals, and set one of the leaves for the white to shoot at. Now I sell, nay I give and bequeath for ever and aye, the mould of my doublet to fifteen hundred hampers full of black devils, if ever any archer in the country (though they are singular marksmen in Guienne) could hit the white. Not the least bit of the holy scribble was contaminated or touched; nay, and Sansornin the elder, who held the stakes, swore to us . . . that he had openly, visibly, and manifestly seen the bolt of Carquelin moving right to the round circle in the middle of the white; and that just on the point, when it was going to enter, it had gone aside about seven foot and four inches wide of it, towards the bake-house."
>
> "Miracle!" cried Homenas. "Miracle! miracle! Clerica, come wench, light, light here! Here's to you all, gentlemen; I vow you seem to me very sound Christians."

What a treasure of joy is François Rabelais! Has anyone understood better than he what George Meredith means by the "cataract of laughter"? In parenthesis, we may say that (if we remember rightly) Mr. Meredith uses the phrase to describe the "supper in the manner of the ancients" in Smollett's "Peregrine Pickle"; and that super-excellent episode, had we space to give to it, would aptly serve our purpose.

Half a century nearer to us than Smollett is Walter Savage Landor; and we might bring forward as a thoroughly literary example of sustained irony his "Citation and Examination of William Shakespeare," but with diffidence we submit that it is a little tough in the reading. Rather would we name the matchless "Imaginary Conversations," and in especial such a piece as the talk between Louis XIV. and the unctuous confessor.

Still nearer to us, chronologically, is the namesake of the author of "Hudibras," Samuel Butler, whose "Erewhon," at no time as well known as it should have been, is greatly distinguished among the minor, or even the greater, efforts of satire. In "Erewhon" (need we say?) sickness is a crime, while crime receives the treatment that we bestow on sickness. In working this out, Butler, as Garnett says, "holds an inverting mirror to the world's face with imperturbable gravity."

The chapter entitled "An Erewhonian Trial" is a finished pattern of the author's ironic art. He begins with the directness and seeming earnestness of Swift:—

> "But I shall perhaps best convey to the reader an idea of the entire perversion of thought which exists among this extraordinary people, by describing the public trial of a man who was accused of pulmonary consumption—an offence which until quite recently was punished with death."

The case is clearly a very bad one. The prisoner, a young man of twenty-three, coughs incessantly in the dock, and is kept on his legs there solely by the attentions of the two surgeons in charge of him. Vainly does his counsel plead that the young man has been simulating consumption in order to defraud an insurance company from whom he wanted to buy an annuity. "If this could have been shown to be the case he would have escaped a criminal prosecution and been sent to the hospital as for a moral ailment." But the prisoner is damned by his appearance and his cough; and in ten minutes the jury find him guilty. The judge, in passing sentence of hard labor for life, says:—

> "It pains me much to see one who is yet so young, and whose prospects in life were otherwise so excellent, brought to this distressing condition by a constitution which I can only regard as radically vicious; but yours is no case for compassion: this is not your first offence: you have led a career of crime. . . . You were convicted of aggravated bronchitis last year; and I find that, although you are now only twenty-three years old, you have been imprisoned on no fewer than fourteen occasions, for illnesses of a more or less hateful character——" and so forth. Here, again, is an instance of the art that raises the smile which sympathy would repress. But all humour, and the appreciation of humour, have their foundation in malice—and who should know this more certainly than the masters of irony?

Short Story.

THE PATHETIC FALLACY.

Jack Vane had been struck off the rolls for five years for the misappropriation of trust money—he who had lived like an anchorite, to whom money had never been a temptation. He would have been in prison, but that the injured party, a wealthy woman and a distant relative, had declined to prosecute. His career was over at thirty-five.

He had come of people of unblemished integrity, in whom the habit of honesty was ingrained. That morning he had received a letter from his only sister, in which she expressed a chastened thankfulness that their father and mother had been taken away from the evil to come.

He had alleged gambling as the reason of his financial difficulties, although, in point of fact, he hardly knew clubs from spades. One or two of his friends surmised this, and said that there was probably a woman in the business; but they never guessed what woman. Ella Mannering was above suspicion. It was generally felt, at this crisis, that the friendship which, for many years, she had extended to her moody, laconic cousin had been a greater boon than he deserved, and that the Ethiopian who, under her ministries, refused to be washed white was impossible.

She, too, had written, saying that the news of his trouble had come like a bolt from the blue, and asking him why he had done it. That question seemed irrelevant; but perhaps she really believed that gambling had ruined him. Perhaps she had forgotten her own appeal to him four months ago, her piteous story of blackmail and compromising letters, her immediate need of twelve hundred pounds.

Oh! yes, he had seen his way quite clearly to returning the money. That always goes without saying. The fact remained that he had built a shelter for her out of his own dishonor, and discovery had come swiftly and certainly. But her letters were burned. That was well. She had never been wicked, only weak and emotional. And she would marry some strong man—he fancied he knew the man—and be quite good and happy.

To be sure, if she had stood by, it would have seemed possible for him to begin again. As it was, his presence in the world was like a faint reproach to her. That reproach would end to-night. And he did not judge her; he had done with all judgment save this last judgment on himself—that was expressed in the small dark blue fluted bottle that stood before him. He had got it from the chemist's six months ago for neuralgia, and had not used it, which was providential, since just now a chemist who knew his story would have hesitated to supply him. He thought of the monument in St. Paul's with two stone angels, and the legend, "Through the gate of Death we pass to eternal life," and wondered if the little bottle held white angels, or black demons, or only sleep. It seemed very small to hold anything effective, being a two-ounce bottle, and it was dark blue for Oxford—he was an Oxford man.

Surely the step he was about to take was a necessary expiation, a libation to the injured laws, and not a coward's expedient. Yet he knew, also, in his heart, that he was afraid to face the music, the dissonance of remorse and shame that had broken in upon his life. He couldn't disentangle his motives, and it didn't seem to matter. He was done.

No one would miss him acutely. Perhaps, he conjectured vaguely, his own intense desire for love had driven it away from him, since all love flies from exaction; and, though he had exacted very little outwardly, the exactions of his soul had been many, and had made the emotional atmosphere about him heavy and tense, like air charged with electricity. People had often tired of him.

It is a terrible thing to outstay one's welcome in the world—the world of fellowship and sanity and hope—to become conscious of oneself as a menace to its well-being, an obsession, like the nightmare that visits a healthy man. Just then he hardly blamed himself, or God either. Why should he? It seemed to him that freedom and necessity were one, that there was no responsibility, divine or human, that God was a dream of the emotions, which always crave for some half-way house, some halting-place between the infinite and the finite, at which to lay down their burden of passion, or worship, or hate. But if there were responsibility, it would be of the whole, not of the tortured fractions which we call human beings, poor fragments of the world-soul bound on the wheel of life, for other ends than their own. Christ? Yes, Christ was a person who had been broken on the wheel long ago, and it had pleased humanity to worship Him. But what of Judas? He, too, was broken on the wheel; but his agony held at the heart of it no supreme faith and joy. There were broken hearts that God did not despise, and broken hearts that He despised. . . . One was haunted by that term God. Perhaps, after all, it stood for something—some ultimate bliss and harmony into which all discords died. But with that thought he seemed to have nothing to do.

There was no good in waiting, and he rose to get a wineglass. But as he rose a brown retriever at his feet stirred uneasily, and then, without warning, lifted up his voice and howled. He started; he had forgotten the dog.

He stooped down and patted his head, saying farewell to the one living friend, it seemed to him, who had never criticised him, never told him he was a fool. Rough had been a patient dog, not exacting, and not greedy. But he wasn't a handsome animal, nor one for whom it would be easy to find a suitable home. He was snappish with strangers. Moreover, age was creeping upon him. But he had been absurdly grateful, absurdly loyal to Jack. It was a pity to leave him. But, after all, in the great world-tragedy, what is the pain of one more dog?

"Good-bye, old man!" said his master. "Good dog!"

He reached a glass from the cupboard. Rough followed him, whining uneasily. Then, with unusual demonstrativeness, he sprang up, licking Jack's hand.

"It's no use, Rough," he said, as if the dog could understand. "I must do it—I'm knocked. See?"

It was as if the dog acquiesced—he was a very obedient dog—for he fell back instantly and crouched on the ground, one dumb anxiety from head to tail, his eyes following the man's movements. It was worse than if he had barked; then one might have been angry with him. Jack swore softly as he took up the blue phial, but his hand shook. For the first time he realised vividly what would happen after his death. There would have to be a coroner's inquest. He would be carried upstairs, the door would be locked and unlocked for doctors, jurymen, undertakers, and through it all Rough would be trying to force his way into the room. People would kick him and swear at him. Perhaps some good-natured person would drag him into the backyard and give him a bone. He would attack it fiercely, in the first pangs of hunger, and then slink away ashamed, with some dim, doggish sense of having been unfaithful, or he would forget it altogether, in his consuming anxiety to find his master. He had done that kind of thing before now, when Jack was absent. Someone would say, very soon, that it was kinder to put him away, or, if benevolence prevented such summary proceedings, he would be turned out to starve. Jack had a vision of an unattractive dog, wandering, homeless, hungry, masterless, with drooping tail, not understanding even then that the one person in the world who had been consistently good to him could never be found again. If one could only explain to the brute!

Jack pulled himself up in these imaginings.

"It's the pathetic fallacy," he said, angrily, and then his eyes fell on the dark blue bottle, and in a remote, vague fashion, he wondered if an impartial outsider might not have called his despair another instance of the same thing. The dog gave a short, muffled bark. Outside the sun was shining, for the first time that day.

"I'll take him one more walk," said Jack, grudgingly.

After all, it would do later on, when the dog wasn't looking! He put the wineglass back into the cupboard, and the phial into his pocket. Then he took up his hat and whistled to Rough. He had not changed his mind; indeed, his mind was not a plastic one, rather the kind of mind that has to begin all over again from the beginning before it can come to a fresh decision. But he would concede so much to the dog. And the edge of his agony was growing blunt, as if the effect of the anodyne were already creeping over him. So Rough and he went down to their old haunt, the Thames Embankment; and he sat down on a bench, while Rough lay at his feet in the sunshine. Already there was a touch of autumn in the air, and sunshine was pleasant.

No one knew, here, that he had been struck off the rolls; if they had known it wouldn't have mattered. On the next bench, the one he had passed, was a woman obviously of no reputation, the kind of woman one expects to see in other places than the Thames Embankment. But there was a boy of seven with her, whom she had clearly brought to watch the ships and steamers, and in her face, as he passed, Jack had seen fleetingly the sweet, protective look without which the face of a saint is too austere, and that can redeem the face of a sinner.

Then an old man came limping to the bench on which he sat, and sank down heavily at the farther end. Next he drew out a battered pouch, and, with infinite care, as if the particles had been of gold, transferred what coarse shag it contained to the evilest-looking meerschaum that Jack had seen for a long while. Still, the bowl was only half filled, and he groped in all his pockets for any precious débris that might have leaked from the pouch. Jack, watching him with a curious, detached interest, pulled out his own full pouch and replenished the old man's. They entered into talk, and he found that his companion was seventy-six, and lived in a fourth-floor back in Wardour Street. It cost him eighteenpence a week, and he had three-and-six from the parish. It wasn't often he got down as far as the Embankment; but he liked to see the shipping. Yes, his rheumatism was cruel bad, but it was no manner of use grumbling—he'd bear his bit of pain and go!

Jack left him at last, and crossing to the parapet leaned over it—the stone was hot to his touch—and watched the grey river lapping round the piers, the river that always looked to him like the life of the great city—the human life, fed by pure, far-off springs, and dark with shame and pain, as it flowed through the city of time, but passing on to the all-transmuting purity of the sea. What was he, one poor breaking wave, to rebel against the river?

Remorse, in its anguish, looks for short cuts; but very few of those it finds are open to repentance. Strange incoherent thoughts passed through Jack's mind. He thought of all the baulked and inefficient people, halt and maimed of soul and body, better far at dying than living. He thought of obscure frontier warfares, incessant, seemingly trivial, the loss on both sides, the nameless graves, the men facing death in inglorious skirmishes, or invalided home, with their poor pensions—and, either way, God help them! Yet that was how the empire held together.

And there was another empire, with dim, uncertain boundaries, where men fought for a line they could not see, where there was always trouble and ferment, little glory and heavy risk—a frontier held by people who weren't worth much, but they had to hold it for all they were worth. . . . He had been badly beaten, but so had many others, who had yet crept back to the frontier and, scarred and wounded, were fighting still. For that was how the other empire would rule the world one day, the empire called by many names. Jack Vane drew a long breath, and, in another moment, there was a tiny splash, as the river's waves closed over something. He turned and called to the dog.

"Come on, Rough," he said. "We must get some more tobacco!"

May Kendall.

Open Questions.

THE USE OF PUBLIC LIBRARIES.

The annual conferences of the Library Association, of which the thirty-first has taken place at Brighton this week, are probably looked upon by the average layman simply as meetings of librarians, having for their object the advancement of the profession, or the discussion of esoteric problems in library economy. In reality, these congresses have a much less selfish aim, and one of far greater public significance. Of the six hundred and odd members in the Association, perhaps one-third are actual librarians, the remainder being made up of delegates from public library authorities, of committee-men, and of other persons interested in the establishment of a national system of libraries. For the last quarter of a century, the two most powerful factors in the library movement have been the millions of Dr. Carnegie, and the patient activity of the Library Association. The Association has secured amendments in the Public Libraries Acts; it has by its discussions and publications helped to make efficient and economical administration generally attainable; it has, in spite of adverse conditions, established a scheme of professional training for the young librarian; it has secured sound leather for bookbinding, and is laboring to improve the quality of paper and the general durability of books; and among other notable services it publishes an annual volume of one hundred pages, forming a descriptive guide to the best current literature of Europe and America. Above all, the Library Association has been the one influence on the side of concerted and harmonious action, and has steadfastly promoted exchange of views and orderly progress among the scattered groups of libraries administered by the different local authorities.

The library movement has now been going on for much more than half a century, but though few would dissent from the abstract proposition that the public library should be an integral part of the national system of education, it is still a long way from taking up its full position as a necessary complement to our schools. Our public libraries at the present day remain what they have always been, a number of isolated institutions, working, it is true, for a common object, but with no official apparatus for concerted effort, and by as many different methods and systems as there are distinct authorities. Inevitably the result is great overlapping and waste of energy, and innumerable anomalies, the most glaring of which are exhibited by the haphazard conglomeration of libraries in the metropolis. The libraries have also been starved by the miserable financial conditions imposed by the Public Libraries Acts, yet it is doubtful whether they are hampered more at the present time by the lack of funds than by the lack of co-ordination. It must suffice for the present to take London as an illustration of this absence of any organic system. In London there are seventy-nine lending libraries financed out of the rates, with a total stock of 822,168 volumes, averaging rather more than 10,000 volumes apiece; and in "Greater London" there are forty lending libraries, with an aggregate stock of 347,247, averaging a little less than 9,000. There are besides three or four voluntary free libraries, with an aggregate stock of 64,577 volumes. These libraries, together with a score of reference libraries, have been established at various dates, each as a separate unit, and with complete indifference to the facilities afforded by the libraries in adjoining parishes and boroughs, their distribution being the result of principles of local government that are rapidly becoming obsolete. It strikes one as monstrous that Londoners paying the library rate should be debarred by the vagaries of our boundary lines from using the books bought from the same penny rate, simply because they live a few streets away. Mr. Sidney Webb, in 1902, in an address to the Association, truly said of this vast library service that it is not organised at all.

Attempts have been made without success to introduce the obvious reform of making borrower's tickets interchangeable throughout the Metropolis. The Association has also discussed schemes for forming library groups, with a moderate number of good reference libraries established in convenient situations, each with due regard for the specific character and position of its neighbours. Another valuable proposal was put before the Bradford Conference by Mr. J. McKillop, who thought that the London County Council should take advantage of its powers under the Education Acts to remedy one of the most urgent defects of library administration; the failure to provide books for special students and persons engaged in research. Briefly, he would ask the separate libraries to content themselves with collections of moderate size, capable of satisfying the requirements of the average reader. Then he would establish a library in central London, and stock it with long sets of learned periodicals, transactions of societies, and other costly works of supreme importance to students, which the ordinary library acquires only in a haphazard way; such books to be lent to the libraries demanding them on application from the local readers. This central depôt (for the proposed library would not be a place of public resort) would be stocked partly by permanent loans of books from the scattered borough libraries, where quantities of valuable works are at present lying unassimilated and idle, the reader who badly needs them being situated, perhaps, in another part of London, and partly by a grant from the education rate. Some such scheme must be put in operation sooner or later; it would make for economy as well as fulfil an urgent public need.

But it is not only the student and the scholar who is neglected at present. A strong case could be made out for that far more numerous body, vaguely denominated "the general reader," which suffers a good deal more in the aggregate through the present wasteful system, since spasmodic attempts to foster the student mean that few, if any, of our libraries are really complete even as general collections. During the last twelve months, a group of libraries, including Woolwich, Stepney, Poplar, and Hackney, and certain libraries in "Greater London," have entered into an agreement to lend each other books, when a borrower at one requires a work in some other library of the group. The borrower defrays all the expenses incurred, but these have been reduced to a minimum, and in the case of contiguous library districts, where the advantage is at its maximum, there is no expense at all, as the borrower takes his credentials from his own library and fetches the book himself. The combination at present embraces twenty-one lending libraries, with an aggregate stock of 160,000 volumes. The work done so far has been most encouraging; borrowers taking advantage of the scheme use it again and again. The greatest obstacle is the absence of a union catalogue, but if the system is extended to a large part of the Metropolis, this obstacle, with many others, can easily be done away with.

That difficult problem, the wise selection of books, has been a perennial topic of debate at meetings of the Library Association. Needless to say, the Association is anxious to furnish librarians with the best materials for maintaining a high standard of choice, and several members have compiled guide-books to books for the use of both librarians and readers. Much more could be done were the Association financed for this purpose on the same scale as the American Library Association, which has produced a dozen or more guides to all departments of literature, science, and art. I have already alluded to the annual Best Books List—a volume that ought to become the standard index to the best of our current books. Recently, in conjunction with the National Home-Reading Union, the Association has begun to publish a monthly "Readers' Review," in localised editions at some thirty libraries, the object of which is to keep library readers in touch with literature as a living thing, and to furnish them with expert guidance to the books actually on the shelves.

Public libraries are constantly charged, mainly by those who hardly dissemble their hostility to every effort at giving the people opportunities for the higher culture, with being little more than distributors of inferior novels. It is a fact that the issues of fiction for home reading largely exceed those of all other classes of books. Since it is in the novel that the age has chosen to express itself and to contemplate its form and pressure, this must have been so inevitably. But the Association has always taken a sensible view of the case. A public library is something more than a workshop, subserving the arts of life and scientific knowledge and research; it has to satisfy the demand for books dedicated to the humanities. The fiction that stimulates and delights the higher faculties of man—the fiction, in short, that is literature—justly claims a place in our public libraries. So long as we select our novels with the same scrupulous regard for literary merit as we pay to the essay, the drama, and poetry, so long can there be no question that in this department, as in the others, we are promoting the higher culture of the people.

The Association, in default of satisfactory legislation, has undertaken many duties that should properly fall to the lot of some public authority—such, for instance, as that of the training of librarians. For many years the Association has provided lecturers and run correspondence classes and summer schools on the various departments of library country; it has also held annual examinations. Last May, for example, 250 candidates sat for the certificates granted by the Association. The usefulness of the work that has hitherto been done voluntarily by the Association, at great personal sacrifice, is being gradually recognised by University colleges and other bodies. The London School of Economics in 1901 opened its doors to students of librarianship, and several University colleges in the provinces are now offering similar privileges; but until the work is properly endowed, and one permanent library school at the least established in some such centre as London or Manchester, the training of librarians cannot have the continuity and thoroughness that are essential to qualify a man for the administration of a modern library system.

In an age when intellectual culture, scientific research, and even industrial progress, depend to such an extent on books, good libraries must take an all-important place in the life of the community. The most conspicuous defect of our system of elementary education is that it breaks off at a certain point, and does not serve, as it should, to lay a permanent foundation for intellectual habits. Our school children must be taught the use and enjoyment of libraries: to teach them to read may otherwise be disastrous. Our public libraries must be, in the first place, an auxiliary to education; in the second place, a workshop for the technical and the scientific student; and, lastly, a means of intelligent recreation and delight to people of all ages. In close touch with all the artistic, scientific, and literary activities of each town, it will take its true position as the centre and focus of the intellectual life of the nation.

ERNEST A. BAKER.

Present-Day Problems.

THE HARMSWORTH BRAND.—(CONCLUSION.)

> In 1904 Mr. Walter said: "The control of the 'Times' has been in my hands for a good many years past, it is there now, and there it will remain until events over which mortals have no control shall place it in the hands of my successor. No outside influence of any kind or of any origin will ever be permitted to affect the character of the great institution which was founded by my great-grandfather 120 years ago, which has never for a moment passed from the control of his lineal successors."
>
> Biography of Arthur Fraser Walter, chief proprietor of the "Times," in "Daily Mail" Year Book. 1908.

WHEREIN lies a prime source of the untrustworthiness of a paper of the character of the "Daily Mail" and of the American prints of which it is an imitation? Largely in their eschewing of the verbatim or detailed report. "It is a very rare occurrence," said this paper of itself, "that the 'Daily Mail' prints speeches." It includes in this self-denying ordinance any serious report of the proceedings of Parliament, and of the men who guide its activities. Thus the paper which delivers its brawling judgments to the world, unweighted with reason or authority, gives its readers the smallest possible opportunity of judging their value. The case is not heard; only the verdict is announced. Nations and individuals share this summary dealing, which disposes of their destinies after the fashion of the Queen of Hearts in "Alice in Wonderland." Thus, as we have said, in November, 1899, the French were described as our "inveterate enemies," with whom nothing like an entente cordiale could subsist, whose mind was hopelessly perverted by the "dreadful gutter journals" they read, and whose colonies must be "taken from them" as a mark of our profound "contempt" for their character. These elegant extracts, which should be written in letters of gold in front of the "Daily Mail's" pavilion in the Anglo-French Exhibition, served as a foil to the artless suggestion (made in the same month) of an Anglo-German alliance, to be succeeded in its turn (1903) by the proclamation that Germany was a "secret and insidious enemy," and by a long-continued series of "warnings" of an inevitable and imminent war with her. The public, fed on this coarse diet of hatred and suspicion of other nations, forgets that its purveyors have no system of policy which cannot be changed in half-a-dozen issues, and that reckless sensationalism continually varies the object of its light-headed wrath or fancy, but never its method. The danger is that right-thinking men have not time to counteract the mischief-monger, who, day by day, and hour by hour, multiplies, through a dozen instruments, the voice of anger or unreason, as a squeaking gramophone multiplies the notes of Tetrazzini or Caruso. As in the Lever case, the "Evening News" takes up the tale where the "Mail" drops it, and then passes it to the "Mirror," the last word in catch-halfpenny journalism. Take the case of the Russian outrage on the North Sea trawlers three years ago. The "Daily Mail" (February 23rd, 1905) then declared that the verdict of the Court of Inquiry was that the Russian Admiral was "entitled to act as he did." Four days later, as Mr. Morgan-Browne has pointed out, it was obliged to declare the truth, which was that the Court found the Russians not to be "justified in firing on the trawlers." But, in the meantime, the "Mail" had called for "instant reprisals," in case of future trouble, on the ground that the finding of the Court was a "death-blow to arbitration." There, as in a flashlight, you have the whole "Daily Mail"—the untrustworthy intelligence, the rash, violent conclusion from it, the childish logic, the spirit of ill-will and impatience, governed by the ingrained trade sensationalism of the journal, the contempt for deliberate reporting, and the appeal to passion. We will give two capital examples of this spirit, to which we have already referred in brief, before we close these articles.

The first is the Lever case. Of politics the chief director of the "Mail" has always been ignorant. But one would have said that Lord Northcliffe's practical shrewdness and capacity for "business" would have stood him in some stead in a great commercial issue. But the "Mail" never went near accuracy. It failed to defend a single one of its serious allegations, withdrawing them all in panic-stricken haste after Mr. Lever's cross-examination. It is therefore fair to assume that they were all as false as Sir Edward Carson declared them to be. The "Daily Mail" did not fail in breadth and severity of judgment. It charged Mr. Lever with fraud and dishonesty. It declared that the formation of the trust had led to a great dismissal of employees. It said that he had indulged in a "tricky method of trade," that he had cornered the raw material, that he had tried to bribe the Press, including, of course, the incorruptible "Mail," with advertisements, that he had manipulated shares, oppressed the widow and orphan, and sold them 15 oz. of soap so as to lead them to believe that they were getting 16 oz. "Cunning" and "secrecy" were said to have been Mr. Lever's conduct in the sale of the famous soap tablets. The trial showed that the reverse of these charges was true; that the Lever firm had been singularly and unwontedly open and straight-dealing. Still more serious was the view the trial afforded of the good faith of the defendants. Just before the attacks in the "Mail" were opened, a letter was written to the Lever firm, on behalf of Lord Northcliffe, offering to treat the controversy with perfect fairness and friendliness and to insert both sides of the case. In point of fact, only one side was heard, and Sir Edward Carson quoted the case of an important letter written in defence of Messrs. Lever, which was sent to the "Mail" and refused insertion. It only remains to be said that the main features of the Lever case—the vindictive libel, and its withdrawal without an attempt at justification—were repeated at Mr. Churchill's expense during the Manchester election.

But what was the motive of the "Mail" in the vindictive attack on "the Soap Trust"? It could hardly be the dislike of syndicated trading: the largest newspaper syndicate in the United Kingdom, which once aimed at controlling the newspaper distributing business, and thus placing its rivals at its mercy, could not be so fastidious. The prosecution suggested that the cause was the economy of £200,000 in newspaper advertisements which had been set out as one of the reasons for associated production, a matter which the "Mail" had included in its own indictment of the "trust." If this be true—and no attempt was made to rebut the suggestion—the attack on the Levers stands stripped of every vestige of public spirit. It had none of the merit which could fairly be claimed for Mr. Hearst's journals in their costly and powerful crusades against American syndicates.

But the method of the "Mail" was open to graver censure still. Sir Edward Carson insisted that part at least of the correspondence which appeared in the "Daily Mail" was not genuine.

> "The defendants," he said, "published an article headed the 'Sunlight Trust,' and they advertised certain other soaps so as to try and prevent the public buying Messrs. Lever's soaps among others, and they headed the appeal, 'Fifteen ounces make one pound.' They mentioned that correspondence was reaching them from all parts of the United Kingdom in connection with this matter. It would," counsel said, "be interesting to see that correspondence, if it was ever produced. They had an order upon the defendants calling upon them to produce all the letters they had in their possession, but they had not produced any. When a newspaper talked of correspondence, it very often really meant correspondence manufactured in the office."

And again:—

> "To further influence the public, the defendants, under the heading of 'Cruel Blow to the Poor,' published an interview with a widow with a large family, who said the Trust had meant an increase in her weekly soap bill of 1s. 6d. The poor widow, counsel pointed out, must have used ninety-six threepenny bars a week to lose so much. But the plaintiffs had asked who and where this widow was, over whom the 'Daily Mail' had sought to make the tears of its readers flow, but without being satisfied as to her identity. They made interrogations about the widow, and the only answer they got was that the words were contributed by one of their reporters, who was now in the South of France, reporting the strike riots."

If this statement was untrue, and the correspondence was all genuine, why did not Mr. Rufus Isaacs assert the fairness and propriety of his client's procedure?

But when we come to fairness, let us glance at another leading episode in the "Daily Mail's" career, its relations to the Boer War. Whatever may be said of the causes of the South African War, no one will rob the "Daily Mail" of the credit of inspiring much of the spirit in which the British nation entered upon it, the spirit of bitter hatred of the South African Dutchman, and of absolute cock-sureness of beating him after a few insignificant skirmishes. Week after week the readers of the "Mail" were taught in leading articles, in letters, in columns of extracts from censorious writings, that the Boer was a malignant, cruel, hypocritical, and lustful being, the sum of whose bad qualities, one would have said, sadly unfitted him for membership of the British Empire. It is true that the "Mail" laid stress on certain characteristics—such as a habit of "doing to-day what he would undo without a twinge of conscience to-morrow"—which detractors of that journal might possibly attribute to its conductors. But the inconvenience of this method of stirring up passion against a public adversary happened to be that at a moment when diplomacy desired to go a little slower, if only because the military side of the situation had been developed with some deliberation, the Mafficking element contributed by the "Mail" could brook no such delay. Not that the "Mail" was troubled by this trifling impediment to British success. Day by day, in the early stages of the war and the troubled negotiations which preceded it, it told, with some trifling qualifications, a pleasing tale of the Boers' incapacity for modern war. Their tactics were those of "Afridis." On October 9th, 1899, their "threats" might be dismissed with "contempt," for the coming of the Army Corps would be their "doom." True, in pursuit of their savage instincts, they were accumulating a large quantity of cyanide of potassium at Bloemfontein, "presumably for use in poisoning the springs." But in the field they would be merely contemptible, for they had "no organisation whatever," so that the British forces were "in no risk of defeat," while a Boer attack on Sir George White could only mean a "crushing defeat" for these wild tribesmen of the kopjes, who however (October 24th) were too "disheartened" for any such enterprise. On October 11th the country was assured by Mr. H. W. Wilson, who acts as a kind of military-naval-political expert for this highly instructed journal, that, while there might be "trifling reverses" for the British flag, there could be "no disaster." On the same day there was in Natal "no danger whatever," for Boer warfare would be limited, on this side of the theatre of campaign, to "meaningless advances" and "cavalry raids." What else could be expected of "half savages," with an "infantile strategy," which (October 19th, with the "Ladysmith entanglement" drawing swiftly near) might impel them to court "terrible disaster" at Sir George White's hands?

So the paper warriors prattled of the war which was to cost England thousands of lives and scores of millions of money, their proprietor not forgetting, in the daily pursuit of custom, to remind the British public, advertising and other, on the eve of the outbreak of hostilities, that some months' pursuit of "Independent Imperialism" as against the unprofitable errors of "Little Englandism" had brought the circulation of the "Mail" up to 600,000 a day. Was ever such a paper? Was ever such a meagre stock-in-trade of knowledge, conscience, forethought, good feeling, and good sense joined to so prodigious a faculty for self-advertisement and acquisitiveness? Put the Harmsworth paper at its highest—which is the "Daily Mail," now a little chastened by experience—or at its lowest—which is the dreadful, coarsely-printed page smeared with tales of maniac crime like Jack the Ripper's—is there one quality revealed by its directors that they hold in common with the writers and men of the world who built up the "Times"? Is there one great London journal on either side in politics to which it can fitly be compared? Each one of these newspapers can boast of something—the steady advocacy of a political or a social cause, richness of talent and personality in its staff, a well-conceived or brilliant scheme of adventure or enterprise—giving it a title of merit, a standing and substance in the world of journalism and letters.

What title belongs to the "Daily Mail"? Let its conductors, and the conductors of the weekly journals associated with this business, make what pleas and excuses they may—the search for a new public, its half-educated character, and, therefore, its indifference to the old-fashioned paper that the "Mail" has largely pushed aside. Let them proclaim, with justice, the vividness, brevity, and adroitness of their presentation of news, the "push" of their business organisation. But what good have they done, or tried to do, to their country, to the children who buy their wretched crime stories, or their silly, vulgar school tales, to the women whom they dose with snobbery and sentimentality, to the citizens whose minds they fill from time to time with hatred of this country or that, to the simple people, young and old, whose time and small stores of money, and not too broad or elevated intelligences, they waste in idle guessing games, skilful only in name, and truly profitable only to themselves, or turn into a thousand petty channels of gossip and sensation? Could not Lord Northcliffe's cleverness have been put to better use than this? Could he not have set his standard a little higher, even though the sum of his profits stood a trifle lower?

And why, we may well inquire, Lord Northcliffe at all? On what grounds could a Minister recommend such a creation and the King be induced to sanction it? Could not Mr. Balfour have taken the common precaution of reading a bundle of Harmsworth papers, culled at random from the nearest bookstall, so that he could realise what was their method, their commercial aim, their literary standard, before he proposed such a peerage? These are unpleasant questions; but they must be asked and asked again unless the life of our age and people is to be enfeebled by a form of journalism which acknowledges no responsibility to its readers, save the production of a conventionally "bright" and amusing paper. It is deplorable that such a firm, with its present methods and ideals, should be associated with the "Times." It is impossible to think that the special power over public opinion that to this day adheres to Printing House Square can survive such a connection.

Communications.

"THERE IS NO CONQUEROR BUT GOD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I now feel how the prophets of old must have felt when (by chance) their prophecies came out as they had predicted.

When they were wrong people simply said they were fools, and the prophets returned to their usual avocation quite undisturbed. The fulfilment of their predictions placed them in quite a different position. Instantly everyone must have hated them, for whereas we all love a fool, recognising in him a man and a brother, we naturally dislike all those who show the least vestige of common sense, for common sense and hard work are two things that we profess to admire, but really despise and dread.

For the last year all those who knew Morocco have been writing and saying that Mulai Hafid had the whole country at his back. We were told this was untrue, chiefly by gentlemen who had either never been in Morocco or had passed a month there as representatives of some "Diddlesex Herald" or another.

It was hinted that we were in the pay of Germany, though no one ever heard of the Kaiser being over free with his thalers. We were enemies of France, the great Power which Nature herself had pointed out as the natural ally of England. This, too, from writers who had had no words too bitter to apply to France when some of us in our humble way were preaching the "entente cordiale" in the days when it was unpopular.

Well, we are justified, both by faith and works, not our own works, of course, for we are but human, after all. Mulai Hafid has demonstrated to Europe, by the only arguments that Europe ever really cares about—that is, by brute force—that he is the master of Morocco.

That he was the choice of the people of Morocco no one who knew the country ever doubted for a moment; but when did Europe care for a trifle of that nature? Freedom of choice is right and proper for those who have armies and navies, but Poles, Irishmen, Chinese, Zulus, and the rest of those peoples whose funds are not quoted on the Stock Exchange may have some sort of abstract right to be considered as human beings, but they had better not talk too much about the matter, as that sort of thing is apt to annoy a great Power if carried too far. (I do not mention Egypt or India, for fear of bothering your readers with facts.) The first act in the drama has now been played. It remains to be seen what will be the attitude of Europe, and especially of France

The Act of Algeciras is in no wise altered or infringed by what has occurred. That Act declared for the integrity and independence of Morocco, and not for any Sultan in particular.

Everyone knows how it was stretched and trespassed on by France, by her quite unnecessary landing at Casa Blanca, and by all the useless and futile loss of men and money which she has since sustained.

Here, again, I refrain from dragging in the loss of money and death of her subjects (all with their presumable immortal souls), to Morocco.

To insist on such things is to make oneself hateful and hated.

In the past year the French have advanced just sixty kilometres into the country. They assumed to have pacified the province of Chawia, though no one had ever heard it was disturbed—that is, more disturbed than Yorkshire would have been had a force of Germans or Yankees landed in Whitby, because there had been a riot and a few Germans or Yankees been killed by a mob. I hope to have put these sort of things in a common sense way, but really is a Yorkshireman's soul of so much more value to the Creator than a Moor's? That the Chawia has not been pacified (pacification is a thing that can only be achieved with a very large army) is apparent by the fact that at the very first battle, no less than six thousand of the Chawia people are said to have deserted the standard of the ex-Sultan and passed over to the actual Sultan, Mulai Hafid. There can be no doubt that Mulai Hafid is the actual Sultan to-day.

It is for that reason that I have headed my letter as I have done. To the Moors, anything that is, is of God, and the fact that Mulai Hafid is victorious will be interpreted by them as the Will of God.

Now that God's Will is clear, for I presume that in this matter Christians and Mahommedans are at one, and that not even the most bigoted Christian in the world would sustain that Mulai Hafid has conquered against God's will, what is to be done?

As France has suffered heavily, in pocket, in human lives, and in prestige, and, as most clearly from the first, she has been in error, surely now she should try and show her love for that liberty about which we hear so much in her Press. It is time for her at once to withdraw all forces from Morocco and to endeavour to repay the Moors for all the cruel wrongs she has inflicted on them, by leaving them alone.

Spain, her co-mandatory by the Algeciras Act, has shown her how that Act should have been interpreted. She would have shown her still more clearly had not she been so unluckily represented in Paris by Leon y Castille, who has become more French than Spanish by long residence in France.

England might surely give a "cordiale" jog to France, for we cannot stand by and give our countenance to an armed intervention, with all its attendant crime and bloodshed, merely to save the faces of the French politicians who have plunged their country into so Serbonian a bog.

No doubt the Jingo section of the Parisian Press will call out savagely for blood, as did the Jingo section of the English Press during the "sort of war" in the Transvaal. If they do so, the reason will be the same that made our Press so fierce against Kruger and all his works. In France, just as in England during the Boer affair, capitalists have embarked much of their soul (that is their money), and, without doubt, articles will be written and speeches made by the score about the mission of "La France," on Liberty, on Progress.

The fact remains that we are face to face with a whole nation struggling to free itself from the dominion of the European money-lender and the concession-monger, to live its life as it seems good to it, and by degrees to evoke, as have the Turks, free institutions and some liberty.

This to the journalist or to the man of money may seem ridiculous. They well may say, What freedom can there be outside the circle of the freedom that we in Europe know?

Nevertheless, a great occasion has arisen for France and England, for Spain and for all Europe, to make a stand in favor of the Moors, and to show definitely that the Act of Algeciras was not a miserable stalking-horse for filibusters, but a real charter for the emancipation of the Moors.

From whom? I think I hear you say. From the tyranny of Sultans and of tribal fights?

Well, partly so; but ten times more from the blighting breath of Europe, so harmful to the East.—Yours, &c.,

R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM.

Letters to the Editor.

"THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Some of your correspondents have suggested petitioning Parliament on the subject of motor-cars, but it is useless to petition a Parliament made up of so many motorists. The villagers must take the law into their own hands and make the roads unfit for motor traffic. The patience of the villagers is remarkable, but sooner or later they will rise to protect their children and chickens from these ever increasing "road-hogs."—Yours, &c.,

DOUGLAS FOX PITT.

War Coppice, Near Caterham, Surrey,
August 22nd, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The motor problem and unemployment trouble might conceivably be touched by constructing a main road through the land, where no speed limits would apply, and along which hotels, restaurants, repair shops, and possibly even villages would soon appear.

The motor as a carrier-means of marketable commodities has scarcely begun, and I can conceive the use such an agency would be for farmers—among others—to gain speedy access to the large towns possibly through the intermediation of regularly running freight cars.

In all probability the road would soon pay both for construction and upkeep by charging toll.

The number of men that could be kept at work from the very start all along the line would surely make itself felt in the ranks of the unemployed, while the income arising from the sale of land would probably bring satisfaction to hundreds in all parts of the country.

Is this not a matter for a public company?—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES HAMFELDT.

Cricklewood, N.W.,
August 24th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Re "Lost Liberty of the Road." I have carefully read your article in a recent issue of THE NATION, also the letters which appeared therein, but no one seems to me to think of a very simple remedy for all this trouble. Mr. J. Colquhoun Reade seems to me to have made the most sensible suggestion when he suggests that the speed limit should be thirty miles per hour instead of twenty on an open road, and that in villages and towns the limit should be ten miles; but, may I ask, what is the use of licensing cars whose speed is known to be anything from thirty-five to sixty miles an hour, and at the same time make the maximum rate at which they should travel only thirty miles? Does anyone imagine that a driver with a car which can do fifty miles per hour is not going to take the opportunity when he thinks it is quite safe of going at a much higher rate than thirty miles. My simple remedy is this: If cars are to be limited to twenty, twenty-five, or thirty miles per hour, then cars should be built accordingly, and no licence should be granted to any car which has the power to go at, say, five miles an hour beyond the limit speed; that is to say, if the limit is to be thirty miles an hour, then no cars should be licensed which can travel at a greater speed than thirty-five miles per hour. The limit when approaching villages and towns, and when going through villages and towns, should not be more than ten miles per hour.

My own idea of limit is twenty, or, at the very outside, twenty-five miles, per hour on an open road, and that no car should be licensed with a speed power of more than five miles beyond the limit. Where is the sense of licensing cars which can do fifty miles per hour if the limit is to be twenty miles?—Yours, &c.,

JAMES TINTO.

Timperley, Cheshire,
August 18th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. H. S. Clough seems anxious to offer himself as a "shocking example" of the havoc which motoring plays with good sense and good taste. In his two letters he adopts the motorist's favorite line that those who dislike being choked and blinded with dust, or sickened with stench, or terrified by the tearing speed of cars, or being crushed against walls, or having their mangled bodies dragged fifty yards along roads, or having their gardens ruined and their homes rendered intolerable—that all who resent this treatment merely exhibit their "ignorance and prejudice."

But his ire is chiefly kindled if we apply the term "rich vulgarians" to the class of motorists against whom public indignation is being roused to an extent of which Mr. Clough seems to have formed no conception. He first takes the word "rich," and meets it by contending that "the great increase in the number of cars is due to their use by people of moderate means, who, in very many cases, previously had no vehicle of their own." When the obvious meaning of this statement is ridiculed, he stultifies himself by repudiating the interpretation that these people could not have afforded ordinary vehicles. In which case the sentence is wholly irrelevant.

But to turn to the word "vulgarian." "Vulgar" is an ugly word which I personally dislike. It is often most objectionably used to stigmatise little peculiarities or mispronunciations which do not happen to be those that are common among the smart set. But there are some things which the word perfectly describes and to which no other word would so fitly apply. And the rowdy motorist is one of these. A mind so coarse in its perceptions that it can take no pleasure in the beauty or fragrance of our country roads or lanes, and so coarse in its way of regarding other minds that it will deliberately and knowingly destroy those pleasures for others, is a vulgar mind if the word has any meaning at all. The motorists I see in our lovely Lake District, goggled and veiled, tearing along the roads at reckless speed, defiling their beauties with dust and stench as they go, can see nothing of the beauties they rush through, and do all that is in their power to prevent others from seeing them.

I do not think that anyone whose intelligence has not already been injuriously affected by motoring will deny that this is vulgarity of a peculiarly odious kind. It is not negative, but aggressive offensive vulgarity. We can ignore some vulgarians and simply avoid them; but these infest every highway and lane and offend every sense.

I stayed last year with a friend in Switzerland, who used an electric motor. It went easily, made no noise, emitted no stench, the speed was abundantly sufficient for purposes of locomotion, but not so great as to prevent our enjoying the beauties we drove through or to be a peril and nuisance to others. If motorists will use such cars none will complain. If they prefer to be a pest and a peril, to see no beauties themselves and to defile them for others, they openly declare themselves selfish vulgarians of a dangerous and detestable kind, and the question will before long have to be settled whether the country is to belong to these or to the nation.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY HOLIDAY.

"Oak Tree House," Hampstead,
August 17th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I yield to no one in my dislike of motor cars and their manifold offences, but are we not inclined to get things a little out of perspective? To the ordinarily alert persons, in towns at least, there is not much danger, provided that the rules of the road are adhered to. Unless the police stiffen their backs somewhat in this respect, many of these rules will die a natural death, and I should put down the hansom cab as at least as bad an offender as the motor car. Where there is no island, and even at times where there is, vehicles of all kinds turn out of the traffic and cut the corner on the wrong side of the road. The fact that it is illegal, as well as dangerous, to pass a vehicle or cycle on its near side seems to be unknown to or ignored by most of the cyclists and drivers. The place of the slowest vehicle is the side of the road; actually your dray or horse omnibus is to be found, even in a clear road, as near the middle as possible. This is done partly to avoid the slope, but often with the deliberate intention of blocking faster traffic.

Again, the smell from a motor car is only so offensive because cars are permitted by the police to go along emitting a cloud of foul gas and dense smoke; this, I understand, could be stopped under existing laws.

It may interest your readers to know that Calcutta has a speed limit of twelve miles per hour, and an examination to test all applicants for a driver's licence.—Yours, &c.,

W. G. Wickham.

34, Craven Terrace, W.,
August 25th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In reading the correspondence in your columns under the above heading, it has occurred to me that if coroners' juries would do their duty and return a verdict of manslaughter in all cases except where it was clear that the accident was unavoidable and was not due to any negligence on the part of the driver, the recklessness of motorists would soon be effectually checked, as few would care to incur the risk and expense of a trial. In the notes in your last issue there is an account of an inquest where the driver, in answer to the Coroner, admitted that the accident could have been avoided by stopping the motor cab. The unfortunate man who was killed had as much right to be on the road as the motorist, and if he failed to get out of the way, there was not the slightest justification, in law, for driving over him. And yet, in the face of this admission, the jury exonerated the driver from blame.—Yours, &c.,

A Lawyer.

August 26th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—It is evident from the attention given to the subject by journals of every shade of opinion that there is grave cause for complaint and that this is almost universal.

The principal points on which all non-motorists and, we believe, many law-abiding motorists also will agree, appear to be substantially as follows:—

1. The excessive speed at which many cars are driven, involving (inter alia):
   (a) Danger and annoyance to all other users of the public roads.
   (b) The production of clouds of dust, which, besides being a nuisance, are dangerous to health and damaging to all property in the vicinity.
2. Uncalled-for noise, both of machinery and horns, bells, &c.
3. Smoke and fumes, annoying to everyone but the offender, and undoubtedly detrimental to the public health.
4. Reckless disregard of the comfort and convenience of others, and of the ordinary amenities of civilised life.

Nobody wishes to "deprive motorists of the use of the roads," or to "stifle a young and growing industry," which are the typical parrot cries with which objectors are daily assailed, but some remedy is urgently called for, and the following are suggested as some of the points on which the law needs reinforcement:—

1. First of all, the hands of the local authorities need strengthening, to enable them to make regulations to suit local circumstances including:
   (a) Special speed limits.
   (b) Closing of any thoroughfare not suited to motor traffic (as in Holland and Germany).
2. Prohibit the use of any car which emits fumes or smoke or makes an undue amount of dust or noise. Cars to be subject to inspection in the same manner as are cabs, &c., at present. Each car to be certificated for a limited (renewable) period, and this certificate to be liable to suspension or withdrawal for certain offences.
3. Make the owner of the car a party to all proceedings in which the car is shown to be in default. A second conviction should involve total deprivation for a period of the right to drive or use any car except as a passenger.

The cost of special treatment of the roads (now for the first time discovered to be necessary) should be collected by the Excise from the motorists themselves and distributed locally as are other "grants in aid."

The present laws should be more strictly enforced, not so much as regards speed limits on open country roads, but more especially in cases where it can be shown that life or property are recklessly or avoidably endangered.

The time has passed for a mere attitude of "passive resistance." We cannot wait for ever, and if stringent legislation is required for the suppression of an admitted nuisance, the whole body of motorists need not necessarily suffer for the misdeeds of the undesirable element against whom alone such legislation would be aimed. As a lifelong athlete I am naturally an upholder of all legitimate sport, and an earnest believer in a policy of "give and take." At present, however, we "give" all that makes outdoor life worth living, while we "take" poisonous smells, choking dust, and nerve-destroying row. It is too one-sided.—Yours, &c.,

W. Austen Bolam.

August 27th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—A chimney-sweep was recently charged with driving to the common danger in one of the streets of a country town. He hurt neither man, woman, nor child, but was convicted and fined because it was proved to the satisfaction of the Bench that he had driven his light cart at the furious pace of fourteen miles an hour.

A chauffeur, driving a heavy car in the same street, was unable to pull up in time to avoid running over a cyclist, who, alarmed at the approach of the car, had fallen twenty or thirty yards in front of it. At the inquest that followed, where the usual verdict of accidental death was returned, the coroner pointed out that here was no question of a car being driven at a dangerous speed. Police evidence showed it to have been travelling at the reasonable pace of fifteen miles an hour.

Now, I fancy that many of us who dislike privilege would be content to take our chance of being killed on the road if motor cars were restricted to the same pace as other vehicles; but, like your correspondent, "Cassandra," I have very little hope that anything will be done to dock the motorist's existing privileges.—Yours, &c.,

New Forest.

August 24th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Accept my thanks for your patriotic endeavours to restore the lost liberty of the road. "The road"—the very phrase will soon disappear. At present it might better be called "the track," for it practically exists for one class of persons alone—motorists.

Speaking of remedies, you say: "Generally the aim of these measures would be to force the motor trade out of the groove in which it has become fixed and into channels where it may become useful to humanity." There is, I am certain, only one such channel possible—a road of their own. When steam was first used for traction an attempt was made to run "steam carriages" on the road; these were practically motors. The speed attained was from eighteen to twenty-four miles an hour; the lower figure was the usual one, but the annoyance, dust, noise, danger, and possibility of losing the liberty of the road for all other vehicles, riders and pedestrians, caused all such things very soon to be relegated to a road of their own—that is to say, the railway. This, properly supervised and organised, gradually became the magnificent system that, on the whole, it is. Of course, even with their own tracks there would be places where motors would have to cross ordinary high roads, others where they would be compelled to pass along them for a short distance, but in these cases they would have to be under regulations infinitely more stringent than any at present in force.

I should have used the words "their own tracks" rather than "roads" for reasons that need no stating.

"Would it be very costly?" you will ask. Not a hundredth part the cost of a railway, I reply. And who is to pay? Themselves primarily—afterwards such of the public as may make use of this method of travelling in public vehicles.

Surely things cannot remain as they are. Rural England is all but ruined, whilst in London our windows have to be kept shut on a hot summer day, otherwise we cannot hear each other for the din outside. "Town," "country," and similar expressions will soon have no meaning. Life is held to mean going rapidly from A to B, and back again from B to A.—Yours, &c., J. C. Paget.

August 20th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I fear that the so-called considerate motorist is somewhat of a "myth."

Whenever I have been in motorist circles listening to the conversation I find that one and all acknowledge they break the speed limit; they all have to tell of striking adventures, of narrow escapes, dogs and poultry killed, of how near they have been to collisions with other vehicles, and passengers on the road, and the tricks they have played on the public and the police. These tales are not told with shame. I feel, therefore, that it would be dangerous to trust them. Their apologists write one way, and they do another. One thing above all others would restrain them, and that is imprisonment for reckless driving, whenever they are caught; and, secondly, insurance companies ought not to be allowed to insure motorists against accidents caused by culpable negligence.

I know of a case recently in which a motorist rightly or wrongly was convicted at the assizes for damages done to others. I give him credit for the ordinary human feelings, but for some reasons he enjoyed the case rather than otherwise, and he knew beforehand that although he might be nominally fined hundreds of pounds, and have to pay the legal expenses, yet he felt personally quite comfortable, as he was insured. He suffered, then, practically no punishment at all. Within a very few days he informed me that he had travelled in his motor to a certain town, and came back by express train, but his return journey took a longer time than his outward one. He passed through some populous places, and his average worked out at twenty-six miles an hour. These are the sort of cases the police ought to catch.

Motorists also travelling in the evening, when the main roads of our cities are practically deserted, return from long journeys at great speed, and hooting continuously without the slightest regard for the inhabitants who wish to obtain their needful rest.

I do not believe there would be so many accidents, if both motorists, and particularly motor cyclists, and pedalling cyclists, were forbidden to use horns at all (they are a nuisance by day and night), and if they were confined to the use of bells it would be much pleasanter for everybody. The motorist is compelled by law to hoot, and is encouraged to think that he can then proceed with safety, when he has made noise enough. The penetrating sounds of the vile motor horns and syrens do not allow us quiet lives even in our own homes, and the sooner the inhabitants of these islands band themselves together, and say they will have some comfort, and will not continue to be annoyed, the better it will be for everyone.

If the motorist slowed up as he should, when he sees an obstruction, instead of continuing his pace at the same speed, sounding his horn imperatively, the public would be much safer, and our lives not made a burden. I find I am not alone in being sensitive to noise.—Yours, &c.,

"Pro Bono Publico."

August 17th, 1908.

"A CRISIS IN COFFEE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I be permitted to point out a few inaccuracies in your article of the 22nd inst?

No Brazilian battleships are on sale; the Brazilian Government is not corrupt; there is no large or small town in Brazil where white men are not allowed to walk on the pavement; the commercial and agricultural development of the country is not mainly in German and British hands; there is scarcely any direct taxation in Brazil, but the State of Rio Grande do Sul pays its contribution to the Federal Government by a high import duty in exactly the same way as any other State in the Union; the depression in coffee and rubber could hardly have been greater, but has not been fatal to Brazil's prosperity or credit; the Bank of France has not refused to lend any more money on coffee warrants, and it is a practical certainty that the State of Sao Paulo will be able to hold the purchased stock of much less than nine million bags without danger of bankruptcy.

The burden on the planters to repay a consolidation loan of 15 millions will undoubtedly be very heavy, but the already decreed surtax of 5 francs on every bag exported will yield two millions per annum, and the calculation of the number of years required to repay capital and interest, after setting aside sufficient funds for storage, is simple arithmetic. What will eventually become of the coffee is a more difficult question to answer. The trade will probably have to get accustomed to this sword of Damocles, which will be suspended by a strong golden chain until the accident of drought or frost or the effects of well-judged propaganda will allow the load to be removed. This may not be for ten years, but in the meantime the coffee is an asset for the State in much the same sense as the gold reserve in the Bank of England.

If once the holding of the Government of the State of Sao Paulo comes to be looked upon as definitely withheld until urgently called for by the consumer, and thus ceases for the present to be calculated as an integral part of the world's visible supply, the market must respond, and when it does so, to the tune of 5 francs per bag, the planter's burden is gone. It will be objected that, after all, valorisation will still have accomplished no good purpose for the State of Sao Paulo, but I am not concerned to offer any apology for the action of the Government. A blunder has been committed, but it is not irreparable, and will entail neither revolution nor bankruptcy.—Yours, &c.,

Chas. Evers.

August 26th, 1908.

[We can only say that we have no reason to doubt the general accuracy of our article, and that we envy our correspondent his certainty on so many matters that rest upon report or opinion.—Ed., Nation.]

A PROPOS DE BOTTES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Mr. Thomas Seccombe speaks of "the tasselled Wellington, dear to the heart of Jos Sedley." Jos wore Hessian boots, and Hessian boots were tasselled. The last man who wore them was Mr. H. F. Stephenson, who died in 1838, and was father of the present Usher of the Black Rod. Hessians were superseded by Wellingtons, which had no tassels, and were worn inside the trousers.—Yours, &c.,

August 24th, 1908. G. W. E. R.

"A GREEN HEAVEN."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Under the above title your correspondents refer to the Garden of Eden or Paradise in contrast to the New Jerusalem or the shining golden city of the Apocalypse; and you yourself invite information as to the popular thought on the subject. I may say personally that, having had a long professional course, I have often heard expressions about a future life from the sick and dying, and the similarity of these expressions had so much struck me that I one day turned over the pages of a well-known hymn-book, and also some other devotional work, to see what the orthodox teaching was. I there found, to my surprise, how like this was in the words used to those which were quite familiar to me. It was therefore evident that the Protestant Church had nothing to impart as to the nature of another spiritual world. Unfortunately, I am away from home as well as my library (being convalescing after a long illness), and therefore I must trust to my memory, but I am sure that many words employed in the idea of heaven imply little more than a negation. This necessarily must be the case, for, as all our knowledge is obtained through the five senses, it is impossible to gain a glimpse of what a place is like when filled with spiritual beings. All descriptions of heaven must be purely metaphorical, even in the hands of so great a genius as John Bunyan.

As most people have gone through hardships of various kinds in life, the heaven they look forward to enter is a place where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest, as with the lotos-eaters, where all was afternoon and there was no peace but rest. Heaven, therefore, is a place of rest, and with some even more than this. It is a place where they will be unconscious; at least, I see no other meaning to be given the figurative expression sleep. I do not perceive myself much difference between this state and one of non-existence, although the true Christian would be horrified at the thought of annihilation after death, as held, I believe, by the "Positivists." My statement is made in consequence of having so frequently heard these terms used by the friends of deceased persons and printed in the daily obituaries. He or she has gone to his rest or his eternal rest, is almost daily seen; or he is now sleeping in the arms of Jesus. This expression, or its synonyms, is to be frequently met with in hymn-books.

How far this rest is real happiness opens up another question which need not be discussed, as it is irrelevant to the present one, but I might remind those who have read the works of the distinguished American, Professor James, that he declares he cannot understand happiness except in this wicked world. They may remember his description of a new Eden formed by a reading society wherein nothing evil enters, and virtue alone in all its forms is practised, and how he admired it all. And yet the rapture of delight he felt when he left its gate, and how he much more enjoyed a world of vicissitudes, showing him that it was there, with all its crimes and vicissitudes, happiness could only exist. The Professor quotes FitzJames Stephen to the same effect, and how the latter looked back with the greatest pleasure and satisfaction to his first voyage across the Atlantic in a sailing vessel when the weather was stormy and he was in danger of shipwreck, for he regarded it as an important era in his life. But he found no pleasure in his later quiet voyage when the ship was merely an hotel, and he was surrounded with all the luxuries and requirements of his daily needs. This feeling might carry us further into the whole question of human nature, and make us agree probably with the writer on Art who maintains that all beauty depends on its contrary. We might then enter into the question discussed ever since the time of the Greeks whether the feeling of beauty was innate or acquired.

Without occupying your valuable space further, I may say to your inquiry, "What is the popular idea of heaven?" it is a state of rest or inactivity, or even with some it is a state of sleep—meaning unconsciousness. If this be so, my answer to your first correspondent would be that a Garden of Eden would be preferred to a New Jerusalem.—Yours, &c., SAMUEL WILKS.

Eastbourne, August 23rd, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am well aware of the distinction between "Paradise" and "Heaven" pointed out by Mr. Jupp. But in ancient Christianity this distinction was not clearly borne in mind, if it was ever really made at all. By "the Fatherland of Paradise," "Patria Paradisi," the old offices for the dying and the dead quite clearly intend Heaven, and not a kind of Purgatory—not an "intermediate state," but the final rest. The most cursory glance at them shows this quite plainly. "May thy place be to-day in peace, and thy habitation in the holy Zion." "May'st thou see thy Redeemer face to face, and always in His Presence, with blessed eyes behold the unveiled Truth." "May the holy Angels come to meet him, and lead him into the heavenly city Jerusalem." "We beseech Thee for the soul of Thy servant which Thou hast to-day bidden to depart out of this world that Thou would'st order it to be received by the holy Angels and led to the Fatherland of Paradise, and that because it hoped and believed in Thee it may not suffer the pains of hell, but possess eternal joys." "May the Angels lead thee into Paradise. May the Martyrs receive thee at thy coming, and lead thee into the holy city Jerusalem."

But I do not wish to enter upon a difficult theological question. What I had in mind in writing was the mental picture of the other world made by simple people at different periods, and what was actually expected and hoped for by them —Yours, &c., THE WRITER OF THE ARTICLE.

August 23rd, 1908.

HEAVEN AS SEEN BY CHILDREN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The following report may interest your readers:—

"Is Heaven a nice place, like a garden?" said Nell.

"Ah!" said Charlie, the eldest boy, "you girls never do understand anything. Of course it is nice, or we should never make ourselves so miserable all day Sunday to get there—always being quiet, and church, and all that."

"I don't think much of it," said Jack. "There's nothing to eat and no larks."

"How do you know?" shouted Charlie.

"Well," said Jack, "what would be the use of the jolliest sorts of grub if you can't eat it? When your mouth and everything are gone, it would be awful lines to see the stuff about and not be able to wire in."

Said Nell, in a ghostly voice, "There's spirits!"

"Ah!" said Charlie; "and a jolly lot of good spirits would be to us—teetotallers, same as we are."

"I ain't," said Jack. "I had some of Uncle George's whisky in water. It was splendid, and burnt all the way down."

"That can't be like Heaven," said Nell. "Nothing can burn there—there is no fire."

Jack: "Shouldn't like that—not in mornings."

Charlie: "Mornings! Shows what a lot you know about it! There will be no sun nor moon nor day nor night."

"Nor nothing," said Jack, "as far as I can make out, 'cept clouds."

"I think," said Nell, "Heaven must be going on now. When auntie took us to see 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' at the theatre, and Topsy and Eva, I saw a lovely bit of Heaven when the angels took Eva up after she was dead. Her nightdress was just like shiny moonlight. I thought the angels looked tired. Perhaps Eva was fractious in dying, like baby at nights, and worried the angels."

"Bah!" said Jack, "angels! They are only a lot of girls. One of our sixth form kissed one as she came out. He said she smelt of onions. I hate onions."

"Oh! yes," said Charlie; "but when you had the debility didn't you used to cuddle up to Nurse Jeannie, and she likes onions?"

"She never smells of anything," roared Jack; "and when I'm a grown-up I shan't bother about Heaven. I shall marry Jeannie. She will be very useful when mother's head is bad and there's rows in the kitchen."

Nell: "You boys always talk about getting married when I want to know about Heaven. Wonder if it is going on now?"

Charlie: "Shows what a lot of use it is for you to go to church. Didn't they read, 'The trumpets shall sound continually, and the blood shall be up to the horse bridles, and they shall sing'——"

"Couldn't sing when their throats are gone," interrupted Jack. "But perhaps it was the Volunteer brass band and the wars, becuss of the blood."

"How horrid!" said Nell. "I'm sure they couldn't sing with all that mess about."

"Just like you," said Charlie; "ask a lot of questions, and when you are told, find fault."

"But you haven't told us," said Jack. "Father told us the world was millions of years old, and what a deuce of a time some of them must have been waiting for your trumpets, unless they were blowing all the while."

Nell: "That would not be all nice."

"What ignorance!" shouted Charlie. "You don't understand a bit. All these things are spiritual like—like very fine air."

"Ah!" said Jack, "I know—a sort of wind."

And upon the breath of that last blast I wafted myself away.—Yours, &c., JOHN HIGGINS.

Pylle, Somerset, August 18th, 1908.

EMDEN AND ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Reading your extremely able article on an agreement with Germany immediately after a visit to the Frisian coast, I am emboldened to ask your permission to state the reasons why agreement is impossible, unless Germany abandons purely aggressive—not defensive—preparations for attack on some Power unnamed. It is beyond dispute that no Englishman free from mental disease desires war with Germany or any other Power, and it is equally clear that the average German outside the Army, especially in the North, is as much opposed to war with England as the average Prussian was opposed to the war with Austria. Unfortunately, however, the pacific spirit of Germans and Englishmen, and their passionate desire for peace—at all events on our side—are not the deciding factors. Mr. Asquith and Sir E. Grey, with the United Kingdom at their back, will never make war on Germany. But when Germany makes war, the assent of the German people is neither invited nor required, and therefore, if war comes, it will be the act of an Administration, not the desire of a people on either side of the North Sea.

The Bismarckian method, when closely studied, is consistent, logical, and patriotic. For national purposes it launches a policy of which the national conscience disapproves. When it is a fait accompli, the nation accepts it.

No German except the Duke of Mecklenberg—according to King William, approved of the Austrian war, but every German now accepts the result and admires Bismarck's audacity and courage.

In the case of France, it was essential to drive France into a declaration of war. Bismarck succeeded. What I fear in our own case, is that German policy will goad some future English Ministry into repeating the policy of Pitt at Copenhagen, and of becoming the nominal aggressor in a war that the rulers of Germany desire and intend.

If this were not so, how can the existence of the new Emden be explained? To describe Emden as a rival to Hamburg or Bremen is a wilful deception. It is a dead town galvanised into life by Bismarckianism and aggressive militarism. Floods of money have been spent on it, and the enormous cost of the dredging operations now being carried on is not explained by the prosperous herring fishery of the coast. Fishermen's nets were almost the only sign of life on the miles of deserted quay and warehouse that have been erected, not for commerce or defence, but for aggression, because the whole apparatus can be put to no other use than aggression. What is the object of those Emden quays? Why twenty-nine great cranes? Ten of them are electric travelling cranes. There is a large coal tip which will unload twelve railway waggons per hour and discharge into war vessels alongside.

These arrangements are necessarily meant for war vessels, because merchant ships do not resort to Emden for the purposes of coaling, except on rare occasions, and the quays are useless on any commercial theory.

The Ems Jade Canal can be easily made available for torpedo boats, and although the railway track from Oldenburg to Leer up to the present date is a single line, it is sufficient for all purposes of the Tenth Army Corps, which is quartered in the neighbourhood. Krupp's proving range for artillery at Meppen is near Rheine, and the passage of heavy guns attracts no attention.

The phenomenon of Emden is inexplicable on any ground other than that of sudden and deliberate aggression.

The immense harbour system, with the miles of quay space practically deserted, make a powerful impression on the mind of one who agrees with Mr. Winston Churchill that there is no Englishman outside a lunatic asylum who desires war with Germany.

We are told moreover, that the new German Navy is intended for the protection of German commerce in all parts of the world. Since coal is the breath of the Empire, and coaling stations the lungs, the German Navy cannot be intended for commerce-protection, because there are no German coaling stations in the Atlantic, Mediterranean, Persian Gulf, or Indian Ocean. In time of peace British coaling stations are at the service of Germany, but the construction of German Dreadnoughts and Indomitables is not to be reconciled with any theory of commerce protection.

Unfortunately for the world, the Bismarckian war policy does not depend on the assent of the governed. The will and intelligence of five or six Germans are all that are necessary to light the conflagration. A hundred years ago Napoleon told the French people that the choice of their destiny lay between artificial restriction of the population —Malthusianism—and expansion. The French have followed Malthus; the Germans prefer expansion, and the menace of this country is not the insensate folly of German or English jingoes, but the never-ceasing cry from a million German cradles. When Englishmen understand the German point of view, they will appreciate the inevitableness of German expansion, and surely it should be within the limits of English diplomacy to enquire the meaning of Emden and the building of the German Dreadnoughts, which are useless for commerce protection, and can have no other function than to wrest the mastery of the seas from this country. Intellectually and physically, the average German to-day may excel, as is claimed, the average Englishman, but the menace of Emden may play the part of a Savonarola in awaking this country from sleeping sickness, and enable her to improve the quality of its men and women by improving the lot of the disheartened and by giving them something to live for. We should then need no leagues to spread the love of country. We are now drifting towards a collision, because there has been no frank interchange of views between the great German people and British democracy.—Yours, &c., ARNOLD WHITE.

August 17th, 1908.

[We cannot deny Germany the right to construct quays suitable for the reception of men-of-war, or say that they have a more aggressive purpose against us than Rosyth has against her. Both Powers are building against each other, in fear of each other.—ED. NATION.]

THE DILEMMA OF A LIBERAL LAWYER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am not a lawyer nor an abstainer, but may I give a short reply to "Ignoramus"? A few years ago I held shares in two brewery companies which yielded good dividends. I became alarmed with the way licensed houses were, as I thought, recklessly being bought up, and also with the small amount set apart in the balance sheets for repairs and depreciation of property. For a trade always liable to restrictive legislation from whichever party happens to be in power, and with the knowledge of the Sharp v. Wakefield case as a warning, such depreciation was foolishly inadequate, and the sums paid in dividends far too large. I sold out at good premiums, and advised my friends who held shares to do the same. The shares I had sold declined heavily in price while Mr. Balfour was in office. "Ignoramus" is a Liberal, and asks if he should leave his party because he advised some clients to lend money on licensed premises which I presume he is now afraid may prove a bad investment. Obviously the advice he gave to his clients was unwise, but why blame the Liberal Party for that?—Yours, &c., C.

August 19th, 1908.

Poetry.

"ON YOUR ACCOUNT I SHALL NOT DIE."*

(From the Irish.)

O WOMAN shapely as the swan,
On your account I shall not die:
The men you've slain were trivial men,
Not such as I!

Well shaped the breasts and smooth the skin,
The cheeks are fair, the tresses free!
And yet I shall not come to death
God over me!

Those even brows, that hair like gold,
Those languorous tones, that virgin way,
And flowing limbs and rounded heel
Slight men betray!

Thy spirit keen through radiant mien,
Thy shining throat and smiling eye,—
Thy little palm and side like foam!
I cannot die!

O woman shapely as the swan,
In a cunning house hard-reared was I,
And so, white breast and well-shaped palm,
I shall not die.

PADRAIC COLUM.

* There are two versions of this poem in English already. Mr. Douglas Hyde has placed a metrical translation opposite the text in "The Lore Songs of Connacht," and Mr. Alfred Percival Graves has made another version. Both of these are in the difficult metre of the original. The present translation may convey something of the hardness and concentration of the original.

Reviews.

THE STORY OF DARTMOOR.*

In this country at the present time we have two different kinds of prisons; prisons for the punishment of offenders sentenced to short terms of detention, and prisons for offenders sentenced to penal servitude. All offenders sentenced to imprisonment for two years and under (and these compose the bulk of the prison population), are committed to what are called local or county prisons. All offenders who have received a sentence of more than two years, are sent to penal servitude prisons. These penal servitude or convict prisons, as they are technically called, are four in number: Aylesbury, Parkhurst, Portland, and Dartmoor. It is of the last of these grim establishments, the great convict prison on Dartmoor, that Mr. Basil Thomson has just written the history. Mr. Thomson has many qualifications for the task. He tells us that he was Governor of the prison for seven years. He has had access to all the records relating to its past. His practical experience of prisons, imprisonment, and the habits and character of the convict population, are all placed at the service of the reader. At the present moment Dartmoor is the principal penal establishment in the United Kingdom, and contains an average daily population of over one thousand convicted men, whose sentences range from three years' detention to penal servitude for life. Its history as a place of detention goes back to the early years of the last century, and revives the recollections of our great war with France. Dartmoor was not in its origin a convict prison at all; it was started as a place of safe keeping for prisoners of war. It was within a day's march of Plymouth; the land, as it belonged to the Duchy of Cornwall, was to be had for nothing; it was represented to the Admiralty that Dartmoor was "a most eligible and healthy situation" for a prison. Considerations of this kind decided the authorities to choose it as a site for a war prison; it was completed in 1809, and on the 24th of May in that year, 2,500 French prisoners were marched up to Dartmoor from Plymouth, and were followed by another 2,500 a month later on.

The life of a prisoner of war was not an enviable one. The daily allowance of food was scanty; far short, in fact, of what is now found necessary for convicts in the hungry air of Dartmoor. It was no uncommon thing for the imprisoned Frenchman to consume his daily ration at one meal, and to go without food till the following day. Those who could not afford to buy provisions were always hungry. One day the soup was discovered to be full of dead rats, whose heads and tails and feet were dredged up from every bucket, but so great was the hunger of the prisoners that only a very few of the most squeamish abstained from eating it. In spite of French gaiety, insufficient food produced nervous irritability among the prisoners, and a mere jest or sharp word was immediately followed by a challenge to fight. The prisoners, possessing neither swords nor pistols, had to resort to all sorts of curious weapons, such as scissor blades, razors, and compass legs. Even with these weapons many duellists received dangerous wounds, and some were killed outright. In fact, the number of deaths and suicides in the prison was so great that the Plymouth Coroner protested to the authorities. But the Admiralty, who had charge of the prison, instead of improving the condition of the prisoners, met the Coroner's complaint by undertaking to pay the jurymen who had to attend the inquests one shilling for each attendance, instead of the eightpence which they had formerly received from the parish. Such is the wisdom of a Government Department. In such circumstances it is not surprising that the imprisoned men excited the pity of the country folk, and many of them, with their assistance, escaped to France. Fishermen and smugglers made their living by arranging escapes, and the militiamen on guard over the prisoners were often successfully bribed to allow a prisoner to get away. A Government inquiry which took place as to the causes of these escapes established the fact that the town of Launceston was more French in its sympathies than English. One man, Samuel Smith, a mason, was described "as a very disaffected old fellow, very much attached to the French and to their principles." The ideas of the Revolution had made a deep impression on the minds of the English middle classes, and to whatever place in England the French prisoners had been sent, they would have found many friends and sympathisers. The second war with the United States brought many American prisoners to Dartmoor. They proved to be much more difficult to manage than the French, and the fact that the prison was already overcrowded when they arrived did not contribute to make them welcome visitors. The Americans had none of the distractions which the French had invented for whiling away the monotony and miseries of prison life, and a certain number of them enlisted in the British Navy to escape the horrors of Dartmoor.

After the peace with France and the United States, Dartmoor was deprived of its inmates, and it remained almost unoccupied for more than thirty years. It was a bleak, inhospitable spot, and all the attempts which had been made to utilise it for agricultural purposes had failed. During the first half of the last century convicts sentenced to penal servitude were not kept at home to undergo their sentences; they were, as a rule, transported to Australia and Tasmania. But as these colonies grew in population and organisation, they became less and less willing to receive the dregs and desperadoes of the Mother Country, and transportation had to be abolished as a method of dealing with crime. At the best it was a wretched system, and the decrease of crime in this country may be said to have begun with the abolition of the practice of sending convicted offenders to penal settlements beyond the seas. But the Government had made no preparation for a change of system. When transportation suddenly came to an end, they were at their wits' end as to the disposal of the criminal population. In those days the local prisons scattered up and down the country were in the hands of the county authorities. The Government had to negotiate with the county magistrates for accommodation in the county prisons for offenders sentenced to penal servitude or transportation. But the county prisons were soon filled, and the old war prison at Dartmoor had to be opened for convicts. Even after this was done, the tremendous sentences which it was then customary to inflict soon had the effect of overcrowding the prisons, and in 1853 the ticket-of-leave system was extensively resorted to, in order to diminish the congestion. But several of the prisoners liberated on ticket of leave were soon afterwards re-arrested on charges of burglary or housebreaking; a panic arose in the country, and the order went round to the convict establishments that ticket-of-leave was to be abolished, and that the convicts would have to serve out their sentences to the last day.

Had the authorities possessed the slightest glimmering of common sense, or the most elementary knowledge of human nature, they might have foreseen the effects of such an order. Every one of these men was pining for liberty; every one of them was confidently counting on the reduction of his sentence as a reward of good behaviour. It is easy to imagine the state of mind of a man eagerly looking forward to freedom, when he was suddenly told that the moment of his liberation was to be delayed for years. The effect of these perverse proceedings on the prisoners confined at Dartmoor was disastrous. Escapes became common; assaults on warders increased in frequency and violence, and the prison was a pandemonium. Sir Joshua Jebb, then the official head of the prison administration, tried to improve the situation by increasing the rations. But it was all to no purpose, and matters did not improve till the old incentive to good conduct in the shape of a remission of sentence was restored. It is unfair of Mr. Basil Thomson to blame the humane policy of Sir Joshua Jebb. Some of its details may have been defective, inasmuch as he was experimenting on an unknown field. But the essential principles of his administration were sound. Imprisonment at its best consists in reducing a civilised human being accustomed all his life to liberty to the condition of a slave. Such a condition in itself is inevitably demoralising to character and conduct, and the only way in which that demoralisation can be held in check is by humane and considerate treatment. A timid movement in this direction has recently taken place in our prison administration. We have only to look at the latest reports of the

* "Dartmoor Prison." Basil Thomson. Heinemann. 3s. 6d.

Commissioners of prisons for an indisputable proof of its beneficent results. Almost every governor, doctor, and chaplain engaged in prison work asserts that the improved dietary, the associated labor system, the remission system for short term prisoners, the Borstal system for juveniles, and other minor alleviations in the prisoners' lot, are producing a wonderful improvement in prison discipline, as well as a highly beneficial effect on the character of the individual prisoners. Humanity and discipline are not two antagonistic ideas, as some prison administrators seem to suppose. They are complementary, and it is only the official acting on these lines who is fit to be in control of convicted men.

WILLIAM PENN.*

William Penn was born in a year of civil strife, the year that saw Prince Rupert and the Duke of Newcastle ride out of York to meet the Ironsides on Marston Moor. He was living in London when Cromwell was Protector; in the year of the Restoration he entered Christchurch; he was a friend of James II.; he lived through the reigns of William and Anne, and died after the first Hanoverian had reigned for four years.

His father, Admiral Sir William Penn, resided in the City of London. Handsome houses, with gardens sloping to the river, stood close to London Bridge, and fashionable people received their friends hard by the walls of the Tower. The Penns withdrew from London filth in the Plague year, but when the Fire followed Pepys and the Admiral might be seen digging a huge pit for their valuables. Mrs. Grant gives an interesting picture of England's inns, good because travel by land was slow and difficult. "The birch floors were swept clean, the sheets smelt of lavender, and the home-made bread and home-brewed ale, and trout from the stream, with the produce of the farmyard, caused these halting-places to be looked upon with favor." Travel by water was no better than by land. A journey from Brill to Harwich meant suffering for Penn for three nights and two days, and his first voyage across the Atlantic was accompanied by small-pox, which demanded toll of one-third of the passengers.

In such an England Penn rose to fame in the cause of civil liberty, of spiritual religion, and of peaceful colonisation.

Charles is sometimes acclaimed as a champion of liberty by virtue of the Habeas Corpus Act, which we are told, only passed the House of Lords by a corpulent peer being counted as ten in jest—a precedent which might be commended to modern Prime Ministers in their endeavours to get Bills through the Lords. The authoress tells us that Charles II. was not a persecutor. It may be true, in the constitutional sense that his sayings were his own whilst his deeds were his Ministers'. Surely the Clarendon Code must rise up against him, and the fact that thousands of Englishmen languished in foul gaols for their religious convictions. Although the King had no intention of going on his travels again, the Second Stuart Tyranny was a reality, and "the people's ancient and just liberties" needed a champion. Penn pleaded for the fundamental laws of England: "Are our liberties to be invaded, and the laws of our country not to be observed? The Lord of Heaven will be judge between us in this matter, which concerns thousands of persons as well as my own case." When the jury brought in a unanimous verdict of "guilty only of speaking in Gracechurch Street," the infuriated magistrates haled prisoner and jury alike to Newgate. The trial is memorable in the development of our civic liberties and in the prisoner's persistent questioning of his judges. When the Recorder of London remarked to Penn, "If I should suffer you to ask questions till to-morrow morning, you would be never the wiser," Penn aptly replied, "That is according as the answers are."

The middle of the seventeenth century was notable for a keen search after the things of religion. One man seeks them in outward uniformity, another in inward conformity. "Poor grey old little Laud" dreams his dream out of a perfect church; Fox, the maker of the perennial suit of leather, grasps the thought, "There is one, even Christ Jesus, that can speak to thy condition." To Laud, says Mr. Trevelyan, "the Church was not so much the temple of a living spirit as the palace of an invisible King." For Fox, the Church was "made up of living stones, living members, a spiritual household which Christ was the Head of." The whole conception of Early Quakerism, of which Penn was an exponent, is missed, if one fails to recognise its two-fold aspect: mysticism and ethics. It is the mysticism of the Fourth Gospel combined with the ethics of the Synoptists. Nowhere is this religion of the spirit better expressed than by Barclay: "When I came into the Silent Assemblies of God's People, I felt a secret power among them, which touched my heart; and, as I gave way unto it, I found the Evil weakening in me, and the Good raised up."

No story of British colonisation is complete without mention of the Holy Experiment. In Pennsylvania, writes the Governor, "the trees are beautiful; in the woods are to be found black and white mulberry chestnuts, walnuts, plums, strawberries, cranberries, and grapes of divers sorts, muscadel and black cluster grapes, also peaches in great quantities." Turkeys, we are told, weighed forty-six pounds, salt fish cost three farthings a pound, and herrings were caught Indian fashion in penfolds. William Penn's stipulations in favor of the Indians have immortalised him. "Soaring above the customs of his time, when navigators and adventurers considered the inhabitants of any lands they discovered as their lawful prey, to treat and use at their pleasure, he regarded his unknown subjects as men of like feelings and passions with himself, and who, in proportion to their ignorance, were the more entitled to his fatherly care and protection." The story is well told of that "great array of strange men in their war paint and feathers" meeting with Governor Penn under the elm tree, pledging themselves to live in love with him and his children as long as the sun and moon should endure. There was a conspicuous absence of all military and naval provision for attack and defence. Seventy years of peace and friendship resulted.

Mrs. Grant's book gives admirable pictures of London in the seventeenth century, of a ministerial tour in Holland and Germany undertaken by three leaders of Early Quakerism, Fox, Barclay, and Penn; it gives glimpses of Penns and Peningtons at Chalfont, along with Milton and Ellwood. But the book is marred throughout by carelessness and inaccuracy. Carelessness is represented by a habit of punctuation that would be tolerable in a fourth form boy. It would be easy to quote fifty sentences punctuated like these:—

> "(King Charles) gave orders to be rowed alongside, and inquired whither they were bound, on receiving that information, he further asked if they were all Quakers" (p. 100).
>
> "Wigs were expensive and troublesome, but the Governor had four in a year, doubtless sent from England, there is a bill extant for 'dressing the Governor's hats,' and 8s. for a pair of stockings" (p. 199).

Carelessness is further represented by extraordinary constructions:—

> "the lives, properties, and persons, even of English people were in danger of justices of the peace putting aside trial by jury, could convict, fine and imprison" (p. 61).
>
> "Having before me an original one hitherto unpublished, I think it may be of interest as giving an insight into his thoughts, and is a specimen of his style" (p. 122).

Inaccuracy, born of ignorance or carelessness, is prolific in these pages. Chapter VI., on "Quakers," is unworthy of the book. What conceivable authority, apart from the dogmatism of ignorance, is there for the statements that "they admitted two ceremonies—water baptism and the Lord's Supper" (p. 48); that "Quakers never used actual texts of the Bible for their sermons, but formed them out of Scriptural words" (p. 41, note); that "the Quakers seem to have been very numerous in all parts of Europe" (p. 106); and that the Quakers "did not long entrust the defence of their principles" to Fox (p. 90)?

Amongst the "principal doctrines" of these Early Friends no mention is made of the "Universal and saving Light of Christ," surely their central doctrine, although some reference is made to it forty pages further on. "Meetings for discipline were called quarterly, but ended by becoming monthly ones," is sheer nonsense. "A yearly meeting was held in London in 1675 for the purpose of assistance in case of suffering for conscience' sake, and this practice continued to be observed till 1797." Why 1797? For the yearly meeting was held in London every year from 1678 to 1904, the record being only broken by a transfer to Leeds for 1905.

* "Quaker and Courtier: The Life and Work of William Penn." By Mrs. Colquhoun Grant. John Murray. 10s. 6d. net.

Robert Barclay, the Apologist, is confused with his father, the hero of Whittier's poem, and his wife is given a wrong Christian name and a wrong surname. The Conventicle Act of 1670 seems to be confused with the Conventicle Act of 1664 (p. 61): but what had the Long Parliament to do with either? Mary Penington becomes Maria; Pennsbury is sometimes Pennsburg.

Mrs. Grant writes of "such a senseless enthusiast as George Fox, who, however, continued to preach until he was imprisoned at Nottingham in 1649." It would be more correct to speak of his preaching until his death in 1690. "Enthusiast" Fox certainly was, and sometimes extravagant in language, but his common sense, his organising powers, and his insight into social reform, combined with profound spirituality, go far to nullify the word "senseless."

Penn is so attractive a subject that, in spite of carelessness and inaccuracy, the book gives an interesting sketch of the Quaker and Courtier, and succeeds in showing the essential simplicity of the man, that simplicity which Swift styles "the best and truest ornament of most things in life."

A CITY IN SPAIN.*

Some little time ago Mr. A. F. Calvert produced a large, splendidly illustrated volume on the principal feature of Granada—the Alhambra. Since then he has written in the well-known "Spanish Series" on "Granada and the Alhambra"; and now comes a new book from his prolific pen, entitled "Granada: Present and Bygone." In the preparation of the latter some fresh authorities appear to have been consulted, notably the "Guia de Granada," by Señor Valladar; and Mr. Calvert tells us in his preface that he has approached his subject in a mood more critical than hitherto. But the chief value of the book seems to us to lie in the fact that it is the most comprehensive record of the Spanish city that he has given us. The contents deserve the title, and if the treatment is really more critical than on previous occasions, we do not notice any slackening of the enthusiasm that gives wings to the author's style. Granada has for Mr. Calvert the same fascination that it possessed for Washington Irving. It is not a difficult one to understand. Of all the cities occupied by the Moorish conquerors of Spain, this was the last to succumb to the armies of Christendom. More than two centuries elapsed between the victories of St. Ferdinand that deprived the Moors of most of their Spanish possessions and the final surrender of Granada by Boabdil to Ferdinand and Isabel of Castile. During this period Granada rose from the position of a provincial town to that of a populous city state. Al Ahmar, the first of the Naorid dynasty of Moorish Sultans founded the Sultanate of Granada and built the Alhambra; and the monument to his genius as a ruler "was a kingdom which, shut in between the sea and its implacable and powerful foes, and torn by incessant internecine disorders, defied its fate for 250 years." But it paid the penalty of prolonged resistance. Despite undertakings to the contrary, its fall was followed by a ferocious persecution of its Moorish inhabitants by the Christians, culminating in 1609 in the expulsion of all persons of Moorish blood. This bitter religious fanaticism that would not suffer the presence of another people and creed, however impotent for evil, in its midst, is also responsible for the paradox that the modern city of Granada presents. In spite of its having been a Moorish city far longer and more prominently than towns like Seville, Cordova, or Toledo, it retains fewer traces of the Moorish occupation than either of these. The iconoclastic zeal of the Christian Spaniard, fanned by this time to a fierce flame, would not permit the arts of Islam, which St. Ferdinand had admired and allowed to remain elsewhere, to pollute Granada by their presence: the conquest was the signal for an orgy of vandalism. The Alhambra, indeed, escaped destruction by the skin of its teeth. But the site of the mosque attached to it is occupied by a sixteenth-century church; the principal show-places—after the Alhambra—are the Catholic Chapel Royal, where Ferdinand and Isabel lie buried, and the palace that Charles V. began to build in 1526 and never finished: and Moorish remains in the town itself are difficult to find. Only by night does the Moorish spirit of Granada re-assert its sway. "The white city gleams with a shimmer that the luminous sky above reflects. The thousand points of light that stud the vault of Heaven are outnumbered and outshone by the myriad lights below. It is thus at night-time that Granada resumes her old Oriental aspect. Leaning over the rampart, this seems no city of the West. The fancy strays to Syria, to white towns crowning brown hillsides in Galilee. The Christian's by day, Granada returns by night to the allegiance of the Crescent riding yet triumphant in the violet sky of Andalusia."

Mr. Calvert devotes the first portion of his book to the history of the city. The second chapter deals with the Alhambra. This, though necessarily less detailed than the exhaustive account in his larger work, is a sufficiently useful guide, and brings out most of the salient architectural features, while expounding the geometrical basis on which Moorish design rests. Brief essays on the Moorish remains in the modern town, on the Chapel Royal and Cathedral, the church of San Geronimo, and the old houses and historic sites, make up an all but complete picture of Granada, past and present. Despite the perpetual feuds of rival sultans, marked by most of the horrors and savageries of the Middle Ages, the city's steady development was not seriously checked until the capitulation of 1492. Then, however, the failure of the Christian sovereigns to keep faith with the conquered population, the establishment of the Inquisition and the final expulsion of the Moors brought a rapid decay, the tale of ruin being completed by the French invasions of 1810 and 1820. It was not merely that the Spaniards destroyed buildings and oppressed the Moslems who would not forswear their faith; it was the tragic fact that in doing so they uprooted the trades and industries of Granada, which the Moorish people alone had the power to keep alive, and so drained the city of the life-blood necessary to its existence. It is clear at any rate that Mr. Calvert does not think that Granada gained by its change of masters; there is a perceptible slackening of his enthusiasm when he has passed the point at which the city becomes Catholic, and a distinct note of disparagement in his reference to its "tawdry churches and dilapidated buildings" in the chapter on "Old Houses and Historic Sites." His interest, however, appears to revive in the concluding chapter on Alonso Cano, a Spanish artist who is not as well known in this country as he might be.

The colored illustrations to this volume are contributed by Mr. Trevor Haddon, and the black and white drawings are by the same artist, and by Messrs. Walker Hodgson, Louis Weirter, M. Green, F. H. Gallichan, and M. Reed. They look as if they had been done very largely from photographs, and do not call for particular comment.

* "Granada: Present and Bygone." By A. F. Calvert. With 230 illustrations. Dent. 7s. 6d. net.

THE VISIT OF "MR. APOLLO."*

One of Mr. Wells' cleverest romances was "The Sea Lady," a fantasy which describes how a mermaid came ashore at Eastbourne, and installed herself in a British family, and how all the respectable conventions of Villadom were powerless to prevent her luring back to the sea the hapless man she loved. And now, in "Mr. Apollo," we have Mr. Hueffer rehandling with freshness the old legend of the Gods descending to earth to see how it fares among men. Apollo in Hoxton, among the Fabians, and at Carmelite House! The idea seems, at first sight, more bizarre than a mermaid being wheeled in a bath-chair along the parade. But our audacious novelists know what they are doing: they know that a world-wide spiritual conception is more potent than a mass of contradictory phenomena, and they cleverly place the elemental figure of Aphrodite and Phœbus Apollo against the perishing stucco figments and the crumbling lath and plaster conventions that we have reared. After a score or so of pages, the divine idea incarnated in the immortal figure of Apollo waxes stronger and stronger, and the ephemeral human activities that would deny it, by their denial, give us their measure. It is not necessary for "Mr. Apollo" to do anything much or say anything much in the story: he simply moves among the crowd of characters, calmly unconcerned, all-seeing, and just, manifesting his will both to those who serve him and those who refuse to serve him in a pleasingly capricious and god-like manner. But the reason why, at the close, the human characters appear small and grey beside his figure is that "Mr. Apollo" symbolises for us the Unknown God at whose altars the ancients sacrificed, but whose shrine modern materialism has denied. Despite the ineffectiveness of certain chapters and the tiresomeness of some of the conversations, it must be allowed that Mr. Hueffer is justified of his thesis, which would liken our scientific materialism before Apollo to a brick wall in the dazzling sunlight. Thus when "Mr. Apollo" walks away from the Western Police Court, where he has been confined for the night, through a blunder of Constable 742L, and is conducted through a region of grimy slums by the court missionary, Mr. Todd, who intends "to exhibit the poor as a background to himself—himself as a personality"—the Prince, as he is called, simply asks the missionary: What were the aspirations of these people? And what became of them and their aspirations? And Mr. Todd, discomfited, can think of nothing to say but that "They fill graveyards."

* "Mr. Apollo. A Just Possible Story." By Ford Madox Hueffer. Methuen. 6s.

Here we have, in a stroke, the artistic method by which the author brings us to admit that a system which breeds a population without faith is more irrational than a system which worshipped an incarnation of the divine principles of light and beauty. The test of a system and creed of life is, after all, its human product. Mr. Hueffer is, therefore, able to make very short work of Mr. Clarges, the agnostic, whose mortal fear is that his forty years' work of sweeping away the priests and all their works will be lost in a general religious reaction. Similarly the cocksure young Fabians, who make it a principle to show no reverence for anything or anyone, fall an easy prey; and the Cockney Science teacher, Mr. Carver, merely by the exhibition of his arid and ungracious manners, is shown to be the victim of too narrow and soulless a conception of the universe. Incidentally there are some shrewd blows dealt at those altars at which the man in the street worships, the new gods he has set up in his own image. When "Mr. Apollo" is conducted into the heart of the palace where Lord Aldington is editing "The Daily Outlook," the great paper which "spun out of brains here and reverberated into paper that night would be all over England, all over the Empire and the world, on the morrow," we hope that our author is about to expound for us the psychology of the demagogue and bring Cleon up to date. We get, indeed, some passages that are too truthful to be styled satire:—

> "They came to where, in the corner of a block, a gaily-lit door, set transversely, sent gleams down marble stairs. Innumerable young men passed in and out, and many young women, pulling on and off their long gloves as they entered or left. A benevolent commissionaire, with an aspect that was almost more motherly than fatherly, so kind and serviceable was he, took their names, conducted them with little pats on the shoulder into a waiting-room that, behind a gilt and trellised lift, had the air of being a cupboard beneath stairs. Nevertheless, it was furnished with oak and green leather; it was lit by a gilded chandelier with pink shades, and alone, solitary and startling, on the heavy carved table, with its name in white letters on a red ground, decorated with the smiling portrait of an actress in an opera hood, there lay a single copy of 'Cosy Notes.'
>
> "Wouldn't you say?" Alfred Milne laughed, "that the last word, the final message of this huge building, of these streams of people running about, and of all the millions of us men that they write for and bamboozle and lead by the nose—the last word of it all is—that?"
>
> "Mr. Apollo took up the flimsy pamphlet; he glanced at a smuttily-printed portrait of a marchioness; at infinitesimal paragraphs of two lines each, divided by a black border leaf; at the badly-printed lines and dots of a diagram with the subscription: 'A New Cape.'
>
> "It has all the air of being as you say," he uttered, "if this be, as I understand you to imply, one of the products of this palace." He looked up at Milne.
>
> "But why not?" he asked.

But we must confess to being disappointed with the last third of the story, in which Lord Aldington takes a hand. Lord Aldington is on the point of booming the Krakoffs, the famous spiritualistic mediums, in "The Daily Outlook," and when "Mr. Apollo" performs a miracle which puts the Krakoffs' performances in the shade, his lordship naturally asks "what sort of" an advertisement do you want us to give you? Are you behind the Krakoffs, or what is it?" The opportunity here for a close analysis of the mind of a man who is "an anemometer, a thing for registering the public's breath," is fiddled away in a number of sketchy conversations, during which the story marks time. Minor shadowy characters are unnecessarily introduced, and our author's fault of letting his characters talk in arbitrary fashion till they irritate us becomes conspicuous. When "Mr. Apollo" becomes didactic in his insistence on his own godhead, we sympathise with the scrupulous man, Alfred Milne, who refuses to have him in his house. And it would have been deeper satire had we been shown Lord Aldington actually booming the god successfully in "The Daily Outlook," and transmuting something divine into a sensational appeal to the "common, the worst appetites, the appetites of the crowd, for evil fare." Our author has, however, not ventured to launch boldly into this final audacity, and we can only thank him for a romance, which, uneven and in places desultory, is very stimulating in its criticism of scientific materialism.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

A SYMPATHETIC appreciation of the late Edward Grieg, the Norwegian composer, is contributed to the Miniature Series of Musicians (George Bell, 1s. net), by Mr. E. Markham Lee. It is early yet to estimate Grieg's position among the world's composers, but Mr. Lee's broadly-stated judgment of his genius appears to be sound; "an artist of consummate power in the miniature" is his description of the Norwegian. With the exception of the incidental music in Ibsen's "Peer-Gynt," Grieg accomplished nothing remarkable in the way of orchestral or operatic music; but, using the folk songs and dances of his country as the foundation for many of his delicate lyrical piano pieces, he transformed this material by his own genius for original harmonies. His style is so well known to amateur and professional students in this country, and so popular with the drawing-room performer, that one credits it with more superficiality than it possesses, and this little book, with its careful analysis of the composer's talent, should help to remove any such misconception. It would clearly be futile to disparage Grieg because he was neither Beethoven nor Brahms.

* * *

"THE ELEMENTS OF ANGLING," by H. T. Sheringham (Horace Cox, 3s. 6d. net), is well designed. The handbook is written, as it were, in response to a request for guidance. Assuming that his friend will be content to begin with what are generally called coarse fish, Mr. Sheringham takes him to a tackle-shop, and has him properly equipped; then to a well-stocked stream, whence no fewer than eight of these fish, each a good example of a species, are caught at the first outing. Soon the tiro goes on to brown trout, which take his wet flies very freely, and the dry ones now and then; and before the year is closed he baskets sea-trout and salmon. Why not? Mr. Sheringham is quite right in pooh-poohing the notion that the angler's craft is mysterious and very difficult. It is just difficult enough to be well worth acquiring in what measure may be possible. Only a few of us can become first-class hands at it; but practically anyone can become sufficiently skilled to be highly entertained. Mr. Sheringham, who, being in charge of the angling department of "The Field," has most of the details of the subject well under command, talks like a trained writer.

* * *

THE latest Ordnance Sheets issued on behalf of the Ordnance Survey Authorities by T. Fisher Unwin (2s. each net) are those for Spalding and London. The latter is an entirely new departure in the printing of these maps, the Government having adopted, for the first time, the so-called layer system, which shows the varying heights of the ground by differences in the colors of the inks employed.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S LIST.

New Novel by MRS. HUMPHRY WARD.

READY SEPTEMBER 17th. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Diana Mallory.

By MRS. HUMPHRY WARD,

Author of "The Marriage of William Ashe," Etc.

On September 10th. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Wroth.

By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE.

Authors of "Rose of the World," "If Youth but Knew," "French Nan," Etc.

New Volume by W. H. FITCHETT, LL.D.,

Author of "Deeds that Won the Empire," "Fights for the Flag," Etc.

JUST PUBLISHED. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A PAWN IN THE GAME.

 A true historical novel dealing with Napoleon and the Expedition to Egypt.

Recent 6s. Novels.

CROSSRIGS - - MARY & JANE FINDLATER.
Third Impression.

THE HONOUR OF "X." - GRAHAM HOPE.

CHATEAU ROYAL - - J. H. YOXALL, M.P.
Third Impression.

THE FOREWARNERS - GIOVANNI CENA.
Translated from the Italian by OLIVIA AGRESTI ROSSETTI, With an Introduction by Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.

London: SMITH, ELDER and CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

BOOKLETS ON DIET By the Author of "Plainer Fare and Less of It."
SEVENTH THOUSAND.

"PLAIN DINNERS: a Help to a Uric-Acid-Free Diet." Post-free, 7d.
"There is much sound wisdom and real helpfulness in the pages of this little pamphlet."—Dundee Courier.

"SALINE STIMULATION: with Remarks on a Common Ill." Post-free, 7d,
A "new application of old and familiar facts." From the Author,
ALICE BRAITHWAITE, 45, West End Avenue, Harrogate.

In the SEPTEMBER ISSUE
OF THE
Financial Review of Reviews
THE
Rt. Hon. Viscount Midleton, P.C.,
Late Secretary of State, writes on British Life Assurance and American Models.
The Article includes a striking survey of the changes in National Life during the past thirty years.
Other Articles, Notes, Statistics, &c., 288 pp., price 1s., post free.
Publisher, 2, Waterloo Place, Pall Mall, S.W.

BOOK BARGAINS.—Balzac's Droll Stories, illustrated by Doré, 12s. 6d. Foote's valuable medical work, Plain Home Talk, 7s. 6d. Burton's Arabian Nights, unexpurgated, 17 vols., illustrated, £13. Garnier's English Landed Interest, 2 vols., 6s. 6d. (published 21s.). Hart's Female Pelvic Anatomy, colored plates, 17s. 6d. (cost 42s. net). Cruickshank's 400 Humorous Illustrations, 4s. 6d. (published 16s.). Pepy's Diary, 4 vols., 15s. (published 30s.). Fennimore Cooper's novels, 32 vols., 42s. Thackeray's complete works, 26 vols., 45s. (cost £4 12s.). Chaffer's Pottery and Porcelain, 28s. 6d. (cost 42s.). Trall's Sexual Physiology and Hygiene, 3s. 6d. Art of Extempore Speaking, 2s. 6d. 100,000 books for sale and exchange. Please state wants. Catalogues free.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

THE CONFESSIONS OF A BEACH-COMBER.

SCENES AND INCIDENTS IN THE CAREER OF AN UNPROFESSIONAL BEACHCOMBER IN TROPICAL QUEENSLAND. BY E. J. BANFIELD. WITH A MAP AND 48 ILLUSTRATIONS. 15s. NET.

CULTS, CUSTOMS, AND SUPERSTITIONS OF INDIA.

BEING A REVISED AND ENLARGED EDITION OF "INDIAN LIFE, RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL." BY J. CAMPBELL OMAN, D.LIT. PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED. 14s. NET.

CONCERNING LAFCADIO HEARN.

BY G. M. GOULD, M.D. WITH 5 ILLUSTRATIONS. 8s. 6d. NET. AN APPRECIATION OF HEARN'S PERSONALITY AND WORK, CONTAINING SEVERAL HITHERTO UNPUBLISHED LETTERS.

THE HISTORY OF CO-OPERATION.

BY GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE. PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED. POPULAR EDITION IN ONE VOLUME. LARGE CROWN 8vo, 7s. 6d. NET.

AUGUSTUS.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF THE FOUNDER OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE (B.C. 63—A.D. 14). BY E. S. SHUCKBURGH. ILLUSTRATED. POPULAR EDITION. CLOTH, 2s. 6d. NET.

THURSDAY MORNINGS AT THE CITY TEMPLE.

BY THE REV. J. R. CAMPBELL, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE NEW THEOLOGY." CLOTH, 5s. NET.

SYLVIA IN SOCIETY.

BY MRS. GEORGE BLOUNT (MRS. GEORGE NORMAN). WITH A COLOURED FRONTISPIECE. CLOTH, 3s. 6d. NET.

NOTABLE 6s. NOVELS.

PATSY.
BY H. DE VERE STACPOOLE, AUTHOR OF "THE BLUE LAGOON," ETC.

THE STEM OF THE CRIMSON DAHLIA.
BY JAMES LOCKE. WITH FRONTISPIECE.

THE PRINCE'S MARRIAGE.
BY W. H. WILLIAMSON, AUTHOR OF "THE TRAITOR'S WIFE."

THE WOMAN WHO VOWED.
BY ELLISON HARDING.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON.

The Week in the City.

THE MOVEMENT OF LEADING STOCKS.

	Price Friday Morning, Aug. 21.		Price Friday Morning, Aug. 28.
Consols 2½ per cent.	86 5/16	...	86½
German 3 per cent.	83½	...	83⅓
London and North Western	132½	...	132½
Union Pacific	159¾	...	164½
Canadian-Pacific...	175¾	...	178
Rand Mines	6 17/32	...	6 23/32
Peruvian Pref.	9¼	...	10¼

THE last account was not a satisfactory one, generally speaking, to operators for a rise, though an upward movement set in towards the close, which has since been carried further. All doubt as to the permanence of cheap money has vanished since the Indian Government released a million of gold held by it at the Bank of England. The American and Canadian crops, though large, will evidently be financed without difficulty. Many prophets predict a general upward tendency in home and foreign securities with the exception of American railways, which seem to have been carried rather high by professional operations. In the foreign market a large investment business is reported, and Peruvians have been specially strong. Preparations for the new Russian loan are reported to have been completed in Paris. It is expected to be for a very large amount, and is likely to appear soon.

GERMAN GOVERNMENT LOANS.

At the present time the only really first-class Government securities that yield four per cent. are German State issues, and the last German and Prussian loans. Our Consul at Frankfort in his long and very able report, which has just been issued, points out that the low state of German credit is due to excessive recent borrowing. In 1907, he writes, the German Government stocks suffered from the first, because the banking concerns which had clubbed together for the issue of the 3½ per cent. German stock of 1906 still held at the beginning of 1907 120,000,000 marks of that issue; as a result, they could not intervene as purchasers when quotations began to fluctuate downwards. Twice in the course of 1907 the quotations sank so low that they became a temptation to foreign buyers, who purchased German stock in considerable amounts. Shortly after the first purchases by French and Belgian investors, however, the Government stocks reached the lowest point they had yet touched; in August, 1907, the 3½ per cent. Imperial stock fell to 91·80 and the 3 per cent. stock to 81·20. Some of the stock of the other Confederate States dropped even more seriously, e.g., the 3½ per cent. stock of the free city of Bremen which fell between August 1st and August 20th from 92 to 89·90 per cent., i.e., 2·10 per cent. This drop tempted chiefly French and British purchasers; and these foreign purchases "ultimately encouraged the German investors again to buy German stock!" Last December the quotation were:—

	1903.	1904.	1905.	1906.	1907.
3 per cent. Imperial stock and 3 per cent. Prussian stock	91·75	89·90	88·70	87	82·60
3 per cent. Kingdom of Saxony	90	88·25	87·25	86	83·25

Owing to this downward tendency of the older stock, the Government, forced to raise money, offered as an additional inducement to investors the payment of an increased rate of interest. Early last year Bavaria and Würtemburg issued 4 per cent. stock. Prussia and the Empire were compelled to make the same concession, though they tried at first to make it a temporary operation by issuing 4 per cent. Treasury bonds for five years to the amount of 400,000,000 marks; 300,000,000 marks were offered to the public at 99 per cent., equalling an investment for five years at 4 1-5 per cent.; as such they became popular at the expense of the existing older stock. "The return to a 4 per cent. issue of German stock is very remarkable and contrary to all expectation," writes our Consul. "Years ago so experienced a financier as Miquel, the then German Secretary of State for Finance, had predicted popular Government issues at not more than 3 per cent.!" At the beginning of this year the Prussian Government was again faced by the necessity of a new loan. In order to capture the interests and dividends which then were becoming due, it was the first in the field with its new issue.

> The issue itself was addressed to intending investors only, and as such all applicants had to bind themselves to hold the stock for a year, the scrip to be deposited with the Prussian National Bank. The amount of the issue was not limited, but was made dependent upon the amount that would be subscribed. The most remarkable feature of the issue, however, in the eyes of the Germans, was the varying rate of interest. The stock bears 4 per cent. interest to the end of March, 1918, then to the end of March, 1923, interest at the rate of 3¾ per cent., and subsequently 3½ per cent. The price of subscription was fixed at 98½.

The Stock Exchange was entirely taken by surprise, and took a gloomy view of the chances of the issue, but nobody dared predict to what extent subscriptions might be expected. However, the total sums actually subscribed amounted to 181,000,000 marks; which in all the circumstances was deemed satisfactory. Moreover, in most cases the total amount subscribed was paid for at the date fixed for the first instalment only.

Nevertheless, the subscription of 181,000,000 marks did not fulfil the "official" expectations. The issue was closely followed by the issues of—

	Marks.
Baden	34,000,000
Würtemburg	50,000,000
Hamburg	65,000,000
Bremen	15,000,000
Bavaria	60,000,000

Our Consul writes:—

> These loans became necessary not, as is so often believed abroad, for the purposes of the army and navy, but for the growing number of public enterprises. The constant need of new issues for the purpose of public trading (railways, canals, &c.) is not generally taken into consideration by those advocating State railways, &c. The State in Germany builds the railways in the "Reichsland" (Alsace-Lorraine), it works the post office service, telegraph and telephone. The individual Confederate States have practically converted their whole railway systems into State enterprises. They also own State lands and woods. Prussia owns a very extended mining industry; in future years the construction of canals will necessitate further issues. The Imperial debt to-day amounts to approximately 3,200,000,000 marks. The revenues amount to 2,570,000,000 marks, among which 700,000,000 marks, i.e., 27·40 per cent., are the yield from State-owned enterprises. The debts of the Confederate States aggregate 12,200,000,000 marks; the receipts amount to 4,600,000,000 marks, among which no less than 3,098,000,000 marks, i.e., 67·28 per cent., are the yield of State-owned enterprises—against 9·65 per cent. in France, 12·81 per cent. in the United Kingdom, 14·68 per cent. in Italy (1905).

But though the debts of Germany are by no means crushing, and would justify a lower rate of interest, the deficits are appalling. We read:—

> When, towards the middle of April, 1908, the money market became somewhat easier, a lively competition among new issues was expected. In consequence, both the Empire and Prussia showed some anxiety to be the first in the market. The amount of their issues—850,000,000 marks—was a great surprise to many. Among the 850,000,000 marks Prussia claimed 600,000,000 marks and the Empire 250,000,000 marks. Among these, 650,000,000 marks were issued as a 4 per cent. loan, whereas 200,000,000 marks were taken over in the form of Treasury bonds by a banking committee. Even then the 4 per cent. rate of interest was not decided upon as a permanent type; it was guaranteed for ten years only.

The new Prussian issue was chiefly needed for secondary railways, which required 434,000,000 marks, and for the expropriation of Poles in the eastern provinces, &c. In the Empire new credits had been voted amounting to 253,000,000 marks, to which must be added 134,000,000 marks still needed for the satisfaction of older credits. Moreover, on October 1st next, 145,000,000 marks of 3½ per cent. Prussian Treasury bonds, 1904, and 100,000,000 marks of 3½ per cent. Imperial Treasury bonds become due. The result of the issue was not brilliant; the amounts subscribed represent home savings, and there is little foreign participation; only 700,000,000 marks were subscribed. Since then there have been considerable purchases of the issue by foreigners; but the situation has been so harassing to the growth of German banks that there is now an overwhelming demand that the process of providing for ordinary expenses by borrowing shall cease.

LUCELLUM.

"Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking."

Player's
Navy Cut
Tobacco and Cigarettes

Sold only in the original Packets and Tins, and may be obtained from all Stores and Tobacconists of repute

Regd. No. 154011.

0487.

TANGYE
OIL ENGINE
AUTOMATIC
TUBE IGNITION.
NO LAMP
EXCEPT FOR STARTING
TANGYES LTD
BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE
RED WHITE & BLUE
Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

Curio Club Bargains
Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

Liver troubles
SHOULD NEVER BE NEGLECTED.

The principal duty of the Liver is to extract the bile from the blood, and carry it direct to the digestive organs. Therefore, if the Liver is disordered, it cannot perform its duties properly, and the result is, the blood becomes overloaded with bile, which causes Lassitude, Debility, Irritability, and may develop Dropsy.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets
STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

will speedily and permanently cure all livery troubles, because they thoroughly cleanse the Liver of all impurities, and stimulate it to easily perform its functions in a natural healthy manner MERIT'S LIVERETS are prepared from purely vegetable ingredients only, as prescribed by a prominent physician, and have no debilitating effect upon the health. Price 1/1½ and 2/9 of all Chemists and Stores. If unable to obtain, send direct to

MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name MERIT'S LIVERETS, and the signature MERIT & Co., is on the package. So beware of spurious imitations.

BIRKBECK BANK
ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.
2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.
2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

"PYRENO"
(REGISTERED)
A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.
Should any Garment shrink in the wash it
WILL BE REPLACED.

TYPEWRITING.
TYPEWRITING. — Typewriting of every description high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION
Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

WEST HEATH SCHOOL, HAMPSTEAD.

On high ground close to the Heath.
A day school for Boys and Girls (about 100 pupils).

Principal: Mrs. Ennis Richmond.
Headmaster: Mr. F. V. Bindon (M.A. Cantab.).
Succeeding Mr. & Mrs. Rice, now taking up work at Bedales School, Hants.

Good Buildings. Playground. Large Grass Playing Fields.

A Boarding house will be opened in September in connection with the above under the immediate management of Mrs. Richmond and her son, Mr. Kenneth Richmond, as house master.

Michaelmas Term will begin September 22nd.

BROMSGROVE SCHOOL, WORCESTERSHIRE.

AUTUMN TERM begins September 17th.

APPLY THE HEADMASTER.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

THE ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL.

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields; gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Next Term, Sept. 18th. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

NEW BOYS ARRIVE SEPTEMBER 17TH, OTHERS 18TH.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR

CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."
—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN. W.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

TOURS.

£6 6s. LUCERNE TOUR.

Nine days. Short Sea Route. No extras for Conductor or Gratuities.

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D.

5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. 25, Cannon Street, E.C.
4, Charing Cross, S.W. 84, Piccadilly, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son, Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.

67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye. Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.

BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott. Prop.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

GREAT YARMOUTH.

HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing sea. 10/- per day.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor.

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop. J. E. Dowthwaite.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell. Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny. Golf, etc. Lecture.

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Afternoon Teas, Tel. 647.

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties Catered for.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

A Memorable Debate

An Interesting Reminiscence of

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE

and Mr. Lloyd George, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer

In a debate in the House of Commons, on the 13th June, 1890, on the Local Taxation Bill, Mr. Gladstone said, "Enough of idle words; if you were to multiply these amendments till they were as thick as the leaves in Vallombrosa, or as plentiful as the advertisements of you would not prevent the consequences of this clause." And in the same debate, as the Pall Mall Gazette reported, "Mr. Lloyd George, the new Member for Carnarvon, made a capital maiden speech, full of promise for his future career."

Pears' Soap

This was eighteen years ago, but tributes to the popularity of Pears' continue to appear in an ever-broadening stream. It is 120 years since Pears' was invented, and it still remains the leading toilet soap of the world—first in purity, first in beautifying properties, first in point of economy and first in public favour.

The highest possible honours at the leading International Exhibitions since 1851 (including the only Grand Prix ever given for a Toilet Soap) have been awarded to Pears.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, AUGUST 29, 1908.

READING ROOM INSTITUTE

The Nation

Vol. III., No. 23.] SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	Page
Diary of the Week	787
Politics and Affairs:—
Kings as Politicians	790
The Entente of America and Australia	791
A South American Ruler	792
Life and Letters:—
Science and the Supernatural	794
The Despair of an Intellectual	795
The Legend of Faust	796
The Kitchen Garden	797
Letters from Abroad:—
The Character of the German Workers' Insurance. By Ed. Bernstein	798
Short Studies:—
An Immortal. By the Rev. S. Henry	800
Present-Day Problems:—
Useless Naval Expenditure. By the Rt. Hon. Lord Eversley	801
Communications:—
The Dual Policy in India. By S. K. Ratcliffe	802
Letters to the Editor:—
The Lost Liberty of the Road. By H. F. H.	804
The New Daily Press. By P. J. Reid	804
Concerning the "Imitation of Whitman." By Henry Bryan Binns	805
Ideas of Heaven and Happiness. By W. J. B.	805
A Green Heaven. By J. M. Lloyd-Thomas	805
A Propos de Bottes. By G. W. E. R.	805
"The Dark Side." By Lawrence Richardson	805
The Date of George Fox's Death. By A. Neave Brayshaw	806
The Maintenance of "Dreadnoughts." By G.	806
Officialism in the Channel Islands. By Taxpayer	806
Poetry:—
The Old School. By Thomas Burke	806
The World of Books	807
Books to be Read	807
Reviews:—
The Real Ossian	808
The Hope for India	809
A Great Schoolmistress	810
Filthy Lucre	811
Books in Brief:—
The Monthly Reviews	812
Birds and their Nests and Eggs	814
The Week in the City	814

The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The Kaiser made a series of speeches on Sunday at military banquets at Strasburg, which, though described by the Berlin correspondent of the "Times" as a "statesmanlike appeal" for peace, have somewhat seriously disturbed France and Europe. The pith of the Emperor's speech was to assure the world that peace was not in danger chiefly because it was guaranteed, first, by the "conscience of the princes and statesmen of the world," secondly, by the "will and desire of the people themselves," and, thirdly, by "our power on sea and land—by the German people in arms." The Kaiser's final sentence was still more expressive: "Proud of the manly discipline and love of honor of her armed forces, Germany is determined to keep them on their high level, without menace to others, and to develop them as her own interests demand, favoring none, injuring none." The meaning of the speech, we are afraid, is universally found in the hurried mission of Dr. Vassel to Fez, and the revival, very much in Germany's favor, of the situation in Morocco which preceded the Act of Algeciras. Its further interpretation is that it rejects the proposals said to be made at Cronberg for a reduction of naval armaments, and confirms Germany's right to maintain her naval policy on the full basis of her revised programme. The place, time, and substance of the speech, as well as its apparent sequence in policy, are taken to show a reversion to Bismarck's coarser strokes of policy, even though the Kaiser be not a fully conscious agent. Probably the tactlessness of the intervention decrees its failure.

Meanwhile, the Kaiser's speech is obviously connected with German action in Morocco, the news of which has swept over Europe like a dust-storm. The action is twofold. The German Government has intimated to the Powers the importance of recognising Mulai Hafid as a means to the pacification of Morocco, and has sent Dr. Vassel, its consul, back to Fez, Mulai Hafid's headquarters, nominally to look after the interests of its subjects. It is hardly doubtful that the two events are part of a single policy. France, which, as the "Frankfurter Zeitung" points out, occupies with Spain a preferential position under the Act of Algeciras, and has a right to conduct negotiations, is naturally perturbed, and her Foreign Office declares that the recognition of Mulai Hafid must be preceded by "minimum guarantees." France's position is difficult on account of her earlier errors of policy, and because a section of her politicians would like to perpetuate the occupation of the Shawia. But Germany's precipitate action has isolated that country, and the criticism of the able and enlightened Frankfort journal that German policy has once more shown itself to be "incalculable, untrustworthy, and therefore disturbing," is an echo of European opinion. The same kind of rough tactlessness has been shown in the choice of Alsace-Lorraine as the scene of the German autumn manœuvres.

* * *

The whole of the Parisian Press (writes our Paris correspondent), including even such papers as the "Petit Parisien," which rarely touch on foreign politics, comments on the announcement made by the German Government that it proposes to recognise Mulai Hafid apparently without making it a condition that he should accept the Act of Algeciras or afford any other guarantees to Europe. The comments are as nearly unanimous as those on the voyage of Herr Vassel and rather more vigorous in tone, but there is an absence of excitement, except on the part of one or two Nationalist journals. The majority of the articles regard the action of Germany as a characteristic example of bad Europeanism. The "Temps" remarks that Germany, after complaining of attempts to isolate her, is now isolating herself. It is not the proposal of Germany to recognise Mulai Hafid that is criticised, but the action of the German Government in forcing the pace while negotiations were in progress, and in forestalling the rest of Europe. The "Temps" says that the French and German Governments have been in communication since August 26th, that France and Spain have made it clear that they do not object to the recognition of Mulai Hafid, but insist on the necessity of obtaining from him beforehand the necessary guarantees. It is also understood that steps were already being taken, with the knowledge of Germany, to ascertain whether Mulai Hafid would furnish these assurances. The Nationalist Press calls for a "spirited policy," but it represents a small fraction of public opinion.

* * *

The visit of the American fleet to Melbourne has been marked by something more than indiscretion on the part of Mr. Deakin, the able Prime Minister of the Commonwealth. Mr. Deakin, speaking at a dinner given to the American officers by the Melbourne Royal Yacht Club, declared that the visit was no "holiday adventure," but that it grew out of an invitation made by him in "a spirit of deepest earnestness." In other words, Mr. Deakin said that he had invited the American fleet to come, and had used his personal influence with Mr. Whitelaw Reid and Mr. James Bryce to secure its coming. Mr. Deakin was no less candid as to the purpose of the visit. Describing the American Navy as the last word in the art of naval construction, he added that it would "launch Australia on the beginning of a naval career," for the American example showed that only through her navy could a nation protect herself from outside injury. Mr. Deakin did, indeed, say that the Australian Navy would be added to the defences of the Empire, but on the point of an Australian Squadron he has been, and is now, in complete disagreement with our own Admiralty. The visit of the American fleet, therefore, is practically used as a weapon in his controversy with the Mother Country on a problem of Imperial defence. The American Press declares that the visit shows Australia to be nearer akin to Americans than to the English people, and that it dissipates the sentimentalism that "blood is thicker than water." Other papers suggest that Australia is losing confidence in the British flag, and in Great Britain's willingness to protect her against the Eastern peril. The "Springfield Republican" considers that the reception is a reminder to the country that Australia means to keep itself "white at whatever cost," even of the loss of the Japanese alliance.

* * *

The most dramatic event of the week in Turkey has been the reception by the Sultan of his heir, Reshad Effendi, after a seclusion of thirty years. It coincides with the return of the Sultan's nephew, Prince Sabah-ed-din, the head of the Young Turkey Committee in Paris, and of many other eminent exiles, who have received an enthusiastic popular welcome home. Politically little that is tangible has happened. The new régime is riveting its authority on the remoter facts of the Empire, and is getting something of order into the administration, and the various nationalities are formulating their demands. The Greeks emphasise the importance of ecclesiastical and educational privileges, but, unlike the Bulgarians, will be content with a modest concession of local government. Only Parliament can settle these questions, and in the meantime the nationalities are selecting candidates and organising themselves into political parties.

* * *

There has been no attempt yet by the Shah's lieutenant to recapture Tabriz, and the Constitutionalists are maintaining order in that city with vigour and effect. The "Times" correspondent, however, telegraphs that financial necessity and disillusionment at England's policy have created an extreme faction in Tabriz which is openly talking of an attack upon the British Consulate as a means of compelling foreign intervention. There is little danger, however, of this party getting out of hand, and meanwhile the Shah's position at Teheran does not improve. The Anglo-Russian loan has fallen through, not because English diplomacy had any scruples as to its pernicious consequence to Persian liberty, but because the lenders were not satisfied with the guarantees of their pound of flesh. The Shah's troops are already divided and dissatisfied, and if supplies are scarce their loyalty must be a treacherous reed to lean upon.

* * *

Lord Hugh Cecil, speaking at a Primrose League demonstration at Lord Londonderry's seat at Wynyard Park, spoke in a strong vein of Tory individualism. He complained that the Liberal conception of social reform was to make somebody uncomfortable, to make him "squeal." This defect would destroy the value of the Licensing Bill, which went beyond public opinion, and would never obtain the co-operation of the liquor trade. The Liberal Party were lingering on for mere custom's sake, and must give place to Socialism, which, in its turn, would be fatal to the national character, for it would unfit us for the control of "many races and many climes," and would destroy our main characteristic, namely, our love of liberty.—Mr. Arthur Henderson, speaking on foreign policy, declared that the Labor Party would never incite to a war with Germany, and any Labor leader who departed from this position betrayed the British democracy. He said that the Labor Party was collectivist in its tendency, but accepted practical solutions, and declared strongly for Free Trade, which so greatly mitigated the evils of unemployment.—An important election is pending in Newcastle, Mr. Cairns, the Liberal member, having died. The Liberal majority is enormous, but Sir Walter Plummer, the Unionist candidate, is a strong man, and the Liberal-Labor entente may not hold.

* * *

Mr. Francis Darwin, chosen as President of the British Association fifty years after his father's enunciation of the theory of natural selection, took as the theme of his address the existence of what he called a psychic attribute, e.g., a kind of memory, in plants. Such language would have sounded strangely in the ears of scientific men thirty or forty years ago, for it is really a development of the argument which we remember Martineau used in the famous symposium in the "Nineteenth Century," that consciousness was innate in the most primitive natural forms, and developed until it attained its full fruit in man. Dr. Darwin gave two instances of what he called a "mnemic factor" in the life of plants. The first was the case of scarlet runners, whose leaflets, under the alternate influences of light and darkness, rose to a horizontal position by day and sank at night. Yet, if the plants were placed in a dark room where these stimuli were absent, they would still mechanically rise and fall at the usual times. In the same way a little sea creature in Brittany, whose life depended on the ebb and flow of the tide, would go through its usual motions were it placed in an aquarium where the necessity for them no longer existed. Dr. Darwin's address developed into a close statement of his position and that of Semon against the rival theory of Weissmann which, as Dr. Darwin said, is so hard to fit in with the "rhythm of development." Weissmann, of course, denied that characteristics which were acquired through various external causes could be telegraphed, as it were, from the acting body to the cells of the central germ plasm and so transmitted to offspring. Dr. Darwin declined thus to take the linchpin out of evolution. In a happy metaphor, he likened natural selection to the power of a trainer of dogs, the power of "an automatic master with endless patience and all time at his disposal."

Mr. Alfred Robbins, in delivering his Presidential Address at the Conference of the Institute of Journalists at Manchester on Monday, touched on many vital points in the history and development of journalism. He thought that the Press in this country was never more powerful than during the Popish Plot, that it worked in fetters under the later Stuarts and the earlier Hanoverian Kings, though it produced Defoe, whom he truly described as "perhaps the greatest all-round journalist" in England, and that it attained its height "in the realm of thought and opinion" in the first three quarters of the nineteenth century. Since then, while the circulation of newspapers had increased, their power had declined because of the sensationalism of the later newspapers and the public's growing distrust of their good faith and truthfulness. Closely connected with this decline was the loss of security of tenure for the individual journalist, with which, we are afraid, the Harmsworth development has had much to do. The need of the hour, therefore, was to raise the status of the journalist, to deepen his culture, and to heighten his self-respect. We believe this to be thoroughly sound counsel, and we should like to see the Institute of Journalists applying itself systematically to such purposes.

* * *

On Tuesday the Hedjaz railway, which now covers the eight hundred miles from Damascus to Medina, and two years hence will reach Mecca, was formally opened. The new line is a remarkable tribute to the strength of Islam. The capital has been provided by the subscriptions of the faithful throughout the world, so that the line starts free of debt. It has been built very rapidly and economically in seven years; it has been pushed through a disturbed and desolate country; and it has been zealously, and, what is more remarkable, honestly, furthered by even the most corrupt officials of the old régime. Strategically the Hedjaz railway tightens the grip of Constantinople upon Arabia, and when linked up with a completed Baghdad railway will greatly add to the cohesion of the Turkish Empire. Politically it strengthens the Sultan's claim to the Khalifate, and it can hardly fail to give a considerably extended circulation and influence in the Islamic world to the ideas of Western and reformed Islam. Its reactions will certainly be felt wherever there is a large Mohammedan community.

* * *

We are glad to see that the local authorities are heartily co-operating with the central departments in the administration of the Old Age Pensions Act. Their first business is to set up the Pension Committees, the minimum membership of which is fixed at seven. The majority of local authorities that have taken steps towards putting the Act into operation have appointed all their members to act on these Committees, and the expedient of co-option has seldom been resorted to. For administrative purposes in County Council areas the petty sessional divisions will probably be found the most convenient units, and in the boroughs and urban districts the ward representatives will, as sub-committees, take charge of the work. The only doubtful point in the organisation seems to be whether the Excise officials, who will act as Pension Officers, will be able to get through the vast amount of work they will be called upon to do between the beginning of October and the end of December. It is estimated that during this time half a million claims at least will have to be investigated, and in many cases the enquiries will be long and tedious. The Executive Council of the Poor Law Unions' Association will next week discuss a resolution passed by the Birmingham Guardians, expressing the opinion that all aged poor over 70 who are in receipt of out-door relief "and who have exercised any sort of thrift" should be granted 5s. each weekly from the beginning of next January. It will be interesting to see whether this policy is endorsed.

* * *

The meeting of the first Eucharistic Congress held in England (our Rome correspondent writes) is regarded at the Vatican as an event of international importance, going beyond the field of religion. The Congress will indeed demonstrate to the world, the Holy See believes, the freedom, protection, and sympathy enjoyed by the Catholic religion, its episcopacy, clergy, and faithful, in a Protestant country, among people who, up to half a century ago, had the reputation of being the most intransigent in their opposition to Rome. The Vatican is convinced that a manifestation like the Eucharistic Congress in London, or the celebration of the centennial of the New York diocese in New York last April, would be impossible, not only in France, but in any Latin country. It therefore concludes that what is called liberty in Latin countries is a mask for religious persecution. In other words, among the Latins the separation between Church and State, the Vatican thinks, is generally understood as the liberty of the State to persecute the Church, and the union between State and Church is, as a rule, used by the former to oppress the latter. Such a situation makes the Pope still more enthusiastic over English-speaking countries, and a greater admirer of their institutions.

* * *

Here is the latest list of the worst outrages by motors: A man walking near Green Lanes, Tottenham, saw the wheels of a motor-car "twist" and "something like a bundle of clothes underneath." He saw "it" taken from under the wheels and put on a van. "He then saw that it was his own child, eight years old." His boy, who had also been run over, told him of his sister's fate. The child's skull was fractured and she died in a few minutes. The children did not seem to have seen the car. At Dunblane, on September 1st, a servant-girl was killed by a car belonging to her master. A man named Hobbin died in Bromsgrove Cottage Hospital on Tuesday, from a fractured skull, after being knocked down by a road motor-mail. His companion suffered a compound fracture of the leg. An Elgin cow-feeder named Grant, striking at a hare which ran across the road, was himself struck by a motor-car, carried along by it till it stopped, and killed. A middle-aged man, getting out of the way of one taxi-cab in the Brixton Road last Saturday, was struck by another, and "seriously injured." A car dashed into a wagonette near Onibury, upset it and its load, and inflicted concussion of the brain on a son of Sir William Grenville Williams. A taxi-cab, driven by a drunken chauffeur, was seen to be "proceeding at a rapid pace" near Blackfriars Bridge, with a boy "clinging to the mud-guard," and a bicycle "jammed into the rear." He had been struck violently in the back, thrown bodily on to the mud-guard, and carried one hundred yards with the vehicle and its drunken conductor.

Politics and Affairs.

KINGS AS POLITICIANS.

It is rarely a good omen when the Kaiser makes a specially amiable speech. His visit to the City was intended to soften the effect of the revision of the German naval programme. His speech at Strasburg on Sunday, for all its praise of peace, and of kings as the pillars of peace, has proved to be the prelude to a new period of German activity in Morocco. Indeed, to any commentator skilled in the interpretation of these Imperial utterances, the warning was quite clearly conveyed. For it was to a corps of French veterans that the Kaiser's flatteries were specially addressed. Next day came the news from Tangiers that the German Consul had set out in profound secrecy for Fez, whence all the representatives of the Powers had simultaneously withdrawn when Mulai Hafid was proclaimed. It was, of course, denied that Germany was attempting to steal a march on France by recognising the victorious Pretender in advance of other Powers. The denial retained whatever value it may ever have possessed only for twenty-four hours. For on Tuesday the announcement was officially made in Berlin that Germany had taken the initiative in inviting the Powers to recognise Mulai Hafid. The commentaries of the German Press disposed of any idea that Prince Bülow was merely contributing a disinterested suggestion towards the solution of the Moroccan tangle. His move was interpreted as an explicit reply to the French theory that the Act of Algeciras conferred upon France a certain leadership in the Concert in the handling of Moroccan affairs. The intention was partly to further the political interests of Germany by doing a service to the successful competitor in the Moroccan civil war, partly to emphasise the mistakes of French diplomacy, and partly, by being the first to advocate officially a course which everyone has recognised to be inevitable, to acquire, for the time being, the appearance of leading the Concert.

France is annoyed, and it could not be otherwise. Nor is the curiously clumsy strategy which alternates a caress with a buffet at all calculated to minimise French resentment. Indeed, German diplomacy has merely aggravated a blow to French interests by what is, in effect, an insult to French intelligence. It is difficult to believe that the Kaiser can really have supposed that Frenchmen would be so flattered by a flamboyant reference to their military prowess as not to resent a scheme designed to frustrate their political aims. The real explanation of this now familiar method is probably that it is a conventional way of indicating that Germany is about to enter on an active competitive policy, without, however, wishing to provoke the Power which she has challenged to any dangerous hostility. Her theory of international relations is that they should imitate those which may obtain between rival merchants or party politicians. Two Powers may outbid each other in naval armaments, or struggle for influence in a barbarous country, just as traders compete for a market or party leaders for votes, without the risk of any mortal enmity. Unfortunately for this theory, nations, at a certain stage in this competition, are apt to go to war; rival merchants and politicians, on the other hand, do not, in civilised communities, assassinate each other. No one in Paris can forget the German ultimatum of December, 1905. This German move need cause no immediate alarm, and if it damages French interests, the fault lies mainly with French diplomacy. It is only the fact that M. Pichon chose to back Abdul Aziz with money and men which gives a sting to the German partiality towards Mulai Hafid. But in so far as it is an advertisement that Germany still aspires to play an active part in Morocco, still disputes the supremacy of French interests, and means to trade on the too numerous mistakes of the French Foreign Office, it introduces a fresh element of anxiety and unrest into the European situation.

This incident carries its own commentary on the Cronberg meeting. Whatever success King Edward may have had in improving the feeling between the British and German Courts, it is obvious that he has done nothing to smooth the political relationships between Germany and the Western Powers. There is, we believe, no doubt that the meetings which have taken place at Cronberg and Marienbad had a political character. Public opinion in this country is left, as usual, without authoritative information, but the statements in the German and French Press have been unusually precise. So far as can be gathered from German sources, an attempt was made from our side to discuss naval armaments, and, apparently, a too brusque approach ended only in causing a certain irritation. Morocco, and the recognition of Mulai Hafid, was also mentioned in all the communiqués as one of the subjects discussed. If that is so, the events of this week have sufficed to show how far the discussion was from reaching an understanding. King Edward's personal popularity in French society probably enabled him to aid in the cementing of the Anglo-French entente. But the conclusion which is commonly drawn in London and Paris from this success, that he is an active and exceptionally gifted diplomatist, has done much more harm than good, based as it is on an entirely false and yet tenaciously held theory of our Constitution. If we were to accept it, we should necessarily have to speak with more freedom than the British Press usually applies to the action of a King who reigns but does not govern. We should have to point out that the friction between the British and German Courts has added for several years an element of special difficulty to Anglo-German relations. The notion that the King is his own Foreign Minister has, we are bound to add, received some support since those days. And the results have not been fortunate. The King's sudden visit to Italy in 1907 gave rise to suspicions at Berlin, which were, for the moment, a positive danger to peace. The Reval visit had already begun to complicate Anglo-German relations by raising the Balkan question in an acute and undesirable form, when, happily, the revolution in Turkey created a wholly new situation. Of the Cronberg visit one can only say that visibly it has done no political good, and it may have done much harm. Quite apart from the constitutional impropriety of these proceedings, there is nothing in such a record to lead us to welcome the increased influence of the Crown in foreign affairs, or to condone the startling breach with established practice which they indicate.

Up to the present reign it had been an invariable rule of our Constitution that the King should not meet a foreign Sovereign, save in the presence of a responsible Minister, and this principle of jealous supervision was even extended to correspondence. There is no conceivable reason why the principle of Ministerial responsibility should be relaxed in the department of foreign affairs. On the contrary, the very fact that so large a part of the work of diplomacy is carried on in secrecy and beyond the control of public opinion makes it, if possible, more important there than elsewhere to limit the activity of the Crown. The temptation for a Monarch to follow his dynastic interests or his personal prepossessions is too obvious to require emphasis. The revelations of General Kuropatkin, which trace the Russo-Japanese War to the financial interests held by the Russian Grand Dukes and probably by the Czar in person in a Korean timber concession, and show how the Court contrived to make war inevitable by over-ruling the Ministry, remind us forcibly of some of the reasons which justify the rigid English theory of Ministerial responsibility. The King cannot begin to play an active part in foreign affairs without at once exposing himself in Parliament and the country to the attacks and criticisms from which it is one of the chief purposes of the Constitution to shield him. It may be objected that in all these visits the King was accompanied by Sir Charles Hardinge. But however implicit the confidence which Sir Edward Grey reposes in his chief permanent assistant, a paid official, who is not responsible to Parliament, and whose views and temper are unknown to the public, and are never expounded to them, cannot possibly replace the Foreign Secretary as a check upon the Crown. Parliament cannot call him to account, nor judge of his fitness for so delicate a function, nor has he the authority or prestige which would enable him, if necessary, to assert the views of the Cabinet (known to him only at second hand, and by the report of the Foreign Secretary) against his Sovereign. If the King is permitted to discuss political questions with the Kaiser, or M. Clemenceau, or M. Isvolsky, all of whom he has met at Cronberg and Marienbad, he fills one of two functions. Either he speaks for himself, with a certain freedom and authority, or else he is the agent of Sir Edward Grey, tied down by precise instructions, and permitted to speak only to a brief. On the former supposition Parliamentary government would be at an end; on the latter the dignity of the Crown itself would be seriously compromised. There is only one possible answer to this dilemma, and that is, that despite official and semi-official communiqués, the King, when he goes abroad, does not talk politics, and that all the statements solemnly made by Russian, or German, or Austrian officials, to the effect that he has discussed Macedonia, or Morocco, or armaments, are pure fiction. But if these visits are to result in misunderstandings so grave, and misunderstandings for which highly placed foreign officials are responsible, that is only one reason the more for their discontinuance, or for a reform of the procedure which governs them.

These visits have not contributed to the tranquillity of Europe, nor have they enhanced the prestige of the Liberal Cabinet. Their effect has been to confirm a belief, always prevalent on the Continent, that nothing is really changed at the Foreign Office when a Liberal Government comes into power. It is assumed that, in diplomacy, at least, "the governing class," which is apt to mean in practice the inner ring of the Unionist Party, still rules. The "Times" is still accepted as its voice, the King as its representative. Anything which tends to encourage this view must damage the special purposes of Liberalism in foreign affairs by exposing it to a suggestion of impotence and insincerity. This is no novel objection, and it is beginning at last to disturb men who are not by any means pedants in constitutional matters. The Garden Party incident, which meant, if it meant anything at all, that the King considers that the policy of his official visits is in some sense his personal policy, has made it all the more important to insist on a change of practice. The precedent which is being fixed is much too grave, the growth of a permanent misunderstanding abroad far too serious, to be ignored. Sir Edward Grey's distaste for ceremony, creditable as it is to his good taste, may explain this very risky innovation, but hardly excuses it. Liberalism, if it sanctions this precedent, weakens its chances of resisting the growth of the power of the Crown, and removes foreign affairs by yet one stage further from democratic control.

THE ENTENTE OF AMERICA AND AUSTRALIA.

It is natural for British opinion to be moved by surprise, at least as much as by pleasure, at the spectacle of the entertainment of the American battle fleet in the great Australian ports, and the unbounded warmth of its reception by the people and the statesmen of the Commonwealth. The demonstration is said to have been more cordial than the greeting to the Prince of Wales at the opening of the Commonwealth Parliament, and is compared with the frenzy of emotion with which Paris received the sailors of the Russian fleet. Mr. Deakin, the head of the Commonwealth Ministry, admits that the visit was arranged, and that it was designed by him to enforce a policy on which he and other Australian statesmen have long been at issue with the Imperial Government, namely, the creation of an Australian Navy. The "Westminster Gazette," indeed, points out that Mr. Deakin did not, as Reuter's report indicated, invoke the example of the American Navy as an incitement to Australia to build another such fleet as the only means of securing her against "outside injustice and injury." He only appealed for the building of a Navy "which would rank in time among the real defence forces of the Empire." But even in the modified version the speech strikes us as a somewhat sensational development of the march of colonial self-government. We are on the best terms with the United States; had our relationship been cold and strained, the visit would not have taken place. But it seems to us strong measure for an Australian statesman to use a foreign fleet as a means of forwarding a project which is not approved by the Admiralty, and is regarded by them as an entirely wrong development of Imperial Defence. Mr. Deakin is still fighting his battle for an Australian Navy. The Admiralty support, as they are bound to support, the opposite policy of Colonial aids to the great force which guarantees the safety of Australasian territory, of a unified command, and of concentration on the seas which wash these shores. It is clear that Mr. Deakin rejects these theories, so far as they hamper his view of Australian naval policy. He uses the American fleet—"the last word in the art of naval construction," as he calls it—as a plea for the "creation" of a separate Australian scheme of "naval defence." As we have no real control over Australian policy, it is certain that Mr. Deakin will prevail, especially as Canada cherishes a like ambition for itself. The Australian subsidy of £240,000 to the Imperial Navy will be withdrawn, and a small, and entirely useless, Australian squadron will take its place. The special point of attraction in the Canadian case is the United States, in the Australian case it is Japan, and, as Mr. Archibald Hurd points out in the "Fortnightly Review," Canada must provide a fleet comparable to the American Navy, and Australia aim at a counterpart to the sea-power of Japan, before these visions can even approach reality.

The truth is, however, that Australia's desire for an independent Navy, in "alliance" with our own, is merely a fresh embodiment of the nationalism which has informed her politics for a generation, and which federation has powerfully aided. Australia has always desired to act alone. She would have liked to govern Imperial policy in the Pacific before and after the day when Sir Thomas McIlwraith "annexed" New Guinea, and was disavowed by the Colonial Office. Even when she joined an enterprise of the Mother Country like the South African War, she did so largely with the desire, expressed to a distinguished Englishman by Mr. Deakin himself, to "blood" her young people, to furnish them with a passage of adventure in the early history of their State. This feeling, consistent as it may be with a feeling of loyalty to the Motherland, finds ready expression in contact with the American people. All visitors to the Colonies are struck by the points of superficial likeness between the Colonial and many prevailing American types—their self-confidence and buoyancy, their newness, their sharply defined and rather material views of life, and their highly-developed vision of an organised commercial and industrial democracy unknown to our more delicately shaded and conservative society. Resembling the Americans, the free colonial peoples resemble each other still more. And in one point of exterior policy they are in close harmony with the later, though not the earlier, developments of American opinion. The American fleet was invited to Australia in close sequence on the anti-Japanese riots on the Pacific coasts of Canada and the United States, and the Mayor of Sydney took care to emphasise, in the address of welcome, the identity of views on the color question, and especially on Asiatic immigration. Here, indeed, Australia has led America, and has done as a considered and consistent policy what the States are beginning to do as a consequence of later teachings of the dark evangel of race hatred and fear. And here, again, British and Colonial policy does not move from the same springs. Few South Africans or Australians see with pleasure the admission of Asiatics or negroes to London clubs and the terms of equality on which they subsist with British people of all classes. Many cherish more or less consciously the idea of the old-fashioned Boer that such races as the Kaffirs belong to an inferior, half-finished creation, with doubtful pretensions to a soul. And all "Colonials" are firmly possessed of the notion that the standard of life must be maintained by white men for white men, and that a mixed industrial order, based on inter-marriage and joint government by white and black or yellow, is incompatible with civilisation.

It is obviously impossible for an Australian holding such views to approve the action of this country in entering on an equal alliance with Japan. The Anglo-Japanese alliance may and should mean a great easing of the situation in respect of Asiatic immigration, a useful guarantee of peace, if not of good feeling, between white and yellow Governments in the Pacific. But Australia is much more disposed to regard it as a concession to the doctrine of color-equality on which that portion of the British Empire which is self-governing is no longer built. For that reason, she is pleased to see the hand of the United States stretched between her northern shores and Japan—pleased to secure the patronage and support of the Great Republic, fresh from her anti-Japanese agitation. We have, indeed, to admit that on a great range of questions in which British commercial interests and British feeling develop on one line, Australian and free Colonial feeling is firmly established on another, which now happens to be distinctly American. It does not, of course, follow that because the United States and the two federated Anglo-Saxon communities—which will soon be three—think alike on such questions as Protection, the color problem, and hereditary aristocracy, and because their internal governments belong more distinctly to the Republican than to the Monarchical type, there will be separation. Already the tie between the self-governing colonies and ourselves is one of alliance rather than of dependence, and the Liberal conception of these relationships was always based on sympathy and on freedom. Probably, South Africa, Canada, and Australia are, and will remain, almost as safe from invasion as from the Black Death. But we confess that we think the Colonies do not always realise, in the later developments of their politics, how much moral force they owe to the home connection, and how great would be their loneliness in the world of new Empires and old ambitions if the prestige of the Imperial Power and the support of the Imperial Navy were withdrawn from them.

A SOUTH AMERICAN RULER.

It is impossible to describe President Castro's present proceedings except by saying that he is at it again. He has challenged the Dutch Government to come on. The Dutch Government looks at him in some perplexity, talks vaguely about naval demonstrations, and resigns itself to putting up with it a little longer. But the Netherlands are not alone in furnishing Castro with the sort of excitement on which he thrives. Great Britain, France, and the United States have each their account to settle with him; and none of them quite know how to do it. The Americans a few weeks ago advertised at once their impatience and their embarrassment by breaking off diplomatic relations. Great Britain, indeed, seems to be the only considerable Power with which the Venezuelan potentate is at present on speaking terms. Such a situation is precisely what he relishes. In the course of the last ten years he has trodden on the toes of at least six European Powers. He has been blockaded by the fleets of three of them; he has probably received more ultimatums than any man alive; he has insulted plenipotentiaries, cancelled concessions, disturbed the peace of Central America, and flouted foreign bondholders. Now he has the supreme satisfaction of seeing another crisis well on its way to maturity.

It is the old story of broken contracts and cancelled concessions. Castro has had an unequalled experience in all these forms of politics, but the pastime of outwitting concessionaires is probably the one that most appeals to him. His indulgence in it is quite impartial. He does not care to what nationality the concessionaires belong nor what kind of enterprise they engage in. Mines, banks, railways, cables, waterworks, matches, salt, asphalte—it is all one to him. His procedure is usually this. He begins by granting the concession. He incorporates into its terms a clause binding the concessionaire never under any circumstances to have recourse to international redress. He then looks on benignantly while the work of development proceeds. When it has advanced sufficiently far, when the business is well established, he begins to tax it. Nine times out of ten the provisions of the original grant exempt the undertaking from taxation. But trifles such as these do not weigh with Castro. He applies the pressure of export and import dues, and of such direct imposts as happen to occur to him. Soon afterwards it is found that there was a technical flaw in the concession. It had not been approved by the National Congress, or the work had not been completed within the specified time. The next stage is to hale the offending company before the Venezuelan courts. The courts know what is expected of them. The concession is cancelled, and the plant and property of the undertaking are taken over by the Government. The concessionaires appeal to their respective Foreign Offices. The Foreign Offices "make representations." Castro, secure in the consciousness that Venezuela is a debtor State and impossible to invade, replies that the case has already been sat upon and decided by the highest judicial authority in Venezuela. If the Foreign Secretary is a European, the Monroe Doctrine is thrown at his head. If an American, he is adjured to remember the solidarity of the sisterhood of republics.

This more or less has been the history of the Italian mining concession, the Belgian waterworks concession, and the French cable concession. More or less it is also the history of the American salt, asphalte, and shipping concessions, and of the British match concessions. And Castro has a measure of right on his side. Speculators in South American Republics are not always political fainéants. Such a thing as their subsidising a revolution is not unheard of, and Castro, who has always the whip-hand of the material situation, has not infrequently the better of the argument also. But the business of cancelling concessions, long since reduced to a mere matter of routine, fails to satisfy his more expansive moods. There are times when he is stirred to seize foreign trading vessels and imprison their crews, to violate commercial treaties, or to select some foreign Minister as the target for his fulminations. His variety, indeed, is inexhaustible, and it is out of the question to be seriously angry with him or to forget that if he is occasionally an international nuisance, he is at all times an international joke.

Ten years ago Castro was an unknown man. The outside world had never heard his name, and even in Venezuela itself there were reckoned to be at least fifty "generals" more prominent than he. He began life on a small ranch on the Colombian frontier, a Westerner of the Westerners, a typically hardy mountaineer of the Andine provinces. When he was sent to Caracas as Senator for his district, the aristocrats of the capital laughed at his clothes and provincialisms, and his general air of uncouthness. It takes as little to stir an Andino against the rulers at Caracas as to stir a Catalan against the rulers of Madrid. Chance brought Castro his opening. His cattle had been seized and confiscated for the non-payment of taxes. Having no other means of livelihood, he raised the standard of revolt. The local capital was quickly captured, and in a few weeks Castro found himself President of the Andine province. A little later he was invited by the military chiefs at Caracas to join in overthrowing Andrade. With six hundred mountaineers behind him, Castro set out for the capital, entered it, overawed the local conspirators, and was proclaimed President of Venezuela. From that moment his rule has been absolute. He has had to face the regulation number of risings, but he has stamped them out without very much difficulty and with an ample revenge. He owns Venezuela completely. He is the beginning and end of all legislation, of all decrees, of all official activities. His journeys through the country are marked with the pomp, the extravagance, the adulations and revelries of a Roman Emperor. Even the Spanish language has been hardly equal to coping with the panegyrics that bubble up to the dictator and gush from him. He is the "prodigious Andino" whose heart is "inspired by ideals sublime and grandiose." The blessings he has bestowed upon his country are "as refulgent as the light of the king star when it shines in the zenith." He is "the universal conscience, the criterion of peoples, the saviour of the sovereignty of the Patria, and the defender the most inflexible that reason and justice ever had in the Homeric struggle against the enemies of liberty." Castro himself deprecates such language. "I ought to declare," he has said, "that I am hardly more than the agent of a something superior that watches over the fortunes of virtuous peoples, of nations called to fulfil the high destinies of civilisation and of progress." Yet in his calmer moments his estimate of his "magnificently patriotic, and admirably grand and portentous work," is not a low one. He speaks of himself as a second Bolivar, another Cæsar, a Washington redivivus.

But Castro is also an able man and an ambitious one. He has raised an army of six thousand men; he has invaded Colombia, and means, if possible, to amalgamate Venezuela, Colombia, and Ecuador into one Republic under his rule; he has laid every conceivable form of industrial enterprise under contribution for his own and his favourites' benefit; he is the very monarch of "graft"; he has perfected a more than Turkish system of espionage and censorship; and he has made good his title to be called "The Restorer of Venezuela" by restoring to her most of the concessions that were granted by his predecessors to foreigners. He is an original whom the great world of diplomacy and Empire has to bear with, for it cannot get rid of him.

Life and Letters.

SCIENCE AND THE SUPERNATURAL.

For a man of science forty years ago to treat the phenomena of occultism as worthy of consideration was to run a serious risk of being deemed a charlatan. It is very different now. The pioneers of psychical research, Professors De Morgan and Crookes, and Mr. A. R. Wallace, have not merely hewn a broad path through the jungle of prejudice, but have drawn after them a large number of men and women of the highest standing in the intellectual life of these and other nations. Among the active psychical researchers of to-day we find eminent physicists such as Lord Rayleigh, Professors Ramsay, J. J. Thomson, Barrett, Lodge, psychologists such as Professors W. James, Stanley Hall and Richet, anthropologists like Lombroso and Ferri, many of whom have not merely abandoned the blank incredulity of a generation ago, but have advanced far towards a state of positive acceptance of facts and interpretations which their predecessors would have dismissed scornfully as "old wives' tales." This striking change of attitude is well worth investigation. A nidus for the new culture was doubtless furnished in large part by the litter of decaying dogmas, religious, scientific, and philosophical, which strewed the latter part of the nineteenth century. The general trend of the scientific interpretation of nature and of man has been away from the hard-shell determinist materialism of the mid-Victorian era towards more spiritual conceptions and terminology. The abandonment of the older molecular theories to meet the more fluid demands alike of modern physics and modern chemistry; the growing recognition, alike from the side of biology and of psychology, of an underlying unity of mind and matter; the insistence of philosophy that this unity shall be expressed directly in terms of consciousness, as Professor Darwin expressed it, on Wednesday, in his address to the British Association, rather than in other terms that are unmeaning until they are reduced to consciousness—all this march of modern thought has helped to concentrate more and more attention upon the study alike of the normal and the abnormal phenomena of the human mind.

But this new stimulus to psychology would not alone account for the modern zest for psychical research. Still more potent has been the influence of the transformation of religious thought and feeling wrought by the combined impact of Biblical criticism and the wider evolutionary teaching. Among many intellectual men of a definitely religious cast of mind, the liberative influence substituted for a creed of dead miracles, embedded in a distant past, a more living and glowing apprehension of a growing spiritual order in man and the universe, which not only preserved but enriched the significance of the human soul, opening wide the gates of spiritual revelation in this life and another. The claim of priests and churches to an exclusive interpretation of spiritual things could be no longer maintained, and many busy souls set themselves reverently to an exploration of the mind of man in the fuller light of evolution. But there is the best reason to believe that the strongest impulse towards psychical research in its narrower sense came from another religious effect, viz., the shock which the new biology had dealt to the theological supports of the belief in human immortality. Many intellectual men and women found that, amid the decay of many accepted dogmas, all assurance of a personal life after death for themselves and for those they loved was slipping from them, and that the loss was fraught with anguish and despair. It is important to recognise that this craving for a support for the belief in personal survival has not merely underlain the acceptance of spiritualism by large numbers of men and women, here and in America, but was directly responsible for the organisation of psychical research upon scientific lines. Though the research itself has, for the most part, been conducted in a seriously scientific spirit, which seeks to banish prejudice and to apply the sternest tests of evidence, it must not be forgotten that the desire to ascertain whether positive proofs of spiritual survival could not be found was a chief motive of the founders of the study. Certainly the leading investigators have shown, both in their researches and in the controversies to which they have given rise, a singularly high standard of intellectual integrity, setting, in this regard, an excellent example to modern controversialists in some of the "exacter" sciences. But we doubt whether they have realised the havoc which so powerful an interest is capable of making in processes of reasoning so delicately subjective as most of those upon which they have to engage.

Two works before us, both able and lucid expositions of the positive achievements of modern psychical research "A New World of Thought," by Professor Barrett (Kegan Paul), and "Occultism and Common Sense," by Beccles Willson (Werner Laurie)) seem to illustrate this inherent defect of their science. So long as the researcher keeps within the wonderland of psychology, dealing with mesmerism, trance, hypnotism, and thought-transference, he is sufficiently remote from the central craving to preserve a sane judgment upon the worth of evidence. In those fields psychical research has made genuinely scientific progress, though much deceit and error have grown up with it. The evidence of double or alternating personality, stores of sub-conscious knowledge, and direct psychical communications among the living, is so strong and various as to convince open-minded readers of the existence of many unsuspected powers in the mind of man. Though the evidence of clairvoyance, and of what are termed the "physical phenomena" of séances, such as rappings, the raising of bodies, &c., involves some radical changes in our conception of the material world, these changes are not really more wonderful than those involved in such modern miracles as wireless telegraphy or x-rays. No one doubts that matter, as well as mind, contains such powers as yet unused or undiscovered. We do not know that we are yet prepared to give full acceptance to the case of Mr. Home floating mid-air between the windows of two adjoining houses. As a guess we would rather set down such cases to collective hypnotism. But our intellectual constitution would not be wrecked if such "interference" with the law of gravitation were proved to be possible. Of thought-reading, the direct imposition of thoughts and feelings by one mind upon another, access to knowledge forgotten or only known to lower centres of consciousness, involving, perhaps, the notion of a universe vibrating with psychic as with physical energy, there exists a large amount of substantially sound evidence.

But when we are invited to pass from such enlargements of ordinary knowledge to the acceptance of premonitory dreams, disclosures of past occurrences known to no one, and the appearance of disembodied spirits, we are impelled to pause and contemplate the chasm which separates these phenomena from the others we have just described. How future events can be imaged in the present, how a trance-subject can learn facts that never have been known, how a "soul," having shed its body, can simulate to the senses that body and its former clothing—these things are no extension but a contradiction of the whole round of human experience. Therefore, their adoption and incorporation in our mind upon the sort of evidence that is adduced spell intellectual chaos. It is true that we must, as reasonable beings, "go where the argument leads us," but we shall do well to scrutinise the evidence very closely. In this task we have the able and skilled assistance of Mr. Podmore, whose latest volume, "The Naturalisation of the Supernatural" (Putnam), is a forcible criticism of the nature of the reasoning in these processes of psychical research. As we cross the borderland of abnormal psychic experience into the realm of objective spiritual phenomena, the ground appears to crumble beneath our feet. While valid instances of phantasms of the living and other psychical projections abound, the ghostly visitants from "another world" who bide our question, baffling both physical and ordinary psychical interpretations, are extremely few. The fact that many men of intellectual eminence think otherwise carries little weight when due allowance is made for the incessant working of the craving for positive proofs of human survival. There is, first, the selection of persons interested enough to pursue such enquiries, a condition which probably disqualifies the very men whose judgment is coolest and whose scrutiny is keenest. Next comes the necessary or contrived obscurity of the setting in which the phenomena appear, involving grave possibility of error in clear and continuous observation. Then we have to reckon for the treachery of memory and records conducted in an atmosphere of excitement; and, finally, there is the tendency to prefer interpretations which support a strongly preconceived and deeply cherished idea. The most thorough training in disinterested science affords little security against the twin perils of mediumistic trickery and honest self-deception. Both these elements abound both in ordered séances and in sudden chance invasions of ordinary experience by the abnormal. As Mr. Podmore shows, among the best attested instances of prophetic visions or "revenants," where the separate testimony of several eye-witnesses is given, the genuine independence of these witnesses is almost always open to doubts, which, in the nature of the case, cannot be resolved. It does not seem as if the researches of members of the Psychical Society have yet surmounted these difficulties, which beset the task of proving inductively the survival of human personality. Such proof may not be impossible, but it must be very difficult. And we are afraid the evidence tendered hitherto is not strong enough to convince those who approach it without a positive bias towards acceptance.

THE DESPAIR OF AN INTELLECTUAL.

The second volume of Taine's letters concluded with his German tour; when, immediately before the chaos and whirlwind of 1870, he suddenly realised that some awful disaster was impending to his country. This third and concluding section of his correspondence ("The Life and Letters of H. Taine, 1870-1892," Constable & Co., an English translation and partial abridgment of the third and fourth French volumes) carries the story onwards to his death. His life appears sharply divided into two halves by the great catastrophe: part of whose interest lies, to an observer who can contemplate it dispassionately, in the twisting, stunning or stimulating effect which it produced upon the various great intellects of the time. M. Hanotaux, in his "Modern France," has vividly described the effect of this sudden crashing of harsh realities into the visions and speculations of the intellectuals of the time. They had pictured the progress of man, of society; they had sought the origin and traced the development of intelligence; they had declared that life was "a living geometry," men a "walking theorem," Vice and Virtue "products like sugar and alcohol." In the midst of these speculations fell the dumbfounding realities of war and national disgrace, with the invading army thundering at the gates of Paris. Taine is driven to madness by his impotence, the uselessness of all his knowledge and intellect in face of the overwhelming calamity. He offered himself for the armies, but he was too short-sighted to be of any use. He turned in fury first to denounce the Commune and its leaders, then the whole structure of the society which had been built up from the Revolution and seemed to him finally to have collapsed in irretrievable ruin. At first the cries are almost as those of a wounded animal. "My heart is dead within my breast," he wrote; "I feel as if I were living in a madhouse." Later, "I am in a continuous state of dumb anger and dry despair," he proclaims. "I have tried in vain to start work once more," he wrote from Pau; "sorrow and anxiety seem to sap my energy." He brushed aside all the elaborate speculation in art, literature, and philosophy which had made his international reputation. In face of such shattering realities the best of these kind appeared but as shadows. He determined to devote his remaining energies to an attempt at diagnosis of disease: to reveal, through the historical method, the errors and deliriums of the Revolution and the generations which still called themselves its children. "This short, slender, pale man," says M. Hanotaux, "munching his throat lozenges, with squinting grey eyes behind his thick glasses, had at last seen things which astonished him—dying men, flowing blood, burning cities." The result of that experience was "Les origines de la France contemporaine."

These letters are practically a commentary upon that great controversial study, revealing the spirit in which it was written and the motives, deliberate or unconscious, behind it all. Taine claimed to be writing in as detached and impartial a spirit as a visitant from Mars or Saturn, recording without bias, without passion. A similar assertion was made by Macaulay, by Froude, by Carlyle, with as little justification. Every page of this cold, relentless indictment of the Revolution and its authors bears evidence of the convictions and prejudices of the writer: his hatred and fear of the mob, his exaltation of the intellectuals, his distrust of all passionate and emotional upheavals and appeals to anything but the reason of the few. Carlyle possessed no more whole-hearted a contempt for the Democracy. "The essential point to be gained," he declares, "is that the wealthy and enlightened classes should lead the ignorant and those who live from hand to mouth." He never grasped the truth, as Lord Acton once declared, that not only was any class unfit to govern but that every class was unfit to govern; perhaps of all most unfit, the "wealthy and intellectual classes," whose follies are stamped upon the pages of history. He regarded organised society as a "fortress in which humanity had taken shelter." Like Mr. Balfour and other enlightened intellectuals, he saw a tiny region of serenity and culture set in the midst of a waste howling wilderness, only preserved from destruction as by a miracle: the barbarian always "knocking at the gates," a brutal populace, blind and furious, prepared to bring the edifice at any moment crashing to the ground, even if at the cost of their own lives. France thus painfully reviving her wasted energies after the havoc of the war, fills him merely with wretchedness and disdain. Sometimes he thinks the whole civil society will end in a universal dissolution. "The grey has now turned to black," he writes in the spring of '71. "I foresee a whole year of anarchy and civil strife, then a second invasion, possibly then the severing of France into two hostile parts." "We have no leaders," he cries, "and are driven at haphazard by our interests or by our fears." Six years afterwards, "as we are in the power of the brutes," he suggests "we must learn to tame them, and, above all, to find them enough food." He is convinced that by 1920 France will have sunk below the level of Italy; perhaps below that of Spain. In such a spirit of savage anger—born of outraged patriotism and a smarting sense of impotence in defeat—he turned to the "introduction of the grandsires to the grandsons." "Generally speaking," is his summary, "since 1789 the French have thought and acted partly like madmen, partly like children." The Revolution he branded as "an insurrection of mules and horses against man, the mules and horses being led by monkeys with parrots' voices." Its progress resulted in "a systematic selection of madmen, all equally alarmed and alarming." He hunts eagerly for incidents derogatory to its leaders: finding Robespierre "a scared and embittered fool," asking for evidence that Saint-Just stole silver. "I should be much obliged," he writes to a correspondent, "if you could help me to verify this allegation." The man who found Victor Hugo a "mystic charlatan," and had seen Paris burning and the alien triumphant could never, as M. Hanotaux has declared, "see success through defeat, and the world conquered beyond the limited frontier."

Outside this great product of labor, anger, and bitterness, these letters reveal Taine as faithful friend and generous husband and father, working for the common good, for the healing of dissensions, for the advancement of truth, and for the social welfare of the world. That world appeared to him no desirable residence for the tortured and bewildered race of men. He repudiated the charge of pessimism, claiming that he saw life as it was, without distortion, without undue complaint, enduring where resistance was empty and vain. "The more I think of life, he wrote to his wife, the more it seems to me like launching out to sea in a frail boat—the weather is always uncertain, and one has no one to depend upon but oneself, and oneself is not always quite reliable. If I were a religious man I should say, 'May God guide us and help us! All that we can do is to add our small endeavours to His aid.'" He was unable to fall back with any confidence on a directing Providence. He could not even follow Renan in his general affirmation of Purpose in the Universe and progress towards an end. When the natural losses of life fell upon him—a man of sensitive friendships and deep affections—he could only call up a stoical endurance, with work as a refuge from torturing memories, and a perpetual recollection that life itself would soon be over for all. At times he had been tempted to repudiate altogether, standing aside, defiant, refusing to acquiesce or to obey. He writes to a friend after the death of a little girl, "For a long while I was prevented from marrying by the idea that life was too sad to be passed on to others, and I used to think that to provide oneself with a wife and children was to act like the tortoise when it exposes its head or feet to the knife instead of keeping them safely in its shell. My head and feet are now exposed, and may be taken from me any day." So, in the face of the great mysteries, he fell back upon the teaching of Marcus Aurelius, wiser, as he thought, than all the speculations of later ages. "You will suffer much and long," he wrote to M. Boutmy, in a letter of consolation; "it cannot be otherwise with you, but calm will come at last and resignation to the inevitable. And the dead are not unhappy, and we, too, shall soon have joined them. Last year I realised so intensely that my own life is but a vapour, and it was this conviction which served as the opiate that, though it does not cure, it at least brings respite from the pain."

It was a life of almost unparalleled mental activity, consistently devoted to high causes, disinterested, laborious, sincere. Of the accepted religion (in correspondence) he was frankly contemptuous. "All these early Christians," he wrote of Renan's "Antichrist," "are such inferior creatures, so like low-class Methodists or the converted negroes of America, that one grows weary of their jeremiads and their hallucinations." Yet later he is re-reading the Gospel of St. Mark, and finds "some striking passages there"; although "it is the work of an illiterate, straightforward artisan, something like the cahiers of Coignet." Yet he had no prejudice against the adherents of the older faith, and was totally lacking in any anti-clerical ardor. "Perhaps your road," he writes to M. Bourget in a rather remarkable prophecy, "will lead you to some mystic haven, some form of Christianity. Should you there find rest and peace of mind, I will greet you no less warmly than I do to-day."

His test of character in history was the test of humanity. "Has the man under consideration tried to diminish, not augment, the total sum of present and future human sufferings?" "I would gladly exchange all worldly honors," he could declare to Alexandre Dumas, "for one more original idea of my own or for the power of proving the truth of the ideas which I have already conceived." His last survey of the world was mournful and uncertain. "We are being borne along by a vast and rapid current," he declared. "Of what avail is it to write about its rapidity and depth?" So—unable to anticipate the future of society except in dread, pronouncing utter ignorance of life or death beyond the grave, refusing even to affirm purpose and a goal in the Universe—died one of the wise men of the nineteenth century.

THE LEGEND OF FAUST.

To see Mr. Tree as the Devil may satisfy a curiosity in playgoers, but when the curtain at His Majesty's rises to-night, there will be nothing new in the theme of Mr. Stephen Phillips and Mr. Comyns Carr. It is not a virgin soil that they are cultivating. Some years ago a diligent German professor, named Karl Engel, totted up the books, plays, and pamphlets in which the story of Faust had been told. He collected two thousand seven hundred and thirteen titles before he died, and even then he left his task unfinished—it was called "Die Zusammenstellung der Faust Schriften." For the poor Professor never lived to see Nellie Farren in "Little Doctor Faust," or Irving as Mephisto, either of which would have given him a happy end. And so, as a German professor can be trusted in arithmetic, we know for certain that to-night's version will be at least the two thousand seven hundred and sixteenth that has been attempted. It is rather depressing that of all that number only two have counted, except in the German's simple addition. But perhaps to-morrow we shall be able to say three.

Evidently, there is something attractive in the idea of a learned man who sells his soul to the Devil. To unlearned people, who give their souls for nothing, it seems a pleasing vengeance upon superiority. That the legend originated with the unlearned is shown by the kind of pleasures which Faust purchased in exchange for eternal torment. His joys have always largely consisted in the beery jests that Germans think merry and call mad. In his first authentic biography, published a year before the Armada attempted our holy shores, and entitled "A Life of Doctor Faust, Compiled from his own Manuscripts, for the Instruction, awful Example, and earnest Warning of all presumptuous, over-curious, and impious Folk"—in that first biography we find tricks upon the Pope's dinner and apple-pie beds for the Sultan's wives ranking high among the pleasures for which the man of learning consigned his immortal soul to perdition. It is significant, too, that the Devil as part of his price taught him the German miracle of making wine without grapes, the tradition of which lingers in Hamburg to this day, though now the ultimate penalty is paid by those who drink.

It is true that in that early story Faust visited the stars and called up Helen from the classic shades, and even took a glimpse at hell, as though seeking a foretaste of things to come. But his chief delight was in the Till Owlglass merriment of beer barrels, and it is queer to see how even Marlowe, who had read the tale and put it to such magnificent use, was caught by the German infection in the unremembered parts of his play. It is almost as queer that this side of the old legend should have suggested to Goethe the scene in Auerbach's cellar. Faust came from communing with eternity and with the spirit who labors at the buzzing loom of time. How, then, could a clever Devil suppose that for him a German students' Kneipe would be a fair exchange for damnation? A cultured don may not as a rule commune with the Earth Spirit or spend much thought on eternal truths, but even he would not dream of giving his soul to be present at a fresher's wine. He would be more likely to give his soul to be out of it.

At the back of all this legend one discerns the figure of some dim scholar, some prophet of approaching change, dwelling alone with knowledge among the roofs and spires of an old German town. A Churchman's letter, written while Henry VIII. was still innocent of matrimony, tells of such a man whose name was Faust, and ascribes to him the dangerous powers of working miracles and knowing Plato and Aristotle by heart. In the year when a wife survived Henry VIII., Faust is mentioned again, but as one already dead—strangled by the Devil in accordance with his bond. In that mention we meet the dog for the first time—the black dog, which has always played such a part in the Faust legend and will—we lay even money—trot into His Majesty's to-night by kind permission of the Hippodrome. Wagner first appeared in another "Life of Doctor Faust," published nearly fifty years later, in the very year that Marlowe's play was acted. And that is all we know for certain of the dim scholar who lived alone in an unknown German town. He passionately sought wisdom in the New Learning of the Greeks. He experimented in chemistry, for he wrought miracles, and to the common mind all the greatest miracles are chemical. He was fond of animals, for he kept a dog. He endured boredom, for he kept Wagner. And he probably had a German woman as housekeeper, for gossip said he associated with Helen, the ideal of feminine beauty.

How tragic a fate has befallen that humble and obscure man of learning! We need not suppose him a man of unearthly virtue—not so unimpeachable as the hero of a Chinese novel, who was so very good that in his thirtieth year he was allowed to converse with the Emperor. But, still, we recognise in him a patient and devoted lover of wisdom, tinged, perhaps, with the scholar's melancholy at the hopelessness of knowing all that life offers for knowledge, but mild and tolerant by nature. One of his few authentic sayings maintains that the Devil was not so black as he was painted, and Hell not so hot as was generally supposed. "Ah!" whispered the townspeople, "he may get on very well with the Devil in his garret up there, or riding to his wicked dances with women we know of on broomstick and cloak, but as to the comparative coolness of Hell, he will find out his mistake when his twenty-four years of revelry are up!"

The twenty-four years have been up for nearly four centuries now, and still the damnation of Faust continues. After Marlowe's play, nothing could save him. His lamentable story went back again to the theatres of German Courts. At German fairs it became the most popular of Punch-and-Judy shows, with Faust as Punch, Helen as Judy, the black dog as Toby, and Mephisto as the executioner. A squeaking voice from underneath the show always brought down the curtain with the words: "Faust, thou are being judged! . . . Faust, Faust, thou art damned, damned, damned!" And to-night the curtain rises again on the damnation of Faust at His Majesty's. Really, it is a tragic fate for any scholar, even a bad one.

But to-night the main interest will not lie in the poor old scholar so repeatedly sent to perdition, but in Mr. Tree, who sends him there again. It is seldom that a spiritual conception has changed so rapidly as the Devil did between the days of Luther and of Goethe. The devil who haunted Faust in his real German attic was rather a tricksy thing, amid all his obvious terrors—a little childlike, almost good-humoured. When Luther turned on him with the appeal, "If grace cannot save me, you must pray for me yourself," we feel he would relish the humour of the situation. Burns, writing at the same time as Goethe, was clinging fondly to the old conception when he cried:—

"Hear me, auld Hangie, for a wee,
And let poor damnèd bodies be;
I'm sure sma' pleasure it can gie
E'en to a Deil,
To skelp an' scaud poor dogs like me,
An' hear us squeal."

There is something homely and human, a touch of the household pet, about the creature. But in good society he would be as much out of place as a bumpkin given to practical jokes or the conjuror from a fair. To be sure, Goethe's Mephisto, in his conversation with the Lord, for one moment half pities the wretched brood of man, and has hardly the heart to plague them further, but we have in him no more of a rollicking and lubber spirit than in Milton's Satan. He is, as Goethe himself said in old age, "the living result of a vast observation of the world." Or, as Carlyle said of him, he is the devil, not of superstition, but of knowledge. He has so changed that when he visits the old witch she does not know him again. "Culture," he sighs, "has licked the devil smooth. Men have banished the northern phantom, but haven't got much by the exchange; they have lost the Wicked One, but kept the wicked." So now he is the man about town; a delightful conversationalist, never declaiming or volunteering information, but profound in the knowledge of iniquity—"a lynx of hell," as the witches call him, with a sleuth-hound's nose for evil. In any decent circles he would pass very well as the commonplace, negative kind of man raised to a higher power. It is only Gretchen that feels at sight of him the instinctive horror that a dog feels at a snake, though he has never seen one before.

But we cannot here analyse the most significant personality of modern literature, or dwell upon those scenes of unsurpassed subtlety and pathos in which the spirit of evil is revealed at work, until, at the common spectacle of a young girl's ruin, we are ready to cry with Faust as he enters her prison: "Der Menschheit ganzer Jammer fasst mich an," and the long misery of all mankind lays hold upon us. It is nearly a century and a half since the creation of Mephistopheles was begun. That is not long for the growth of a spiritual idea, but the change from the earliest of Faust's devils up to Goethe's took only some fifty years longer, and we wonder what fresh conception of the Evil One may have been developed in the interval for Mr. Tree to show us.

THE KITCHEN GARDEN.

The flower garden touches the house and belongs to the house. The carpets are reproduced in its lawns bordered with geranium and calceolaria, its wall-papers in its tall hollyhocks and sunflowers, larkspur and œnothera, poker plant and golden rod. The arboretum is like a Roman triumph in which all the denizens of the empire have been collected together to do honour to their conqueror. If we want the true temple of Flora we must enter the rose garden. Here, as in other temples, only one attribute of the thing to be worshipped is singled out and placed on high, but at least the roses are thoroughly honoured. The ideal wild garden has no borders; if man arranges it he must at any rate appear not to have done so. In the kitchen garden man frankly sets nature at work for his own ends. We feel when we enter it much as we should if we asked the dairymaid among her milk-pans to help us wile an idle hour. Idleness in the flower garden has no piquancy; while, for some reason that we are too lazy to pursue further, the kitchen garden seems crammed full of idleness. A tall brick wall of the warmest, softest red that the old brickmakers ever baked shuts out the wild world.

It is said that the bell of the snowdrop encloses air two degrees warmer than that outside. If a little sun shines, our kitchen garden, even in January, sometimes feels like the Garden of Eden. To-day, with the bees at eager commerce among the lavender blooms, with the gorgeous autumn butterflies sailing among the artichoke blooms, with plums, peaches, and apples glowing in the last ecstasy of colour, the air, albeit, just laced with the tonic of September, the walled garden seems the whole world and the hour of noon the whole twenty-four hours. It is indeed the Garden of Eden regained by generations of human industry. We are back again not only in the place but in the days when we bottled the bees at work in the foxgloves, or watched those wonderfully courageous little spiders attack even the wasps that got entangled in their net. And as it seems, the same fly-catcher inhabiting the same branch of the jargonelle permits us to take pleasure in her work.

The kitchen garden is far older than the flower garden, even than the happy, perennial flower garden that our great-grandfathers loved. The first flowers were planted here as thank-offerings for the more substantial benefits received, and many of them remain here to this day. At the same time, our kitchen garden is far older than most of the vegetables it now officially contains. Every schoolboy knows what is the age of the British potato. At the time when its first tubers were propagating in England, carrots and onions, and "sallets of herbs" were being imported from the Continent for royal and other wealthy tables. It is true that Piers Ploughman, or, at any rate, his master, could eat parsley and leeks and cabbage about two centuries earlier, but if the cult of vegetables had not died out in England by the time of Elizabeth, it had, at any rate, fallen far behind that of Holland. We are even reminded, as we pass the feathery carrots and come to the next bed, that the best parsnip we grow to-day is from stock that grew wild in the fields less than twenty years ago.

Our kitchen garden gives many evidences of its antiquity in the "weeds" that spring up here in spite of the sternest cultivation. The commonest and most persistent reminder of our ingratitude in calling it a weed is a tallish green-flowered plant with heart-shaped leaves, the under sides of which seem to have been rubbed with soap. It is Chenopodium bonus-henricus, Good King Henry, All-good, Fat-hen—lastly wild spinach. Some curious people and a faithful cottager or two eat it now. To our ancestors who knew simples better it was one of the best of green-stuffs obtainable, and we do not doubt that in this old garden it was once thoroughly welcome in the beds whence now we chase it with the proverbially vain "furca." "Simple" we have called it. Let anyone reflect for a moment, and he will realise that for thousands of years the vegetable has been at most but the garnish or the medicinal corrective of the joint. So deep-rooted is this feeling that we regard even the fat parsnip or the bean, which the analyst tells us contains far more food than the meat, as merely an adjunct. Take away all the vegetables and we can still dine on the joint, but take away the joint and we are lost. That attitude is being rapidly beaten down by the vegetarians, and we may have to take up its exact opposite. But before the advent of the heavy vegetables, it may be said that the cabbage was scarcely more important to the sirloin or griskin than the mint is to-day to the green peas or new potatoes. That is to say, vegetables were unimportant from the food point of view. We took them as the cat and dog take couch-grass as medicines, and so badly did our staple food of meat serve us, that as time went on we cultivated in this kitchen garden of ours a vast number of herbs that we never hear spoken of to-day.

The sweetest of them have survived with the flowers. We all know lavender, marjoram, thyme, sage, mint; many of us rosemary, hyssop, sweet basil, borage, dill. But where are alecost, clary, dittander, fenugreek, lovage, skirrets, smallage, and a hundred others that were once deemed essential to the happiness of every housewife. We can find no trace of them. Long ago their places were required, and none of them are of stalwart fibre enough to live as guerillas with the spade and hoe always against them. But there is a certain other sinister family that has taken its dismissal by no means so tamely. Let us test the significance of their names even in their Latin guise. Atropa belladonna, Hyoscyamus niger, Solanum, Datura. They still signify something because, being among the most potent of the old herbs, they are still notorious in the pharmacopœia. Deadly nightshade has gone. Such outspoken villainy could not be expected to escape the attentions of a hostile gardener. But sometimes even now its woody friend, the bitter-sweet, climbs up the roots of a peach tree and manages to set its tomato-like fruit, and the expeditious black nightshade rears its tiny tree in the rich soil between diggings, ripens its berries, and meets the hoe smiling. The great henbane is regarded to-day as a curiosity, but there must have been other gardeners who tried in vain to eradicate it perhaps in a less tidy and more overgrown garden. For the past twenty years no partiality has been shown for the thorn-apple, a leaf from which cured, let us hope, the asthma of some medieval monk. Twenty, nay, thirty years ago, we remember, a solitary thorn-apple came up, spread its cucumber-like blossom, and matured its prickly burr. We have scarcely known the garden since, but here again is the solitary annual plant, its burr open and grinning with black seeds about to fall. Let us leave the mandrake, still rambling here, the aconite promoted to the flower garden, and others, and return to pleasanter subjects. The black art of those who founded this garden will not bear dwelling on. Some of those stories poured into the ears of avaricious Henry may have been true.

Letters from Abroad.

THE CHARACTER OF THE GERMAN WORKERS' INSURANCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There appears to be widespread desire in Great Britain to build up a system of workers' insurances. This is very natural, and the first step having been made with old age pensions, the force of events will, I think, compel you to seek other developments. There is in this domain, perhaps, still more than in other kinds of legislation, a powerful law of consequences. The calamities that befall the worker and disable him from earning a livelihood are manifold; but often they combine in such a way that it is almost impossible to keep them separate or distinguish cause and effect. Our agencies for the administration of the insurance laws have provided experience, and Great Britain will not ignore it. But she may for that reason avoid the false steps by which the German insurance law has become a complicated and wasteful machinery.

It was no other than Count Posadowsky, the able late Home Secretary, and one of the most competent authorities on the subject, who, on March 29th, 1905, said in the Reichstag—and English legislators would do well to keep these words in mind:—

> "If to-day we had the question before us as res integra, no sane man, I believe, would think of creating a separate organisation for sick insurance, a separate organisation for accident insurance, and a separate organisation for old age and invalidity insurance. Accident, sickness and invalidity are, I dare say, three physiological conditions which in cause and effect are closely connected. What is called the system of our social legislation is only the result of a chronological evolution. If to-day the social legislation could be built up afresh, there would, I think, be not the slightest dispute in this House that a uniform organisation should be created. I am convinced, gentlemen, it must be the task of the time before us to combine these three great insurances into one uniform organisation."

These words were, stated the official report, received with "repeated cheers from all sides of the House"; and I may add that the Socialists were not the last to applaud them. The evil is felt and recognised by all concerned.

It is not enough to speak of three bodies only, for the sick insurance alone comprises seven—or, with the miners' provident funds, eight—differentiated sorts of organisation. But the evil is not so much that there are three great organisations, but in the fact that the three insurances are organised on three absolutely different systems of administration and finance. It is this constitutional evil which creates an enormous amount of superfluous clerical work and other costs, of friction and discontent, of confusion and disputes in courts. To make the matter understood, I shall try to explain as clearly as possible the three systems.

1. Sick insurance is, in the main, organised in local or localised associations. An exception is made in favor of the free friendly societies, formerly very popular, but now, in consequence of the law, on the decline, the miners' provident funds, and the sick funds of the artisan corporations ("Handwerks-Innungen"). The latter are, by the way, quite a negligible quantity in spite of much patronage by the powers that be. Servants and agricultural laborers, as far as sickness is concerned, are not insured by law. Four-fifths of the workers insured against sickness (over ten millions of about twelve millions) are organised either in local sick unions or in municipal sick insurances ("Gemeindekrankenkassen"), or in the works insurances. Of these the localised sick unions, the "Ortskrankenkassen," are organised by trades or federated trade groups, the works insurances are insurances established by manufacturers for their employees, and the municipal sick insurances are established by the municipalities for those workers for whom other agencies do not exist—e.g., workers in small trades, or jobbing workers, &c. They are wholly administered by the municipalities, through their officials. Those insured have no voice in the administration.

But it is otherwise with all the other sick insurances. There the insured workers take a more or less important part in the administration, most, of course, in some of the free friendly societies, least of all in the works and artisan sick insurances, where the employers, either by statute or by the force of their economic predominance, have the power to nominate the chairman of the administrative body. But even there the workers elect two-thirds of the members of the administration, whilst the employers elect the other third. This is in accordance with the legal distribution of the costs of the sick insurance. One third of the contributions per head is paid by the employer, two-thirds by the workers themselves. In the local sick unions the employers have no other representation than the third of the administrative body allotted to them by law, so that the representatives of the workers are always in the majority, and, consequently, often the masters. But there is comparatively little quarrel between the representatives of the employers and those of the workers, even where the latter are all or in their majority Social Democrats. Nevertheless, the Ortskrankenkassen are to-day the object of all sorts of hostile schemes on the part of the reactionists, just as they are favored by the advanced workers. They embrace six millions of members, i.e., more than half of all the workers concerned in the sick insurance.

To sum up, the sick insurance is, with some few exceptions, organised locally and administered mainly by the insured workers themselves, together with a minority of representatives of the employers. The costs are collected in the shape of regular fixed contributions, one-third of which is to be paid by the employers. They accumulate no capital, but provide some funds for reserve, which at present amount to something over twenty shillings per head of the insured workers. This equals the amount of the average expenditure for each sick worker in 1906, the last year for which returns are available. The number of cases of sickness supported was in that year four millions and a-half.

Altogether, the organisation of the sick insurance may be described as a qualified democracy. It is different with the other two insurances.

2. The accident insurance is organised on aristocratic or feudalistic lines. Here the employers, organised in trades associations ("Berufsgenossen Schaften") manage the whole insurance through their committees and agencies. In the management the workers have no say at all, only at the boards of appeal and the boards of experts have they some representation. The trades associations are organised either on imperial or on State lines, and in the cases of some particularly big industries there are also provincial associations. On the whole, there are sixty-six organisations for the different trades or trade groups, and forty-eight for agriculture. For the accident insurance embraces almost the whole wage-earning class, and includes certain sections of small traders who practically are workmen themselves. In 1906, 20,717,000 persons were insured against accidents under the law.

In the overwhelming majority of cases the trades associations raise their costs, not by regular fixed contributions but in the shape of levies, fixed annually according to the calculated expenditure, and graduated according to risks. Their reserves amounted in 1906 to 236 millions of marks—i.e., little more than 10 marks per head of insured workers. Their expenditure was 185 millions of marks, of which 142 millions were paid to disabled workers.

The entire cost of accidents is not paid by the associated employers. For the first thirteen weeks the disabled worker is supported by his sick insurance. Only if the disability exceeds thirteen weeks is he entitled from the beginning of the fourteenth week to support from the accident funds of the employers' associations. It will be easily understood that, in consequence of this, the workers pay a considerable part of their accident insurance themselves in the shape of their contributions to the sick funds. In 1906, 675,583 accidents were reported, and of these only 139,726 had to be paid by the employers' associations. They include 61,347 cases of permanent partial disability, 1,463 cases of permanent total disability, and 9,141 cases of death, so that the aids and pensions to be paid by the employers amount to much more than the amount of the aids shifted on the sick insurances. But the fact remains that in nearly four-fifths of the cases the sick insurance had to interfere, and this is a strong set-off against the fact that the worker is entitled to pay or pension in all cases where the accident was not caused deliberately by him.

Great discontent prevails in the ranks of the workers in regard to the spirit shown by the insurance committees of the associated employers. It may not in all cases be justified. But the exclusive character of the organisation is, in a high degree, responsible for the extreme distrust felt everywhere by the workers, without difference of party, in regard to the administration of this branch of the insurance.

3. If the sick insurance represents democracy, the accident insurance aristocracy, the old age and infirmity insurance may be called the bureaucratic branch of the system. Here the administration is mainly in the hands of permanent State or municipal officials. There are thirty-one State insurance boards—"Landerversicherungsanstalten"—and nine "Pensionskagsen" (superannuation boards, partly for railway employees and partly for miners). In Prussia and Bavaria they have for their domain provinces only, in some States there is only one board, and in some cases a group of States have one board in common. Locally, the insurance is administered by particular departments of the State or municipal authorities. As is known, the insurance is paid in the shape of equal weekly contributions of the employers and the workers, whilst the Empire adds an annual grant of fifty marks to each pension or superannuation granted. In 1906 this Imperial contribution amounted to about seventy-nine million of marks. Part of the costs of the administration is also paid from public (Imperial or State) funds.

The employers, as well as the workers, have an equal representation on the advisory committees, arbitration boards, and even on the central boards, so that officialdom does not act in seclusion. But the officials have the casting vote, and thus the decisions are very often against the workers. This is now mostly the case in the decisions of the Imperial Insurance Board—the "Reichsversicherungsamt"—the supreme body of the whole insurance system and the court for appeal and revision in regard to the interpretation and application of the laws concerned. It, too, is mainly composed of high officials (lawyers and others). True, the workers and the employers are also represented—as assistant judges—but the election of the representatives of the workers is, at least, a four-fold sieve, and, then, they are mostly outvoted. The "Reichsversicherungsamt" was, in former years, very popular with the workers. But since Herr Boediker, its late director, left office, a different spirit seems to prevail, and complaints increase from year to year.

The old age pension is paid at the age of 70; the invalid pay begins after the twenty-sixth week of the illness or infirmity which leads to invalidity. The first twenty-six weeks must be paid by the sick insurance.

Thus we have a very complicated machinery which makes friction and litigation almost inevitable. One insurance is linked with the other, but each has its own finance, each its own administration, led in quite a different spirit from those of the other bodies. Often it is difficult to decide whether a case of invalidity is the consequence of the unhealthiness of the occupation or must be regarded as an accident, from which decision the rights of the injured worker and the obligation of his sick society depend; and similar difficulties arise about other questions.

Everybody longs for simplification, and, if possible, unification of the organisation. But political fear and class interest prevent a radical progressive solution of the problem. Instead of widening the sphere of self-government for the workers concerned, those in high circles want to take away as much as possible of the not too extended sphere of self-government that exists. The local sick unions, as has already been stated, are the object of their attacks. They cannot deny that these unions are well and honestly administered; but since a number of them are led by Social Democrats their free movement must not be tolerated.

This is the constitutional evil of the German workers' insurance. That the insurance has had beneficial effects cannot be denied. It has even had some good effects its initiator did not foresee, and would have execrated had he foreseen them. Instead of keeping down the movements of the workers it has helped to educate and organise the wage-earners for the improvement of their conditions. Each measure to minimise the social influence of the workers has resulted in raising their spirit of opposition. The local sick unions were intended to kill the Socialist free friendly societies, and they have become Socialist bodies themselves.

From a progressive, statesman-like standpoint, it ought to be no complaint that they are, for what lives in the minds of the people must live in their administration. But it ought to be a warning not to mix political cross-purposes with the organisation of a comprehensive insurance system. It must be elaborated for its own purpose as a measure of constructive social policy. From the outset the guiding idea must be to make it as uniform and coherent as possible. It is a difficult task, but an examination of the principal schemes for the reform of the German insurances will show that it is not impossible. —Yours, &c.,

ED. BERNSTEIN.

Schoneberg, Berlin, August 30th, 1908.

Short Studies.

AN IMMORTAL.

I OVERTOOK him at the gate of the cemetery, not without some deliberation on my part. That he is dangerous company for a parson I am well aware; but I no longer avoid him. Perhaps by the time he has cut the ground from under my feet I shall be sure-footed and strong. At least, there is a Pauline dictum to this paradoxical effect. A system of religion or philosophy—call it what one will—which has saved himself and something over, cannot be very debilitating.

He walked on as unconcernedly as though it were his wife who had joined him.

"If there be no Hereafter," I burst out, hot from the grave of a young man whose untimely death had cast a gloom over the whole parish, "what are we to think of scenes like this? How can we stand up against such tragedies? If this be all—cui bono?"

Almost before the words were out of my mouth I realised, with something like shame, how widely I was separated in thought and feeling from this strangely self-collected and informed individual. No sad nod of agreement answered me, as nine people out of every ten would have done; no sympathetic shake of the head; no companion doubt, hesitation, or despair. Instead, he paused and looked at me sorrowfully, almost scornfully, like one who could hardly credit my continued stupidity. Then, without a word, he walked on with averted face, ridding the pavement of pebbles. My grief was more than half cured already—almost frightened away by this unsociable treatment.

"Why don't you say something?" I asked at last, timidly as a child.

"What's the use o' talkin'?" he answered, with unexpected forbearance—even gentleness. "My boots don't fit you, that's all."

"Perhaps my feet will grow," I suggested, feeling unaccountably hurt at the pedal comparison.

"They're too big a'ready, I'm thinkin'," he returned, uncompromisingly. "Most people's are, for the matter o' that. God only stocks small sizes."

"You think, then, that I'm wrong in taking this dear fellow's death—one of my best Sunday-school teachers—to heart?"

"I think no such thing! There's few bowels enough in the world 'thout shuttin' up yours or mine. If th' Almighty 'adn't intended us to feel, He'd ha' made us stones."

"Well, then?" I interrogated, in better spirit.

"To heart, but no more," he allowed. "It's when your feelin's rise to your 'ead, an' make your reason drunk, that we part company. I don't mind anybody that likes 'avin' a quiet cry, but I powerfully objeck to 'em blamin' the wrong party, or showin' a bad temper."

I winced.

"This young fellow," he summarised, "who you 've just committed earth till earth, got struck by a cricket ball, an' never 'gained consciousness. Bin clever an' so on, he might ha' done wonders in the world, if he'd lived, or, again, he mightn't. We won't say anythink now 'about dyin' as a fool dieth. Any'ow, he's gone as complete as if a tel'gram came for him, or he was offered a new situation. But no one 'll give up cricket, I don't suppose. An' I don't think anybody worth mentionin' 'll give up 'avin' sons an' daughters. But, 'cordin' to you, the world should come to an end because one fine young chap didn't duck his 'ead at the right moment. That's queer logic. It's the funny conclusions you come to as take away my breath."

"They're not a bit funny," I assured him sadly. "The awful uncertainty of life, witnessed here, there, and everywhere, weighs on the minds and spirits of mankind until they naturally ask if the game is worth the candle."

"Natcherly, eh? Try again, sir! You'll get there in time if you keep on guessin'. Life is the most dead certain sure thing I know. I may be wrong; but it 'pears to me that's the one only reason why we was cr'ated!"

"But I refer to the individual consciousness," I protested.

"Certingly! You can be as conscious o' 't as you like. My dear sir," he continued, as if addressing me in a letter, "come down from your steeple an' do a bit o' reel livin'. You're not 'alf-born yet, if you don't mind my sayin' it. See them beautiful fine roses there?" pointing to a neighbouring garden. "Only the Lord Himself knows 'ow ever they came here 'an stay here spite o' everythink an' everybody. The wind snaps 'em off. People break 'em off. Cattle come an' tramp 'em down. The owner hisself plucks 'em. A few fall to the ground leaf by leaf. But, strange to say, the roses are all there as sweet an' good-lookin' as ever!"

"Not the same roses," I said.

"If you can tell the diff'rence, your sight is better than mine. Even when the gard'ner has done his best, God 'elpin' him every time, it's still the same fine flower."

I shook my head sadly. I could not share in his exultation, not just yet.

"It's a bad world for pride, sir," he observed penetratingly, "of a certain sort."

"But what's the good of it all?" I asked wearily.

"Find out!" was the indignant answer. "If you can occupy your time to greater a'vantage, don't let us keep you."

We walked on again in a silence which might be felt.

"I don't pertend to be no scholar," he resumed less distantly; "but the little 'rithmetick I know tells me that anythink at all is more than nothink. It'd be a hextr'ordinary world where no one died (wouldn't it now?), not to say un'abitable. But what's your trouble if you b'lieve in a 'Ereafter?" he asked suddenly.

"That's our one hope and consolation," I murmured.

"Isn't it strange, sir," he rejoined with more consideration than one might expect, "isn't it strange that the people who only b'lieve what they see with their two eyes, an' don't bother about no 'Ereafters, are the very ones who complain the least? How d'you account for it?"

"They are worldly people," I said, half-enviously.

He laughed aloud, much to the undertaker's surprise who was driving past.

"I should think an' hope so, indeed! The more worldly people there is, the better. If you know o' any other sort, tell 'em from me they're in the wrong place. For 'Eaven's sake, sir, try an' talk sense," he finally advised. "Even if I felt like you sometimes, I wouldn't be such a bally onnatcheril fool as to say so. I'd cut my tongue out first. You remember what the Psawmist said? 'A day in Thy Courts is better nor a thousand.' That's the way to see it! But I s'pose now you thought he could only mean the brick-an'-mortar Church. Small wonder there's onb'lievers."

With this parting shot, smilingly delivered, he took off his coat at the door of his workshop.

S. Henry.

Present-Day Problems.

USELESS NAVAL EXPENDITURE.

In a recent article I dealt with the matériel of the Navy, and endeavored to dispel the prevalent belief that it will be necessary to make very large additions to the shipbuilding votes in the next and subsequent years for the purpose of meeting the prospective increase of the German Navy.

It may be well to consider the other main branch of naval expenditure—that of the personnel. It appears to be the general impression that the enormous increase of naval votes compared with a few years ago has been mainly, if not wholly, due to new constructions of vessels of war. This is very far from being the case. As compared with the year 1897-8 immediately preceding the war in South Africa, which opened the flood-gates of extravagance and waste, the increased expenditure on new ships has been inconsiderable. It accounts for a very small part of the aggregate increase of the Naval Estimates. The total of the naval votes for 1897-8 was £21,838,000, as compared with £17,545,000 three years earlier in 1894-5, when, as we now know, Mr. Gladstone resigned the Premiership rather than be responsible for a large increase of naval expenditure, and about £11,000,000 the average for many years up to 1884-5. For the present year, 1908-9, the amount voted is £32,519,000, an increase in the ten years of no less than 10½ millions. Of this great total not more than one million can be attributed to the increase of the shipbuilding vote. The expenditure under this head in 1897-8 was £7,166,000. The amount proposed this year is £8,113,000. Deducting the difference, there remains 9½ millions of increase. This, however, should again be reduced by 1½ million, the interest and sinking fund payment in respect of money borrowed during the last ten or twelve years for new naval works in all parts of the world, mostly wasted, and which will be charged to naval votes until the capital sum is repaid. The net increase, therefore, for the votes other than for new constructions, is about eight millions. The following Table will show how this is distributed under wider heads of expenditure:—

	1897-8.	1908-9.	Increase.
No. of men voted	100,000	128,000	28,000
No. of naval reserve, naval pensioners, and volunteers	33,000	50,600	17,600
Votes for wages, food and clothing	£6,180,000	£9,415,000	£3,235,000
Repair of ships...	947,000	2,502,000	1,555,000
Coals for the fleet	525,000	1,720,000	1,195,000
Sea stores ...	500,000	914,000	414,000
New works and maintenance ...	648,000	1,042,000	394,000
Ineffective service pensions, staff pay	2,039,000	2,203,000	164,000
Other naval expenditure: Education, medical, Admiralty Office, dockyard establishment .	3,908,000	4,913,000	1,010,000
			£8,012,600

The question arises upon these figures whether it would not be possible to effect a sensible reduction of expenditure without any loss of real naval power. As regards the number of men, it has long been contended by many naval experts, such as Lord Brassey, and his son, the present able editor of the "Naval Annual," that the standing force of men in active service is excessive, whether in proportion to the ships provided for them, or to the relative number of men in rival navies, and that, on the other hand, the reserves of men who have been trained to service in the Navy are comparatively small and insufficient.

> "We have frequently," said the Editor of the "Naval Annual" in 1906, "protested against the continual increase in the permanent force that has been going on for many years. We have pointed out that to maintain the Navy in peace time at what is practically a war footing, in order to give useful practice at sea to the permanent force of men was to impose too great a burden on the resources of the country. . . . . On this ground we urged that increased attention should be devoted to the development of naval reserves. . . The cost of a naval reserve man is one-tenth that of a man in the permanent force.
>
> "For many years the manning requirements of the Navy have been met by additions to the permanent force, and no serious attempt has been made to increase our reserves. Our manning policy compels us to keep a large number of ships in commission in time of peace in order to give the necessary training to the increased personnel. It has thrown a heavy burden on the resources of the country, the financial effects of which, in the charge for pensions, are as yet hardly felt."

It would seem to be wise policy, and one which would result in considerable economies without lessening the real strength of the Navy, to adopt the short service system in respect of many classes of men not requiring long and special training, and to pass them into the reserve, where they would be available in time of war. This is what is done more or less in other navies. Germany maintains a standing naval force of only 50,000 men, or considerably less than one-half our own. But she has a reserve of 70,000 men, who have been trained in the naval service for four or five years. France also, with a standing force of 56,000 men, has a large reserve of men who have passed through the service. In the British Navy the reserve of men who have passed through the service is small. It consists only of 8,000 pensioners, all of whom have passed the prime of life, and 13,000 non-pensioners. The naval reserve consists of men in the merchant service, or of fishermen who have not passed through active service in the fleet. If the increased numbers of men in the last ten years, or a large proportion of them, could be passed into the reserve, a great reduction would be affected not only in the votes for wages and victuals, but in other votes for the maintenance and repair of ships, without any real loss of power in the event of war.

The personnel must be considered in relation to the number of ships for which they are required in the event of war. It will be seen that considerably less than one-half of the total number voted would be sufficient to man all the vessels which constitute the real fighting force of the Navy. This consists at the present time of forty-eight battleships (excluding those of the "Admiral" class), thirty-four armoured cruisers, 140 torpedo destroyers, and forty submarines. Of these, forty battleships, thirty-three armoured cruisers, and 127 torpedo destroyers are in commission, either on active service, or in reserve with nucleus crews. When fully manned they find employment for about 60,000 officers and men. It may be doubted whether in the event of war we could send more of such vessels to sea, for a certain number of them must always be in port undergoing repairs. Of other vessels in the Navy, there are twenty-one protected cruisers of the first class, of from 8,000 to 14,000 tons, forty-two of the second class of from 3,600 to 5,000 tons, sixteen of the third class of 3,000 tons and under, and eight scouts; total, eighty-seven. Of these, one of the first class, fourteen of the second, and eleven of the third are in commission on foreign stations, and eleven first class, seventeen of the second, and four of the third are in commission at home, most of them in reserve with nucleus crews. It may be doubted whether any of these can be counted as fighting ships adding to the real force of the Navy in time of war. In respect of the larger protected cruisers, such as the "Powerful" and "Terrible," of 14,000 tons, and of the "Blake" class, and even of the "Diadem" class of 9,000 to 11,000 tons, it is improbable that any Board of Admiralty in the future will send them to sea in the event of war. With crews of from 600 to 800 men, and with little or no protection against shell fire, the risk of life would be too great. The Admiralty four years ago, in their well-known memorandum, condemned the so-called protected and unprotected cruisers as useless for war purposes. They would, it was said, be a cause of anxiety to the Admiralty in time of war, as they could neither fight nor run away from the modern armoured cruisers. This argument will be greatly strengthened by the contemplated construction by Germany of twelve fast armoured cruisers of the "Invincible" type. The strongest condemnation of these large protected cruisers is that not a single vessel of this type is on the stocks either in this or any other country. Many millions have been wasted on the construction of those which exist.

Some of the smaller vessels of this type supply the work of scouts to the fleets of battleships. Others show the flag, and maintain what is called the police of the sea on foreign stations, but they are useless for war purposes, and would have to seek refuge in harbor in time of war. It would seem that many of the larger vessels of this type are only maintained in commission for the purpose of finding employment at sea for the redundant number of men. In spite of this the number of men in barracks on shore is far larger than is consistent with good training and discipline. Of the 68,000 men not employed in fighting ships at sea, as above enumerated, or told off for those in reserve, 4,800 are cadets and boys in training ships; 6,200 are employed in yachts, surveying vessels, and small coastguard craft; 3,000 pensioners are in various services on shore, and 3,500 are in the coastguard. Deducting these, there remain nearly 50,000 to be accounted for. Of these about 8,000 appear to be employed on protected and unprotected cruisers on foreign stations, and about 13,000 on similar vessels in commission at home or in reserve, told off for vessels in the home ports with nucleus crews. This leaves about 30,000 in barracks, naval and marine, exclusive of those told off for vessels in reserve with nucleus crews.

There must be a very large expenditure in maintaining and repairing these non-fighting ships, and in providing coal for them, apart from the service of showing the flag on foreign stations. It is thus in the direction of non-fighting ships and their crews, and of redundant men in barracks on shore, that there appear to be great opportunities for reduction of unnecessary expenditure, without any loss of real strength of the Navy. On the other hand, there are prospective increases of naval expenditure which will be unavoidable. During the last three years there have been great savings to the votes, resulting from the reduction of excessive stocks of stores. The Estimates for 1907-8 were reduced in this way to the extent of £1,200,000. Those of the present year have been less by £700,000. But this reduction of stores will come to an end next year, and the Estimates will consequently be increased by £700,000. Again, there are the new docks at Rosyth, estimated to cost £3,500,000, to be spread over eight years, involving an annual expenditure of £400,000, which will, it is feared, entail a large increase to the Works Vote. It is not too much to expect that these increases, and any others that may be forced upon the Government by alarmists in respect of new constructions, shall be met by economies in the other directions I have referred to. In any case, a searching enquiry should be made as to the stupendous increase in the expenditure on repairs, on sea stores, and on coals, with the object of determining how much is expended on ships which do not add to the strength of the Navy.

The present seems to be a fitting time for such enquiry. On the assumption, so persistently put forward by panic-mongers, that Germany has ultimate hostile intentions, and seriously means an attempt to rival us at sea, it must be admitted that some years will elapse before her schemes can be developed. Her naval shipbuilding programme will not be completed till 1920. The Kiel Canal, which is an indispensable part of her naval strategy, and without which the big ships will lose half their value, will not be deepened and widened till 1917. It is true that by 1912 or 1913 she will have completed a considerable number of big ships of the new type, double the number of any other naval Power than ourselves. But, as I have shown, our relative position will then be absolutely secure, without any addition to our present rate of shipbuilding. In the meantime will it not be well for us to husband our resources in other respects? Is it necessary to maintain in commission or in reserve not only every fighting ship that can possibly be sent to sea, but a vast number of other ships which never will be sent to sea in the event of war?

It is clear that a grave error was committed by the present Government when it came into power nearly three years ago, in not at once reducing its naval and military expenditure to a peace footing. Had this been done it is improbable that Germany would have propounded its recent naval programme. The opportunity was lost and what we are now reduced to hope for is that there will be no further increase. I can imagine nothing more contrary to the pledges of the Liberal Party, or more fatal to its cause, than an increase of the aggregate expenditure on preparations for war.

EVERSLEY.

Communications.

THE DUAL POLICY IN INDIA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A recent leading article in THE NATION on the revolutions in Turkey and Persia contained the following sentence: "We shall be poor students of history if we fail to foresee, short-sighted statesmen if we neglect to forestall, the influence of these events upon Egypt and India."

It is not possible, I suppose, for anyone to dispute that observation; but the number is still small of those who realise that the uprising of the Islamic world portends a crisis which may prove to be the ultimate test of British imperial rule.

There is no difference of opinion as to the fact of an awakening in India. Lord Morley has been proclaiming it at intervals for more than two years. Lord Minto is, in this respect, in agreement with the patriots of Bengal and Poona. And on all hands the admission is made that the old methods of administration are obsolete—that reforms, long since overdue, must be granted on a generous scale. Nothing could well be more significant than the absence at this moment, even at Simla or in the House of Lords, of any authoritative voice demanding mere repression, although only the other day we were face to face with a terrorist conspiracy. But, these things being granted, the question remains whether we have not so far misread the signs of the time, mistaken the temper of the Indian peoples, and miscalculated alike the nature and the extent of a movement the existence of which we have at last come to recognise. Have not the Government of India been guilty of a grave mistake in failing to discriminate between the several manifestations of the nationalist spirit, in treating the preachers of the new political faith as the allies of Terrorism? A few days after the discovery of the Bengal bomb conspiracy, the "Pioneer," most respectable of official newspapers, provoked a cry of rage throughout the country by affirming that the gradation between the smooth Indian member of Council and the thrower of bombs was unbroken. I submit that the peril of the present situation is due, in the main, to the practical acceptance by the Government of that outrageous theory.

Let me illustrate. The law is coming down heavily (though with inhuman slowness) upon the unhappy dupes of the Nihilist gospel. It will, of course, continue to do so, and the Viceroy is right in saying that in this matter the Government has the support of the whole country. But when the Government asks for a similar support in its campaign against certain forms of speech and writing, it finds itself in conflict with almost the entire mass of Indian opinion and sentiment. It is the misfortune of the present Liberal Government that it has become responsible for a more sustained and systematic campaign of repression than any undertaken by its predecessors. After two years of incessant activity in the courts on a minor scale, magistrates and judges are now imposing the severest sentences possible under the Penal Code. I cite a few examples from the newspapers of the past few weeks:—

Bombay.—B. G. Tilak, for two articles in the Marathi paper "Kesari"—six years' transportation and a fine of Rs.1,000 (£66).

Editor of the Marathi weekly "Vihari," for an article embodying a translation of a poem by Mazzini—two years' hard labor and a fine of Rs. 1,000.

Editor of "Hind Swarajya," a Gujerati weekly—three years' hard labor.

S. M. Paranjpe, editor of "Kal," a Marathi weekly—nineteen months' hard labour.

Tinnevelly.—Chidambaram Pillai and Subramania Siva, for making inflammatory speeches during a labor dispute—the former transportation for life, the latter for ten years.

Aligarh.—Hoti Lal Varma, for sending a seditious telegram to a Calcutta newspaper—seven years' transportation.

Fazl Hasan, for an article in an Urdu monthly criticising British educational policy in Egypt—two years' hard labor and a fine of Rs. 500.

Would any one in England, I wonder, question the assertion that such sentences are equally barbarous and futile? I know that much nonsense is talked, both in England and in India, about the right of free speech and a free Press, and I am ready to admit that few among us really believe in carrying out the principle of freedom to the end. Any Government must, I conceive, draw the line somewhere; and a despotic Government, such as the Government of India, will insist upon drawing it a good deal closer than English Liberals commonly think necessary. For my part, I do not see how the Government could permit the unfettered publication of certain vernacular papers which have recently been circulated in Bengal. Further than this: I am not sure that, in certain circumstances, it might not be right and wise to find some means of checkmating the subtle preacher of revolution—say, Bal Gangadhar Tilak—if good reason were shown for concluding that his writing was malignant in motive and dangerous to the public peace. But, assuming the necessity of taking action, there must be no ambiguity about the procedure; the letter of the law must be meticulously observed. In short, the methods lately adopted in the case of Mr. Tilak would have to be altogether barred. The accused should be treated as a political offender, and allowed bail; he should be tried by his peers; every advantage that the law afforded him should be conceded; and, as Lord Morley would say, the Government should not be afraid of an appeal.

Mr. Tilak was certainly not dealt with in this fashion. He was refused bail, although there was no imaginable reason for refusing it. He was tried, not at Poona, but at the Bombay High Court, and in consequence deprived at once of a jury composed of his peers, and the right of appeal. The men who condemned him were ignorant of the language in which the offending articles were written, and the official who translated them was not offered for cross-examination. The two offences were tried as one, although the first was obviously less serious than the second; but they were punished as two, and as of equal turpitude. Finally, the Government law officer who conducted the prosecution was empowered to decide that Mr. Tilak had no ground of appeal to the Privy Council.

Well, is the Government satisfied with the result? After the trial the city of Bombay was, for six days, in a state of siege, and an unknown number of people, certainly not less than twenty, were shot dead by the police and military. And, from one end of India to the other, the Government has been reprobated for carrying through an act of injustice, and scoffed at for being afraid to give the law a clear course in the trial of a powerful popular leader. It is not true, as has been frequently asserted, that moderate Indian opinion approves the Tilak prosecution; and no one who knows the Indian Press will be inclined to minimise the fact that no paper has spoken out more strongly than the "Indian Spectator," whose editor, Mr. B. M. Malabari, has been for thirty years a supporter of the British Government, and the confidant of successive Viceroys.

The facts will not allow us to think that the conviction of Mr. Tilak and many lesser representatives of Indian Nationalism is making our task of governing the people any easier. The public temper is such that the smallest incident—a local labor dispute, a district officer's little blunder, an unpopular judgment in the courts—may be enough to excite a disturbance, and that, to all intents and purposes, there is now little to choose between the state of feeling in Bengal, the North-West, or Madras. The Government knows this; but the "Times" and the Anglo-Indian papers continue to repeat that the whole trouble is the work of a handful of unscrupulous agitators with no real backing among the people. We may prefer to accept that view; but, if so, we shall be making straight for the abyss.

What, then, is to be done? All Liberals look with earnest sympathy upon Lord Morley, engaged in his "search with many sighs" for a way out of what he has called, not inaccurately, the most baffling problem ever presented to statesmanship. But to some of us there is tragic irony in the spectacle of the foremost representative of philosophic Liberalism attempting—with the help of that facile and confident departmentalist, Sir Herbert Risley—to find the greatest common measure between the Simla Secretariat and a vast movement of popular forces. Surely the Writing on the Wall, of which a foolish person discourses in the current "Blackwood," is not veiled in any unknown tongue. The whole East is awake, and we shall be worse than crazy if we try to persuade ourselves that a movement which we greet as inevitable and infinitely promising in Turkey or Persia must be condemned as futile, or factitious, or wicked when it is manifested among a people habituated for a hundred years to our institutions, and for fifty years encouraged to share our intellectual heritage. Self-government in India has got to come, and the business of England during the next ten years is to prove to the world that this is what we have been meaning all along. The alternative is not to be contemplated without horror. Confronted by a hostile India, in the presence of an awakened China, a renascent Islam, a triumphant Japan—where should we be?—Yours, &c.,

Sept. 1st, 1908. S. K. Ratcliffe.

Letters to the Editor.

THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It does not seem as if any of the suggestions made to regulate motor traffic would have much success in fact, for the nuisance is various, and requires several medicines. The dust nuisance can be cured completely only by improving the road surface and entirely prohibiting motor cars in narrow unimproved lanes. This is mainly a question of finance.

The killing and maiming of pedestrians and cyclists, and the driving of other traffic off the roads, cannot be wholly cured by any speed limit, unless that limit were, say, five miles an hour or less. The most wickedly dangerous driving I have seen has been at speeds much less than twenty miles an hour, or even ten. Only this morning I saw a motor car come out of a side street and try to cross the most crowded street here, leaving all the main traffic to look out for itself. An accident would hardly have been averted except that a policeman was standing at the corner and stopped the car. Yet it was not going over eight miles an hour.

No speed limit can be enforced generally. It is impossible to line the streets and lanes with police armed with stop watches. The remedies lie on other lines. A motor driver and motor owner must be held responsible for the results of their acts. They are not so now. It seems to be assumed in law that unless the speed can be proved to be over the legal limit, or deliberately dangerous (almost impossible to prove), the motor driver may kill, maim, injure other vehicles, terrorise the roads, and be held irresponsible. The criminal law cannot touch him, nor can the civil.

This is probably due principally to the presumption that it is every one's interest to avoid collisions, and that if one occur it must be pure accident. This is a fairly correct presumption about pedestrians, cyclists, and horse-driven vehicles. If a cyclist runs into even a pedestrian, he is likely not to escape himself without a bad fall, horses do their best to avoid collisions, and a collision may frighten the horse, and so result in damage to the offending driver. Horses, again, are easily thrown down or hurt, and they cannot turn sharp corners at speed. Until the advent of the motor car, therefore, this presumption was generally true of all traffic. But with the motor car it is quite different. It can run over a pedestrian or cyclist and sustain no damage at all; it can scare horses, graze them, knock them down, upset light vehicles, and be hardly at all the worse. It is the brass pot among the earthen pots. It is almost invulnerable to other traffic, and the driver knows it. Therefore, he assumes possession of the whole road, and says, "Let the others get out of my way; if not, worse luck to them." As, therefore, every other form of traffic for its own sake goes carefully, and gets out of the way of motor cars, while the motor drivers have no fear, it follows that in every accident between a motor car and a pedestrian, cyclist, horseman, or horse-driven vehicle, the presumption is that it is caused by the motor driver's careless driving. Instead of the onus of proof lying on the prosecution, it should lie on the defence. The fact that an accident has occurred should carry in law, as it does in fact, the presumption that the motor driver has driven carelessly, unless disproved by evidence.

The above considerations apply both to criminal and civil cases, but there are further considerations on the civil side. Consider a motor car driven by a chauffeur with the owner in the car. Whatever accident befall the chauffeur, the owner is responsible under the Workmen's Compensation Act. If the chauffeur be injured, he must be compensated, if the chauffeur be killed his dependants must be supported. But the car may cause any quantity of damage, personal and material, to the public, and the law is apparently powerless. In France very heavy damages are given as compensation to those who suffer from motor cars, even where "dangerous" driving is not proved. I have not seen any such cases reported in the English papers.

Make a chauffeur responsible criminally for his actions, make the owner responsible civilly for the damage caused by his chauffeur and the car, and we should see very different driving to what we now suffer from. Some such adaptation of the law to the facts is the only possible solution, if motor cars are to be allowed at all. And no one wants prohibition if it can be helped.—Yours, &c.,

H. F. H.

August 29th, 1908.

THE NEW DAILY PRESS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—THE NATION writer who has just finished the series of able and original articles on "The Harmsworth Brand" owes it to those who conduct as well as those who work on the daily newspaper Press of Great Britain to state in a few plain and practical propositions how the defects he sees in it—or thinks he sees in it—are to be remedied, and also how his scheme of reforms is to be carried out. Because his general indictment, i.e., against the "Daily Mail," applies as directly to the good old "Daily Telegraph," to the halfpenny daily papers, morning and evening, published in London and the provinces, and to some (though not all) of the other penny daily papers, as it does to the newspaper specially singled out.

The material of THE NATION articles is not arranged systematically. To take the matter to an issue, however, it is logically justifiable to disentangle the terms of the general indictment, to rule out all the publications except the "Daily Mail"—as your writer does on pages 637, 701, 734 and 769—and take the case as it stands, thus:—

> That the directors of the "Daily Mail," in order to make their newspaper pay, give the public what they want.

I suggest that the discussion of this statement can only lead to confusion of thought, unless account is taken of a distinction which the writer of your articles has not noticed, namely, between:

> (1) The news services, commercial, sporting, &c., of a daily paper; and
>
> (2) The leader-writing and purely editorial matter, book notices, literary articles, &c.

I. That is a distinction which is made in most of the big newspaper organisations of to-day, and whether or not it has to be deplored, the fact itself remains, and, brazenly or otherwise, contradicts your writer's view that good journalism and good literature have something in common. "Good" journalism, if it is concerned only with news, &c., is not literature in any sense.

Arguing, then, from the simple to the complex, for the sake of clearness, and leaving out at first the question of purely editorial matter—I suggest that almost all (though not all) the directors of daily newspapers in Great Britain are making their papers pay by catering for the popular demand; that their "general appeal is, in a word, to the uneducated, by the half or quarter educated," NATION, page 701 (I don't even shrink from your writer's sarcasm); that "the appeal" is "to the multitude on the plane which brings in the greatest number of adherents," page 701 (I exclude the more purple passages, because I am only trying to disentangle the thread of the indictment).

The proof of this argument is to be found in the columns of the halfpenny press from day to day—which show that newspapers, like laws, change—and it need not be set forth in detail here. Your writer claims (page 599) that the Harmsworths are not original, but only imitative. Elsewhere (on page 734) he wishes to give the "Daily Mail" credit for initiating an era of sensationalism which other journals have copied. But a visit to the British Museum and a glance at the files of the halfpenny newspapers for, at any rate, ten years before the "Daily Mail" began, will convince your contributor that sensational news, both home and foreign, and notably that from Chicago and Paris, was treated therein in a manner the looseness of which was never surpassed by the "Daily Mail," even during its most spacious days, and that the directors of the "Daily Mail" did not originate sensational journalism, though, it may be added, they did set going the most efficient news-gathering organisation that had ever been known. I am not, however, concerned to defend the "Daily Mail" or deal with the situation, existing in present or past times, more than to call attention to essential features of it which your writer, by applying one set of criticisms to both the "news" question and the "purely editorial and literary" question, has failed to draw out.

II. Returning to the main argument, and now including the leader-writing, &c., I suggest that your writer has not made out his case. It is not sufficient to refer to his differences with the "Daily Mail" on questions of public policy and to claim that modifications of view are caused by the "purely commercial aim" of the directorate. For all newspapers, like politicians, in that respect, though more so, are continually making changes in the statement of their opinions. The point is: Do the "Daily Mail" "leaders"—do the "leaders" of the daily Press in general—advocate private interests as against public interests? No evidence on this issue was adduced in your articles.

Your contributor gibes at the "Daily Mail" for wanting, as readers, all men and women—Liberals, Democrats, and Tories—as if it were not—as far as news goes—one of the "virtues" of the "Daily Mail" that it shows less bias in arranging space for the headlines of the leading political speech of each of the three parties than most of its morning contemporaries. Did not the "Daily Mail" publish on its leader page articles by independent and expert writers on both sides of Tariff Reform, the new Labor movement and Socialism at the times when they were burning questions? How many of the daily newspapers of which your writer approves met the "Daily Mail" in the honorable rivalry of giving the cases "for" and "against" those three leading issues of recent years?

In conclusion—whether or not the cause is to be found in the Education Act of 1870, as some say, or deeper down in the mysteries of herd instinct and social psychology in general, as others think—there is no denying the fact that the public of 1908 has developed an extraordinary craving to be amused, entertained, and to be taken out of itself; and it seems to find its "Daily Mail" or other halfpenny paper as necessary a stimulant of its daily life as tea. Does THE NATION wish to deprive it of its tipple? If so, is it also to be bereft of its theatres, its music-halls, its popular fiction, its football matches, its horse-races—and even its Winston Churchill rhetoric?—Yours, &c.,

P. J. REID.

Middlesbrough, August 31st, 1908.

CONCERNING THE "IMITATION OF WHITMAN."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—While I am not concerned to combat the personal application of your criticism of my "Great Companions" in last week's NATION, I beg to protest against the well-worn device of describing every attempt to write in what is called "free-rhythm" as an imitation of Whitman. Everybody knows that Whitman wrote in this manner, but that he did not invent it: and the method of classification is therefore somewhat vicious.

What Walt Whitman did for us was to rediscover the prophetic value of the unconventional rhythmical movements in poetry. To make use of his discovery is surely not, of necessity, a mere imitation. No one who has any sense of literary and spiritual values can mistake, for example, a page of "Towards Democracy" for a page of "Leaves of Grass," and this not because they are of unequal value, but because they are essentially distinct in content and style.

The question I wish to raise afresh is simply this: Is it not possible to find in that unconventional form of rhythmical utterance the proper vehicle for modern prophecy, the natural continuation of the ancient prophetic tradition? I believe it is.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY BRYAN BINNS.

Letchworth, August 29th, 1908.

IDEAS OF HEAVEN AND HAPPINESS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—After the delightful little scene written with such artistic skill by Mr. John Higgins on this subject in your last issue, it seems like bathos to recur to the subject in a matter-of-fact spirit. But perhaps the following little anecdote may have interest as throwing light on the mind of the uneducated man. A country laborer asked for his idea on Heaven answered: "A bar parlor, with plenty to drink, a good fire, and a fiddle agoin'."

On the subject opened by your other correspondent, "What is Happiness?" William Blake's lines are a comment:—

> "Pity would be no more,
> If we did not make somebody poor,
> And Mercy no more could be
> If all were as happy as we.
> And mutual fear brings Peace,
> Till the selfish loves increase,
> Then cruelty knits a snare
> And spreads his baits with care."

Hear also Anatole France:—

> "Le mal est necessaire. S'il n'existait pas, le bien n'existerait pas non plus. Le mal est l'unique raison d'être du bien. Que serait le courage loin du péril, et la pitié sans la douleur? Que deviendraint le dévouement et la sacrifice au milieu du bonheur universel? Peut-on concevoir la vertu sans le vice, l'amour sans le haine, la beauté sans la laideur. C'est grâce au mal et à la souffrance que la terre peut être habitée et que la vie vaut la peine d'être récue. . . . A chaque vice qu'on detruit correspondait une vertu qui périt avec lui."—"Le Jardin d'Epicure."

Happily, there is small risk of the virtues dying out on this hypothesis, and one wonders what new virtue will arise as a pendant to the motorist vice.—Yours, &c.,

W. J. B.

August 29th, 1908.

A GREEN HEAVEN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In "Songs from a Twilight Nook," by Winifred Sutcliffe (Percy Lund, Humphries & Co.), is a poem entitled "Hereafter," which expresses the feelings of some of your correspondents on this subject. As the slender volume probably shares the fate of most collections of minor poetry, I venture to quote the first two and the last of eight verses:—

> "Not streets of gold for weary, earthworn feet,
> But grassy ways, made fair with flow'r and fern.
> And leafy boughs, to make a cool retreat,
> Where tired steps may turn;
> And sunshine, and the sighs of many a breeze,
> And glimpses of far hills between the trees.
>
> Dear God, no crystal sea, but cool, green waves,
> That croon a love song to a greener land,
> A summer sea, whose shining ripple laves
> A stretch of silver sand;
> And 'mid the meadow-grasses let there be
> Tangles of tiny streams that seek the sea.
>
> * * *
>
> [And] in a world of dear familiar ways
> With those we love to hear and help the strain,
> Our thankful hearts would sing Thee songs of praise
> Freed from their Sorrow's stain.
> So hear our pray'r, dear God, and let there be > Green paths for gold, cool waves for crystal sea."

—Yours, &c.,

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

Nottingham, Sept. 1st, 1908.

"APROPOS DE BOTTES."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—My writing must have been in fault. "Boots Stephenson," as he was called—the last wearer of Hessians—lived till 1858, just fifty years ago.—Yours, &c.,

G. W. E. R.

August 29th, 1908.

"THE DARK SIDE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am extremely glad to see your article calling attention to the problem of the feeble-minded, and the report of the Royal Commission just issued. The remedy proposed in the article, however, viz., better conditions of life, seems to be, by itself, quite inadequate. You say:

"Eliminate alcoholism and congestion from the body of society, and the feeble-minded and mentally degenerate might become as rare as the once familiar figure of the leper." This opinion would appear to be contradicted by the great weight of the evidence summarised in pp. 179-185, Vol. VIII., of the Report. It is almost certain that a merely stunted mental growth due to want of food or bad surroundings, is not inherited; while most cases of "feeble-mindedness" will still be liable to have feeble-minded children—however much the conditions of life are improved. Of the children admitted to the "special schools," only a very small percentage are cured by better feeding and healthy conditions; the great majority, though capable of more or less training, remain permanently incurable. Alcoholism is probably more often a result than a cause of this defect.

The only real remedy would seem to be in getting these unfortunate individuals into homes, where they can be kept out of mischief, and their lives made happy; where under supervision they can be made partly self-supporting, and where, the most essential point of all, they have no opportunity of having children (see pp. 120, 121, Vol. VIII. of the Report). A few such homes exist, but many more are wanted.—Yours, &c.,

LAWRENCE RICHARDSON.

Stoneham, Beech Grove Road,
Newcastle-on-Tyne,
August 30th, 1908.

THE DATE OF GEORGE FOX'S DEATH.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I trust it is not pedantic to point out, à propos of your reviewer's remark (on page 779) about Fox dying in 1690, that, as we now reckon, the year was 1691. Previous to 1752 the year began on March 25th—the order in which we invariably mention the four seasons—spring, summer, autumn, winter—is reminiscent of this. Hence at the time in question, the year 1690 went on till March 24th, and the statement that Fox died in "eleventh month," 1690, is not infrequently rendered as November of that year, whereas "eleventh month" was then January, and the year was (as we count) 1691. It is always possible to get a year wrong unless we know that the necessary correction has been made in the case of dates from January 1st to March 24th (both inclusive) in years before 1752.—Yours, &c.,

A. NEAVE BRAYSHAW.

Rockport Villa, Auboro Street, Scarborough,
September 3rd, 1908.

THE MAINTENANCE OF "DREADNOUGHTS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It would be useful to know, in connection with Lord Eversley's estimate for naval construction, what the cost of maintenance—for instance, the coal bill—of these additional big ships would be.—Yours, &c.,

G.

August 26th, 1908.

OFFICIALISM IN THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Under the administration of the present Home Secretary the Lieutenant Governors of Jersey and Guernsey are inaugurating a new era.

The Lieutenant Governors of these islands are taken from the Major-Generals' list, and the islands themselves, as everyone knows, are in the Home District and in the Home Command.

The position the Lieutenant Governor has recently taken up is that of a pseudo-viceroy. The National Anthem is played for him on every conceivable occasion, and ladies are expected to rise when he enters a room—and this at private as well as public functions.

The Lieutenant Governor has no official or paid "A. D. C.," but provides himself with one from the militia, and madame has several ladies in waiting.

The assumption of this position led to the incident reported in the "Times" of August 19th, when a captain and a subaltern of the regiment in garrison were sent to return the visit paid to the Lieutenant Governor by the commander of a French training ship and the Consular Agent.

It may be said that these matters do not concern us on this side. That is not so, inasmuch as we pay the piper, and under the new régime the expense for providing offices for the Lieutenant Governor and staff has been quintupled. A small house at £50 per annum has given place to a large house at £178, and it is the "War Office" that pays.

I am informed that no change has been made (officially) in the "powers, attributes, or position of the Lieutenant Governors." Who, then, is responsible for this waste of public money, and who will be held responsible for the further expenditure in the upkeep of the position of a viceroy (in a Home District!) if such a position is to be recognised?—Yours, &c.,

TAXPAYER.

London, August 24th, 1908.

Erratum.—We wish in fairness to correct an error in the description of the Harmsworth publications. The reference to "an Emperor of France" "dragged to the block" does not appear in the "History of the World" itself, but in the "Little Book about a Big Bock," which was issued by Messrs. Harmsworth to describe the contents of the larger book. It is fair to say that the "History of the World" itself, although inferior to other publications of the kind, is free of some of the absurdities attributed to it by its publishers.

Poetry.

THE OLD SCHOOL.

HERE where the white owl sweeps and cries,
And far hills fade as if in flight,
And evening trembles into night,
And roads like wavy ribbons rise,

And hills encircle, fold in fold—
Her pensive, purple towers loom;
And from a depth of melting gloom
Leap out her hundred slabs of gold.

Upon the air soft voices go—
Faint echoes of a lovelier day
When life was ours, and life was May,
When the first shrinking violets blow.

And all the sadness of the years,
And all the pains of old desire
Revive, and, like a smouldering fire,
Burn deeper for the rain of tears.

Yet are the dead not wholly gone;
They bore her name by land and sea,
Their higher parts were hers, and she,
When all is done, reclaims her own.

So as her festal windows glow,
Within their castellated frame,
Each light becomes the ardent flame
Of some young soul of long ago.

THOMAS BURKE.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

WITH the beginning of September the stream of new books begins to set in strongly. It is true that the old division of the year into a spring and an autumn publishing season is no longer observed, and that books make their appearance all the year round. But August remains the slackest month, and, outside fiction, few books of importance are then published. It is difficult as yet to gauge the prospects of the coming season, but it is safe to say that Mr. Swinburne's critical work, "The Age of Shakespeare"—which we were able to announce in these columns on June 20th last—will be one of the chief books of the autumn. Biography and autobiography will be strongly represented, among the more notable books being Mr. Aylmer Maude's "Life of Tolstoy," Mr. Lang's life of "Bluidy Mackenzie," Lord Ilchester's "Journal of Elizabeth, Lady Holland," Mr. Austin Brereton's "Life of Henry Irving," Miss Alice Shield's "Henry Stuart, Cardinal of York," Dr. Robertson Nicoll's biography of Ian Maclaren and volumes of reminiscences by Dr. Francis Galton, Lady Randolph Churchill, Miss Ellen Terry, Mr. Joseph Bennett, Mr. Comyns Carr, and Mr. T. W. Russell.

* * *

ANOTHER welcome feature of the coming season is an indication that the essay is again becoming popular. At any rate there are quite a number of volumes of essays upon the publishers' lists. Dr. William Osler, who carries on the tradition which connects the healing faculty with letters, has in the Press "An Alabama Student, and Other Biographical Essays." It is mainly concerned with some aspects of the lives of doctors in the United States, but it has also a literary interest, since among the subjects are Sir Thomas Browne, Locke as a physician, Keats, and Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes. The book will be issued by the Oxford University Press.

* * *

"SIX MASTERS OF DISILLUSION," is the title of a series of essays in criticism by Mr. Algar Thorald, which Messrs. Constable have in preparation. According to Mr. Thorald the poetry of doubt, which dominated the third quarter of the nineteenth century was succeeded by the prose of disillusion, and in the coming book he sets himself the task of appreciating and interpreting six of the chief exponents of that attitude. His six masters of disillusion are Schopenhauer, Heine, Nietzsche, Fontenelle, Anatole France, and Mr. Bernard Shaw. This is an interesting list, though we should hardly call Fontenelle a chief exponent of anything, and we miss such names as Montaigne, Leopardi, Senancour, and, above all, Renan.

* * *

Two other volumes of essays to be published early in the season are "All Things Considered," by Mr. G. K. Chesterton—a very good title, by the way—and "Russian Essays," by Mr. Maurice Baring. Mr. Chesterton's book is based upon articles contributed to the "Illustrated London News," while Mr. Baring's consists of short papers describing journeys in Russia, and conversations with Russians of all classes, written, we may say, with much distinction. The Russian stage, modern Russian literature, and the problem of Anti-Semitism in Russia are also touched upon. Both books will be published by Messrs. Methuen.

* * *

SEVERAL new series will be started this autumn. Mr. John Murray's "Wisdom of the East" series was so successful that he is following it up with a collection of books called "The Romance of the East," which will deal with Oriental romance. The first to appear will be "Tales Within Tales," being a translation of the Fables of Filpai, by Sir Arthur Wollaston. Others from the Sanscrit, Chinese, Japanese, and Arabic will appear in due course. In the same way Messrs. Constable's "Religions Ancient and Modern" have had so large a sale that the publishers have decided to issue a set of similar primers called "Philosophies Ancient and Modern." Among the first volumes will be "Early Greek Philosophy," by Mr. A. W. Benn; "Stoicism," by Professor St. George Stock; "Plato," by Professor A. E. Taylor; and "Scholasticism," by Father Rickaby, S.J. In English literature Messrs. Bell will begin their "Queen's Treasures Series," a collection of stories which delighted the young readers of the last generation, and have still preserved some of their fascination. The opening volume will be Mrs. Gaskell's "Cousin Phillis," with an introduction by Mr. Thomas Seccombe, and illustrations in color by Miss M. V. Wheelhouse.

* * *

MR. FISHER UNWIN has in the press the third volume of the English translation of M. Jusserand's "Literary History of the English people." This section of M. Jusserand's great work deals with the Elizabethan drama, a subject on which it is specially interesting to have the views of so accomplished and learned a French critic. He deals first with the condition of the English drama at the dawn of the Renaissance, and with the predecessors of Shakespeare, including Marlowe. He then passes to the personal and literary biography of Shakespeare and a full study of his work in all its bearings. This is followed by an examination of the chief works produced by Shakespeare's famous contemporaries and successors, and the volume ends with an account of the literature of the reigns of James I. and Charles I. No foreign writer since Taine has studied our literature to better purpose than has M. Jusserand, and in brilliant exposition, combined with profound and exact scholarship, he has few rivals even among English students.

* * *

MR. BARRY O'BRIEN has just completed an examination of the Irish administrative system which, under the title "Dublin Castle and the Irish People," will be published shortly by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. Mr. O'Brien describes the relations of Dublin Castle with the various Boards and Departments of Irish administration, discusses how far the Castle dominates, or does not dominate, official activities, and points out the way its influence extends over the whole Irish people. Such a work is likely to be of great value, since but little is known in this country of the machinery of Irish government. Mr. O'Brien unites the scholar's and the politician's knowledge of Irish history, and of the problems of Irish administration. His mastery of the political aspects of the question was specially shown in his biography of Parnell.

* * *

MR. R. S. CRAIG has written a book called "The Making of Carlyle," which Mr. Eveleigh Nash has almost ready for publication. Mr. Craig has tried to re-establish the lost atmosphere in which Carlyle and those about him moved, and to view their actions as they appeared to themselves. An impartial account of Carlyle would be a valuable contribution to letters, but it is doubtful whether such a work is even now possible. Froude's volumes and the letters of the two Carlyles will always be indispensable in forming a picture of Carlyle's personality. None the less, every attempt to tell the truth about Carlyle deserves to be encouraged, were it only because the task is so difficult, and we may hope that Mr. Craig will resist the temptation to take sides which has beset every biographer, from Froude onwards.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Life and Letters of George Bancroft." By M. A. de Wolfe Howe. (Hodder & Stoughton. 2 vols. 16s. net.)

"The Empress Josephine: Napoleon's Enchantress." By Philip W. Sergeant. (Hutchinson. 2 vols. 24s. net.)

"The Naturalisation of the Supernatural." By Frank Podmore. (Putnam's Sons. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Confessions of a Beachcomber: Scenes and Incidents in the Career of an Unprofessional Beachcomber in Tropical Queensland." By E. J. Banfield. (Unwin. 15s. net.)

"The Philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche." By Henry L. Mencken. (Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Voluntaryist Creed." The Herbert Spencer Lecture delivered at Oxford, June, 1906. By Auberon Herbert. (Oxford University Press. 2s. net.)

"Co-Operation at Home and Abroad." By C. R. Fay. (King. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Moral Instruction and Training in Schools: Report of an International Inquiry." Edited by M. E. Sadler. (Longmans. 2 vols. 5s. net each.)

"Further Experiences of an Irish R.M." By E. Œ. Somerville and Martin Ross. (Longmans. 6s.)

"Hill Rise." By W. B. Maxwell. (Methuen. 6s.)

"La Vie à Paris, 1907." Par Jules Claretie. (Paris: Fasquelle. 3 fr. 50.)

"Cologne." Les Villes d'Art Célèbres. Par Louis Réau. (Paris: Renouard. 5 fr.)

Reviews.

THE REAL OSSIAN.*

FINGAL, Ossian, and the rest of MacPherson's shadowy heroes are but names to us now. However, it is of interest to know that while Dr. Johnson was finding material for robustious insult in the non-appearance of originals, "Erse" manuscripts were actually in existence. These manuscripts were neither in the Highlands nor in Ireland, they were amongst the Gael of the dispersal. In 1626 an Irish soldier serving in the Netherlands, got certain scribes then in the Irish College in Louvain, in Belgium, to copy out for him the two great sections of the Fenian saga, "Agallamh na Senórach," the Colloquay of the Ancients, and "Duanaire Finn," the Poem Book of Finn. The manuscripts were in Louvain until the outbreak of the French Revolution, when they were sent to the Franciscan House in Rome. When the Italian troops entered the capital the Irish manuscripts were transferred to the Franciscans in Dublin. "The clash of arms sounds within and around them, from the dedication to the Irish captain on the first page to the mention of the English garrison of Lier on the last." "Duanaire Finn," or the Poem Book of Finn, has now been placed beyond the risk of war. It has been ably edited by Eoin MacNeill, and the first half of the compilation is before us as the latest publication of the Irish Texts Society.

We would not be greatly astray in taking Duanaire Finn as the canon of MacPherson's apocrypha. MacPherson based his compositions on fragments attributed to Oisin (Ossian). These oral traditions, current in the Highlands, were derived from literary compositions. Eoin MacNeill tells us that he has found whole pieces of text retained almost verbatim in present-day folk-lore. "This fact, with others that I have observed, convinces me that much of what passes for simple folk-lore has come to the people from literary sources. Judging from Campbell's Leabhar na Féinne, I should say that the bulk of the Fenian sagas reached Scotland in this way." Duanaire Finn represents the Fenian saga as it was known to the Gaelic literati in the seventeenth century. Its compilation shows the homogeneity of the Gaels of Ireland and Scotland. It was compiled for a representative of a family who were as notable in one country as in the other, for one of the MacDonnells of Antrim and the Isles.

The nebulousness of MacPherson's composition is in no way related to these bardic originals. The form of Irish heroic poetry forced on the narrator of Fenian deeds a conciseness that often becomes a literary fault. Eoin MacNeill remarks that the ancient quatrain of seven-syllabled lines was not an ideal form for heroic narrative. "The Irish metres required each line to give nearly complete sense. In the couplet this approach to completion of sense had to be nearer. In the quatrain it had to be perfect." The economy of metre often cuts into the substance of the poem; this is noticeable in the narrative "The Abduction of Eargna," where essential motives are merely hinted at. Perhaps the charm of Ossianic poetry is best felt in those marginal pieces that are free of the rules of heroic poetry, such as this little episode, which is an authentic bit out of the primitive world:—

> "Three heroes, we went to the chase on the top of Sliabh-Cua: we started a brown stag from the pearly fresh brown oak wood. His like I never saw on the heath of Sliabh Cua, his size and the number of his antlers: a lank stag eating the young grass.
>
> "We loosed our hounds at him, we came to pierce his hide, and the stag was not stayed till he reached grassy Sliabh Mis.
>
> "I was there, and tall Oisin and Caoilte of good counsel: there were not of the Fian, as good as we, three heroes."

These free pieces are only occasional. The poems in Duanaire Finn are mainly narrative and dramatic. "The Abduction of Eargna" is the best of the narrative poems, with its inevitable tragedy, its rapid incident, and its dramatic suggestiveness. "The Bathing of Oisin's Head," "The Crane Bag," "The Headless Phantoms," are typical of the Celtic imagination. The poems we will read again and again are the two dramatic pieces, "The Sleep Song for Diarmaid," and "Goll's Parting with his Wife." Both these poems recall the darker side of Fionn's character, his vindictiveness, his ruthlessness. The story of Grainne and Diarmaid will be remembered as the most dramatic episode of the saga. In a late development Fionn, as captain of the militia of Ireland, is put on equal terms with the high King. The King's daughter, Grainne, is offered to Fionn as a bride; she drugs the ale at the feast and elopes with Fionn's follower, darling young Diarmaid O'Duilhne. Fionn pursues the pair, and only on the wilds and waste places have they a while of security. Grainne sings over her sleeping lover, and her song is out of the very heart of the wild. There is no patronage of Nature in her song, for the doe, the hen-thrush, the brooding duck, are Grainne's veritable mates in affection and solicitude. She lulls Diarmaid to sleep for a while, though she knows that danger threatens; the wild things around the lovers cannot sleep:—

> "Sleep a little, a little little, for thou need'st not fear the least, lad to whom I have given love, son of Duibhne, Diarmaid. . . .
>
> "Sleep a little, a blessing on thee, above the water of the spring of Trenghart, little lamb of the land above the lake, from the womb of the country of strong torrents. . . . O fold of valour of the world west from Greece, over whom I stay watching, my heart will well nigh burst if I see thee not at any time. . . . The parting of us twain is the parting of children of one home, the parting of body with soul, hero of bright Loch Garman. . . . The stag eastward sleepeth not, ceaseth not from bellowing, though he be in the groves of the blackbirds it is not in his mind to sleep. The hornless doe sleepeth not, bellowing for her spotted calf; she runs over the tops of the bushes, she does not sleep in her lair. The lively linnet sleepeth not in the tops of the fair curved trees; it is a noisy time there, even the thrush does not sleep. The duck of numerous brood sleepeth not, she is well prepared for good swimming, she maketh neither rest nor slumber there, in her lair she does not sleep. To-night the grouse sleepeth not, upon the stormy heaths of the height; sweet is the sound of her clear cry: between the streamlets she does not sleep"

In contrast to this fluttering song is Goll MacMorna's tragic farewell. The House of Morna had been concerned in the death of Fionn's father, Cumhal, and Goll had supplanted Fionn's house in the command of the Fiana of Ireland. Peace had been made between the House of Baoisgne and the House of Morna, but those who crossed Fionn, sooner or later, knew his relentlessness. Goll and his wife have been cut off on a narrow crag, for thirty days they are without food, and Fionn's battalions are around them. Goll bids farewell to his noble wife.

> "Woman, take away my tunic, rise up and go from me, prepare to depart, dear one of rosy cheeks, the morn before my slaying."
>
> "O Goll, what way shall I take? Alas for those whose friends are few! Rare is the woman that has grace when she is left without head, without lord."
>
> "Seek the camp of Fionn of the Fiana, in its place on the westward side; wed there, gentle one of the rosy lips some good man worthy of thee."
>
> "What man there shall I wed, my great Goll that was kind to me? Where might I find west or east thy equal for a bed-fellow. . . . Seven years of bravery agone, thou broughtest me, husband, to thy couch. From that night until to-night, thou has not shown me a harsh mind, from this night out I will not be light-minded, I will belong to no man on the surface of the earth."

Who was Fionn, son of Cumhal, descendant of Baoisgne, whose name and lineaments have come down through dynasties, conquests, and civilisations? The saga that takes its name from him is, according to Eoin MacNeill, unique, inasmuch as it is the hero-lore of a subject people. In the Ulidian epic, the Táin Bó Cualnge, we get a sight of a kingless people who come to the hosting of Maeve. They had the competence of professional soldiers; they had cleared the camp before the others got to the resting-place; they had lit their fires before the others cleared their camp; they had their food cooked before the others lit their fires. They were the Galeoin of Leinster, and were brought to the foray by one of Maeve's allies; they themselves were without a king. The crude policy of Meave would have destroyed these dangerous servitors. She was persuaded from doing this, but the political status of the Galeoin was so low that Maeve could break up the levy and distribute them through the troops. It was amongst these people that the Fenian saga, according to Eoin MacNeill's consistent theory, took shape. The military competence of the Galeoin was the mark of their subjection. They were Aithechtuatha, or vassal people, and one of the demands on the vassals was compulsory military service. The free races need not serve during seed-time nor harvest, while the vassal races might be called out for any length of time. The Aithechtuatha met the demand of the over-king by the creation of a militia (Féine), who lived by hunting and the spoils of war. Fionn was the hero of a subject people in Leinster. The story of the conflict of his clan with the Clanna Morna became widely known amongst the non-dynastic races of Ireland. In the tenth century the saga was taken up by the dynastic people. It came to them without any literary prestige; it was, therefore, capable of extensive development.

* "Duanaire Finn, the Book of the Lays of Fionn," Part I., Irish Text, with translation into English. Edited by Eoin MacNeill, co-vice-President of the Gaelic League, Member of the Royal Irish Academy. David Nutt. 10s. 6d.

The Ulidian epic and the Fenian saga grew up amongst people whose names are known only to the student of history. They were adopted by a third people, the dynastic race of Scots or Milesians. But whatever the names of the people who created or adopted them, the sagas are essentially Irish. Both reproduce a type of character that is still the national ideal. The dominant characteristic of this type can best be described by the Irish word flaitheamhlachd. There is no English equivalent for this word, still retained even in the English speech of the Irish peasantry. It has reference to an exuberant and overflowing personality. In the sagas the heroes are always flaitheamhlachd, and they have the powerful social instincts of the modern Irish; they have a delight in praise, a dread of public opinion, a love of striking deeds. They are emulous; they delight in good manners, in music, in poetry, and oratory; they are without speculative thought. Cuchulain and his peers of the Ulidian epic are aristocrats; Fionn comes close to the peasant type. Side by side with his recognition of chivalry, courtesy, bravery, there is a scepticism, a silence, an unforgiving memory. These heroic poems, written out for an exiled soldier of the seventeenth century, recall, over and over again, the faces and forms of old peasant men by their fireside or upon the roadway. "I am Oisin; though ancient I have trysted with gentle women. Greyness is nearest to brownness, bentness is nearest to erectness."

THE HOPE FOR INDIA.*

This week has marked the fiftieth anniversary of England's direct government of India, and the appearance of a book like this at such a moment must be mentioned with mixed feelings. For fifty years we have been conducting in India the greatest experiment in Imperialism that history has seen. We have prided ourselves on our success, and no one disputes certain advantages that we have brought the country—peace, western education for a few, a common language for the educated of all the various races, and a standard of justice higher than India knew before. To that extent we may regard the half century with some satisfaction. We have done something, and can be grateful to the devoted servants who have carried out the work. But when we regard the present situation our satisfaction begins to give way, and in this book of Mr. Gokhale's the present situation is discussed with a singular accuracy of knowledge and reasonableness of judgment which only add to the uncomfortable sense that now is not the time merely for self-congratulation or the joy of anniversaries.

Mr. Gokhale is one of the few Indians whose name is known among us outside the small circle of politicians and retired officials who take a special interest in the vast populations of India and our government of them. In spite of the almost impenetrable indifference of the English people to the Indian Empire, his public addresses for the cause of Indian reform attracted some attention three years ago, and during the subsequent period of unrest he has become prominent as the leader of the party of reform, distinguished from the extremists. In his own country there is no one more widely respected, though the Government's treatment of his friend, Lajpat Rai, and his fellow-townsman and old opponent, Mr. Tilak, may have raised them to greater popularity for the time. A disciple of Mr. Justice Ranade, the great Indian reformer of Bombay, he has devoted himself entirely since his University days to the service of his people, first as teacher in a college at Poona, and then in the wider spheres of politics and social reform. A Mahratta Brahman by birth, he has all the qualities of that courageous and keenly intellectual race, and added to these a more uncommon quality which we can only call "sweetness and light." It is a combination of which India in perilous times has especial need.

As founder of the Poona Society called "Servants of India," he is free from the politician's danger of standing aloof from the common people and losing touch with those whom he desires to serve. The Society is a training place for missionaries of freedom, and the freedom they proclaim would deliver, not only from political oppression, but from that old servitude to superstition and degrading custom which mankind so often lays upon itself. One would say that the interest nearest his heart is not merely the cause of the poor—all Indians are poor—nor even the cause of the ignorant, for most must be ignorant when the Government still spends little more than £1 per thousand of the population on primary schools. It is rather the cause of those unnoticed millions who lie too low for caste, but live in degraded misery and eat dead things, being regarded as almost an offence to the light of day. It is to social reform that both he and Lajpat Rai would naturally have turned if India had been wholesomely governed and some account taken of her will. But the urgency of political change has turned them aside, and it is as the Moderate leader of the National Congress and one of the few elected members of the Viceroy's Council that Mr. Gokhale is now most conspicuous.

So the speeches included in this volume are mainly political. They treat of the great subjects that have occupied the Indian Government during the last eight or ten years, and of the chief causes of complaint between the Government and the Indian peoples. Together they form as good a history as could be found of a very critical time. The seven Budget speeches with which the book opens are in themselves a commentary on the transition from the latter part of Lord Curzon's domination to the present year, when Lord Minto and Lord Morley are reaping the crop of perils that Lord Curzon sowed. We do not mean that Lord Curzon's administration was the sole cause of the new movement in India. There are many other causes, far deeper and more enduring. But it was his scornful disregard of Indian sentiment and representations that united all the growing elements of unrest into one power of opposition.

Mr. Gokhale is known as the leader of the Moderate party, but no one likes to be called a Moderate, and in his case moderation has nothing to do with half-heartedness. He is a Moderate only compared to those extremists who would proclaim a boycott in India, not merely against British goods, but against British government, law-courts, language, official posts, education, manners, and everything that is British. That is the party of despair—the party which believes that India can receive no aid from her rulers, but only hindrance on the path of progress, and that all demands for reforms would be vain, even if they were complied with. To isolate the Indian people from all British influence, and either to embarrass the Government or to let it go its own way unheeded, are the methods chosen by extremists, until the day comes when, by one means or another, the connection between the two countries shall cease. That counsel of despair is a new thing as a power in India. It has gained its strength and popularity from the refusal of reforms, the suppression, the growing misery of the people, and from injustice. Probably it still commands only a small section in numbers, but the numbers are growing under the common attraction of extremes

His speeches shows in what sense Mr. Gokhale and the other leaders of the Moderate party, like Lala Lajpat Rai, differ from those counsellors of despair. They have not abandoned hope of reform, even in conjunction with the British rule. Certainly, they have little or no hope from Anglo-Indians; but they still believe that if only the English people could be induced to see things as they are, uncolored by official tradition and prejudice, such a change would be accomplished as would allow both countries to work together for the true advancement of India. They admit the advantages that British rule has brought, but they are quite aware of the evils which now attend it. Till a few years ago most Englishmen believed that we had at all events raised the general prosperity of India; but, speaking at the National Liberal Club in 1905, Mr. Gokhale said:—

* "Speeches by the Honble. Mr. G. K. Gokhale, C.I.E." London: Luzac & Co. Madras: Natesan & Co. 4s.

> "I firmly believe, and I say this after a careful study of about twenty years, that the economic results of the British rule in India have been absolutely disastrous. That the mass of the people in India are at present sunk in frightful poverty is now admitted by all, including the most inveterate official optimist."

He tests the poverty by various official statistics, such as the estimate of the average annual income in India at £2 per head, contrasted with £42 per head in England. And not only does this poverty continue after a century of our rule, but the condition of the people is steadily declining, whether judged by trade, agriculture, or death-rate.

Far worse than the economic wrong is the moral evil our bureaucratic system has brought:—

> "Of these moral evils," he says, "none is so great as this continuous dwarfing or stunting of our race that is taking place under your rule. Our rigorous exclusion from all power and all positions of trust and responsibility, on a scale never before attempted in the history of humanity, involving as it does an enforced disuse of our national abilities—is leading to a steady deterioration of our race, and this, I venture to think, is a cruel, an iniquitous, wrong you are inflicting on us."

He points to the exclusion of Indians from nearly all the higher offices, to the exclusion of the whole vast population from any real control over the Government which spends their money, and the prohibition of arms among our own fellow-subjects while we turn to the Japanese for an alliance to defend their country.

Such a policy of exclusion and distrust is, as Mr. Gokhale said in his Budget speech to the Viceroy's Council last March, naturally galling to proud and sensitive spirits. "Sooner or later, mere order is bound to appear irksome to those who zealously cultivate the belief that there is no chance of better days for their country as long as existing arrangements continue." That feeling of uneasy dissatisfaction is not merely spreading; it is growing more acute as each year brings further disappointments and further attempts at repression. We have lately seen evidences of it only too plainly, even among highly educated men. The situation is full of peril for both races. But Mr. Gokhale is among those who think it is not too late for remedial reforms that would display a certain courage and generosity. He still retains a confidence in the good sense and justice of the English people, if only their ignorance of India could be broken down. Three years ago, when the younger and less hopeful party was beginning to make itself felt, though it had not reached anything like its present strength, he was chosen President of the National Congress at Benares, as the best man to hold the divergent elements together. In his presidential address he said:—

> "For better, for worse, our destinies are now linked with those of England, and the Congress freely recognises that whatever advance we seek must be within the Empire itself. . . . 'It is liberty alone,' said Mr. Gladstone in words of profound wisdom, 'that fits men for liberty.' While, therefore, we are prepared to allow that an advance towards our goal may be only by reasonably cautious steps, what we emphatically insist on is that the resources of the country should be primarily devoted to the work of qualifying the people by means of education and in other ways for such advance. Even the most bigoted champion of the existing system of administration will not pretend that this is in any degree the case at present."

The lines of the remedial reforms that Mr. Gokhale suggests are well known and quite definite. They are found in these speeches, set forth without passion and without rhetoric, but with the charm of reasonableness, supported by wide and careful knowledge, and with an intensity of conviction that in itself produces the best kind of eloquence.

A GREAT SCHOOLMISTRESS.*

Whether the movement for Women's Suffrage is, or is not, the effect of the movement for women's education, it is well, at any rate, that the movement for education came first. One of the pioneers and foremost leaders in this movement was Miss Dorothea Beale of Cheltenham. The history of her life's work was written by herself in the "History of the Ladies' College," which she compiled in 1900. This was what she would have termed the biography of her "husband." But though to her the work was everything, her old pupils, and that wider public whom she influenced through them, felt that even greater than the work was the creative personality which lay behind, and these will turn with strong interest to the story of the inward life which Miss Raikes has told so well in this volume.

Miss Beale herself passed through the mill of the old-fashioned education for girls: she learned history by devouring dates, and by way of literature repeated week by week the lamentations of King Hezekiah, doggerel verses on the solar system, and Cowper's "Mother's Picture." The girls were required to talk French with each other, a "tongue which we could indeed talk, but in which conversation was impossible." She was "finished" at a school in Paris which was brought to an untimely end by the Revolution of 1848, when a mob surrounded the house demanding garden tools as firearms. But her real awakening came with the foundation of Queen's College, Harley Street. Entering as one of the earliest students, she not only had her mind opened to the meaning and scope of higher education, but learnt from Frederic Denison Maurice the dignity of the teacher's vocation.

In 1858, at the age of twenty-seven, she was appointed Principal of the Cheltenham Ladies' College, which had been founded as a proprietary school five years previously to be a sister institution to the College for Boys. For nearly fifty years till her death Cheltenham was, if not the sphere, at any rate the centre, of her work. Nowadays schools are founded ready-made. A great and fine "plant," opening ceremonies, royal patronage, appear necessities from the beginning. But fifty years ago was the day of small beginnings and slow growth, and the Ladies' College at Cheltenham was twenty years old before it had a building of its own. Still, spite of all difficulties—and these were neither slight nor few, both from within and without—the College grew. Over and above its own beautiful building, which has received constant additions, it established its own boarding-houses, its kindergarten, its training college for secondary teachers, its hostel at Oxford, and its settlement in Shoreditch. The launching of these successive ventures, their expansion and the widening circle of their usefulness, is the story of Miss Beale's public life; these institutions themselves are her memorial. No wonder that a woman with her power of mind, her enterprise and business capacity, resented Bishop Fraser's quoting with approbation the Periclean verdict on woman. "She hath done what she could" was one of her favorite texts, and she herself had a talent for doing. She had a talent also for seeing what was needed. At a time when most educational faddists thought the best way to reform education was to foist first one new subject and then another into the curriculum, she turned her attention to the teachers, and showed her wisdom by providing better training for secondary work, working out better methods of teaching, and stirring up teachers to put more knowledge, more skill, more enthusiasm and affection, into their work.

These things belong to the outward life. Miss Raikes has been happy in giving us the inwardness of Miss Beale's life, for which, fortunately, ample materials were at hand. She shows us Miss Beale as her pupils, "her children," as she called them, knew her. There is the time of overwork and physical strain, when she was "tested and sifted till all human longings and cravings, even those the most lawful, were laid low." There is the time of her spiritual darkness, when faith and hope were overcast; when her pupils turned to her in the struggle with their own spectral doubts, and found that she was herself even as they; and when it was the great trust of "her children" which restored her to clear vision and surer strength. "Like Hagar, I could die in the wilderness, but I could not see my child die." There is, too, a glimpse, all too scanty, of the way she would treat her erring child and win it to confession, and this confession to newness of life.

---

* "Dorothea Beale of Cheltenham." By Elizabeth Raikes. Constable. 10s. 6d. net.

One would gladly have known more of her as a ruler. "We govern by little things," she said to the Schools Inquiry Commission, and it is a pity Miss Raikes has thought the "little things" too trivial for a permanent record. It is precisely in detail that the womanly genius excels.

One feature stands out in attractive contrast to the biographies of some of our greatest head masters. Her relations with her assistant mistresses were always of the pleasantest. She gave them advice and help, and she insisted on thoroughness of work; it was not uncommonly said that they were overworked, but she gave them also freedom to realise themselves, and, once assured of their loyalty and efficiency, she gave them her trust.

There is much in the book about Miss Beale's religious opinions. But far more important than her opinions was her religious motive. It was the dominating force of her mind and her life-work. Religion to her meant something more than a succession of agreeable and æsthetically beautiful thoughts: she had nothing in common with emotionalism, "letting it off in steam," as she called it. Religion to her was authority. It involved all the details and difficulties of daily discipline and daily obedience. To this her diary bears eloquent testimony. It has no purple passages; it is a daily record of self-examination, and stern in its laconic verdicts.

> January 31. Inattentive. Spoke unkindly without cause. Irritable.
>
> February 11. I grieve for the stupid lesson I gave Division III., because not well prepared.
>
> February 16. More than one hour wasted in idle thoughts, 5-6 a.m., and yet I have work for others that I ought to have thought of, and lessons. . . . Not much matter or order in lessons. Tired and discontented with self. Neglect of books. More trust and energy wanted.
>
> February 26. I have idled away precious time, neglected individual work. Because my own will is weak, I could not strengthen another.

There is hardly a reference in this book to the emancipation of women, and no mention whatever of women's rights. But Miss Beale dwelt much on duties, and what she postulated for her sex was scope for effort. For the rest, she trusted to the justice which comes in due time to those who deserve. For women, like men, can get whatever they show themselves fit for.

FILTHY LUCRE.*

In "The Magnate" Mr. Elson has made a plucky attempt to patch up the regrettable, long-standing dispute betwixt God and Mammon. His moral—the pleasures of the virtuous life led on the income of a millionaire—is one that will command the sympathies of that vast body of our countrymen who like to receive the genial, cheery nod of a "big man." "Whether we be poor or prosperous, let us respect the magnate's prosperity that transcends infinitely our own powers for good or evil. Let us not exclude him from our sympathies, or from our society. If he has got hold of the golden key for which the rest of us are struggling, let us conclude that his virtue is so much the greater." Such is the very human argument of a trading community whose morality is based on the conviction that individual wealth and national health are one and indivisible. Is not to-day's plutocrat to-morrow's peer? There's a nobility doth shape the rich man's means, as the poet remarks. And our sense of domestic virtue is subtly ministered to throughout the four hundred pages of "The Magnate," from the first page, where John Holden, the honest, manly, commonplace, persevering millionaire, begins to woo the exquisite and penniless Janet, to the last, where he throws into her lap the finest diamond in the world, "The Star of Africa," "a river of imprisoned sunlight," and she, his wife wooed in vain by him for a whole year, begs him at length to make her "his own lass."

The musings of the reviewer would prove ill-timed if they were to dull the reader's appetite for our author's entrancing bill of fare. Whether taken con amore or tasted critically, "The Magnate's" sumptuous descriptions of the life de luxe led by Janet on the Riviera might move an anchorite. The plot is simple. To escape the hateful and jarring servitude of her place as "mother's help" in a mean and vulgar Manchester household, the beautiful Janet Nicholson consents to marry her plain and commonplace suitor, John Holden, with the proviso that she is to be his wife only in name. Janet, indeed, lays down the terms with a business-like precision that should appeal to millionaires: "You are never to remind me that our relation is incomplete in word or tone or gesture. I will promise you that—that I will not disgrace you in any way." The bargain is struck, and the gates of Aladdin's palace swing open before our ravished senses. All that the indecent power of money can command, all that the gross vulgarity which a society of noureaux riches delights in, is displayed before us by our author with an enthusiasm that is staggering. The bare description of Janet's trousseau, her frocks, her furs, her laces, her fans, her camisoles, her sunshades, her shawls, her opera cloaks, her gloves, her veils, her gorgeous toilettes de bal, breakfast gowns, elaborate tea-gowns, dressing-gowns, stockings, hats, &c., &c., fills five pages. And, more bewildered than Janet, we pass with her into her magnificent apartments at the Imperial Hotel, Torrento, where the Magnate, after a hundred franc lunch, is awaiting "the gentleman from Fougereau's, with a few rings and things." And here we judge that our readers will like to see for themselves what brings into Janet's throat the "gurgling cry of pleasure":—

> "I only want good stuff," John Holden had said emphatically to Fougereau: "not a lot, but pick 'em. I know I can trust you."
>
> Fougereau is the first jeweller in the world: the implication that he had anything in his store that was not the very best of its kind was almost an insult. Yet Fougereau only bowed gravely to John Holden. Perhaps it was the careless compliment that wiped out the unintentional sting; or was it the magic words which Holden added: "I'll give you carte blanche as to cost"?
>
> She gave a little low cry of pleasure, and she held out fluttering white hands. . . . But everything would probably have turned out all right if it had not been for the jeweller-man. He was a man of taste; he had heard that gurgling child's cry of pleasure in Janet's throat; he had arrived immediately at the conclusion that, although Mr. Holden had spent not merely a fortune, but many fortunes, on madame'e jewel-case, he ought to consider himself amply repaid because it had produced that indescribable sound. The jeweller-man, it will be seen, was French. He prided himself on the delicacy of his perceptions. He saw through his eyelids that when Jant's fluttering hands passed over the open tray, and her eyes went to her husband, there was embarrassment in their liquid depths. Those confounded perceptions of his told him that he was de trop. He effaced himself instantly.
>
> "Monsieur permits me to retire?"
>
> Holden could not well refuse. The man had done his part. . . .
>
> "Don't you like 'em?" he said, with a clumsy assumption of gruffness.
>
> "You know I do," she replied, her eyes thrilling him. "They're . . . . they're splendid."
>
> "Well, you'd better look at 'em, then. You haven't seen 'em yet."
>
> There was a heart-shaped diamond, surrounded by cut rubies; a marquise ring of sapphires and diamonds, Kashmir sapphires of that pure corn-flower blue that cannot be matched even in the depths of heaven: a black pearl of brilliant lustre, with a single white diamond . . .
>
> She pulled out the second tray. It contained watches, brooches, hair ornaments, tortoiseshell combs set with brilliants and pearls.
>
> She investigated further. The next tray almost took her breath away.
>
> There was an exquisite necklace of rubies and diamonds, the rubies being like drops of blood in a lacework of platinum and brilliants; they were Burmah rubies of the true colour; a rope of pearls long enough to reach the knees; they were round, and of perfect colour and sheen. She lifted them up. . .
>
> Her husband watched her. It must have been a pretty sight enough—her dark head bending over her baubles like a lovely child with a box of toys, her rapt face glowing, her white fingers touching them one by one. He had filled his cup with splendid munificence, and we must not blame him if he quaffed it somewhat recklessly. It was a heady drink.
>
> "Oh!" she cried. . . "Oh!" . . . . and again "Oh-h-h!"
>
> She had found the crown. It was a superb ornament of pearls in conjunction with diamonds, made as only a Frenchman can make such things—magnificent without heaviness, graceful without declining into mere prettiness. Then she pulled out the fourth tray, and found The Necklace reposing in solitary grandeur on its bed of satin. To that she paid the greatest of tributes—silence.

* "The Magnate." By Robert Elson. Heinemann. 6s.

> She glanced at her husband for a moment, and then, very reverently, she took hold of it at each end, and lifted it out. She had never seen anything at all like it in her life before.

But Janet is not to be bought by the "many fortunes spent on madame's jewel-case." When John Holden touches her neck clumsily while he is trying to fasten her necklace, Janet rushes, panic-stricken, to the door. She thinks that he has, of design, broken his promise. The scene is shockingly overdone, of course, as is the plutocrat's contrite humility, chivalry, and exquisite forbearance in the many scenes where Janet, out of perversity, flirts abominably with the men of pleasure, Corbishley, Captain Ambrose, Tommy Wentworth, who are in her smart, motoring, bridge-playing set. What interests us in the picture of their atrociously vulgar Riviera life, described with such loving appreciation, is that both Janet and John Holden, while intent on getting their money's worth in social luxury, as long-headed business people should do, are sound and unsophisticated as mill-hands in all that pertains to their domestic virtue. This is, in a sense, a good sign, as it illustrates the old saying about the generation that corrupts society by its lavish display, not itself being corrupted; but one asks oneself whether this deification of the money-power is not more offensive to good taste when buttressed by domestic virtue. We have in "The Magnate" innumerable little scenes all designed to impress on us that money is king everywhere, except in the nuptial chamber. Thus we are shown Janet receiving Rothschild with awe, and wondering whether "he could be so little, so plain, so quiet, and yet the bearer of that great historic name." And was she herself "the spiritless drudge who, so short a time ago, had been at the beck and call of a vulgar shrew in the dreary suburbs of Manchester"? And, of course, character's the thing that one can coin into money, as your plain business man knows. If you are rolling in money, then you can even afford not to look up to it!

> Philippa began to laugh again: then she became grave. . . . "Why, you'll be entertaining royalty, next year, at home, my dear. I'd give my ears to be in your shoes."
>
> The audacity of the suggestion rather frightened Janet. "Royalty?" she said.
>
> "The King thinks the world of John. Didn't you know? 'The only man who never wants anything for himself,' he said of him. It went all over London."
>
> It was a wonderful revelation to Janet, that pithy careless verdict of the best judge of character in Europe. It was not merely that her husband was honoured by the respect of a king, but that the king had said just that one thing of him.

After this testimony from Royalty the reviewer's appreciation of plain, honest John Bull Holden would be superfluous to the modern Briton. The Chief, as John Holden is styled, is superb when he bribes the engine-driver of his Paris-Riviera special with 6,000 francs to gain an extra half an hour on the run, so that he may spend it with Mrs. Holden. And he is simply the super-Briton when Captain Ambrose prepares a trap for the innocent Janet, and bribes her chauffeur to break down late at night in a mountain village. The reader must be left to sample these delights. Perfect propriety is maintained, and everything mentioned in the book is "the best that money can buy."

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"The King and the Constitution" is the title of the opening article in "The Contemporary Review" for September. The writer, who signs himself "A Loyal Subject," criticises the part which the King is commonly assumed to have played in recent foreign negotiations. The view taken is that the tension between this country and Germany is partly due to the sudden announcement of the Reval visit, without any pains having been taken to allay German anxiety. "On the contrary," the writer goes on, "much was done which had the effect of intensifying it. The central source of the alarm of the Germans springs from their belief that King Edward, of whose supernatural ability in political manœuvres they have fully persuaded themselves, is his own Foreign Minister, pursuing, with relentless persistence, a personal policy, aiming at the isolation and ultimately at the destruction of Germany. The one great check upon this fantastic theory is the assertion of the Constitutional doctrine that his Majesty neither has, nor can have, nor desires to have, any foreign policy excepting that for which the English Cabinet and the Foreign Minister are responsible." This is the line of argument which we ourselves have taken in discussing the question, and we believe it to be one which, in view of current misconceptions, needs to be insisted upon. Mr. Edmund Gosse contributes an appreciation of Count Tolstoy. A determination to place before the reader a series of exact statements, an effort to represent the truth in a formal exposition of particulars, this, says Mr. Gosse, is the central feature of Tolstoy's work as a novelist and the reason why he must be ranked great among the greatest. "His method, when sentiment does not intervene to disturb it, is impeccable. He deals, by the aid of his superb resources of description, with the relation of causes, the linked succession of facts, and the inevitability of events. He explains the laws of humanity to us by history, and history by manners." A want of impartiality is, in Mr. Gosse's view, Tolstoy's great drawback. "In his earlier nihilistic days, in his later pietistic ones, he has deliberately shut himself off from the very highest achievement by his didactic habit of mind. As long as he patiently observes, there is no one above him, and perhaps no one equal to him. But from the opening chapter of 'The Cossacks' to the final book of 'Resurrection,' he has never been able to resist a temptation to illogical satire. . . . He set out to observe mankind impartially, and yet he has not been able to resist the ethical caprice which has led him into a thousand flagrant contradictions and illogical conclusions. Nor is there anything very new in any of his theories, except the extravagance with which they are formulated. He goes back to 1750 and the 'Discours sur l'inégalité.'" This is a very commonplace and superficial view of a great man's intellectual and spiritual life. Similar criticisms have been made on Ruskin, but after all is it not Ruskin the prophet, and not Ruskin the art critic, who will be remembered? "The Turkish Revolution" is discussed by Mr. Edwin Pears—an unrivalled authority, with great balance of mind. Mr. Pears thinks that the most serious danger ahead of the Young Turks arises from the probability of conflict between the Committee and the Army. "So long as the Committee is in accord with the Army it can govern. But will the Army remain content to be under a chief who is the nominee of a civil and self-appointed Committee? If a few years pass under the Constitutional régime the Army may learn to recognise that Parliament is its real master. The Committee may dissolve itself, or be forgotten, as having merged its powers in Constitutional authority. But if, before such a lesson is learned, the Army is discontented, the troops may declare for the Sultan against their official chief, and then will come the chance of reaction." Mr. A. D. Webster, in "Our Timber Supplies," urges that the State should acquire suitable waste lands and plant them with timber at the rate of 40,000 acres annually, for a period of twenty-five years. Other articles are "The Transmission of Acquired Characters" by Professor Marcus Hartog, "The Political Relations of Hungary and Austria," by Count Jos. Mailáth, "Chamber Drama" by Mr. G. V. Williams, "Re-union and Intercommunion" by the Archbishop of Melbourne, "The Belgian Parliament and the Congo" by Mr. E. D. Morel, and "Sick Nursing in the Territorial Army" by Miss Elizabeth Haldane.

* * *

The Turkish question forms the subject of no fewer than four articles in "The Fortnightly Review." "Viator" has the highest praise for the Young Turks, and is very sanguine of their future developments. The movement is, in his view, thoroughly national and patriotic. "The new men desire to keep every inch of territory at present under Ottoman control; and if we think European interference will be easier than in the past we are mistaken." Mr. Angus Hamilton describes the Midhat Pasha Constitution of 1876, and shows how the present reforming policy compares with that of thirty years ago. "Modernism in Islam" is the title of a brilliant article by Mr. H. N. Brailsford, in which he shows that the Mohammedan world is very much in the same position relative to the Koran as Catholicism is relative to the Bible and the Church. Captain von Herbert's article on "Kamil Pasha and the Succession in Turkey" was written some months ago, but the conclusions then reached have been fully borne out by

THE INTERNATIONAL

A Review of the World's Progress.

September No. Price 1/- net.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS.

THE FUTURE OF MARRIAGE. By DR. RODOLPHE BRODA.

THE INFANT MORTALITY CAMPAIGN IN GREAT BRITAIN. By C. W. SALEEBY, M.D.

THE PROBLEM OF DIVORCE IN FRANCE. By PAUL MARGUERITE.

THE STORM-CENTRE OF THE WOMAN SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT. By TERESA BILLINGTON-GRIEG.

THE MACEDONIAN QUESTION. By G. F. ABBOTT.

THE WAR AGAINST TRUSTS IN AMERICA. By ARTHUR BEAVES (New York).

THE MAORI AS LAND REFORMER. By SIR ROBERT STOUT, K.C., M.G. (New Zealand).

THE EMANCIPATION OF MOHAMMEDAN WOMEN. By G. DESORMEAUX.

THE RELIGIOUS AWAKENING OF INDIA. By INDICUS.

On Sale at all Booksellers.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON.

BY DESERT WAYS TO BAGHDAD.

By LOUISA JEBB (Mrs. Wilkins). With a Map and 64 Illustrations from photographs. Price 10s. 6d. net.

THE CONFESSIONS OF A BEACHCOMBER.

Scenes and Incidents in the Career of an Unprofessional Beachcomber in Tropical Queensland. By E J. BANFIELD. With a Map and 48 Illustrations. 15s. net.

CULTS, CUSTOMS, AND SUPERSTITIONS OF INDIA.

By JOHN CAMPBELL OMAN, D.Lit., Author of "The Mystics, Ascetics, and Saints of India," &c. Profusely Illustrated. 14s. net.

AUGUSTUS.

The Life and Times of the Founder of the Roman Empire (B.C. 63—A.D. 14). By E. S. SHUCKBURGH. Cheap Edition. Illustrated. Cloth, 2s. 6d. Uniform with Lord Morley's "Life of Richard Cobden."

CHATS ON OLD LACE AND NEEDLEWORK.

A Practical Guide for Collectors.

By Mrs. LOWES. With a Coloured Frontispiece and about 70 other Illustrations. Cloth, 5s. net.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON.

THE CASE FOR FREE TRADE

is being pithily put from day to day in

"THE DAILY NEWS"

by

L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P.,

under the title

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE.

EVERY DAY ONE POINT.

All who wish to have ready to hand an apt reply for the Tariff Reformer should watch this series in

"THE DAILY NEWS"

daily.

BOOKS WANTED, 25s. Each Offered.—Brewer's Henry VIII., 2 vols., 1884. Burke's Armoury and Extinct Peerage, 1883. Borrow's Wild Wales, 3 vols., 1862. Eliot's Scenes of Clerical Life, 1st edition, 2 vols., 1858. Jerrold's Men of Character, 3 vols., 1838. Alice in Wonderland, 1865 or 1866. Stevenson's Edinburgh, 1879. Desperate Remedies, 3 vols., 1871. Churchill's Poems, 3 vols., 1844. Symond's Italian Literature, 2 vols., 1881. Swinburne's Atalanta, white cloth, 1865. Lorna Doone, 3 vols., 1869. James's Painters and their Work, 3 vols. Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863. Jackson's Old Paris, 2 vols., 1878. Freer's Last Decade, 2 vols., 1863. 100,000 books for sale and wanted. Please state wants.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

BOOKLETS ON DIET By the Author of "Plainer Fare and Less of It."
SEVENTH THOUSAND.

"PLAIN DINNERS: a Help to a Uric-Acid-Free Diet." Post-free. 7d.

"There is much sound wisdom and real helpfulness in the pages of this little pamphlet."—Dundee Courier.

"SALINE STIMULATION: with Remarks on a Common Ill." Post-free, 7d,

A "new application of old and familiar facts." From the Author,

ALICE BRAITHWAITE, 45, West End Avenue, Harrogate.

Now on Sale, 6d. net. The September BOOK MONTHLY.

Contents.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. Topics and Talk in the Literary World, with really good Illustrations.
THE "SEVENPENNY" What It Has Done Since It Came Into Being.
LIFE AND LETTERS. According to the Experience of David Christie Murray.
A LONDON LETTER. Which Tells all about the Summer Heroine in Fiction.
OXFORD IN PRINT. Some Annals of the Great University Press.
LIGHT AND LEADING. New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.
THE GENERAL READER. Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best-Selling Books.
NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.
BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of August.
THE PERIODICALS. Contents of this Month's Reviews and Magazines.

Publishers: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London, E.C.

events. Mr. Archibald Hurd argues that the Colonies should relieve the British taxpayer by voting grants in aid of the Navy—a position impregnable to argument but hardly likely to be adopted in the near future. Two critical articles are a fine appreciation of "Mark Rutherford," by Miss Frances Lowe, and "Tolstoy and the Tolstoyans," by Mr. Francis Gribble. Mr. Gribble attempts to enact the part of advocatus diaboli without much success. There is a clever short story called "The Gift," by Miss May Sinclair.

* * *

In "The Nineteenth Century" Mr. Edward Dicey examines the effect of the Turkish Revolution upon Egyptian Nationalism, and reaches the conclusion that the case for some form of Parliamentary self-government for Egypt is strengthened by events in Turkey. "I cannot conceal my conviction," he says, "that Kamil Pasha created a state of feeling in Egypt more akin to patriotism than had been known there before, and that this feeling can be best described as one of general unrest. I cannot doubt that, whether reasonably or unreasonably, English rule is viewed with disfavor by the great majority of the Egyptian public, and that if we are to reconcile Egypt to our dominion we must adopt other measures than those which commended themselves to the British Agency under the late Administration." Sir Godfred Lagden discusses "Our Protectorates and Asiatic Immigration," urging that "our obligations to British Indians, with whose problems we warmly sympathise, should not be satisfied at the expense of the natives of Africa" Mr. Beckles Willson publishes some fresh letters of General Wolfe, those to his parents being particularly interesting. "Aerial Navigation" is treated by Professor Simon Newcomb, "Woman and the Suffrage" by Miss Eva Gore-Booth, and Mr. Bram Stoker fears that necessity may soon arise for a censorship of fiction.

* * *

"Birds and Their Nests and Eggs," by Mr. George H. Vos (Routledge, 1s.), is described by the author as the second part of a description of the rambles of two friends in search of birds' nests near London, the first part having been published last year. The observations made on these rambles are described in a style which, if a little too childish to please all adult readers, should commend itself to more youthful students of bird life and lore. Beginning with an account of how, one January, a pair of robins made the mistake of regarding that month as the proper one for nesting, the author narrates a series of excursions, lasting till early June, and accompanies the text with some excellent photographs of his own taking. The appendices consist of a brief but useful list of eggs, described and illustrated, and of a synopsis and alphabetical index of the birds mentioned.

The Week in the City.

The Movement of Leading Stocks.

	Price Friday Morning, Aug. 28.		Price Friday Morning, Sept. 4.
Consols 2½ per cent.	86½	...	85 11/16
German 3 per cent.	83½	...	84
Japan 4 per cent. 1899	82⅝	...	83⅞
Union Pacific	164½	...	168½
Canadian-Pacific...	178	...	177½
Rand Mines	6 3/32	...	6⅞
Peruvian Pref.	10¼	...	10⅝

This has been a very interesting week on the Stock Exchange, chiefly on account of the upward spurt in the Foreign market, led by Peruvians and Japanese. Peruvian Ordinary has risen 20 per cent. in a few weeks, owing partly to the better outlook for nitrate, partly to the better relations between the Corporation and the Government, partly to the admission of the Corporation's stocks to the Paris list. Peruvian Ordinary is little better than a speculative counter. The Preference has more solidity, and the Bonds, yielding 6 per cent. at or near about par, look rather attractive. The American market is still in an excited condition. As to Japanese issues, the revival of support is less remarkable than the cause, which deserves a special paragraph.

Japanese Finance.

The great event of the week has been the declaration of policy by the new Katsura Cabinet, which has just decided to effect the most sweeping retrenchment that one can remember in modern financial history. The proposal is to reduce the expenditure by 200 million yen, or 20 millions sterling. If this is carried out it will mean that many of the war taxes can be swept away or diminished, that a real sinking fund can be applied to the reduction of the war debt, and that considerable sums can also be applied to the economic development of Japan. During the last two years the pressure of military and naval men has been strong enough to keep the military and naval estimates at an extravagant height, with the result that the promise of a big sinking fund has been unfulfilled, and that last year's revenue and income only just balanced. But the depression of Japanese bonds and a long-drawn crisis of trade and finance have apparently produced an irresistible counter pressure not only from bankers, merchants, and financiers, but from the whole nation, the Press powerfully assisting. Hence we now get this startling declaration of policy. Forty per cent. of the reduction—i.e., £8,000,000—is to be obtained by diminishing the military and naval outlay. Another sum is to be gained by postponing the International Exhibition at Tokio, which will be a costly affair. Moreover, the Japanese Government perceives that the sanitation and hotel accommodation of the big towns are by no means up to European standard, and that it would be well to give the local authorities time to prepare for an influx of wealthy visitors. Altogether Japan is to be heartily congratulated on this bold stroke of policy. The Government has been rewarded immediately by a strong upward movement of Japanese bonds, which has not been confined to merely Government issues.

The Russian Loan.

Meanwhile the Russian Government is still floundering in financial embarrassments, wasting its money recklessly on an army unmanageably huge, and on perfectly useless military railways. An appalling deficit is again certain, and the French banks are preparing to float another big loan, probably in October. No one thinks that the recent 5 per cent. internal loan of 200,000,000 roubles will satisfy the Government's needs. The finance minister, M. Kokovstoff, is never tired of enlarging on the need for economy, but, in view of his Budget proposals, his speeches are worthless. The Russian Budget for 1908 was larger than ever. Ordinary expenditure stands at £231,225,106, and extraordinary at £26.915.207; while the revenue estimates from taxation are £238,694,549. The history of the debt appears in the following table:—

Year.	Total debt. Roubles.
1862	1,376,420,117
1872	2,291,918,841
1882	4,356,638,149
1892	4,976,995,271
1902	6,430,651,061
1905	7,081,746,618
1906	7,841,164,509
1907	8,609,577,528

From a recent study of the debt I take the following:—

> "Much of this debt has, it is true, been incurred on account of railways. In 1904 3,189,852,000 roubles had been borrowed for this purpose, and improved communication is undoubtedly one of Russia's great needs. But a large number of the lines do not pay, and therefore are a burden on the country's finances. The government owns about two-thirds of all the railways in Russia, and its system now extends to over 25,300 miles.
>
> "The default of the Russian government would be so appalling that its possibility is scarcely conceivable. But the country's economic future depends entirely on the shape her policy takes. An investor might weigh his individual opinion on these points against the attractive yields of Russian securities."

I am not sure that the yields are attractive, in view of the continuation on an ever increasing scale of deficits and loans. For it must be remembered that the interest on the debt could not be paid except by annual borrowing in France

Lucellum.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

ONE & ALL SEEDS

THE BRAND GUARANTEES ONE & ALL QUALITY.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

ONE & ALL SEEDS are reliable, pure, and guaranteed.

Each packet is dated with the year of issue.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS are complete Manures.

All are supplied in small quantities at reasonable prices.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Choice Varieties of Sweet Peas, with an Original Pamphlet on their Culture, by Richard Dean, V.M.H.—viz., Dorothy Eckford, white; Hon. Mrs. Kenyon, yellow; Prima Donna, soft pink; King Edward VII., crimson; Miss Wilmott, rich deep orange pink; Mrs. Walter Wright, mauve; Prince of Wales, fine rose; Duchess of Westminster, violet purple; Othello, deep maroon; Lady Grisel Hamilton, pale lavender; Duke of Westminster, purple; Navy Blue.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Annuals.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Perennials and Biennials.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables for Saladings.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables.

One & All Collection of Choicest Asters in 10 Varieties—2s. 6d. Giant Comet, white; Giant Comet, The Bride, white; Giant Comet, rose; Giant Comet, azure blue; Giant Comet, dark violet; Mixed Dwarf Chrysanthemum; Finest Mixed Bouquet; Mixed Victoria; Mixed Paeony; Perfection; and Betteridge's Quilled in mixed colours.

One & All Fertiliser No. 24 for general garden purposes. Half-rod packets 6d. bags, 7 lbs., 2/3; 14 lbs., 3/6; 28 lbs., 5/9; 56 lbs., 10/6; 112 lbs., 20/- Carriage Paid.

ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, LIMITED. Name and address of nearest Local Agent, Illustrated Catalogues, and other details, sent free by post on application to EDWARD OWEN GREENING, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS

BOOKSELLERS.

A Beautiful Large Emerald Type

10/6 OXFORD TEACHER'S BIBLE for 5/11 POST FREE.

Latest Illustrated Edition. Size 7 x 5-in.

To which are appended Notes analytical, critical, chronological, historical, and geographical, a glossary of antiquities; an abstract of modern discoveries; a dictionary of Scripture proper names; a biblical index concordance; a new series of maps; and compendium of Scripture natural history. Handsome Limp Morocco binding, with overlapping edges, round corners, elastic band.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE, 53, Paternoster Row.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education, Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.
Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

(For Leisure Hour Work, see the Bootham School exhibit in the Franco-British Exhibition, Education Building, Section J.)

Special terms for boys under 14 and under 13.

For copies of Prospectus and full particulars with regard to Scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

BROMSGROVE SCHOOL, WORCESTERSHIRE.

AUTUMN TERM begins September 17th.

APPLY THE HEADMASTER.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

THE ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL.

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields: gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Next Term, Sept. 18th. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE.

(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON).

The MICHAELMAS TERM BEGINS on OCTOBER 1st, 1908. The College prepares Students for the London Degrees in Science and Arts.

Twelve Entrance Scholarships, from £50 to £60 a year, and several Bursaries of not more than £30, tenable for three years, will be offered for Competition in June, 1909.

For further particulars, apply to the SECRETARY, Royal Holloway College, Englefield Green, Surrey.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

NEW BOYS ARRIVE SEPTEMBER 17TH, OTHERS 18TH.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

WEST HEATH SCHOOL, HAMPSTEAD.

On high ground close to the Heath.
A day school for Boys and Girls (about 100 pupils).

Principal: Mrs. Ennis Richmond.
Headmaster: Mr. F. V. Bindon (M.A. Cantab.).
Succeeding Mr. & Mrs. Rice, now taking up work at Bedales School, Hants.

Good Buildings. Playground. Large Grass Playing Fields.

A Boarding house will be opened in September in connection with the above under the immediate management of Mrs. Richmond and her son, Mr. Kenneth Richmond, as house master.

Michaelmas Term will begin September 22nd.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR
CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.
By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."
—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."
—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

TOURS.

£6 6s. LUCERNE TOUR.

Nine days. Short Sea Route. No extras for Conductor or Gratuities.

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D.

5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. 25, Cannon Street, E.C.
4, Charing Cross, S.W. 84, Piccadilly, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son, Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.

67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day.

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par., facing Sea, Central for Amusements. South Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageres.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.

BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott. Prop.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

GREAT YARMOUTH.

HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor.

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop. J. E. Dowthwaite.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny. Golf, etc. Lecture.

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic. &c., Baths and Treatment.

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Afternoon Teas, Tel. 647.

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties Catered for.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

NEW BOOKS AND NEW EDITIONS

FROM

GREENING & CO'S LIST.

ROYAL LOVERS AND MISTRESSES.

The Romance of Crowned and Uncrowned Kings and Queens of Europe. By DR. A. S. RAPPOPORT (Author of "The Curse of the Romanoffs," &c.). Illustrated, demy octavo, cloth. (In active preparation.) 16/- net.

A DAINTY EDITION OF DEAN SWIFT'S WORKS.

Bound in neat Cloth binding and printed on good deckle edge paper. 2/- net. per vol.

Vol. 1. THE TALE OF A TUB
Vol. 2. POLITE CONVERSATION
Vol. 3. THE BATTLE OF THE BOOKS AND DIRECTIONS TO SERVANTS
Vol. 4. MISCELLANEA
Vol. 5. GULLIVER'S TRAVELS (Lilliput and Brobdingnag).
Vol. 6. GULLIVER'S TRAVELS (Laputa and among the Houyhnhnms.

* This volume contains many of Swift's choicest essays, including "A Meditation upon a Broomstick," "Essay on Conversation," etc.

THE ROYAL HOUSE OF STUART:

From its origin to the accession of the House of Hanover.

By SAMUEL COWAN.

Author of "Mary Queen of Scots," &c.

Bound in whole red buckram. Two vols., demy 8vo. With 48 illustrations and photogravure frontispieces of Mary Queen of Scots and Annabella Drummond. Price 42/- net.

FROM ST. IVES TO LAND'S END.

By A. G. FOLLIOTT-STOKES.

Vividly describes the beautiful but little known Coast and Moorland stretching from St. Ives to Land's End. Many of the excellent pictures by Mr. J. C. DOUGLAS represent views which have not hitherto been photographed and add much to the value of the work. It is a handy little volume for the pocket, containing a map of the ground covered, and will be found of the greatest interest to tourists and visitors to West Cornwall. It is strongly bound in cloth, and the price is 1/- net.

CATHOLIC CHURCH MUSIC.

By RICHARD R. TERRY.

(Organist and Director of the Choir at Westminster Cathedral).

Demy 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

EDUCATION, PERSONALITY, & CRIME.

By ALBERT WILSON, M.D.

With about 100 illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

The Author makes a new departure in suggesting that degeneracy forms as distinct a class as insanity. As a scientific basis he gives a full analysis of the brain of a degenerate who was a murderer. There are many micro-photographs to prove his case. If later observers support this view it will form quite a novel feature not only in pathology, but also in sociology and in the medico-legal aspect of crime.

BUBBLES IN BIRD LAND.

Written by HAROLD SIMPSON.

Drawings By G. E. SHEPHARD.

This is one of the cleverest and funniest books for Children ever produced. It contains 30 full-page coloured illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.

POPULAR FICTION.

If you want a really thrilling tale of love and war, ask at your library for

6/- SEMIRAMIS. 6/-

By EDWARD PEPLE, part author of "Richard the Brazen."

OTHER GOOD NOVELS ARE

WORKERS IN DARKNESS	- HARRIS BURLAND 6s.
BEAU BROCADE	- BARONESS ORCZY 6s.
THE CARDINAL AND LADY SUSAN	LUCAS CLEEVE 6s.
A BACHELOR'S LOVE STORY	- ANTHONY GRIMM 6s.
ROLLIN STONE	- ERNEST SUFFLING 6s.
THE MEETING OF THE WAYS	- J. D. BAXTER 6s.
A SUBURBAN SCANDAL	- GURNER GILLMAN 6s.
THE AVA MINING SYNDICATE	- CECIL LOWIS 6s.
MRS. FITZMAURICE ON LEAVE	GABRIELLE FITZMAURICE 3s. 6d.
THE PRODIGAL CITY	- TRISTAM COUTTS 6s.
BRENDAVALE	- E. BLACK. 6s.
GOD IN SAN DAM	- F. BLOUNT MOTT 6s.
HEATHER O' THE RIVERS	W. HAROLD THOMSON 6s.
ROSE CAMPIONS PLATONIC	- ADAM LILBURN 6s.
THE MYSTERIOUS ABDUCTION	G. S. GOODMAN 6s.

GREENING'S SHILLING NET NOVELS

Were the first in the field, and still remain the best on the market.

JUST ADDED:

THE TANGLED SKEIN

By BARONESS ORCZY. Author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel."

PORTALONE

By RANGER GULL. Author of "The Serf," "The Hypocrite," &c.,

AND

THE DUPE

By GERALD BISS. Author of "The White Rose Mystery."

OTHER VOLUMES IN THE SERIES ARE:

THE SCARLET PIMPERNEL	BARONESS ORCZY.
I WILL REPAY	BARONESS ORCZY.
A SON OF THE PEOPLE	BARONESS ORCZY.
THE DEGRADATION OF GEOFFREY ALWITH	MORLEY ROBERTS.
SEEN AND UNSEEN	E. KATHARINE BATES.
FROM THE BOOK BEAUTIFUL	GUY THORNE.
OSCAR WILDE	R. H. SHERARD.

To their "LOTUS LIBRARY" Messrs. Greening have just added A MUMMY'S ROMANCE, by THEOPHILE GAUTIER, translated by G. F. MONKSHOOD, price 1/6 net cloth, 2/- net leather, to be had at all booksellers'.

JUST ADDED TO GREENING'S USEFUL HANDBOOKS:—

HOW TO INSURE PAYMENT OF DEBT ... By a LAWYER.	GOLF ... By Sir HENRY SETON KARR and others.
VILLA GARDENS ... By W. S. ROGERS.	THE HOME BEAUTIFUL ... A Practical Guide to Home.

IF YOU WANT A REAL GOOD LAUGH READ

THE VICTIM AND THE VOTARY

A really funny yarn by WILLIAM CAINE. Price One Shilling net. Illustrated wrapper.

WRITE FOR COMPLETE CATALOGUE.

GREENING & CO. Ltd., 91, St., Martin's Lane, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. III., No. 24.] SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	Page
Diary of the Week ...	819
Politics and Affairs:—
The Catholic Church and Modern Life	822
The Policy of National Insurance	823
The Message of Liberalism to the East	824
The Crisis in the Cotton Trade	826
Life and Letters:—
The Teaching of Tolstoy ...	827
Fifty Years of Evolution ...	828
The Passing of the Horse ...	829
Little Living Creatures ...	830
Present-Day Problems:—
A New Force in Agriculture	831
The Drama:—
Mr. Barrie's Failure. By H. W. M.	832
Communications:—
The South American Naval Armaments. By One Who Knows	833
Letters to the Editor:—
"A South American Ruler." By the Consul for Venezuela	834
Taine's Letters. By Frederic Harrison	835
"The Lost Liberty of the Road." By John W. Graham, Active Resister. Sir Jas. B. Smith, and H. Reynolds Brown, M.D.	835
Women Municipal Voters. By J. Smith	836
England and Germany. By A. Clutton Brock	837
Miss Beale and Women's Suffrage. By Mrs. C. D. Rackham	837
Poetry:—
Starlight on the Hill. By W. K. Fleming...	837
The World of Books ...	838
Books to be Read	838
Reviews:—
The Child of the Temple ...	839
English Oarsmanship ...	840
David Christie Murray ...	841
Three Novels	842
Books in Brief:—
The Story of the Guides ...	844
James II. and His Wives ...	844
Leaf and Tendril	844
A Short History of the English Bar	846
The Week in the City ...	846

The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The Eucharistic Congress was opened in Westminster Cathedral on Wednesday by a reception of Cardinal Vincenzo Vannutelli, the Papal Legate, an ecclesiastic of much learning and distinction who has been close to the succession to the Papal chair. Cardinal Vannutelli has been careful to disavow any "political intent" for his mission, or "any idea of dispute or argument with Protestants," and has declared that all the discussions in the Congress will be on purely religious topics. The opening ceremony in the great Byzantine structure at Westminster was imposing. The chief figure was the Legate, who walked in full canonicals to the High Altar, rich with many colored marbles, beneath a white silk canopy, accompanied by his suite in pontifical uniform, and a long file of great Roman ecclesiastics. The Cardinal delivered a special Papal Benediction, and in his Address paid a tactful compliment to a country which a famous Pope found to be inhabited "by angels rather than Angles," and offered his respects to the King and to the British authorities. On Thursday morning a full Pontifical Mass was finely sung, the Archbishop of Paris being the celebrant.

* * *

Meanwhile, a somewhat bitter controversy has arisen with regard to to-morrow's procession round the precincts of the Cathedral in honor of the Blessed Sacrament. It appears that technically this procession violates the twenty-sixth section of the Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829. This section declares that "if any Roman Catholic ecclesiastic shall exercise any of the rites or ceremonies of the Roman Catholic religion, or wear the habits of his Order, save within the usual places of worship of the Roman Catholic religion, or in private houses, such ecclesiastic or other person shall forfeit for every such offence the sum of £50." This prohibition was revived in the proclamation by Queen Victoria in 1852, when the anti-Catholic movement was rife. It does not seem to be clear that the procession itself is a violation of the law. The Catholics deny that it involves the actual exercise of any of their rites and ceremonies. But it is admitted that ecclesiastics wearing their habits might be prosecuted under it if the Attorney-General chose to set the law in motion, and the Protestant Alliance have already served an injunction on Archbishop Bourne.

* * *

It is certain, however, that the Government will not act, and their abstention is, we think, justified. Considerations of tact and feeling should have led the organisers of the Congress to dispense with a procession through the streets of a non-Catholic country. But it is too late to invoke old penal laws on religious grounds, and there appear to be many cases in which the wearing of Roman Catholic vestments in the streets has been condoned, notably in the annual Corpus Christi processions. We criticise elsewhere the general position and attitude of the Roman Catholic Church to modern life, but we hope that no Protestant or freethinker will discredit himself and the traditions of his country by offering any insult to the procession. The discussions in the Congress have been on matters of faith associated with the doctrine and ceremony of the Mass, though Monsignor Moyes declared that the presence of a Legate in England after so many hundred years of banishment, and the fact that the country contained as many Catholics as in pre-Reformation days, made an annus mirabilis for Catholicism. The aged Lord Llandaff strongly denounced the Royal Declaration repudiating the Mass and the invocation and adoration of the Virgin as idolatrous. He declared this singling out of a specific religious doctrine for condemnation to be outrageous and a relic of barbarism, and pressed for its abolition. We doubt whether the time for advocating this change was wisely chosen. It suggests that the Congress had a political as well as a religious object.

* * *

The crisis of unemployment in Glasgow has given rise to the first anti-Royalist demonstration which has taken place in Great Britain for many years. The occasion was the visit of Prince Arthur of Connaught to the great municipal buildings at Glasgow in connection with a review of the Boys' Brigade. A crowd of 8,000 or 10,000 unemployed workmen gathered before the buildings, hooted the Prince when he entered them, and on his departure after luncheon. Some shouts of "Down with Monarchy" were raised as he drove away to the review ground in the company of the Lord Provost, but the demonstration was chiefly directed against the idea of expensive feasting by Town Councillors while so many workmen were starving. Another rough demonstration took place at the gates of the Cathedral, and proposals were made to conduct midnight raids on the richer quarters of the city and suburbs, but these came to nothing. To-morrow there is to be a parade of the unemployed round the city. But the state of feeling has been greatly softened by the sympathetic words and action of the Town Council, which is one of the most progressive in Great Britain. An interview between the representatives of the unemployed, at which their case was moderately stated, led to a display of strong emotion by the Lord Provost, who promised that Glasgow should sustain its character for generous conduct. The men at once responded to this note, and the danger of violence has probably passed.

* * *

Meanwhile, the situation in the shipbuilding trade and the general building industry shows some signs of amelioration. The Cotton Operatives have balloted on the question of a reduction of five per cent. in their wages. Ninety-two per cent. of the Operative Spinners voted against accepting the reduction, and ninety per cent. of the Cardroom Operatives. On this the joint unions asked for a fresh conference with the employers. This took place on Thursday, and brought the parties a little nearer a settlement. The masters proposed to postpone the five per cent. reduction to the beginning of the New Year. To this the workers replied by offering to accept reduction from January 1st, 1909, if the state of trade warranted it. The masters refused further concession, and the conference broke up without a definite issue. But neither party desires a conflict, and the door remains open for an adjustment. Unemployment seems to be spreading in Manchester, Birmingham, and other large centres. Finally, Mr. Churchill has succeeded in arranging provisional terms of agreement for the engineering trade on the North-East coast.

* * *

Mr. Shackleton, perhaps the ablest member of the Parliamentary Labor Party, delivered the Presidential Address to the Trade Union Congress on Monday. He approved the Old Age Pensions Act, while asking for the removal of the exception of aged paupers and for the reduction of the general age limit to sixty. He believed workmen wanted the Licensing Bill, thought that no amendments weakening its operation should be accepted, and was willing to fight the issue of Lords against Commons upon it. His chief remedies for unemployment were the reduction of the hours of labor and an effort to stop "systematic overtime," together with the re-introduction of Mr. P. W. Wilson's Bill of this year. He thought that the time was ripe for a new International Labor Conference, and asked the Government to call one—an excellent suggestion, which we hope the Prime Minister will adopt. He denounced Mr. Blatchford's and Mr. Hyndman's war scare, and, quoting John Bright, demanded the substitution of arbitration for war.

* * *

The most sensational incident of the meetings of the Congress has been the practically unanimous denunciation of the Salvation Army for the wages and conditions of work which apply at its Hanbury Street Joinery works. A strongly hostile resolution was withdrawn, but the industrial methods of the Army found no friends. The statement that the men at these works only receive from one-fourth to one-fifth of the trade union rates, and that three-quarters of this meagre wage is given in "truck," seems to us to require an answer.—On Thursday Mr. Shackleton made the highly important announcement that Mr. Gladstone has decided, after communication with the Parliamentary Committee, to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the entire problem of compulsory State insurance. The Commission will be set up this autumn.

* * *

England and Russia have taken a very important step in Persia. On Tuesday they presented an identical Note to the Shah telling him that the only way to put an end to the anarchy which was ruinous to Persia and dangerous to foreign residents was to carry out his pledge to hold new elections and to convoke a new Parliament. They suggested the middle of November as the date for the re-assembling of the Megliss, two months later than the date fixed by the Shah in the proclamation of last June, which he has shown no signs of carrying out. He will be unable to resist this peremptory advice of the two Powers, which will be of the highest benefit to the Constitutional movement. The initiative on this occasion has, of course, come from England, and Sir Edward Grey is heartily to be congratulated. He has perhaps waited too long, but he has finally, in the most unmistakeable fashion, cleared away the mists of suspicion which were damaging British prestige, and proved to Persia and the Asiatic world in general that in entering into the Anglo-Russian agreement England had no intention of abandoning her rôle as a great Liberal influence.

* * *

The meeting between Senator Tittoni and Baron von Aehrenthal at Salzburg (our Rome correspondent writes) is arousing much interest, for it is more important than the former meetings at Semmering and at Desio, which occurred last year, between the same two Ministers of Foreign Affairs. It is no secret that the two statesmen discussed at some length the relations between England and Germany, and the best means to ameliorate them. Austria and Italy have every interest in remaining on good terms with the British Empire, while friendship with England is for Italy a vital question, considering her position in the Mediterranean. This is independent of any question of sentiment, which has also a considerable weight, as good-will to England is so rooted in the Italian people that an anti-British policy would be absolutely impossible. This is the reason why Senator Tittoni has declared in the Italian Chamber, and has now repeated to Baron von Aehrenthal, that the adhesion of Italy to the Triple Alliance is conditional on her not being set in conflict with England. It appears that this clause existed in the original treaty, concluded in May, 1882, and has successively been maintained at each renewal of the alliance. With regard to the situation in Turkey, I believe that Austria and Italy pledged themselves to adhere to the agreements already existing between them, especially with regard to Albania, by which each country pledged itself against any territorial aggrandisement. Another of the important questions touched in the interview of Salzburg was that of Morocco. Here, as at the time of the Algeciras Conference, Italy sides more with England and France than with Germany and Austria.

* * *

The dispute between British Indians and the Transvaal Government has been embittered by sentences of six weeks' and three months' imprisonment passed on Indians who have re-entered the country as residents before the war, or as being qualified by the educational tests. These men included three sergeants who had served in the last Zulu "campaign" in Natal. The British Government have pledged themselves to secure this right of re-entry, but we see no prospect of their doing it. The final exclusion of Indian immigration is clearly intended by both white races in the Transvaal.

* * *

The Committee of Union and Progress has announced its election plans. Where it can, that is, in European Turkey and the larger towns of Asia Minor, it is putting up its own candidates, most of whom are Moslems, though not all; the candidates for Salonika and Smyrna, for instance, are Jews. Its attitude towards the nominees of the nationalities will depend upon their platforms, but it has closed the Young Turkish ranks by absorbing Prince Sabah-ed-Din's organisation. Prince Sabah-ed-Din stood for decentralisation, and as such was one of the hopes of the Bulgarians. He has apparently modified his views, and the Bulgarians will have to go further to meet the Committee. They have already dropped some extreme demands and the negotiations with the Committee now look more hopeful. Unfortunately, unlike the Turks, they cannot agree among themselves, and Panitza, the dissident Sandansky's lieutenant, has just crowned his murder of Sarafof with the murder of three delegates of the Bulgarian Internal organisation, a dastardly outrage which has not made the situation easier.

* * *

An unpleasant situation has been averted at Newcastle. The local Labor Party met in conference and decided to run a Labor candidate, Mr. J. J. Stephenson, of Barrow. This action involved a distinct breach of the relation of comity between Labor and Liberalism which was established at the General Election. The Liberals ran only one candidate, and there can be no doubt that a division of votes and a tacit arrangement subsisted between Mr. Cairns, the late member, and Mr. Hudson, the present representative of Labor. A similar situation prevailed at Norwich and in many other constituencies. The Labor Party at Newcastle proposed—we imagine with small chance of success—to claim the entire representation of Newcastle for the Labor Party. For immediate purposes this would have implied an almost certain victory for the Protectionist candidate, Mr. Renwick. The special effect of such a reverse would have been felt in the coming debates on the Licensing Bill, of which Mr. Shackleton, the President of the Trade Union Congress, expressly approved. Happily the statesmanship of the Labor Party has been firmly exerted to stop a complete break up of the entente between Labor and Liberalism, with its inevitable consequence in the return to power of Protection and anti-Labor Conservatism. A conference of the Executive of the Labor Representation Committee met at Nottingham, both Mr. Stephenson and Mr. Hudson attending it. It was then unanimously decided to withdraw Mr. Stephenson's candidature, and to this course he assented. The local Labor Party have not yet accepted this decision, but headquarters will, of course, take steps to make it effective.

* * *

From Monday to Thursday the hills of Alsace-Lorraine echoed with the tramp of armies. The Kaisermanœuvres this year have taken place on the scene of the early fights of the war of 1870 and have in some measure reproduced their scheme. Seventy thousand men were engaged, including not only Prussian, but Bavarian, Saxon, and Würtemberg contingents. The general idea was that a Blue army, based upon Strassburg, was repelling the invasion of a Red army, based upon Metz. The Blue army gained the advantage, its cavalry doing wonderful and impossible things, including the capture of a battery of artillery. The troops were severely tried and well stood the strain of prolonged marching on heavy ground. But the most important purpose served has been to test the new field-kitchens with which every battalion was supplied, and motor transport. Both armies had to depend for supplies upon motor communication, and, as a great variety of types was employed, valuable information was probably obtained.

On Monday the French engaged and routed with heavy loss a large Moorish harka at Bu-Denib. The French reports speak of this as fighting in Southern Algeria and treat the Moorish movement as a fanatical invasion. The frontier, however, between Morocco and Algeria is not delimited along its whole length. The latest atlases put Bu-Denib well upon the Morocco side, and the French military maps down to 1885 did the like, nor do the latest include it in Algeria. The point of view of the Moorish tribesmen is that they are the victims of a French attempt to occupy the Morocco hinterland. The Algerian railway and the advance of the French are being pushed straight towards the Tafilet, the greatest and richest oasis of the Sahara, which explains why there was a strong contingent of Tafilet tribesmen in the harka. The Franco-Spanish Note has taken a long time drafting because it was difficult to persuade Spain to look at the situation through French glasses, but the two Powers are now said to be in agreement. It is pretty certain that Germany will not make its recognition of Mulai Hafid dependent upon the Sultan paying the costs of the Shawia adventure.

* * *

Tolstoy's eightieth birthday was quietly celebrated on Thursday. The Russian Press generally revolted against the Holy Synod's prohibition, and even the "Novoe Vremya" published a friendly and congratulatory article. But the local Governors appear to have put down all attempts at festivity. The aged "pan-Evangelist," as Anatole France happily calls Tolstoy, has received thousands of letters and telegrams, which testify to an affectionate devotion felt for no literary man since Voltaire, to whose position as an arbiter of thought and feeling about men and institutions Tolstoy has largely succeeded.

* * *

Mr. Wells's vision of the future of aeroplanes is coming nearer realisation. On Wednesday, Mr. Orville Wright stayed nearly an hour—57 minutes 31 seconds—in the air after making more than fifty circles of the parade ground of Fort Myer, attaining a height of 150 feet. Mr. Wright said he descended because he was tired and not because the machinery failed. In the evening, at the same place, he flew 62 minutes 15 seconds, again running easily and without an accident. On the third experiment he carried a second aeronaut, and the aeroplane ran at once more steadily and more slowly. The machine dipped up and down and flew at all kinds of varying heights. Mr. Wright estimated the speed of his aeroplane at 36 miles an hour.

* * *

Here is a further account of deaths caused during the week by the running of motor cars. On Tuesday a child of five was knocked down and killed by a motor car at Leeds, and another child of seven, playing on the road in a village near Worcester, ran in front of a motor car and met his death. On Monday night Mr. Coxon, described as a well-known North-country contractor, was found lying on the high road by the side of his motor cycle, terribly injured. His cycle had collided with a motor car which had run away. He died on the following day. On Monday evening a Nonconformist minister was overtaken by a motor train, near Goraghwood, in Ireland, and killed. The driver of the motor stated that the dead man paid no attention to his whistle. On Monday a motor car driver, who was held to be responsible for an accident causing the death of two persons and serious injury to another, and who was stated to have made no attempt to avoid it, was found guilty of "culpable negligence," fined £10—£5 a-piece for each death—and had his licence suspended for a year.

Politics and Affairs.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND MODERN LIFE.

The holding of so important a Catholic gathering as the Eucharistic Congress in London is a fact of significance, though it may be doubtful whether this significance is to be looked for in the direction in which its organisers, or public opinion in general, suppose. It does not indicate, and will not bring about, a Romeward movement in this country. Never, we believe, since the Reformation was such a movement more impossible: the hopes entertained of the "conversion" of England, the idea that the nation is in any way gravitating towards Catholicism, Roman or Anglican—these things are dreams. The welcome which will be given to the members of the Congress, and the freedom with which its programme will be carried out, are due to the courtesy with which distinguished visitors are received by our people; to a certain indifference—for the nation at large Catholicism has long ceased to be a danger, or even a practical question; to curiosity—the crowd loves a pageant, and this particular pageant is sure to be well done. Whether under these circumstances a procession of the Host through the streets is a proper proceeding is a matter upon which considerable difference of opinion exists even among Catholics. Among a believing population such a procession is natural and impressive. But to parade an intimate religious symbol before a nondescript crowd, at the risk of insult and with the certainty of hostile comment, seems to many, apart from the question of legality, an aberration of taste and of discretion.

As applied to this gathering the name of Congress is misleading. The assembly is in no sense deliberative or designed to promote discussion. Even before the restrictions placed on such meetings by the Encyclical Pascendi, deliberation and free discussion were foreign to the genius of Roman Catholicism; and their absence at once places the Congress in a different category to that under which the recent Pan-Anglican Conference or the periodical Synods of the Free Churches fall. It is not necessary to question Cardinal Vannutelli's sincerity in emphasising its religious character. The Mass is the centre of Catholic worship and of the religious life of Catholics; the Congress is, at least on one side, a testimony to the belief in its mysterious efficacy, a public and private auto da fè. We may be thankful that some of the accessories by which such Acts of Faith were formerly accompanied are obsolete. The age is milder; faith itself burns with a less intense glow. Average English opinion regards the present celebration with the respect due to all sincere conviction, and with the special interest which the antiquity and wide diffusion of Catholicism inspire in those most remote from its standpoint. The protests which have made themselves heard, and those, perhaps the most significant, which have remained unspoken, are not directed against the Congress as a religious act, but as a demonstration, against the publicity given to it, and the advertisement of what, to the nation at large, is an alien creed.

Its religious aspect, however, is not exhaustive: so far from excluding, it implies and even accentuates its character as a demonstration, the effect of which, it is hoped, will be felt in England, and even more abroad. It would be unreasonable to complain that the assembly should possess this character. This is a free country. Within the law the Catholic Church is as much at liberty as any other to demonstrate; it is for the observer to explain the nature of the demonstration and to estimate its worth. As things stand, it is notorious that such a Congress would be impossible in the leading Catholic countries—in France or Italy. It would be the signal for a fierce outburst of anti-clericalism. The attempt to hold it would be put down by the civil authorities in the interests of public order. In Paris—in Rome itself—no public religious procession could take place without rioting and bloodshed; the streets through which it passed must be lined with bayonets and protected by cannon. How and why is this? Among non-Christian populations it is otherwise. The Sacred Carpet is escorted by enthusiastic crowds through Cairo; Buddhist monks go up with flowers and incense from the city to the protecting shrine. Among ourselves, little as we are given to external observances of the sort, the processions of the Salvation Army rouse little or no ill-will; to-morrow's ceremony will be witnessed by thousands of Protestants with decorum: it is only among Catholics that it could not safely take place. The reason assigned by the Pope is man's hatred of religion. Were it adequate, it would but throw the question farther back. Why does the Church of Rome inspire such hatred? Why, alone among religions, does it provoke such antagonism and inspire such distrust?

The fact is due not so much, we believe, to any distinctive features of Catholicism as a religion as to its embodiment in a polity. It comes into conflict with society not as a spiritual but as a secular power, as a social, or rather anti-social, force. That Christianity in the medieval world should have assumed the form of a highly organised society, governed by a powerful hierarchy, possessing its own jurisdiction, temporal as well as ecclesiastical, and recognising none but its own laws—this was natural and inevitable. That it involved a deterioration of the religious idea is beyond question; it is equally beyond question that this deterioration was a safeguard against evils worse than itself. Law is the first need of society; the sacrifice of individual freedom is the price paid by infant communities for survival; their members must learn at all costs to act in common and to obey. But at a later stage this insistence on corporate as opposed to individual life becomes mischievous. Men do not remain always minors; the time comes when they must think and act for themselves. They do so, indeed, at their peril; but in the long run the experiment is justified; character is formed by the undertaking of responsibilities and the incurring of risks. Catholicism has failed to recognise this; to see that the swathing bands of infancy are an incumbrance to the grown man. And when their retention is demanded by a sacerdotal caste bent at all costs on the preservation of its privileges and authority, the force of class interest and of real or assumed fanaticism is added to the natural conservatism of the human mind. Of these tendencies Catholicism is the embodiment; hence the opposition that it encounters from all that is living in thought and action. "L'Eglise ne marche pas dans le sens de la vie, et la vie la repousse." It would be difficult to name a single step in advance taken by mankind, a single measure of reform or progress which it has not met with hostility. It fought against the union of Italy, the House of Savoy, the German Empire, the Republic in France. Pius X. acclaims the liberty which makes such assemblies as the Eucharistic Congress possible in England. It should be remembered that this liberty is denounced by the formal and authoritative teaching of the Holy See. The Syllabus of 1884 condemns the proposition: "Laudabiliter in quibusdam Catholici nominis regionibus lege cautum est ut hominibus illuc immigrantibus liceat publicum proprii cujusque cultus exercitium habere."

The same spirit runs through the Roman system as a whole. The internal discipline of the Church, it may be thought, does not concern outsiders. If those concerned find it intolerable, the remedy is in their own hands. Catholicism bulks too large in the world to make special pleading of this sort valid. The anti-modernist crusade inaugurated by the present Pontiff and rigorously carried on in England is matter of public concern. Men are not going back to this prison-house; they are escaping from it. Catholicism, though a survival on a vast scale, is a survival; its disappearance or transformation is a matter of time, the Reformation was the turning point. The evolution of religion pursued its way; nothing could arrest or deflect it. But "the other disciple outran Peter": the Churches of the Reformation took over the birthright which Rome definitely, and once for all declined. Since then, the jetsam of the tide, she has remained unmoved in the movement of humanity; the stream of life has flowed in other channels and into other seas. The progressive elements in the system—and there are such—are not those that appear on the surface. This, imposing as it is, is the mask of dissolution; it has the name of being alive, but is dead.

THE POLICY OF NATIONAL INSURANCE.

It was natural that Mr. Shackleton, in addressing the Trade Union Congress, should give prominence to the question of the unemployed. But it was disappointing that he should have little better to recommend as a remedy than the diminution of overtime and the revival of the impossible Bill of the Labor Party. It is a striking evidence of the inherent difficulties of this problem that the representatives of the class which suffers have no remedy, no offer, which will hold water. Other social evils arise from the greed, the selfishness, the short-sightedness of men, or from the operation of social and economic tendencies which can be measured and controlled. The difficulty in reforming them lies not so much in finding the right remedy, as in overcoming forces which resist its application. It is otherwise with unemployment. Of the cyclical fluctuations of modern industry no one has yet diagnosed the true cause, still less has anyone pointed out the right method of cure. For two or three years we have been tolerably free from the trouble. Now even before autumn has set in it is upon us again. On every side the trade figures show heavy falls. The North-East coast has been the scene of acute suffering through the summer, and at Glasgow misery has found a rude and half-articulate voice. The problem, we all know, is a complex one, in which faults of character play their part along with defects of industrial organisation. But in the face of the figures no one can say that the eight per cent. of trade unionists who are out of work to-day are out by their own fault. They are sufferers from the defects in our industrial and commercial organisation—that same organisation which, for the favored few, has piled up wealth beyond the dreams of our forefathers, and has brought plenty, comfort, and even luxury, to a large and ever-growing class. All the greater is the moral obligation on those who have reaped the benefits of the system to deal with the suffering which is its darker side.

Unemployment is only one of the evils of the workman's life, though it is probably that of which he goes most constantly in dread. While the skilled operative has now secured what may be called a fair-weather wage—a wage which carries him on well enough as long as health and strength last and employment is regular—he is still liable to strokes of fortune which rapidly depress him below the level of healthy livelihood and independent citizenship. Accidents, sickness, the approach of old age, no less than the ever present chance of losing his "job," beset his career. He has done much to provide against these contingencies by mutual insurance, but even for the skilled worker there are certain points on which voluntary insurance breaks down, and for the agricultural labourer and the unskilled workman generally this method is no solution. Year by year it becomes more clearly recognised as an obligation on the community as a whole to insure the laborious poor against the chances of pauperism. A beginning was made by Mr. Chamberlain when the principle of compensation for all accidents was recognised, however inadequately that principle may have been embodied in the first Act in which it found expression. A second and even more important step was taken this year when the Government first admitted the right of maintenance in old age as something distinct from the pauper's dole. Here again the principle has been very imperfectly embodied in law, and the next step must be to remove the obvious limitations and inconsistencies which at present deprive the Pension system of a great part of its value. For with all these limitations we have in the system of Old Age Pensions as established this year a basis on which it is, we believe, possible to erect a comprehensive scheme of social reform, the effect of which will be to achieve that insurance of the worker against pauperism of which we have spoken.

The natural course of development is, in the first place, that from the age of seventy upwards the pension system should be extended so as to include the very poor. The next step is to deal with the earlier phase of old age in which sickness shades off into permanent invalidity, not, we would suggest, on the German plan of contributions from individual workmen and employers, but on the principle of the full responsibility of the State. That is to say, instead of beginning by lowering the age limit at which pensions should be universal, we would take a lower limit, say the age of sixty, and say that for all persons between sixty and seventy a medical certificate of permanent inability to earn more than one-third of the normal wage of their calling should qualify for inclusion in the pension list. We do not say that this addition to the cost of the pension scheme could be made at a stroke, but we say that it is an intelligible ideal towards which to work, and that it would go far towards solving the problem of security for the worker so far as that depends on old age and the feebleness that comes with advancing years.

The problem of old age and invalidity being dealt with on these lines, the question of sickness would next arise. Here, we think, two points should be distinguished. So far as the provision of medical care and hospital accommodation is concerned, we believe it would be very generally admitted that voluntaryism has proved insufficient, and that it is in the interest of the public as much as in that of the individual sufferer that more systematic provision should be made out of public funds. So far as the maintenance of such persons and their families is concerned, the case is somewhat different, and we think that the individual workman should be called on to co-operate by insurance against this contingency. We touch here on the problem of national insurance and the German State Socialism which has so much interested Mr. Lloyd George. We are glad to read Mr. Shackleton's announcement that the Government have decided to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the whole question of compulsory insurance by the State. This seems to us a proper and promising way of advance. It is clear that the conditions of State action in this matter differ radically in England and Germany. In England we are confronted at once with the great development of mutual insurance in the Friendly Societies and Trade Unions, and no national scheme of insurance would be desirable which would interfere with the work of these organisations, nor would it be politically possible unless it should secure their co-operation and support. Those who have an insurance scheme in contemplation must begin by frankly taking these societies into their counsels, and considering in concert with them what part, if any, the State can usefully take in supplementing their work.

The same considerations apply as forcibly to any attempt to deal with unemployment by the method of national insurance. Such a plan might have its advantages in relation to the skilled workman. In fact, it is probable that the immediate line of advance in dealing with unemployment depends on distinguishing between the methods applicable to the skilled and the unskilled respectively. The skilled workman can and already does do something towards insuring himself against loss of work. Unfortunately, as the tragic experience of some of the great unions is showing, he cannot with all his efforts do enough. Neither can the State conceivably undertake the duty of finding for him occupation in his own highly specialised employment. What it might do, we think, is to supplement the efforts of trade unions and friendly societies and so render them adequate to meet such prolonged periods of depression as certain trades are now encountering. At the same time we fully recognise great difficulties demanding a fuller discussion than we have space to give on the present occasion. We only remark for the moment that if anything is to be done in this direction, it must be by keeping in close touch with the invaluable work of existing voluntary organisations. The case of the unskilled laborer is widely different. On the one hand, he is less able to insure himself; on the other, it is far easier to provide work suited to his powers. To meet his case an extension of the existing Act allowing wages to be paid out of public money is the immediate requirement. The Act of 1905 has so far justified its existence as to admit of this extension. The problem is one in which, for want of a satisfactory theoretical solution, we have to grope our way by means of experiment. But experiment we must have, even at the cost of failures and losses. Experiment is better than blank nescience or cold indifference.

THE MESSAGE OF LIBERALISM TO THE EAST.

When Great Britain and Russia addressed this week their excellent joint Note to the Shah, we may be sure that they were thinking only of the Persian situation. They are really alarmed at the anarchy to which the reactionary coup d'état has led; they are impressed, it may be, by the relative vigour which the popular party has displayed at Tabriz; they sincerely believe that nothing can restore order so surely as a return to Parliamentary rule, and, finally, they are doubtless anxious to remove all ground for the too just reproaches for which Colonel Liakhoff's support of the Shah's purge had given an occasion. The bearing of this intervention upon Persian affairs is not, however, its most significant aspect. Even Governments cannot think in water-tight compartments, or vary their policy because of a little more or less in latitude and longitude. A certain sense of sympathy and solidarity links Stamboul to Teheran and Cairo to Delhi. A common industrial system is unifying Europe more surely than any dream of peace and federation. A common history of despotism and decay, a common dread of conquest, a common hope of emancipation and progress—all these things are making no less surely for the unity of the East. To the Young Turks and the Egyptian Nationalists even the distant Buddhist Japanese is in some new sense a brother. He had suffered with them under the secular contempt of West for East; he has broken, as they hope to break, the ban which doomed all Orientals to stagnation and an eventual conquest. But this link is specially close between Mohammedan peoples. One cannot take up an Egyptian newspaper without being struck by the fact that it has lately acquired a correspondent in Calcutta, who keeps it informed of the new ferment in India, and side by side with his letter the chances are that there will be an article on the latest phase of the Persian situation. The Anglo-Russian Note, one may safely predict, will interest no people more keenly than the Egyptians. They will draw the moral with an irritating absence of subtlety. If a Parliament is good for Persia, why not for Egypt? If the least advanced, the least virile, the least Westernised of the more cultured peoples of the East, can work the machinery of a Constitution, why should Egypt be unripe—Egypt, which was the first of Eastern lands to imitate the West, Egypt, which has mixed intimately for three generations with Europeans, and enjoyed for a quarter of a century the advantage of British nursing?

At the door of the Prophet's tomb in Medina a sentence was spoken last week amid the applause of pashas and pilgrims, which even the "Times" felt to be significant. "Allah," declared the orator, "would not permit the railway to reach the Holy Cities before the Sultan had granted a Constitution." It was a clever conceit, the sort of sentence which men repeat to each other in the shady booths of lazy Eastern bazaars for many a month afterwards. We wonder whether the "Times" realised that the Ali Kamel who uttered it is the younger brother of the late Mustapha Kamel, the founder of the Egyptian Nationalist Party? It requires little imagination to foresee how such a theme will be embroidered in Nationalist articles and orations. Turks and Persians have won Parliaments. But that is only half the miracle. Great Britain smiles on their achievements and powerfully helps to consolidate them. But it declines to grant a Parliament to Egypt. We may think this mental process elementary. That is precisely why it will appeal to the masses of Cairo. A politician in London may invent half a dozen reasons which, in his opinion, render the parallel inapplicable. He may say that the gross oppression in Turkey and Persia made an argument for heroic experiments, which is wanting in Egypt, where the material lot of the people has been well and honestly cared for. He may add, and with truth, that the Egyptians are less manly than the Turks, less intellectual than the Persians. He may argue that our occupation has begun a certain slow evolution, which cannot be interrupted simply because something irrelevant has happened in Monastir or Tabriz. But in the end it is the large and simple ideas which matter in history. A broad generalisation doomed Asia to perpetual despotism. A broad generalisation will as surely alter the entire status of the Oriental in his own thoughts first, and a little later in ours. The emancipation of the West Indian slaves ended by liberating the whole negro race. The first Reform Bill set going a process which can end only in adult suffrage. It will not be otherwise in the East. Even China has come this week into line with the native despotisms in process of transformation. It is incredible that a bureaucratic Egypt and India should survive for many years beside a free Turkey, a Parliamentary Persia, a Constitutional China.

The real obstacle to the emancipation of Egypt is not any defect in the character or intellect of the Egyptians, though we readily admit that they develop no leaders comparable to Mr. Gokhale, and no mass instinct for moderation and dignity such as the Young Turks have displayed. The same thing could be said of several free peoples in Europe. The real obstacle is the hold which European finance has obtained in the country. It is a repetition of the Transvaal situation, with a significant difference. The Uitlanders in Mr. Kruger's Republic owned most of the wealth and directed all the commerce of the Transvaal, but they also formed a large proportion, some said a majority, of the male population. In Egypt, on the other hand, though capital and trade are mainly European, the Europeans numbered in the census of 1897 only 113,000 persons in a population of 9,733,000. The Capitalists of the Rand were content to ask for a franchise which would include the Uitlanders, because they believed (erroneously, as it has turned out) that they could control the legislature by their weight of numbers. But the foreign capitalists in Egypt are under no such illusions. They know that even if a scheme could be devised which would admit them, without surrendering their nationality, to a share in controlling Egyptian legislation, their votes would be utterly swamped by the native poll. They rarely become permanent residents, rarely settle as families with roots in the land, never blend with the native population, rarely acquire more than a sort of kitchen-Arabic, and do not affect an Egyptian patriotism. But they none the less resist any measure of self-government, because they believe that their financial interests are more carefully and efficiently supervised by a foreign bureaucracy, than they would be by a native Parliament. In some degree they are wise. It is not probable that a native Parliament would sanction such concessions of landed estates as Sir Ernest Cassel obtained, or tolerate the exploitation of native children for fifteen hours a day in ginning-mills owned by Europeans. Of all the forms in which money gains an ascendancy over men, this resistance to a Parliamentary régime by a colony of foreign financiers is perhaps one of the least defensible. No one who has followed the more recent phases of the Egyptian controversy will, we think, dispute this diagnosis. It will not be forgotten that Lord Cromer proposed the creation of a legislative council elected by the foreign colony in Egypt, as an alternative to the dreams of the Nationalists.

Yet the Egyptians show no tendency to antagonise foreign financial interests. Their movement has no economic basis. They are an agricultural people, and they hardly seem to realise the power of the business element in the two great cities. They are struggling mainly for a sentiment, for the recognition of their nationality. They rarely talk of finance, and indeed the Copts are the only native Egyptians who understand it. Like the Boers, the Moslem Egyptians stand aloof from the restless and mysterious life of the Stock Exchange. Apart from the vague desire to seem to be their own masters, they have two definite objects. The first is to control education, which in our hands has been completely de-nationalised. The second is to secure for natives a larger proportion of official posts. In this programme there is nothing which need menace the interests of foreign finance. Moreover, the foreign colony is adequately protected. The Capitulations too often shield even its criminals from justice; the Mixed Courts safeguard its interests in civil suits. Nor have even the extremer Nationalists refused to compromise. They are quite prepared to accept the continuance of our financial control. Given these limits, it is hard to see what injury a Parliament could inflict, even if it were ill-disposed, upon European finance.

It is clear that our Government will not oppose a mere negative to Egyptian claims. As Sir Edward Grey feels his feet, he undoubtedly becomes more and more sensible of the part which Liberalism has to play in foreign policy. The present intention is to offer provincial councils, with limited powers. The objection to that course is that the Egyptians are not interested in provincial councils. The grant of these bodies will no more satisfy them than County Councils satisfied the Irish Home Rulers. A stage has been reached at which the English bureaucracy, having done much for Egypt, has ceased to extend the range of its power for good. It does not teach, nor will the Egyptians learn. It can doubtless continue to do its valuable and important, but external, work in irrigation and finance, and in lightening the economic burden of the peasantry. But neither in ten nor in twenty years of the present régime are the Egyptians likely to grow riper for self-government. More angry, more violent, more intent on the bare thought of asserting themselves, they certainly will grow. But fruitful thinking demands leisure from agitation, as sagacity in action demands responsibility. To refuse a Parliament much longer must injure the Egyptians, as surely as it will mar our own reputation for consistent liberalism in the East.

THE CRISIS IN THE COTTON TRADE.

A TRADE depression, such as we are now encountering, with its dismally familiar phenomena of falling prices, glutted markets, slack employment, is certain to produce a crop of conflicts between capital and labor. Though the highly-organised condition of the Lancashire cotton industry, with its representative machinery for adjusting the relations of employer and employed, reduces friction to a minimum, it cannot bridge those deeper antagonisms of interest and policy which are liable to show themselves at turns of the industrial tide. From the end of last century up to a few months ago the cotton trade has experienced a tolerably continuous era of profitable expansion, enormous profits have been earned, and a series of advances of wages, accompanied by full employment, has raised the economic condition of the workers to a higher level than they ever reached before.

During the period of general commercial success cotton stood out conspicuous. Attracted by the prospect of high dividends, capital streamed in, new companies sprang up, a multitude of new mills were hastily equipped and began to operate, with the inevitable result. The new supply of producing power was not adjusted to any reasonable estimates of the future probability of markets, and, when the check in general trade carried with it a falling demand for yarn and for manufactured cotton goods, the slump of prices brought matters quickly to a head. Low prices and reduced sales have, of course, cut down the margin of profits, and it is probably the case that a number of highly-capitalised businesses are moving towards an unremunerative level. Now, though the wage arrangements in the cotton trade are not formally based on the acceptance of any sliding-scale, by which wages should automatically rise and fall either with selling prices or with profits, it is evident that wages must have some relation to the profitable condition of the trade. The wage-earners cannot expect to get as much in bad times as in good. This is not denied, we take it, by the men. But when the employers insist that the present state of the trade involves and justifies an immediate reduction of piece wages, the men demur. They urge several points. In the first place, though current business may be largely done upon an unprofitable basis, the large reserves accumulated during a period of bounding prosperity enable high dividends to continue to be paid. So long as this accumulation from good times lasts, labor not unreasonably claims that it should be applied in maintaining wages as well as in maintaining interest. Such a doctrine is, of course, alien to the capitalist standpoint, but this only serves to illustrate the conflict of interest between capital and labor. That the maintenance of the current standard of wages is the first charge upon the available resources of a business is the underlying economic principle of trade unionism. In a word, it is contended that the temporary fall in the margin of profits does not require or justify a reduction of piece-wages. To the employers' general contention that, since the workers shared the gain of a period of prosperity, they must expect to share the losses of a period of adversity, they reply that they have already suffered loss by working short time. It is reckoned, we believe, that the recent adoption of short time in the spinning and carding rooms engaged upon American cotton has meant a reduction of not less than £30,000 a week in wages.

Though it cannot doubtless be maintained that piece wages can be indefinitely retained at their highest level, irrespective of selling prices or of the margin of profit, especially in a trade exposed to foreign competition, there is much to be said not merely from the standpoint of the immediate monetary interests of the operatives, but from the wider economic standpoint, in resisting as long as possible the demand for wage-reductions. If reduced wages enable cotton-mills to keep in full working, which would otherwise close or work short time, the further congestion of the market, the falling prices and profits, and the demand for further wage-reduction, are inevitable. Whether the glut is attributable to a fall-off of demand or a redundancy of supply. the only direct remedy is a check upon production, and since the organisation of the cotton industry enables this to be achieved by a system of short time instead of by wholesale unemployment, it is surely best to utilise this method, rather than to endeavour to maintain a larger volume of output by cutting down the labor cost of production. For though, no doubt in theory, a fall in cost of production, enabling a living profit to be earned at lower selling prices, should stimulate consumption, and so maintain a larger volume of employment, it is seldom found to operate thus in the midst of a general trade depression. For the interests of labor the application of the policy that wages must follow prices has proved most disastrous, and we look with considerable trepidation to the effect of a series of reductions in other trades, such as Lord James authorised a few days ago in the mining industry. Wherever it is possible, the substitution of short time for reductions of wages is preferable, not merely in the interests of the workers immediately concerned, but as a means of checking a precipitate fall of prices, and of enabling demand to catch up supply, and so to re-establish a firmer state of markets. Though a trade union may not be wise to carry its habit of resisting wage-reductions to extremities which involve a prolonged strike, with its attendant waste and misery, the clinging of the workers to each rise of wages and of standard of comfort that they have been able to obtain is upon the whole a sound and a socially serviceable instinct. For if the workers easily permitted wages to be cut down whenever trade was bad and prices low, trade would become worse and wages lower, because the reduction of the purchasing power of the wage-earners, who form the vast majority of the nation, would be followed by a further decline of consumption of commodities. Prices would then fall still lower, and a further demand for wage reduction would be enforced, establishing a circular movement as "vicious" in its concrete effects on trade as in the logic it involves.

The cotton operatives, then, in our judgment, are right to press forward short-time as an alternative to lower wages. It seems no doubt absurd and even wicked that expensive machinery and skilled labor should be kept half idle at a time when there are still millions of people without a decent shirt to their backs. But to attempt to work fully this machinery of production when markets are already filled with unsaleable goods, and when the unshirted have no means of buying shirts, is a still worse absurdity. Of two absurdities it is best to choose the lesser. While, therefore, it may become impossible, as the operatives themselves recognise, to resist the demand for a reduction of wage, if the softening of the market still continues, it is their duty, and is we think the public interest, to place every peaceful obstacle in the way of the application of so hazardous an expedient.

Life and Letters.

THE TEACHING OF TOLSTOY.

There is no great cause for wondering at the action of the Holy Synod in anathematising the celebration of Tolstoy's eightieth birthday. The organisers of the religion of pity cast out the most merciful man of the eighteenth century; it is only a little more surprising that Russian orthodoxy should reject the great Christian of the twentieth. "You are right, St. Sulpice," ran an epigram of Paris a few hours after Voltaire's old bones had been hurried out of the city in the dark: "Why bury him? You can refuse a tomb, but not an altar." Since Voltaire, no great figure of literature has dominated his time so completely as Tolstoy, or has led its thought farther away from the paths to which its authorised instructors would confine it. No one can say that religion is not the end and aim of all his teaching. Few will deny that he is essentially Christian. Yet he has expressly joined to his condemnation of modern politics, society, art, and science, a repudiation of the customary teaching of the Eastern and Western Churches as repugnant to the plain doctrine of Christ. Rationalist and anti-mystic, this Grand Heretic of our times has contrived to set against him the whole hierarchy of Scribes and Pharisees on which our faith and culture rest. Probably if he had desired to found a new church, or a new political society, Tolstoy could have set up the most imposing organisation of his day. But he has chosen to criticise the institutions that exist, and to point to their conductors a more excellent way. Thus, from Yásnaya Polyána, as from Ferney, has proceeded a voice of unequalled penetration and power, expounding, denouncing, satirising, preaching, covering the entire range of modern religion, philosophy, government, industry, letters, and artistic production. And thus this great critic, being also the most gifted art worker of his day, writing the best modern novels, the best short stories, the best essay on the theory of art, the best descriptions of war, the best political and social reflections, having an almost equal faculty for affecting men's reasons and touching their emotions, and being all the while passionately in earnest about them, and zealous for the welfare of their souls and bodies, while he possesses a style so simple and unaffected that wayfaring men, though fools, cannot miss his meaning, has come to be the supremely representative person of his age. It is doubtful whether the Russian Revolution would have occurred if Tolstoy had not lived. His death may powerfully affect the issue between the people of Russia and their rulers.

Yet there is probably no kind of influence which Tolstoy would less care to own than that of a leader or inspirer of revolutions. Political forms have never concerned him overmuch, nor does he believe in any change in them in which violence is the main factor. His interest, like that of all religious teachers, is with the affections and wills of mankind. Thus his indictment both of orthodox theology and of orthodox science rests mainly on their common neglect of the true end of existence, the attainment of that state of common goodwill and affection in which alone the happiness of the individual and of the community consists. He has judged all institutions by the simple test: Do they make men love each other more or less? Do they unite them, or do they thrust them asunder? It is in this search for unity in modern life, and for the simplicity of habit which alone can make it possible, that Tolstoy reaches out after the most vital desire of our age. It is the aim, more or less conscious, of the best literature of the last century, of Wordsworth, Hugo, Ruskin, Dickens, Arnold. But none of these writers have given it such religious expression, or have brought to its pursuit so rich a personal experience, so profound and comprehensive a study of contemporary thought, and so impressive a judgment and gift of generalisation. What has not Tolstoy been, what has he not read? His personal life, in its earlier phases, may seem, like the life of many a saint, a rude preparation for the prophetic eagerness and concentration of its later years. Somehow out of the wild, quarrelsome boy, soldier, adventurer, gambler, sportsman, man about town, fashionable novelist and country gentleman, grew the author of "Resurrection" and "What is Religion?"* And from the incessant student, who in a single tract epitomises the whole theory of æsthetics in classical and modern literature, was evolved the perfectly trained artist, who in fifty volumes has hardly written a line too much. It is when we remember that this exuberant force of artistry has been freely given, literally as well as spiritually, to mankind for its soul's good, that we feel of him, as we feel of Ruskin, that he indemnifies the world for the countless meannesses of the literary life.

Tolstoy is, indeed, no "literary man." His judgment of the literary class, even of its greatest exemplars, like Dante and Shakespeare, has always been severe. Hating ornament, æstheticism, poetry, the complications and delicacies of art, and being himself, par ex- cellence, poet, artist, and decorator of life, his later theories have forced him to condemn much of his own work, which did not seem to him to stand his stern appeal to the common feeling and understanding of the people. And yet it is hard to say that he is essentially wrong. Who can wish to see the idea of "literature for literature's sake" work such havoc with the art of writing as the same notion has worked in modern painting? To Tolstoy the limitation of the appeal of literature to small, fastidious circles has seemed to carry with it a final degradation of its purpose and method. He would like to see literature at the service of all—simple, clear, didactic, like the parables or the old-folk stories. To him, sensitive as he is to form, and studious of proportion in artistic work, to write without moral intention seems as bad as to write without feeling. It is this conception that informs all his work, his earlier as well as his later. And it is the quality which gives it its peculiar power of awaking emotion. Through him the man of our times, in spite of all his social divisions, of the materialism with which his whole life seems bound up, begins to feel the desire to be at one with his kind; through him the unworldly message and personality of Jesus revive again, bringing trouble to the intellect but peace to the heart. Thus his writings are, and must be, a ferment in society. They make men discontented with themselves, eager, as in the early Christian days, to solve the contradiction between their ideals and their physical impulses, their supposed social necessities and the longing to tear them asunder and find new motives and sanctions for living. Here arises the ground of Tolstoy's quarrel with science and with the Churches. Both, he thinks, give an unpractical answer to the question: What is life and what should we live for? Science contents itself with observing the laws which fulfil themselves unconsciously in a man's body, and are most remote from his needs; the Churches point him to an existence "immortal, innocent, and idle," far from the life of labor and suffering of which alone he has any idea. Thus Tolstoy brings us to common sense, to practical action here and now, as the door through which man, losing himself, is to find himself, and forgetting his craving for individual happiness, may enter a continuing society equipped for Eternal Life.

* For further and very interesting light on Tolstoy's personality and early life read Mr. Aylmer Maude's "The Life of Tolstoy: First Fifty Years." Published on Thursday by Messrs. Constable (10s. 6d. net).

It is this new birth of the soul, this capital event in the life of man, with which all Tolstoy's literary conceptions are concerned. Levin and Nehludoff aspire to it; Anna misses it as she falls under the wheels of the railway train; Ivan Ilyitch catches a glimpse of it in his last hour of mortal pain and fear; simple souls, like the servant in "Master and Man," are never far from it and the kingdom of which it is the door; even in the brothel Maslova has not lost the key to it. All Tolstoy's innumerable pictures of modern existence, all his denunciations of war, luxury, over-eating, of kings, governments, politicians, judges, officials, decadent artists and literary men, his harsh classification and cold derision of our philosophies and belles lettres, his tender parables, his unsparing self-confessions, are part of his plea for a new manhood, treading underfoot the fears and claims of its animal nature, living for affection and for brotherliness. No wonder that he stirs the world, that he makes it think that religion can become alive again. And no wonder that it finds in this fearless and loveable man at once the most disturbing and the most consoling of its teachers.

FIFTY YEARS OF EVOLUTION.

The most significant character in Mr. Francis Darwin's presidential address to the British Association last week lay in its illustration of a treatment of evolutionary doctrine which is nothing less than a reversal of that employed by its earlier exponents. When Charles Darwin, by the publication of his "Origin of Species," provided the rising scientists of his age with a clear general conception of organic evolution, driven home by a vast array of inductive evidence, its first effect was to fortify the philosophy of mechanical determinism by which Herbert Spencer and others were laboring to explain the universe through an extension of physical formulae. Research into origins naturally impels towards attempts to explain the later in terms of the earlier, the higher in terms of the lower. To explain man, as animal, by linking him historically with lower animals, to build a more or less continuous bridge along which the lowest organic forms were seen passing towards higher and more complex forms, to resolve the nature of these organic forms and their modes of advance into mechanical operations of matter and energy moving along lines of least resistance, to summarise the entire process from the orderly movements of the stars to the most delicate adjustments of human conduct in terms of molecular economy, all this was an intellectual necessity of the age. It was the endeavour of a scientific instrument, made for purely materialistic purposes, for mechanical measurements, to take account of phenomena where psychical differences came in. The higher the order of organic life to which such treatment was applied, the more futile, or, at least, inadequate, it proved to be. The crowning futility was reached by Herbert Spencer's attempt to build a theory of ethical progress upon a play of feelings, which, in the last resort, are the puppets of physical forces moving by mechanical necessity.

Our leading scientific men to-day have mostly abandoned this attempt to use Darwinism, or any other evolutionary doctrine, as a philosophy of nature or of life. For the most part they admit that science must confine herself to quantitative analysis, using for her tools assumptions and hypotheses which are only applicable for such purposes, and the absolute validity of which lies outside her consideration. They confess that while she can describe the processes of inorganic and organic phenomena, she cannot explain them as a completely intelligible system. This recognition of the necessary limits of physical explanation is, no doubt, largely responsible for the growing tendency, particularly among biologists, to reverse the entire method and to apply concepts and formulae derived from the study of higher phenomena to the study of the lower. Thus Mr. Francis Darwin, in his fascinating survey of a large department of organic science, brings to his assistance, for interpreting the actions of plants and lowest animal forms, such terms as "habit" and "memory," taken directly from psychology. When he imputes to plants or worms changes of structure and behaviour which he is driven to explain in such psychical terms, it is not particularly important to decide whether this use implies some sort of consciousness in them, or whether he is forcing an extension of the meaning of "habit" and "memory," or is using the language of "mere metaphor." The point is that he finds it convenient, and even necessary, to work downwards instead of upwards by the application of analogies which involve psychical or quasi-psychical interpretations of phenomena commonly classed as physical, instead of following the older method.

Readers of his paper will generally agree that he justifies this method. It is difficult to deny something akin to memory to the stentor. "If a fine jet of water is directed against the disc of the creature, it contracts 'like a flash' into its tube. In about half a minute it expands again, and the cilia resume their activity. Now we cause the current to act again on the disc. This time the stentor does not contract, which proves that the animal has been in some way changed by the first stimulus." Here is a capacity for learning and for adjusting future conduct to what is learnt. The physical structure of the creature has been altered by its first experience, so it "reacts" differently against the second. It is hard to deny that here is "physical memory," or to refuse to recognise that our conscious memory also implies a similar physical apparatus of change. Or, again, take the force of habit in plant life. "If a sleeping plant is placed in a dark room after it has gone to sleep at night, it will be found next day in the light position, and will again assume the nocturnal position as evening comes on. We have, in fact, what seems to be a habit built by the alternative of day and night." Such conduct, less "reasonable," less economical, than that of the Stentor, nevertheless involves a curious capacity for acquiring habit, by association of stimuli, which is, after all, nothing else than the physical equivalent for the association of ideas in human memory. That a whole rising school of botanists and biologists should have selected the term "race memory" as most suitable to describe the modus operandi of specific development is exceedingly instructive.

Mr. Darwin's main theme was, indeed, nothing else than an exposition of the utility of this application. When an organism is subjected to an outer stimulus there occurs, not only an immediate reaction on its part, but, in many, probably all, cases, some morphological change which registers the stimulus and its first reaction. This register forms a latent memory in the sense of a capacity of regulating future action by past experience. Whether the effects of such stimuli through memory and habit are confined to the individual organism, or can also be transmitted to offspring is a question into which it is impossible for us to enter, though it involves very important consequences in the theory of organic progress. Spectators who have watched the heated controversy that has waged so long round Weismann's doctrine of "the continuity of the germ-plasm," with its implication of the non-inheritance of acquired characters, are relieved to recognise distinct signs of compromise. The preposterous claims of absolute immutability and immobility made for the germ-plasm by its earlier prophets have been so greatly modified as to give reasonable hopes for a restatement of the relations between the soma and the germ-plasm which shall enable each new generation to reap at least some of the fruit of ancestral experience. If Mr. Darwin's interesting speculation of an elaborate system of nervous telegraphy, communicating every physical excitation from one part of the organism to all other parts, including the germ-plasm, should be verified, we seem well upon the way to a consistent view of something more than the mere mechanics of organic development in the individual and the species. For the practice of summoning the concepts of the higher sciences to help in interpreting the lower, based, as it is, upon the underlying and supreme hypothesis of the unity of nature, will certainly be carried further, with the result of a continually closer co-ordination of spiritual with mechanical interpretation. It is primâ facie unlikely that the logical requirement of continuity will allow Mr. Darwin, or any other scientist, to insist upon the purely physical character of the "memories" and "habits" he imputes to plants. Indeed, Mr. Darwin is absolutely open-minded upon this, as upon so many other matters. "It is," he admits, "impossible to know whether or not plants are conscious; but it is consistent with the doctrine of continuity that in all living things there is something psychic, and, if we accept this point of view, we must believe that in plants there exists a faint copy of what we know as consciousness in ourselves."

Hardly less significant as a recognition of the inadequacy of the older evolutionary method is the frank avowal by Dr. Haldane of the failure of the physico-chemical explanation of life to exorcise "the spectre of vitalism." Physics and chemistry between them have failed to cope with physiological phenomena, because their methods are mechanical, and there is something in all life, even the lowest, which baffles mechanical analysis. Though Dr. Haldane does not throw much light upon the new intellectual organon that is required, he incidentally discloses the nature of the most fundamental defect in the evolutionary doctrine regarded as an "explanation." The whole apparatus of stimulation and reaction, memory and habit, natural selection, transmission by heredity, which evolutionary science sets up, consists of instruments for manipulating, economising, and converting into growth and progress a flow of what used to be termed "vital energy." It is not merely the question, for ignoring which Charles Darwin has been so often criticised, how the "variations" which are the condition and material for natural selection are brought about, but the further question of conceiving the creative or productive flow of energy which pulses through the whole organic (and inorganic) process. One does not explain the part played by the Nile in the economy of Egypt by the most accurate account of the construction and working of water-gates, dams, canals, and other irrigation works, if one neglects to explain the rise and flow of the Nile itself. It is the dim perception that physiology has been trying to do something like this that underlies the demands of the "vitalists." But it is a criticism applicable not to physiology alone, but to the whole trend of evolution in the hands of science. When Lamarck's conception of organic changes, as wrought by the pressure of a fund of desire or will enabling animals to adapt their structure to the satisfaction of their needs, collapsed before the rise of Darwinism, nothing was put in its place. Darwinism did not substitute any new conception of a fund of evolutionary progress, it merely sought to explain better than Lamarck how such a fund would be utilised by Nature. The anima in animate Nature is still commonly ignored. This remained possible, nay, almost inevitable, so long as a purely mechanical conception of causation was applied, for such conception only admits the registration of results and not the direct realisation of efficient causes. It is a significant advance in scientific method to recognise, so clearly as do Mr. Darwin and Dr. Haldane, that the mechanical treatment requires to be fortified by a more truly "vital" method, and by hypotheses which transcend the realm of chemistry and physics. Though it may not be possible for a biologist, as such, to "put salt upon the tail of the vital principle," the growing tendency of these scientific thinkers to employ concepts derived from the higher processes of conscious life to give meaning to the current of evolution marks a distinct advance towards a natural philosophy, in which the course of development from simpler to more complex, nay, from "dead" to living matter, and from "mere" life to consciousness in its highest degree, shall be envisaged as a continuous transformation of a flow of universal energy, the dual character of which, physical and psychical, shall constitute the final working hypothesis of science.

THE PASSING OF THE HORSE.

It was at a Berkshire fair last Saturday, and the merry-go-rounds whirled full blast. There they went, those gallant steeds, black, white, or brown to choice; all with four legs and fearless eyes and crimson nostrils; all made to pitch up and down like a boat in a head wind, irresistible to any child of mettle, while steam urged their wild career to an orchestral setting of "Bonnie Dundee," the tune to which real soldiers do their Military Ride. But that night the saddles were all empty, and in the place of honor at the very summit of the fair was seen another show. It was a merry-go-round, to be sure, but instead of childhood's horses, a series of motor cars in little went plunging over hill and dale as at a Manx competition, and the village crowd, eager to taste the joys of riches at a penny, stood in long rows awaiting their turn. Lamps blazed, the motors flew, and a steam orchestra blared out the Hallelujah Chorus.

In that dim village scene was symbolised the completion of an era, the close of a long stage in man's rough journey upon creation's road. It was the passing of the horse that was signified, the death and burial of man's antediluvian friend. There he still stood, beautiful as of old, decorated with mane and tail, his coat glossy, his neck clothed with thunder; patient, too, a creature of regular—nay, of cast-iron—habits, always ready to tread the daily round; a better Conservative than the squire himself, esteeming the doing of a thing once to be quite a sufficient reason for doing it again, whether it were shying at a white post or stopping at the public's door; always with one eye turned to his distant stall like the needle to the pole; true as a lark to the kindred points of stable and home; an imprisoned spirit, an Ariel with hoofs for hands and feet, an angel to whom only the Greeks gave wings, a messenger harnessed to the chariot of the sun, and equally serviceable in a hansom. There he stood, brave as of old, and wistfully enduring; but no one considered him now, for his day was done.

His day is done, and Mr. Basil Tozer has written his obituary notice. It is called "The Horse in History" (Methuen), and displays something of the confusion and mournful repetition of a lamentation. We should suppose Mr. Tozer to be more at home in the paddock than the lecture room; at all events, for the sake of his pocket we hope so, and when he tells us that the Bug flows into the Caspian, or speaks of "Virgil's famous Georgics," or says Bucephalus ought properly to be spelt Bucephalos, we should prefer to ask him the odds. But what a spacious and fascinating theme he has chosen an epitaph! He might have extended it beyond the limits of historic man, for we vaguely remember how a course of Huxley's lectures on the horse was suddenly checked by the discovery of remote remains of horses in Mexico no bigger than foxes; and we more clearly remember the discovery of the fossilised missing link between a horse and a bear, though the unlearned mind would expect more links than one—as many missing links as between a gentleman and a road hog. But long before the verbal record of man begins, the anthropoid conceived the notion of moving from place to place by clinging to a horse's back and using his own prehensile tail as a girth to keep him steady. His seat was further assisted by the hairiness of horses in days when they were the natural companions of furry mammoths, and even Herodotus mentions horses north of the Danube with coats five fingers long, so that they must have been shaggier than bears, and both easy and comfortable to ride by grip. So early did the servitude of the horse begin, nor, indeed, can we suppose that so generous and defenceless a creature would, apart from man's protection, have survived the winged and plashing dragons which at that time enjoyed the earth's productive surface.

By the date of Job the horse was commonly used as an engine of war, and has been so used ever since, though it is doubtful how far he really enjoys the battle, or says among the trumpets, "Ha, ha." Mr. Thomas Hardy had better reason on his side when he proposed that at the point of danger in an engagement the horses, as innocent beings, should be left behind, or conducted out of harm's way. The ancient Egyptians were condemned for trusting too much to cavalry, and we know from Miriam that the horse and his rider were thrown into the Red Sea with the rest of Pharaoh's host. But in Homeric times riding was no longer fashionable, and in war the horses were used only for chariots. Horse racing with chariots was also popular on off-days in the siege of Troy, and the betting ran to biggish stakes—a cooking pot, a tripod, a horse and cart, or a girl; the last three being counted as about equal in value. Some riders still rode by voice and knee without bit or bridle; some used a halter only. But the Greeks had already forced the bit between the horse's lips, though we do not hear that they kept the lips sore, as is now the habit in parts of the Near East, so as to increase the control. Horse-cloths were early employed for comfort, as the horse began to lose his fur, and Alexander used one; but the Athenians of the Parthenon rode bareback, and saddle and stirrups, we believe, did not appear till after the Christian era. Horsemen mounted by leaping on with a pole, or making the horse crouch like an elephant, or standing upon a slave's back. We gather, too, from one of Mr. Tozer's pictures, that riders mounted like sailors, indifferently on the starboard side of the horse or on the port—a rare though useful accomplishment now. In Greece the horse was always the evidence of riches, and their quickest drain; and, in spite of motors, the tradition of his respectability still lingers in our remoter counties, where, if you even walk in riding breeches, you will see all the peasants touch their hats to you. Nor can we deny to the ancients a personal affection for their horses, when we remember the knightly kindliness of Xenophon in his treatise on riding, or how Caligula caused his horse to be elected consul, and the Emperor Verus fed his upon almonds and raisins.

Color always played much part in the destiny of this curious animal. The Greeks preferred a bright chestnut (not a dun, as Mr. Tozer thinks), but their expression of color was a little vague, being almost limited to bright and dark, so that they would call a man, or even a woman, the same color as a horse. Black is a natural color for highwaymen and the thundercloud of chargers, and why the Scots Dragoon Guards choose the dappled grey of Dobbin we do not know. Piebald was much affected in ancient times for its distinction, and, we suppose, because piebald horses are difficult to steal. That reason made them popular in the Boer War whenever patriotic auxiliaries were in the neighbourhood. The circus maintains an old tradition, for the horses of William the Conqueror's cavalry were brilliantly particolored, those that were not Prussian blue all over frequently having the near legs yellow and the off legs crimson, as may be seen on the Bayeux tapestry to this day. White was the choice of heroes who wished to be conspicuous on the field, like Castor and Pollux, who could die only on alternate days. But in modern warfare that heroic desire is fading away, and in South Africa there was a large demand for Condy's Fluid, which turns a white horse to khaki. The present writer once rode a horse that had to be kept with his off-side always towards the enemy, because the Fluid had run short and the near side was left as white as a sepulchre.

It is grievous to think that all this is over now. We cannot lament that the Calvary of the cab horse (as Mr. Cunninghame Graham has called it) should end, and hoofs no longer beat the rhyme to wheels. But with the horse there passes away a peculiar race of man— a centaur breed, such as no motor can beget. Cabmen, 'busmen, stable-boys, grooms, coachmen, whips, jockeys, trainers, and the Horse Guards Blue—all will follow their long-nosed friend into the abysm of time. We regret them all, but the horse himself we most regret. He was so stoical, so Tory, so refined and good to eat. What will a starving siege do without him now? What will the makers of Chevril do, and the cats, and the poor? When he is gone, who shall tell of horses that champed the golden corn, of the snow-white steeds the Dioscuri rode, of bright Æthon, horse of Pallas, that bedewed the earth with big tears at his young master's funeral, of the Cid's horse Cid, of Richard's Roan Barbary, of Warwick's Black Saladin, of Mary's Black Agnes, of Turpin's Black Bess, of Rinaldo's Bajardo, of the Bayard's Carmen, of the happy white horse that carried Joan, the flower of chivalry, of sad Rosinante that bore chivalry's bones, of Napoleon's Marengo, of Wellington's Copenhagen, of the nursery rocking-horse, and the Wooden Horse of Troy? The whole dear race will soon be gone—gone with Flying Childers, the fastest horse that ever lived, and with Eclipse, the greatest of sires, at whose birth the sun and moon were troubled in their courses—gone with Gladiateur, and Blue Gown, and Blair Athol and Hermit, and Ormonde, and Persimmon and Flying Fox—gone with the winners of yester year. In a touch of irresistible pathos, Mr. Tozer tells us the demand for oats has fallen by more than twenty per cent., and there were 12,000 fewer horses in the kingdom last year than the year before.

The age of mechanism and peace is before us. Already we foresee the day when the last living soldier will take the field upon the last living horse, while nursemaids and grooms are sighing and sobbing around. We foresee the day when tagging writers will say, "extinct as the horse," instead of "extinct as the ——" Oh, we know what the creatures say now, and we will not couple our last farewell to our Arab steed with the similitude of a waddling, wingless bird! Already we foresee the day when the white horse that Death rides in the Revelation alone will survive, and if at last we behold him, he will be something of a curiosity.

LITTLE LIVING CREATURES.

The Ancient Mariner cried out as he told of the water-snakes:—

> "O happy living things! no tongue
> Their beauty might declare."

"Happy living things" always seems to be the exact phrase to describe the little creatures, "les bestioles," as the French call them, the little animated particles of light and color, of sound and motion in which the joy of living is so perfectly expressed. A bluebottle is, no doubt, a "bestiole," or a mosquito. A thousand and one other undesirable things may lay claim to the name, but the kindly diminutive seems better kept for such creatures as the lizard, the cicada, the firefly, the glow-worm, the butterfly, the dragon-fly, and the ladybird.

These all seem to belong to a pagan, pantheist Nature, a world self-sufficient, self-existent, eternal, to be the momentary flashing into consciousness of its unconscious delight in itself. They are the joyous, untiring worshippers of the sun, the true and only Divinity of Paganism in all its forms, and of all Pagan men and things.

> "For summer is the sovereign good
> Of all the creatures of the wood."

"Le bon Dieu—c'est le soleil," exclaims a fat Frenchman in the train. Who does not know in travelling south the delight of hearing the first cicada, the note of a world becoming more living and sufficing, a world that as one moves southward seems always more natura rather than creatura, φύσις rather than κτίσις? In the true south the whole plain is filled with their voices, it becomes alive with their song, one multitudinous strident hymn to Pan and to Apollo. The league-long leaps of one of these astonishing creatures are each a salto mortale, a leap "out of France into Spain" of folk-tales and nursery rhymes. In them all the vitality and activity of Nature, the soul of the summer and the south, is made audible and visible.

The lizard is another pagan. It is again a sign of the South to see this happy little being flicker over the hot stones for the first time. Dante with his keen eyes must have often watched him, and so amid the countless images of the Divine Comedy, he makes mention of—

> "il ramorro, sotto la gran fersa
> Ne' di canicular cangiando siepe
> Folgore par, se la via attraversa."
> (Inf. xxv. 79-81.)

"He seems a flash of lightning" in his fiery swiftness. In temples like Paestum and Segeste, by waveless seas and under violet skies, amid dark groves of cypresses, in nooks and crannies of the marble porticoes and courts, the lizard must long ago have found him a house. It is good to think on a November London day of his swift flicker over the broad white temple steps. The king of the little living creatures is, no doubt, the dragonfly. He is a creature of the air, not like the cicada or the lizard, of the earth. His flight expresses the very ecstasy of motion—he darts as a swallow darts. It has again and again fallen to the lot of the writer of these lines to be taken captive, like the Ancient Mariner, by the beauty of these "happy living things." In the wonderful year 1893 from February to October, day succeeded day of pure, white sunshine. All through that gorgeous summer he took a five-mile walk, two or three times a week, in a remote North-country district. For about three miles the road skirted a park wall. One day in mid July he found this wall alive with dragonflies. It was a revel of motion and of color, "blue, glossy green, and velvet black," three miles long.

Again, he remembers as a very little child, standing one bright autumn morning amid tall asparagus ferns, which were dotted all over with scarlet ladybirds. "Ladybird" is, of course, "our Lady's bird." It is a touching evidence of the faith of the Middle Ages that the simple people found even for these creatures Christian names. In Germany the ladybird is the "Maricukäfer," the "Mary-fly." In France it is the "bête du bon Dieu," the "bestiole," the "little living creature" of "the good Jesus," the kind God.

About the glow-worm there is a quaint charm. The most poetic light, more than moonlight, starlight, firelight, candlelight, is surely the light of glow-worms. It seems to belong to the far North, to the "high latitudes" of Jean Paul's country parson. One thinks of the tiny lamps of the glow-worms lighted up the livelong summer night in Swedish pine woods, and by the roadside, and in faëry meadows of far Northern lands. The writer again remembers one hot July evening, when the air was heavy with a coming storm, strolling out of his country cottage, and finding the long grass of the roadside, still uncut, lit up here and there by the strange, soft shining of clusters and constellations of these elfin lamps. In Germany the glowworm is called "Johanniswürmchen," "St. John's little worm," and in spite of its Christian seeming the name suggests that the grass was lit up with glow-worms as with candles, when the great fires of the old sun-worship were kindled all over Europe on Midsummer night.

The butterfly is called "God's flame" by the spiritually-minded people who speak Celtic tongues. To our duller minds this flying flower may seem only to express a sensuous delight in the moment, the joy of life in the sunshine. The dispute between Christianity and Paganism is at the bottom of many questions, and it remains the great intellectual interest of the world. There is a quaint medieval poem called "The Dispute Between the Lady Venus and the Virgin Mary." The "little living creatures" might seem to belong wholly to the pagan world of the ancient gods, but by innumerable voices of popular language and tradition Christianity has laid claim even to these. Once more, the writer remembers as a child going into the garden one sunny Michaelmas Day, and seeing a great clump of Michaelmas daisies covered with a swarm of fluttering red admiral butterflies, "in a wonderful order"—"miro ordine," as the Collect says. To this day he never thinks of Michaelmas without a mental picture of a flowering mass of purple autumn daisies, and above their golden hearts a flutter of "wings full of eyes," like those of the seraphim. As that fair sight is blended with all the associations of the day, he finds a hint of a possible reconciliation of the two great sides of the human mind.

Present-Day Problems.

A NEW FORCE IN AGRICULTURE.

Few men in these islands, as his address to the British Association last week proved once more, speak with a higher authority on rural economics than Sir Horace Plunkett. In politics he has never been a conspicuous success. He has pleased no party in Ireland. But in agriculture he has been a pioneer in a large and serious movement, whose influence is only just beginning to be felt. He has studied farmers' questions at first hand, with an alert and inquiring mind, and under a wide variety of conditions, for the past five-and-twenty years; and in Ireland, as the working head of the Department of Agriculture and as the prime worker in the campaign for the better organisation of the farmer's business, he has turned theory into practice with much success. The pamphlet which he has just published on "The New Development in Agricultural Co-operation" would deserve attention, therefore, on the sole ground that it is his work. It deserves it still more as a memorandum of admirable vigour and lucidity. But, above all things, it should be read and pondered because of its subject-matter, because it deals with one of the fundamentals of national existence. The case for agricultural co-operation has yet to be made plain to the English and Scottish consciousness. Twenty years of propaganda have familiarised Irishmen with its principles and their application. But in England and Scotland, where the rural mind is, perhaps, less malleable and where the associative instinct is certainly weaker, the movement has made comparatively little headway, and its necessity, if country life is to be rehabilitated, if small holders are to rise above the mean, struggling isolation of the old days into the ordered unity and the economic independence of a better time, is not yet perceived. We are busying ourselves about the superstructure before we have made sure of the foundations.

The revolution wrought in manufactures by machinery and the factory system is no greater, but is infinitely better understood, than the revolution which in the last half-century has overtaken agriculture. Competition is no longer local but world-wide. To eat in one hemisphere what has been grown in another is an occurrence so familiar as to have lost all significance. Vast tracts of virgin soil have been opened up in the uttermost parts of the earth, and their products, thanks to incredible improvements in preservation and carriage, are brought to our swollen and hungry towns at regular intervals, in fresh condition, and of fairly uniform quality. On the Continent the new conditions have been met by a free and intelligent use of co-operation. The farmers have banded themselves together for the purchase of all the raw materials of their industry at the lowest cost and of the best quality. They are thus enabled to produce more abundantly and more cheaply. They have combined for the improvement of all classes of live stock and for the manufacture or curing of nearly all agricultural products. They have organised themselves for the purpose of ensuring their animals at the lowest rates and of creating, by mutual support, the credit required to bring in a large and constant flow of capital. Above all, co-operation, besides increasing the volume and lowering the cost of production, has made it possible for them to control the whole process of modern marketing—to collect, for instance, in bulk, to regularise and standardise their consignments, and to forward them at a minimum cost of transit and distribution. The Danes, by these methods and no others, have formed themselves into a national, pliant, and cohesive trust that covers every side of the farming industry. In Great Britain—though less so in Ireland than in either England or Scotland—the average farmer still sticks to the ancient ways, mostly remains an isolated unit, still prefers to pay the highest prices for his seeds, manures, and machinery, and still persuades himself that he is better off as an unattached individual, without capital or credit, at the mercy of the railways and the middlemen, than as a member of a powerful co-operative organisation.

But it is not only in its financial aspects, as a means of adding to the agriculturist's revenue and increasing its stability, that co-operation has justified itself. Farming is more than an industry: it is a life, and the social qualities of confidence and helpfulness fostered by co-operation, the thorough business training it affords, and its varied and often unexpected results in enlarging the farmer's horizon, providing him with new interests, penetrating his social life and reorganising the scheme of rural existence upon brighter, more wholesome, and more democratic lines, altogether outweigh, from the standpoint of national well-being, its benefits to agriculture as a business. This has been especially noticeable in Ireland, where nearly 1,000 agricultural co-operative societies, comprising all but 100,000 members, with an annual turnover of some £2,000,000, are in existence. Their material value has been very great: but greater still has been their effect in strengthening character, in conquering the farmer's distrust of himself and his neighbours, and in mitigating the fury of social, sectarian, and political strife. In England and Scotland the movement is of later birth and considerably less advanced, but in both countries Agricultural Organisation Societies are slowly carrying the gospel of rural salvation, and in England the Government has subsidised the work in connection with the Small Holdings Act. The stubborn individualism of the Scottish and English character, a system of rural education that has to do with everything but rural interests, the hostility of the trading interests, who dread the appearance of co-operative stores in the villages, and cannot see that whatever increases the farmer's power of production must also increase his power of consumption, and the fact that we are still governed by an industrial, city-bred legislature, are all tremendous obstacles. But they are obstacles which are steadily yielding, and which must in the end give way before the gathering concentration of interest upon the problem of rural life.

The "new development" to which Sir Horace Plunkett's pamphlet is devoted is the unification for certain common purposes of the co-operative movements in England, Scotland, and Ireland. While maintaining complete internal independence, the three Organisation Societies are henceforward to be associated "for mutual consultation in matters relating to organisation and united action in matters relating to trade." Three objects, it is hoped, will be secured thereby. First, the organisation of farmers will be brought to a higher level of business efficiency by the exchange of experiences between the three Organisation Societies—an exchange in which Ireland will play the unwonted rôle of a predominant partner. Secondly, the co-operative agricultural trade will be developed by joint action between the organised farmers of the three countries. That is to say, in the purchase of supplies, the organised farmers of each country will obtain the best terms prevailing in any, and will be put on an equality of advantage in the marketing of produce and the interchange of such commodities as seeds, forage, and, possibly, live stock. Thirdly, regarding the agricultural interest as a whole, the new machinery which is to be established for the above purposes will be used, as opportunity presents itself, for advancing and protecting the interests of the agricultural classes in relation to government. These are ambitious objects, but it is not premature to strive for them, and their attainment would transform the possibilities of British agriculture and of British rural life. The farmers of the three countries have a common fiscal and transit system and a common market. The home demand far exceeds the capacity of the home supply. As against the foreign importer their interests, therefore, are at one, and without the spread of the principle of co-operation till it embraces every village and can be worked throughout the entire kingdom from a single centre and on uniform and harmonious lines, those interests cannot be safeguarded.

The Drama.

MR. BARRIE'S FAILURE.

I DO not counsel an intelligent playgoer, with a reasonably cheerful view of the future of the English theatre, to see Mr. Barrie's new play, "What Every Woman Knows," after reading what the dramatic critics have to say about it. If he does, I am afraid he will come to a conclusion equally unfavourable to the piece and to the gentlemen who describe it. If "What Every Woman Knows" is good or interesting drama, as, with the exception of Mr. Baughan, most of these writers find it to be, we must set aside all that we have learned about the modern stage during the last half century, and try to revive the atmosphere and the attitude to life and literature that permitted us, or our fathers, to enjoy, let us say, the Robertsonian comedies. Mr. Barrie's play is not, indeed, as good as these works; for example, it is less human and much less witty than "Caste." But it is in the same vein of sentimental trifling; it is thoughtless and superficial, and is concerned, like them, with prettiness, with small jokes, with a kind of character-drawing that suits the insignificant and accustomed tricks of the experienced actor, while it makes no serious demand on his intellect or imagination. One is grieved to say and to think this of Mr. Barrie, who has a talent for fable, and can carry us with him on pleasant voyages through the quaintly illumined land of children's fancies. But it is necessary to say it, because if the author of "Peter Pan" and "The Admirable Crichton" can write such a play as "What Every Woman Knows," and can be applauded for writing it, it is clear that we in London are without a standard of dramatic production, that the laws of literary criticism are not applied to the theatre, and that the more promising of our writers for the stage can "break back" to sheer futility, and yet be free of the castigation they deserve. One feels that nothing ranks with us; we have the same vocabulary of vapid sweetness for Mr. Hall Caine as for Mr. Bernard Shaw; and the welter of the British drama goes on, undirected by a conscience or an aim.

If, therefore, I say that "What Every Woman Knows" is a worthless play, and that it would be described as worthless in every centre of European criticism but London, I am answered by the public, and the people who interpret for the public, that it is a brilliantly successful one. And why? Mainly, I imagine, because just as the leading character in the piece is supposed to enrich his speeches with certain gems of fancy called "Shandisms" (mercifully unrevealed to us), so "What Every Woman Knows" is believed to sparkle with "Barrieisms." One of them, I am afraid, is a bit of ancient tinsel which was a political joke twenty years ago when Mr. Gladstone introduced the Home Rule Bill. Another of them, which is the capital suggestion of the comedy, a piece of ore mined from the main reef of Mr. Barrie's fancy, is the discovery that what "every woman" really knows is that she was made, not from Adam's rib, but from his "funny bone." On this exquisite situation the curtain actually descends, to the unmixed delight of the audience, which was hardly less stirred by the decision of one of Mr. Barrie's Scottish characters to take his whisky not hot but "neat." When I further specify that Mr. John Shand, blazoned forth for us as a shining new member of Parliament and candidate for the Ministry, is advertised as bringing in a Bill to enable women to grow whiskers (he is a champion of the suffrage movement), my readers can imagine what kind of illuminating power, what measure of verbal dexterity, the author of "Peter Pan" has brought to a play which in form at least is a political comedy.

Now, this feebleness and maladroitness of Mr. Barrie do not arise from a bad choice of subject. The idea of a personality of the type of John Shand, whose career and character (so far as he has any character) form the play, is an interesting one. What is going to happen to a raw, half-trained Scottish lad, who has got into Parliament on the strength of his glibness and selfishness, backed by the hints of a clever, self-effacing woman who loves him? Well, nothing of any consequence happens to him. I suppose Mr. Barrie means to suggest some kind of personal force when, in the first Act, he shows Shand as a young railway porter "burgling" his well-to-do neighbour's house at night so that he may "cram" by stealth the books he is too poor to buy. But no force is developed. Shand proves to have a coarse appetite for success, which he coarsely gratifies. He has no ideas, no opinions, only an animal zest for pursuing what he calls "ma career." Then does Mr. Barrie, who may be held to have slightly caricatured, in Shand's loutish figure, the poor Scottish scholar and politician, mean, boldly and truthfully to describe the career of an egotist without principle or fine feeling, like the "hero" of "Bel Ami," or of "Les Affaires sont les Affaires"? No, he has no such purpose. Shand is so weak that he tumbles headlong into the net that a stupid, uninteresting woman half-unconsciously spreads for him. But perhaps Mr. Barrie means to illustrate the eternal tragedy of deep love abused and slighted. This, again, can hardly be the case, for the note of "What Every Woman Knows" is that of farcical comedy, and Shand's flirtation with Lady Sybil Lazenby is a mere card-castle, which a breath blows down. So empty is his life, so boorish is his character, that if any serious thought shapes itself from the sight of the odd gestures of Mr. Barrie's stage puppets, it is that no woman of Maggie's character would have stood him for six months, and that a girl of spirit would have turned him out of doors on the discovery that he was perfectly willing to mount to an under-secretaryship on her shoulders, and to traffic with her brains so long as her part in his speech-making was concealed or unguessed by his chief or his audiences. Maggie herself, indeed, approaches to a fine and durable conception of womanhood. But she is given no room to develop; and the grotesque arrangement under which she binds herself to Shand, degrades her, while it fits her into the make-believe household to which she belongs. She is something more than a theatrical property, and thus far she somewhat redeems the play. But the other characters are mere sawdust and wires. The Wylie family are "property" Scotchmen, with "property" accents and "property" jokes about whisky, and thrift, and best chairs in best parlors, and all the rest of it.

If, therefore, a London audience is pleased with such a play, if it applauds meritless work from an author who has taught it to expect from him the none too common gifts of fancy and grace and sweetness of temperament, it is because unreality is so woven into the texture of our national thought that the most serious problems can be raised on the stage, trifled with, garnished with old jests and raddled situations, and yet no shock is experienced, no sense of dissatisfaction expressed. For example, it is suggested that John Shand is an Independent Member of Parliament; certainly he comes from the people, and their trust in him is indicated in a vigorous election scene, with plenty of pantomimic cheering and enthusiasm. Here is good, fairly fresh material for almost any kind of play except the type of fitful, farcical comedy which Mr. Barrie has actually chosen. There lies the essential trouble of modern England. Instead of playing on ideas and movements, our writers play with them. Everything goes in to the great amusement-mill—thought, love, passion, despair, folly, cruelty—and comes out ground into flavorless dust. The nation seems incapable of seriousness, its artists, for the most part, averse from taking trouble to make it think or feel, or even laugh at itself, sure that they can realise ample wealth and notoriety and favor without attempting so arduous and thankless an enterprise. But the country suffers from this faithlessness, and so does the stage. What is the use of wasting competent and ambitious artists like Mr. du Maurier, Mr. Gwenn, Miss Trevelyan, and Miss Lillah McCarthy on the kind of part that Mr. Barrie's pretty or featureless inventions provide? I see none; and now and then it seemed to me that these ladies and gentlemen were of the same opinion.

H. W. M.

Communications.

THE SOUTH AMERICAN NAVAL ARMAMENTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—More than a year ago the Government of Brazil placed orders in England for the construction of three extremely powerful ships of an improved "Dreadnought" type. The construction of two of them is far advanced. But even these will not be ready for commission till 1911.

Besides these battleships orders have been placed for a number of lighter craft, and there is a permanent commission of Brazilian naval officers in England, superintending the execution of all these orders.

There was lately an attempt made to cause a scare on the subject of the Brazilian "Dreadnoughts." The scaremongers started more than one theory. The most alarming story was that the big ships were really being built for Germany, and that when they were ready they would be suddenly sold to the Kaiser, and thus upset all our arrangements for building a due proportion of battleships to meet the German Leviathans. A still wilder story was that they were meant for Japan, which can build its battleships much more cheaply at home, and has no money to waste on costly orders to British yards. The German story was only second in absurdity to the Japanese rumour. For Germany is building homogeneous squadrons on lines of her own, and her Admiralty would not spoil its well-considered plans by scheming to build abroad ships that are not of the same type as those laid down in her dockyards, and are designed to carry guns of calibres not represented in her Navy.

Now there is an attempt to work up another scare. The Congress of Argentina has voted eleven millions for a programme of armaments, which includes the construction of three "Dreadnoughts." And at once we have alarming explanations provided for us by newspapers of such divergent views on other matters as, for instance, the "Daily Mail" and the "Daily Chronicle." The vote is described as "Argentina's reply to Brazil." We are told that the two Republics are quarrelling over Uruguay, and going to pit their new ships against each other. One would think that "Dreadnoughts" could be built as quickly as aeroplanes. Whatever questions are at issue between Brazil and Argentina will be settled long before the first of the three Brazilian battleships hoists her flag. If it were really a race for armaments for an impending war, Argentina would be left so hopelessly behind by starting more than a year after Brazil that the "reply" would be a foolish waste of money.

But then the authors of the earlier scare take up the running. They point to the danger of some foreign Power, probably their favorite bogey Germany, buying now, not three, but six, "Dreadnoughts." History will repeat itself, they say. Just as after the settlement of the Andes boundary dispute between Argentina and Chili the two Powers agreed to a mutual reduction of armaments, and Chili sold two battleships to England, and Argentina handed over the two armoured cruisers built by Ansaldo to Japan, so Brazil will patch up the dispute with Argentina, and the six "Dreadnoughts" will be in the market.

It is forgotten that both Argentina and Chili lost money over the sale of their ships, and Brazil and Argentina are not likely to indulge in speculative "Dreadnought" building for the sake of Germany or any other Power, with the prospect of loss, and the certainty that there will be no gain worth talking of. The theory is all the more absurd considering that both Brazil and Argentina have their own scares about the German fleet. The sale of the ships, after the settlement of the Andes question, by our King's arbitration, was really forced on by Chili. The chiefs of the Chilian Navy were anxious to keep the two battleships, that now figure in our own Navy List as the "Belleisle" and "Superb." But they were outvoted by the stronger party in the Republic that held that railways and internal development were a better investment at the time than battleships. Admiral Simpson and his colleagues gave way on the understanding that the naval programme was only deferred for a few years, and mutual disarmament for a period of time, that has now elapsed, was made part of the treaty It is because the disarmament clause is no longer operative that Argentina has brought forward her programme of naval construction. Chili would have taken the same course a year ago only for the heavy losses caused by the Valparaiso earthquake.

The writer of this letter has been in touch with more than one of the South American Admiralties ,and has discussed questions of naval policy with officers of more than one South American navy. Without betraying any confidences, it may be stated that these naval armaments are neither part of a wild scheme for having "Dreadnoughts" to sell to Germany or any other foreign Power, nor are they a sign of impending hostilities between the Republics. On the contrary, there is an idea of mutual help and protection behind the naval programme, in which Brazil has taken the lead, Argentina has followed, and Chili and Peru will come into line before long. These are the four Republics that really count in South America. They are all committed to a policy of order within their borders, and peaceful settlement by arbitration of any disputes with each other. They realise that on these lines there is a prosperous future before them, and that disorder or war with their neighbours can only delay developments that mean steadily increasing prosperity.

But they also realise that the independence of a modern State with a long seaboard must be protected by the possession of a navy of an up-to-date type. They have no fear of either England or France, but there is an uneasy feeling about Germany as a new naval and colonising Power, and, though little is ever said on the subject, there is a lurking jealousy of the United States—a fear not so much of aggression as of patronising protection with dictation as its consequence. There was a curious indication of this in the case of Brazil. At one time it was proposed to include in the programme the building of a number of powerful submarines of the "Lake" type. The idea was afterwards abandoned, but while it was under consideration provisional arrangements were made with an English shipyard for the building of these American boats on this side of the Atlantic. "No South American orders will go to United States yards," said a prominent member of the Naval Commission.

None of the Republics can afford to build a huge battle fleet, but each of the four can build, as a beginning, a homogeneous squadron of the most powerful ships that naval designers and constructors can provide. The possession of these ships will be an assertion that each Republic means to police its own seas and coasts without foreign interference, and in case of aggression against any of them the local battle squadron may expect help from the sister Republics. The armaments of Brazil and Argentina, to be followed by corresponding steps on the part of Chili and Peru, are a sign that South America is no longer to be a continent of quarrelsome little States. For years there has been a process of internal consolidation going on in the four leading Republics. There is now a real feeling of solidarity between them. They are not arming against each other, but in the interests of each and all.

We shall not see the coming of the "United States of South America," but a tacit or a formal League of the South American Republics is a possibility of the near future.—Yours, &c.,

ONE WHO KNOWS.

September 8th, 1908.

Letters to the Editor.

"A SOUTH AMERICAN RULER."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your article under this heading has greatly surprised me, as it is so inconsistent with the high standard of fairness which your paper generally follows. In this instance you are both aggressive and unjust to General Castro and the Venezuelan Government. You do not only repeat the unfounded accusations which the Yellow Press of New York has brought forth against them, but go even beyond their unscrupulous assertions. You affirm that "he" (General Castro) "has laid every conceivable form of industrial enterprise under contribution for his own and his favourites' benefit," which I take as meaning that he appropriates the public revenues for himself and his favourites. The bitterest enemies of General Castro have never attacked his honor with such an unworthy insinuation, because his honesty has been so clearly demonstrated that it is generally recognised. Will the writer of this article give one instance, with any shadow of truth, of General Castro having appropriated any public money? As to the old assertions you mention, every one of them having been completely answered, I wish only to remind you that the Mixed Committee appointed to examine the claims against Venezuela, which amounted to £6,197,730, assessed them in £773,786, thus completely justifying General Castro for having refused to pay them without being legally adjudicated. The attempt to compel the Venezuelan Government to pay these claims without being properly assessed proved the absence of any commendable principle on the part of the aggressors, and caused the establishment, by the last Hague Conference, of the principle that force must not be used by States to collect contractual debts from other States until a Court of Arbitration may have found for the creditor, assessed the amount of the debt, and prescribed the time and manner of payment.

Now, as to the question with Holland, I am pleased to send you the following translation of the official communication of the Venezuelan Minister of Foreign Affairs, giving the reasons of his Government's action in this case:—

"Foreign Office, Caracas, July 20th, 1908.

"MOST EXCELLENT SIR,—The supreme Magistrate of the Republic, surprised by the terms of a letter addressed by the Most Excellent Sir M. J. H. de Reús to the Commercial Association 'Hou en Trouw,' dated at Caracas on the 9th of April of the present year, and published in the 'Fijdsscrift der Verenniging Hoú en Trouw,' No. 5 of Amsterdam, on May ultimo, under the motto 'Informatie-bureau,' has been under the necessity of declaring M. de Reús unfit to continue serving as the friendly medium in the relations which the Venezuelan Government cultivates with that of Your Excellency, and, consequently, he has instructed me to send to M. de Reús his passport in order that he may leave the country.

"This measure, imposed by the pressing duty of safeguarding the national decorum, only affects the person of M. de Reús in his relations with the Government of Venezuela, and it does not alter in the least manner the good intelligence that happily exists between the two countries, and which Venezuela wishes to maintain in the highest degree of cordiality, cultivating it with any other medium who may know how to appreciate this good will, and may use the appropriate means, as a messenger of friendship and harmony, for the attainment of the aspirations of the two countries.

"I have the honor to present to Your Excellency the testimony of my highest consideration.

"(Signed), J. de J. Paul,
"Minister of Foreign Affairs.

"To the Most Excellent Sir the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Kingdom of the Netherlands.
"The Hague."

I beg leave to offer to your consideration the following facts, published by an impartial judge, hoping they may change your opinion about General Castro and the Venezuelan Government:—(1) For seven years Venezuela has acted in all her activities with surprising energy and rapidity. (2) Public order, strongly established by President Castro's energy and conciliation, vanishes for ever all danger of revolution. (3) The construction of public works advances wonderfully in the interior of the country. (4) All the attention of the Government is chiefly concentrated on the construction of railways, ports, and buildings for public instruction. (5) The extension of the means of communication for transporting to the coast the products of the interior has been considerably developed. (6) The exports and imports increase year after year. (7) The international exchange is above par. (8) Venezuela appears to-day amongst the South American nations of importance and worthy of all consideration.

Any unbiassed man must admit to-day that General Castro is a ruler of liberal and progressive aims, an honest administrator, and a faithful guardian of the national honor. He may have enemies, as he is not amenable to speculators, who flout the laws and authorities of the country, and are the financiers of revolutions; but his fellow-countrymen, who know him well and appreciate his patriotism, courage, and abilities, are devoted to him, and so the greedy schemers cannot get rid of him.—Yours, &c.,

A. Aldana,
Consul of Venezuela.

Cardiff, September 9th, 1908.

[We are sorry if we have been unjust to President Castro. He has certainly done well for Venezuela. But the points of view of a Venezuelan and a non-Venezuelan, like those of the man in the motor car and the man outside, are somewhat different.—Ed., Nation.]

TAINE'S LETTERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—You excellent article on "The Despair of an Intellectual" might equally be headed "An Intellectual's Blunders." In the thirty-ninth year of the Third Republic it is amusing to find M. Taine writing, in May, 1871, "the Republic can be but a provisionary matter" (p. 54). On p. 56 I chanced to see my own name in a paragraph which is a tissue of errors. Mr. Stuart Mill, he says, "rather approved of our red Republicans"—"his niece has just been defending the Commune." Miss Helen Taylor was Mill's stepdaughter, not his niece, and her article on "Paris and France" in the "Fortnightly Review" (Vol. IX., p. 451) was certainly no defence of the Commune. "The most notable Communist here, Mr. Frederic Harrison," writes Taine from Oxford, June 1st, 1871, "sums up their principles by the sentence, 'Let capital be employed for the noblest objects.'" Now, in that year I was not in Oxford at all, and had no connection with Oxford, having ceased to be a Fellow, was married, and lived in London, working at the Bar

It will surprise people to hear that I am, or was, a Communist. I did write in May, 1871, an article in the "Fortnightly Review," Vol. IX., p. 557, on "The Revolution of the Commune." I opened it thus: "We deplore its blunders and abhor its crimes. Like every revolution, it has both. So far as it seeks a political solution of a social question, so far it is doomed to ultimate failure. It has a strong Communistic side; and Communism is incompatible with human nature." In the end I said the faith of the insurgents was "that capital and its holders must adapt themselves to nobler uses." I said the movement was a "tremendous yet wild veto on the absolute reign of capital."

But perhaps some of these absurdities are due to the translator, who talks of "the historicity of Taine's conceptions," who makes Taine speak of Henry Reeve as "his publisher," and calls the famous firm in Paternoster Row "Messrs. Longways" (sic).—Yours, &c.,

Frederic Harrison.

The Athenæum Club, Pall Mall, S.W.,
September 7th, 1908.

THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I add one to your correspondents' proposals. In addition to trenches across roads, imprisonment of motorists, and confiscation of cars of transgressors, I suggest:—

1. An annual Imperial tax, averaging £50 a year, graded, and greatly cheapened to professional motor users, such as medical men.
2. Power to the local authority responsible for the roads to erect toll bars at intervals of about five miles, and charge half-a-crown at each; the money to go to repair the roads, and save local rates.

Where high speed constitutes the fun of the thing, mere attempts to check it will never entirely succeed. The present, or as "Cassandra" truly prophesies, an increased, number of motors going at ten or a dozen miles an hour, or less, is an intolerable evil. If each motor makes dust for a little over four hundred yards, then four motors a mile will choke all the road all the time. Their number must be kept down. Where the rich are concerned, a small tax and low tolls are useless as deterrents. The tax proposed will not repay the public for the injury done them; and toll-bars are costly to maintain.—Yours, &c.,

John W. Graham.

Dalton Hall, Manchester,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The attitude and suggestions of some of your correspondents are somewhat puzzling to a mere outsider. For instance, the idea of unlimited speed upon an "open road." What is meant by an open road? The other day my boy and self were out cycling; there was but one house in a distance of over two miles. About twenty-five yards in front of us were two ladies, also cycling. A motor, going at, I am certain, over thirty miles an hour, passed us and the ladies, not slowing down in the least, and keeping the centre of a narrow country road. When I say that this was just previous to the recent rains, and upon an exceptionally dusty surface, I scarcely need add that we were nearly blinded, choked, and poisoned, as also must have been the ladies ahead, but — this was "an open road."

Another day I was riding in a district even more thinly peopled than the other, when rounding a bend I came into view of a motor descending a hill just in front of me at full speed. I had barely time to draw my horse close to the hedge when the thing rushed past, nearly touching me—a close shave—but, of course, it was "an open road."

Then I was both puzzled and amused at a report in a daily paper of an address delivered by Prince Francis of Teck at the dinner of the R.A.C., when the speaker commended the Chief Constable of Norfolk for his action in giving the members of the Norfolk Constabulary permission to "politely request the owners of automobiles to drive with consideration to other users of the road." This, I think, is very funny. Our roads are rendered unsafe, unhealthy, unusable by a few, and all that can be done for the many is to "politely request" the few to be considerate.—Yours, &c.,

ACTIVE RESISTER.

September 8th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—'Tis certainly amusing, but for the tragedy of it all, to read the multifarious appeals and suggestions appearing in your columns for proper regulation and control of the speed of motor cars. How, in the name of goodness, people with half an eye, as the saying is, did not see, when a blundering Unionist Government allowed anything faster than the pace of a good trotting (not racing) horse on public roads that incalculable trouble, discomfort, and danger would be the inevitable result, passes my comprehension. It is a law of nature, and we would never progress without it, that if a thing is to be done, the one who does it quickest "gets on top"; and, apart from the crazy fascination of the thing, we all know that "time is money." Given these two incentives, who can wonder, beginning, as it did, with the highest in the land, M.P.s, railway directors (who complain at the same time of railway income going down), and various other misguided "buddies" and bodies who career about on these devilish inventions, that our Government, and now the whole public, know not what is to be done?

It is impossible now, I fancy, ever to get back to what I held from the first were the only two ways to deal with this question of the "Lost Liberty of the Road." My first would have been as the Turks have done—not permit a single motor car running on ordinary roads to be made or to be brought into the country, or, alternatively, make it criminal for anyone to be found in possession of an engine-propelled vehicle for public roads capable of being driven at greater speed than ten miles an hour.

Are people aware that the safest place against accident to life or limb is in a railway train? Statistics have proved this fact up to the hilt—safer by far than going about outside of trains. The thing stands to reason—you are being taken care of by certificated, competent officials "all along the line." Take your conveyance "off the rails" and run it at railway speed on public roads, and the case is exactly reversed, both in danger to those inside as well as those not upon the vehicle. Anything may happen on a public road, and no two accidents are exactly alike, or owing to the same cause. It is an undoubted fact that very many of the motors which fly about in their abominable dust-raising, mud-splashing, "get-out-of-the road" fashion are in the hands of, and being steered by, irresponsible (sometimes drunken) donkeys, who selfishly think only of their own pleasure and convenience and a "fig" for those who seek not to, or cannot, use the roads otherwise than for what they were made and intended since the days of Adam. Many of our very judges and nearly all of our women folks seem to be the craziest over this motor mania. When will they be awakened to the risks they are running?—Yours, &c.,

JAS. B. SMITH, Kt.

Clifford Park, Stirling,
September 8th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your last issue you give what you are pleased to call "The latest list of the worst outrages by motors." Yet, so far as your description goes, there is no evidence whatever that any one of these sad tragedies was caused by any carelessness on the part of the driver; that there was in it any element which might fairly be described as outrageous; or that it might not equally well have been caused by slowly moving horsed traffic.

I have with my own eyes seen a young lady fall from a bicycle, run over by a dog-cart—which was not being driven fast—and killed on the spot. Had the dog-cart been a motor, this would, I suppose, have been a "motor outrage." As it was, a sensible coroner's jury realised that it was only a deplorable accident.

A few weeks ago I was called out to attend to a farm laborer who had been run over and badly mangled by his own cart. He died within a couple of hours. His horses had taken fright and bolted at the barking of a dog. What a treat for anti-motorists had the dog been a motor!

That the motor nuisance is a serious one, however, few people would, I fancy, attempt to deny. It seems to consist chiefly in—

1. Dust.
2. Noise.
3. Danger to other road-users.
4. Frightening of other road-users.

Of these (4) is, I think, a constantly diminishing inconvenience. Fewer people on hearing or seeing a motor spring into the ditch or fall off their bicycles than did so a year or two ago. Fewer horses become restive. Certainly I now cause much less alarm among horses with a motor car than I did with a bicycle when first I owned one in the year 1880.

3. As to actual danger, there is no doubt that the motor takes its toll of human life. So does the horse. An element of danger always will exist with either. With careful motor drivers, I believe it to be very small. Personally, I have seen very numerous accidents, fatal and otherwise, from horses, but as yet not one from a motor. Culpably careless drivers, however, do undoubtedly exist. Fining them is of little use. As a rule, they already fine themselves—often as much as £50 a year or more in their tyre bills by excessive speed round corners. What is wanted to keep them in check is conviction only for driving to the common danger, education of the police and magistrates as to what constitutes dangerous driving, and then imprisonment or temporary confiscation of the car on conviction.

2. The noise nuisance is now practically entirely caused by exhaust whistles or by motor cycles with open exhausts. Of these the former might be prohibited at night and the latter entirely.

1. Dust. A motor car at even a very reasonable pace will raise the dust, if there is any dust to raise. Dustless roads are the only possible remedy. Some recent experiments seem to indicate that dustless roads may perhaps be produced that will not be more expensive in the long run than ordinary macadam. On the other hand, if they become general, perhaps the farmer will complain that he is robbed of the "March dust," which, according to the old proverb, is "worth a guinea a peck" to him.

And, lastly, may I be allowed to say one word to some of your correspondents, who seem to think that the motor is exclusively the plaything of the wealthy?

In this town there are at present six motor cars. Of these two are owned by doctors, one by a solicitor, who has numerous professional engagements some ten miles off in a town practically inaccessible by rail, and one by an auctioneer and property agent, who uses it exclusively for business purposes. Motoring as an amusement will probably fall out of fashion, like bicycling. For business purposes its use is rapidly increasing, and it is well to remember that the business or professional man's car is the servant not only of the man who uses it, but of the whole community.—Yours, &c.,

H. REYNOLDS BROWN, M.D.

Fairlie, Maldon, Essex,
September 8th, 1908.

[Our correspondent makes a very good case for the motorist, but he begs the question when he says that there is no evidence in any one of the cases of death and injury which were specified last week that they could not have been caused by some slowly moving form of traffic. What of the drunken conductor? In other cases fright—one of the causes of danger from motors which he specifies—appears to have been the cause of accident. We did not allege specific blame on the part of the driver of each motor. That would clearly be unfair.—ED., NATION.]

WOMEN MUNICIPAL VOTERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have noticed that opponents to Women's Suffrage always deduce from the results of municipal elections, one of two reasons for denying women the Parliamentary vote. Either they should be denied it because they have not used the vote they already possess in municipal elections, or they must be denied it because they have, "by large majorities, voted for the Tory and Moderate candidates" in municipal elections.

Your correspondent of the 22nd inst. uses the latter, putting aside the fact that the ballot at elections is secret, and that there is, therefore, no means of telling in what way a certain section of the community have voted. These two arguments are utterly worthless. If certain women are too self-centred and too careless of the welfare of their town to use their municipal vote, they are not likely to record their opinions in a Parliamentary election, and the fact that they possess the right to do so will not affect the affairs of the nation in the slightest. If the second argument is true, then it shows that women as a whole realise the importance of a vote, and the franchise must not be denied them on the score of disinterestedness in political affairs.

In conclusion, I trust your correspondent will forgive me if I point out that, whereas he promised to say a few words on "Votes for Women" in connection with the result of the Haggerston by-election, he has, in reality, done nothing of the sort.

Instead of telling us why the Suffragettes are not justified in claiming the defeat of the Government nominee as due to their efforts, he contents himself with asking one question and telling us how Mrs. Pankhurst failed to answer a second which was put to her by an elector in his hearing.—Yours, &c.,

J. Smith.

17, Bouverie Street, London, E.C.,
August 28th, 1908.

ENGLAND AND GERMANY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—There is no doubt that both in England and in Germany there is a general fear of war between the two countries. Such a war might arise merely out of the prevalence of this fear, or it might come because Germany has designs that cannot be accomplished peacefully. The enemies of Germany say that she has such designs, that she wants our Empire and our trade. We may assume, with the friends of Germany, that the Germans are not fools; and therefore we may ask whether she would get our Empire and our trade if she beat us. She is supposed to want our Empire so that she may fill it with Germans. Therefore her chief wants must be Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa. Now, even supposing she gained a complete victory over us, she could not conquer Canada. She would have to fight the United States for it, and she would have to fight them in Canada. But could she conquer the other Colonies? Would she have any chance of conquering them? We might sign them away to her under pressure of famine, but they would certainly resist desperately. I do not pretend to know how many troops Germany would need to conquer them, but the South African war proves that she would need at least a million. Now, assuming that she had transported a million troops over all those thousand miles of sea, what would happen in Europe while they were fighting the British Colonies in a long and wasteful guerilla war? Would France be so grateful for the destruction of her friend and her best customer that she would forget all about Alsace and Lorraine? And would the rest of Europe be so eager for German predominance as to sit still while the predominance was secured? The German Navy will certainly be much enfeebled with its contest with ours. The French Navy would be fresh and uninjured; and the sea for thousands of miles, for months, if not years, would be covered with German transports. If France declared war, the transports would be cleared from the sea, and a million German troops would be cut off from home in huge countries where the inhabitants would do their best to kill them all; and meanwhile French armies will be marching on Berlin. If the German Government has ever thought of conquering the British Empire, it must also have considered these obvious facts. And, unless it consists of fools or madmen, it cannot, therefore, harbour this design of conquest. But would Germany profit by destroying our trade? The war would cost her a large sum of money; and as the result of it she would lose the custom of one of her best customers, to whom at present she exports about £35,000,000 of goods every year. This would be a very substantial loss for a very shadowy chance of profit. And there is also the chance, too, that Germany would be beaten.

But the question still remains—Why does Germany go on increasing her fleet? Partly, of course, because she is afraid of a war with us, produced by irrational fears and animosities on both sides; but partly also because any country with a large and growing mercantile marine must have a large fleet, if her mercantile marine is to have any security when other countries are engaged in naval war. Every naval war proves that the combatants will not respect neutral rights except through fear. The Germans need a fleet, not so large as ours, but so large that, if we were at war with some other Power, we should not dare to do what we choose with German merchant ships for fear of having to fight the German fleet as well as that of the other Power.

Of course, the Germans are not innocent of blame in this matter. There are people in Germany, as here, who would like a war so as to read about it in the evening papers. There are others who think that a war is inevitable, and, therefore, would like to have done with it as soon as possible. The first kind cannot be appeased with argument. The second can. The aim of all who desire peace should be to prove that war is not inevitable, because neither country has aims that cannot be peacefully accomplished. Peace is not secure, but the best way to secure it is to get rid of irrational fears.—Yours, &c., A. Clutton Brock.

Farncombe, Godalming.
September 7th, 1908.

MISS BEALE AND WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In your interesting review of the recently published "Life of Dorothea Beale" there is one statement which might perhaps create some misunderstanding. Your reviewer states that there is in the book "no mention whatever of women's rights." The expression "women's rights" has happily fallen into disuse, but I should like to draw attention to the striking statements in the book as to Miss Beale's views on women's suffrage. She wrote to an old pupil: "Remember the real thing to aim at is the Suffrage. Without the vote you may cut off one evil to find it coming up again in a worse form, and often, but for the personal discipline, might as well be knocking your head against a stone wall."

Mrs. Raikes tells us that "once when a petition was put forward against the Suffrage for women, Miss Beale, who declined to sign it, said that one reason urged upon her for doing so, seemed so poor, namely, that the vote would impair the influence of women with men. . . . As time went on, this question of the vote for women seemed more and more important to Miss Beale. She became a Vice-President of the Central Society for Women's Suffrage, besides being a regular subscriber."—Yours, &c.,

(Mrs.) C. D. Rackham.

4, Grange Terrace, Cambridge,
September 7th, 1908.

Poetry.

STARLIGHT ON THE HILL.

From the world's petulant babble newly fled—
The faithless wail, th' unmeaning festival—
We climb where high the heavenly splendours call
Unto a wide land not inhabited:
There, where the unutterable things are said,
And from our feet the dizzy hollows fall
Like altar-stairs, with Aaron and with Paul
We stand betwixt the living and the dead.

Well-nigh persuaded that earth's night grows old
And the long vigil nears its final ward—
Sing to us, chorus of the prophet-souled,
Sing that our absent Sun shall be restored,
And even the meanest of his kind behold,
As in a glass, the glory of the Lord.

W. K. Fleming.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE want of some sort of a manual from which the beginner in fiction might learn the technique of his art forms the subject of an interesting article by Mr. A. Dunn in the current number of "The Westminster Review." The painter, the architect, or the musician, he observes, have their schools and conservatoires in abundance. "In the following of these arts and others, there exists a definite and assured method; the tyro starts on a firm basis and pursues his object, helped by a system which is precise and complete, and which, as the result of many generations of experience, has been proved to be right. . . . Not so with the student of fiction. Here one complains that the right road to travel has never been mapped out at all. True, books of instruction have been written, but these books, it cannot be denied, fall wholly short of their purpose. That they are, for the most part, verbose and long-winded matters little; what does matter is that they concern themselves almost entirely with what is to be achieved, and hardly ever with the manner of its achievement. The construction of the story, for instance, is rarely mentioned. That supreme difficulty which faces the novelist always, is discussed, when discussed at all, only in the vaguest and most uncertain fashion. There is no scheme of technique—as in the sister arts; no definite plan on which to work; hardly a hint anywhere to set the beginner fairly and squarely on his legs."

* * *

NONE of the three books mentioned in Mr. Dunn's article—Stevenson's "Essays in the Art of Writing," G. H. Lewes's "Principles of Success in Literature," and Sir Walter Besant's "Art of Fiction"—furnish the sort of guide he requires. Stevenson's book tells us much about the technical elements of style, but is certainly not intended as a handbook for the young novelist; Lewes wrote upon literature in general, and not upon fiction in particular; while Besant attempted to do too much in small compass, and discussed the value of literature and its future prospects, instead of confining himself to his subject. That the novelist's craft may be taught, just as the painter's or the musician's is taught, can hardly be denied, and it is equally certain that the general level of achievement in the art would be raised by the process. Flaubert taught it to Maupassant, and at the present moment several of the American Universities have courses in story-writing. Artistic worth is, of course, essential to the only kind of success which counts heavily; but we cannot help feeling that the mass of English fiction would not be so bad as it is if we had more books of the type of Mr. Hamilton's "Materials and Methods of Fiction"—a work introduced by Professor Brander Matthews, and recently published by the Baker & Taylor Company of New York. It discusses such subjects as the purpose of fiction, plot, characters, setting, the point of view in narrative, emphasis in narrative, and the factor of style, illustrations being drawn in each case from the writings of masters of the art. Apart from their value to intending novelists, books like Mr. Hamilton's may be of real service to literature, for if the patrons of circulating libraries could be induced to read them, they would soon become intolerant of the slipshod fiction with which we are deluged.

* * *

A MORE fitting editor for the "Selected Poems of William Barnes" than Mr. Thomas Hardy would be impossible to find, and the news that he has written an introduction and glossarial notes for the volume shortly to appear in the "Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry" will be welcomed by all lovers of English dialect verse. Barnes, the Dorsetshire Burns, the Wessex Theocritus—he has been given both titles—is one of the truest of English pastoral poets, and perhaps the only dialect poet who is now widely read. Unlike most poets who confined themselves to dialect, he was a great reader, and mastered most of the European tongues, as well as Hebrew, Hindustani, and Persian. Traces of the influence upon his verse of writers so far apart as Petrarch and the Persian poet, Sádi, have been noticed by several critics. Mr. Hardy has already pointed out that he did not even take all Dorsetshire for his province. He confined himself almost entirely to "the secluded vale of Blackmore, whose margin formed the horizon of his boyhood."

* * *

THE past season has been remarkable for the number of translations of French memoirs then issued, and a glance at the publishers' lists shows that they also form a large proportion of the books to be issued during the autumn. We have already given some particulars of one of the most interesting of these announcements, the "Memoirs of Mademoiselle George," which Mr. Eveleigh Nash will publish under the title "A Favourite of Napoleon." Another class of book which seems to be growing in favor is the biography of persons famous—or infamous—in French history. Two books of special promise which fall under this heading are also announced by Mr. Nash. "Rousseau and the Women He Loved," by Mr. Francis Gribble, treats of Rousseau's relations with Madame de Warens, Mlle. Suzanne Serre, Madame Dupin, and Madame d'Houdetot. By means of fresh material unearthed at the Archives of Savoy, Geneva, and Venice, Mr. Gribble is able to check, and in some cases correct, the account given of these episodes in the "Confessions." Rousseau has formed the theme of a crowd of books, but if the coming work proves to be "the most complete biography of Rousseau that has yet been published in any language," it is sure of a welcome.

* * *

THE other book is called "The Wife of Lafayette," and has been written by Mrs. MacDermot Crawford. Few women of the Revolution had better claims upon our admiration or possessed a more attractive personality than Madame de Lafayette. The granddaughter on her father's side of the Duc de Noailles, and on her mother's of the famous Chancellor d'Aguesseau, she encouraged her husband's Republican tendencies in the face of his and her own relatives. Her love for him, said Fox, was "seldom equalled, never excelled," and she never wavered in her adherence to the cause of freedom. During the Terror her mother, sister, and grandmother perished by the guillotine, and it was only the constant efforts of her friends and the repeated appeals of the American Ambassador that saved her from a like fate. The memoirs dealing with the later years of the French monarchy introduce us to so many women whose fame rests on their talent for extravagance and intrigue that we are apt to forget the existence of others of finer character.

* * *

WE much regret to observe an announcement in the current number of the "Albany Review" that its appearance, at all events in its present form and at its present price, is to cease. Both "The Albany" and its predecessor, the "Independent Review," have shown qualities of insight and freshness of ideas and interests which, in the not too exhilarating condition of English critical thought, promised well for their influence and standing. We are sorry that their very capable conductors have felt unable to continue their work.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Life of Tolstoy: First Fifty Years." By Aylmer Maude. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Chaucer and His England." By G. G. Coulton. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Phillips Brooks." By A. V. G. Allen. (Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d. net.)

"By Desert Ways to Baghdad." By Louisa Jebb. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

"All Things Considered." By G. K. Chesterton. (Methuen. 5s.)

"Sir Christopher Wren." By Lena Milman. (Duckworth. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Home Life in Italy." By Lina Duff Gordon. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

"The Life of Beethoven." By Alice M. Deihl. (Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Mirage." By E. Temple Thurston. (Methuen. 6s.)

"The Tramping Methodist." By Sheila Kaye-Smith. (Bell. 6s.)

"Le Sentiment de la Nature." Par M. Epuy. (Paris: Rudeval. 3fr. 50.)

"Après le Naturalisme, vers la doctrine littéraire nouvelle." Par G. Sauvebois. (Paris: L'Abbaye. 3fr. 50.)

"Les Cloches." Par L. Brethous-Lafargue. (Paris: Ollendroff. 3fr. 50.)

"Theodor Mommsen." Von L. M. Hartmann. (Gotha: Perthes. M.4.)

Reviews.

THE CHILD OF THE TEMPLE.*

Did the child, Louis XVII., pathetically famed throughout the world as the little Dauphin, die in June, 1795, a prisoner in the Tower of the Temple? If so, what were the circumstances, and what was the manner of his death? Was he, upon the hint or order of the Comité de Sûreté Générale, slowly got rid of by ill-usage and neglect? Was he murdered by Simon the cobbler, Robespierre instigating and arranging the crime? Or, finally, did certain friends of the poor innocent contrive his escape from the dungeon? These questions compose a problem that has mightily intrigued three generations of inquirers. We are ourselves of the opinion that the matter has been settled (as has also been settled, for all reasonable seekers, the mystery of the Iron Mask), but that it is not one to dogmatise upon.

Dogmatism is assuredly not the note of the patient and very intelligent investigation of Miss Welch, in which, with unflagging interest, we have step by step accompanied her. Miss Welch's conclusions are not ours, nor are they those of the Cambridge Modern History, but they continue to be held by many enthusiastic students of the case. We do not undervalue them.

Many enthusiastic students, we said. Yes, indeed: one wall of a modest library would scarce accommodate the wise and foolish works to which this puzzle has given rise. Hear Miss Welch:—

> "On the subject of this mystery more than a thousand books and pamphlets have been published, and to the solving of it scores of historians have given years of research. There have been and are still monthly magazines published on the question, and it may be said without any danger of contradiction that there are to-day alive many serious students who would give half their possessions to secure in exchange a definite proof of what happened to King Louis XVII."

From this digression we return to the points at issue. We ourselves are as sure as circumstantial evidence can make us that the child died in the Temple—died or was murdered there. Not a whit less tenacious is Miss Welch's belief that he escaped, though she adds, with a charming candour, that she has no idea what became of him afterwards. That a child some ten years of age did at the date indicated perish in the Temple, and that the body was immediately afterwards seen and examined and reported on by doctors, are facts not in dispute. But the official announcement of this death was never universally accepted. A suspicion almost at once arose that the child who had died or been done to death in the Temple was not, in truth, the King of France. Such a suspicion would, of course, give inspiration and a sheet anchor to adventurers. If the little Monarch had indeed been spirited out of his dungeon (and a substitute had died there in his place), where might he not be? Surely he would come sooner or later to claim his father's throne.

Accordingly, when Napoleon lies bound in his Atlantic isle, and the Bourbons have once more fastened upon France, there springs up a small host of deceivers, each of whom proclaims himself the long-lost Dauphin, and demands to be hoisted forthwith to the throne of his lamented father. And what a procession of them it is! History knows none other so grotesque. Forty of them, when the tale is told—forty of them exhibiting the blessed scars that spoke of Simon's sabots: they jostled one another in the capitals of Europe.

Here for an instant we pause to observe that in certain likenesses, and even identifications, which were loudly from time to time asserted, there was nothing so extraordinary. Strange, on the contrary, would it have been, when we recall the prowess of Louis the Well-Beloved in his Parc-aux-Cerfs, had not the celebrated Bourbon nose, during many years, flaunted itself considerably in France. Have not Claimants been "identified" since then? Is Orton forgotten?

But these forty pretenders to the Crown of France after the second Restoration—the artful squad of them extending from Paris to St. Pancras, London, and from London to a wigwam of Iroquois in America! What do we make of these dissemblers? Has any one of them a snip of evidence to produce? Is there one ghost among them that would obligingly ascend from the shades and submit himself for fifteen minutes in the witness-box to Sir Edward Carson or Mr. Rufus Isaacs? It is curious (or not) that sundry of the leading claimants were now and again in trouble with the police; it is not curious at all that most of them had originally escaped (like Falstaff) in a buck-basket, for of this story we know the source. Shall we take Hervegault to friend, who began in a tailor's shop at Saint Lô? Shall we risk anything on Mathurin Bruneau, the laborer's son, who had a difficulty in signing his royal name? Shall we put a trifle on Augustus Meves, Esquire, "of 35, University Street, St. Pancras, a gentleman of musical tastes in business on the London Stock Exchange," who "died suddenly in a cab" before it had completely occurred to him that he was King of France? Shall we plunge in the interests of Eleazar Williams, that soft-headed Chief of the Iroquois Indians, who had not a notion that he was Louis XVII. until the young Prince de Joinville (taking an unpardonable rise out of him) told him so "on a boat going from Buffalo to Green Bay"? Shall we play up on ex-Baron de Richemont, whose beginnings, known to nobody, are as mystic as a pyramid's? Shall we make a throw at last for the handsome and polished Naundorff, who had the misfortune to be detained on a charge of circulating false coin ("the sole indication," said someone, "of his august origin"), and whose grandson passes in France to-day under the humorous style of "Jean III."? Or, on the whole, are we here entangled and floundering in the dream of a midsummer night?

Miss Welch, it is unnecessary to say, stands by none of these beguilers. She discusses the case of Naundorff, as she is justified in doing; for Naundorff does seem to have given qualms to Louis XVIII., though we never could know why. He was "identified," it is true, by ancient Nurse Rambaud; but Madame de Rambaud, had she been nurse to the ten tribes, would readily afterwards have identified the lost one.

Miss Welch holds by the romantic tradition of the Dauphin's escape. It was a widespread tradition, and has persisted. Napoleon's Josephine (Napoleon, of course, being not yet upon the scene) has her part in it; and the Empress Eugénie is reported to have said that it was a belief in the Bonaparte family that the sympathetic creole had helped Barras to set the boy free. But for no story of escape is there any tittle of proof. One chance of freedom the Dauphin had, by the plot (before Marie Antoinette's execution) that failed through the cowardice of Lepitre. There seems after that to have been very little hope of the release of the child by stratagem. And tradition has played us such scurvy and foolish tricks. It was a tradition that Oliver Cromwell was the Man in the Iron Mask. It was another tradition that Molière was the Man. It was a tradition that Monmouth was never beheaded on Tower Hill. It is to this day a tradition in the West of Ireland that Mr. Parnell is lying hid among the Seven Bens of Connemara, awaiting heaven knows what call from Westminster or Erin. Tradition, like Habbakuk, is "capable de tout."

If the Little Dauphin escaped from the Temple, what became of him? No one has been able to tell us that.

But let us now see what excellent reasons the men of the Revolution had for ridding themselves of the pretty boy of whom the populace of Paris had made a little idol. To hale him to Tinville's bloody bar, and thence to the guillotine, they did not dare. None the less was it imperative to the safety of the new Republic that this child should, by some privy means, be disposed of, inasmuch as while he lived there was still a King in France. Says Miss Welch:—

> "This child, indeed, had become the bogey of all true Republicans. . . . Did one of their number show lessened enthusiasm for the cause—it must be because he was conspiring to put Louis XVII. on the throne. Louis XVII., a constant possibility, an unceasing danger, hung always over the Republic. Hardly a day passed that there was not heard some new and alarming rumour about the King whom Paris had dethroned but could not get rid of."

We, on our part, feel quite assured that Paris could, and did, get rid of him. Taken by force from his half-fainting mother on the night of July 3rd, 1793, he was given over to the mercies of Marat's friend, Simon, the elderly cobbler of the lank black hair and sooty skin, a butcher's son from the provinces. Mr. Moreton Macdonald explicitly states that Simon "received from the Comité de Sûreté Générale the assurance that the boy's death would be welcome to them." Of the manner in which Simon acted on this hint we are not ignorant. The radiant little boy was quickly reduced to a state approaching imbecility. By the way, if Royalists were planning his escape, in the interests of their own party, it is reasonable to suppose they would know something of his condition. Of what use to them, for any purpose of State, would have been a King whom Simon's brutality had rendered "almost witless"?

---

* "The Little Dauphin." By Catharine Welch. With Sixteen Illustrations. Methuen. 6s.

Simon resigned his charge in January, 1794. According to Mr. Moreton Macdonald (and he represents in this connection a long line of learned and careful historians), "active maltreatment now gave place to absolute neglect—neglect even of the barest necessities of cleanliness and decency" It is certain that the boy whom the Thermidorians found later "in a pestiferous cell" of the Temple was in the condition of a tortured animal, covered with sores, vermin, and the marks of blows and kicks, and half idiotic. To this there could be but one end, and it could not be long delayed. "The nursing of the dying child was neglected and every consideration denied. . . On the 10th of June the long sufferings were mercifully ended; the Dauphin passed away."

This is the view most widely accepted of the tragedy of the little Dauphin. It is sane and reasonable throughout. History not improperly says: "If you insist on it that the child escaped, you must bring me proof other than traditions of the country-side."

There is, however, another and a newer theory, as yet but little studied in this country or in France. In the space that remains to us we can but give a glance at it, logical and profoundly interesting as we have found it. In December of last year M. Joseph Turquan, an indefatigable student of the period of the Revolution, published a pamphlet entitled "Du Nouveau sur Louis XVII: Solution du Problème" (Paris: Emile-Paul). In this he builds a likely argument on the discovery in 1801, within the Temple precincts, of the skeleton of a well-grown child. This, says M. Turquan, is the skeleton of the Dauphin, murdered by Simon (at Robespierre's instigation) on the night that he and his wife quitted the Temple. In the instant of the assassination a child, procured from some Paris hospital, is smuggled in a basket into the Temple. This is a sickly little creature, who can be easily provided for in the manner in which baby farmers provide for undesired infants. It is this child who dies in the Temple in 1795, and whose death is officially given out as that of "the son of Capet," Louis XVII. We wish that we had space to detail M. Turquan's reasons, which are ingenious in the extreme, but at two francs his pamphlet will not be dear to any reader whom this drama of the Temple concerns.

If the child escaped, is it not wonderful that the contrivers of the escape (for unaided he could never have got out) left not a single line by which posterity might be satisfied? On the other side, we have striven to show what substantial reasons the Republic had for secretly destroying him—by Simon's rough hand or by the not less murderous process of ill-usage and neglect. By whatever paths we seek to trace the Little Dauphin's fate, wherever a signpost is found, it bears the same legend: Death.

ENGLISH OARSMANSHIP.*

When one takes up a new work on rowing, one wonders if there can be anything new to say about it. It is like reading the life of a man whose deeds or thoughts have been chronicled and criticised many times before. Yet as each new life which is published varies from its predecessors owing to the collection of fresh material or the suggestion of some new point of view, so each study of the principles and history of oarsmanship adds something to what has already been written. It is true that rowing as a science moves less with the times than most other sports. In the matter of method the oarsman is proudly conservative—the oarsman, at any rate, who represents orthodoxy (and heterodoxy in the rowing world is a plant of recent and as yet of diminutive growth)—and points, as with the pride of ancestry, to the principles of sixty years ago, boasting them, in the main, the principles of to-day. It might have been thought that an improvement in implements, in boats and rowlocks and oars, in this age of mechanical advance, would have revolutionised method. But the science of boat-building has stood still for more than half a century ,and no sufficient change has been made in oars or rowlocks to alter style or add appreciably to pace. One mechanical device alone—the sliding seat (invented in the seventies of last century)—has affected oarsmanship as a science, and this only to the extent of adding a new principle, the drive with the legs, to principles already existing. But, though rowing is so immutable in character, and though Mr. Lehmann is essentially a champion of orthodoxy, there is in "The Complete Oarsman" much that is fresh and nothing that, technically at any rate, is not interesting.

A book on oarsmanship is necessarily in part a history, in part a scientific treatise. Rowing can trace its origin to mythological times, and boatracing was probably the earliest sport that man indulged in. But how they rowed in a Greek trireme hardly matters to us to-day, and all the very early references to oarsmanship are too vague to be enlightening. Even when we come to comparatively modern times, to the race for Doggett's Coat and Badge, for instance, a trophy which has been competed for annually for nearly two hundred years, or, later still, to the early days of the Oxford and Cambridge Boat Race, which was instituted less than a century ago, the contemporary records are meagre in the extreme. It is, perhaps, a matter of regret that in those unenlightened times, when the halfpenny newspaper was unknown, men entered on sport in so simple a spirit, and in oarsmanship, at any rate, were content to row and not write about it. We could spare some of the effusions of modern strokes if we could obtain in their place some inkling of the views of those early heroes of the oar. In Mr. Lehmann's book there is nothing new either in his account of the origin of rowing or in his historical sketch of boatracing; but the old facts are well arranged and set down clearly and concisely. This part of the work is, at best, an excellent summary. What, then, one is tempted to ask, will the writer of some magnum opus on oarsmanship a hundred years hence find in these pages that is of more than ephemeral value or that has not already been recorded elsewhere?

It is from this standpoint, perhaps, that the book should be considered, and we shall attempt to take this larger view of it, dealing first with its use as a historical, afterwards as a theoretical treatise. To the future inquirer into the history of rowing, it should be interesting, firstly, for the accounts given by the author of certain famous races which he witnessed himself, and in most of which he was either coach of one of the crews or closely connected with its practice; secondly, for the entirely original matter contained in a chapter by Mr. W. H. Eyre on the training of crews in the early days of the Thames Rowing Club. Mr. Lehmann's experience in rowing matters covers a period of over thirty years, during the whole of which time he has been in close touch with Oxford and Cambridge and Leander crews. His accounts, not only of many famous races, but of the form and training of many famous crews, are, therefore, as permanently valuable as they are interesting. Mr. Eyre's chapter on the habits and doings of himself and his contemporaries in the days of their youth is the most entertaining in the book. It is the reproduction of a letter from Mr. Eyre to Mr. Lehmann, and is written, just as Mr. Eyre might speak, in a racy and colloquial style which is eloquently expressive. This story of a "Thames" training for Henley of forty years ago is a revelation to most of us to-day.

The keenness which induced the City clerk of that time to endure the rigours of such a training, to practise in the early hours of the morning before his work and again after it at dusk, to run countless miles at a still earlier or later hour in order to reduce his weight beyond all reason, and so forth, is, we sadly feel, a thing of the past in these days of golf and a more luxurious ideal. And we wonder if to the reader of a hundred years hence, if there be one, it will seem as Spartan as to us to-day.

The rest of the book is chiefly an exposition of the orthodox theory of oarsmanship. This is clearly and exhaustively treated, and these chapters should prove of great practical value to the man who is learning to row. They may also be of greater interest to the future inquirer into aquatic history than most of us at present imagine. There is no doubt that if Leander had not decisively beaten the Belgians at the recent Olympic Regatta a new and entirely revolutionary school of oarsmanship would have arisen in England. As it is, one prominent club has avowedly adopted the Belgian method, which, with all its good points, is essentially a short-stroke method, and there are some at least who consider that rowing, in the matter of style, is at a parting of the ways, and that before long new principles must be introduced. This, with Mr. Lehmann, we are disinclined to believe; but it is, at any rate, conceivable, some would say probable, that Mr. Lehmann's book may be the last to uphold unhesitatingly the method which has been referred to as orthodox—the method, that is to say, which was undisputed to within the last few years, and of which the veteran Leander crew at the Olympic Regatta were such admirable exponents. The future of style in rowing is a thing about which it would be unsafe to prophecy. The old school think that the style of the great Oxford crews of the nineties has been entirely vindicated by the recent defeat of the Belgians, but there is no doubt that this foreign eight did surprisingly well. In the two previous years it had won "the Grand" at Henley, and this year, if it had not been for certain champions of an elder generation who took infinite pains to get themselves fit and successfully vindicated the supremacy of this country, no combination of Oxford and Cambridge or any other English clubs would have stood much chance against the foreigners. In an interesting chapter on foreign styles, in which the principles laid down by foreign coaches are quoted, Mr. Lehmann tries to show that these principles vary little from our own. In actual fact, however, there is a cardinal difference between all foreign and English rowing. The foreigner swings short, the Englishman long. This long swing is natural to a science of oarsmanship that existed before the sliding seat was invented. In countries other than England scientific rowing only had its beginning after the sliding seat had come into general use, and in these countries slide has been invariably substituted for swing, not added to, as in England. It has still to be definitely proved, and we hope it may be, that the foreigners are wrong. In the meanwhile, English rowing is in a bad way, for there is a distinct tendency to shorten swing without emulation of the other good points which these Belgian crews undoubtedly possessed. This tendency, it is to be hoped, will be checked by the recent Leander victory.

* "The Complete Oarsman." By R. C. Lehmann. Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.

A review of Mr. Lehmann's book would hardly be complete without reference to two other chapters—one on sculling by that best of amateur scullers, Mr. F. S. Kelly, the other by Mr. R. B. Etherington-Smith on the physiological aspect of training. Mr. Kelly's chapter is admirably clear and accurate, and Mr. Etherington-Smith is in a unique position to deal capably, as he does, with his subject, for he is not only an experienced medical man, but one of the most prominent oarsmen in the country. It may be seen, therefore, that Mr. Lehmann's book is a complete and thorough study of oarsmanship At the moment it is the last word on its subject, and it is likely to remain so for some time to come, unless the advocates of Belgian style pure and simple meet with more success than seems at present probable.

DAVID CHRISTIE MURRAY.*

This handsome volume, entitled "Recollections," calls for candid treatment. Sent forth by a publisher after the death of its author, David Christie Murray, it has been received with rather exaggerated appreciation. Our daily newspapers are always quick to seize upon good stories as the basis of their reviews. In these cases reviewing there is none. Columns of quickly prepared and cheap "copy" leave the publisher little to sell when two or three newspapers have done their worst or their best with the various anecdotes in the volume. In the case of Murray's "Recollections," however, the grievance of the publisher has been small. Was it his sense of humor or a moral twist in his nature that led Murray to sell so many of these anecdotes twice over for book publication—once to Chatto & Windus, who published them in 1893 under the title of "The Making of a Novelist," and once to John Long, who gives them to the world as "Recollections," a dozen years later? Take an execution scene, which Mr. Murray described three times in all. Here are examples of two of these descriptions:—

Making of a Novelist, 1893.

"The hapless chaplain read the service. The bell boomed. Hughes came to the foot of the gallows, and I counted mechanically nineteen black steps, fresh tarred and sticky. 'I can't get up,' said the murderer. A genial warder clapped him on the shoulder . . . 'You'll get up right enough,' said the warder. He got up and they hanged him."

Recollections, 1908.

"The prison chaplain . . . walked in front of the prisoner reciting the 'Prayer for the Dead.' The poor condemned wretch . . . had nineteen creaking beech steps, newly tarred, to walk in reaching the scaffold. He turned to the warder and muttered, 'I can't get up,' but the latter slapped him on the back with the utmost bonhomie and said, 'You'll get up all right.' He did get up and they hanged him."

One might multiply examples of this kind indefinitely. Scenes describing his life as a private soldier, as a newspaper reporter, and in other capacities, as told in one volume, recall the other. Assuredly it was Murray's sense of humor, his knowledge of how little the reviewers read, that led him to perpetrate this rude jest, which he did not live to see to a finish.

With one story, indeed, in "Recollections," the joke is more pronounced. Murray relates that he was in the House of Commons when Lowe, afterwards Lord Sherbrooke, got up to speak. "We want the fullest possible note of this," the chief of the staff whispered; he could not follow the speech, so full was it of literary reference and classic allusion, and he was in great distress of mind when, happily, in the corridor he met Jack O'Hanlon, "one of the veterans of the Gallery, and reported the best classic in all Westminster." O'Hanlon had all the classic allusions, but knew nothing of the quotations from English literature—the references to Father Prout, Dickens, Pope, and Smollett. Murray provided these last, and the two journalists exchanged notes. O'Hanlon's report was swamped by other news, and Murray came out triumphantly with the best report of Lowe's speech. What are we to make of "Recollections," which gives this story to the extent of two or three pages as one of the author's own experiences, when we know that it did not occur in the House of Commons at all? The speech was made in a provincial town and the experience befell one Fenton and Mr. William Senior, now editor of the "Field," who himself told the story to Christie Murray, and kindly give the writer permission to record the circumstances here.

Apart from the stories, many of which are obviously quite inaccurate, as, for example, his account of Lord Beaconsfield's first appearance in the House of Lords, the "Recollections" have less literary merit than "The Making of a Novelist." Neither book is as good considered autobiographically as a novel by Murray entitled "Despair's Last Journey." This is the autobiography of a man who, oppressed by complications which include divorce proceedings and drink, betakes himself to the Californian wastes in the hope that in the midst of solitude he may conquer all his weaknesses. The novel is not a good one, but it is clearly autobiographical. It is best in its earlier story of the career of a young journalist, afterwards to become a successful dramatist. Many of the facts set forth here are also identical with those contained in the "Recollections." In "Despair's Last Journey" Dawson of Birmingham reappears as Ralston, and the father is admirably shadowed forth in both books.

Certainly troubles came thick and fast upon Murray in his last years. But Goethe's Duchess of Weimar, who asked that there should be one law for men and another for poets, touched the core of the matter, and it is because of the poet in him that one is disposed to cast a cloak of the widest charity over Christie Murray, with his handsome lion's head and mane of very fine white hair. Yet he was not a great novelist, and perhaps achieved his best successes in the all too ephemeral field of journal-

* "Recollections." By David Christie Murray. John Long. 10s. 6d. net.

ism. His articles in the "Referee" were excellent. Nearly all his novels were "pot-boilers," lacking real distinction, slipshod, with a dash of genius, but invariably missing their mark. Nevertheless, these "Recollections" record the generous recognition of several contemporaries. There is an autograph letter from Robert Louis Stevenson, addressing him as a "brother artist." There is another from Mr. J. M. Barrie, and, above all, there is one reproduced in facsimile in the handwriting of Mr. George Meredith, always generous in his recognition of his contemporaries. One novel, indeed, of Mr. Murray's was fully entitled to hearty appreciation, and deserved a better fate than is its to-day. "Aunt Rachel" narrowly escaped a place side by side with "Cranford" and "Silas Marner" among the fiction-classics of the Victorian era. Strange that Christie Murray, of all men, should have written the most beautiful story of constancy known to us in modern fiction. Strange, also, that that pretty story should be out of print, instead of being sold in illustrated editions to multitudes of people who read worse books. Here, and here alone, Mr. Murray was ill-used by fortune; in other directions he had little to complain of. His own temperament was his greatest enemy. He was a successful playwright for many years, of the type now represented by Mr. Hall Caine—a type that has no connection with literature, but makes money in abundance.

THREE NOVELS.*

In her preface to Madame Rossetti's admirable translation of Giovanni Cena's novel, Mrs. Humphry Ward puts the reader, we fancy, on a wrong scent. After saying, truthfully, that "the north of Italy has become a great industrial country . . . and the Italian working class is deeply stirred by new and revolutionary ideas, expressing themselves in what seems to other nations tyrannical and extreme forms—general strikes, agrarian leagues, dislocation of the railway service, and the like"—she states that in "The Forewarners" "we have at last a voice from this unknown world—a voice of singular sincerity, expressing an intimate and first-hand knowledge. . . . The record is full of melancholy, full of the crude thinking and passionate feeling of the intelligent workman who is supported by none of the old faiths." But to us the novel seems the work of a middle-class man, whose refined literary intelligence is separated by the deep barrier of caste from the suffering and misery of the industrial classes it is striving to depict. Otherwise we cannot account for the extreme vagueness of outline and the strange absence of exact detail in his picture.

The hero, Stanga, a young Turin proof-reader, is supposed to be the son of a poor brickmaker of Gassino, a hamlet in the valley of the Po, and after his father's death he, a boy, is admitted to an orphanage, and, later, apprenticed to a printer. Of his experiences between the impressionable period of fourteen and twenty-four nothing is vouchsafed us. On page 6 we are introduced to Stanga's attic in a huge block of Turin flats, and the action, so far as there is any, is confined to desultory scenes between the young compositor and his friends—Crastino, the poet, Dr. Eva Lavriana, a lady doctor, Quilio, an artist, the Biondina, a dressmaker, and the Salamander, an unfortunate. None of these people have any but the most shadowy personalities, and rhetorical musings take the place of psychological analysis. Crastino's sister is seduced by some unknown man, and dies in childbirth at the Maternity Hospital. We naturally expect that some chain of action will be linked to this tragedy, but it merely serves the author as a peg for a string of philosophical abstractions—on fate, humanity, the oppressed, and sociological determinism. Crastino himself, a few months afterwards, dies of heart disease, and we are told in a funeral oration that the poet "was a nightingale born to enjoy the freedom of earth and sky. The monstrous mechanism of our society broke his will and killed him. He personified liberty, beauty, the happiness which sings in your hearts, O brothers of him, he was love." Mina commits suicide with a charcoal brazier, and the hero, Stanga, after resolving to throw himself before the wheels of the King's motor car, and by his suicide call attention to the miseries of the poor, is drowned in an inundation of the Po.

The book is really noteworthy, not for the reasons Mrs. Humphry Ward adduces, but because it gives evidence of the revolt of educated Italian society against the crushed and pitiable condition of the proletariat. The Italian Socialistic party is made up chiefly of middle-class intellectuals, and Signor Cena would seem to bear much the same relation to the workers that Mr. Edward Carpenter bears to the English industrial masses.

"Mr. Saffery's Disciple" would have made an admirable short story, and, as it is, Mrs. Truscott's delicately satirical touch carries the reader with only a trace of boredom from the first page of her story to the last. Too much time, however, is wasted in the leisurely character-drawing of the priggish schoolmaster, Mr. Saffery, and the humble-minded youth, Robert Potter, and we are conscious that the tale has been beaten transparently thin by the time that we reach the central psychological situation. The humble Robert falls in love with and engages himself to a designing and artful shop-girl, Sara Wade, a young lady who has several strings to her bow. We rather like Mr. Menelik, the carpenter's, view of the engagement, "Carry me out and bury me straight—if that ain't a good 'un! Little Bob and that stuck-up piece!" However, Mr. Saffery, true to his High Thoughts and his High Aims, takes a more heroic line. He decides to save Robert in spite of himself, or, in the carpenter's vulgar words, "to go in for the lady himself and cut young Bob out." Inspired by Browning's poem, "A Light Woman," Mr. Saffery resolves to prove to the "stuck-up piece" "an eagle's the game her pride prefers," and in doing this falls desperately in love himself with the shop-girl. Sara, however, avenges Robert by eloping unexpectedly with an old lover who turns up in the nick of time, and the schoolmaster is left to face the agony of his frustrated passion, the only genuine feeling he has ever known, free from the ethics of the copybook and the cant of the "Higher Purpose."

It is not often we receive from America a novel so penetrating in its psychological analysis as "The Bond," a close study of the complex changes of feeling between a husband and wife. Basil and Teresa Ransome, themselves artists, belong to an "artistic set" in New York, a society of leisured, dilettante, cosmopolitan people, with European culture and that shade of refined Bohemianism which goes naturally with an epicurean philosophy, and a studio and flat kept up on four thousand dollars a year. Basil is painting the portrait of Mrs. Perry, an attractive femme incomprise, with a void in her life that she is trying feverishly to fill, and while determining not to be entangled by her and secretly worried by her emotional demands, he is reticent about her to his wife, and so arouses in her a vague but blind instinct of jealousy. Basil's philosophy is that a man's peccadilloes ought not to count to his wife, so long as he does not fall in love with another woman, and he desires, theoretically, that Teresa shall have her friends among men, just as he has his friends among women—and it is just this attitude of his that calls forth in Teresa what she calls her "idiocy," her emotional crises and fits of pointless jealousy. For though Teresa has always prized her own bachelor independence before marriage, she "is painfully aware now that she could not do without Basil," that she needs him more and more, and, in fact, she requires that all his thought and interest shall be given to her. She dreads change, and knowing that Basil is "always wanting something new, always being interested in new people," she fears vaguely for the future. When a child is born to Teresa, two years after marriage, a subtle change of mood comes over both husband and wife. Basil, who has had to work harder at pot-boilers and portrait-painting to get money for his household expenses, and has been profoundly bored by Mrs. Perry while decorating her house, grows more and more eager for his wife's society and for the domestic atmosphere, but Teresa, "after her year of the baby," has a

* "The Forewarners." By Giovanni Cena. Translated by Olivia Agresti Rossetti. Smith, Elder. 6s.
"Mr. Saffery's Disciple." By L. Parry Truscott. T. Werner Laurie. 6s.
"The Bond." By Neith Boyce. Duckworth. 6s.

The Athenaeum says:—

"In Mr. Unwin's valuable series, 'The Story of the Nations,' 'The Roman Empire,' by H. Stuart Jones, will take its place as one of the best."

THE ROMAN EMPIRE,

B.C. 29—A.D. 476.

By H. STUART JONES, M.A. With Maps and Illustrations. 5s. A New Volume in "The Story of the Nations."

BY DESERT WAYS TO BAGHDAD.

BY LOUISA JEBB (MRS. WILKINS). WITH A MAP AND 64 ILLUSTRATIONS FROM PHOTOGRAPHS. PRICE 10s. 6d. NET. A ROMANTIC RECORD OF TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE IN ASIA MINOR.

THE CONFESSIONS OF A BEACH-COMBER.

SCENES AND INCIDENTS IN THE CAREER OF AN UNPROFESSIONAL BEACHCOMBER IN TROPICAL QUEENSLAND. BY E. J. BANFIELD. WITH A MAP AND 48 ILLUSTRATIONS. 15s. NET.

CULTS, CUSTOMS, AND SUPERSTITIONS OF INDIA.

BEING A REVISED AND ENLARGED EDITION OF "INDIAN LIFE, RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL." BY J. CAMPBELL OMAN, D.LIT. PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED. 14s. NET.

CONCERNING LAFCADIO HEARN.

BY G. M. GOULD, M.D. WITH 5 ILLUSTRATIONS. 8s. 6d. NET. AN APPRECIATION OF HEARN'S PERSONALITY AND WORK, CONTAINING SEVERAL HITHERTO UNPUBLISHED LETTERS.

THE HISTORY OF CO-OPERATION.

BY GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE. PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED. POPULAR EDITION IN ONE VOLUME. LARGE CROWN 8vo, 7s. 6d. NET.

AUGUSTUS.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF THE FOUNDER OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE (B.C. 63—A.D. 14). BY E. S. SHUCKBURGH. ILLUSTRATED. POPULAR EDITION. CLOTH, 2s. 6d. NET.

"First Cousin to Sam Weller."

PATSY

By H. de VERE STACPOOLE,

Author of "The Blue Lagoon," &c. 6s.

"Mr. de Vere Stacpoole has, to use a cricketing phrase, far more strokes than the author of 'Charles O'Malley.' He has the reckless Irish fun, the Irish devilment and vivacity, but with it a poet's taste for beauty and freshness alike in human character and natural scenery. Lever could not have drawn the Irish children of this book. As much could not be said of Patsy Rooney, who is decidedly of the same family as Mickey Free, and if possessed of any English relations is probably first cousin to Sam Weller."—Country Life.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON.

A CHARMING ALLEGORY WITH THE DEEPEST RELIGIOUS MORAL.

PSYCHE

By Louis Couperus. Translated from the Dutch by the Rev. B. S. Berrington, B.A. With Twelve full-page Illustrations by Dion Clayton Calthrop. Imperial 16mo. 3s. 6d.

The name Louis Couperus is already familiar in English literary circles, but Mr. Alston Rivers is sanguine that the translation of "Psyche" will much enhance the Dutch writer's reputation. It is a book which may, perhaps, be best described as an allegory, permeated with the deepest religious moral, and full of poetic imagery.

G. K. CHESTERTON:

A Criticism.

By an Anonymous Author. 5s.

"There is plenty of shrewdness, common sense, and careful analysis in the volume. The author eschews all that nonsensical prattle which is to be found in most books about living celebrities. He is a hero-worshipper, but he is not afraid to criticise his hero. . . . . It is a clear, clever, and an accurate work; it is eulogistic, but it is not servile, an excellent handbook to the student about to begin the Chestertonian 'opera omnia."—Daily News.

HEATHER

By John Trevena, Author of "Furze the Cruel." "A Pixy in Petticoats," &c. 6s.

"Mr. Trevena has genius. It hardly matters where he sets his characters—whether in huts on the moor, in village hovels, in the sanatorium, or in the vicarage, he makes them alive to us. They are many, but we remember them all, and shall remember them long. We are not more likely to forget them than we are persons whom we have really met in life."—Daily Mail.

LONDON: ALSTON RIVERS, LIMITED, 21-22, BROOKE STREET, HOLBORN, E.C.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S

NEW NOVEL.

DIANA MALLORY.

WILL BE READY AT ALL BOOKSELLERS' AND LIBRARIES On THURSDAY NEXT, Crown 8vo. 6s.

New Novel by AGNES & EGERTON CASTLE.

NOW READY. WROTH. Crown 8vo. 6s.

By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE,

Evening Standard:—"'Wroth' is a novel with a fine zest. It strikes a good note and it is so engrossing. A cleverer bit of plot-making has not come our way in recent fiction."

A PAWN IN THE GAME.

By W. H. FITCHETT, B.A., LL.D.,

Author of "Deeds that Won the Empire," &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Daily Telegraph:—"A book to be cordially recommended both to those who enjoy a good love story and to those who enjoy adventure."

RE-ISSUE OF THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY

Edited by LESLIE STEPHEN and SIDNEY LEE.

IN TWENTY-TWO VOLUMES.

Cloth, gilt top, 15s. net each; or half-morocco, marbled edges, 21s. net each

VOLUMES I.-VII. (ABBADIE-GLOUCESTER) NOW READY.

Spectator.—"We cordially hope that the success of this new venture will be all that its merits entitle it to. The work is really indispensable to the student, and every public library, not to speak of private purchasers, should be supplied with a copy."

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

desire for gaiety, a craving for seeing new people, a "quite new delight" in going out and in social amusements. She forms a friendship, quite harmless, with a Southerner, Fairfax, who is charming and amusing, and interested in her, but Basil resents it, and at last confesses to a torturing jealousy. Teresa is pleased by this, she becomes gayer and lighter, while soothing Basil, but the couple begin to drift apart, they go out more than ever, and spend less and less time together. And after her second baby is born, and its death and the strain of Teresa's illness on both her and her husband, the break comes—when the woman discovers that he has had a liaison with Mrs. Perry, despite his light denial. Teresa feels that she must get away by herself, to some quiet place where she can grow strong and get rest and peace, and she starts for Italy.

The second part of the story, in which Teresa turns the tables on her husband, and which recounts their final reconciliation, is very true to nature. The old confidence, the old joy and trust are gone, and Crayven, the Englishman, comes as an anodyne in Teresa's life. Basil's infidelity has injured something deep in her soul, and, in turn, she has become hard and indifferent about hurting him. Basil must be made to pay for the wound he has inflicted, and intercourse with Crayven gives Teresa a new outlook, different ideas and feelings. The description of the subtle way in which she proceeds to cure herself, and of her final astonished discovery that she cannot love Crayven or anybody else, that she is bound to Basil by ties she can never break, and that "her will, her imagination, her power of loving, her whole self," are in her husband's hands, is very striking. So many and delicate are the shades of the emotional history of both the husband and wife that it would be futile to try and indicate, in this hasty summary, Miss Neith Boyce's sensitive and unerring touch.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

It is not often that thirty-four men in a battalion wear the star "For Valour." But in the Guides they have done it as Colonel Younghusband's book, "The Story of the Guides" (Macmillan, 7s. 6d. net) shows, and anyone who knows the record of that glorious regiment can only wonder how one or thirty-four of them ever came to be selected as specially braver than the rest. In our long history of devoted courage there are few regiments indeed that can rival in fame this corps of Indians, scraped together originally by young Harry Lumsden under the orders of Sir Henry Lawrence. It was at Peshawur, before the Mutiny was thought of, and while the Sikhs were still called masters of the Punjab. That strange old town, so full of war unrecorded ages before Alexander brought his Macedonians there, right away down to the Zakka Khel expedition of seven months ago, stands on its plain between two mountainous sides of a long triangle, with the Khyber at the apex. It is the very centre of fighting stocks that none in Asia can surpass, whatever Gurkhas and Japanese may do in rivalry. So to the service of Lumsden and his successors have come Afridis and Pathans, Turcomans, Afghans from Kabul, Persians, Sikhs, and Hindus from the Punjab. Moslem, Sikh, or idolater—it did not matter; all the brave were welcome there. Splendid British names have been connected with these Indian fighters, in supreme or subordinate command—Lumsden himself, Hardinge, Hodson of the Horse, Daly, who led them to Delhi, Neville Chamberlain, Dighton Probyn, Walter Hamilton, Roberts, Sam Browne, Peebles, and the Battyes, of whom four brothers in the Guides have been killed in action. Of their exploits one hardly knows which to choose, from the early siege of Mooltan down to the relief of Chitral, on which Colonel Younghusband speaks with the authority of a leader, or, again, to the Malakand and the fight at Landáki. That was a great march to the terrible Ridge at Delhi—twenty-seven miles a day and a fight on the day of arrival, in which every single officer was killed or wounded. Four times over during that summer outside Delhi the officers suffered that fate, and out of 600 men less than half returned to the North. But, for a drama of courage, we think there is no such scene as that defence of the Residency at Kabul when the Cavignari Mission was annihilated, and, with Walter Hamilton and every British officer lost, the seventy Guides held the position till the very last man of them was killed at his place. No wonder their quarters at Mardan are a scene of which Indians and British are alike proud.

Such are the records that Colonel Younghusband tells, and, as we know, he speaks with almost unequalled authority. On such themes it is difficult to avoid what we may call Mr. Fitchett's strain—the strain of big drum, blood, and trumpet. It is always difficult to describe war as it really is, and not as high-souled schoolboys like to dream of it. Colonel Younghusband sometimes puts things with a finer flourish than a model writer like Cæsar would have used. But then, though he was an eye-witness in part of his story, Colonel Younghusband is not telling his own exploits, as Cæsar was, and it would be almost impossible even for a schoolboy to imagine finer scenes of straightforward heroism than those which he describes. For "Rough and Ready" was the motto the Guides earned at Delhi and like to remember.

* * *

The romantic charm that surrounds so many of the Stuarts is but little evident in James II., and in choosing a title for his book, "James II. and His Wives" (Methuen, 12s. 6d. net), Mr. Allan Fea seems to have thought that his readers would be more interested in the social history of the period than in the personality of the last of the Stuart Kings. But Mr. Fea rightly holds that, with all his faults, James was not so despicable as he has been generally held. Evelyn credited him with "infinite industry, sedulity, gravity, and great understanding and experience of affairs." In his retirement at Saint Germain he rose to a certain dignity, and, had he been less obstinate in his efforts to force Catholicism upon the nation, it is probable that James would never have become a by-word for blind and stupid arrogance. Buckingham defined the characters of Charles and James in the epigram that Charles "could see things if he would; James would see things if he could." The particular things James could not see were that England was Protestant, and was determined to hold by the sovereignty of Parliament. His first wife, Anne Hyde, is described by Burnet as having "great knowledge and a lively sense of things." She was certainly cleverer than James, who, it would seem, had at first no intention of marrying her. The favor she showed to Henry Sidney, though possibly innocent enough, lost her the power she had over her husband, "although," says Mr. Fea, "he always stood more or less in awe of her." Mary of Modena, James' second wife, was much too good for him. She was handsome, vivacious, and good-natured, and knew how to bear adverse fortune bravely. There is much in Mr. Fea's pages about James' mistresses, one of whom, the Countess of Dorchester, declared that it was impossible to discover the qualities for which they were chosen. "We are none of us handsome, and if we have wit, he certainly has not enough to find it out." Mr. Fea disclaims responsibility for any attempt to whitewash James II., and he is in no way blind to the weak sides of the King's character. At the same time, he writes with the sympathy proper to a biographer, and his book is a very readable and lively account of James II. and his circle, both in England and in later years on the Continent.

* * *

A volume from Mr. John Burroughs is always welcome, and sure to be read by those who know the old American naturalist. His chief function for the last twenty years has been to correct the exuberances of the new school represented by Long, Roberts, and Seton, named by Burroughs, with rough incisiveness, "nature fakers." His counter philosophy is well represented in "Leaf and Tendril" (Constable, 4s. 6d. net). Perhaps it swings out as far beyond the facts in one direction as theirs does in the other, but exaggerated error demands exaggerated correction. You may watch for a thousand years, he says, and not see the things that these "nature fakers" see every time they take a walk. You will not see, for instance, "the old teaching their young this or that." But if we turn some fifty pages we find this strong saying considerably modified. He says:

BOOKSELLERS.

A Beautiful Large Emerald Type
10/6 OXFORD TEACHER'S BIBLE for 5/11 POST FREE.
Latest Illustrated Edition. Size 7 x 5-in.
To which are appended Notes analytical, critical, chronological, historical, and geographical, a glossary of antiquities; an abstract of modern discoveries; a dictionary of Scripture proper names; a biblical index concordance; a new series of maps; and compendium of Scripture natural history. Handsome Limp Morocco binding, with overlapping edges, round corners, elastic band.
THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE, 53, Paternoster Row.

Buy The Saturday Westminster
Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because
it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It Never Fails to Please & Satisfy
Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy
SUGGESTIONS FOR
CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.
By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.
"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.
"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.
"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION
Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

The pipe that clears today of past regrets and future fears
Omar Khayyam (modernised).

is a pipe filled with

Player's Navy Mixture

A Tobacco of Matchless Charm.

Sold in Two Strengths:
MILD, 5d. per oz.
MEDIUM, 4½d. per oz.

John Player & Sons, Nottingham, will forward Testing Samples post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

C442

The Imperial Tobacco Co. (of Great Britain and Ireland) Limited

Liver troubles
SHOULD NEVER BE NEGLECTED.

The principal duty of the Liver is to extract the bile from the blood, and carry it direct to the digestive organs. Therefore, if the Liver is disordered, it cannot perform its duties properly, and the result is, the blood becomes overloaded with bile, which causes Lassitude, Debility, Irritability, and may develop Dropsy.

MERIT'S (FAVRINE) Liverets
STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY REGULATE

will speedily and permanently cure all liver troubles, because they thoroughly cleanse the Liver of all impurities, and stimulate it to easily perform its functions in a natural healthy manner MERIT'S LIVERETS are prepared from purely vegetable ingredients only, as prescribed by a prominent physician, and have no debilitating effect upon the health. Price 1/1½ of all Chemists and Stores.
If unable to obtain, will be sent post free by
MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.
CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name MERIT'S LIVERETS, and the signature MERIT & Co., is on the package. So beware of spurious imitations.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

"A trait alike common to man and beast is imitativeness. . . . We are more or less copyists all our lives. Among the animals the young do what they see their parents do. This, I am convinced, is all there is of parental instruction among them; the young unconsciously follow the example of their elders." It seems to be enough to support all the stories in "The School of the Woods" itself, Mr. Burroughs' bugbear. In another chapter Mr. Burroughs runs a tilt against the Darwinian theories of sexual selection and protective color. It is a rain of unconsidered blows, the defence to any one of which is easy enough to find. Its effect is merely to make the theory lean rather more heavily on the creative than on the selective power of environment. Both these supports, of course, were perceivel by Darwin. The question of animal instinct versus intelligence is one of "perennial interest" to this youth of eighty summers, and those who think they have quite made up their minds on the subject can do no better than read what he has to say in the present volume.

* * *

"Voluntary societies whose origin nowhere distinctly appears" was the description applied by Lord Mansfield to the Inns of Court, in giving judgment in the case of Rex v Gray's Inn. Even to-day there is no very definite evidence of how these familiar institutions came into existence. But in "A Short History of the English Bar" (Swan Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d. net) Mr. Bernard W. Kelly supplies some useful clues, and traces concisely the development of our national judicial system from the time when legal advocates were supplied from the clergy, as the only educated class in the country. The article of Magna Charta, "that common pleas should no longer follow the King's Court, but be held in some certain place," was the means of forming legal practitioners into one aggregate body. The Courts being at Westminster, these practitioners settled near that locality; and from this settlement or centralisation sprang the Inns of Court and Chancery. Of existing Inns the oldest is Clifford's Inn, dating back to 1345; but this, together with Furnival's and Barnard's Inns and New Inn, soon lost its prestige and came to be regarded as a preparatory school to the four great Inns of Court, comprised in "The Temple," Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn. The history, mode of education, functions, and feasts connected with the Inns of Court, as well as the habits and recreations of their occupants, are well described in this little manual. It abounds in quaint and entertaining anecdote. As late as Henry VIII.'s time "the students were forbidden to shoot the rabbits," which were plentiful on the Lincoln's Inn estate! Apropos of the energetic volunteer movement in the Inns, associated with very recent times, we learn that "the gentlemen of the Inns of Court raised an armed company" against the expected Spanish Armada. It was of the lawyer volunteers at the time of the French Revolution that a wag said that "when the word 'charge' was given, every member of the Corps produced a note-book and forthwith wrote down six-and-eightpence!" Mr. Kelly has mastered not merely his subject but the art of presenting it in attractive form.

The Week in the City.

The Movement of Leading Stocks.

	Price Friday Morning, Sept. 4.	Price Friday Morning, Sept. 11.
Consols 2½ per cent.	85 11/16 ...	85 15/16
German 3 per cent.	84 ...	84
Japan 4 per cent. 1899	83 7/8 ...	84 1/8
Union Pacific	168½ ...	171½
Canadian-Pacific...	177½ ...	179¼
Peruvian Corp. Ord.	10 5/8 ...	11 5/8

The labor disturbances and the increasing demand upon public authorities for employment made one look with special anxiety at the Board of Trade Returns for August, which made their appearance on Tuesday. Very little comfort could be extracted from them; indeed, they are about the worst, so far. However, it must be remembered that the greater part of the fall in values is due to the fall in prices. The shrinkage in the volume of trade has not been very great; and the working classes are getting their food about 5 per cent. lower than last year. The best hope of an early recovery lies in the harvest, which may be good enough to lower still further the price of bread and oatmeal, so that the poor will be able to buy more of other things.

The Kaffir Revival.

The buoyancy of the Kaffir and Mining markets during the last account is only part of the speculative revival. Accumulations of capital for investment, bad trade, and cheap money have combined to divert enterprising people from the hazards of business proper to the hazards of the Stock Markets How much of the stimulus is a purely artificial one (applied by the mining houses) it is impossible to say; but no doubt the public have been coming in, and in some cases some good bargains might have been had a few weeks ago. On the last account alone the gains were very substantial, as the following table shows:—

Share.	Making-up price Aug. 24.	Sept. 8.	Rise.
Anglo-French ...	1 1-2 ...	1 11-16 ...	3-16
Consol. Gold Fields...	4 1-4 ...	4 7-8 ...	5-8
Crown Reef	6 9-16 ...	8 1-2 ...	1 15-16
East Rand	4 7-16 ...	4 19-32* ...	5-32
Modderfontein ...	9 1-2 ...	10 1-4 ...	3-4
Randfontein	1 5-8 ...	1 13-16 ...	3-16
Rand Mines	6 9-16 ...	7 7-16 ...	7-8
Wolhuter	2 5-8 ...	3 9-16 ...	15-16
De Beers Def....	12 3-16 ...	13 ...	15-16
Premier Def.	7 13-16 ...	9 1-8 ...	1 5-16
Tanganyika	3 1-2 ...	3 3-4 ...	1-4
Brakpan	1 15-16 ...	2 3-8 ...	7-16
Village Deep ...	2 ...	2 1-2 ...	1-2

* Ex 4s. 6d. dividend.

Even Chartered shares rose 2s. 3d., from 15s. 6d. to 17s. 9d. Whether these rises can last is another question. A little squeeze of dear money would soon alter affairs. But the last account was very favorable to operators for a rise in almost all classes of securities.

The American Bull Campaign.

"The present bull campaign, led by the Harriman-Frick-Rockefeller coterie, is one of the most adroit and masterly that has ever been undertaken," remarked a Wall Street broker a fortnight ago to a representative of the New York "Journal of Commerce. "These gentlemen and their immediate following took all offerings of stock at very low figures, and, of course, have experienced no difficulty in carrying them, owing to the abundant supply of money at abnormally low rates. If, for instance, they had attempted to sell Union Pacific at 125, there would have been no takers. Their programme has been to simply mark up the prices of their goods from time to time, and whenever there is a reaction of two or three points from the top, the public and traders show a disposition to nibble. Last week it was difficult to coax anyone to buy Union Pacific around 157. If it should decline now to 159, there would be a grab for it. This will happen, in a like manner, as long as the marking up process continues. In the end the public will have the great bulk of the stocks. As yet, however, they are in strong hands." I have seldom seen a better account than this of the way in which successful manipulators with millions behind them contrive to squeeze profits out of small investors and speculators. It seems to me that, considering the state of trade and the political uncertainty, the values of most American Railway stocks are now dangerously high.

Lucellum.

LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING COMPANY, LIMITED.

ESTABLISHED IN 1836.

CAPITAL - £8,000,000, in 100,000 Shares of £80 each.
Paid-up Capital, £2,000,000. Reserve Fund, £1,600,000.

Directors.

Hon. SIR ERIC BARRINGTON, K.C.B.	WILLIAM E. HUBBARD, Esq.
JOHN ANNAN BRYCE, Esq., M.P.	SIR THOMAS JACKSON, BART.
JOHN JAMES CATER, Esq.	WM. McKEWAN, Esq. (Honorary Director).
ERNEST H. CUNARD, Esq.
Right Hon. VISCOUNT GOSCHEN.	OSWALD CECIL MAGNIAC, Esq.
C. SEYMOUR GRENFELL, Esq.	WILLIAM G. RATHBONE, Esq.
CHARLES JOHN HEGAN, Esq.	CHARLES J. CATER SCOTT, Esq.

Auditors.

HENRY GRANT, Esq. THOMAS HORWOOD, Esq.
Hon. STUART PLEYDELL-BOUVERIE.

Head Office Manager—HERMAN RICHARD WYATT.
Deputy Head Office Manager—FREDERICK JAMES BARTHORPE.
Country Manager—WILLIAM GEORGE GRIBBLE.
Chief Inspector—FRANK WILLIAM HOWETT.
Chief Accountant—THEOPHILUS JAMES CARPENTER.
Secretary—EDGAR FRANCIS ROBINSON.

Head Office: 21, LOMBARD STREET, E.C.
Foreign Exchange Office—80, Cornhill, E.C.

266 Branches in London and Country.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened on the usual terms. Facilities are given Customers at any Branch for the transfer of money to or from any other Branch.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.—Sums of £10 and upwards are received on deposit at interest, subject to notice of withdrawal, or by special agreement, in accordance with the usual custom.

PURCHASE AND SALE of Stocks and Shares effected.

DIVIDENDS, ANNUITIES, &c., received.

THE AGENCY OF FOREIGN AND COUNTRY BANKS is undertaken, and every description of Banking business transacted.

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT.

CURRENCY DRAFTS, CIRCULAR NOTES and LETTERS OF CREDIT are issued, and TELEGRAPHIC TRANSFERS made to all parts of the World.

APPROVED FOREIGN DRAFTS are purchased and Collections undertaken.

DOCUMENTARY CREDITS are established, and every facility given for the handling of Documents to or from Abroad.

The Officers of the Bank are bound to secrecy.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

TANGYE OIL ENGINE

AUTOMATIC TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP EXCEPT FOR STARTING

TANGYES LTD BIRMINGHAM.

THE
LEADING EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES

Try them. They are the finest imported, and can be obtained from all High-class Tobacconists, Stores, &c.

Wholesale depot—20, Cheapside, London, E.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING. — Typewriting of every description high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

WEST HEATH SCHOOL, HAMPSTEAD.

On high ground close to the Heath.
A day school for Boys and Girls (about 100 pupils).

Principal: Mrs. Ennis Richmond.
Headmaster: Mr. F. V. Bindon (M.A. Cantab.).
Succeeding Mr. & Mrs. Rice, now taking up work at Bedales School, Hants.

Good Buildings. Playground. Large Grass Playing Fields.

A Boarding house will be opened in September in connection with the above under the immediate management of Mrs. Richmond and her son, Mr. Kenneth Richmond, as house master.

Michaelmas Term will begin September 22nd.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

The Autumn Term opens on SEPTEMBER 16th.

BROMSGROVE SCHOOL, WORCESTERSHIRE.

AUTUMN TERM begins September 17th.

APPLY THE HEADMASTER.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

THE ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL.

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields; gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Next Term, Sept. 18th. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.SC., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

NEW BOYS ARRIVE SEPTEMBER 17TH, OTHERS 18TH.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY.

EVERY FRIDAY, 2d.

PUBLIC OPINION

EDITED BY

PERCY L. PARKER.

¶ "Public Opinion" provides the busy man with a lucid summary of what is happening in the different fields of human activity and focusses within reasonable compass something of that teeming interest which comes from being in touch with many phases of life.

Dr. W. H. FITCHETT says:—

"Most interesting and valuable; a matchless bit of journalistic work."

Sir HUBERT VON HERKOMER says:—

"Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise."

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum.

SPECIMEN FREE ON APPLICATION.

31 and 32, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C.

ONE & ALL SEEDS

THE BRAND GUARANTEES ONE & ALL QUALITY.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

ONE & ALL SEEDS are reliable, pure, and guaranteed.

Each packet is dated with the year of issue.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS are complete Manures.

All are supplied in small quantities at reasonable prices.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Choice Varieties of Sweet Peas, with an Original Pamphlet on their Culture, by Richard Dean, V.M.H.—viz., Dorothy Eckford, white; Hon. Mrs. Kenyon, yellow; Prima Donna, soft pink; King Edward VII., crimson; Miss Wilmott, rich deep orange pink; Mrs. Walter Wright, mauve; Prince of Wales, fine rose; Duchess of Westminster, violet purple; Othello, deep maroon; Lady Grisel Hamilton, pale lavender; Duke of Westminster, purple; Navy Blue.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Annuals.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Perennials and Biennials.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables for Saladings.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables.

One & All Collection of Choicest Asters in 10 Varieties—2s. 6d. Giant Comet, white; Giant Comet, The Bride, white; Giant Comet, rose; Giant Comet, azure blue; Giant Comet, dark violet; Mixed Dwarf Chrysanthemum; Finest Mixed Bouquet; Mixed Victoria; Mixed Paeony; Perfection; and Betteridge's Quilled in mixed colours.

One & All Fertiliser No 24 for general garden purposes. Half-rod packets 6d. bags, 7 lbs., 2/3; 14 lbs., 3/6; 28 lbs., 5/9; 56 lbs., 10/6; 112 lbs., 20/- Carriage Paid.

ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, LIMITED. Name and address of nearest Local Agent, Illustrated Catalogues, and other details, sent free by post on application to EDWARD OWEN GREENING, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS

TOURS.

£6 6s. LUCERNE TOUR.

Nine days. Short Sea Route. No extras for Conductor or Gratuities.

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D.

5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. 25, Cannon Street, E.C.
4, Charing Cross, S.W. 84, Piccadilly, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son, Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.

67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day.

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par., facing Sea, Central for Amusements. South Aspect Tel. 575 Manageres.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR - YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.

BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott. Prop.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

GREAT YARMOUTH.

HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM - ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor.

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop. J. E. Dowthwaite.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny. Golf, etc. Lecture.

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Afternoon Teas, Tel. 647.

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties Catered for.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.

THE LAWS OF WAR ON LAND (Written and Unwritten).

By THOMAS ERSKINE HOLLAND, K.C.

8vo, 6s. net.

Times.—No living writer is better qualified to treat of this subject. In the rapid transformation of a mass of crude, indefinite, ill-observed customs into something not very far removed from a Code no one has been more active than Prof. Holland; and it adds in no small degree to the value of his manual that he is often commenting upon formulæ which, if their genesis were examined, it would be found that he helped to frame, and no less frequently formulæ of which he failed to prevent the adoption. . . . The value of this manual, a model of condensation, is increased by the appendices which contain documents and information likely to be of use to the soldier and the student. It is rare to find a book with so much compressed information and so total an absence of padding."

A HISTORICAL GEOGRAPHY OF THE BRITISH COLONIES.

Edited by Sir C. P. LUCAS, K.C.M.G.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

Vol. V. CANADA. Part II. (Historical.)

By HUGH E. EGERTON. With 10 Maps.

Already published.

Part I. (HISTORICAL: NEW FRANCE). By Sir C. P. LUCAS. 6s.

A HISTORY OF THE PENINSULAR WAR.

By CHARLES OMAN.

Vol. III. (Sept. 1809–Dec. 1810): OCANA—CADIZ—BUSSACO—TORRES VEDRAS. With 14 Maps and 5 Photogravures and other Illustrations.

8vo, 14s. net each.

Already published.

Vol. I. 1807-1809, to CORUNNA. Vol. II. 1809, to TALAVERA.

Athenæum.—"Mr. Oman's work is marked with a thoroughness of detail that is unhappily far from common in these days of text-books and popular compendiums. . . . This work is marked by a scholarly eagerness to make use of every available source."

THE IMPERIAL GAZETTEER OF INDIA.

FOURTEEN VOLUMES NOW READY, viz., the Four Volumes of "The Indian Empire," and Ten Volumes of the Alphabetical Gazetteer proper, from Abāzai to Karā.

The Subscription price for the entire work of Twenty-Six Volumes bound in cloth is £5 net, or £6 6s. net with morocco back, to be paid in advance. Each of the Four Volumes of "The Indian Empire" may be purchased separately at 6s. net in cloth, or 7s. 6d. net with morocco back; the Atlas may be purchased separately at 15s. net in cloth or 17s. 6d. net with morocco back; and the remaining Twenty-One Volumes at £4 4s. net in cloth or £5 5s. net with morocco back—payable at the rate of 4s. net (or 5s. net) per volume on the publication of each instalment of the body of the Gazetteer.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"A great and triumphant work of reference."

A CALENDAR OF THE COURT MINUTES, &c., OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY, 1635-1639.

By ETHEL BRUCE SAINSBURY. With an introduction and Notes by WILLIAM FOSTER. (Published under the Patronage of His Majesty's Secretary of State for India in Council.)

8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Morning Post.—"Of considerable value to the student. . . . Miss Sainsbury has edited these ancient documents with consummate order and regularity for the benefit of posterity."

INDIVIDUALISM AND AFTER.

The Herbert Spencer Lecture. By BENJAMIN KIDD.

8vo, 1s. net.

Birmingham Post.—"Lucid and thoughtful in expression, weighty with thought, packed full of matter, of supreme importance to every publicist and citizen. . . . Mr. Kidd is pre-eminently a thinker, and he compels thought. For that reason these works of his cannot be too widely read."

THE CHRONICLE OF JOHN OF WORCESTER, 1118-1140.

Crown 4to, 7s. 6d.

Being the continuation of the "Chronicon ex Chronicis" of Florence of Worcester. Edited from a Manuscript in the Library of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, by J. R. H. WEAVER.

[Anecdota Oxoniensia Mediaeval and Modern Series, Part XIII.

YUSUF AND ZALIKHA.

Crown 4to, 25s.

By FIRDAUSI OF TUS. Edited from the Manuscripts in the Bodleian Library, the British Museum, and the Library of the Royal Asiatic Society, and the two Lithographed Texts of Teheran and Lucknow (or Cawnpore), by HERMANN ETHÉ, Fasciculus Primus.

[Anecdota Oxoniensia Aryan Series, Part VI.

SKOTLANDS RIMUR.

Icelandic Ballads on the Gowrie Conspiracy.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Edited by W. A. CRAIGIE. With a Collotype Facsimile. On linen rag-paper, cloth back, white stamped paper sides, in style of old Icelandic binding, 5s. net.

ESSAYS ON EVOLUTION, 1889-1907.

By EDWARD BAGNALL POULTON.

8vo, 12s. net.

Athenæum.—"The merit of Prof. Poulton's work in his own field, and the charm and clearness of his writings are well known. . . . Prof. Poulton is known to be an ardent supporter of Darwin's original thesis, and probably no living man is better acquainted with the master's writings, or better able to expose the apparent flaws in the Lamarckian theory of evolution. . . . The book is provided with an excellent analytical Index, upon which much labor must have been bestowed, and in type and general appearance is all that could be desired."

THE VOLUNTARYIST CREED.

8vo, paper covers, 6d. net. Cloth, 2s. net.

Being the Herbert Spencer Lecture delivered at Oxford, June 7th, 1906, and a Plea for Voluntaryism by AUBERON HERBERT.

THE OXFORD THACKERAY.

A NEW ILLUSTRATED EDITION IN SEVENTEEN VOLUMES.

ARRANGED AND EDITED BY

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

The arrangement is chronological as far as possible. The text is as Thackeray finally left it; the most interesting variations from the earlier forms being supplied in foot-notes or in appendices. Copyright matter is included.

The illustrations exceed 1,750, gathered from various sources, some very little known.

The Oxford Thackeray, printed on good ordinary paper, ranges in all respects with the "Fireside," crown 8vo, Edition of Dickens, and the price in cloth is 2s. net for each volume. There is also a fcap. 8vo edition, printed on India Paper, which matches the "Oxford India Paper Dickens," the price being 2s. 6d. net for each volume bound in cloth. In both cases the books can be obtained in a variety of leather bindings.

Daily Chronicle (LEWIS MELVILLE).—"It is certain that all lovers of Thackeray will welcome the latest venture, for it is well and plainly bound, clearly printed, and wonderfully cheap; and it is rendered indispensable to all good Titmarshians by the exceedingly interesting and scholarly introductions of Professor Saintsbury. . . . The arrangement . . . is the best conceivable. . . . The greater part of the introductions are critical, and are exceedingly interesting to all, alike to students and to admirers of the master; and if here and there we differ from an opinion, or dissent from a verdict, on the whole there is nothing but praise to be awarded."

SIX VOLS. ALREADY PUBLISHED.

VOL. I. 1829—1841.

The Yellowplush Papers, Major Gahagan, Stubb's Calendar, The Bedford Row Conspiracy, Flore et Zephyr, and other Early Miscellanies, 660 pages. 64 Illustrations.

VOL. II. 1837-1845.

The Paris Sketch Book, and Art Criticisms. 754 pages. 103 Illustrations.

VOL. III. 1839-1841.

Catherine, Cox's Diary, A Shabby Genteel Story, The Second Funeral of Napoleon, and Miscellanies, 1840-41. 580 pages. 24 Illustrations.

VOL. IV. 1841-1843.

The Great Hoggarty Diamond, The Fitz-Boodle Papers, Men's Wives, &c. 528 pages. 17 Illustrations.

VOL. V. 1842-1844.

The Irish Sketch Book, and Contributions to the Foreign Quarterly Review. 564 pages. 45 Illustrations.

VOL. VI. 1843-1847.

Barry Lyndon, The Wagstaff Papers, Little Travels and Roadside Sketches, &c. 676 pages. 57 Illustrations.

The next Six Vols., including VANITY FAIR and PENDENNIS, ready immediately.

Prospectuses of the CHEAPEST ILLUSTRATED THACKERAY yet issued post free on application, and of all Booksellers.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, E.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1908.

The Nation

VOL. III., No. 25.] SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1908. [PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK	851
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—
The Doctrine of Tolerance	854
The Limits of Industrial Arbitration	855
Two Schools of Socialism	856
The History of Religion	858
The Road and the People	859
LIFE AND LETTERS:—
Can Morals be Taught?	860
Barmecide Feasts	861
Visitors	862
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—
Is Constitutional Government in Turkey Possible? By Edwin Pears	863
CONTEMPORARIES:—
President Diaz	865
THE DRAMA:—
The Sad Case of Dr. Faust. By H. W. M.	866
COMMUNICATIONS:—
The "Messages" from Frederic Myers. By John W. Graham	867
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
A Protest. By J. L. Balbi	868
"The Lost Liberty of the Road." By T. Wilson, Thomas Howard, Alfred Ollivant, and J. Leng Sturrock	868
The Cause of Unemployment. By J. J. Bisgood	870
The Trades Union Congress and Electoral Reform. By John H. Humphreys	870
Catholics and Liberalism. By "A Knight of St. Gregory" and W. P.	871
"Moderate and Extremist in India." By V. Chattopadhyaya	871
Moral Education Congress. By St. G. L. Fox Pitt	872
"The Dilemma of a Liberal Lawyer." By Ignoramus	872
POETRY:—
Light o' the Moon. By Edward Sydney Tylee	872
THE WORLD OF BOOKS	873
Books to be Read	873
REVIEWS:—
France and Her People	874
Peru. By R. B. Cunninghame Graham	875
Bishop Stubbs on Medieval Germany	876
Hearn's Candid Friend	877
Three Novels	878
BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
Great Raleigh	880
G. K. Chesterton: A Criticism	880
Victoria the Woman	880
St. Bartholomew the Great	880
The Insect Book	880
Through the Depths of Space	882
By the Roman Wall	882
A Novel Reader's Guide	882
THE WEEK IN THE CITY	882

The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

CONTRARY to general expectation, the Government intervened to stop Sunday's procession of the Blessed Sacrament, or to divest it of the religious symbol. Archbishop Bourne made the announcement amid the angry shouts of the Catholics assembled in the Albert Hall. Mr. Asquith's first step was to make a private and verbal statement through the Catholic Lord Ripon, deprecating the procession. The Archbishop declined to act without a public request, and the Prime Minister then telegraphed from Slains Castle declaring the Government's opinion to be that, in the interests of order and good feeling, the ceremonial ought not to take place. The Archbishop then replied that purely ecclesiastical elements should be eliminated and that the Cardinals and other dignitaries would walk, not in their vestments, but in Court dress. This promise was verbally kept. The Host was not carried in procession, but the elevation took place, in sight of an immense crowd, from the balcony of Westminster Cathedral. The obscure streets through which the procession, consisting of a great body of priests, passed were thronged. The crowd was quiet, and the immense gathering of Catholics before the Cathedral bared their heads in silence when the monstrance containing the Host was held up to them by the Legate, to the sound of bugles. The ceremony, therefore, rather gained in picturesqueness from the Government's action. This is strongly resented by English and Irish Catholics, but the Vatican appears to take it philosophically. It is, we suspect, generally popular, and its object was clearly protective. But we are unable to reconcile it with our ordinary spirit and practice of religious toleration.

THE KING has sent a very warmly worded telegram of congratulation to the Sultan, nominally to mark the anniversary of his accession, but really to note his approval of the new Turkish Constitution. The telegram, which was sent direct to the Sultan, properly hopes that under the rule of freedom the Sultan's Empire will have a peaceful and prosperous future. The further suggestion that Abdul Hamid may secure "the veneration of posterity" seems rather more problematical. Meanwhile we feel bound to ask whether the Foreign Office is jointly responsible with the King for this communication.

* * *

BULGARIA has broken off diplomatic relations with Turkey and recalled her agent because the Turkish Foreign Minister refused to invite him to a banquet attended by all the representatives in Constantinople of foreign sovereign States. The Turkish point of view is that Bulgaria is a vassal State, and this is no doubt technically correct. But it is equally beyond doubt that of recent years the Bulgarian Agent has attended similar functions and that the time is particularly ill-chosen to raise such difficult questions, which affect very nearly the pride and the ambitions of the Bulgarian people. Turkey's great problem is to come to an arrangement with the nationalities. Of these at present the most difficult are the Bulgarians, who require very delicate handling. To fling into the political arena wholly unnecessarily the question of the constitutional relation of Bulgaria to Turkey is to commit an error of statecraft.

* * *

THERE ought not now to be much time lost in recognising Mulai Hafid, who has already been proclaimed throughout all Morocco. He has himself formally assumed responsibility for all treaties made with his predecessors, and France and Spain have submitted their conditions to the Powers. These include, in addition to the assumption by the Sultan of all treaty obligations, the acceptance by him of Abdul Aziz's debts, the disavowal of the Holy War, the payment of the Casa Blanca compensation, and the assurance of the security of the ports and roads. So far the terms were to be expected in a Franco-Spanish Note, and Mulai Hafid ought to have no difficulty in adopting them. The trouble will come after he is recognised, for France reserves the right to demand an indemnity for her military outlay. Mulai Hafid is neither morally nor legally bound to pay this, and, of course, cannot afford it. If France presses the demand it will be resisted, and Germany will stand behind Morocco because she is determined not to see Morocco at the mercy of France. The whole trouble will remain open and Morocco persist as the storm-centre of Europe.

* * *

ON Thursday the fifteenth Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union was opened in the Hall of the Reichstag in Berlin, and Prince von Bülow delivered a carefully prepared and important address. He described himself as a Chancellor, strictly and loyally Constitutional, though not a Parliamentary Minister in the full sense of the word. He maintained that the German Government was entirely on the side of peace, and reminded his audience of Germany's service at last year's Hague Conference in supporting the formation of an International Prize Court and a permanent Court of Arbitration. He also mentioned that his Government will take part in the Conference of naval Powers that is shortly to assemble in London. His object was evidently, as at the Hague Conference, to prove that Germany should not be regarded as an obstinate barrier in the way of peace, even though she resolutely refuses to accept proposals for the reduction of armaments on which she relies for the protection of her territory and sea-borne commerce. Perhaps the most significant part of a speech which produced a very favorable impression was his defence of the promoters of the Inter-Parliamentary Conference and other lovers of peace from the charge of lack of patriotism. In words that were evidently intended as a rebuke to the Chauvinists of Germany, he added: "Those are patriots who strive to prevent conflicts by combating ignorance, which is always mischievous; rancour, which is so unwholesome; hatred, which is often blind; and ambitions, which are sometimes misguided."

* * *

Mr. Churchill was married on Saturday at St. Margaret's, Westminster, to Miss Clementine Hozier. No marriage in which a public man was concerned has excited so much interest or drawn such enormous crowds since the wedding of Lord Rosebery's daughter. Mr. Churchill's personality attracts his countrymen through his spirit of energy and vivacity, his power of work, his abundant, and at times almost classical, eloquence, and a certain frankness and amiability of bearing which give charm to hard political fighting. His personal popularity derives importance from the fact that his work at the Board of Trade assigns him a large share in the task of keeping Liberalism and Labor together.

* * *

His proposal to set up a permanent court of arbitration is a step in this direction. It necessarily retains the voluntary basis of the Conciliation Act, for British trade unions at present reject compulsory arbitration, and it can only be set in motion with the assent of each party to an industrial dispute. The court is to be chosen by the Board of Trade from three panels, the first, from which the Chairmen are drawn, consisting of two eminently impartial men of the character of Lord Courtney or Lord James; the second, of employers of a temperate type; the third, of representative workmen and trade unionists. The numbers of the court may be three or five. In the first case, it would consist of one person taken from the three panels; in the second, of two representatives of capital and two of labor, plus the chairman. The second type of court would, we should say, be the more acceptable to workmen. The scheme has been received with great favor and we imagine that leading capitalists and trade unionists have been wisely taken into Mr. Churchill's confidence during its incubation.

* * *

The Joint Committee of Lords and Commons on Lotteries and Indecent Advertisements has made a useful if rather tardy series of recommendations. The evil of newspaper lotteries, thinly disguised as skilled competitions, has now almost run its course, and we should say that more than one great fortune has been built upon it. The Committee are now proposing that it should be made illegal for a conductor of a newspaper or periodical to charge any form of entrance fee, including the purchase and return of coupons, for prize competitions in newspapers. We hope that this will put down the evil, though it clearly does not deal with the advertising of premium bonds, which are very thinly disguised lotteries. The Committee do not think it wise to stop lottery circulars in the post, but propose to bring all circulars or advertisements concerning lotteries under the Lotteries Act. We hope that the Government will rapidly frame and carry a Bill on these lines. It is high time to stop the mad fit of gambling which has disorganised people of all ages and classes, but especially, we suspect, the young, and to which, to its eternal shame, the Press has been the chief tempter.

* * *

Cholera, which during the last two months has been creeping slowly up from the Caucasus, has broken out violently in St. Petersburg, where in the last week there have been more than a thousand cases and over 250 deaths. The authorities had ample warning, but apparently have looked upon the possibility of an epidemic with true Russian heedlessness. The head of the Sanitary Board went to Carlsbad, no proper hospital accommodation was provided, an impure water supply was tolerated, and nothing was done to improve the horribly insanitary dwellings of the poor, although it is notorious that bad water and bad sanitation are the most favorable media for cholera propagation. The epidemic is not yet at its height in St. Petersburg, although it is impossible to say whether that city is likely to suffer as severely as during previous visitations. The disease has undoubtedly come to Russia overland from India viâ Persia, but there is little prospect of its spreading beyond Russian territory. Other countries, in particular Germany, are already taking precautions, and are not neglecting the teachings of experience.

* * *

The German Secretary to the Treasury has laid before the Federal Council his plan for putting the German Budget in order, though its details have not yet been made public. If the debt service is to be put on a sound basis, and revenue and expenditure are to be balanced without recourse to loans, then at least £20,000,000 of new taxes will have to be raised. The difficulty is not that Germany is too poor to meet the demand, but that constitutional and political interests are involved. On the one hand the individual States want to keep direct taxation to themselves, and to have their contributions to Imperial funds reduced and fixed; on the other hand the Agrarians want to put the new burdens upon the consumer and the industrialist by means of indirect taxes, while the Liberal parties want direct taxation. The Government scheme, as outlined in the "North German Gazette," is a compromise favoring the Agrarians and meeting the wishes of the States. It includes heavier liquor and tobacco duties, a tax on electricity and gas for lighting purposes, a modification of the State contributions, and an extension of the Imperial death duties. The bloc is pretty certain to vote it without very substantial alteration.

* * *

The German Social Democrats have been meeting in Congress at Nuremberg since Monday. A record attendance of delegates was registered, though illness kept Herr von Vollmar, the leader of the South Germans, away, and Herr Bebel could not arrive till late. The various reports were distinctly optimistic. Among other facts it was shown that the Socialist vote at Berlin alone for the Landtag in 1908 was greater than the Socialist vote in all Prussia in 1903. The party Press has 1,061,289 subscribers, a slight increase on the previous year, though the economic depression has reacted seriously on newspapers. The most important debate arose out of the action of the Socialist members of the Baden, Bavarian, and Würtemberg Parliaments in voting their State Budgets. Herr Bebel delivered a strong speech in favor of maintaining the old aloofness, which was not only a symbolic protest against the existing order of society, but helped to keep the party independent of other parties, and free from the taint of opportunism, so fatal to its revolutionary spirit. At the time of writing the debate has not concluded, and the supporters of the Social Democratic Party can only hope that the question will be settled in such a way as to preserve the power of unity, though, so far, there is no sign of concession on either side.

* * *

We much regret to record the death near Oulton Broad, under melancholy circumstances, of Professor Churton Collins, an honored contributor to The Nation, and a figure of genuine power and significance in our contemporary literary criticism. In a time of much charlatanry, Professor Churton Collins was an unsparing anti-charlatan, and his own learning, while now and then a little wilfully and hardly used, was at the service of good causes and honest views of life and literature. He was one of the two or three most learned of English journalists. His knowledge of seventeenth and eighteenth century literature was both wide and deep, and he was right in insisting on associating the study of literature in our schools and universities with the great classical masters, and dissociating it from mere "gerund-grinding" or even philology. As a reviewer he could write roughly of work which was disfigured by gross faults of style or by inaccuracy or pretence, but he was a just, and at times enthusiastic, appraiser of honest and competent work. At the time of his death he was engaged in a very necessary and timely effort to raise the standard of journalism, and to associate it with definite courses of study.

* * *

Dr. Hagberg Wright has sent to "The Times" an interesting account of his visit to Tolstoy in order to present to him the Address of his English friends. He says that public demonstrations have been mainly suppressed, to the great indignation of the people, though some provincial governors have allowed their Dumas to pass resolutions and send telegrams. He found Tolstoy weak, but his face lit up with a "benign and spiritual look." Of the hundreds of Addresses he has received on his eightieth birthday, the one which pleased him most came from the waiters in a fashionable restaurant in Moscow, which assured him that they were "becoming human beings who have a consciousness of God and are striving towards eternal truth."

* * *

The question has again been raised, our Rome correspondent writes, whether Socialists should interest themselves or not in international policy. Deputy Bissolati, who was for many years editor of the "Avanti," the Socialist leading organ, writes on the subject a most interesting article in the popular paper the "Messaggero." Signor Bissolati, who is one of the best balanced minds which the Italian Socialist Party possesses, says that only revolutionary Socialists or pure anarchists can seriously advocate the neglect of foreign policy. Instead, all Socialists who abandon utopian projects cannot fail to understand that foreign policy has an enormous influence on the economic and social conditions of a country, and should not be disregarded. As a practical example, he points to the present situation in Europe, saying that there is no doubt that German foreign policy represents a constant danger to the peace of many millions of people, a threat to their lives, possessions, work, and tranquillity. The German Government and the Kaiser, according to Deputy Bissolati, are dominated by the idea that they must fight England. He thinks that this conflagration, of which no one can foresee the consequences, can be averted chiefly through a loyal understanding between Austria and Italy, both of which are interested in avoiding a conflict with England. It is, he thinks, almost impossible that Germany will insist on an aggressive policy if both her allies are against her. From all this Signor Bissolati comes to the conclusion that it is an imperious duty for the Socialist Party to use the whole of its influence to help the Austro-Italian understanding.

* * *

A Paris jury has acquitted Grégori who fired two shots at and wounded Major Dreyfus when Zola's remains were being transferred to the Panthéon. The jury may have meant by its verdict that Grégori was the victim of a mad impulse, though he had deliberation enough to make his will and buy a new revolver for the occasion; or that the firing was harmless, though the bullets actually inflicted a slight wound and might have inflicted a worse; or that it regarded the affair, as Grégori said, as a symbolic demonstration against "Dreyfusism," and sympathised with its purpose. If this last be the correct explanation then it is a grave index of a revival of reaction, for which M. Clemenceau must bear some responsibility.

* * *

Charity is profiting from the spite of party journalism. The other day a Manchester paper had to pay £300 to a Manchester hospital for libelling Mr. Churchill; now a London organ of gossip has to pay £315 to the Carnarvon Infirmary for similar treatment of Mr. Lloyd George. It is noticeable that the type of journalism which is most indifferent to public interests should be the most malicious in its treatment of private persons.

* * *

Here is the week's return of motor-car accidents, and significant occurrences in connection with them:— A chauffeur called Levy was charged on Tuesday with the manslaughter of a market porter. A woman, who was also run down, said that the car "flashed upon them" without sound or warning, and going at a great pace. The man had been repeatedly convicted under the loosest of Acts, once for refusing to stop after an accident. He was sentenced to four months' imprisonment, but it appeared that the County Council had no power to withdraw his licence, but only to endorse it with convictions, and that this endorsement did not apply to manslaughter! Last week a boy of thirteen was knocked down by a motor car going at a great speed, and killed. The car, occupied by two men, drove off and left him lying there. The car came round a sharp corner, giving no notice of its approach. It travelled between thirty and forty miles an hour, and another car was driven into the hedge to avoid it. The owner proved to be Lord Newborough, who has expressed deep sympathy with the boy's relatives, and his chauffeur, a Frenchman, has been arrested and charged. A boy of six was killed at Deptford on Sunday by a motor car, which was going slowly, and which he did not see. A motor car, which is said to have been racing another car at between thirty and forty miles an hour, knocked down a man at Kingston and injured him seriously. The defendant declared that he was going only eighteen miles an hour. A young Birmingham metal worker rode on his cycle into a car and sustained grievous injuries. Lord Curzon has been badly cut about the head by a car which swerved and is said to have crashed into his vehicle "with terrific force." A string of cars, one of them occupied by the Duke of Connaught, who has been in more than one accident, frightened a horse in Ireland, and his driver sustained injuries to the knee.

Politics and Affairs.

THE DOCTRINE OF TOLERANCE.

We can quite understand the argument which underlay the Prime Minister's virtual prohibition of the carrying of the Host through some streets of London last Sunday, and we can well believe that his action is widely, if not generally, popular. Nevertheless, in stating that argument, we shall venture to disagree with it. We imagine that Mr. Asquith acted in the main on one consideration, that of public order, and that he took no account of the religious controversy save so far as it promised to disturb the peace of the London streets and to imperil the safety of the processionists. The modern State, even though it is loosely associated with one religious organisation, tends to neutrality in matters of faith, and this is at once the drift of opinion and the special heritage of our own people and their usually tolerant creed and attitude of mind. Mr. Asquith, we assume, thought that there was danger of a riot, which would take the peculiarly gross form of insults paid to a much-cherished religious symbol, and revenged by violence, or even by bloodshed. For this belief there was some ground. We much regret to see that Mr. Hyslop, the Organising Secretary of the Protestant Alliance, threatened disturbance to the procession by means of "twenty arrangements" to "bring the Host to the ground." We are unable to sympathise with a mood which calls itself Christian, and yet can feel either pleasure or a sense of spiritual security in wounding the feelings of other Christians. But we suppose that similar intimations were conveyed to the police and to Ministers—though the Home Secretary does not appear to have been influenced by them—and that they had their effect. Governments do not take risks, if they can avoid them.

Nor can we quite acquit the processionists of a touch of provocativeness. Protestants do not like to be told that Christ has returned to England after an absence of some hundreds of years, accompanied by a Papal Legate; and we should have thought that the carrying of the Host before a mixed body of believers and sceptics, in a country unsympathetic to the ceremony, would have repelled a sensitive Catholic. It would have been wiser to dissociate the Legate's visit from even the suggestion of illegality; it would have been good taste to maintain the private and intimate character of the ceremonies which accompanied it. The century that has passed and that which has begun are chiefly notable in Catholic history as having witnessed the triumph of Ultramontanism, the re-modelling of the Catholic Church into a stiff system of highly conservative polity, bearing the sign-manual of the Vatican Decrees and the Encyclical and Syllabus of 1864. The present Pope has reversed the fitfully liberal foreign policy of his predecessor, as well as its marked French tendencies, and is at war not only with the old Gallican ideas but with the existing government of the great Republic over the water. The dominant Catholicism of to-day is not that which Newman made familiar to many devout thinkers in Great Britain; it is a practice, if not a doctrine, of an older and less agreeable brand. Finally, Mr. Asquith had behind him the fact that an existing law and proclamation made the procession of the Host, attended by priests in vestments, illegal. Therefore, if he had sanctioned and protected the procession, he would have had against him the contention, for all that it was worth, that the Government were helping the professors of an alien creed to break the law. It might have been difficult to defend in Parliament a strong use of the police in such an enterprise. Putting these more or less formidable pleas together, the Government, after an unsuccessful attempt at private negotiation, intervened publicly, and virtually compelled the promoters of the Congress to divest the procession of its special religious significance.

Something like this chain of reasoning, we suppose, was responsible for the Prime Minister's decision. But we may take the decisive fact about his action to be that the Government were subject to much pressure from the militant Protestant societies, that they resisted it for a time, and that finally they yielded to it. We wish that their first thought had also been their second, for we are sure that it was the best. We hear much of the duty of Governments. A primal duty of a Liberal Government is to see fair play, and to be, if necessary, stricter in the application of its general principles of tolerance when the practice of religious ceremonies is in question. Against this plain business of Liberalism many powerful elements are at war. In these days majorities, perfectly secure in the possession of their rights and of their material power, are given to taking fright at minorities or possible rivals, which seem to threaten them either physically or by virtue of their seeming intellectual strength. Thus the Australian is afraid, or pretends to be afraid, of the Japanese; white America fears the advance of the negro; Great Britain alarmed itself about the Boers, and now has a recurring panic about invasion by the German Fleet. It seems to us a real dereliction of duty when Governments feed this kind of panic, instead of using all their influence to stem it and to see that justice is done to its victims. What had English Protestantism to fear from a dozen processions of the Blessed Sacrament? And how does it imagine that its case against the Roman Catholic Church is strengthened when it goes back upon its own position of toleration and uses against Catholicism the intolerance which it insists that both history and the implications of Catholic doctrine fasten upon the Roman Church? The impression made by Protestants who try to stop a procession of the Host by threatening to "bring it to the ground" is that they are frightened of the advance of Catholicism. But if they can devise no better way of combatting it than by threats of force, they will find no friends among thoughtful people, among those who believe that all religions have elements of good in them, and that the essence of the religious appeal must be to the enlightened reason of man. We recall what happened to those who disbelieved in the policy or the justice of the Boer War. They were told that the public expression of their opinions imposed an unendurable strain on human nature, and that the authorities might therefore consider themselves relieved of the burden of protecting them in the exercise of free speech. That right was partially preserved, no thanks to the Government of the day. Now the prevalence of the same mood of popular excitement and indignation is pleaded, and with success, as a reason for disallowing a religious procession rather than for taking effectual precautions to save it from violence in the streets. We answer that we cannot listen to such arguments in the name of Liberalism, or of that spirit of tolerance which showed its first strong shoots in the Puritan and Quaker movements, and expanded in noble fruitage in the teaching of the early Anglican divines. It is easy to say that there are bounds to the spirit of tolerance; we have never found that human nature was inclined to err in the direction of over-stepping them.

No doubt the position is to some degree compromised by the nominal illegality of the procession. We say "nominal," for who can yield full authority to a law which has been allowed to sink into forgetfulness, which has again and again been broken, which qualifies the right of procession for a single religious profession, and whose reluctant verbiage no modern House of Commons would endorse? It would have been better if the Catholics had yielded when the remembrance of the Act of 1829 and the proclamation of 1852 was revived. But they cannot be very seriously blamed for thinking that the England of 1908 had grown out of the fears that encumbered a tardy Act of civil emancipation nearly eighty years ago. Having allowed them to think so when the procession was announced and organised, the Government were certainly under some obligation to see them through. But we are not concerned for the Catholics. They are likely to gain more from the frustration of the procession than they could have hoped to secure from the peaceful holding of it. What we dislike is the bowing of the Government before a threat of violence to a minority of its subjects, linked with the idea that the prevailing form of religion can suffer by the parade of the symbol of a faith that the nation as a whole has renounced. This is quite against the true genius of our race, which has gone on for centuries in the great business of continually enlarging the boundaries of free thought for the spirit of man, and free action for all his forms of faith.

THE LIMITS OF INDUSTRIAL ARBITRATION.

Mr. Churchill has taken a new and serviceable step towards the establishment of industrial peace by his proposal to use the powers given by the Conciliation Act of 1896 to set up a Standing Court of Arbitration. The nature of the proposed change has been somewhat misstated. The Act of 1896, it will be remembered, empowered the Board of Trade to do four things; first, to inquire into the causes and circumstances of trade disputes; secondly, to assist in bringing the parties together with a view to an amicable settlement of their disputes; thirdly, on the application of either of the two parties, to appoint a conciliator or a board of conciliation; lastly, on the application of both parties, to appoint an arbitrator. Though a large and increasing number of disputes has each year been settled under the Act, it has become quite evident that its full utility has been hampered by defects in the machinery for arbitration. The proposal to enlarge this instrument by establishing courts of three or five arbitrators, selected in equal numbers from a panel of employers and workmen, with a chairman, "a person of eminence and impartiality," similarly drawn from a panel of chairmen, has several advantages over the existing system. In the first place, it substitutes a permanent for a casual tribunal; secondly, it provides a number of trained and experienced arbitrators with growing competence for their delicate work; and last, not least, its representative character will command a larger confidence from both parties to disputes than can be expected to attach to a single arbitrator, however carefully selected.

The stress laid by Mr. Churchill in his Memorandum upon this question of confidence in the personnel of the Court, will not be regarded as excessive by anyone acquainted with the susceptibilities, both of employers and of workmen, in a trade dispute. Workmen in particular have every reason to scrutinise closely the selection of a single arbitrator in cases where some vital interest of wages, hours, or other trade condition is affected. It is not so much that they fear the appointment of a judge who will either fail to give proper consideration to their statement of the case, or will be influenced by prejudices against trade unionism and the cause of labor. This charge has been very seldom brought against any of the eminent lawyers or business men who have been summoned to act as arbitrators or umpires in great trade disputes. But there is a feeling that such men, moving habitually in the society of masters, are likely to be biassed unconsciously in favor of employers' points of view. Now, this might not matter very much if the issues they were called upon to determine were issues of hard fact, to be reached by the application of accepted canons. But though sometimes the interpretation of a sliding scale or of the terms of some other quite explicit agreement is at stake, more commonly the matter in dispute lies in a region of opposing interests, where no accepted rules of valuation hold. The consideration of a "fair wage," rate of pay for overtime, regulation of apprentices, and other claims, all resting on some slippery computation of what "the trade will bear," allows indefinite play for notions and sympathies, and it is rarely possible to state clearly and convincingly the grounds on which a decision is based. In a word, the judgment in most instances cannot resemble that of an ordinary law court, but is either a judicious compromise, or else registers a conclusion which, in the opinion of the arbitrator, would ultimately have been reached as the result of the struggle which has been avoided. Under such circumstances, the regular presence of one or two employers and workmen in each Court must greatly increase the confidence of both parties, and is likely to lead to a great extension of the use of this mode of settling disputes.

The experiment, indeed, has a growing importance given to it by the clear recognition that, on the one hand, the day of great conflicts between capital and labor shows no signs of passing, while, on the other, compulsory arbitration is acceptable, in this country at any rate, neither to employers nor to workmen. Though last week's vote at the Trade Union Congress showed a less majority than that of last year against the principle of compulsory intervention of the State in trade disputes, the masses of the people are evidently not prepared for so signal an enlargement of State interference. The theory of such compulsory intervention on behalf of public order and of the general body of consumers, often grievously injured by the sudden stoppage of a trade, is overwhelmingly strong, but its early enforcement in face of the opposition of the several trades is quite impracticable. Moreover, the recent experience of New Zealand and Australia in the working of compulsory arbitration is throwing grave doubts upon its efficacy as an instrument of industrial peace. The report of Mr. Aves to the Board of Trade gives some considerable support to the opinion that compulsory arbitration may prove unable to stand the strain of a period of industrial adversity, in which the workers will be called upon to accept awards of reduced wages. At any rate it is quite clear that the trade unionists in this country are not willing to abandon "the right to strike," which is involved in a real system of compulsory intervention by the State. But though the proposed development of Arbitration Courts carries with it no formal power of compulsion, the greater facility of voluntary agreement it furnishes may be expected to exercise a growing though informal pressure, both on workmen and employers, to have recourse to this mode of peaceful settlement. It may become disreputable to brawl in public when an easy and an equitable alternative presents itself. Thus, though the right to strike and to lock-out remains unimpaired, the desire to use a right so barbarous and so expensive may be weakened. For it is surely true that the sight of means to do good deeds makes good deeds done.

While, however, we consider the Board of Trade is wise in not moving towards any form of compulsory settlement of trade disputes, we would gladly support an increase of its power to institute inquiries. At present this power is crippled seriously by an inability to compel attendance of witnesses and to secure documentary and other evidence material to such process of inquiry. If upon the eve of an impending outbreak of hostilities between capital and labor a representative court, similar to the new Arbitration Court, were empowered to go fully into the facts of the dispute and to publish the result of their inquiry, the moral effect of such procedure, both upon the public mind and on the two contending parties, would be most salutary. A strike or a lock-out, persistently pursued in the teeth of a clear official adjudication on the facts, would carry with it so grave a responsibility that only recklessness or despair would make it possible. We should like to see the new step in public arbitration followed by this acquisition of the right of full compulsory inquiry for which, we think, popular opinion is already ripe.

TWO SCHOOLS OF SOCIALISM.

An identical industrial system has all but succeeded in imposing a common life and a uniform evolution upon the peoples of Western Europe. It is the mill-chimney which everywhere makes the sky, the tenement which makes the home, the struggle of organised classes which more and more tends to dictate the march of history. Even the devices which nations have created to accentuate their individuality end only by setting the same problems to the working-class, and across frontiers their thinkers join hands in the struggle against the tariff and the barracks. September has brought with it the annual congress of the various Socialist parties, and in Germany, France, and Italy, the issue which divides them is essentially the same. It is in one form or another the incessant battle between revolutionary and evolutionary schools. It turns in Germany on the question whether a Socialist Party may consistently aid a middle-class Government in carrying its Budget, in France and Italy on the expediency of general strikes. M. Jaurès in France, and Herr von Vollmar in South Germany both aim at a gradual penetration of society, by means of the wedge of universal suffrage and the phalanx of a slow trade-union action—at its transformation by layer upon layer of partial reforms and single concessions, without violence, and without catastrophes. They see in the parties to the right of them, groups of reasoning men who at no time represent any single or solid interest, but rather fluctuating tendencies of opinion which may be influenced and persuaded. They are ready to compromise and transact with the groups that stand nearest them, to envelop them if possible in an atmosphere of sympathy and conciliation, and to yield them a discriminating support, if thereby the immediate aims of labor may be forwarded. To Herr Bebel and the materialist school the very notions of sympathy and persuasion are suspect. They will see in history no movement of ideas, but only a steadily sharpening conflict of interests. They have no desire to encourage open-minded opportunist groups, ready to act with them on questions of detail. The world for them is either black or white, either bourgeois or proletariat, and the triumph of their cause can come only by the slow desertion of individuals, from one organised host to the other. So far from preferring the tolerant and easy-going politics of South Germany to the crude antagonisms of Prussia, they are ready to argue that Prussia, with its narrow ruling caste of squires and manufacturers, its militarism and its class-franchise, is actually more advanced than kindly Bavaria, where universal suffrage prevails, and Socialist Deputies are welcomed in Ministerial drawing-rooms. It is more advanced, because the class-war is sharper, more conscious, and less merciful.

Such large differences as these cannot be settled by resolutions at a Congress, and it matters very little what the majority at Nuremberg decides. They depend on temperament, and still more on the daily atmosphere of politics. In Prussia the Marxist doctrine seems reasonable and self-evident, for the middle-class itself acts on the assumption of an inevitable class war, and was, indeed, the first to proclaim it. In Bavaria, as in France and in England, it loses its plausibility because the middle-class is not solid, and manifestly modifies the pursuit and defence of its interests by sympathy for the workmen and a steady regard for the general good. There is no doubt, however, that the Socialist parties in the diets of Baden and Bavaria have defied the principles not only of German but of international Socialism. To refuse to vote the Budget at its third reading has become a sort of sacramental act by which the orthodox Socialist affirms his attitude of unrelenting opposition to capitalism. To vote the Budget is to sanction the whole machinery of armies and police on which rests the system of "wage slavery." It is intelligible that even a moderate Socialist should shrink from this complaisance in a national Parliament, where the Budget includes naval and military and colonial credits. But that difficulty does not arise in Baden and Bavaria. The South German Socialists have two arguments on which they rely. They had succeeded, "in committee," as we should say, in sensibly improving these Budgets in a democratic sense. Were they to repudiate their own work on the third reading? Moreover, had they voted against a relatively friendly government, the result would have been to place a reactionary clerical minority in power. Clearly, without the option of voting the Budget, a Socialist Party must become a mere instrument for wrecking, powerless to secure social reforms, because it is unable to guarantee a relatively enlightened "bourgeois" government against the hostility of a decidedly hostile opposition. The absurdity of the intransigent attitude was well illustrated by the history of the "bloc" in France. While M. Combes was in power, M. Jaurès was the power behind the throne, the inspirer of policies, the orator who made the spirit of the Chamber, the real organiser and leader of the majority. When M. Clemenceau came upon the scene, he was forced in his quest for a stable majority to bid for the support of the Left Centre. For, as he often reminded the Socialists, they were not to be trusted in an emergency, since even M. Jaurès was compelled to obey the decision of the Amsterdam Congress and to vote against any Budget in its final form. Socialism, within these limitations, may wield the personal influence which the talents of its individual leaders confer upon it. It can intervene on occasion to force a reform or wreck a policy. It may in favorable circumstances make or destroy a Government. But it cannot exert the steady pressure to which the weight of the numbers behind it entitles it. In so far as it is a party of protest, it cannot be a party of construction.

In Germany, one suspects, the distant future lies with the revisionists, but their success will be delayed, just so long as Prince Bülow succeeds in maintaining the three-class franchise in Prussia. Up till the last election Socialism had not a single representative in the Prussian Diet, and even now its deputies are reckoned by a single figure. For a party in that position, formidable, intelligent, and numerous outside the House, but wholly impotent within it, there is no possible attitude save that of ceaseless and uncompromising opposition. Until universal suffrage gives it in Prussia the same opportunities and responsibilities as it possesses in South Germany, "revisionism" will seem to it a foolishness. Herr Bebel's mistake is his failure to recognise that circumstances alter cases, and his doctrinaire habit of dictating to Bavarians and Frenchmen a strategy which hard necessity has imposed upon Prussians. The unity of the party will be strained in the interval, but it is probable that pride in its discipline, in its ever-growing numbers, its great financial resources, and its influential press will succeed in keeping it together. In the Reichstag at least there is little or no friction, and there can be no temptation to compromise while Prince Bülow keeps "Radicals" and Conservatives together in an unnatural alliance.

In France, on the other hand, the risk of an internecine struggle is much more serious between the "reformist" and the catastrophic schools. The French extremists have indeed little or nothing in common with the German doctrinaires, save a belief in the class war, and in the coming dies irae. The federation of trade unions (C. G. T.), under the leadership of a dictatorial and probably unrepresentative clique, has succeeded in two years in destroying the prestige which the genius of M. Jaurès had won for Parliamentary Socialism. It is continually fomenting angry strikes, which aim not so much at securing better conditions for some trade or trades, as at sowing terror in the heart of the bourgeoisie. Nothing concrete is ever won by these demonstrations, but the leaders are satisfied to think that they are awakening the militant spirit of labor, and rehearsing that general strike by which society is one day to be overthrown, as it were, by a puff of wind. The immediate result is that society becomes every day more angry and reactionary. Its patriotism revolts against the extravagant anti-militarism of this clique. Its pocket is affected and its temper tried by such escapades as the sudden turning-out of the lights of Paris. It retorts by acquitting the anti-Dreyfusard broiler, Grégori, by delaying such social reforms as old age pensions, and by forming employers' syndicates, and using the lock-out. The Socialists see themselves cold-shouldered by the Radicals in the Chamber. Every week brings some fresh incident, which turns on a dismissal of a Socialist teacher or a Trade-Unionist postman. The better Radicals hardly dare to associate with a party so suspect, and more selfish Radicals turn with alacrity to the thought of compromising alliances with the Conservative groups. For long M. Jaurès, busy with his continual duel against M. Clemenceau and his protests against the Moroccan adventure, refrained from active polemics against these reckless revolutionists. But at length he has broken silence. In a series of powerful and eloquent articles in "L'Humanité" he is restating the case for a disciplined evolutionary strategy. He has shown how essential are Parliamentary reforms as a complement to Trade-Unionist action, how impossible it is to combine a strategy of provocation with a strategy of constructive effort, how grotesque is the idea of a general strike while the trade-unionists are still a minority of the working class, and, finally, how necessary it is for French Trade-Unionism to imitate the English method of balloting before strikes, if ever the workers are to have confidence in each other and faith in their leaders. These articles are manifestly a preparation for a conflict which must settle the future of French Socialism for some time to come. The "C.G.T." is, unfortunately, an organisation quite distinct from the Parliamentary party, and its leaders profess to be indifferent to Parliamentary reforms. The party cannot control it, but it is none the less compromised by its tactics in the eyes of the country. In France, as in Germany, evolutionary Socialism can only hope to exert its due influence, after the preliminary trial of a struggle with the cataclysmsic schools. It will be a war of many campaigns; the decisive battle is not yet ranged.

THE HISTORY OF RELIGION.

The study of the development of religion, though one of the youngest branches of sociology, is among the most living and progressive. It is but the other day that the data came to hand which made it possible as a systematic inquiry. To our fathers the history of religion meant the development of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, with a wholly outside account of Græco-Roman mythology, and a little knowledge of Hinduism thrown in. But during the last half of the nineteenth century new material became accessible in every quarter. Sanscrit and Pali scholars put the principal texts of the Vedas, of Brahmanism, and of Buddhism at the disposal of the comparative student. Dr. Legge's translations of Confucius and Mencius were included in the sacred books of the East. The mysteries of Taoism were unveiled for the English reader by more than one translator. The text of the Zend Avesta became available for comparison on the one hand with the Vedic mythology, on the other with the development of Judaism. Babylonian cuneiform script and Egyptian hieroglyphs yielded the secret of religions and of ethics which were ancient at the date which Archbishop Ussher assigned to Moses. A mass, a still imperfectly digested mass, of material derived from the study of contemporary savages and barbarians, threw new lights on the early history of religion, and affected the interpretation of much that is to be found among more advanced peoples. It became clear that quite apart from theological controversy here was a field of absorbing interest for the sociological explorer. It became clear that, taking the world over, there operate within human society certain permanent forces building up, with endless variations of detail but yet with many a striking analogy, and perhaps with a certain essential identity of function and meaning, the fabric of local, tribal, national, and world religions. If we bring these forces together into a single conception, and speak of them as the religious spirit, then the object of comparative religion is to trace the evolution of this spirit and discover the variety of forms which it assumes, to ascertain the other social forces by which it is influenced, and to measure its function and value in social life.

All are objects, so to say, of positive science. They can be inquired into without necessarily raising the question of the truth or falsity of any given religion. It is true that to hold to the special revelation of one particular religion, or of a given set of religious truths, is to put that religion in a special place within the field of inquiry. But the Christian who takes the traditional doctrines of revelation in the most literal sense only applies it to his own religion, and, as a rule, only to that religion at, so to say, certain critical points. He has no occasion to deny that all the rest of religious history exhibits an evolution which is of profound interest to the student of society in general and of the religious life and its bearing on law and ethics in particular. But in reality few instructed theologians of the modern school would any longer interpret inspiration upon such hard and fast lines as would remove their own religion—however profound their conviction of its dogmatic truth—from the sphere of comparative investigation. It is in this broadening view of the entire meaning of religious life and truth that the significance of such a gathering as the Congress of the History of Religion is to be seen.

The Congress had its first meeting at Paris in 1900, its second at Basle four years ago, and now, most significant of all, it has just held its third meeting at Oxford. A more liberal strain has long been making its way into the religious thought of that ancient University. Stimulated, perhaps, by the turn given to philosophical idealism by Green and Caird, the Oxford world was ready for a more philosophic interpretation of religious teaching. The foundation of a non-sectarian school of theology at Manchester College secured a basis for disinterested theological research, and the theological faculty itself contains men of the moderation and learning of Dr. Sanday and Hebraists like Canon Driver whose "Old Testament Literature" is a convenient text-book of the results of scholarship in reconstructing Old Testament history. In Professor Tylor, who is Hon. President of the Congress, Oxford has in her midst the founder of English anthropology, and she has more than one original worker to carry on the tradition and apply the results of anthropological research in other fields—to her own special subject, classical literature, as well as to the pastures new of more modern learning. As no other English city preserves so much of the fragrance of the past in the midst of the stir of modern life, so perhaps there is no home better suited for cultivating the true spirit in which the study of development should be approached. The sense of growth in social tradition, of secular process of change in thought and institutions, and of deep underlying identity of human nature and social structure—is hardly to be communicated by books or proved in so many propositions. It is more like an atmosphere of thought which is to be breathed or felt, and nowhere is it more readily felt than at Oxford.

The history of religion will not of itself yield us intrinsic speculative truth on the fundamental problems. Yet it has an educative influence which may help us to understand these problems better. It teaches the most dogmatic among us some sympathy with the gropings of mankind. It emphasises the essential importance of the meaning and the relative emptiness of the inadequate form in which the meaning is conveyed. It tends to show how near men draw to one another, all unconsciously, perhaps, in proportion as they dig down to the deepest truths, and how shallow and valueless by comparison are the differences of formula that create the contentions and controversies. We may even go one step further, and suggest that the whole history of religion and ethics as revealed, imperfectly enough as yet, to the comparative student is not barren of meaning, but is full of developmental significance. It was Comte who said, "L'homme devient de plus en plus religieux." The statement will be accepted in very different senses by different people, in accordance with their definition of religion. But it has its significance. The history of religion, dispassionately studied in relation to the whole of social life, is an integral part of the development of purpose in human history. The story which is meaningless when we confine it to a string of external evidence, and worthless when we approach human development with biological preconceptions, acquires a wholly new meaning when we regard it as a record of the slow growth of mind in man, when we regard institutions as the practical shape in which social problems are experimentally solved, ideas and doctrines as theoretic solutions of the riddles of life, appropriate each to its own stage of growth. The conception of a great metaphysical school of the mind as gradually "coming to itself," and so entering on its kingdom through all the vicissitudes of history, acquires a new meaning from the sociological study of development, and to this meaning the comparative study of religion has much that is essential to contribute.

THE ROAD AND THE PEOPLE.

Since last we wrote upon the "Lost Liberty of the Road" the question has advanced a stage, and we are glad to hear that the Local Government Board are about to deal with it. It is no longer necessary to arouse public feeling, for feeling is everywhere awake. It is no longer necessary to argue the most obvious points with the dialecticians of motoring, for the public have begun to use their own eyes and ears and noses. The regretted accident to Lord Curzon is not necessary to remind the world that motorists themselves are exposed, like the humble cyclist and pedestrian, to the dangers caused by the recklessness of others. There is no need for a new Charles Lamb to appeal to the Bench of Bishops to sacrifice one of their number in a "smash" for the common good. "Even Sodor and Man" would be superfluous. The experiences of the summer holidays brings the whole question home directly to the vast bulk of the middle-class, who find that quiet has fled the world, and that a tramp on moorland or mountain, shunning all roads, is the only method left of avoiding dust, noise, worry, and danger. Parliament meets in the autumn, when the memories of the summer and its daily list of casualties will still be fresh in the mind, and it will be asked to take some practical step. Already motorists are palpably nervous. On the one hand they issue their own proclamations against "inconsiderate driving," as if that were the exceptional offence of a contemptible minority; on the other they are ready in advance with laudations of Mr. Burns as too good a friend to their sport to do anything rash. In a word, having failed to fight the movement, they propose now to capture it. They will put forward a set of innocuous or unworkable regulations, in return for which they will ask the abolition of the speed limit. They will join in loud denunciations of the "road-hog," get the means for more public expenditure in dust-laying experiments, and then everything will go on as before.

That is, we take it, the programme. How is it to be met? What practical steps are to be taken to recover the use and enjoyment of the roads for the public? A host of correspondents have sent us a multiplicity of suggestions. Unfortunately every new writer has a weakness to point out in the remedy of somebody else. Excessive speed is virtually the sole cause of the entire trouble. There we are all substantially agreed. But how to get the speed checked? We are dealing, as statistics of conviction show, with an exceptionally lawless class—with men rich and powerful enough to snap their fingers at law and magistrates. We are dealing with a machine which, as one terrible incident after another illustrates, provides for callous and unscrupulous drivers the ready means of escape from pursuit. We should like to see a return of the number of motorists now credibly supposed to be at large who have fled leaving their victims to die. The problem of keeping the new machine in order is enormously complicated by the fact that it is the favorite toy of the ruling class, who can employ the best available skill in its defence, and who man the entire administration to which its control is entrusted. Apart from this difficulty, the adequate protection of the public from the motor is a problem as new and as complex as was that of securing safety in railway travelling seventy years ago. The dangers of the railway appeared and were grappled with one by one. Even in quite late years it would seem that some imperfectly understood sources of danger have arisen, and three or four bad derailements have occurred without adequate assignable cause. The safe working of great machines sets a problem of constant and close surveilance to the public authority, and it is only little by little that it is solved. On the whole, in the case of railways so far as the travelling public is concerned the success has been most remarkable. There is no reason why it should be less complete in the case of motors. But the price to be paid is that of continual and close supervision, many experiments probably, many changes in the law, perhaps the erection of a special commission or other authority to frame regulations from time to time.

Take any single proposed regulation and it is easy to pick holes in it. A universal speed limit brought low enough would solve the problem if it could be enforced. But how enforce it? The construction of cars might be so regulated as to enforce the limit, but it is quite possible that the ingenuity of engineers would get round the difficulty. The use of the horn to "clear the course" is an annoyance in itself, and is an abuse which makes reckless speed possible. But if it were suppressed altogether we should have accidents ascribed to the action of the law. All such points require regulation, but instead of rough and ready rules they need detailed and close supervision. To take a single point. Something would be gained from Mr. Strauss's Bill limiting speed to ten miles an hour in populous places. But, first of all, in order to be effective, it would require a special police staff to enforce it, and, secondly, it leaves the country roads to take care of themselves. Now, country roads differ immensely in suitability for fast traffic. There are straight, open and unfrequented roads across moors where a very high speed is unobjectionable. The great "Routes Nationales" in France, laid down more like railways than roads in long straight stretches, broad and smooth, often avoiding villages and with few scattered houses on their sides, are suitable enough for the fast motor. The majority of our English roads are of a wholly different character, winding about between hedges, dusty, often narrow, and beset with cottages and hamlets round unsuspected corners. On such roads, even though there be no houses about, a speed of twelve or fifteen miles an hour is probably the maximum compatible with the comfort of other users of the road. It is astonishing to see the dust which even a slow-going and considerately driven motor will create.

The problem, then, is one of great complexity. It will probably involve the scheduling of the roads of the country with a view to special regulations—including in some cases the total prohibition of motor traffic—in each case. It will involve methods of inspection and police regulations which have not yet been attempted, and it may necessitate the creation of some central Commission to supervise the whole traffic. Such regulations would probably lead to the making of motor roads as a commercial speculation. Those who want to go at high speed and can afford to pay for it would be fully entitled to do so on roads made for them at their own expense. There must clearly be more differentiation than there is at present. But we would suggest that the time is come for the fuller and more regular discussion of remedies, and for a sustained attempt to focus public opinion, and obtain changes in the law that will really touch the trouble. The Road Union and the Highways Protection League have jointly issued a valuable pamphlet, in which the nature of the difficulty is set forth with moderation, but with unanswerable logic. We would suggest to these bodies that they should unite their forces, and then come forward with a more active and aggressive policy. They should call meetings, and make themselves heard at elections, parliamentary and municipal. Public opinion is behind them. It only wants to be organised and directed.

Life and Letters.

CAN MORALS BE TAUGHT?

Only a few years ago the very notion of an art of education, demanding serious separate study and capable of communication, was scouted alike by teacher and by parent in this country. The prevalent belief, to which the most successful teachers generally gave support, held that teaching was a purely personal grace, a gift or knack which came by nature and could not be acquired. It was, in fact, so incalculable and so incommunicable that it was a needless, or, indeed, a foolish, thing for any parent, about to send his children to a school, to enquire whether the teachers knew "how to teach." He might do well to ascertain what subjects were to be taught, what examinations the school prepared for, what games were played, and, if he were inquisitive, what "honours" the masters had taken at the University. But method of teaching—that was a phrase entirely destitute of meaning. He knew there were such persons as "born teachers," and he might be glad if his boy happened to come under one. But that was quite evidently a question of luck. It would be too much to say that this attitude has disappeared, for there are still plenty of well-to-do and "educated" parents, very solicitous about the food and games and "status" of a school, but prepared to hand over without demur the minds and morals of their children to be mauled by any smart young man fresh from the University, who, for want of any better opening in life, takes to teaching. More intelligent parents, however, are now coming to demand some evidence not merely of natural aptitude but of definite training in teachers, though it would perhaps be fairer to teachers to say that the new recognition and practice of teaching as a fine art have come from them more than from the parents.

But this advance of education towards a trained profession has been hampered by a most imperfect realisation of what the term implies. The training of the intellect and the art of imparting knowledge have been absorbing overmuch attention. This should we do and not leave the other undone! Education still suffers much from a belated psychology of separate faculties directed to separate subjects. Though most modern teachers talk glibly enough of character-building as a task which the school should undertake, it rests in their minds as a sort of mysterious influence, partly a "spirit of the school," partly good personal relations between individual teachers and pupils, but without any organic connection with the intellectual curriculum. There is a pervasive notion, genuine but vague, that "character counts most of all," and an admission that school can and ought to do a good deal for character. But there, if we take our school system as a whole, the matter hangs in an elevated region of amiable commonplaces. We welcome, as a movement of inestimable value, the strong organised endeavor now being made to find the true place of moral education in the school and its relation to the entire round of school activities. Professor Michael E. Sadler, whose industrious survey of facts and opinions bearing on this subject has just been published, presides next week at an International Congress held at the University of London to hear and discuss papers upon Moral Education in Schools read by a number of eminent teachers, men and women, from almost all the civilised countries of the world. Though the initiative in the Congress has come from individuals and private associations, school education has become everywhere so largely a State function that it might have been expected that every Government should interest itself in these deliberations. We regret to learn that while nearly every European State and certain great municipalities, such as Berlin, have sent accredited representatives to take part in the Congress, neither our Education Department nor the Education Committee of the London County Council has seen fit to follow their example. We cannot imagine a more discouraging reflection on the spirit which governs these authorities.

About the utility of international co-operation for such an object no question can arise, for while on matters of politics or industry, such as form the subject of many of these Congresses, wide national divergences of institutions or of interests must be taken into account, these first principles of rational education drive down to the common roots of humanity among all civilised peoples. Even the discussion of differences in the application of principles to the particular conditions of school life in the various nations must greatly contribute to a clearer apprehension both of the principles themselves and of the methods of applying them. Thoughtful consideration of such issues as the following cannot fail to yield a rich harvest of experience: School and Home; School Organisation; Methods of Training and Teaching; Juvenile Literature; Civics and Patriotism; The Relation of Religious, Intellectual, Æsthetic and Physical to Moral Education; The Education of the Morally Backward; Moral Education in Kindergartens, in Primary and Secondary Schools, in Continuation Schools, and in Training Colleges.

There is, however, one issue of quite pre-eminent importance in educational method which must assert itself in the deliberations of this Congress. Can moral facts be taught to children, as physical facts are taught, so as to dominate their conduct by firm habits? Can a child be taught not to lie as he can be taught not to put his hand in the fire? In both cases there is the action of a natural law, equally regular in its causation, its sanctions, and penalties: it is to this natural law that in both instances the appeal is made. Even those who refuse to divorce morals from some ultimate theistic sanction, conceive the Divine Will as operating by this natural law. "The laws above are sisters of the laws below," as Emerson says. But a moment's reflection suffices to show that, though it may be the business of a teacher to make a lie as repulsive as a burn, the mode of demonstration or conviction must be far less simple, and the result far less certain. This opens up, indeed, a relative though a wider issue of method in moral training. Can ethics be taught at all as a separate subject or group of subjects, in lessons upon work, purity, courtesy, temperance, kindness to animals, hygiene, thrift, &c., or is it better to adopt the more indirect or "penetrative" method by which moral teaching will be got out of literature, history, and the training in accuracy, taste, and industry which art, natural sciences, and mathematics yield? While a fairly general agreement has been reached that morals must not be taught in any merely abstract way, or so as to encourage that gymnastics of casuistry to which many children are so easily addicted, the broader issue still remains open. Each course has its advantages, and, we may add, its perils. The latter, perhaps, in most instances, proceed from a certain strain towards undue "specialisation" which has tended to attach to the term "morals" and even more to "ethics."

The popular resentment of claims of supremacy for "morals" as the guide of conduct is undoubtedly associated with a certain coldness and austerity of character, and the term "ethics" has inherited this reputation with some added burden of depressing priggishness. Enlightened educationalists of to-day are somewhat hampered by these traditional associations of language, and the atmosphere they carry with them. Indeed, while we are entirely sympathetic with Lady Grove's plea in the "Fortnightly Review" for the "permeation of the moral idea into the ordinary every-day school curriculum," we confess to looking forward with some alarm to the operation of a school in which teachers were ever anxious to extract ethical values out of the geography or the arithmetic lesson. All subjects are not directly and equally "palpitating with human interests," and any attempt to make them palpitate may serve to upset their educational equilibrium. Such risks, however, not really serious, will be averted in just proportion as the narrower associations of "morals" and "ethics" yield to the wider import of "humanity" in which the conception of character fuses the physical and the intellectual with the "moral."

For it is this large humanism that is the only educational atmosphere in which the soul of man can grow to its full stature, and no other "atmosphere," religious, military, patriotic, or even moral, in a narrower sense, is to be tolerated in our schools. It is because we believe that this wider conception of moral education already commands the intellectual assent and the sympathy of our best educationalists that we welcome the fresh stimulus the Congress will give to the greatest and finest of the fine arts.

BARMECIDE FEASTS.

When a newspaper the other evening displayed on its broadsheet the solitary announcement, "Burglars feast on Royal Fruit!" what an alluring picture it called up! Others might go splashing about in mud and rain, some of them hungry, all of them cold and wet. But inside that royal dining-room what genial warmth, what caressing light, shed from silvery lustres upon the gleaming surface of immemorial mahogany where, in bowls and salvers and centre-pieces of solid gold, the Royal Fruit was piled with the lavish profusion of Arabia Felix! Apples shone ruddily, their peel, no doubt, emblazoned with the royal arms, as it is emblazoned for the imperial picnics of the Tsar. Grapes flushed purple, weightier than those of Eskron, of which it needed two Israelites to carry off a bunch; oranges were there at a dollar a dozen; melons, fat and soft as a policeman's head. To say that the board groaned would be a novelist's licence, for not a groan was heard, and all was safe and still, as round that opulent board the jolly burglars sat, for once in their lives exactly as happy as kings. "This 'ere's somethink like!" spluttered Bill, his dear, dishonest face deep in a guinea pear. "Chuck us yer jemmy, mate, for them pavin' stones," said Charlie, after trying to crack the Brazil nuts in the hinge of the silver door. "Drive slowly twice round the pawk, and then 'ome," said Bob to the chauffeur of the Blackwall motor-'bus when at last the feast was done.

It was a dream of earthly bliss seldom realised in this work-a-day world. Those too happy burglars had enjoyed in actuality the very thing that the audiences at our theatres seek after but are compelled to enjoy only in a semblance, a figment, a fantastic projection of the brain, a Barmecide feast. Take, for example, the men and women now crowding to behold the drama called "Sins of Society" in a southern theatre where aristocratic foot has never trod. Honourable shopmen with their wives, small manufacturers, publicans, foremen, undertakers, lodging-house keepers, clerks, and the working people—they have all gathered for their feast on royal fruit. They long to be quit of beef, mutton, suet, and household jam; they long to shake themselves free, just for one fleeting night, from the common round, the daily task, which is so far from furnishing all they need to ask. For one night they will lay aside the virtue that so easily besets them and move unabashed among the vice and glamour of the very best society. They will be admitted to the intimacy of titled ladies who lose one fortune at bridge and the next on the racecourse of Paris. They will see the high-born hero in the Guards swear to save a woman's honour (concealed in a cardboard box), take off his best coat to the job, and set to work in his shirt-sleeves. They will learn how auburn duchesses walk the world, how Anglican priests may be human at a crisis, how countesses lead their lovers about a tea-party by the ear, how natural it appears to a lady of title to be received by a millionaire in running drawers and a pink dressing-gown, and how deeply engrained is virtue in an aristocratic villain, seeing he has perpetrated all his villainy for Gwen—all for Lady Gwen.

It is our feast on royal fruit—a Barmecide feast, to be sure, for we dimly know we are not really part of that illustrious society, and at the foot of the titled programme we are sharply brought back to the facts of our humble estate by an advertisement of Bottled Bass, where champagne would have been more in keeping. But even the Bottled Bass is described as "supplied to the Palace of Westminster," and who shall grudge us this short relief from the sphere of our drab relations, this glimpse into fairyland, this brief satisfaction of the moth's desire for the star?

> "What I aspired to be,
> And was not, comforts me," sang another poet. And here we have what we aspire to be. We should like to move in that entourage of splendid wickedness and stupendous deeds, to run the safe though deadly risks of morphia and revolvers, to relieve some poor criminal's mind with a gift of ten thousand pounds, to wave the banner of England while the ship settles into the deep and the battalion stands with presented arms, dressed by the right, and singing "God Save the King!"

In another drama it was an equal joy to be present at a State ball in the Winter Palace and see the Tsar take his seat upon the throne in a staff cap and military greatcoat (alas! our only Imperial properties), while the adventurous heroine whirled in a solo dance before him, having concealed about her person a live bomb the size and shape of an old-fashioned cannon-ball—a thing impossible for Miss Maud Allan to do. There is the life worth living, the kind of existence for which all of us poor drudges crave. Had that bomb but dropped, how different would have been the scene from our even course of secure monotony! Why should we listen to those who call us to dramas of real life? Real life, indeed! Have we not back-parlours of our own? Let us rather remember the reproof of the wise essayist, when, writing of the Artificial Comedy, he said:—

> "We have been spoiled with the exclusive and all-devouring drama of common life. We carry our fireside concerns to the theatre with us. We do not go thither, like our ancestors, to escape from the pressure of reality, so much as to confirm our experience of it. We must live our toilsome lives twice over, as it was the mournful privilege of Ulysses to descend twice to the Shades."

Well, we have certainly left the pressure of reality far enough behind us now. Upon our modern stage there is no dull similitude to life, but all is fancy, farce, and comfortable lies. So one was not surprised when a morning paper discovered the other day that "there are only two or three plays at the nineteen theatres open in which the wealthy classes do not monopolise the interest." A list of fourteen theatres followed, in which the characters were sometimes mere kings, princes, or dukes, but as a rule were millionaires. It is quite natural that this should be so. Serious critics, looking round for a reason, might say that it is only in well-to-do classes, free from the cares of food, warmth, or wages, that comedy has a sphere. Men and women, they say, must be well-off for comedy, though we may dip lower down for pathos, humour, or sugared sentiment. But serious critics go too far afield for explanations. The real reason is that our West-End theatres depend on the upper-middle classes, and where the working people and lower-middle classes desire a life of astonishing wickdness and glorified virtue in a setting of titles, the upper-middle classes desire a life of luxury in a setting of gold. Wealth is their glimpse into fairyland, the star which they desire, the vision of something not themselves which makes for comfort, the royal fruit on which they long to feast. Just as soldiers take no interest in Mr. Kipling's soldier tales, and the poor see nothing in Dickens, so the upper-middle classes are discontented with dramas of average income. "It is unwholesome," says George Meredith, in his "Essay on Comedy," "it is unwholesome for men and women to see themselves as they are if they are not better than they should be." The upper-middle classes, being quite aware that they are not richer than they should be, find it unwholesome to see themselves as they are. They, too, yearn for something beyond, some golden glory of a dream. It is the millionaire's life for which they yearn—the just unattainable ideal. They support their preference by appeals to Mr. Bernard Shaw, who has become their apostle. With what vigour he denounces poverty, with what philosophic penetration extols the glory of wealth:—

> "The crying need of the nation," he has said, "is not for better morals, cheaper bread, temperance, liberty, culture, redemption of fallen sisters and erring brothers, nor the grace, love, and fellowship of the Trinity, but simply for enough money."

Enough money! But the millionaire is the only man who really has enough, and beside his claim to honour, how flat and commonplace are morality, liberty, culture, religion, and the other objects only mentioned by Mr. Shaw to be rejected! To adapt a line from "The Silver Box," the millionaire has got what the upper-middle classes want. As the Greeks liked to see gods and heroes on the stage, those being the kind of persons they would wish to be themselves, so modern managers recognise the millionaire as the fittest character for our dramas. Let the dramatist, while he is about it, set his millionaires thick upon the boards, for the millionaire is the vision splendid, the sort of man theatre-goers would choose to be, the royal fruit on which they long to feast, even though, at a play, the feast is rather of a Barmecide description.

VISITORS.

As the people of the city go, they come; and while the pleasure-seekers seek pleasure elsewhere, and multitudes of workers are away, taking a temporary rest, they fill the emptier streets unusually.

Singly, and in pairs, and in homely parties, and straggling droves, they wander through the streets, and gaze and gaze, in a lingering oblivion of wonderment. Their enjoyment is very leisurely. They stroll and stop and loiter on again, with ever-turning head and widening eyes; and they speak strange languages, or curiously. For they are foreigners and country-folk.

They come, for a holiday, to see the City of the Great Unrest; and their methods make them incongruous, because of their slow, deliberate, staring interest. It is as if they could never see enough, and could never see too much of what they see. And while they point and ejaculate and stand admiring, the busy people pass them quickly by, and the turmoil of the traffic surges on, in concentrated streams of straining speed. For they principally frequent the larger thoroughfares, where the city's usual unrest is always evident; and they saunter round and group themselves about the well-known buildings, where the people of the city never stop. Thus they bring notice on themselves.

But, besides the contrast of their meanderings, their clothes and face and manner betray them variously; and their peculiarities and tendencies proclaim the place or country whence they come. For they are noticeably representative.

They act as unrestricted strangers—naturally. Clumsy, slow-stepping men, in rigid clothes, with the color and creases of the open air upon their face, plod ponderously on, or stand stock-still, patiently waiting for an omnibus that never comes; while their women, young and old, in finikin, be-ribboned muslins, or thick, hot cloths, stray from their side to gape at shops, or fidget and worry on the kerb to get advice as to their journeyings. Indifferently-interested gangs, in caps, with badges in their buttonhole, or decked in variegated finery, plank their metallic feet along the streets; and the uncouth men and faded women fling at each other criticisms and jests. And unobtrusive folk, with a revealing, awkward gaiety of dress, or the dazed uncertainty of those not used to speed, troop into eating-shops, or munch food as they go, or sidle into auctions, specially designed for their unknowingness.

Many show only accustomed curiosity. Flat-hatted youths, in coats too big for them, slouch lazily about the busiest streets, as if they liked the hurry and the noise; their empty hands hang limply at their sides, and flopping bows of shoe-lace add to the superfluity of their wrinkled trouser-ends. At the galleries and the well-known places and the palaces, beveiled, quick-eyed women congregate in unescorted groups; each has an inevitable dangling bag; with a strident, drawling curiosity they maks short runs at anybody to enquire; policemen they mob, and even sentries on duty are not safe; such is their anxiety to know. And equally inquisitive pairs of straightfaced men and women stop everywhere, forever asking things.

Though you may tell their nationality by their speech, it is not necessary to hear them talk; for they proclaim themselves. Complacent couples, arm-in-arm, hung round with straps and cameras, seem satisfied to stroll and look at anything; but every now and then they stop to read red-covered books, and gesticulate and gabble angrily. White-faced, white-shoed exotics, dressed daintily, saunter wherever there are trees or space, with a lilt or languor in their high-heeled walk, inspecting idly, from heavy-lidded eyes, the people more than anything; and their plump or haggard escort wears the little hat, or the light, tight suit, or the generous tie of other lands. Whole families seek the quiet of the parks, straggling and speaking aloud among themselves—mothers, with only a back effort at a waist, or worryingly thin, talk dispassionately of what they see, or, may be, exhort some bare-legged, bare-armed children not to lag; perspiring fathers, with tufted upper chin, or pointed beard, carry their hat and handkerchief, and wave both, as a fan, or to point their strangled sentences; daughters, demurely contradictory in looks, catch and avoid the glances of a passer-by; and tall, knickerbockered sons kick up the gravel as they dawdle on—a little bored. Or, in hot, contented proximity, they sit—five or six of them—upon a seat.

Some are experienced, and some only just reveal their foreignness in an unfamiliar look, or one unusual article of wear. Square-bearded elegants, in elongated boots, escort proud women, with glittering eyes, about the shops, or lounge with them indolently in hired carriages or cabs. Ceremoniously straight-backed, satchelled folk, and pairs and parties, all equally stout and oxen-eyed, trudge methodically from place to place, as if they were cataloguing things; and they look at every place of note thoughtfully through the usual glasses on their nose; and they point, and meditate. Occasionally a resident compatriot acts as guide, with the lofty indulgent air of one who knows. And sallow, untidy men and swarthy, dark-lipped women parade the dusty pavements, leisurely, indifferent to the heat and glare.

Thus, with detached, contrasting groups and individuals, the hurry of the streets and the saunter of the parks are strangely changed; and the places of interest and entertainment seem curiously cosmopolitan. For their itinerary is very much the same; and mostly they are obvious, untravelled, homely folk.

In all they do they show their homeliness and a certain natural unconsciousness. They read aloud the names of streets, regardless of a pronunciation that may raise a smile; they ask their way quite naturally in unintelligible words, or demand information spontaneously from the person nearest them; and they raise their hat, or smile familiarly in thanks. When they are tired they sit down where they are—on the steps of public buildings, or on railings, or on the dirty, paper-strewn plots of public grass; and they see no harm in walking hand-in-hand, nor do they think it wrong to eat things as they walk. They do what they want to do in a manner of their own.

For they only think of what they see. They have come to see the city and the sights; and in their sight-seeing they enjoy themselves without a thought of whether what they do seems strange.

They take no heed of passing curiosity. In shaded solemnity and silent rows they crowd in under the awning of char-à-bancs, and pack into decorated brakes; and, as they drive funerally about, they crane and look, following the driver's pointing whip, or the conductor's extended arm, with simultaneously-turned faces. Regardless of the jostle of the streets, they stop to turn the pages of a book, and read and discuss the information volubly; and they spread out maps between themselves, or on a seat, and hold long consultations as to where they are and where they want to be. They feed strangely, without rule, at all times, when they feel inclined; and the careful ones inspect the bill of fare outside before they enter in. They turn about on the tops of crowded omnibuses; they comment on ordinary unnoticed scenes; they admire views.

So, with an indolent loitering, they spend their day in one long, hovering continual look. During the evening they continue seeing things, at crowded entertainments or gay-lighted shows. And then they disappear into strange lodgings and peculiar hotels—to seek a needed rest.

But all this continuous, fatiguing sight of sights does not apparently affect them adversely. Even towards the close of their long day, they remain, for the most part, contented and interested and polite. Though their faces may show the weariness of sight-seeing, the snappy petulance and little bickerings of holiday fatigue are seldom heard; though they are tired, or even harassed or confused, they persevere, with smiles, or eager interest, or stolidly. For they are determined to admire and enjoy; and very nearly all of them succeed.

Letters from Abroad.

IS CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT IN TURKEY POSSIBLE?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Given a nation of about twenty-four millions, seven of whom are Christians and the rest Moslems; a nation consisting of various and hitherto hostile races, none of which has the tradition of self-government, a nation which has been under an Asiatic despotism of a crude form for centuries, can a constitutional government possibly be more than a temporary phase in its history? Such is the question which, under various forms, has been often asked since the wonderful 24th of July.

In order to give an answer, it is worth while to call attention to several factors in the problem, and first, to those which produced the revolution. The Turkish people during the last half century have had an exceptional education in political matters. Those who knew Turkey in the 'sixties speak with great respect of two great Turkish reformers, Ali and Fuad. They, like their immediate successors, of whom Midhat Pasha was the most conspicuous, were the pioneers of political liberty in Turkey. They were a band of men acquainted with Western civilisation. They realised the definite fact that since 1683 every quarter of a century had seen a diminution of the Turkish Empire, and they were desirous of checking its disintegration. In some respects they were dreamers. They corresponded to the band of philosophic Radicals of whom Grote and Layard formed part. Neither had much democratic sympathy. But their seed fell upon fruitful soil. Their immediate successors gained their greatest triumph when they compelled Abdul Hamid to grant a Constitution in 1876. It was not granted because the Sultan or even any important section of the Turkish people sympathised with liberty, but as a means of checkmating the Powers, who by their representatives were trying to draft reforms for Bulgaria, Bosnia, and Herzegovina. A Turkish Parliament actually met, showed considerable capacity, and sat some months. In February, 1878, Abdul Hamid in one night packed off all the members from Constantinople, and decreed that the portion of the Constitution relating to a representative chamber should be in abeyance. The principal use of the Parliament had been to popularise the idea of constitutional government.

Abdul Hamid had unconsciously rendered service both in granting the Parliament and in dismissing it The short period during which it sat showed to native and foreigner alike, first, that abuses were rife all through the Empire, and second, that the deputies of the people, though elected under conditions unfavorable to a fair representation, were determined to sweep away these abuses. The government of Abdul Hamid, from the time of destroying his Parliament until last July, was compared with that which the Parliament would have established. The Constitution, of which the Chamber was the most important part, became an ideal, almost a fetish. Give us a Parliament, and all abuses will cease. To create such an ideal was an important service.

An equally valuable one was rendered by Abdul Hamid in another direction. The European visitors whom he saw, including Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, told him that, for the prosperity of his country, he should build roads and railways, and have the people taught to read. To do the first required money, and very little progress has been made. The mollahs supported the proposal to establish schools. Abdul Hamid saw no harm in it. They would, at least, make him more highly thought of abroad. He established elementary Turkish schools throughout the Empire, which have taught reading and writing, and practically nothing else. But the result was remarkable. There are probaby fifty times more readers of Turkish now than there were thirty years ago. There were times when Abdul Hamid seems to have felt that education was a little dangerous. Some years ago the professors of one of the most important Turkish colleges in the Empire received orders not to teach anything but reading and writing, and the director in consequence vetoed instruction in other subjects. The acquisition of the power of reading was a splendid service to the political education of the upper layers of the Turkish population. For though the Turkish papers were worthless for the purposes of information, yet they kept alive the art of reading, and, when the revolution came and the censors were bundled out of the printing offices, the newspapers immediately increased their circulation, and every week since has seen the birth of new papers.

Abdul Hamid's most important contribution to the political education of his people was a demonstration of the manifest inefficiency of his personal government. He lost territory everywhere. It would perhaps be unfair to hold him responsible for the diminution of the Empire resulting from the Russian War. But Cyprus, Tunis, Egypt, and Crete, ceased to be part of the Empire through his want of statesmanship. Nor did his country share in the material progress of European nations. His policy was his own and not that of his Ministers. It was not merely inefficient, it was supremely foolish. Granting that he wished to secure his own position, his conduct was opposed to the realisation of his wish. It worried everybody, and kept its inefficiency constantly in view. Fancy a Government which abolished a well-organised local post because it facilitated conspiracy, that would not hear of a telephonic service for a like reason, that ostentatiously delivered opened letters, that drove correspondents to send their telegrams a few hours by rail or sea out of Turkish territory, that created so large an army of spies that it had to create another to spy upon the spies, that paid heavy subsidies to foreign newspapers in order to prevent the insertion of articles against the Sultan personally; that allowed an up-to-date fleet to rot in harbour, its sailors unpractised, its boilers rusted for want of attention, because it had brought about the revolution which dethroned Abdul Aziz.

The story of the purchase of the three best ironclads in the navy is a striking example of the folly of the Palace régime, and is worthy of a Gilbert and Sullivan opera. Four Powers, America, Great Britain, France and Italy, demanded compensation for damages done to the property of their subjects during the Armenian massacres. The Sultan denied all liability. The Powers insisted on payment, and the pressure began to be severe. Then a brilliant idea presented itself. The American Chargé d'Affairs was sent for, and at the Sultan's request produced a representative of the shipbuilding firm of Cramp. A new ironclad of the latest pattern was bargained for; and then the secret came out. Cramps were to add to the price the amount claimed by the United States Legation for the damages done to American citizens. The total amount would be paid to the Legation, which would, of course, pay Cramps what was due, and the Legation would not be asked what it had done with the rest. In this way, argued the Palace, the principle of non-liability would be saved, and the Legation would not bother any more about compensation for the destruction of American property. The whole operation was to be kept strictly secret. So it was, for twenty-four hours. Then the British Ambassador, the French, and the Italian, put forward their claims arising out of the massacres. Armstrongs took a contract for an ironclad of the latest model, and the British claims were added in the same way, and paid over to the British Embassy. So also with the French and Italian claims.

The people of Turkey had thus been educated politically by allowing them to see what a Parliament could do, by causing them to form an ideal of what a Parliament might do, and by rendering them discontented with the Palace government. These causes combined to produce general discontent, and a people ready for revolution. The knowledge of reading, once the signal was given, acted in producing an ubiquitous explosion.

These are the principal factors which produced the revolution. But having established Constitutional Government, what are the factors to be considered in examining whether it can continue?

There is, first of all, a profound belief among all classes in the efficacy of the Constitution. It will take years before the people can be convinced that its provisions are not a panacea for all the ills of misgovernment. They are likely, of course, to be disappointed in results, but they will attribute failure to persons, and not to the institution. It will take at least another generation to make them forget the thirty years' tyranny. There will be also the strong desire of the thousands who have taken part in the revolution to prevent its work being undone, and the great fear of the reprisals which would follow if a reaction were to succeed.

Most important of all is the new hope which the Constitution has inspired for an improvement in the material interests of the people. Poverty has existed everywhere, poverty of a kind unknown in any European country. Roads and bridges everywhere in ruins; fields uncultivated and long since covered with natural and useless scrub. Yet the poorest peasant recognises that these are ills due to misgovernment. He cannot get his produce to market for want of roads. He therefore does not grow more than suffices for his own wants. He has nothing which he can sell, and knows that in the rare cases of men who have saved a little, they have been liable to have it taken from them by the tithe farmer, backed by an unscrupulous official, who has bought his office. He hopes to see roads repaired, bridges rebuilt, communications opened up to the sea, or to railways. The enterprising men who even a dozen years ago went through Asia Minor buying what they could at absurdly low rates, in the hope of getting it through to a market, will again present themselves. Even already the peasant has been delighted to see that the cruel and absurd restrictions upon travel have been, thanks to the Constitution, abolished. Small local hawkers or merchants can once more travel to sell their Manchester or Sheffield goods, in exchange for such goods as the peasant can produce. When the Constitution is in full swing, he believes that all the evils from which he has been suffering will vanish. A new era of prosperity is what is dreamed of by all sections of the community. This is in itself an important factor, to be considered in asking whether Constitutional Government can continue.

A further factor to be taken into consideration is that the population of the Turkish Empire is an easy one to govern. This is a statement which would, I think, be endorsed by all who are acquainted with Turkey. Every Turk is a soldier, the son of generations of soldiers, and the habit of discipline is inborn. In the various massacres of the last half century the killing was done to order. Sir Philip Currie was firmly convinced that this was the case during all the slaughter of the Armenians. In many places the massacres were commenced and concluded by sound of trumpet, as if by military drill. The Turkish crowd obeyed orders. Nor is the non-Moslem population an unruly one. The Greeks are found mostly on the coast lines of Asia Minor, and are quiet and law respecting. The Armenians have only been driven into revolt by intolerable tyranny; otherwise they were ready even to pay tribute to the Kurds in order to live a quiet life.

One of the gravest factors in the problem results from the incongruous elements which will be represented in the Turkish Parliament: Turkish peasants almost all unable to read, but full of the spiritual pride which makes the ignorant Moslem everywhere feel himself a member of a superior order of beings to all non-Moslems; Greeks, who fear that they and their privileges will be swamped in the great Moslem majority, who have been taught by centuries of experience to distrust Turkish rule; Kurds little removed from savagery, and accustomed to live by preying on their Christian neighbours; Arabs of Syria, with great natural intelligence, and somewhat better educated than the Turks, whom they hate; Armenians, keen in all business matters, and with an aptitude for acquiring property due partly to race, and still more to their having had, like the Jews, to hold their own surrounded by enemies; Lazes, hardly further removed from savagery than Kurds; Albanians, perhaps the race best adapted to exercise political rights, a race which has usually been tolerant in religious matters. Secure in their mountains they have never been altogether subdued.

Can these incongruous elements be made to combine? Well, one must distinguish: the Kurds will require a strong hand. They are already giving trouble in Dersin and its neighborhood. But even they and the Lazes have been accustomed to feel the power of Government which will be represented in the future, as in the past, by the soldier and the policeman. When Christians are enrolled in the army, the tendency will be to diminish disorders due to differences of race and religion. If the Government should get itself well established, the mass of ordinary subjects will be obedient to it without considering whether it is that of the Sultan actually or of Parliament acting in his name.

Now as to the Parliament itself.

The leaders recognise that the provisions in the Constitution for its election are complex and almost unintelligible. These are to be altered without delay. But, with or without changes, the actual elected chamber will constitute an oligarchy. The officials, the mollahs, in certain places the surviving beys, will really elect the representatives, and if they make as good a choice as they did thirty-two years ago the chamber will do fairly well.

The Constitution cuts off the lower stratum of the population by requiring a property qualification. Only those can vote who pay two Turkish pounds a year for land tax on their own property. The franchise therefore at once becomes greatly restricted. There is no class of landed gentry or of squires in Turkey (unless we except a few beys), but there is a large class of peasant proprietors. If a Turk does not cultivate his land or is not a soldier he manages to become an official. They and the mollah class are the persons in the provinces who have most influence. They will select candidates, and the voters will vote usually as they are advised by these, whom they regard as natural leaders.

Among the Christians matters will be somewhat different. Turkish statistics are far from trustworthy. Out of a total population in Asia Minor of eighteen millions, there are said to be only three and a-quarter millions of Christians. Out of an alleged six millions in Europe, three and a-half are reported as Christians. The Christians, through their respective churches, have always kept certain rights of self-government, and the Committees or Ephories of their churches will assist in choosing representative men for the chamber.

Then comes the most serious question of all: Will the great Moslem majority consent to admit non-Moslems on an equality with themselves? I propose to leave the discussion of this question for a second letter.—Yours, &c.,

EDWIN PEARS.

Constantinople, September 14th, 1908.

Contemporaries.

PRESIDENT DIAZ.

MOMMSEN says somewhere that Julius Caesar was at the same time absolute dictator and a democrat of the democrats. So is, mutatis mutandis, the reigning president of Mexico. That republic exhibits to the world an interesting example of a despot ruling by universal suffrage. General Diaz is elected to the chief executive office of his country under a constitution by which every male citizen twenty-one years of age (or eighteen if he is married) has an equal vote. At the end of his term of office (now six years, until lately four) he becomes again a private citizen. And yet no one who has lived long in Mexico doubts that, theoretically no more than constitutional president, he is in fact an absolute monarch, whose will is as undisputed and effective as was that of Haroun al Raschid, and that he will always be re-elected until he dies or pleases to retire. More fortunate than Caesar, he has now reigned for twenty-eight years, and no sovereign in Europe has a securer seat.

Sir Porfirio Diaz (for so he may call himself if he chooses, King Edward having conferred on him the Grand Cross of the Bath) completed his seventy-eighth year on the 15th of this month.

Mexico is very unlike Rome, and Caesar played his part on a far greater stage, and yet, in his degree, the Mexican may be compared to the Roman in other respects than as at once dictator and democrat. He is like Caesar in being both a statesman and a general, in being ever practical and never fanciful, in his capacity for placing himself in the main currents of his time, in the deep attachment of his friends, in the amazing rapidity of his journeys, in the singular and happy tenacity of his memory. If Caesar knew the names of all the soldiers of the tenth legion, it is said of Diaz that, should he meet a poor Indian whom he has but once spoken to twenty years before, he addresses him instantly by his Christian name. Like Caesar, he never hesitated in battle to hazard his own person. Like Caesar's, his dictatorship, at first temporary, became gradually permanent. His ambition, like that of the great Roman, has been the regeneration of his deeply-decayed nation. Like Caesar, too, he has been the first to tranquillise his country. And, like Caesar, he came not to begin, but to complete. For Juarez, his predecessor, a man greater morally, and not less steadfast, laid the foundation of the edifice Diaz has built up.

Diaz's task was to make Mexico orderly and solvent. He could only fulfil it as the nominal servant and the actual master of the people. Thus it was necessary that he should be popular. And so Fate willed that the odium of the unpopular measures necessary for Mexico's redemption should be borne by others. Clerical and military privilege had to be abolished, and the Roman Catholic Church disestablished and disendowed, but Juarez did these things while Diaz was a subordinate. His good fortune even served him in spite of himself; for, after the victory of the Liberals, it kept him out of office against his will, while Lerdo mercilessly suppressed every spark of life in the remnants of the clerical party, and passed the very necessary (for revenue had to be raised), but most inquisitorial, harassing and unpopular tax that could be invented, the Stamp Act; while martial law was proclaimed against the "condottieri," many of them his good friends; while the superfluous crowd of military officers, his comrades, an army in itself, was abolished; while roads and bridges and railways and telegraphs were built with money borrowed by any means on any terms. He had predecessors as able and as honest, but less fortunate. The patriots, Hidalgo, Morelos, Juarez, had cleared away the first and worst obstacles to Mexico's progress, and the weaknesses of the immediate successors of Juarez made a background on which Diaz's character shone with redoubled lustre. Other things have contributed to his success. Naturally the first that occurs to one is his powerful personality. He is both feared and beloved. He came into power by the bloodiest of all Mexico's revolutions. His courage, his skill, his luck, his incredible swiftness, and his calm ruthlessness have inspired opponents with sheer terror. His gentleness of manner, his perfect temper, his considerate affection, and his unfailing memory have won and held the devotion of his friends.

Then his rule is wise and beneficent. The country has had peace and prosperity under it, and knows when it is well off. Anarchy has become order, bankruptcy has been turned into solvency and good credit. Life and property, formerly of precarious tenure, have become as safe for the well-behaved as they are in England. Thus, even if there had existed any considerable opposition in Mexico, it would have been disarmed. But, as has happened, there is none. Before he came into power for the first time, in 1876, with the prestige of the most distinguished fighter among the Liberales, his opponents, the Clerigos, the Catholic Party, had been annihilated with the fall of Maximilian. The country was at peace when he became president for the second time, after an interval of four years, in 1884. He had now a clear field. All his possible rivals, whether of his own party or his opponents', were dead or discredited.

Lastly, although Diaz uses the democratic machinery of government, he is careful not to let it get beyond his control. Once firmly in his seat, he equipped and reorganised the army, placed a trustworthy friend in every higher command, and distributed the regiments so that the soldiers should be distant from their friends and among alien tribes. He has so promoted the extension of railways and telegraphs that he can quickly quell any outbreak of disorder before it has time to spread. And he takes care that every State governor and higher official is his adherent. Thus government is effective and elections run sweetly. Voters do not in Mexico vote directly. Five hundred voters choose a delegate, and he votes. The delegate is almost always amenable to the powers in office, and if he is not it does not matter, for the enumerators are. The Indian voter does not know much about it, and is indeed seldom consulted. But he does know, and under Diaz's wise rule it is well for him that he does know, that no man's property, or liberty, or even life, is safe if he makes trouble for the Government.

In the science of "booming" his country (the article he desires to bring to the notice of an investing world) Diaz has learned from his northern neighbour, and has bettered the lesson. By using and improving upon the method of the subsidised newspaper, by an urbane condescension to the globe-trotter, the special correspondent, male and female, the adventurous tourist, he has gained a thousand clacqueurs. He has astutely entered into a tacit agreement with the kodak-carrying scribbler, who will "do" Mexico in six weeks and publish an illustrated volume for the circulating libraries. Diaz is ready to furnish his share of the materials. He has a department for the purpose which will supply selected information ready for the market. The president will graciously add the signed photographs of himself and his wife, their lithographed visiting-cards, and even a note of invitation to lunch at Chapultepec, all to be reproduced in the book by full-page photogravure. Sweet are the uses of advertisement, and even a piece of pasteboard properly published blesses both him that gives and him that takes. Foreign capital accordingly is said to be flowing into Mexico now at the rate of forty millions sterling per annum. Inhabitants, too, are gradually coming to its vast lands, for, as the United States once did (but does no longer), Diaz welcomes everybody of every race and color, Chinaman, Jap, Mormon, Jew. Silver and gold mines, mills, plantations, tramways, railways, and harbours increase. A great wave of American enterprise pours across the Rio Grande. But there is little fear of the "Uitlander" appropriating the country. The Government keeps a firm grip. Already it has the predominating interest in the chief railways, and holds in its own hands the great lines of communication with the United States. English capitalists have re-made the railway across the narrow isthmus of Tehuantepec, and have built the splendid harbours at each end. But Diaz has only given them a lease, so that it is the Mexican Government which owns the quickest means of transport from the Atlantic to the Pacific, ten degrees nearer New York and San Francisco than the Panama canal will be, and with ten years' start of it. His last financial achievement has been the successful conversion of Mexican currency to a gold standard.

This great man has brought his administration, but hardly yet his people, within the comity of nations. Other countries are said to have a submerged tenth, Mexico has only an emerged tenth. The remaining nine fractions are still below the level. And such civilisation as he has brought about is not indigenous—is superficial rather than substantial. As Mexico borrowed her constitution in large measure from the United States, she is also getting from the same source her ideals of progress. She takes those she can assimilate, and they are chiefly such as can be expressed in dollars and cents. Diaz has ruled Mexico wisely and firmly. He has imposed upon her public order and financial solvency. He has greatly extended school education, though it is still far short of being universal. He is bringing Mexico into line with Chicago. But he seems to be not so much civilising the Mexican people as introducing a different kind of barbarism. His country has always been attractive to the adventurer. It is still so, but Diaz has altered the attraction, and now draws largely adventurers of a different class, the company promoter, the exploiter of "concessions," the filibuster of the stock exchange. What his methods have made, and tend to make, may be seen in the streets of his capital any afternoon.

Porfirio Diaz is a hero both in the oldest fashion and the very newest. And, in Mexico at least, he has very nearly attained to his apotheosis in his lifetime.

The Drama.

THE SAD CASE OF DR. FAUST.

If anything could justify an invasion of England by Germany (personally conducted by a band of pro-Rectors) it would be Messrs. Phillips's & Carr's adaptation of "Faust," which is now having a brilliant vogue at His Majesty's Theatre. From Fichte to Bismarck we have suffered much at Germany's hands—but has she deserved this? And yet, in the act of commiserating the countrymen of Goethe, I find myself drawn to sympathise with a branch of the Anglo-Saxon race. For it seems to me that Mr. Phillips and Mr. Carr have been under fewer obligations to the German poet than to his American translator, Bayard Taylor. I see that an American critic in the "Forum" gives what appears to be irrefutable proof that the reef from which our authors largely quarried was not the original poem but Taylor's very interesting rendering of it. For example, they have followed Taylor in a mistranslation designed to preserve the rhyme. In Faust's famous soliloquy, Taylor renders "Der Kranich nach der Heimat strebt" by "The crane sails by to other shores," by way of furnishing a rhyme to "soars," instead of writing simply "The crane shapes onward to its home." The Phillips version, without the compelling influence of rhyme, repeats Taylor's inaccuracy, and announces that "past me sailed the crane to other shores." The wording of the ballads—both of the "König in Thule," and "Meine Ruh' ist hin"—and a comparison of the verse endings and the general verbiage of the two works makes this imitation of an imitation obvious. What is lost is the poetic feeling and the intellectual strength of the American version. What is left is good enough for a crude melodrama, the only form of a great world-poem which the most considered of our actor-managers thinks it wise to place before an audience in the heart of well-to-do London.

It seems necessary to ask why such a travesty of literature, which no one would tolerate in any form of art but the dramatic, readily finds a place on our stage. Our critics do not protest against it; I imagine that after Irving's example they are resigned to it. But how complete the degradation of the theatre when a man of undoubted intelligence like Mr. Tree takes from a drama like "Faust" its poetry, its moral significance, its philosophical adornment, and presents its mysteries, its pictures of Heaven and Hell, of the soul of man and of woman, as a kind of cinematograph show, its pictures linked together by a story of seduction! Within the space which the authors of the version at His Majesty's allow themselves no other treatment is possible. And there is a superficial reason for it. The loves of Faust and Gretchen will always be remembered; their philosophic setting will not. But it is not feasible thus to cut across a great writer's purpose without spoiling his work. Over-subtle, over-learned, as Goethe's "Faust" may seem to be, its writer meant something more than to re-tell an old legend. And if his larger ends are unrepresented, his poetry is necessarily coarsened. Take Mr. Phillips's treatment of Margaret. She is the "woman soul"; not the mere child of passion that this version declares her to be. Mr. Phillips makes her yield to Faust, in a scene which was not a little distressing to witness, under physical impulse; Goethe's idea was that her surrender followed from the innocent submission of her soul and spirit to this wonderful dazzling young man, who seemed to her to be all beauty and wisdom. Tolstoy repeats the Margaret theme in "Resurrection," and with a similar intention. In the same way the whole conception of the poem is weakened and defaced. The temptation of Faust is a "set to" between the powers of good and evil, the end of which is inevitable. Faust's wisdom teaches him in advance that mere pleasure will never hold him, and though Mephisto depraves his relationship with Margaret, and tricks him into cruelty and cowardice (Nehludoff in "Resurrection" is led precisely the same path), Faust is not a true consenting party, and his recovery to benevolence—his finding of the "right way"—is sure. But none of this spiritual by-play is seen, or can be seen, at His Majesty's Theatre. There is not scope enough, our literary resources are not fine enough, and our play-goers are not interested enough in the problems of life, to encourage such an enterprise. Therefore, while the formal beauties of the poem—such as the glorious songs of the spirits, the majestic opening stanzas, the lyrics, the overpowering prison scene—are sucked out in the translation like the honey from a flower, with them goes the significance of the struggle between Faust and Mephistopheles. No new effect of power is introduced, like Gounod's cathedral music, and what is left is a kind of slow-going pantomine, with golden Mantegna-like angels standing on rocks, against a background of clouds, and gibbering witches taking flying leaps across the stage or crooning over cauldrons, and Mr. Tree, declaiming blank verse with a weary air, and posing, now as a melancholy angel in scales and wings, and now as an Irvingesque jester with Dame Martha as his butt. I have said how much the authors have omitted, or have been obliged to omit. But their additions are not without boldness. Thus, the appearance of the vision of Margaret to Faust on the Brocken is ascribed to a witch's trick on Mephistopheles rather than to Faust's reproachful and awakened conscience. A material difference, in keeping with the commonness of the play in its present dress.

It is this commonness which makes the work of the artists at His Majesty's so difficult. Miss Marie Löhr, for example, makes an almost too ethereal Margaret. Her slender beauty is a little too high-bred, too fine-drawn, for the simple creature whose womanliness is half her charm to Dr. Faust's fastidious soul, clothed though it be in a handsome youth's body. But the more refined Miss Löhr's appearance is, the more distasteful is it to see her Margaret fall before a siege which, save for some faint echo of the famous talk about religion, gives hardly any idea of what so splendid and eloquent and kind a lover must have meant to an untaught girl. And what chance is given Mr. Ainley when the tremendous scene in the prison is closed by a sentimental vision of a kneeling Faust ascending with clasped hands to Heaven in full sight of Margaret herself, sustained by angels? So have I seen her sustained when, as a child, I delighted in Poole's diorama. Goethe, it is true, needs an almost interminable book to describe this long ascent. With Mr. Phillips, moral processes are more summary; he merely requires a couple of pages. As for Mr. Tree's Mephisto, and for his conception and setting of the play, both have their origin in Irving's unfortunate, if now and then imposing, production. But Mr. Tree's face, though powerful, had not Irving's impish, sinister, black-avised look; nor has he Irving's power of suggesting the coarse, practical joker which Mephisto was. Here and there he is interesting, and his by-play vigorous; but his is not the sneering spirit that Goethe drew—the Devil that makes the good shrink away and the bad rejoice. H. W. M.

Communications.

THE "MESSAGES" FROM FREDERIC MYERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—It is more difficult than might be supposed to prove by modern experiment or observation that man survives the change we call Death. We will leave out for the present physical phenomena, such as spontaneous apparitions and the materialisations of the séance room, which convince those whom they do convince by their mere appearance, not by any information, otherwise inaccessible, that they bring. Ghosts may be belittled by sceptics as nothing more than centres of spiritual energy left from the earth-life, or as the fading remnant of a disintegrating personality (whatever these alternatives may really mean), and materialisations may be sniffed at as partly fraud, partly mistaken interpretation of the subliminal self of the medium. Separate articles would be required to evaluate these in barest outline.

But we shall be free from doubt if some actual knowledge, unknown otherwise, is written by the hand or spoken through the voice, of a sensitive psychic or medium, such that it can have come from no other source than the departed who purports to communicate.

The difficulty lies in the condition "unknown otherwise." It is not very hard to find facts which are unknown to the owner of the writing hand or speaking voice. But we have to deal with the wide possibilities opened up by thought transference, or telepathy, now accepted as a fact by all psychical students. This compels one to credit the mind of the medium with any knowledge there may be in any other mind, particularly in the mind of anyone present. This is as good as saying that no one present is competent to verify a statement offered, and even its verification after research in other minds, or in records, is always subject to the suspicion of telepathy. Moreover, we have to guard against the subliminal memory of the scribe or trance speaker. The subliminal self is the self which dreams, which "walks" in sleep, which is awake in the hypnotic trance, which is the vehicle of thought transference, and which is known to keep in memory much that has sunk below the level of consciousness and been forgotten by the ordinary working self. According to the rigid canons of the Society of Psychical Research, nothing that has ever been in print can be counted as evidential, for the medium may have read it and forgotten all about it. Yet, when nearly everything terrene has thus been put out of court, it is still to earth that we must look for the materials of proof, for we are not in a position to verify facts about the hereafter. Within these narrow bounds the best plan has appeared to be for men to leave in charge of a trusty friend some sealed envelope containing words unknown to anyone else, which words, when given through writing or speech after their death, would be capable of verification. But we know so little of the contents of minds in the hereafter, of their earth memories, and their power of choice as to what "comes through," that this plan was always highly speculative. F. W. H. Myers left such an envelope with Sir Oliver Lodge, and after messages had come through Mrs. Verrall purporting to contain its contents, it was solemnly opened and the contents were found to be entirely different.

But three years before this was done, it looks as though Mr. Myers himself had found that for some reason the plan would not be the best, viewed from the other side. He died in January, 1901, "like a schoolboy going joyfully home for the holidays," and two months later writing purporting to come from him to Mrs. Verrall divulged a new plan, which has since been put into practice. It consists of sending rather a puzzling message, making no sense, a sort of riddle, through one medium; and then afterwards sending through another, explanations or completions or keys to the riddle, again unmeaning by themselves, but giving a clear message when the two are put together.

This cuts out the criticism that the medium's mind is the origin of the message; for neither medium has sent anything coherent. Also, as neither understands what their hands have written they cannot send telepathic messages to one another. The origin is therefore to be found in an intelligent mind elsewhere, and the nature of the message is such that that intelligent mind can hardly be other than the mind of the man it purports to be.

These "cross correspondences" between the writing of Mrs. Verrall at Cambridge, and "Mrs. Holland" in India and in various parts of England, give interest to the latest part of the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (Part LV., pp. 404, Maclehose, 5s. net). The subject is expounded by Miss Alice Johnson, one of the officials of the Society, with extraordinary pains and most loving accuracy. It is possible to think Miss Johnson too sceptical and to accuse her of pushing incredulity to the verge of a superstition, and almost ceasing to have proper scientific openness through the very excess of scientific caution; but no one can deny the combination of faithful zeal, acuteness, and ability which her article manifests. Part LIII. of the Proceedings (10s. net) was of about equal length, and consisted of automatic writing and cross correspondences between Mrs. Verrall, who writes the Report, and "Mrs. Forbes" and others. A forthcoming part, we are told, will contain even more striking cases through the same "scribes," along with Miss Verrall and Mrs. Piper.

The impression produced on the reader's mind is, notwithstanding Miss Johnson's occasional doses of cold water, that the lost leaders, Henry Sidgwick, F. W. H. Myers, Edmund Gurney, and Dr. Richard Hodgson, are engaged in a missionary effort from "the other shore," in continuation of their work here, trying to prove by such evidence as compels belief that the spirit of man survives death.

The "cross correspondences" are so complicated and detailed that a brief account is difficult, even of one. Mrs. Verrall's hand wrote on March 2nd-5th, 1906, in Latin, Æneid II. 521, which is in English: "Not with such help will you find what you want; not with such help, nor with those defenders of yours." This is uttered by Hecuba to her aged husband Priam, as he put on his armour in the vain hope of saving Troy from the Greeks. It may be noted that F. W. H. Myers was drenched in Vergil, could repeat whole books in boyhood, and has written the wonderful well-known Essay on the poet who was his constant mental companion and literary master. The hand proceeds, again partly in Latin:—

> "First among his peers, himself not unmindful of his name, with him a brother, related in feeling, though not in blood. Both these will send you word through another. After some days you will easily understand what I say. . . . Pagan and Pope. The Stoic persecutor and the Christian. Gregory, not Basil's friend, ought to be a clue, but you have it not quite right. Pagan and Pope and Reformer, all enemies, as you think. The Cross has a meaning. The Cross-bearer who one day is borne. The standard-bearer is the link. . . . The key (or club) bearer with the lion's skin well described before this in the writings. Some things are to be corrected. Ask your husband; he knows it well. There stand the columns where Calpe has been left. That is the end. No, you have left out something. The columns (broken) by incessant reading."

It occurred to Dr. Verrall (the "husband" to be asked) that "first among his peers" is an accurate technical description of the Pope—whose title appears later, along with "Pagan." The whole follows on from a vain attempt by Priam's arm of flesh to save Troy. What more likely then than that the riddle refers to Raphael's well-known picture in the Vatican of Pope Leo coming forth from Rome, the new Troy, whose Colosseum and aqueducts are seen in the background, to meet Attila, the invading Hun, who is struck with terror by a vision of St. Peter and St. Paul coming down with flaming swords to save the Holy City? The Pope is behaving like a lion, "not unmindful of his name," with Peter his predecessor, "a brother related in feeling but not in blood." Peter is again referred to in connection with the prophesied manner of his death. "The cross bearer who one day is borne." And Pope Leo again is hinted at as "the key bearer with the lion's skin." Dr. Verrall did not tell his wife his interpretation, and she had no light upon it, when on March 7th "Mrs. Holland" wrote in the person and name of F. W. H. Myers, "Ave Roma immortalis" (Hail, immortal Rome). "How could I make it any clearer without giving her the clue?" This gives the needed illumination, fixing the idea on the preservation of Rome from ruin, and disclosing further the writer's policy of an enigma already referred to in the other script. "Mrs. Holland" knows no Latin, so that it would be less easy to use her subliminal faculties for long Latin messages than those of Mrs. Verrall, who was a classical lecturer at Newnham. The two automatists did not communicate directly, but each sent her script to Miss Johnson.

The other allusions in the Verrall-Myers script are almost dreamlike in their sequence. The stoic persecutor and the Christian, and the reformer, are left unexplained by Miss Johnson. To me it appears that they might refer to Marcus Aurelius, who was stoic and persecutor and reformer; and it might be suggested by the general subject of the Empire, Paganism and the Church. Then key bearer (claviger) might also mean club bearer, and so Pope Leo suggests Hercules in his lion's skin, and thence we reach the Pillars of Hercules, or Gibraltar (Calpe in the script), and "pillars" suggests the final line from Juvenal about columns broken by the force of torrential eloquence. It is like the utterance of a dreaming classic, and this process of speaking to earth may be as imperfectly under a spirit's full control as our dreams are under ours. The allusion to Gregory is puzzling, and admitted to be "not quite right."

Here we have a touching effort of the noblest type, if it is what it purports to be. The pathos of Frederic Myers's long failure to obtain recognition from those whom he fain would serve, is moving indeed. To begin with, two years passed before the two writers of script became conscious of one another's existence, and before the cross-correspondences were discovered at the Society of Psychical Research office. The current "Proceedings" contains eight of them, all elaborately discussed, and full of convincing trifles. I trust Mr. Myers's mind is happier now than it was when he wrote in January, 1904, through Mrs. Holland:—

> "If it were possible for the soul to die back into earth life again, I should die from sheer yearning to reach you to tell you that all that we imagined is not half wonderful enough for the truth—that immortality, instead of being a beautiful dream, is the one, the only, reality—the strong golden thread on which all the illusions of all the lives are strung. If I could only reach you—if I could only tell you—I long for power [to communicate], and all that comes to me is an infinite yearning—an infinite pain. Does any of this reach you, reach anyone, or am I only wailing as the wind wails—wordless and unheeded?"

Among the many events fleeting by on this busy planet in these days, few can be so fruitful and so significant as this cosmic research.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN W. GRAHAM.

Dalton Hall, Victoria Park, Manchester,
Sept. 14th, 1908.

[Our columns are open to discussion of the statements with which Mr. Graham deals.—ED., NATION.]

Letters to the Editor.

A PROTEST.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Let the following appear in your pages: it is a protest against the scenes we have been witnessing lately:—

"Il 20 Settembre, 1870, per la breccia di Porta Pia penetrava un soffio di libertà in Roma e cadeva per sempre il potere temporale dei Papi. Trentotto anni dopo la civile Inghilterra rendeva omaggio al Rappresentante d'un Dogma ormai logoro!"

Thanking you,—Yours, &c., J. L. BALBI.

National Liberal Club, Whitehall Place, S.W.,
September 13th, 1908.

"THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am wholly with you in the war you are waging against the spirit of vulgar motorists.

In aid of this I suggest:—

(1) That all cars should be provided with a speed recording instrument, connected with a reel of strong paper, drawn along by a drum actuated by clockwork, and the paper ruled with hour lines, as in many recording instruments, so that not only the number of revolutions of one wheel should be recorded between two observations of the index, but the varying speed at which the car had travelled during each quarter of an hour of the current day. Any falsifications of the instrument should be punished by fine for the first offence, and imprisonment or suspended licence for subsequent offences. The cost would not be beyond the means of the rich class who use motors, and surely they could not object to a record of truth.

(2) It cannot be necessary that the centre of gravity of a motor should be so low as it usually is. The entrancing sensation of rushing through the air at headlong speed with loss of all care for the safety of human and other animals, and the delicious feeling of risking one's own life, would be rather enhanced by a higher seat; and if the rider says he travels to see the country, through eyes as big as a tiger's, he would have some little plausibility in his plea. We see new engines on the Great Northern lines, with the cylinder containing furnace and boiler elevated to a much greater height than used to be usual. Yet a locomotive going at high speed round curves with one rail elevated, perhaps not sufficiently elevated, for the highest speed and greatest weight, would seem to be much more in danger of toppling over than a motor. In both machines some of the sustaining wheels are of small diameter. With greater elevation there would be less dust. The motorist's neighbours feel the dust more than he does. But the force that raises the dust is waste force. It cannot be his interest to raise much dust.

(3) I have been told by a very intelligent road-mender employed by our county council that the passage of one motor damages the road more than ten carts. By blowing the dust from between the stones, it leaves these sticking up. The next heavy wheel that passes crushes them into spicula.

(4) Let us avoid exaggeration and tall talk; this always damages a good cause. One of your correspondents calls a road with a sharp curve an open road. I should call the road from Killiecrankie, past Struan to Spaeside, an open road. There you can see at least a mile in front of you. If the rich driver of a car chose to go at the rate of thirty miles an hour there no one need blame him except those who have to pay for the maintenance of the road.

(5) Someone has quoted against us the old proverb of the value of a peck of March dust. A good deal more than a king's ransom of dust is deposited, and not always in the month of March, on many a cottager's roses and dahlias and pansies. Let our aristocratic owners of costly and dangerous toys employ an agent to measure the depth of the dust, and to estimate the probable reduction in the rent that ought to be, and the improbable reduction that will be, made by the landlord.—Yours, &c.,

T. Wilson.

Rivers Lodge, Harpenden, S.O., Herts.,
September 16th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I be allowed to draw the attention of the readers of The Nation and the correspondents who have written in your columns to a quotation from the "Autocar" of the date August 29th last, from a signed article by Owen Jones, as follows?—

"The subject and its cause will then drop until the next silly season comes round, and perhaps by that time more roads may have been rendered dustless, more old fools have passed away, and it will be better realised that highways exist for the purpose of locomotion, not people's parks."

Comment is superfluous; the taste and spirit of these remarks speak for themselves.—Yours, &c.,

Thomas Howard.

Oakroyd, Manningham, Bradford,
September 10th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—(1) I would suggest that a Government meter should be attached to every car; that every car should be compelled to report itself once a week, or at set intervals, at a police station, or at motor stations specially created for the purpose; that the number of miles registered should there be recorded; and that the owners should be taxed according to the distance travelled—that is, in proportion to the nuisance created and the damage done.

I would have any tampering with the meter punished by fine for the first offence, and afterwards by imprisonment.

(2) I would have every car, the driver of which had been convicted of furious driving, carry in front, in a conspicuous place, a badge or flag for three months after the conviction. I would forbid all such flag-carrying cars to travel more than ten miles an hour; and I would have them compelled to report themselves daily at a police or motor station when on the road.

In the event of the owner changing his car before his months of penance had expired, he would of course exchange his flag to the new car.

Any infringement of these regulations I would punish through the owner.

It might be expedient to exempt from some of the above regulations cars used for professional or commercial purposes.—Yours, &c.,

Alfred Ollivant.

6, Vicarage Drive, Eastbourne,
September 15th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your readers, whether motorists or non-motorists, must wish you well in your campaign against the inconsiderate driving of automobiles. But since our quarrel is, presumably, with those who abuse the use of motor cars, and not with all who favor a mode of locomotion with which, properly conducted, progressives are more or less bound, with due regard to consistency, to sympathise, is it not rather unworthy of The Nation to compile a weekly "casualty" list, which is calculated to mislead its readers to a very serious extent? I venture to quarrel with you in respect of two items to which you have recently given publicity. "At Dunblane, on September 1st, a servant girl was killed by a car belonging to her master." This brief statement in your issue of Saturday, 5th inst., may be justified by the necessity for condensation. (Remember your commentary upon the Harmsworth brand because, in regard to their serial fiction, they stipulate that these stories "must be sensational, and each instalment should contain a fresh sensation.") In justice, you ought to state the exact circumstances of the Dunblane fatality, since you class it among the "worst outrages by motors" committed during the week. Is it too much to ask you to quote the following paragraph from the "Dundee Advertiser"?—

SERVANT GIRL'S SAD DEATH.
RUN OVER BY A MOTOR.

"About five on Tuesday night a motor car belonging to Mr. Osborne, Glasgow, at present residing at Kippendavie House, Dunblane, knocked down and fatally injured a young domestic named Winifred Lindsay, employed at Kippendavie House. It appears that the car was coming out from the approach to Kippendavie House on to the Perth Road as the deceased and another maid servant were about to enter the approach. They stopped to speak to the driver, but before he could draw up his car he knocked over the unfortunate girl, who seemed to have got in the way. She was found to be unconscious and bruised about the head, and was at once conveyed in the car to a chemist's shop in Dunblane, where she died in half an hour without regaining consciousness. The girl is said to be an orphan. No blame falls on the driver, who ran his car on to the footpath to avoid the accident."

I think it is perfectly evident to any fair-minded person that to call this "an outrage" of the "worst" kind is to create unnecessary prejudice against the unhappy driver, and, indeed, incidentally, against all motorists.

Again, in your issue of August 8th, you wrote that "two men were terribly injured—probably to death—near Aberdeen. . . ." The two men are not yet dead, nor are they going to die prematurely.

Is this method of conducting a legitimate crusade quite worthy of The Nation?—Yours, &c.,

J. Leng Stubbock.

Dundee, September 10th, 1908.

[We cannot think, as we said last week, that the use of the word "outrage" is improper. We turn to Webster's Dictionary, and find that its primary meaning is declared to be "injurious violence offered to persons or things." This seems to us a good definition of the kind of action which motoring sets up. But it does not imply blame or misconduct in particular cases on the part of the driver of the motor.—Ed., Nation.]

THE CAUSE OF UNEMPLOYMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I am surprised that The Nation should be of opinion that no one has yet diagnosed the true cause of the cyclical fluctuations of modern industry. Some years ago Mr. T. E. Young, a former president of the Institute of Actuaries, dealing with the question of the correct valuation of investments, pointed out that their appreciation and depreciation has followed for many years a cycle of approximately ten years from nadir to zenith and back again, and, curiously enough, this cycle was in direct relation to the seasons of bad and good harvests throughout the world.

Now a little reflection will show that the only increase to the world's wealth in any year is the multiplication of its flocks and herds and the products of its soil. Such wealth as is represented by coal and iron, copper and gold, was there before, and, if not exploited, is there after. But the whole of our transport services, of our milling and weaving, of our mining and metallurgy, can be traced back to exchange for the products of the soil. For instance, the vintage has failed this year in Champagne. The vine growers have nothing to offer us in exchange for the commodities they usually purchase on the sale of their wine to the great houses, and so a large production of manufactured goods will not be required in Champagne, and those who would have made them are unemployed. Or there is a famine in India. The cultivator of the soil, had his harvest been good, might have required Lancashire cotton cloth or Birmingham Buddhas in exchange. As it is, he cannot afford them, and so Lancashire makes less cloth and Birmingham fewer idols. Even in this country the agricultural interests exceeds all others in value of production, and a check to its prosperity reacts on the production of all our manufacturing districts. The automatic reflex action, as it were, causes unemployment.

Six weeks ago the hop-growers of Kent were cheerful with the hope of a record ingathering. Their wives were planning the purchase of all sorts of commodities required about their houses, new furniture, new dresses, and all the rest of it, all of which would have represented employment in the manufacturing districts. To-day they are sadly contemplating the wreckage of the hop gardens, ruined by wind and rain, and the hope of replenishing the household stores has vanished for another year. The employment that might have been given is gone, destroyed by the bad weather, that relentless provider of misery. In the country it produces famine directly, in the towns famine indirectly or unemployment.

I will not weary you with many examples. The effects of the floods on the Yang-tse, or the Ho-hang-ho, are felt as keenly in Lancashire as in China, and a drought in Australia, or a frost in Manitoba, produce the same result in Bradford as in Melbourne, in Hull as in Winnipeg.

You will find that the more closely you examine the sequence of the years of good trade and bad trade, the more irresistibly you are drawn to the conclusion that the good trade years follow good harvest years, and bad trade waits hand in hand on agricultural depression. Of course, I mean agriculture in its widest sense, including the growth of coffee and rubber in Brazil, tea in India and China, silk in Japan, spices in the Maladives, and so forth, as well as corn at home, in the Colonies, the United States, and the rest of the world, and flocks and herds in the Argentine and New Zealand. The nadir of trade is reached when the weather is bad everywhere, the lower figures when it is good somewhere and bad elsewhere, and the zenith as in 1907, when it had been good everywhere, as in 1906.

It would appear, then, that the cause of unemployment is beyond human control. Is there a remedy for the effect? I am glad to see you discussing some system of national insurance to meet the lean years when the agriculturist must dispense with commodities because the soil has yielded him nothing to offer in return. Such a provision should not be difficult if the bad years could be foreseen. There is, I believe, an undoubted connection between the bad years of weather and the condition of the sun. It would be interesting if meteorologists, to whose investigations we all owe so much, would trace back in parallel lines for, say, one hundred years, the years of drought or flood and the state of the sun at the corresponding dates. If Mr. T. E. Young's surmises are correct, it might be possible to foretell with some exactitude what to expect in any one year, and make provision accordingly.

I hesitate to value the yearly increase of the world's wealth, due to the products of the soil. But it cannot be much less than £12,000,000,000. A fall of even ten per cent. in volume means more unemployment than it is pleasant to contemplate.—Yours, &c.,

J. J. Bisgood.

11, King William Street, E.C.,
Sept. 14th, 1908.

THE TRADES UNION CONGRESS AND ELECTORAL REFORM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I, before the echoes of the Trades Union Congress have died away, direct the attention of your readers to the important modification made in the electoral reform resolution submitted to the Congress by its Parliamentary Committee. This resolution, as originally framed, contained the following paragraph:—

> "The provision for a second ballot where, at the first election, the candidate highest on the list has not secured a majority of the votes polled."

This paragraph was, however, eliminated, and the following addition unanimously substituted:—

> "In view of the complete failure of the second ballots in Austria and Germany to secure the just representation of political forces, in view of their universal condemnation in France, and in view of their abandonment in Belgium, this Congress calls upon the Government to institute an inquiry into methods of proportional representation, preference, or second ballots, so that the most effective means of securing the true representation of the electors may be embodied in the new Reform Bill."

The modification indicates a noteworthy change in the view taken of the second ballot, and if, as Mr. Asquith has promised, the Government intend to submit "a really effective scheme for the reform of our electoral system," it is most desirable that the inquiry asked for by the Congress should be instituted without delay.—Yours, &c.,

John H. Humphreys,
Hon. Sec., The Proportional Representation Society,
107, Algernon Road, Lewisham, London, S.E.,
September 15th, 1908.

CATHOLICS AND LIBERALISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I regret to find fault with my favorite paper, for from its commencement I have looked forward with eagerness every week to its perusal, and that not only since it has been known under its present title, but when, as "The Speaker," it was one of the few exceptions in the English Press, and stood for justice at the time of the Boer War; but I must protest with all my soul against the leading article headed "The Catholic Church and Modern Life," in your current issue. It is an offence, though I refuse to think it wilful, to every reader of yours who is a Catholic and a Liberal, and those of us who hold the Catholic faith and find it compatible with the Liberal spirit as it is known in England, will not accept that article as possessing any true Liberalism at all. It has all the narrowness and bitterness of the intransigent Left (or Right, I care not which) in French politics, or the bigotry of some Nonconformist Pope.

You ask, "Why does the Church of Rome inspire such hatred?" That is easily answered. She alone among the churches of the West speaks "with authority," like her Founder, and nothing, I suppose, is so displeasing to the average man than to submit to authority, to have his will thwarted, his passions curbed. We have an instance in this country in Henry VIII., and we see the melancholy results of his unbridled lusts. To us it is a question which shall prevail, order or anarchy. The hostility to all religious control, and the consequences of it that exist in France, testify to the anarchy prevailing there; the multitudinous and jarring sects that have sprung from the Reformation witness it here. In the Catholic Church alone is there discipline and order, combined with vigorous life, and I ask you, is that good or evil fruit for the individual and for the State? You say, "Men are not going back to the prison house, they are escaping from it"; we do not find it so, witness the many eminent names that have been making up the long catalogue of Rome's recruits the last half century. I will refer you to one, because he was of your profession, the late Ferdinand Brunetière, the able editor of the "Revue des Deux Mondes"; I hope it may be your felicity one day to follow him and enter the "prison house." Meanwhile, may I hope that you will have a little consideration for your Catholic readers, for I cannot think you wish to drive them out of the Liberal Party. I enclose my card, but beg to subscribe myself, Yours, &c.,

"A Knight of St. Gregory."

Sept. 15th, 1908.

[We plead for fair play for Catholics; further we cannot go.—Ed. Nation.]

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—It seems to me that there is some confusion of ideas on this subject. Licence is not the same thing as liberty. It is not only a question of doing what we like, but of doing what is least hurtful to others. If I like I can walk through the streets without a hat on, because this offends and injures nobody. But if my apparel is in other ways unseemly, I am taken to the police station. My offence is not one against decency, which is a matter of opinion, but an offence against the community, who think it indecent. If this were a Catholic country, Protestants would have no right to behave in the streets in any way that Catholics could resent. The Archbishop of Westminster seems to have overlooked this point of view, and to have laid himself open to the charge that the object of the procession last Sunday was to challenge the right of this country to call itself Protestant. By the word Protestant I mean one who "protests" against the legality of the Roman Catholic doctrine, and if this nation wishes to remain Protestant it will be necessary for Englishmen to see straighter and to think clearer than they seem able to do over the present controversy. Where a country enjoys definite civil and religious opinions, there is a corresponding individual responsibility in the exercise of its privileges. The State is not more responsible for the security and welfare of its subjects than its subjects are for the security and welfare of the State.—Yours, &c.,

W. P.

Putney, September 16th, 1908.

"MODERATE AND EXTREMIST IN INDIA."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Among the very few level-headed journals in this country there can be no doubt that The Nation takes the highest place, and every Englishman ought to be grateful to it for the courage and candour with which unpleasant aspects of public questions are invariably examined. At present there is no problem of such magnitude as the future of India, regarding which the attitude of The Nation and most of its correspondents has been practically that of the educated Indians themselves. In your issue of the 5th inst. there appears a most lucid and rational communication from the pen of Mr. Ratcliffe, as well as a tribute to the respected Indian leader, Mr. G. K. Gokhale. But there are some phrases, Sir, on which I should like to offer a few remarks.

It seems to me that the distinction that is frequently made between "moderate" and "extremist" is a meaningless one and has no foundation in fact. There is no moderate who is not an extremist and no extremist who is not moderate—if, that is, they are to be judged by their real ultimate aims as regards the reconstruction of Indian polity. Whenever an Indian is found who uses the so-called "moderate" phraseology, you may be sure either that he is anxious to save himself from incarceration under the present reign of terror, or that he wishes to appear to the powers that he, as a reasonable being, who still believes in the efficacy of compromises, and who still has hopes of the fulfilment of British promises. The first may be writ down cowards, the second as the more slowly-moving and credulous Indians. The ultimate distinction is between non-Indian and Indian—between upholders of irresponsible government and advocates of responsible self-government. No man can be said to be convinced at all who is not prepared, if called upon, to maintain his convictions against all the opposing powers of heaven and earth. In this sense every convinced advocate of Indian self-government is an extremist, and the honored leader of the so-called Moderate Party is himself an extremist of an ardent type. Why, then, should Mr. Bal Gangadhar Tilak alone be called a "preacher of revolution"? Is it because his analysis and bold exposition of the Indian problem have the well-accepted doctrinal bases of political and constitutional liberty, and because, instead of going to the Government on bended knee, he regards it as his proper and legitimate function to educate the people through their vernaculars in the principle of freedom?

Mr. Ratcliffe suggests that it might be wise, in certain circumstances, "to find some means of checkmating the subtle preacher of revolution," and your reviewer of Mr. Gokhale's speeches calls the "extremists" the "party of despair." If all our hopes depended on what the British Government would be graciously pleased to grant, then indeed it may be said that the Indians in increasing numbers are joining the party of despair, and that the subtle preacher of revolution is the most desperate and dangerous of the whole party. But, honestly, do all our hopes depend on the British Government? A huge assumption is made by your reviewer (and perhaps by Mr. Gokhale) when it is stated that Mr. Gokhale "still retains a confidence in the good sense and justice of the English people, if only their ignorance of India could be broken down." The italics are mine. If only! But how and when and by whom is that Herculean task to be undertaken and accomplished? The answer is that the solution must ultimately come, not from those who waste their time and energies upon the English people, but from those very persons who are said to form the party of despair. From the depths of their despair arises the only hope of salvation, and the subtle preacher of revolution (as distinguished from the insane bomb-thrower) is, in reality, the man who is solving the problem. The rage and rancour of the inflexible Anglo-Indian is helping greatly towards the solution. And if, Sir, a pro-Liberal may be permitted to pay a tribute to the enemies of Liberalism, I should like to say that much credit is due to Lord Curzon, who did more in seven years than England had done in a hundred. I am looking, of course, at the other side of the lantern, which shines morbidly brighter in the light of Italy of 1870 and America of July 4th, 1776.

The Indians are a truly law-abiding people. They are invariably on the side of "law and order." But are they necessarily criminals if they are not always on the side of the present law and the present order? If they are, then, Sir, I should like to say that among them there are many men, like myself, whose love of England is second to no Englishman's. As for the policy of repression in India, there are some appropriate lines in Mr. Swinburne's passionate volume of "Songs before Sunrise":—

> "Are ye so strong, O Kings, O strong men? Nay, > Waste all ye will, and gather all ye may,
> Yet one thing is there that ye shall not slay,
> Even thought, that fire nor iron can affright—
>
> The woundless and invisible thought that goes
> Free throughout time as north or south wind blows,
> Far throughout space as east or west sea flows,
> And all dark things before it are made bright."

—Yours, &c.,

V. Chattopadhyaya.

78, Lancaster Road, W.,
September 8th, 1908.

MORAL EDUCATION CONGRESS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—From the numerous applications which I have received for information as to the meeting of this Congress and the address of its office, I fear that, notwithstanding the many interesting notices which have appeared in the Press, the general public is still much in the dark on the subject. Will you, therefore, allow me through your columns to announce that full information will be gladly furnished at the Congress Office, 13, Buckingham Street, Strand, W.C.—Yours, &c.,

ST. G. L. FOX PITT,
Hon. Sec. Finance Committee.

Cedar House, Glebe Place, Chelsea, S.W.,
September 14th, 1908.

"THE DILEMMA OF A LIBERAL LAWYER."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I thank "Another . . . Solicitor" for his sympathetic letter, though his mode of reference to Sharpe v. Wakefield is unkindly. Solicitors even may differ as to the exact effect of that decision, but it is beyond doubt that the principle now generally supposed to have been thereby decided was not acted upon by the justices, and it was customary to renew all licences except in cases where there had been continued misconduct, and where the magistrates took away a licence for a single conviction, it was restored at Quarter Sessions.

As to "C.," he appears to argue that because he has been smart and made a profit on transactions in brewery shares, therefore the Government ought to punish those who have not been as smart as himself. In effect he says: "I escaped from the sinking ship with my pockets full of other people's gold, and I left the widows and orphans on board to perish. They deserve to perish because they were so slow." In other words, he says: "I bought my shares at £1, sold them at £1 5s., and now they are only worth 10s. Because the present holders of shares did not see danger and sell out, the Government ought to reduce the value of their shares from 10s. to 8d." This is Mr. Balfour's estimate of the effect of the Bill. I could have understood the boasting enthusiasm of "C." had he been suggesting that the Government should make him disgorge his ill-gotten gains to assist those persons on whom he has foisted his shares. "Ignoramus" never owned a brewery share, and his clients are only interested in free houses.

To me it seems a fatal objection to the Bill that it ties up the licensing question for fourteen years. It is impossible to say what conditions will prevail at the end of that time. Further, I decline to be a party to selecting the "victims" and then condemning them to a lingering death to extend over a smaller or greater part of fourteen years. And I make the following suggestions:—

1. Instead of taking 30,000 licences during fourteen years, that 5,000 to 10,000 be taken next year. The money can be borrowed, and gradually repaid out of the compensation fund provided by the trade.

2. That in the selection of redundant licences confidence be placed in the magistrates, and they be permitted to consider the requirements of their district as a whole.

3. That the compensation be upon the basis laid down by the Act of 1904—i.e., the reduction of capital market value—but the compensation authority should have power to reduce the amount of compensation if the owner of the redundant licence also owns other licences in close proximity thereto which would benefit by the taking away of the redundant licence.

4. The monopoly value (better called privileged value) can be secured by the gradual but moderate raising of licence duties. Each Government has power to raise or lower these as they do, e.g., income-tax.

5. The above process, if found beneficial, can be repeated in a few years' time.

6. That a Pure Beer Bill be introduced at once.

Upon these suggestions I invite the criticisms of those Liberals who, like myself, desire to see temperance reform without undue hardship upon any class of the community.—Yours, &c.,

IGNORAMUS.

August 29th, 1908.

Poetry.

LIGHT O' THE MOON.

My dad held a share in the land wi' the Squire:
'Twas the ploughshare he drove for ten shillun and fun;
Right foot in the furrow and left in the mire,
Like a lopsided lammiter, dot and go one.
But I were a sperity lad from the fust:
Too nimble to clump in a clodhopper's shoon.
So I told the old chap he med keep his dry crust,
For I'd arn my own bread by the Light o' the Moon.

Oh! the Light o' the Moon, 'tis the sportsman's delight:
The sun and the star of the merry and free;
When the river is full on a Midsummer night,
And no one abroad but the otters and me!
Down stream in a tremble of silver she shines,
Where the weir is a zinging its thundering old tune,
While through the dim midders I creep to my lines,
And pull the brown trout by the Light o' the Moon.

Or up to the corner of Quarrender Copse
I'm listening, maybe, to the nightingale's note;
When a gert stubble hare from the hedge covert pops,
And fierce as a tiger do vly at my throat!
I be vorced my poor innercent life to defend,
Though in general well known as a bit of a spoon;
And I'm just taking care of a gun, for a friend:
So I shuts un stoän dead, by the Light o' the Moon!

O' Zundays, I dander through Somerford town,
And watch the good people a-goin' to church;
And theer, side o' Passon, walks Poulterer Brown,
As grave as a rook on an ellum tree perch.
In a's wide-skirted coät and a's chimney-pot hat,
And waistcoat so round as a broadcloth balloon;
Who'd ever believe that a deacon like that
Would deal, on the quiet, with Light o' the Moon?

In course, like Sum Paul, I gets nabbed now and then,
A doctorin' a pheasant or settin' a wire:
Then at zame Petty Sessions, in zame little pen
They claps me afore the zame red-vaiced old Squire.
Jim Keeper, he kisses his thumb, and he swears:
"I knows un, your Washup, by night and by noon!
For law and police not a farden he cares:
And the name as he goes by is 'Light o' the Moon'!"

Warm weather, I pays my two quid like a swell,
But in frosties I choses the option—and jail.
Theer's fire and theer's grub at King Ed'ard's Hotel,
And all you do miss is your baccy and ale.
Lying out on damp ma'shes, in hopes of a snipe,
Don't suit my complaint like the trouting in June.
And the screws in my back with onmerciful gripe
Do twist I most cruel, poor Light o' the Moon!

Wull, I've taken my sport while the daylight was young:
Now, 'tis—hie along home in the dimpsies, instead!
When the beer is all drinked, and the songs is all sung,
'Tis time for us gaffers to toddle to bed!
Theer's a nook on the downs that the windhovers know,
Where I shall sleep sound as a lord pratty soon.
But winter or zummer, in shine or in snow,
Let me die in the open, says Light o' the Moon!

EDWARD SYDNEY TYLEE.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

A NEW edition of Professor L. T. Hobhouse's book, "The Labor Movement," is in preparation, and will be issued by Mr. Fisher Unwin. The whole work will be revised, and a fresh chapter added dealing with the progress of the labor movement during the fourteen years that have passed since the book was first published. The book, small as it is, is a standard work, of great merit in respect of its tone, method, and command of its subject.

* * *

MR. WILLIAM ARCHER is engaged upon a book which will treat of the negro problem in the United States. During his recent visit to America Mr. Archer spent some time in the Southern States, and was greatly impressed by the difficulties of the situation and the need for a thorough and energetic handling of the problem. By the way, we are glad to hear that the services of the doyen of our dramatic critics have been secured for the "Fortnightly Review." Mr. Archer will, in future, contribute a dramatic causerie to each issue of that magazine.

* * *

THE true story of the circumstances that caused the Wallace collection to come into the possession of the English nation is, we are told, to be related, for the first time, in a book called "Piccadilly to Pall Mall," which will be published by Messrs. Duckworth. The authors, Mr. Ralph Nevill and Mr. Charles E. Jerningham, deal principally with the lighter side of West End life during the past twenty-five years, and a number of lively anecdotes may be looked for concerning some of those who have won fame in politics, society, and on the turf during that period. Several phases of social life, such as clubs, the rise of the modern restaurant, and the changes in London amusements are discussed. We are also promised much curious information concerning the dispersal and acquisition of celebrated pictures and other art treasures. The book is likely to prove a highly entertaining chronicle and criticism.

* * *

EARLY in November Messrs. Methuen will publish Dr. Paget Toynbee's "Dante in English Literature," an exhaustive account of the references to Dante in English from Chaucer to the death of Cary in 1844. During this period of four hundred and seventy years Dr. Toynbee finds nearly six hundred English authors who make mention of Dante or quote his works. Of these more than forty belong to the sixteenth century, about fifty to the seventeenth, and close on one hundred and fifty to the eighteenth. Many of these references seem strangely absurd to the modern reader. One is not surprised to find Lord Chesterfield writing to his son that Dante "was not worth the pains necessary to understand him," or even to see Horace Walpole characterising him as "extravagant, absurd, disgusting, in short, a Methodist parson in Bedlam." But Thomas Warton ought to have known better than to speak of Dante's "disgusting fooleries" and "gross improprieties," and we can scarcely forgive Goldsmith for his verdict that the author of the "Divina Commedia" "addressed a barbarous people in a method suited to their apprehensions," and "owes most of his reputation to the obscurity of the times in which he lived." Dr. Toynbee's book will contain brief biographies of each of the writers mentioned, together with notes and a lengthy introduction. It is certain to be an interesting contribution to English literary history.

* * *

FOR the next instalment of Messrs. Dent's "Everyman's Library" which will be issued during the present season, Dr. Robertson Nicoll is preparing "A Gallery of Literary Portraits" by George Gilfillan. To the present generation of readers Gilfillan is almost unknown, though the frequenter of second-hand bookstalls is certain to have come upon some of his works. During the third quarter of the last century he had a high reputation both as a theologian and a critic. He wrote memoirs and notes for a useful series of the British poets in forty-eight volumes issued by an Edinburgh publisher, and his literary articles in three volumes are marked by a wide range of sympathy and a capacity for generous praise united with a certain fixed brilliancy of style. Dr. Nicoll is making a careful selection from Gilfillan's books and contributions to reviews, and the book will also contain an introduction dealing with his influence upon the literature of his time.

* * *

THE authorised biography of President Cleveland is to be written by Dr. John Finley, President of the College of the City of New York. Cleveland's life was not of the first political importance, but it marked a distinct point in the development of the policy of the Democratic Party. Personally, the interest of the book should be considerable. Cleveland had a strong, honest character, with a touch of waywardness in it.

* * *

UNDER the title "Naval Administration and Warfare" Captain A. T. Mahan has collected a number of essays upon naval topics, which will be issued during the present season. Captain Mahan shared in the cruise of the American fleet as far as Magdalena Bay, and in the coming book he gives his impressions and criticisms of the expedition. Other subjects treated are "The Strength of Nelson," "The Principles of Naval Administration, "The United States Naval War College," and "The Russo-Japanese War." The last topic is dealt with in two papers—one written at the beginning of the contest, the other when it had ended.

* * *

THE bitterest enemies of Modernism cannot deny that it has given a great impetus to theological study, especially in the departments of comparative religion and hagiology. The writings of modernists upon these subjects have certainly interested numbers of people who would never dream of opening an ordinary theological treatise. It is therefore highly probable that a book on Messrs. Dent's list, "The Mystical Element of Religion Studied in Saint Catharine of Genoa and her Friends," by Baron Friedrich von Hügel, will appeal to a large circle of readers. The work, which is the result of much historical research and of a lengthy study of the problems involved, aims at presenting, as undeniably lived within and canonised by the Roman Church, a generous, expansive, deeply spiritual Catholicism operative in specifically modern, but none the less decidedly un-Protestant, minds.

* * *

Two biographies of special literary interest appear on Messrs. Constable's autumn list. Mr. Ferris Greenslet's "Life of Thomas Bailey Aldrich" is the authorised biography of the poet, and will contain a large number of letters written by Aldrich himself, as well as a selection from those addressed to him by contemporary writers, including Holmes, Hawthorne, Longfellow, Howells, and Mark Twain. The other book is a "Life of John Keats," by Professor Albert E. Hancock. Lord Houghton's "Life and Remains of John Keats," first issued in 1848, can never be superseded, but Professor Hancock aims at interpreting Keats's personality in the light of fresh knowledge of the details of his life.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Dumouriez and the Defence of England against Napoleon." By J. Holland Rose and A. M. Broadley. (Lane. 21s. net.)

"Florentine Sculptors of the Renaissance." By Wilhelm Bode. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Thomas Ken and Izaak Walton." By E. Marston. (Longmans. 6s. net.)

"The Story of My Life." By Ellen Terry. (Hutchinson. 6s. net.)

"Evolution in Italian Art." By Grant Allen. (Grant Richards. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Rousseau and the Women He Loved." By Francis Gribble. (Nash. 15s. net.)

"The Cathedrals of Norway, Sweden, and Denmark." By Francis Bumpus. (Werner Laurie. 16s. net.)

"The Old Time Parson." By P. H. Ditchfield. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Some Threepenny Bits." By G. W. E. Russell. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. net.)

"Maurice Guest." By H. H. Richardson. (Heinemann. 6s.)

"By Faith Alone." By René Bazin. (Nash. 6s.)

"A. Daudet. 1840-1897." Par Paul et Victor Margueritte. (Paris: Larousse. 75 cents.)

"Le Rebouton." Par Gustave Toudouze. (Paris: Flammarion. 3 fr. 50.)

"Le Théâtre." Troisième Série. Par Adolphe Brisson. (Paris: Flammarion. 3 fr. 50.)

Reviews.

FRANCE AND HER PEOPLE.*

Mr. George has special qualifications for the task of explaining France to his fellow-countrymen. Although an Englishman, he was born, bred, and educated in France, and has lived there all his life, with the exception of the last five years, which he has spent in England. He should, therefore, have the necessary knowledge with the necessary degree of detachment. With such advantages he might have produced a better book. The field was not so fallow as Mr. George seems to imagine, and it is hardly true that "France has not attracted much attention" in England. If the British public—as one can hardly believe—is really still so ignorant of France as Mr. George maintains, it is not for want of information. The books on France are many, and some of them—for instance, those of Miss Betham-Edwards—are thoroughly well informed. Mr. George is not always well informed. There are some surprising inaccuracies in his book, which shows signs of hasty compilation; and, even within the limits which his special purpose of correcting misconceptions imposes on him, there are equally surprising omissions. But, on the whole, he gives a fairly just and true picture of the French people, even if he does not add much to the information supplied by previous authors.

Most of what we are told about French home and social life is true enough. Mr. George bears faithful witness to the great qualities and influence of the French wife and mother, to the extraordinary power of the family and the home. The chapter on the French woman is one of the best in the book, and that on marriage does justice to the French marriage system, which has not been the failure that it is believed in England to be. The author does not, however, seem to realise that the marriage system has been made successful by conditions which are passing away, and that it cannot, without modification, survive the higher education of women. He does not even mention (perhaps because it came too late) the recent change in the law, which has made marriage, with or without parental consent, far more easy than it was, and has already led to a great increase in the number of marriages and, in particular, of early marriages. The convent-trained jeune fille, on whose existence the marriage system depends, is rapidly disappearing, and a more reasonable view of the relations of the sexes in youth is as rapidly spreading. "Lettres à Françoise" is a book to be read in this connection. On the vexed question of the falling birth-rate Mr. George is judicial and reasonable. He recognises the danger of an actual decrease in population, but recognises also the advantages of moderate families. Perhaps there is greater possibility of an improvement than he thinks. Increased facilities for marriage may do something. The worst evil of "irregular unions" is not illegitimacy, but childlessness, and, among the working classes at any rate, a large proportion of such unions have been due to the obstacles placed in the way of marriage. In the other classes a large proportion may be traced to the jeune fille system, which makes natural relations between a young man and girls of his own class impossible, and forces him to regard marriage as something to be postponed until the freshness of youth is past.

The chapter on the drama may be praised almost unreservedly; not so Mr. George's remarks on French literature, which are strangely inconsistent with his defence of the frankness of playwrights. It is not true that French novels are almost exclusively concerned with adultery. Would Mr George assert that of the greatest of all—the works of Anatole France? Within recent years French novelists have been more and more occupied with the clergy, religion, the status of women and in particular of the jeune fille, education, politics, social life. It is true that most of the best novels are not suited to the "young person," and many are, from any point of view, only fit for persons of more or less mature years. But that is not to say that they are immoral. The French novelist cannot, like the English, deal chiefly with the love affairs of young girls, for the simple reason that the properly brought up jeune fille has no love affairs, and the mere notion that she could have any is shocking to the French parent of the old school, who firmly believes that English—and still more American—girls are young persons of easy morality. It is, no doubt, true that the sexual interest is highly developed in France. This is partly a racial characteristic, which appears, it is said on high authority, in the Gallican service books and devotional works of the seventh century. But the natural tendency has been exaggerated by the restrictions on the relations of the sexes in youth, and that exaggeration is fated to disappear.

In his treatment of political and economic questions, Mr. George may usually be safely followed. His favorable view of the French political system as a whole is that of most unprejudiced foreigners who know France, and it will be good for the English public to read his demonstration of the advantages of a Republic, a written constitution, and the group as opposed to the party system. But in these chapters there are some inaccuracies and omissions to be noticed. The account of the position of the President is, in many respects, very misleading. Far from the President being "invariably a deputy or a senator" (page 95), he invariably resigns his seat in Parliament, if he has one, when he is elected to the Presidency, and he can communicate with Parliament only by written messages. The President has not by himself the power of dissolving Parliament. The consent of the Senate is required, and no President has ventured to ask for that consent since the decisive catastrophe of McMahon. Moreover, the power of initiating legislation given to the President by the Constitution is and will remain a dead letter. Why is Mr. George so anxious to prove that the President of the French Republic is not a mere figurehead? The tendency is to make him more and more a figurehead, aloof from party politics, and that tendency is, in the opinion of some close observers, a wise one.

The chapters on Socialism, Trade Unionism and Co-operation, and Trade and Colonies are all useful. But Mr. George should not have omitted all mention of agricultural co-operation, which is far more important than the industrial and distributive co-operation, with which alone he deals. In the remarks on the effect of Protection agriculture is also entirely ignored, although Mr. George rightly says that it is the staple industry of France. The foreign commerce of France is admirably dealt with and the sound commercial position of the country clearly demonstrated. The paragraph on anti-militarism (page 171), in which M. Anatole France, M. Urbain Gohier and M. Hervé are classed together, is singularly absurd. There is little affinity between the anti-militarism of Anatole France and that of M. Hervé. As for M. Gohier, he is now in quite a different camp. Even more absurd is the account of the organisation known as the Jaunes (page 189), which is described as "a working-class branch of the Radical Party." In fact, it is a clerical and reactionary organisation, as the very names of its leaders, given by Mr. George, clearly indicate. It has very little influence, and no future. Such mistakes as these show that Mr. George has not followed recent French politics with very close attention.

In his general treatment of the conflict between Church and State Mr. George is accurate enough, and his diagnosis of the causes which have led the great majority of men to abandon the practice of religion is true, so far as it goes. He omits, however, one of the most important causes—namely, the profound hatred of the confessional, based on experience of its practical results. The account of the Separation Law is confused and misleading; that law did not leave the "incumbents" free to "obey or not their spiritual chief." On the contrary, it restricted the use of the churches to priests in communion with the Pope and the bishops. Mr. George's description of the provisions of the law as "somewhat on the same lines as the arrangements made by our Nonconformist bodies" shows that he has not grasped the essential principles of the measure. The bishops were willing to constitute, not associations "somewhat similar to the associations of worship," but those legal associations themselves; they were ready to accept the law without any modification. Although Mr George mentions the decree of the Roman

* "France in the Twentieth Century." By W. L. George. Alston Rivers. 6s. net.

Inquisition (usually known as the Syllabus), he entirely ignores the far more important Encyclical "Pascendi," and quotes, as referring to the former document, a passage from the "Church Times," which obviously refers to the latter.

It is, perhaps, in his treatment of the French educational system that our author allows traditional convictions to overcome his judgment. His view is that of most Englishmen—that the English University and public school systems are almost, if not quite, perfect, and that the aim of other countries should be to assimilate their own systems to them. That is not at all the view of French authorities on education, who, for the most part, consider that the art of teaching is very little understood in England. The French admirers of the English public school are not representative and mostly belong to the class of Anglo-maniacs. The present writer had not, like Mr. George, the advantage of being educated in France, but he is convinced, by personal experience, that the product of the French University is not at all what Mr. George describes it as being in a passage (page 274), which is very inconsistent with other passages in the book. And the present writer can also assure Mr. George, from personal experience, that a "peculiar monastic, thoughtful life" is not an accurate description of life at Oxford or Cambridge. The French educational system is not perfect and some of Mr. George's criticisms are entirely justified. It is true that the boys in the lycées are overworked and that the Internat is still gravely unsatisfactory, though it has much improved during the last few years. But Mr. George does not seem to understand that the French conception of the functions of a school differs profoundly from the English. French parents do not expect a school to form character or to provide education in the fullest sense of the term; they regard that as their own duty. This view is not confined to France. England is the only country in the world where parents think it necessary to transfer to others the whole responsibility of training their own children. It is this fundamental difference in conception that makes boarding schools popular in England and unpopular everywhere else. Mr. George is mistaken if he thinks that the lycées will ever be moved to the country, or that French parents will ever surrender the entire education of their children to a schoolmaster. It is far more likely that the day-school system will become more and more prevalent in England, which retains the boarding-school system chiefly because it is behind most other civilised countries in regard to educational matters.

The concluding chapter is one of the best in the book, for Mr. George is usually happy in his generalisations, and he has grasped the salient points in the French character. That character is a paradox: on the one hand practical to the verge of hardness, and often beyond the verge of avarice; on the other hand generously enthusiastic for ideas and for the cause of humanity at large; on the one hand gay, mocking, sceptical; on the other, profoundly serious. It is this complexity which, as Mr. George rightly observes, makes it so difficult for a foreigner to understand the French people.

PERU.*

It is refreshing to come on a book on any part of South America, written by a man apparently unbiassed by Protestant prejudice, and not nurtured on Prescott.

The latter worthy man had almost a virgin field on which to work his wicked will, and a sky almost as virginal, in which to fly the moral banner of the Stars and Stripes.

Most conscientiously he set to work, and certainly most patriotically, translating Bernal Diaz del Castillo's chronicle almost in its entirety for his "Mexico," and several of the less known writers, such as Cieza de Leon, for his "Peru." It is not to be thought he did so without acknowledgment, for in his notes he often sets down mystic numbers which refer to chapters and to pages, but without letting you perceive that the great body of his text is but translation unabashed. No one complains of him for this, for Robertson and others perhaps translated as much too little as Prescott did too much; but it should be remembered that the reputation which he gained was largely gained by his translations from Bernal Diaz, one of the most enchanting writers of the kind who ever held a pen.

In all his writings the Spaniards were the villains of the piece, the worthy writer having forgotten all that had occurred, and was occurring (in his time) to the Red Indians under his very nose. The Spaniards certainly did well enough for men armed, as they were, with snaphaunce and with mere crossbows and the like. Their intentions certainly were bloody, but tempered now and then with piety. Had they been armed as were the men who blew up the natives in the Matoppo hills, the Belgians on the Congo, or as the allies were armed after the relief of the Legations in Pekin, what splendid work they might have done.

The author of the present book starts with a different thesis, for he observes, "But Spain left much that is good in the character and institutions of the people of Spanish America." It is true that he deplores the evil and the cruelty that stained the conquests, both of Mexico and of Peru, but the thought seems to have struck him that at least the Spaniards left some Indians, whereas the Americans have almost "civilised" all theirs away.

But this view of Spain is certainly not the view modern historians take when they compare her doings with our own, those of the Belgians in the Congo, the French in Africa, and our Teutonic cousins in the Hinterland of Walfisch Bay. It also helps the writer of a work such as the present to have acquired the language of the land of which he treats, and this the author of the book has done, so that a feminine noun never appears joined to a masculine adjective—a mercy for which reviewers should thank Providence.

The little survey of the history of the conquest is adequately done, and might have been improved had there been references occasionally to the originals in which the facts were found. These being absent, some are sure to say that the writer took his facts from Prescott, thinking, apparently, that Prescott was a conqueror of Peru. One is glad to see that in this summary the author writes the truth about the President La Gasca, he who was sent from Spain to put down the Pizarros, and calls him the "cruel and useless President," quoting from a writer whom he does not name, but who, I think, is either Garcilasso Inca or Pedro Cieza de Leon.

Had the Pizarros been successful, bloodthirsty as they were, things had gone better in Peru, for they and theirs, bound to the country by the ties of blood (in every sense) would have been more amenable to Peruvian feeling than were the governors sent up from time to time from Spain, to plunder, make their fortunes, and retire. Besides, as nearly all the Spanish conquerors were obliged perforce to marry native women, a race would have sprung up with different ideals to those held in Spain. It might have been that thus Peru would have been the greatest Liberal Power in the New World.

Still, looking at the book as a whole, the historical account is far inferior to the author's own experiences of that which he has seen. Without the least pretence of literary style, and with a hand more used, perhaps, to the theodolite than to the pen, the book has yet a certain air as of a journal written up day by day, simple but quite convincing in its artlessness.

There is, of course, the inevitable table of exports and of imports, drawn from Consular reports, a thing which in a year or two is obsolete and useless, even misleading, but without which no book on any country is complete.

I fancy (in my mind's eye) the luckless author sitting in a scantily-furnished Peruvian room, his water-bottle hung up in a draught, his feet in slippers, and with a maize husk cigarette between his teeth, toiling laboriously through the leagues of figures in the report, wiping his brow, and shouting to his Cholo servant (when the task is done), "A glass of chicha, Juan, and put a little ice in it, and perhaps—yes, just a little Pisco," and then falling again to write the serious portion of the book. "Non ragionam——" in fact, no thinking man would ever waste a moment on such things, which he can learn for himself at first sight by buying the reports, but would naturally read with avidity those things which nothing but experience and long residence in any country gives the power to write. These he will find in plenty on almost every page, with passages such as the following: " . . . nor is he (the Spanish-American) a votary of the strenuous life. . . . His theory of existence does not require him to be the North American to keep his nose eternally to the grindstone . . . It would be unphilosophical to condemn this attitude altogether. . . "

* "Peru." By C. Reginald Enoch, F.R.G.S. With an Introduction by Martin Hume. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.

That is so, and the word "unphilosophical" shows that the author thinks for himself, and, having found the Peruvian a pleasanter man, on the whole, than (let us say) the North American, actually dares to set down what he thinks: a parlous frame of mind, and most unusual in the mining (or civil) engineer who, able at his business, not infrequently takes his opinions upon men and things straight from the newspapers, thinking, apparently, that it is their profession to provide ideas as it is his to build a bridge or follow up a lode, and not reflecting that, whereas he was obliged to study, the journalist is only forced to write.

This paucity of thought, frequently remarked amongst the practical, is due because it is a truism in mechanics and the like to work upon the line of least resistance, whereas in the region of mere thought advance alone is made along the line where the most firm resistance is encountered at each turn.

Thus as one turns the pages of the book, for we reviewers (that is, those of us who read a book at all) skip like adventurous bees from flower to flower, we find the training and up-bringing of the author often at variance with his experience of life.

It is as if a mind active and sympathetic had been imprisoned in a book of logarithms, and by degrees was struggling to be free.

This is at once apparent in his thirteenth chapter, in which he tells about the Indians in the great forests of the headwaters of the Orinoco and the Amazon. In a most curious passage, curious, that is, to students of the human mind, he says: "Bullets, alcohol, small-pox, &c. . . . are rapidly reducing these inhabitants of the Amazonian forests, and it is probably only a question of time before they become extinct."

Here, in his own mind, he evidently deplores their probable extinction. Then he goes on to say " . . . they inhabit, unchequed" (what, then, becomes of the preventive checks of bullets, alcohol, and small-pox? for I presume "unchequed" is a misprint for "unchecked") a vast and valuable territory which some day will count among the land assets of the globe."

It is not stated who was to "check" these Indians from living where they had been born. Clearly the Peruvians are doing their level best, with their bullets, alcohol, &c.; but the onus would seem to lie with Providence, who, in the first place, was so ill-advised as to create the Indians, and then to lose them in the woods.

These newspaper-made opinions only appear when the writer of the book writes consciously. When he sets down what he has seen, as it would seem, unconsciously, his natural kindliness appears. In several instances he dwells upon the patience, the sobriety, laboriousness, and cheerfulness, under oppression, shown by the Indian race, and chronicles instances of kindness shown by them to himself.

Most interesting is his account of the Chilian and Peruvian war, especially when he quotes figures to show that in their battles often a quarter of the whole contending foes were slain. This far exceeds anything that happened, even before Port Arthur, and leaves the military picnic in the Transvaal even more hopelessly ridiculous than it was at first. The introduction from the pen of Martin Hume is in his usual vein, solid and serious, well thought out, and fuller far of facts than is even an ostrich egg of meat. His knowledge of the history of Peru makes it an easy task for him to introduce, in a few well-chosen words, one or two episodes as picturesque as if he had invented them himself, instead of having taken them straight from the pages of the Inca, who now sleeps in the great mosque at Cordoba, in the third chapel on the left-hand side, entering (as he himself relates) from the court of oranges.

R. B. Cunninghame Graham.

BISHOP STUBBS ON MEDIEVAL GERMANY.*

The reason given by Mr. Hassall for publishing a volume of lectures by the late Bishop Stubbs on "Germany in the Middle Ages," is that "the absence of satisfactory histories of Germany in the English language is as keenly felt now as it was when Bishop Stubbs was Regius Professor of Modern History at Oxford." This may be so; but if the statement is meant to imply that the present volume is a "satisfactory history of Germany," it is an unfortunate claim. Such as they are, Mr. E. T. Henderson's "History of Germany in the Middle Ages" and his "Short History of Germany" in two large volumes, are more satisfying than these lectures, which even at the time of their delivery can have had little importance. Bishop Stubbs, says Mr. Hassall, "some thirty-five years ago"—apparently the date of their preparation—"had in contemplation the publication of a volume somewhat on the lines of the present one"; and Mr. Hassall is "confident that this volume will be welcomed not only by students in the Universities and in University Colleges, but also by all who are interested in the history of Germany." That Mr. Hassall pronounced his judgment in haste is suggested primâ facie by the syntax of the second sentence of his preface, and perusal of the book confirms the surmise. He himself could very well have produced for us a preferable treatise. Mr. Henderson, it is true, is painfully careful to be popular, not to say juvenile, in his reflections on the history he traces; but the Bishop Stubbs of thirty-five years ago is not much more profound. Like Mr. Henderson, he thinks it necessary to make excuses for his undertaking; and they are not good excuses. Such fantastic considerations as "the strange phenomenon of the fertility of the transplanted genius of the race, repaying with interest its debt to the Motherland"; "the fact that in the free English air German literature first became vocal"; and the thesis that "from England Germany received the inquiring and disputing spirit which ended (!) in the Reformation," are calculated to repel rather than attract rational students concerned to study the period 476-1250. And those who might surmount the misgiving set up by such an approach would be apt to succumb before "the fact that it is from English pseudo-philosophy that the modern German pseudo-philosophy has arisen, and that in the writings of English philosophers the religious schools of Germany have sought the antidote to the mental poison thus insinuated." It is safe to say that nobody nowadays wants to have the history of medieval Germany prepared for his deglutition in this pseudo-episcopal fashion: the whole procedure is, in more than one sense of the term, impertinent.

Seeing that the lectures make no pretence to critical investigation, being but a compendium of the chronicles, they could attain importance only in virtue of any sociological light they might throw on the vast field of German feudalism. But of this there is none. Instead, we get some characteristically vacillating and nugatory remarks on those threadbare themes, the "Germanness" and the greatness of Charlemagne. He is first presented to us (p. 21) as "a German of the Germans, in life and in death," whatever that may mean; and he is confidently credited (p. 28) with having pushed the dominion of "the German nation" further than it had ever extended. Knowing our author we are prepared to read soon afterwards (p. 35) that there was no German nation to wield dominion, and that Charles "was not the chosen representative of the German race He was a German conqueror of Germans, i.e., a Frank conqueror of Bavarians and Saxons," As to his character, among other precariously balanced estimates we have from the Bishop this: "Not free from the pride, lust, and cruelty of conquerors, he is yet singularly free from the errors, misfortunes, and crimes into which such passions lead conquerors." On the whole, one prefers the moral method of Gibbon.

On the general problem of the "Holy" Roman Empire Bishop Stubbs sees clearly enough, as did Heeren and others before him, the harm done to Germany by the Imperial relation; and on this subject he speaks with weight and wisdom. "Never anything but harm," he rightly sums up, "resulted to Germany from the Italian Dominion." But he makes no attempt to show how the harm worked in the body social; and such considerations as "the humiliation of Henry IV., the one great failure of Frederick Barbarossa, the profound, astounding ruin of Frederick II.," merely put a reader off the scent. What is needed is a presentment of the life of the German people as affected by German Imperialism; and for this the British novice had better turn to Hallam, if not to the translation of Menzel. Hallam is here criticised by Bishop Stubbs for his view of the Emperor Henry III.; but the dispute lacks interest because of the sociological vacancy around it. Had the Bishop lived, he might have based upon the sketch of these lectures a history of medieval Germany worth attention: as it is, one is moved to doubt whether he would latterly have thought the sketch worth printing. If he did to the last stand by the views here set forth as to the incomparable moral superiority of the Teutonic stock; the incapacity of English and German Kings to break their plighted word, as did French Kings (also, as it happens, of the sacred stock); the innate faithlessness of the medieval Italians (with all their Teutonic elements) and of the Byzantine Greeks, with all their Christianity—he thereby proved merely his temperamental retention of the early prejudices which most interfered with his judgment as a historian. In these days we have to listen much in England to the lore of those who hate all things German. It is melancholy nonsense enough; but it is not to be usefully counterblasted by uncritical Teutophile writing of the school of Stubbs and Motley. One had thought that was obsolete; and it is not possible to be grateful to Mr. Hassall for this rechauffé.

* "Germany in the Middle Ages, 476—1250." By William Stubbs, D.D., formerly Bishop of Oxford and Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford. Edited by Arthur Hassall, M.A. Longmans. 6s. net.

HEARN'S CANDID FRIEND.*

One of the many comforts of antiquity is that we know little about its greatest writers. The author of the Book of Job is not even a name, and of the Greek poets hardly half a dozen facts have survived. If the ancients wrote biography, it was the lives of men of action that they wrote. For a man of wisdom they tried little more than to record the memories of his teaching, and for an author his works were sufficient memorial. At the back of this limitation there lay, perhaps, the classic sense of fitness for material—the same sense that refused to imitate each separate hair in marble, or to represent external scenes by music. Certainly, the events in a writer's life can be told, but they are almost always unimportant, and the history of the soul is far too delicate a substance for the biographer's art in marble tombstones.

Yet there is evidently an attraction in literary biographies, and the resurrection of writers is a frequent occupation, even when there is something of a ghoulish feast about the resurrection, or of a body-snatcher's profit. Dr. Gould is far from being a ghoul or a body-snatcher, but he was a friend, and, were it not for Boswell and Lockhart, we should say that no friend ought ever to be a biographer. If we wanted to retain any heroic idea of a great writer, we should almost as soon have his Life by his valet-de-chambre as by a friend. What Dr. Gould has done for his friend in the way of epitaph cannot be called a service. We quite recognised Lafcadio Hearn's limitations before. We never regarded him as a creative genius of exuberant mind or overwhelming character. We knew only that he was excellent within his dainty and rather precious borders, and we did not care to know much more. He was not big enough for more, and when Dr. Gould describes him as "deprived by nature, by the necessities of his life, and by conscious intention, of religion, morality, scholarship, magnanimity, loyalty, character, benevolence, and other constituents of personal greatness," we can only say that we are sorry to hear it was so bad as all that. But it does not now much matter to the world, and it does not matter at all to the little piece of work that Hearn admirably accomplished.

Beside friendship, which thus finds its natural expression in words that no one but a friend could have used, Dr. Gould has the further disadvantage for the biography of being possessed by a theory that is only partially true. He appears to have made a specialist's study of the power of sight and its influence on the mind. Like most specialists, from shoemakers upward, he thinks there is nothing like his speciality. "Intellect, and especially æsthetics," he says, "are almost wholly the product of vision," and he repeats that sentence in the book as though it were an established law of truth. Naturally, he applies it to Hearn as a remarkable illustration. For Hearn had only one eye, and that is characteristically described by Dr. Gould as "enormously near-sighted." A foot or two away, Hearn could see nothing but a hazy blur of colors, and to this near-sightedness Dr. Gould attributes, not only his delight in color, but nearly everything noticeable in his mind and character. We must apologise for using the word "character," for Dr. Gould tells us that Hearn had none, that he only reflected the moment, and was nothing but a "chromatic voice," "a multi-colored echo." His short-sightedness not only caused his "timid and feline" manner, but so limited his mind that his only originality was color.

Of course, there is truth in all this. A very clear-sighted man is often cynical, seldom very imaginative, and usually has a keener sense of form than color. More than twenty years ago Mr. Andrew Lang had praised the advantages of short sight in lines that Hearn took to himself with pleasure. We quote a few of them as exactly illustrating the argument, and also as a model of comic style:—

> "And with my feeble eyes and dim,
> When you see patchy fields and fences,
> For me the mists of Turner swim—
> My azure distance soon commences!
> Nay, as I blink about the streets
> Of this befogged and miry city,
> Why, almost every girl one meets
> Seems preternaturally pretty!
> 'Try spectacles,' one's friends intone;
> 'You'll see the world correctly through them.'
> But I have visions of my own
> And not for worlds would I undo them."

There is a kind of truth in it all; eyesight certainly has its effect on the mind and temperament, just as digestion has. But when we remember blind Thamyris and blind Mæonides, it is a little too much to say that intellect is almost entirely the product of vision, or that Hearn's "morbid vision was his distinctive force."

What with this theory and his personal friendship, Dr. Gould is, perhaps, more merciless to his subject than any biographer has been before. The book abounds with passages like the following:—

> "The interior emptiness was pathetically emphasised by the fact of a contentless experience which also worked to deprive his mind of spontaneous originality. He never loved, except in one sorry way, never suffered much, never lived much, for he was a hard worker, and was always seeking the ever-postponed, ever-unsatisfying Paradise, so vainly hunted for, and which none ever finds except in himself. Ihm fehlt die Liebe, was said of Heine—how much truer is it of Hearn!"

In passing, we wonder if that mistake of Matthew Arnold's is to be immortal! Ihm fehlt die Liebe was never said of Heine. Goethe said it of Platen, Heine's most virulent enemy and best ridiculed butt. The irony that pursues Heine beyond the grave has fastened the phrase on him, and the dulness of mankind seems likely to inscribe it as his epitaph for ever. But it appears to us quite probable that Hearn deserved it as little as Heine himself. One does not become even a "multi-colored echo"—one does not enter into the heart of a people as Hearn did, without a quality that we may call love.

It was a sympathetic affection for her people which gave Hearn the power to describe the fading visions of old Japan as no other foreigner has described them. We admit that, in Dr. Gould's words, it is "rather disconcerting" to find that after fourteen years' residence among the Japanese, Hearn was still unable to speak to his wife and children in their own language or to read it. We can only suppose that his wife must have served as a very useful interpreter of words and, sometimes, of Japanese feeling. But it is to Hearn's own peculiar sensitiveness, to his genius for putting himself in the place of others, that his power of insight and charm of interpretation were due

---

* "Concerning Lafcadio Hearn." By George M. Gould, M.D. Fisher Unwin. 8s. 6d. net.

Indeed, if we were asked in one word to express the secret of Hearn's success where so many have failed, we might well use the word "Liebe" for it, whether he is telling of the holy mountain and country life, or of strange fairy-tales and traditions, or of the blossoms, the singing insects, and the dragon-flies that so well typified Japan in the past, and still hold their place among battleships and similar evidences of progress. "How can a doll live?" asked a dull stranger of a Japanese child. "Why," came the quick answer, "if you love it enough it will live." It was so that Hearn made old Japan live for us in his pages.

THREE NOVELS.*

WHERE women novelists excel is in understanding and delineating the fine shades of personal touch. Woman's mental finesse, necessitated by her rôle in social life and the home, finds its own characteristic expression in feminine humor. This is well illustrated by Mrs. Stepney Rawson's amusing novel, in which the men characters are shown as erratic, unseeing forces of the masculine will, to be played up to, disregarded, or out-manœuvred by the women who, living for the social drama around them, take a malicious joy in watching every move in the game. The story centres round the doings of the Luck household, the retired Anglo-Indian Colonel, his hazy wife, Alethea, and their three daughters, Hazel, Violet, and Penelope, who have just settled down in their new home at Yeldham, on the banks of the Thames. The autocratic Colonel, to the outsider's eye, rules his family with a rod of iron, but, in fact, his paternal thunders pass harmlessly over his womenfolks' heads when the latter have once set their minds on gaining their point, little or big. The chronicle of the scandals set going in the neighbourhood by the gossip-mongers, Mrs. De Saulez-Pratt, and Mrs. Partwell, over Hazel's love affair with her impetuous suitor Edmund Fielding, is done with the lightest of hands, as are the pen-sketches of Mr. Crumpton, the rich plebeian, the "mincing" Honorable Julian Vyner, Major Scott, who writes and stage-manages the Yeldham Pageant, Aunt Gribble, the early-Victorian lady, and a dozen other of the Lucks' neighbors. Where, however, the author's feminine finesse shows itself most piquantly is in her analysis of Hazel's secret love feelings: her ruses of flight with averted head, her sudden returns and relentings, followed hard by an irreproachable and icy manner, her anger with herself, and her final surrender—all the innocency of Hazel's feminine manœuvres are done with clairvoyance and a touch of malice. Mrs. Stepney Rawson throws herself, however, with such zest into her chronicle of the opinions of everyone in Yeldham on everybody else, that a slight dizziness may affect the masculine reader before the last page is in sight. In return for being amused and distracted, the latter is forced to bow his head and admit his likeness to a fly which has buzzed and blundered into the intricacies of a spider's web.

A deeper aspect of feminine morals is dealt with in a story of a loveless marriage, "The Burden," which, lacking in the feminine wit displayed in "The Easy-Go-Luckies," is distinguished by its earnest spirituality. As a work of art "The Burden" is indeed only partially convincing. The aristocratic household of Lord Raven, the hero, is a little wanting in actuality, and the character-drawing of the lover, Captain Piers Raven, and of the men generally, is shadowy. The story, nevertheless, holds one's attention. Lord Raven, a frail widower of sixty, has taken to wife Elizabeth, his ward, an unawakened girl of eighteen. The two live on terms of affection, but Elizabeth does not know the meaning of love, and there are no children. When the irresistible cousin, Captain Raven, comes to stay on a visit, the scales fall from Elizabeth's eyes, and though meaning to be true to her vows, "after a moment of madness she awakes to find that she has given Piers Raven what she might never regain." Captain Raven is recalled immediately to South Africa, and Elizabeth soon finds that it is his child that she will bear. The moral problems here treated are complicated. With one school of novel writers Elizabeth's death would have been held to be the only adequate expiation of her fault, and the fact of the unnaturalness of this marriage between a young girl and a man of sixty would have gone for little. The author, however, from the feminine standpoint, reaches the same conclusion that Meredith has worked out in "Lord Ormont and His Aminta," and her thesis that the sin against nature involved in Elizabeth's marriage is of more vital importance to the community than her sin against her husband, is treated with much spiritual insight. There is, in fact, a conflict under discussion in "The Burden," the woman's feeling of having obeyed a law of love, and the conviction that this love is licence. Her point of view is summed up in the speech of Elizabeth: "I never had the love of wife for him. How could I—a girl of eighteen?" and in the description of the tumult in the girl's heart, her mixture of shame and joy, when she discovers that she is bearing a child to the man she really loves. Elizabeth, of course, does not deny her fault. "That I did was wrong, and I ought to have waited to have freed myself, and that I did not was wrong." But this confession carries no weight with the old maid, Miss Georgie Raven, who "seethes with anger and hatred, and a bitter sense of outrage against Elizabeth, whose clean life and cloistered days, devoted motherhood and wholesome occupations, were like straws against the gold weights in the balance. Georgie judged her wholly vile because she had once yielded to the temptation." The complex situation is smoothed out by the sudden death of Lord Raven, by an accident, and by Elizabeth's resolution, after her child's birth, to reveal to the family trustees that her son is illegitimate, and that Captain Raven is the rightful heir. This is the best scene in the book.

In "Hill Rise," Mr. W. B. Maxwell has, we think, given the measure of his artistic gifts. If we exclude from our field of vision talents of the first and second order, we are grateful that he can be counted as a sturdy recruit in the third or fourth rank. He tells an entertaining and animated story in a breezy and vigorous style, and his commentary on life is fundamentally sound and whole hearted. In "Hill Rise" he traces with unflagging skill the fortunes of two families, the great Sir John Vincent's, the local aristocrat, and Mr. Crunden's, a Medford "builder and decorator," who has retired from business with twenty-five thousand pounds. The picture of the Hill Rise residential gentry, with their ever marriageable daughters, and their sons who ride and row, play golf and tennis, loaf and get into debt, but never find work in any career for themselves, is skilfully set off against that of the Medford shopkeepers and city fathers, who have ostracised old Crunden because he votes against burdening the rates with the cost of an unnecessary Town Hall. Fate however has it that when the great Lady Haddenham dies the Hill Rise estate comes into the market, and is secured by Mr. Crunden, eager to avenge the snubbings the residential artistocracy have inflicted on his charming and modest daughter, Lizzie. The story of the "development" of the Hill Rise estate, and of the financial collapse of the great Sir John and the gentry, has almost epic force. Never has the romance in "bricks and mortar" been set forth in such circumstantial detail as by Mr. Maxwell, who, by the exactness of his facts and figures might, to write "Hill Rise," have gone into training as a builder's foreman. Lizzie Crunden is secretly in love with the dashing Jack Vincent, who seizes the psychological moment of his family's disaster, to roll up his shirt sleeves, and is then taken on by Mr. Crunden as a clerk, at thirty-five shillings a week. If, in places, the reader rubs his eyes and wonders why it is that the novel is transformed into a fairy tale, we may answer that the quality of the author's art is romantic, and that the apparent closeness of nature to his descriptions is varied by effective strokes of caricature. This will not, however, trouble the great majority of his readers, who will follow with profitable amusement the ups and downs of the losing battle which old Crunden wages gallantly against fate and the London and Suburban Trust. All comes right in the end, and the Crunden-Vincent feud becomes an alliance when, on the last pages, Jack goes down on his knees, and Lizzie falls into his arms.

*"The Easy-Go-Luckies." By Maud Stepney Rawson. Methuen. 6s.
"The Burden." By Anna Scott-Dawson. Heinemann. 6s.
"Hill Rise." By W. B. Maswell. Methuen. 6s.

JUST PUBLISHED—BOLD TYPE.

FLORENCE WARDEN'S NEW NOVEL:

THE SOCIALISM OF LADY JIM

Now ready. Crown 8vo. 6s

C. FORESTIER-WALKER'S NEW NOEVL:

THE TRAGEDY OF 44.

Now ready. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE MYSTERY OF A MOONLIGHT TRYST.

By IZE DUFFUS HARDY. Cloth 6/s.

A MYSTERIOUS BOHEMIAN.

By ALICE M. DIEHL, Author of "The Garden of Eden."
Now ready. 6s.

THE BOND WOMEN.

By H. MAXWELL, Author of "The Secretary of State," &c.
Standard says: "A bright and interesting novel." 6s.

THE DIAMOND AND THE LADY.

By JAMES BLYTH, Author of "The King's Guerdon," &c.
Academy says: "A racy, exciting detective story." 6s.

THE PERFECT UNION. By "ALIEN." 6s.

"Readers of 'Alien's' former book "His Neighbour's Landmark" will appreciate the quality of her latest work The story of a woman's struggles to acquire the difficult art of self-knowledge may serve not only to widen experience but to enlighten the mind. No one who reads this well thought-out novel will have any manner of doubt."—Birmingham Daily Post.

THE UNEXPLAINED: True Indian Stories.

By EDITH C. GERRARD. Cloth Gilt. 3/6.

Standard says: "Many Anglo-Indians will welcome this collection of Indian stories. They have a certain wayward charm of their own."

LONDON: DIGBY, LONG & CO., 18, Bouverie Street, E.C.

JUST PUBLISHED. Crown 8vo, 6s.

DIANA MALLORY.

BY

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD

The Times.—"The heroine is fascinating . . . a beautiful character, high strung, chivalrous, the soul of honour, always ringing true when struck by the blows of fate. . . . The swift deft talk carries the reader into politics of the latest kind, and people who are outside party politics must feel that they are initiated into electoral mysteries and cabinet making after reading some of these vivid pages."

Ready on Thursday next. Crown 8vo, 6s.

ROUND THE FIRE STORIES.

By A. CONAN DOYLE,

Author of "The White Company," "Sir Nigel," &c.

MY FIRST AND LAST APPEARANCE.

And Other Original Recitations.

Being Specially Revised Selections from "T Leaves," "Tantler's Sister, and Other Untruthful Stories," and "More T Leaves."

By EDWARD F. TURNER.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. Sept. 26.

NEW SIX-SHILLING FICTION.

WROTH.

By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE,

Guardian:—"This bewitching romance . . . . Few living novelists have a wealth of imagination such as appears in this work, and fewer still know so well how to handle their material."

A PAWN IN THE GAME.

By W. H. FITCHETT, B.A., LL.D.,

Daily Telegraph:—"A book to be cordially recommended both to those who enjoy a good story and to those who enjoy adventure."

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

Part I. Ready

A Book most Fascinating to look at

And of Rare Scientific Value

THE WILD BEASTS

OF THE WORLD

By FRANK FINN

100

Large Drawings in Colour

By

Louis Sargent, Charles E. Swan, and Winifred Austin

It is now many years since any extensive series of pictures of animals in colour was presented to the public, and all works so illustrated have been issued at a very high price. Recent developments in colour printing have now made it possible to bring within the reach of everyone the best work of the best artists in colour, and the Publishers believe that the demand for The Wild Beasts of the World will justify them in placing it on the market at a popular price.

17 Parts at 1/- net

The descriptions are accurate, thoroughly up-to-date, and written in a vivid and lively style.

This New Natural History draws upon a fund of information revealed by the observant traveller, and by the camera, not available in older works.

LONDON: T. C. & E. C. JACK
16 HENRIETTA ST., W.C., & EDINBURGH

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Mr. Hugh de Selincourt's "Great Ralegh" (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net.), is an entertaining biography, written with care and distinction, but, in our view, not quite adequate to its subject. For few even of the great Elizabethans furnish their biographers with a theme at once so rich and so exacting as does Sir Walter Raleigh. Possessing in generous measure the exuberant vitality of his age, he touched life at many points—he was adventurer, courtier, soldier, sailor, politician, poet, coloniser, historian—and in nearly every capacity he showed an audacity and power of mind and temperament that lend themselves readily to vivid coloring. "He was," says Mr. de Sélincourt, "the most romantic figure of the most romantic age in the annals of English history." To present such a figure in clear perspective it is necessary to make much of incident, but Raleigh's latest biographer seems to care little for action, and the Raleigh he gives us is a Raleigh heroic indeed, and attractive, but lacking the substance that goes to make up the true portrait of the man. Not that Mr. de Sélincourt has any want of admiration for Raleigh. He has unbounded enthusiasm for him, and his tendency is to find excuses for Raleigh's pitiful letters to James when under sentence of death at Winchester, and for his counterfeit of illness at Salisbury. "The spirit of life which made him a great man, mastered him, and forced him now to plead for his life like a little man, which he could never be." This is a slight explanation of the tone of the letters. Raleigh's conduct at Salisbury, when he rubbed himself with an ointment so that it might seem he was suffering from grave disease, may have been merely a ruse to gain time to write the "Apology for the Voyage to Guiana," in which he stated his case to the world. But it was terribly undignified and weak, and it is futile to say that "men like Ralegh have different values from ordinary men; in that, perhaps, chiefly lies their greatness." There is some padding in M. de Sélincourt's book, and occasionally—as in the description of Raleigh's death—it descends to sentimentality; but it gives an interesting account of a great Englishman, typical in his defects as well as in his qualities, of the Elizabethan age.

* * *

The anonymous author of "G. K. Chesterton: A Criticism" (Alston Rivers, 5s.), justifies his book on the ground that Mr. Chesterton "is primarily a propagandist, the preacher of a definite message to his own time," and that it is as absurd to postpone discussing him as it would be for Mr. Balfour to "defer replying to a speech by Mr. Asquith till time has shown whether Mr. Asquith will be classed with Fox or with Addington." Accordingly, the writer traces clearly, but rather portentously, the growth of Mr. Chesterton's opinions. His conclusion is that when the process of self-realisation is complete Mr. Chesterton "will come to see that just as he has become a Catholic in religion, he has, in fact, become a Tory in politics." There is ground for this view, but it should not be stated without adding that Mr. Chesterton's democracy is pretty sound and strong. Indeed, his efforts to drive Catholicism and democracy in a sort of tandem, sometimes with the one as leader and sometimes with the other, make a good part of the liberal entertainment he provides for us. Admitting that Mr. Chesterton has no power of creating characters who talk and act from within, his critic holds that the stories are the best part of his work, and gives "The Napoleon of Notting Hill" as his high water mark. For our part, we prefer his biography of Dickens, which, in spite of many faults, is a penetrating and sympathetic criticism, marked also by brilliant pugnacity. An interpretation of Mr. Chesterton would have more justification had his writings or his philosophy a touch of obscurity, but obscurity is a charge of which he is innocent. He is a very clear writer. However, this book will interest those people who like to read about Mr. Chesterton.

* * *

The late Queen Victoria published several of her diaries during her life-time, and a good deal more relating to her private life was revealed to the public through Sir Theodore Martin's standard work on the Prince Consort, compiled under her personal supervision. From this and other miscellaneous material, Mr. Frank Hird has produced a very readable volume in "Victoria the Woman" (Appleton, 7s. 6d. net.). The author's intention is to show the late monarch's character as a woman, as distinct from that of a sovereign, and with this end in view he has made no use of purely political correspondence, such as that which largely constitutes the recently published "Letters of Queen Victoria." He has collected some piquant facts in regard to the Duchess of Kent and her treatment by George IV., William IV., and the Duke of Cumberland, while the events of the Queen's childhood, of her domestic life with the Prince Consort, and of that later life of seclusion, relieved towards its close by a burst of devotion to the ceremonial part of public duty, are described with clearness and a sympathetic touch. Necessarily, the Queen's retirement from State functions from the time of Prince Albert's death to the Jubilee of 1887—a retirement that was greatly criticised by the contemporary Press—calls for vindication at his hands, but his opinions are temperately expressed. The book does not induce a more favorable opinion of the Queen's predecessors in the Hanoverian dynasty than has been entertained hitherto, and the figure of the Duke of Cumberland especially appears in a rather more sinister light as that of a somewhat clumsy intriguer for the possession of the English crown. The Queen's character, however, after making allowances for the political indiscretions of early years and the human selfishness of later ones, gains immeasurably by contrast with those of her royal relatives. Mr. Hird's picture of her as wife and mother is altogether pleasing, and most probably just.

* * *

Founded by Rahere in the reign of Henry II., the Priory of St. Bartholomew-the-Great at Smithfield has had an even more chequered career than most of the important religious establisments whose ruins still survive. Like many another, it suffered severely from the Act for the Dissolution of the Monasteries, and after succeeding periods of complete or partial neglect had reached a deplorable state of dilapidation in the early part of the last century. Then some attempt was made to restore the building, but no real improvement was effected till 1863, when the then Rector of the parish took the matter in hand. The crowning work of restoration was the reconstruction of the Lady Chapel, completed by Sir Aston Webb in 1896; and since then an energetic Committee has done much to revive the early glories of its architecture. A painstaking account of the Priory and its history is contained in Mr. George Worley's "The Priory Church of St. Bartholomew-the-Great," which forms a volume in the Cathedral Series (George Bell, 1s. 6d. net). It is profusely illustrated with photographs and reproductions of old engravings. The latter make very satisfactory pictures, but the former are in many cases disfigured by halation. This could surely have been avoided.

* * *

Mr. W. P. Westell's "The Insect Book" (John Lane, 3s. net.) is the latest addition to the series of "Country Handbooks," and serves its purpose as an introduction to the detailed study of a large and curiously attractive subject. The book is divided into an introduction and five chapters, the latter covering different "localities." Thus we read, in turn, of the Insect Life of the Gardens, of the Waterside, the Woodland, &c., &c., and while in this classification there is bound to be considerable overlapping, the arrangement is, perhaps, the best that could be devised. In a brochure of 25,000 words anything like detailed treatment is, of course, impossible, but this little volume contains quite enough information on the structure and habits of the insect tribe to be useful to the person who is neither an advanced entomologist nor lacking in the necessary intelligence for matters of natural history. The accompanying plates deserve special mention. Beautifully produced and printed, they are illustrations in the best sense of the term, in that they assist the proper understanding of the text,

From Messrs Constable's List

LIFE OF TOLSTOY: FIRST FIFTY YEARS. By Aylmer Maude. Demy 8vo, 10/6 net.

DOROTHEA BEALE OF CHELTENHAM. By Elizabeth Raikes. Demy 8vo, 10/6 net.

PRINCESSE DE LAMBALLE. By B. C. Hardy. Demy 8vo, 10/6 net.

A SHORT HISTORY OF ENGRAVING AND ETCHING. For the use of Students and Collectors. Full Biography and Classified Lists, &c. By A. M. Hind. Sm. Crown 8vo, 18/- net.

WRITE FOR SPECIAL LIST OF BERNARD SHAW'S BOOKS, ALSO FOR DESCRIPTIVE LISTS OF RELIGIONS: ANCIENT AND MODERN; AND PHILOSOPHIES: ANCIENT AND MODERN.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

LEAVEN OF LOVE. Mrs. Clara Louise Burnham.

THE BORDERLAND. Robert Halifax.

THE PRINCESS DEHRA. John Reed Scott.

DESIRE. N. L. Silberrad.

THE LITTLE BROWN BROTHER Stanley Portal Hyatt [2nd Edition.

KITTY TAILLEUR. May Sinclair.

LEWIS RAND. By Mary Johnston. Early in October.

10, ORANGE STREET, LEICESTER SQUARE, W.C.

BOOKS WANTED, 25s. Each Offered.—Brewer's Henry VIII., 2 vols., 1884. Burke's Armoury and Extinct Peerage, 1883. Borrow's Wild Wales, 3 vols., 1862. Eliot's Scenes of Clerical Life, 1st edition, 2 vols., 1858. Jerrold's Men of Character, 3 vols., 1838. Alice in Wonderland, 1865 or 1866. Stevenson's Edinburgh, 1879. Desperate Remedies, 3 vols., 1871. Churchill's Poems, 3 vols., 1844. Symond's Italian Literature, 2 vols., 1881. Swinburne's Atalanta, white cloth, 1865. Lorna Doone, 3 vols., 1869. James's Painters and their Work, 3 vols. Gardiner's History of England, 2 vols., 1863. Jackson's Old Paris, 2 vols., 1878. Freer's Last Decade, 2 vols., 1863. 100,000 books for sale and wanted. Please state wants.—Holland Bros., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE

By L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(Reprinted from "The Daily News.")

The publication of 100 POINTS for FREE TRADE day by day during the last few months in "The Daily News" has been followed with the keenest interest. These 100 Points are now issued in convenient pamphlet form (100 Pages). Free Traders all over the country have thus an opportunity of possessing in a handy form the material for an immediate answer to the fallacies of the Tariff Reformer.

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE

PRICE ONE PENNY.

The price of this 100-page pamphlet, which is of a handy shape for the pocket, is 1d. for a single copy or 1½d. post free. A comprehensive index to the entire subject matter makes every item of information contained readily accessible.

We have arranged for special terms to be in force for large orders as follows:—

SPECIAL TERMS FOR QUANTITIES.
(Carriage Paid.)

2 dozen and upwards	-	1d. each.
200 and upwards	- -	1d. „ less	2½ per cent.
500 „ „	- -	1d. „ „	5 „
1,000 „ „	- -	1d. „ „	10 „

1d. 100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE. 1d.

Applications to be made to THE MANAGER, Publications Dept., "The Daily News," Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.,

CATALOGUES POST FREE.

Have the Largest Selection of Bibles, Prayer Books, and Church Services. Publishers of "The Marked Bible." Lectern Lesson Book," "Priest's Pocket Bible," "Daily Service Book," &c.

CASH DISCOUNT, 3D. IN 1S.

☛ Thousands of Bibles, etc., at HALF-PRICE.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

406 pages, 8vo, cloth, 2s. post free.

HEAVEN AND HELL:

Things Heard and Seen.

By EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER wrote:—"There is one grand and beautiful idea underlying all Swedenborg's revelations or speculations about the future life. His remarkably suggestive books are becoming familiar to the reading and reflecting portion of the community."

LONDON: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury St.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

and, though not colored, suggest the æsthetic attraction of many specimens as few photographs can claim to do. They are the work of Mr. R. B. Imisson.

* * *

Schiaparelli said that astronomy was the science of Infinity and Eternity, and this significant description should always be borne in mind when considering the educative uses of a study that has attracted mankind almost since the world began. In the introductory chapter of his "Through the Depths of Space: A Primer of Astronomy" (Blackwood, 2s. net.), Mr. Hector Macpherson, Jun., keeps this broad aspect of the science well to the front. He writes an interesting historical sketch of astronomical research from the time of the ancient Greeks and Hebrews, showing how old philosophers clung to the theory that the earth was motionless, how this idea was changed by Copernicus, and how further important discoveries by Herschel and Newton paved the way for all modern investigation. Succeeding chapters on the Moon, the Sun, and the Inner and Outer Planets, Comets and Meteors, and the Stellar System, deal concisely with the phenomena of the various phases of this profound subject. With the matter of each section indicated by a title in larger type, the form of the book is essentially business-like, and the accompanying plates leave little to be desired

* * *

"By the Roman Wall," by Miss Maria A. Hoyer (Nutt, 2s. 6d. net.), is the light-hearted account of an August excursion along the line of the Wall from Chollerford to Bowness. The blank verse "foreword" which, the authoress confides to us, was written to pass the time on a wet and idle day, is perhaps blank enough to be a little pathetic; but what follows is in an easy, swinging style, well calculated to attract the reader who has not yet fallen under the spell of "antiquarian research," as the term is understood by the many tourists who go to the northern counties for their recreation. The book is illustrated by the authoress's own sketches and photographs. We have read works on the same subject that aspired to much more, and achieved a good deal less, than does this high-spirited holiday book.

* * *

A Novel Reader's Guide.—"The Suspicions of Ermengarde." By Maxwell Gray (John Long, 6s.) A light comedy of the doings on the Continent of an Englishwoman, watched over by her husband, disguised as an Anarchist.—"Gold of Cathay." By Gilbert Wintle (Ward, Lock, 6s.) A sensational story of hidden treasure, good of its kind.—"Rose Campion's Platonic." By Adam Lilburn (Greening, 6s.) A novel with a Bohemian flavor. The hero's wife dies at the psychological moment, and thus brings Rose's "platonic" to a conclusion.—"The Prince's Marriage." By W. H. Williamson (Fisher Unwin, 6s.) A story of political intrigue in the Near East.—"The Climax." By J. Cranstoun Nevill (John Long, 6s.) The hero, Eric Haines, is determined to see life, and rebels against his guardian's authority. He falls in love with a married woman; a fatal accident to a friend prevents an elopement.—"The Log of a Sailorman." By W. Brooke (The Century Press, 6s.) A good story of rough-and-tumble episodes in a seaman's life.—"A Pawn in the Game." By W. H. Fitchett (Smith, Elder, 6s.) A historical novel of the days of Napoleon, who is one of the characters. There is plenty of adventure, and the style has vigor.

The Week in the City.

The Movement of Leading Stocks.

	Price Friday Morning, Sept. 11.	Price Friday Morning, Sept. 18.
Consols 2½ per cent.	85 15/16 ...	85 9/16
German 3 per cent.	84 ...	83½
Union Pacific	171½ ...	167⅜
Canadian-Pacific...	179¼ ...	176⅛
Peruvian Corp. Ord.	11⅝ ...	11⅝

It is hardly surprising that the week has seen a reaction on the Stock Exchange after the general expansion of the past fortnight. American railways in particular seemed to have gone far higher than the state of trade and earnings justified. The cereal crops in the United States are not so very remarkable this year, though a good deal better than last. Certainly they are not good enough in themselves to swing trade round from bad to good. From all that I can hear it is now the general opinion of those best able to judge that cheap money and bad trade (the first being a consequence of the second) are likely to last a good many months longer. If this be so, it would be reasonable to expect a general rise in Consols and gilt-edged securities. But the Russian Loan is impending, and this will absorb a great deal of capital. The Sao Paulo Coffee Loan is also expected almost immediately, and it is in preparation for this that Brazilian bonds are being manipulated upwards. An interesting report has just been published by our consul at Para on rubber and other products of the Amazon Valley. The International Rubber Exhibition at Olympia ought to be visited by all who are interested in the trade.

The American Harvest.

The following report indicates the condition and prospects of American crops at the beginning of this month:—

> "There is general complaint of the weather being too cool or too dry for corn in the northern half of the belt. West of the Mississippi there is plenty of moisture, but the weather is rather cool, while in Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, drought still prevails, and the crop has lost ground. Light frosts are reported from northern Illinois. The outlook for the crop is mixed. The acreage is larger this year than last, but the condition is lower and the crop is late. Early frosts would curtail yield. A crop no larger than last year is now indicated. Tobacco has been hurt in Ohio and Kentucky by dry weather. Winter-wheat ploughing is retarded by dry weather in the central west. Cotton-crop reports from Texas and the Mississippi valley are very good, but deterioration is reported in Alabama, and serious damage was caused in the Carolinas by the recent floods washing out the crops on the lowlands. Hill crops are in better shape. A good rice crop is bringing high prices in Louisiana, and a good sugar crop is in sight. The Maryland tomato crop was hurt by rains following drought."

This is not a particularly good outlook, comparing unfavorably with Canada, where the harvest is said to be one-third larger than last year, as well of superior quality. And when we turn from the farmer to the manufacturer and merchant, or from the agricultural laborer to the town hand, we find that the barometer of trade in the United States is still very low—considerably below the corresponding period of last year, when contraction was still in evidence.

Trade in the United States.

Iron and steel production, after being only 40 or 50 per cent., is now from 60 to 80 per cent. of full capacity, and the settlement of the Alabama coal miners' and the New England paper-makers' strikes has made for a larger output. During the last eight months the production of steam coal in the United States has only been about 60 per cent. of last year. There is a further gain in the output of lumber, particularly in the South and in the Pacific North-West. The building trade is expanding in Western cities, but the preliminary August report showed a heavier decrease from a year ago than was shown in July or June, owing largely to heavy decreases at New York City. The shoe trade is rather better, but the output is below last year. The Eastern leather markets are quieter, manufacturers having covered requirements. Cheaper jewellery manufacturers are busier. A general resumption of glass factories occurred on September 1st. The tone of the Boston wool market has been fairly good, and the textile mills generally seem to be rather busier. But the depression is still sufficiently serious to make the Republican Party and Wall Street and the Trusts very nervous about the election. The tariff question is coming more and more to the front, and the Republicans are showing more and more disposition to promise reductions. A New York financier who has just arrived in London considers that it will take six years before the United States recovers the prosperity it enjoyed in 1906. This sounds like an exaggeration; but the author of the saying has good opportunities of knowing present conditions at any rate, and he predicts another heavy crop of failures this autumn.

Lucellum.

LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING COMPANY, LIMITED.

ESTABLISHED IN 1836.

CAPITAL - £8,000,000, in 100,000 Shares of £80 each.
Paid-up Capital, £2,000,000. Reserve Fund, £1,600,000.

Directors.

Hon. SIR ERIC BARRINGTON, K.C.B.	WILLIAM E. HUBBARD, Esq.
JOHN ANNAN BRYCE, Esq., M.P.	SIR THOMAS JACKSON, Bart.
JOHN JAMES CATER, Esq.	WM. McKEWAN, Esq. (Honorary Director).
ERNEST H. CUNARD, Esq.
Right Hon. VISCOUNT GOSCHEN.	OSWALD CECIL MAGNIAC, Esq.
C. SEYMOUR GRENFELL, Esq.	WILLIAM G. RATHBONE, Esq.
CHARLES JOHN HEGAN, Esq.	CHARLES J. CATER SCOTT, Esq.

Auditors.

HENRY GRANT, Esq. THOMAS HORWOOD, Esq.
Hon. STUART PLEYDELL-BOUVERIE.

Head Office Manager—HERMAN RICHARD WYATT.
Deputy Head Office Manager—FREDERICK JAMES BARTHORPE.
Country Manager—WILLIAM GEORGE GRIBBLE.
Chief Inspector—FRANK WILLIAM HOWETT.
Chief Accountant—THEOPHILUS JAMES CARPENTER.
Secretary—EDGAR FRANCIS ROBINSON.

Head Office: 21, LOMBARD STREET, E.C.
Foreign Exchange Office—80, Cornhill, E.C.

266 Branches in London and Country.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened on the usual terms. Facilities are given Customers at any Branch for the transfer of money to or from any other Branch.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.—Sums of £10 and upwards are received on deposit at interest, subject to notice of withdrawal, or by special agreement, in accordance with the usual custom.

PURCHASE AND SALE of Stocks and Shares effected.

DIVIDENDS, ANNUITIES, &c., received.

THE AGENCY OF FOREIGN AND COUNTRY BANKS is undertaken, and every description of Banking business transacted.

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT.

CURRENCY DRAFTS, CIRCULAR NOTES and LETTERS OF CREDIT are issued, and TELEGRAPHIC TRANSFERS made to all parts of the World.

APPROVED FOREIGN DRAFTS are purchased and Collections undertaken.

DOCUMENTARY CREDITS are established, and every facility given for the handling of Documents to or from Abroad.

The Officers of the Bank are bound to secrecy.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

TANGYE OIL ENGINE

AUTOMATIC TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP EXCEPT FOR STARTING

TANGYES LTD
BIRMINGHAM.

THE LEADING EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES

Try them. They are the finest imported, and can be obtained from all High-class Tobacconists, Stores, &c.

Wholesale depot—20, Cheapside, London, E.C.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING. — Typewriting of every description high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

WEST HEATH SCHOOL, HAMPSTEAD.

On high ground close to the Heath.
A day school for Boys and Girls (about 100 pupils).

Principal: Mrs. Ennis Richmond.
Headmaster: Mr. F. V. Bindon (M.A. Cantab.).
Succeeding Mr. & Mrs. Rice, now taking up work at Bedales School, Hants.

Good Buildings. Playground. Large Grass Playing Fields.

A Boarding house will be opened in September in connection with the above under the immediate management of Mrs. Richmond and her son, Mr. Kenneth Richmond, as house master.

Michaelmas Term will begin September 22nd.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

THE ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL.

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields: gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Next Term, Sept. 18th. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE.

(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON).

The MICHAELMAS TERM BEGINS on OCTOBER 1st, 1908. The College prepares Students for the London Degrees in Science and Arts.

Twelve Entrance Scholarships, from £50 to £60 a year, and several Bursaries of not more than £30, tenable for three years, will be offered for Competition in June, 1909.

For further particulars, apply to the SECRETARY, Royal Holloway College, Englefield Green, Surrey.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.SC., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

NEW BOYS ARRIVE SEPTEMBER 17TH, OTHERS 18TH.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

EDUCATIONAL.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac, etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR

CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

CONCERNING DEBATING CIRCLES.

ALL who are interested in the formation of Debating and Reading Circles in Clubs and Social Institutes, in town and country, should send a penny stamp for a sixteen-page booklet on HOW TO FORM A DEBATING CIRCLE to PUBLIC OPINION, 31 and 32, Temple House, Tallis Street, E.C.

Each week PUBLIC OPINION gives a series of subjects for debate. It not only gives subjects, but puts the questions to be answered and furnishes a multitude of facts and opinions with which speeches can be made on all sides. No other paper gives so much valuable information on all the great topics of the day. It presents the cream of all the best thought in the best papers and magazines and books.

Every week lengthy and informing summaries of two of the most important books are given, so that in the course of a year the reader is put in possession, by direct quotation, of over one hundred books. In fact, the information contained in this paper could not be obtained in any other way without the expenditure of many pounds.

If a paper like this interests you, write for a free specimen copy to the

MANAGER OF

PUBLIC OPINION.

31 & 32, TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, LONDON, E.C.

It is published at twopence weekly. Post free in the United Kingdom 10s. 10d. yearly, or 13s. yearly abroad.

TOURS.

£6 6s. LUCERNE TOUR.

Nine days. Short Sea Route. No extras for Conductor or Gratuities.

HENRY S. LUNN, M.D.

5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. 25, Cannon Street, E.C.
4, Charing Cross, S.W. 84, Piccadilly, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son, Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 ,, ... 6d. ,,

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.

67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day.

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par., facing Sea, Central for Amusements. South Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye. Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara.

DARTMOOR DOUSLAND, Nr. YELVERTON.

BARONS' PRIVATE HOTEL. Close to Moors. J. Wonnacott. Prop.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel.

GREAT YARMOUTH.

HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh.

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor.

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop. J. E. Dowthwaite.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell. Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny. Golf, etc. Lecture.

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths and Treatment.

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Afternoon Teas, Tel. 647.

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties Catered for.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs T. Newbitt.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S LIST

SECOND EDITION. NOW READY.

HOLY ORDERS

The Tragedy of a Quiet Life.

By MARIE CORELLI

Crown 8vo, 6s.

INTERPLAY

Messrs. Methuen announce that they have just published a new long novel by Beatrice Harraden, author of "Ships that Pass in the Night." The title of the new book is "INTERPLAY." As the demand is great, application should be made without delay.

Messrs. Methuen call attention to the great brilliancy of their new list of Novels :—

THE GREAT MISS DRIVER. By ANTHONY HOPE. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE HEART SMITER. By MARY E. MANN. Crown 8vo, 6s.

MIRAGE. By E. TEMPLE THURSTON. Crown 8vo. 6s.

A DAUGHTER OF FRANCE. By CONSTANCE MAUD. Author of "An English Girl in Paris." Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE SPIRIT OF REVOLT. By PHILIP GIBBS. Crown 8vo. 6s.

HILL RISE. By W. B. MAXWELL, Author of "Vivien." Crown 8vo. 6s. [Third Edition in the press.

"To miss reading this book would be to deprive oneself of a great pleasure."—Daily Telegraph.

ANTHONY CUTHBERT. By RICHARD BAGOT. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.

"An able and interesting book."—Scotsman.

"The plot has the merit of being intensely interesting as well as uncommon."—East Anglian Times.

SPANISH GOLD. By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM. Crown 8vo. 6s. [Second Edition in the press.

"Mr. Birmingham has given us more entertainment than any living humourist except Mr. W. W. Jacobs."—Morning Post.

"Magnificent fun."—Outlook.

MR. APOLLO: a Just Possible Story. By FORD MADOX HUEFFER. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Very stimulating in its criticism of scientific materialism."—Nation.

"There are scenes that linger in the mental vision."—Daily News.

ARNOUL THE ENGLISHMAN. By FRANCIS AVELING. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE RESULT OF AN ACCIDENT. By BEATRICE WHITBY. Crown 8vo. 6s. [Second Edition.

"Very delightful in every respect."—Liverpool Daily Post.

"A good story, full of incident."—Westminster Gazette.

A SET OF SIX. By JOSEPH CONRAD. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.

"All surpassingly good—really romantic novels."—Standard.

"The stories will delight all Mr. Conrad's admirers."—Outlook.

THE SONG OF HYACINTH, and other Stories. By JOHN OXENHAM. Crown 8vo. 6s. [Second Edition.

"Full of kindliness, of observation, and of humour."—Daily Telegraph.

"Charming in idea, gentle and poetic in expression."—Daily Express.

THE EASY-GO-LUCKIES; or, One Way of Living. By MAUD STEPNEY RAWSON. Crown 8vo. 6s. [Second Edition.

"Very rich in observation and humorous appreciation."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Fine workmanship, charmingly deft and wholesome comedy."—Liverpool Courier.

LOVE THE HARVESTER. By MAX PEMBERTON. With 8 Illustrations by FRANK DADD, R.I. 3s. 6d. [Second Edition.

"It is a dainty story."—Evening Standard.

"Highly entertaining, and extremely prettily told."—Daily Telegraph.

THE SURPRISING HUSBAND. By RICHARD MARSH. Crown 8vo. 6s. [Second Edition.

"Mr. Marsh has undoubtedly written a clever book."—Athenæum.

"The story is interesting and really powerful."—Morning Post.

HARDY-ON-THE-HILL. By M. E. FRANCIS. Crown 8vo. 6s. [Third Edition.

"A charming, highly finished, rustic idyll."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The book is redolent of sweet, healthy country life."—Westminster Gazette.

Forthcoming.

SALTHAVEN. By W. W. JACOBS.

OVER BEMERTON'S. By E. V. LUCAS. UNIFORM WITH "THE OPEN ROAD."

LISTENER'S LURE. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. [Fifth Edition.

This is a new edition, completely reset, and uniform with Mr. Lucas's other books, of his delightful novel in letters.

GENERAL LITERATURE

THE OLD-TIME PARSON. By P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A., With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

The author of the "Parish Clerk," which reached a third edition in three months, has turned his attention to the study of old-fashioned parsons and their ways.

COINS AND HOW TO KNOW THEM. By GERTRUDE BURFORD RAWLINGS. With many Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s.

SELECTED POEMS OF FRANCIS THOMPSON. Edited by WILFRID MEYNELL. With a Portrait in Photogravure. Fcap. 8vo. 5s. net.

FLORENTINE SCULPTORS OF THE RENAISSANCE. By WILHELM BODE, Ph.D. Translated by J. HAYNES. With many Illustrations. Wide Royal 8vo. 12s. 6d. net. [Classics of Art.

Dr. Bode traces the development of Florentine plastic art from Donatello to Michelangelo.

ALL THINGS CONSIDERED. By G. K. CHESTERTON. Fcap. 8vo. 5s. [Second Edition in the press.

A new volume of essays which plays over the whole range of modern life.

CHAUCER'S ENGLAND. By G. G. COULTON. With 32 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

A picture of Chaucer the man, with a background of the world in which he lived.

THE HOLLAND HOUSE CIRCLE. By LLOYD SANDERS. With 24 Portraits and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

A delightful gallery of witty and distinguished men and women—Rogers, Bacon, Moore, Sydney Smith, Macaulay among them.

"A thoroughly entertaining and discriminating volume. One of the most agreeable books of the season."—Pall Mall Gazette.

HUNGARY AND THE HUNGARIANS. By W. B. FORSTER-BOVILL. With 12 Illustrations in Colour by WILLIAM PASCOE, and 12 from Photographs. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Hungary past and present—her people, her scenery, her customs, her charms.

HOME LIFE IN ITALY. By LINA DUFF GORDON (MRS. AUBERY WATERFIELD). With many Illustrations, of which 12 are by AUBREY WATERFIELD. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

The life of modern rural Italy is described with sympathy and intimate knowledge. A charming book.

GREAT RALEGH: being the Life and Times of Sir Walter Ralegh. By HUGH DE SELINCOURT. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

The life of Sir Walter Ralegh, soldier, author, statesman, courtier, explorer, illustrates in a remarkable manner the astounding vitality of the great time in which he lived. An attempt has been made to give a picture of the life and of the great men who figured in it.

A GROUP OF SCOTTISH WOMEN. By Capt. HARRY GRAHAM. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"A cheerful book, a useful book, a pretty book, a pleasing book."—Daily Chronicle.

"A most delightful, readable book . . . a wholly fascinating volume."—Daily Telegraph.

THE LITTLE DAUPHIN. By CATHARINE WELCH. with 16 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A very pleasingly written biography, and is delightfully illustrated."—Globe.

"A well-written popular account of a fascinating drama."—Morning Leader.

THE HORSE IN HISTORY. By BASIL TOZER. With many Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Mr. Basil Tozer traces the progress of the horse from very early times down to the present day. All the historic steeds come into the survey.

A SUMMER TOUR IN FINLAND. By PAUL WAINEMAN. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by ALEXANDER FEDERLEY, and 16 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"A delightfully refreshing volume of impressions."—Outlook.

"Of its natural beauty and historical interest Mr. Waineman writes well, and his book is well illustrated."—Daily Mail.

FRANCE SINCE WATERLOO. By W. GRINTON BERRY, M.A. With Illustrations and Maps. Crown 8vo, 6s.

This book tells, in a succinct and graphic narrative, the story of French history from the downfall of Napoleon to the present hour.

JAMES II. AND HIS WIVES. By ALLAN FEA. With 40 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

"A very readable book."—Daily Chronicle.

"A most entertaining book."—Country Life.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1908.

The Nation

Vol. III., No. 26.] SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1908. [Price 6d.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	Page
Diary of the Week	887
Politics and Affairs:—
Disorganised Labor	890
Mr. Hearst's Revelations	891
Our Policy in Persia	892
The Prison Population	893
Life and Letters:—
"Merrie England"	894
The Scholar's Melancholy	896
Christian Dogma and Folk-lore	897
The Year of Caterpillars	898
Short Studies:—
II. An Immortal. By S. Henry	899
Letters from Abroad:—
Is Constitutional Government in Turkey Possible? II. By Edwin Pears	900
Music:—
The Significance of Richard Strauss	901
Communications:—
Bad Harvests and Unemployment. By J. A. Hobson	902
Letters to the Editor:—
The Lost Liberty of the Road. By "A," Balak, John Grubb, Sir Edmund Verney, John Higgins and T. Wilson	903
Don Porfirio. By R. B. Cunninghame Graham	905
"Peru." By C. Reginald Enock, F.R.G.S.	905
Can Morals Be Taught? By F. Kettle	905
"The Doctrine of Tolerance." By A Liberal M.P., W. D., H. W. Francis Walter Philip High and M. L.	905
The "Messages" from Frederic Myers. By G. Stafford Whitby	907
German Foreign Policy. By J. H.	907
Poetry:—
The Ship Siren	907
The World of Books	908
Books to be Read	908
Reviews:—
Mr. Swinburne as Eulogist. By Professor Dowden	909
Sir Spencer Walpole's History	910
Moral Instruction and Training in Schools	910
A Realistic Study	912
Some School Books	914
Mathematical Text-Books	916
Introductory History of England	918
Biology and Politics	918
Books in Brief:—
From the North Foreland to Penzance	920
Confessions of a Beachcomber	920
The Beloved Physician of Tsang Chou	920
The Second Ballot	922
The Week in the City	922

The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The Newcastle election has resulted in a heavy defeat for the Liberal candidate. Mr. Renwick's poll shows an increase of 2,600 as compared with the General Election, and Mr. Shortt's a falling-off of no less than 6,700, as compared with that of Mr. Cairns. The Socialist candidate secured 2,971 votes, so that, apart from this unauthorised candidature, the result might have been very different. The voting shows a majority for Free Trade and social reform, and the result is the return of a Unionist candidate. It should be observed further, that Mr. Renwick's poll is less by nearly 900 than it was in 1900, while Mr. Shortt's, notwithstanding the Socialist candidature, exceeds by 1,200 the highest Liberal vote of that year. Apparently the priests have succeeded to the top of their expectation in persuading the Irish voters to transfer their allegiance as a protest against Mr. Asquith's advice in the matter of the Eucharistic procession. But it is probable that the state of trade is for the time telling against the Government, and securing a hearing for Tariff Reform. Without attempting to minimise this particular defeat, the moral that we should draw from it is that the Government must do their utmost to prove that as Free Trade finance is capable of providing for Old Age Pensions, so, on a Free Trade basis, it is possible to devise real remedies for unemployment in place of the delusive cure of Tariff Reform. The necessity for an electoral reform to meet the case of third candidatures is also emphasised once more.

* * *

The Presidential election in America has at last become really lively, and Mr. Hearst of course has introduced the "ginger." In a series of speeches he has been charging the Republican and Democratic parties with being the tools of the trusts, and he is publishing documents to prove it. The first instalment has blasted the reputation of Senator Foraker, one of the foremost Republican leaders, and Mr. Taft has had to drop him out of his campaign. Mr. Roosevelt, with singular lack of chivalry, heaps coals of fire upon the head of Senator Foraker in the hope of shattering Mr. Taft and the party generally, but the diversion is not likely to be successful. Mr. Hearst has also implicated Governor Haskell, of Oklahoma, the treasurer of the Democratic Campaign Fund; as yet he does not seem to have proved his charge in this case, but he declares that he has much more ammunition in his wallet. Public opinion is greatly excited and embittered by these revelations, which are damaging Mr. Taft more than Mr. Bryan, though the much more interesting question whether Mr. Hearst's third party has a future is not illumined.

* * *

The cholera statistics from St. Petersburg are not easily disentangled, but apparently during the last week there has been a daily average of 400 cases and about 170 deaths. This is a very notable increase upon the previous week, but more optimistic conclusions are being drawn by some from the relative stability of the figures during the last few days. It is hoped that the epidemic has reached its height, and that it will die away after remaining at this point for a fortnight. The disease rages most violently among the poor, in particular the unemployed, but it is devastating the barracks, and has extended to the comfortable classes. Forty youths of the Pavloff Military Academy were struck down in one day. The "Times" correspondent praises the arrangements at the hospitals, but the dangerous proposal, subsequently dropped, to house cholera patients in the schools proves that the accommodation is inadequate. Moscow, which has a good sanitary system, is quite free from the pest, a fact which has stirred the St. Petersburg municipality to revive a big scheme for the reconstruction of the drainage of the capital. There is no trace yet of the epidemic having crossed the frontier.

* * *

The relations between Bulgaria and Turkey have become more rather than less strained. The Bulgarian Government has used the pretext of a strike on the Oriental railways, which has already been settled, to occupy with soldiers the section in Eastern Rumelia. The line belongs to the Porte, which leases it to a company, so that the determination of the Bulgarian Government to retain it permanently, though of course with compensation to private interests, is a slight upon Constantinople, where it is also interpreted as a sinister strategic measure. The situation has not been eased by the reception of Prince Ferdinand at Budapest by the Austrian Emperor with full sovereign rights. Austria's purpose in thus bringing into the foreground and taking sides upon a delicate constitutional question is not clear, though the fact that with regard to Bosnia-Herzegovina her position is not unlike Bulgaria's, suggests a possible explanation. Even if the step is not the herald of aggressive action by Austria herself it is certain to make bad blood, and therefore regrettable.

The German reply to the Franco-Spanish Note ought to settle the question of the early recognition of Mulai Hafid. It is very conciliatory in tone, and the chief points upon which it insists are that the negotiations with the Sultan should be conducted by the doyen of the diplomatic body at Tangiers, that the Sultan should not be pressed for liabilities entered into by Abdul Aziz contrary to the Algeciras Act, and that France and Spain, in pressing their private claims to repayment of their military expenditure, should have regard to the financial stability of Morocco. This last point will not delay the immediate agreement of the Powers as to recognition, but it will be the cause of endless trouble in the future if France tries to convert her unjustifiable military operations in the Shawia into an excuse for imposing a financial burden upon Morocco incompatible with that country's independence. The announcement that she is reducing the expeditionary force in the Shawia by several thousand men may perhaps mean that she has abandoned the coarser and more violent method of an indefinite military occupation.

* * *

Neither the full extent of Alberti's frauds nor their full reaction upon Danish politics is yet clear. A preliminary investigation shows that the ex-Minister of Justice lost over £300,000 of trustee funds on the London Stock Exchange. His total defalcations may run up to a million, and his sudden failure of memory causes grave suspicions as to the possibility of further revelations. One significant fact has been established—that Alberti was deep in his swindling at the moment he was made Minister; yet when in office he was the foremost member of the Government, struck moral attitudes, and was a very intimate friend of the King. He was maintained in office for months after a bitter and overwhelming campaign had been conducted against him in the Press, and, finally, when he retired on the plea of ill-health, he was admitted to the highest honours. It is not surprising that public opinion insisted upon the resignation of a Cabinet so blind and so obstinate, but the resignation has done nothing to lessen the weight of a heavy blow at the prestige of politicians and the ruler alike.

* * *

A British delegate to the meeting of the Inter-Parliamentary Union at Berlin writes: "The meeting has left no doubt as to the growing importance of this great instrument for international peace. Attended by over 600 delegates from the Parliaments not only of Europe and America, but even of Japan, it was welcomed by the German Government and people with every possible distinction. It assembled in the splendid Chamber of the Imperial Legislature, it was greeted by a cordial message from the Emperor, and was opened by a speech couched in most sympathetic terms by the Imperial Chancellor, who was accompanied by the most influential members of the Imperial Government. The hospitality and attention showered upon the delegates by the people of Berlin bore eloquent testimony to the popular feeling in favor of the objects of the Union. Those objects may be summed up in the noble desire to promote the settlement of international disputes by arbitration instead of by war. And when it is remembered that in the last quarter of a century something like 120 of such disputes have been settled by this rational and humane method, it cannot be said that the aims of the Union are either chimerical or beyond the reach of wise and farseeing statesmanship. A very able contribution to the debate was made by Mr. J. M. Robertson's address in favor of exempting private property—not contraband—from capture in sea warfare."

* * *

"There was another feature of the meeting at Berlin which is of more immediate interest to our own country. There has been of late a recrudescence of anti-German feeling in a certain section of the English Press, with its counterpart, no doubt, in a section of the German Press. Three days before the opening of the Congress, Prince von Bülow had thought it necessary to reply in the columns of a London paper to an irritating article in a well-known English review. His reply was eminently conciliatory in tone, and to the British delegates in Berlin the Congress seemed an admirable opportunity for assuring the Prince that the pacific sentiments which he claimed for the German people were shared to the full by the British people. Hence came about a picturesque and striking incident. At a large garden party given by the German Chancellor on Saturday afternoon to over 1,000 guests, the British delegates suddenly grouped themselves round him, and through the mouth of Lord Weardale assured him how they reciprocated the friendly sentiments which he had expressed. Lord Weardale, who spoke with infinite tact and force, was frequently cheered by his colleagues; and the Chancellor, evidently much impressed, replied in very sympathetic terms, assuring his hearers of the strong desire felt by the German Emperor, Government, and people for the friendliest relations with Great Britain. He then shook hands most cordially with all the British delegates. This interesting and remarkable scene, followed as it was the next day by the great Anglo-German labor demonstration in favor of peace and reduction of armaments, created a marked impression in Germany, and may do much to mitigate the bitterness which certain mischief-makers on both sides seem bent on provoking."

* * *

The problem of the unemployed, particularly in Lancashire, tends to become more acute, and some disturbances took place in Manchester on Tuesday, but they appear to have been largely due to a rowdy element which mixed itself with the meetings of genuine unemployed. Efforts to find employment are being made under the Unemployment Act by several town councils, but it is to be feared that the trouble will be rendered more acute, particularly in Lancashire, by the cotton stoppage. The trade union figures of unemployment, published in this month's "Labor Gazette," show a heavy increase during August, and the seasonal depression will from this time onward have to be taken into account in addition. We are glad to see that Mr. Asquith, in a letter to Mr. Shortt, reiterated the pledge of the Government to deal with the question, and promised "the early presentation to Parliament of practical legislative proposals." The simplest step that can be taken to meet the immediate emergency is to extend the Act of 1905 by admitting the use of public money for the payment of wages.

* * *

Mr. Wilson Fox has addressed an important letter to Sir Edward Fithian, Secretary of the Association of Chambers of Commerce, with reference to the Census of Production, tending to show that the difficulties involved are, on the whole, less serious than might have been anticipated. It is natural, as Mr. Fox admits, that there should be a certain amount of objection on the part of manufacturers to the inquiries which the Census necessitates, but the general sense of the value of the report to the nation has clearly reconciled the business world as a whole to the Census. Mr. Wilson Fox is able to say that out of 3,566 schedules sent out for the coal and iron mining industries, only thirty-five relating to small pits are still unreturned. In the woollen, cotton, and iron and steel trades the great majority of schedules have been returned, and the remainder are rapidly coming in. The first Census naturally presents by far the greatest difficulties, and we may therefore say with some confidence that the success of Mr. Lloyd George's Act is already assured. There can be no doubt of its extreme value for the purposes of the sociological student and the statesman.

* * *

Holding that "we live in a heroic age," Mr. Carnegie has constituted a Trust Fund, with an endowment of £12,500 a year, for the benefit of British heroes and heroines. The benefits are to go to those who have injured themselves in "heroic efforts to save human life," or, in the event of their death, to their dependents. Mr. Carnegie has recognised the fact that as things are this kind of virtue "is praised but is left in the cold." We are glad that he specially includes the work of doctors and nurses in the scope of the benefaction. The announcement of his munificent gift follows close on the opening day for making claims under the Pensions Act, which will be remembered as the beginning of a new era in the relation of the State to poverty.

* * *

The news of the sudden death of Sarasate last Sunday came as a shock to the musical world. So little did anyone know of the great violinist's illness that a contemplated visit to London this winter was anticipated as one of the events of the musical season. Sarasate's death will be felt with the more keenness because he was a player of such fixed and sensitive individuality. He was not a great artist in the sense that Joachim was great. The Spaniard had but little of the German's profundity of feeling and nice poise of intellect and emotion. Nor had Sarasate the intense virility of Ysaye, or the catholic taste of Kreisler. Yet he had something rarer than any of these—a curious personal, almost feminine, fascination, and, as a player, a technique which had such ease that the most extraordinary difficulties became beautiful and interesting. He was, indeed, one of the greatest of violinists, if not a supreme artist. Even here it is wrong to belittle his claims. Within the limits of the absolute perfection of tone, which was an expression of his nervous and fastidious sensitiveness, he had a well-balanced grasp of classical music. In his early life this was not so, but his musical taste developed, and later in his career he set himself seriously to the study of music which had not been in his repertoire.

* * *

The art of flying has made a further step forward in the course of the week. At Le Mans, on Tuesday, Mr. Wilbur Wright maintained a regular flight, at sixty to seventy-five feet for a little over an hour and a half, and descended only because darkness had come on. The distance covered is given officially as sixty-six kilomètres and a fraction, and less than half of the petrol on board had been expended. But we note that Mr. Wright had to wait until the wind had gone down before starting, and, until the flying machine can be made independent of the wind, the problem can hardly be considered solved. As to language, we suppose it is too late to protest against "aviation," but "aviator," which is the description awarded to Mr. Wright by some correspondents, may, we hope, be nipped in the bud.

The long-promised Circular of the Local Government Board on motoring was issued last Saturday, and is at least welcome as a sign that the influence of public feeling upon the subject has at length penetrated to the heart of officialdom. The best feature of the document itself is the hint of further legislation. The practical recommendations to local authorities are necessarily confined to what can be done under the existing law. Their weakness, we think, itself disproves the contention of the Local Government Board that the provisions of the Act "should be sufficient to prevent most of the evils of which complaint is made." Attention is called to Section 1 of the Motor Car Act, which provides punishments for driving to the danger of the public, irrespective of speed, and it is alleged by the Local Government Board that this section covers most of the causes of improper driving. But clearly it has no reference whatever to such driving as causes no danger, but nuisance. It does not deal with the creation of clouds of dust, or the bespattering of passers-by with mud. It is clear that any subsequent legislation must provide for the public convenience as well as the public safety. As to speed limit, the Circular states that the Board are willing to consider applications, but the trend of the paragraphs on this subject is by no means such as to stimulate local authorities to take action in this direction. The Board admit that the dust nuisance cannot be dealt with effectively at present, and they call on local authorities to spend the ratepayers' money in further adapting the roads to the use of motors. Upon the whole it is a weak document, proving that the Local Government Board itself requires at least as much stimulation as the local authorities, and strongly confirming the belief that legislation of a stringent character will be necessary to deal with the evil.

* * *

The following are some of the most noteworthy motor car "incidents" of the week. On Sunday night a motor car collided with a cyclist between Witham and Coggeshall, in Essex. The driver of the car stopped to inquire after the injured cyclist, but when he saw he was unconscious and bleeding he at once drove off without offering any assistance. So far, the police have been unable to trace the car. A motor car ran away down Titsey Hill on Monday, and the occupants were seriously injured. Mr. Freeman, one of the victims of the motor accident at Batchworth Hill, died from his injuries at the Watford Hospital on Tuesday. In Bedfordshire a laborer was knocked down by a motor car, and lies in a precarious condition. At Watford, on Tuesday, a motorist was summoned for driving a motor car recklessly on September 7th. Evidence was given that the car had been driven at between forty and fifty miles an hour through a thickly-populated part of Watford. The speed was disputed. Result, a fine of £10 and costs. An inquest has been held concerning the death of Mr. Robert Thornborough, who was killed by a tramcar on the Embankment on Thursday of last week. A Renault taxi-cab, driven close to the tram lines, sounded its horn, and Mr. Thornborough started forward, and was caught by the splashboard of the tramcar. The coroner's remarks were pertinent. "Here is an old gentleman crossing the road. What is he to do when you hooted him? If he rushes one way he goes into the tram; if he goes the other way he goes into you. If he stops he will also be run over." The verdict was "accidental death." The driver of the Renault cab cannot be found.

Politics and Affairs.

DISORGANISED LABOUR.

Those alike who base their hopes or their fears upon the solidarity of the labour movement must experience a feeling of disillusionment in face of recent events in two of the great Trade Unionist industries in England—cotton and engineering. It is unnecessary to discuss in detail here the inherent merits of the issue which this week has led to the sudden stoppage of more than 600 mills in Lancashire, and the addition of some 150,000 workers to the already swollen army of the unemployed. If the strike is maintained for some three weeks, it is generally admitted that a large, if not a general, stoppage of the weaving mills will attend the exhaustion of their accumulated stock of yarn, and some 200,000 more workers may be deprived of the opportunity to earn their livelihood. Nor will the evil stop there. The transport trades and all the local industries subsidiary to the great staple trade, as well as those dependent on the expenditure of the cotton wages, must suffer in their turn. Little comfort is afforded by the precarious contention of those who urge that the reduction of output of yarn thus brought about will operate medicinally in the trade, relieving the congestion from which it suffers, raising prices, and removing the very reason for the demand for a reduction of wages. For the precipitation of so terrible a crisis as an alternative for the policy of restricting output by short time, to which the cotton industry is habituated, cannot seriously be defended. The most that can be said is that if, upon the second ballot of the card-room workers, which cannot be long delayed, the vote favours a return to work and an acceptance of the employers' terms as interpreted by the spinners, less mischief will have been done than appears upon the surface. It is, indeed, scarcely credible that the four-fifths majority of the carders, requisite to maintain the strike, can be attained in face of the concession made by the far larger and more important union of the spinners. The very fact that it is technically feasible for the Card-room Amalgamation, numbering 38,000 all told, of whom not more than 7,000 are adult male wage-earners, to stop almost all the machinery of Lancashire, employing so immensely larger a body of workers, furnishes a strange commentary upon the industrial democracy for which Trade Unionism is commonly supposed to stand. It seems, to the general public, very curious that two bodies of Trade Unionists, not merely working in contiguous processes in the same trade, but conducting their operations under the same factory roof, and, moreover, consisting in the main of members of the same families, should have evolved no machinery of common action that would prevent so mischievous a disagreement. In an industry where the organisation of labour is so old and so general, it ought, surely, to be possible to find an instrument of federal agreement which should correlate the real community of trade interests which exists with the separate interests of the several grades or processes of labour. It is true, we believe, that this particular collision of judgment or of policy has not before risen so sharply, and that in the spinning mills the supremacy, or at any rate, the practical leadership, of the spinners has been usually conceded. But that such collisions with the consequences they entail should be possible, must, in the long run, be seen to be disastrous to the labour movement in this or in any other trade.

Oddly enough, this same week witnesses the tardy close of another trade dispute, also in the sphere of the older and more experienced Trade Unionism, which illustrates a somewhat similar defect in organisation. The strike entered on last April by the shipwrights and engineers in the shipbuilding trade of the North-East Coast has just been brought to a close by a surrender of the men to conditions somewhat less favorable than those which they originally refused. This strike was begun not merely in opposition to the views and votes of other trades connected with them in shipbuilding, but in defiance of the earnest protests of the central executive of the Amalgamated Engineers, expressed in the most outspoken terms by Mr. Barnes, who dwelt upon the folly and futility of such a strike at a time when work was already slack and orders were declining. Unfortunately the structure of this, one of the oldest and wealthiest of Trade Unions, appears to be such as to enable a branch to claim from the central body full financial support for a policy to which the central government has refused assent. It will be recollected that in the great metropolitan strike of the engineers' eleven years ago, similar difficulties occurred. In dwelling thus upon the rifts of organisation and differences of policy within Trade Unionism, we do not ignore the larger need of the time—some quicker, more reliable, and more efficacious machinery of conciliation between employers and employed within the several trades. But the two instances which we cite here show how essential it is, as a preliminary to such methods of industrial settlement, that the two parties within each trade should themselves be satisfactorily organised. Foreign students of our industrialism, like Professor Schulze-Gaevernitz, have often cited for admiring approval the conferences between the representatives of capital and labor in the cotton trade, and the Wage and Conciliation Boards in the metal and shipbuilding trades. Recent events will lead them to qualify their admiration. If a few thousand card-room workers can stop the trade of Lancashire, and a few thousand Tyneside engineers can impose a suicidal policy on the greatest labor union in the country, there is still much to seek in the development of a rational labor movement. In the cotton crisis it is to be hoped that better counsels will prevail. While there is much to be said in favor of resistance to the often premature and needless demands for wage reductions, to correspond with falls of selling prices due to reckless increase of output, no defence is possible for a separatist trade union action by which a small minority of workers in a great national industry can impose their policy upon the whole number of members of the other branches of their industry and of other related industries.

MR. HEARST'S REVELATIONS.

THE Presidential campaign in America, hitherto marked by an "apathy" which the politicians have been at a loss to explain, has this week developed an almost frenzied contentiousness. There has been injected into it one of those personal-financial issues that never fail to appeal with peculiar success to the passions of the American people. To Mr. Hearst must go the credit for a transformation that promises to make the remainder of the campaign as bitter, though not, we hope, so scurrilous, as the Blaine-Cleveland contest of 1884. His position in American politics is unique. He is the patentee of a thoroughly bad type of journalism. Some real public services, we are aware, have been rendered by Mr. Hearst's papers, but their general influence is wholly demoralising. In no capacity has he won the respect of those whose judgment is best worth having. His political sincerity is open to the gravest suspicion. The professed foe of corporations, he has formed his papers into a company in a manner that enables him to evade taxation and legal responsibility. The professed foe of "bosses," it is only a year or two since he was in alliance with the most disreputable "boss" in the country. There is little about him as a public man, journalist, or politician, that does not invite attack. Yet the fact is undisguisable that, next to Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Bryan, Mr. Hearst is at this moment the greatest political power in America. He has a following in every State in the Union. His chain of daily papers places at his disposal means of publicity such as no man has ever had under his control. In this very election an Independent Party, organised by himself, has put forward a candidate of his choice on a platform of his drafting. He was himself a strong candidate for the Presidential nomination in 1904. He fought Tammany to a standstill for the mayoralty of New York in 1905. A year later he forced himself upon the Democratic Party of New York State as their candidate for the Governorship, and though the best elements in the party threw him over, and though not a single journal in New York City, except his own, supported him, he came within an ace of success. In 1907, this time in alliance with the Republicans, whom only twelve months before he had unsparingly lashed, he was again the central and disturbing figure in a minor election in the Empire State.

Clearly abuse will not explain so agile and variegated a record. Mr. Hearst's strength lies not in what he is but in what he is thought to be. He may or may not be a self-seeking charlatan. But he represents a cause, a cause which has enlisted throughout America hundreds of thousands in its support. Very possibly he is quite unworthy to represent it. That does not alter the fact that great numbers of people are ready to accept him as their champion, and do not question either his genuineness or his ability. Dexterous journalistic exploitation has done its work, and all who feel disinherited and defeated, all who have a grievance against the social order, all who are convinced that the millionaire and the boss own America and everything that there is above and beneath it, all who perceive and have revolted from the mummeries and subserviencies of the old parties, have persuaded themselves that Mr. Hearst, and he alone, sympathises, understands, and can relieve. In this election he has definitely cut adrift from both the Republicans and the Democrats, and has nominated a reputable but little known candidate on a strong, independent, and radical platform. His nominee stands no chance of success, if only because the mass of moderate men, while not disputing the accuracy of Mr. Hearst's diagnosis of the political and economic ills of the country, are very far from admitting that Mr. Hearst is the man to apply the remedy. He remains none the less a power for destruction. He commands a flamboyant approach to the public ear. He is a thorn in the sides of both parties, an incalculable influence that they may deride but cannot possibly ignore. Whatever he says attracts an instantaneous and universal attention throughout America, and his recent utterances have been in the highest degree sensational. He has produced letters and documents that go far to substantiate his contention that leading representatives of both parties are the "servile tools of criminal trusts." He has already charged a Republican and a Democratic Senator, a Republican Congressman, and the treasurer of the Democratic Campaign Fund with corrupt relations with the Standard Oil Company; and he promises further revelations in the near future. Popular indifference to the election has at once given way to popular indifference to everything else. The air is dark with suspicions, accusations, and denials. The President has bounded into the midst of the turmoil, savagely attacking Mr. Bryan. Mr. Bryan has replied in kind, and from now till election day American politics seem likely to resolve themselves into a tirade of personal recriminations.

It would be futile at present to attempt to assess the effect of Mr. Hearst's disclosures upon the fortunes of his own or any other party. Their interest, indeed, transcends all mere electioneering considerations. They raise what threatens to be a permanent and what is certainly one of the most momentous problems in American politics—the problem of the illicit and unwholesome influence of the big corporations upon the public life of the country. That influence is far from being limited to contributions to the funds of both parties. In that particular form, indeed, it is already a diminishing quantity. The insurance scandals, an aroused public opinion, a stringent Federal Act, and the obvious impolicy of accepting money from any persons or bodies so much under the ban of popular disfavor as are the trusts and the trust magnates at this moment, have combined to keep the corporations financially passive throughout the present campaign. But writing cheques for the party funds has never been the most pernicious of the trusts' political activities. They have dictated policies, they have selected candidates. Having wealth and needing power they have allied themselves with the politicians who have power and need wealth. The result is, that from the smallest municipality in the country up to the United States Senate itself, there is hardly an elected body of any kind that does not contain some members who are the nominees and representatives of one or other of the trusts, and charged with the well-understood mission of protecting its interests at any cost. The new, expanding, and half-developed state of the country, with its endless opportunities for the speculator and the concession-hunter; the American scheme of government by self-contained compartments, which subjects a telephone company, a bank, or a railway, to as many different systems of regulation, taxation, and supervision as there are States in the Union, and thus makes a corps of political henchmen in each State all but a necessity; and the American tariff, which gives to political power a money-making value—are the three main reasons, in our judgment, why the corporations will never leave politics alone. The individuals whom they employ, when exposed, can be driven out of public life. But against the system itself the American people seem to be practically without defence.

OUR POLICY IN PERSIA.

Two weeks ago we were all congratulating Sir Edward Grey on the despatch of the stiffly-worded Anglo-Russian note, which reminded the Shah of Persia of his numerous promises to respect the Constitution, and invited him once more to call a Parliament together. It was a welcome symptom of that bolder acceptance of Liberal traditions which has marked the policy of the Foreign Office in recent months. It suggested, moreover, that while the Anglo-Russian convention acknowledged the primacy of Russian interests in Persia, British influence remained a powerful factor in determining the common policy of the two Powers. It hardly entered into our calculations that the Shah might venture to ignore this note. His position is so precarious, that independence or defiance on his part seemed hardly possible, if Russia and Great Britain were really agreed in advising a return to Constitutionalism. He cannot subdue the rebels at Tabriz; he holds Teheran only with the help of the Russian officers of his Cossack brigade; he has offended and even insulted British diplomacy. He survived only by the toleration and support of Russia; if that were withdrawn, as it must have been, if the Note meant anything at all, he seemed to have no choice but to yield. But of yielding he gives no clear sign. The Note called upon him to summon Parliament for November. He replies that he will choose his own time. He is still intent on subduing Tabriz, though the popular party there asks for no more than the two Powers have themselves demanded. His attitude appears to be that he will restore the Constitution only after he has first destroyed the Constitutional party. Of the leaders of the late Parliament some have been executed, others tortured and imprisoned; the rest were fortunate to be allowed to slink away into exile under British protection. Only the fighting men at Tabriz stand between the Shah and an unchallenged despotism, and these he now demands the right to punish. As for the Constitution which he will restore when all Persia lies at his feet, a Russian diplomatist has told the world what that means; it is to be a fantastic structure of make-believe, resting on a Parliament nominated by himself. From this situation there seems to be no clear issue. The capable special correspondent of the "Times" at Tabriz is quite certain that neither the Shah's bandit tribesmen nor his conscript "regulars" can capture the town or force the Constitutionalists to surrender. These, in their turn, are not numerous enough to march on Teheran, where the Shah is secure so long as his Russo-Persian Cossacks protect him.

Great Powers, in their dealings with feeble and decadent monarchies, are not in the habit of allowing their advice to be flouted. It is clear that British diplomacy at least desires to avoid any precipitate action. But already the journals which serve up diplomatic gossip, are declaring that this situation can end only in one way, namely, by armed intervention. Armed intervention, even if it took place nominally under the flags of both Powers, would mean in fact a Russian occupation. The Russian sphere covers more than two-thirds of Persia: Teheran and Tabriz are both within it. The Tsar would interrupt his more intimate occupations, the exile of untried "politicals," the persecution of "Cadet" professors, the patronage of Black Hundreds, and the operations of "Stolypin's necktie," to play in Persia the part of Liberator, and to teach the Shah a due respect for Constitutions. No one will suggest that the Persian Nationalists are likely to flourish under Colonel Liakhoff's rule, or the Parliament to recover the influence of which that personage deprived it, when he razed its habitation to the ground. In the rear of the Russian troops would come the railway prospectors, the adventurers, and financiers who always discover something to exploit even in the poorest of protectorates. Neither Shah nor Tsar has yet shown much desire to win "the veneration of posterity" by respecting popular liberties. An autocratic Shah under the tutelage of an autocratic Tsar is hardly likely to do better.

When the idea of a partnership with Russia in the Middle East first began to make headway in Downing Street, the chief obstacle which it had to overcome was a doubt whether any reliance could be placed on an understanding with a Power whose official services are so notoriously anarchical. At home the Palace and Ministry divide authority, and while the Ministry professes to maintain order and legality, the Court patronises the Black Hundreds, and upholds the local governors in their defiance of the law. Abroad the same dualism is at work, and as the Memoirs of General Kuropatkin have shown, a few courtiers, who have managed to interest the royal family in some lucrative concession over-seas, can overrule the whole Council of Ministers, and bring about a war in the face of the opposition of every responsible statesman in St. Petersburg. It was not so much a conviction in Downing Street that Russian methods have changed, as the exigencies of the Continental situation, which ultimately induced our Foreign Office to go into partnership with Russia. The brief history of this experiment is proof enough that the Russian bureaucracy preserves all its old traditions. The present Shah had hardly ascended the throne before Russia violated an express pledge, by separately advancing money to him. A little later, when he had provoked a violent conflict with his Parliament, the Russian Minister, as though he were a viceroy in a protected dependency, sent a letter direct to the Parliament, in which he threatened it with a Russian occupation. On the eve of the coup d'état, the Rusian agents once more took independent action, in opposition to the public policy of the two Powers. The Russian Bank, an official institution, again advanced money to the Shah, and with this he bought the loyalty of his hitherto untrustworthy troops. Colonel Liakhoff, an officer who is still on the active list of the Russian army, directed all the military operations of the coup d'état, including the bombardment of the Parliament House and the picketing of the British Legation. Finally, the reformers, who had frustrated a previous attempt of the Shah to destroy them by arming their partisans, desisted from any effective resistance, because, as Professor Browne has stated, the Russian Legation informed them that their victory over the Shah would be the signal for a Russian occupation. The conclusion from these facts hardly requires to be drawn. Our Foreign Office has loyally accepted M. Isvolsky's pledges at their face value, and desisted from its habitual resistance to Russian policy in Persia. The Russian agents have taken advantage of this unaccustomed freedom to use the Shah as their tool. It is they rather than the Shah who have created the present anarchy, for it is they who paralysed the Persian party of order and progress, and they who sustained a despotism as feeble and ineffective as it is savage and vindictive. We do not pretend to know whether M. Isvolsky is himself to blame for this duplicity, or whether he has been over-ruled by some Bezobrazoff or Alexeieff. It is enough to note the fact that Russian policy has been disloyal. If armed intervention should be the end of these troubles, it will be the consequence to which these Russian interferences have led, by a nicely calculated sequence. There is, after all, nothing surprising in the Shah's decision to treat the Anglo-Russian Note as an exhortation which might safely be ignored. For whatever view he may have formed of British policy, he may be excused for concluding that the Tsar's Government cannot possibly be sincere in its inculcation of constitutional principles.

The past has been so instructive that we can hardly suppose that British diplomacy will lightly incur the odium of sanctioning a Russian occupation of Persia. For the present it wisely declines to take any action at all. Unpleasant as the present anarchy must be to the Persians themselves, it is hardly worse than the stagnant oppression of the old despotism, for at least there is latent in it the hope of a popular success. A Russian occupation would be no less onerous, and it would exclude any chance of a national revival. The legitimate foreign interests which are at stake are much too small, and at present too secure, to justify armed intervention. Apart from the disloyalty to our principles and our past, which the handing over of Persia to Russian rule would involve, there are grave objections of an international order. Such a betrayal of a popular cause would make us suspect throughout the East, and especially among Mohammedans. To Turkey in particular a Russian occupation of Persia would seem to be a direct and formidable menace, for a Russian army established in Persia would threaten the Armenian provinces from two flanks. It was the fear of a Russian advance into Persia that explained the obscure military operations which the Turks had been conducting on the frontiers of Persia and the Caucasus for many months before the revolution. The Young Turks may be too wise to attempt to resist the southward march of Russia, but they would certainly resent it, and inevitably they would visit some part of their resentment on us. The continuance of a limited and almost bloodless civil war is certainly an evil, but it is to our thinking an evil much less serious than a Russian occupation, to which it would be difficult to assign a term. If Russia is sincere in desiring a Constitution for Persia, and if she really resents the Shah's rejection of a piece of advice which comes from her with so ill a grace, there is open to her a very simple way of marking her displeasure. Let her recall the Cossack officers who are at present supporting the Persian despot. This act would effectually punish Mohammed Ali for his contumacy. It would also ensure the object which both Powers profess to have at heart—the triumph of the popular cause. The withdrawal of these Cossacks would achieve the restoration of the Parliament more surely and more cheaply than any occupation.

THE PRISON POPULATION.

It is very satisfactory to see from the annual report of the Prison Commissioners, which has just been issued in the form of a Blue-book, that the number of cases received into the prisons of England and Wales under sentence of imprisonment or penal servitude, during the year which ended in March last, is perceptibly diminishing. This satisfactory condition of things practically began with the advent of a Liberal Government to power, and it has continued ever since. We do not for a moment suggest that this is a case of cause and effect. But at a time when so many unscrupulous agitators are charging the administration with all sorts of subversive ideas, it is of some value to be able to confront them with the fact that the country is in a more orderly condition to-day than when their friends were in charge of it. As a matter of fact, the decline in the number of commitments to prison is a proof that the population is now beginning to recover from the era of demoralisation produced by the South African War. It is well known to students of moral statistics that the termination of all wars is succeeded by a wave of crime. The South African adventure was no exception to this rule. The moral condition of the people as measured by the returns of crime was thrown back about twenty years by this unhappy episode. Even now we are not quite where we were, but it is gratifying to find that the worst seems to be over, and that the nation as a whole is again upon the path of moral advance. It is important that we should have these criminal returns to remind us that the evils inflicted on a population by the operations of war are not confined to loss of life and destruction of property. These evils in their ramifications extend throughout the whole delicate and complicated structure of our social system, and in their grosser forms exhibit themselves in outbursts of lawlessness and crime.

We wish to give the Prison Commissioners every credit for the care and intelligence with which, on the whole, they have constructed their present report. But we must take serious exception to their estimate of the number of professional criminals believed to be in prison at one time. A professional criminal, as the term implies, is a person who makes crime the profession or business of his life. He is a man who lives by the perpetration and the proceeds of crime, in exactly the same way as a shopkeeper lives by shopkeeping or a carpenter by carpentry. Such a man looks upon imprisonment as one of the risks of his career, in the same fashion as a sailor regards the chance of being drowned as one of the inevitable dangers of a seafaring life. At the most this class is a very small one, and it is quite startling to be told by the Prison Commissioners, in paragraph fifty-nine of their report, that no less than 5,000 persons belonging to it are in prison at one time. Considering that the daily average prison population amounts to little more than 20,000 altogether, a statement of this kind is obviously preposterous. It would mean that no less than one-fourth of the prison population is composed of professional criminals. When the Prison Commissioners see the statement which they make presented to them in this form, they must recognise at once that it is calculated to mislead public opinion most seriously. In fact, the paragraph in which the figures relating to the number of professional criminals appears is an unintelligible jumble, and it is astonishing that the Commissioners of Prisons can have attached their names to it. It is, in the nature of the case, impossible to calculate how many professional criminals are in the prisons of England and Wales at a given time. But they certainly do not amount to one-tenth of the number estimated by the Prison Commissioners.

Errors of this kind are not easy to pardon in any circumstances, but they become quite unpardonable when they are set forth as a plea for fresh legislation of the revolutionary character contemplated by the Prevention of Crimes Bill now before Parliament. The Home Secretary, as has already been pointed out in these columns, has at the present moment a scheme of legislation before the House of Commons which, if passed into law, will have the effect of enabling the authorities to detain men in prison for life (the phrase in the Bill is during His Majesty's pleasure) who have been three times convicted of crime. This scheme is being pressed upon Parliament by statements as to the dimensions of professional crime, which are, as we have just pointed out, manifestly absurd. It would be a great relief to many of the best friends of the Government if the Home Secretary, in the light of the facts which we have just placed before the public, would take the opportunity of reconsidering those clauses of the Prevention of Crimes Bill which involve the indeterminate sentence. If the Bill is forced through Parliament in its present form, it will involve the creation of a new and costly experimental prison in the Isle of Wight. It is highly probable that public opinion will be so hostile to the idea of the indeterminate sentence that the law relating to it will remain a dead letter. In that event the Isle of Wight prison will have led to a useless waste of public money at a time when the Government should be exercising the most scrupulous economy. It would be far more statesmanlike to pass an act on the lines of existing legislation, which would be certain to work, rather than to force a novel and ill-omened method of penal procedure upon the statute book, which may prove to be a dead letter when it gets there. It is quite possible to deal effectively with habitual crime apart from the indeterminate sentence.

There are other portions of the Report of the Prison Commissioners which raise interesting issues, but want of space forbids us attempting to deal with them. One word, however, must be said as to the continued success of the educative and industrial method of treating juvenile offenders which is now taking the place of the old punitive and repressive method. We owe the introduction of this method to the initiative of the present Home Secretary, and it is, on the whole, realising the sanguine hopes which were entertained of it. It is a method which necessitates a highly competent and judicious prison staff. It is to be feared that in some of the prisons—Borstal itself, for instance—the Borstal system has temporarily broken down, owing to defects in the personnel of the prison. Warders from our grim convict establishments are now said to be placed over the juvenile offenders at Borstal. A change of this kind is bound to alter the whole atmosphere of the prison. It is, in fact, a confession of failure, and means the reintroduction of the old and discredited penal and repressive element in the treatment of the young.

Life and Letters.

"MERRIE ENGLAND."

"ENGLAND is a strong land and a sturdy," wrote one of Chaucer's predecessors, "and the plenteousest corner of the world, so rich a land that unneth it needeth help of any land, and every other land needeth help of England." It is a peep into the life of this "strong land and sturdy"—a land "full of mirth and of game, and men oft times able to mirth and game" that Mr. Coulton provides in his latest fascinating volume, "Chaucer and his England" (Methuen & Co.). The dark side is exhibited with the bright; the author, indeed, reveals a certain impatience with those who picture the Middle Age as a kingdom of innocence and gold. If the poor were little worse off then, they were little better. In all ages, indeed, as Mr. Coulton justly remarks, the past no less than the present, they find their suffering "limited only by the bounds of that which flesh and blood can endure." Nor were saintliness and meekness more characteristic of our race yesterday than to-day. There are complaints, as indignant yesterday as to-day, of the arrogance, the greed, the truculence of the English people. "The English," wrote Froissart, after he had told the story of all their great victories, "will never love or honor their king, but if he be victorious, and a lover of arms and war against his neighbours, and especially against such as are greater and richer than themselves." "They take delight and solace in battles and slaughter," he notes, "covetous and envious are they above measure of other men's wealth." For the characteristic mettle and temper of this proud people did not reside (as in feudal notions abroad) in an aristocratic caste; it lay in the proud, free vigor of the common people. How far to-day could we boast of the descendants of an English peasantry, as Froissart could boast of their ancestors, that "specially there is no people under the sun so perilous in the matter of its common folk as they are in England"? "England is best kept of all lands in the world; otherwise they could by no means live together." "Englishmen suffer indeed for a season, but in the end they repay so cruelly that it may stand as a great warning; for no man may mock them; the lord who governs them rises and lays him down to rest in sore peril of his life."

It is a land of forests and villages and green gardens; where as yet is "no real divorce between town and country"; London alone, a huge aggregation of 40,000 persons, conspicuous for its wealth and population. Founded by Brut, the son of Æneas, who named it Troymount or New Troy, the city could boast two hundred years before Chaucer that it "traded with every nation under heaven." "Could the ships of Tharshish," asks Matthew of Westminster, "so extolled in Holy Scripture, be compared with thine?" Froissart found the men of London of more weight than all the rest of England, and "where they are at accord and fully agreed" of such strength that "no men can gainsay them." "The only pests of London," said FitzStephen, "are the immoderate drinking and the frequency of fires." And this London is set in a secure and tranquil corner of a civilisation, whose "only pests" are "immoderate drinking" and the "frequency of fires"—and too greedy and riotous pursuit of life's desirable things, and the uncontrollable judgments and scourges of earthquake, pestilence, and war. It is a child world always, with the fascinations and also the perplexities of a world organised upon a basis of accident and caprice. The Middle Age has been shown as "peopled with living creatures," says Mr. Coulton, "beasts of prey, indeed, in very many cases, but always bright and swift and attractive, as wild beasts are in comparison with the commonplace stock of our fields and farmyards—bright in themselves, and heightened in color by the artificial brilliancy which perspective gives to all that we see through the wrong end of a telescope." He deprecates such a picture. Englishmen of the fourteenth century are far more akin to Englishmen of the twentieth; with the same passions, with the same difficulties in a short and hazardous journey towards a similar goal. Yet there is the child element far more dominant, with the simplicity, the gaiety, and something of the solemnity of childhood. Excess of law exists, regulating daily life with meticulous detail, yet the prohibitions, like the prohibitions which satisfy the consciences of the Americans to-day—a similar nation of children—are always cheerfully violated. The common people, with unerring instinct, recognise the law as the enemy. "Then began they to show forth in deeds part of their inmost purpose," wrote Walsingham of the peasants' revolt, "and to behead in revenge all and every lawyer in the land, from the half-fledged pleader to the aged justice. For they said that all such must first be slain before the land could enjoy true freedom."

Yet that law itself does not yet become the cold, iron, indifferent machinery of to-day: justice is not yet bewigged as well as blindfolded: caprice, common sense, kindliness, and anger, as well as a certain ultimate perplexity before the ultimate ironies of fortune, enter into all the efforts to adjust the relationships of human society. Mrs. Green has told a pleasant story of such difficulties a century later, in which an Aylesbury miller, finding that his mill needed repairs, sent his servants to dig clay on the highway, thereby making a deep pit in the road, into which fell a glover, journeying from Leighton Buzzard; and the pit, being filled with water by the winter rains, man and horse were both incontinently drowned. "The miller was charged with his death, but was acquitted on the ground that he had no malicious intent, and had only dug the pit to repair his mill, and because he really did not know of any other place to get the kind of clay he wanted save the high road." The human will pleased itself, uncontrolled by reference to general principles. Edward III. spares the citizens of Calais, because Philippa prays for them; the Black Prince, at the massacre of Limoges, remains indifferent to the cries of women and children for mercy, but is appeased by the spectacle of three French warriors fighting boldly for their lives. "Accident," says Jusserand, "plays a greater part in the fourteenth century than perhaps at any other epoch." Insecurity is normal: hardness and austerity is the lot of all: men see the sunrise but never the sunset: overcoats and fur robes are kept to wear indoors, instead of outside. The wars are conducted with a tedious brutality, amid promiscuous slaughter: diseases born of uncleanliness are rampant; in the midst comes the Black Death, like the sudden shutting of a door, closing the life of an age. Yet with all this there is irrepressible gaiety, breaking out everywhere into sport and song and dances, defying the regulations of the law and the menaces of the Church. Across this gulf of time, triumphant on the moans of the suffering and the poor, comes the laughter of "Merrie England." One sees them, as in FitzStephen's "Description of London": "in the holidays all the summer the youths are exercised in leaping, dancing, shooting, wrestling, casting the stone, and practising their shields: the maidens trip with their timbrels, and dance as long as they can well see." When the great fen or moor is frozen in winter they play upon the ice. In the summer nights they dance with candles in their hands. They break down all regulations in restraint of their jolly, boisterous sports and pleasures, and the strength of their determination towards enjoyment is exhibited by the frequency of the attempts to limit and restrict their excesses. There are revels on Saint's days, revels at marriage feasts, revels at Christmas and Easter and May morning, revels even at executions and funerals. In 1370 at Christmastide a law is passed in London "that no one shall go in the streets of the city with vizor or mask, under pain of imprisonment." Measures are threatened against taking off the hoods of people—a primitive form of "Mafficking," and against football in the streets. In 1446 the Bishop of Exeter complains against unlawful games, such as tennis, in the Cathedral cloister, "by the which all the walls of the said cloister have been de-fouled, and the glass windows all to-burst." Repeatedly the Church endeavoured to clear the people from unholy games (such as football) in the churchyards. There are prohibitions against the "Feast of fools," against the "Scot-ales," complaints of the secular jollity in the pilgrimages, the singing of "wanton songs," "and some other pilgrimes will have with them bagge pipes." Yet everywhere and always, in days of prosperity and decline, this common people were determined to make the most of what pleasures this little life could give. With the enduring background of uncertainty—in rejoicing perhaps heightened and deepened by this uncertainty—the men and women of this far-off time appear as those who accept life instead of rejecting it, filling with zest and rivalry and laughter the hours of a day long dead.

And of religion? Here, also, the divergence is superficial rather than fundamental, between to-day and yesterday. Then, as now, religion meant, for the few the effort after the aspiration of the Spirit; for the many the attempt to escape from the consequences of the sins of the flesh. The spiritual background to life was, indeed, more universally accepted; devils and angels walked visibly on the earth, seen of many; in the great storm of 1361 "the Devil in man's likeness spake to men going by the way"; a herald who watched the rioters march past in 1381 "saw several devils among them"; the good Queen "yielded up her ghost; which," says the chronicler, "as I firmly believe, the holy angels of paradise seized and carried with great joy to the glory of Heaven." Yet even here is a current of underlying scepticism. Walsingham traced the horrors of the peasants' revolt to "the sins of the great folk, whose faith in God was feigned; for some of them (it is said) believed that there was no God, no sacrament of the altar, no resurrection from the dead, but that as a beast dies, so also there is an end of man." "One merchant told me the other day," says Gower, "how to his mind, that man would have wrought folly who, being able to get the delights of this life, should pass them by; for after this life is over no man knoweth for truth which way or by what path we go." "A thousand times have

I heard men tell that there is joy in Heaven and pain in hell," confesses Chaucer in the Prologue to the "Legend of Good Women." "But natheless yet wot I well also," he adds, "that there is none dwelling in this countree that either hath in Heaven or hell y-be." Yet this scepticism was exceptional; most men accepted the narrow path towards a certain goal; only the attractions of the fields outside proved overpowering and the path wearisome to the feet. Froissart describes his childhood, how they tried schooling on him, but he could not be at rest; he was beaten, he suffered, he repented, the next moment "when I saw my comrades pass down the street in front, I soon found an excuse to go and tumble with them again." The experience was unchanged through all the life of this child world; they sinned, they were scourged with plagues for their sin, they repented; a moment after they "found an excuse to go and tumble with them again." Old age was always adjuring them to keep innocency and do the thing which was right; youth was always accepting and always breaking the conditions of such conduct, always able to point to the time when old age had done likewise. "O youngë freshë folkës, he or she," cries Chaucer, at the end of his days:—

> "In which that love upgroweth with your age:—
> Repair ye home from worldly vanitie,
> And of your heart upcast ye the visage
> To that same God that after His image
> You made."

To which the "youngë freshë folkë" could reply with some truth that "worldly vanity" had appeared less vain to the poet before old age had frozen the blood and enforced the contemplation of approaching death. To the sterner moralists of the age the cup of man's iniquity appeared full, and God's patience exhausted: as man's iniquity has appeared full and God's patience exhausted to the sterner moralists of every age, from Pompeii to twentieth century England. "It seemeth to many," cries a contemporary of Wycliffe, "that we are fallen into those unhappy times wherein the lights of heaven seem to be turned to darkness, and the stars of heaven are fallen from earth." "More and more dreary, barren, base, and ugly seem to me all the aspects of this poor diminishing quick world," echoes a voice from the later nineteenth century, "fallen openly anarchic, doomed to a death which one can only wish to be speedy." Amid which stern judgments and warnings the world thus condemned has kept manfully on its way, finding youth always a garland of roses, if age always a crown of thorns.

THE SCHOLAR'S MELANCHOLY.

In the diary that was found beside the body of Professor Churton Collins last week there were some sentences written that many scholars know the meaning of. They tell of a depression, not, indeed, continuous, but recurrent. "A wretched time, with occasional alleviation," is one entry. "Am now in dead, dull suicidal misery" is another. A third says, "I thought I should have gone mad last night. Was so calm when I went to bed, and thanked God I was out of the wood, and felt perfectly well. Alas! morning came, and another fit of depression." Beside this nameless misery there are other more definite emotions—fear of future work, prayers for peace, longings for sympathy and affection, and, most significant of all, "an awful sensation of paralysis of will." Unselfish and kindly by nature, he always concealed this misery from the public gaze. Had he survived to unveil the statue at Lichfield, he would have delivered an inspiring address fit to send the Dean and Chapter hurrying back to turn up the dusty Boswells in their libraries. For more than twenty years how many audiences had he similarly inspired, to how many students opened the gates into the kingdom of literature! But it was a high price that he paid for their happiness as they entered those gates of promise. He was himself their ransom, and the scholar's melancholy had laid her clutch upon him as her due, leading him enslaved through galleries of gloom to abysmal depths, where the brief glimpses of vanishing peace only served to render the darkness visible.

It is difficult to realise that melancholy was once thought a benign and amiable power, compared to whom, as one poet said, there was nought on earth that was sweet. On only a little sterner lines a greater poet imagined her as the presiding deity of a scholar's life:—

> "Hail, thou goddess, sage and holy,
> Hail, divinest melancholy."

It would be incredible, if our grandfathers had not told us of their delicious melancholy as they marched under the standard of Byron's heart. But even before Milton's ode, melancholy's Anatomist had analysed all her forms as evil. Among them he had described "study" as a cause, explaining why the Muses are melancholy, and recommending various cures—by diet, exercise, pageants, shovel-board, simples, such as borage and bugloss, and precious stones, such as emerald and topaz to be either worn or taken inwardly. Such cures, of which spiders pounded in hellebore was one of the most efficacious, show the early recognition of melancholy's physical side. The dull misery and causeless fears may even in a scholar be alleviated by such means—by suggestion, by laying on of hands, and, in a word, by what is known as health. The difficulty in these cures is that when once melancholy has touched the scholar's hand, she leads him round a vicious circle, in which mind acts upon body, and body reacts upon mind, until the two are almost indistinguishable in their misery, being conjoined in an endless round, like a deadly serpent that has swallowed its own tail.

If nature means the law of life, she has fixed her canon against intellect, and, to do him justice, man generally obeys her ruling. Hardly once a century does she allow her finest product of the brain to appear, and on most powers above a low average of mind she inflicts the penalties of the body. Here and there some scholar or man of letters may escape the toll of melancholy by his condition of life or by a peculiar bodily constitution. Scott escaped it till near the end, but he was an open air man, and his son attributed his fame to his power of being always the first to view a sitting hare. Gibbon escaped it entirely. With what envy, or, at least, with what marvel, a scholar must read the sentences of complacent self-satisfaction with which he concudes his autobiography:—

> "When I contemplate the common lot of humanity," he writes, "I must acknowledge that I have drawn a high prize in the lottery of life. . . . . The first indispensable requisite of happiness is a clear conscience, unsullied by the reproach or remembrance of an unworthy action. . . . . The love of study, a passion which derives fresh vigor from enjoyment, supplies each day, each hour, with a perpetual sense of independent and rational pleasure. . . . (I possess) the inestimable gift of the sound and peaceful slumber of infancy. . . . The enjoyments of society and situation would be tasteless or bitter if their possession were not assured by an unusual and adequate supply" (i.e., income) . . . "My income is superior to my expense. . . . Since the failure of my first wishes I have never entertained any serious thoughts of a matrimonial connection. . . . Twenty happy years have been animated by the labor of my 'History.'"

And then, as a final thanksgiving to fate and his own virtue, he adds the significant cause for satisfaction: "My nerves are not tremblingly alive."

Blot those causes of satisfaction one after another with the blackness of negatives, and you see the ordinary life of scholars. Endowed from birth with a beautiful lottery ticket that cannot win; haunted as each year passes by the shadow of some new failure, the memory of some ancient crime—a breach of manners, an unintentional word, a single wounding phrase that everyone else has long forgotten, but that still makes the scholar flush with sudden shame; weary of a life among the dead and the perpetual society of phantoms; tortured by inexplicable fears and the spectres of all the lost opportunities of life, that crouch at the foot of his bed and make mouths at him from three o'clock till the grey horror of morning prepares him by an exhausting trance for another unendurable day; dogged every hour by the squalid face of poverty and the terror that his children may not enjoy the advantages which have brought himself to this pass; almost insane with a shy desire for affection, and himself a continual grief to the unhappy woman who has married him; floundering in a bottomless slough of toil where there is little hope of influence and no assurance of praise: his nerves all the time tremblingly alive, sensitive to the least touch as though his skin had been flayed and left them quivering to the shadow of every imagined slight, every whisper of depreciation, every error in himself, though perceptible to his eyes alone; torn in pieces, besides, by a paralysis of will, an infinite faculty of hesitation, compared to which the Inquisition's rack was a benignant and merciful torture—such are the scholar's life and the scholar's melancholy as we have come to know them now.

It is as though the paths of scholarship led but to the entrance of Virgil's hell, where grief and avenging conscience have made their lairs:—

> "Pale sickness dwells there, and the gloom of age,
> Fear, and inexorable hunger, and drab want,
> And death, and toil, and stupor so like death."

In that grim house are many cells, and not every soul is exposed to all the tortures at once. But time would fail us to call the roll of the noble and unhappy ghosts who have there found their abiding-places, or to draw distinctions between their stoic sorrows, their unappeasable longings, the sufferings of their pride, their cruel indignation, the long diseases of their lives, their invocations to the moon to cast her light for the last time upon their torment. "Feel!" answered Cowper on his deathbed; "I only feel unutterable despair!" "Like that tree," said Swift, "I shall die from the top." "Que vivre est difficile, O mon cœur fatigué!" was the last entry in Amiel's diary.

In the uncreative and profoundly self-conscious temperament of men like Amiel, the horror is, perhaps, seen at its worst. Isolated from the realities of life, and dreading, as he said, the contact of vulgarity in every form, he complained that he exhausted himself by trying to understand wisdom without practising it, by always making preparations for nothing, by living without living. There should be included in these sorrows the hopelessness of ever approaching the limits of the great sea of knowledge that surrounds us now—a hopelessness which Mark Pattison, himself so notable an example of the scholar's melancholy, regarded as its cause. And we must remember the further curse that Jaques added when he defined the scholar's melancholy as emulation. He may have meant the ravenous vanity by which the isolated, introspective man is so often consumed, or he may have meant the sorrow of imperfection, the impossibility of ever realising in words those bright visions of thought that hang before the mind. In either case, another terror couches upon the threshold of the scholar's hell.

Boswell, who himself was tinged with the same kind of melancholy as we may imagine to have infected Faust's poodle, tells us that a Turkish lady (strange authority!) had taught him how happiness depends on the circulation of the blood. Johnson himself seems to have perceived the same truth when he recommended a course of rope-dancing for distressing thoughts, though, unhappily, he never took the cure himself. "Employment and hardships," he also justly said, "prevent melancholy. I suppose in all our army in America there was not one man who went mad"; for he always regarded even his own melancholy as a partial madness. It will be remembered that Goethe sought to banish his Harper's melancholy by a course of cabbage-gardening, and that Coleridge, in some of the most beautiful and melancholy lines ever written, laments, above all, that, in the midst of Nature's work, he remained the sole unbusy thing.

But the worst comes last, and there is one cause of the scholar's melancholy which no improvement of the circulation, no rope-dancing, no cabbage-gardening, or other activity can alleviate. It is the disbelief in the power of the word, the thought that the tongue of men and angels cannot touch the inveterate cruelty, the oppression and vulgarity of all this slow, insensate world. When wrath chokes the soul, and there is no sword to slay the slayer, no club to batter the brains of the fool, but hourly indignation boils itself away in an impotent vapor of words, then the scholar's misery is fulfilled, and from that futile woe there is no escape except only to the place where savage rage can tear his heart no more: Ubi sæva indignatio ulterius cor lacerare nequit.

When those of us who stand outside the realm of scholarship turn for inspiration or peace to the words of scholars like Churton Collins, and of greater teachers than he, we might sometimes remember at how dear a price they have bought for us those consolations which we so easily and carelessly enjoy among the harsh and dusty conflicts of every day.

CHRISTIAN DOGMA AND FOLK-LORE.

The Christian folk-lore of Europe, now everywhere dying out, was in large part, as is well known, a continuance of pagan tradition modified in form to suit the new religion. But in part it may be regarded as the shape taken by the Christian dogma as reflected in the popular mind. Dogma translated into terms of the popular intelligence became folk-lore. It has been a misapprehension, if you will, by which, however, the essential meaning of the Christian teaching has been preserved in a symbolic and poetic form.

In all ages the people take metaphors literally—they hear the vague sound of the words and do not attempt to penetrate further into the speaker's meaning. The words, for instance, "Destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up," would, in any age of the world, have produced on the populace the effect which the Evangelist describes. To give another example from the Gospels, all the wonderful legendary lore of the early and Middle Ages about St. John came from the saying, "If I will that he tarry till I come what is that to thee?" The story that "that disciple should not die" commenced "from that hour." St. Augustine says that he saw the ground rise and fall with the heaving of the breast of the Beloved Disciple sleeping in his grave at Ephesus. In the sixteenth century Columbus crossed the Atlantic with letters from the Catholic King to present to the deathless saint at his remote magnificent court. In this way the teaching of the Church produced in all Christian lands a vast mass of legend and superstition and folk-lore, as the sermons of the parish priest or the addresses of some wandering friar fell on the ears of the people.

In Catholic Germany, for instance, it is believed that when the "genealogy" from the first chapter of St. Matthew is read in the Mass on Christmas Eve, hidden treasures are revealed. This was, no doubt, the meaning attached by the people to that commonplace of medieval preachers about "the gold of the Divinity being hidden in the earth of the Humanity of Our Lord." This was the patristic and mystical explanation of "the treasure hidden in the field" of the Gospel, which, when a man finds, for joy thereof he sells all that he has and goes and buys that field. Again, there was venerated at Puy-en-Velay a miraculous image of the Virgin, said to have been carved by the prophet Jeremiah. It was destroyed at the French Revolution. "This is the Virgin whom the prophet saw," the fervid preacher would, no doubt, exclaim, and for his hearers the transition from his seeing the vision to his carving the image would be easy, and the "saying" would go forth "from that hour."

This quaint literalism often produces folk-poetry of the most touching kind. What, for instance, can be sweeter than this folk-song of Béarn and Navarre:—

> "Le petit Jésus
> Allait à l'école,
> Avec sa Croix
> Sur son épaule."
>
> "With His Cross upon His shoulder, > Little Jesus went to school."

Again, in Andalusia they sing:—

> "Baby Jesus, by Thy Father,
> By Thy Mother, by Thy Cross,
> Give me light amid the darkness
> Of death's hour of pain and loss."

The idea is found in Christian art as well as in popular Christian poetry all over Europe. In Cimabue's Madonna, for instance, in Santa Maria Novella, at Florence, little angels are seen holding the instruments of the Passion on either side of the Child. This, no doubt, is a popular rendering of the doctrine known to theologians as the "interior Cross," the foreknowledge of the Passion the Child is believed to have had from His earliest years.

The translation of dogma into folk-lore is nowhere more apparent than in the Antichrist legends of Christendom. We have recently been reminded of this almost forgotten Christian doctrine by Father Benson's novel, "The Lord of the World." The magnificent trilogy of the Russian writer, Dmitri Merejkowski, "Christ and Antichrist," shows the great influence which the idea has had all through the Christian ages. "Antichrist" is a common term of popular vituperation in Russia, where the belief is still very living. The locus classicus of the doctrine in the New Testament is the well-known passage of St. Paul, "And that day shall not come unless there be first a falling away, and that Man of Sin be revealed, the Son of Perdition who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God . . . And then shall that wicked be revealed whom the Lord shall consume with th e spirit of His Mouth, and destroy with the brightness of His coming." This is depicted in Luca Signorelli's great frescoes at Orvieto. The coming and destruction of Antichrist was one of the cycle of miracle-plays, but it fell out through the elaborateness of the mise-en-scène required for its production. It was believed that he would be a Jew of the tribe of Dan, according to the prophecy of the dying Jacob, "Dan shall be a serpent in the path, an adder by the way, so that the rider shall fall backward." Among the hundred and forty-four thousand whose foreheads were sealed in the Book of Revelation, none are mentioned as belonging to this tribe. Father Benson's Antichrist, by the way, is an American.

Antichrist folk-lore is found from Russia to the Hebrides. In Brittany they say he will be the child of an apostate priest and a nun. There is a Breton folk-saying that when the sanctuary lamp goes out in a single church the world will end. When the peasant passes his village church at nightfall, and finds the windows dark he will know that the earth's last day has come. One divines the process of the formation of this legendary lore: the fervent words of the preacher on the awful portents of the last time before the Coming of the Son of Man, the lamp of faith going out everywhere, and the people applying the words to the sanctuary lamp, first of their own, and then of any single church. The ceasing of the celebration of Mass in the days of Antichrist was much dwelt upon. The hopelessness of that last time is poetically expressed in a concrete form in the tradition that a rainbow will not be seen for thirty years before the Day of Doom Numberless examples of this kind might be given, showing the immense hold which the Christian doctrine had on the minds of our forefathers, how it filled them and occupied them and suggested itself to them at every turn. To many the dying-out of dogma and folk-lore together will, of course, seem pure gain. A recent book, the "Memoirs of a Surrey Laborer," gives a life-like presentation of the manner of thinking and ways of speech of the country people in that part of England. It has the very atmosphere of a Surrey village. The solitary trace of anything not absolutely material in the book is the mention of a Lincolnshire ghost story made by the writer to the old man, George Bettesworth, as he works in his garden. "Weak-mindedness, I calls it," is the Surrey laborer's reply.

THE YEAR OF CATERPILLARS.

We have often wondered whether the author of "The Bishop and the Caterpillar" knew more about the subject than the rector, the curates, the schoolmaster, and the others who were floored by the little boy's question. The last-named may have been correct when he numbered the legs at six, but certainly he did not arrive at the result by counting, as anyone may see for himself the next time he catches a caterpillar. It need not take long, for rarely have we had such a summer of caterpillars as this has been. As we write this in a seaside town, the streets are swarming with full-fed larvæ on their way to places where they can go into chrysalis with a reasonable chance of attaining wings The giants are the buff-tips, which have been feeding on the limes, whose branches they have made into skeletons as they moved, the whole company at once, from one feeding-place to another. They are striped longitudinally with green and yellow, an arrangement that is reproduced by the caterpillars themselves now and then when they march in a kind of battalion formation across the pavement. Some observers have noted well-drilled armies of these buff-tips moving across country. Here, however, the assembly is dispersed before it is in order, and green squashes underfoot are melancholy evidence of blasted ambitions.

Rarely have the cabbages so suffered. The caterpillars of the garden white butterfly have left nothing but the ribs of the leaves and have then attacked sundry other garden growths, including the nasturtiums, which rightly belong to the green-veined white, also much in evidence. The walls are now alive with the creatures, restless under the impulse of their impending change. They usually find anchorage up under the coping, which shelter is fairly packed from end to end with chrysalids that have wriggled out from the homely skins. But nearly two out of three have broken into a horrible eruption of yellow cocoons of the ichneumon fly, the guardian of next year's cabbages. Buff-tips and cabbage whites are always with us and everywhere. But few towns can boast even a single caterpillar of the large tortoiseshell, while here, colony after colony has been at work on the elms, with which our streets are occasionally planted. The species is, however, scarcely on the increase, only a small proportion of the prickly-looking caterpillars coming to butterflyhood. The "thorns" are supposed to save them from the ichneumon fly, but the grubs die of mysterious diseases, while few of the survivors make quite the plump golden chrysalids with knobs as of veritable metal that are typical of the healthy polychloros.

Noble caterpillars of the great order of moths also are often met with. Poplar, privet, and lime have each fed, as far as can be seen, in larger numbers than usual their own particular hawk. They are so perfectly colored in harmony with the leaf that even now that the fall has commenced we see less than one in ten of those that come within range of the eye. See this privet hawk caterpillar nearly as large as the middle finger, which we can yet make, while you turn round, extremely difficult to find, merely by placing it on its native plant. An entirely green creature of this size, of never so well chosen shade, would be conspicuous among the small leaves of the privet. So it is furnished with white stripes curling diagonally across the segments and, so that the white stripes should fairly represent the midribs of surrounding leaves, there is painted below each white stripe a dash of bright mauve. "Why such a color?" you will ask—only until you have tried to paint a privet leaf and to give the midrib a convincingly upstanding appearance. It is possible that your superior skill may attain the effect in another manner, but if time is short you had better take a hint from the caterpillar.

Now how shall we say this very useful coloring was obtained by or for the caterpillar? Are we to believe that it is the work of so many "determinants" sent out from the germ-cell, without any reference to the experience of foregoing caterpillars? Or has there been discovered a single fact to forbid us believe that at the present moment new hints are being registered in this caterpillar body for a yet better painting of the next generation—that just as the descendant of this privet hawk must be a privet hawk, so the descendants of this more than usually pale or dark-green privet hawk will be, subject to the chances of mating, more like this than like other privet hawks? When an artificial variety of the tiger moth (parent of the "woolly bears" that we know so well) was produced by keeping the chrysalids in a low temperature, and when the coloring of these was reproduced in their offspring bred under normal conditions, was not that an instance of acquired character inherited? No, said Weismann, for the low temperature may have had an identical effect on the color determinants in the wing-rudiments of the pupa and on the same determinants in the germ-cell.

Having driven the anti-heredity people into a "may have," let the woolly bear ripple on in search of his, her, or its hibernaculum (according to the vigor with which it feeds next spring, the germ-cell will determine what its sex is to be). A less recondite problem that the farmer would like to have solved is why it has been such an amazing year of caterpillars. Is it to be accounted for by the sparrow clubs? If so, there are to be many other bad years, and worse years than this. The sparrow clubs of the present cycle are scarcely on their feet yet. The peculiar trap which defeats the generally superior wit of this bird, while other and far simpler birds go through it with impunity will be as ten to one when the propaganda of the destruction league has spread a little further, and before the sparrows have got well on their guard they will go down in millions. Let us hope that it is not the sparrow clubs that are to account for the increase of caterpillars. The professionally insectivorous birds, if we may so call those that not only feed their young on grubs but eat this food the whole year round, have not fallen off, unless the fruit-growers have waged that war on the tits that they have foolishly threatened. There is no better gardener than the tit through all the winter months. No particle of grub life, from the tiniest egg to the chrysalis awaiting the return of the summer, even in the adamantine case of the saw-fly, is safe from his persistent search. A tit or two the fewer may easily mean a million grubs the more, and ten times greater toll of fruit than the birds themselves take. The birds that come to us in summer (practically all insectivorous), useful though they be, are of less importance than our resident soft-billed birds. For in summer everyone is insectivorous, and even the abused sparrow is probably as good as the white-throat, apart from the work he puts in as an eater of unwelcome seeds in the winter.

Then what of the wasp? This year of caterpillars innumerable has also been one of immunity from wasps. Though the queens were more than usually common in spring, nests have been very far between this summer, and even when each should have contained forty or fifty thousand inhabitants, the familiar and rather misunderstood insect has been very little of a nuisance. We are unable to guess whether a wasp colony or a nest of young chaffinches is the more valuable insecticide; but it is easy to see that the claims of the wasp are not slight. The number of caterpillars provided by its mother for the grub of the mason wasp, a much smaller insect than Vespa vulgaris, is usually twelve. Allowing only thirty for the social wasp—including all that it eats as an adult—a nest would account for considerably over a million in the course of the summer. At fifty a head, which still seems a meagre allowance, the number would be two million, so that if four out of five of the usual number of wasps' nests are lacking this year, a few tons of the caterpillars that have plagued us are accounted for. Let us hope that the generous supply of food will produce prolific queens for the next year, and, if we may, that careless habits learned by the caterpillars of this generation will be inherited by those of the next, so that they fall early victims to the remnant of our feathered friends.

Short Studies.

II.—AN IMMORTAL.

"You're a mystery!" I said to the carpenter, half-enviously, half-approvingly, after a sleepless night during which I had vainly tried to piece him together. He was engaged on some repairs in the church—his heterodoxy does not include the fabric—with his usual diligence and thoroughness. In the modern world it is not impossible, or even uncommon, to find men—for the most part, of easy means and position—who would appear to have triumphed over life and death and all things; but more important than the virile spirit itself, perhaps, are its source and basis. The efficiency which is synonymous with eternal life can have no weak spot in its armour.

"I'm not the only one," he replied, modestly, too busy or indifferent to look round. "We're all mysteries, if we could only see it. Nowhere yesterday; 'ere to-day!"

This new version of the proverb impressed me. It certainly sounded less gloomy than the old. The thought suddenly struck me that it might express the religion of the future—which is nothing if not one's point of view.

"I didn't mean that altogether," I returned. "I refer rather to the quality of your existence than the fact that you are a living being, however unspeakably wonderful that may be. You seem to have such a grip on life!"

"That's just because I haven't," was the paradoxical admission. "The worse your hold, the better, as the runaway 'orse said. An' blessed are they that expect little, for they won't be dis'pointed."

"But that is want of faith."

"Or the p'ssession o' 't; which?" he submitted.

"Does it never occur to you," I probed, without for a moment thinking to tempt him, or that I possibly could; "does it never occur to you that all your labor may be in vain?"

"The bright idear 'as struck me," he replied, with suspicious solemnity. "When I'm makin' coffins, for example, I say to myself, as reg'lar as the clock, 'What's the dickens use in berr'in this fine bit o' deal or hoak, as the case may be, in the ground, to say nothink o' my own honest sweat?' Or, when I'm puttin' on a new roof, or patchin' up an old 'un, I think o' the grand ruin it'll make some day. An' when I rise early an' late take rest an' heat the bread o' carefulness, I ask myself if I'm a born fool, or what!"

"Well, then?" I enquired, nervously, seeing that he paused with a smile on his tightly compressed lips, which boded ill for something or somebody.

"Well, then," he repeated, "when I've got that far, it can't kill me to go a step farther. An'," lifting his hammer impressively, "the kin'dim o' 'Eaven depen's on what that next step is."

As if with the view of giving me time to divine his meaning, he resumed his work, glancing at me occasionally to see what mental progress I was making. His final look seemed to convince him either that my case was hopeless, or that if he himself did not make haste, I might anticipate his discovery.

"Then, sir," he finished triumphantly, "I tell myself that if there may be little use in doin' it, there's a damn sight less in not doin' it!"

"But it wouldn't be wasted if you didn't do it," I pointed out, with more casuistry than truth.

"But we should," he checkmated. "Put that in your pipe an' smoke it, sir!"

"And you can speak and feel thus about life without belief in a Hereafter!" I exclaimed.

"Who said I didn't b'lieve in a 'Ereafter?" he demanded, over my head, of the empty pews. "I may not talk as much as some people about it; but I'm always provin' it, I hope, which is just as good. An' I don't stand starin' at the sky!" he added, scornfully.

"Of course, everyone believes in the future," I remarked, significantly——

"Oh, do they, indeed!" he interrupted. "I'm oncommon glad to hear it. It must be true, comin' from a parson. My own private impression was that there was a many people as didn't b'lieve even in the present, which might be more to the p'int. Settle that first, an' the 'Ereafter 'll take care o' itself."

"I suppose you're right, in a sense," I admitted, reluctantly.

"I'm right in five senses," was the confident rejoinder. "There's a lot o' use in preparin' a place for folk as haven't made up their minds to start yet."

"At the same time," I persisted, "without a belief in Immortality the world is like a rudderless ship."

"A rudder 's a fine thing, but a whole ship is better."

"You mean to say that you can go on for ever in the dark, without ultimate purpose or destination?"

He almost glared at me.

"T' hell with your darkness an' cross-purposes!" he thundered; "both'rin' the life an' soul out o' poor creatures as if they hadn't enough trouble an' worry o' their own a'ready. That's not the way to make their burden light. Small wonder the 'sylums are full! The very beasts an' flowers have a better time. What good has your 'Ereafter done 'em. Took 'em from their plain, simple life, that's all; fillin' their thick 'eads with a lot o' foolishness until God Almighty Himself can't stand 'em, they're so conceited an' hard to please. He makes 'em a world that's enough to knock you speechless, an' now they want another one, when there isn't even room. Good Lord deliver us! Teach 'em mind their own business, same as the trees o' the garden or the grass o' the field, an' you may be doin' 'em some reel service. But, for God's sake, stop holdin' out baits to 'em, or, some day, they'll wring the Church's neck for her. We're no longer childher."

His passion silenced, awed me.

"As for the tommy-rot that it's all wasted," he went on, remorselessly; "when the Creator Hisself thinks so, it'll be time enough for us to complain. There's such a thing as becomin' a fool in order to be wise, I've read somewhere. Are you 'ware that th' Almighty does more than all of us put together, 'thout makin' any fuss about it, or wond'rin' if it wouldn't be better to do nothink? Man is a rum mortal, an' no mistake. His logic is enough to give a one the jim-jams. The more deuced clever he is, the bigger the fool."

"There are exceptions," I replied, meekly.

"Not among that lot, sir!" was the trenchant reply. "If simple folks, as just go about their business, hadn't a little common sense an' reason o' their own, I don't know what 'd become of us. Have you ever tried to figure to yourself the 'mount o' labor in bringin' the tide in, to take only one small instance? Well, our 'Eavenly Father does it twicet a day, an' doesn't care a grain o' sand what all the lazy devils in the world think or say about it."

With this spirited and luminous commentary, he hurried off to his dinner.

S. Henry.

Letters from Abroad.

IS CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT IN TURKEY POSSIBLE?—II.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Assuming Constitutional Government to get itself established in Turkey, its success will largely depend on whether Moslems can admit Christians to equality with themselves. Nothing was more remarkable in the early demonstrations on the establishment of the new régime than the insistance by the Turks at every meeting of the equality of all races and creeds. Mollahs and Softas attended religious services in the Armenian cemetery to commemorate the massacred victims of Abdul Hamid's reign of terror. Greek and Armenian priests fraternised with Mollahs. All agreed in announcing the downfall of the régime which had made Christians and Moslems regard each other as enemies. Was the reconciliation merely temporary?

I had the advantage of a long conversation with the Sheik-ul-Islam on the subject of the revolution. As the official head of the followers of Mahomet, he spoke with authority on the tenets of his faith. In the same room, and intensely interested in the conversation, were four or five leading Moslem dignitaries, who appeared entirely to acquiesce in what their leader said. The chief point in our conversation turned on the question whether the religion of Islam could admit Christians to equality. The Sheik-ul-Islam was quite positive on the question. He insisted several times that the religion of Islam was essentially tolerant and liberal. Though the Constitution had granted equality, Islam was still more liberal. Then, speaking with the fervour of conviction, he claimed that the unprecedented progress made by the early followers of Mahomet was due to his establishment of equality among all his followers, whether Christians or Moslems. In reply to my suggestion that Mahometan rule had not been characterised by toleration, he claimed that the early Caliphs followed the rule of Mahomet, but that conquerors had constantly set aside the teachings of religion. They were not good Moslems in so doing. Nevertheless Mahometan doctors had never been wanting who pointed out that equality was what the Founder had demanded.

How far the opinion of the Moslem Pope is shared by the doctors of his faith it is difficult to say. A movement towards a Liberal theology in Mahometanism has made considerable progress during the last thirty years. In such movement the idea of equality has been included. The movement corresponds closely to the modernism of the West. It is an attempt to bring theological teaching into line with modern thought. The general attitude of the Turkish race has hitherto been unfavorable to development in religious ideas. The uneducated Turk, even more than the uneducated Christian, accepts his creed as an ultimate fact. A recent writer, Léon Cahun, says, "Les Turcs ont été toujours trop inaccessibles au sentiment réligieux pour jamais devenir hérétiques. Ils ne demandent pas mieux que de croire, mais ils ne tiennent pas du tout à comprendre." But the Mollah class, and a considerable number of men who have been abroad, have been influenced by the example and teaching of the West. The Christian nations are progressive. Their progress is not merely material, but is found in ideas and in general intellectual activity. How far is their superiority due to defects in Islam? Many Moslems have faced the question, and the reply by some of the best of them is that the want of progress made in Mahometan countries is due to a departure from the true teaching of Islam. Such men are endeavouring to find in the sacred books of their faith what non-Moslems would regard as ideas that were foreign to their authors. A striking illustration of this attempt to bring about a reformation regards the position of women. Hood, in the "Song of the Shirt," correctly expresses the prevalent opinion in Moslem countries when he makes the singer wish to be a slave "along with the barbarous Turk, where woman has never a soul to save." But Moslem teachers have been proclaiming for some years that this is a popular error, and that woman has a soul.

There are other subjects intensely interesting in which what may be called the Broad Churchmen of Islam are endeavouring to prove that their faith is not antagonistic either to science or the progress of civilisation.

On the question of equality many interesting statements have been recently made. Count Ostrorog, who is an Arabic scholar, and an authority on Moslem law, contends that Islam is essentially tolerant, that Mahomet denounced despotism, and prohibited his followers from exercising arbitrary power as at once contrary to the Divine will and human reason. He claims, with proof in hand, that upon the question of the equality of Moslems and non-Moslems, there ought to exist no doubt. What is Moslem law is to be found, not merely, as is often said, in the Koran only, but in that book and the Sayings of the Prophet taken together. Moslem law, from these two sources, has been elaborated by the early Doctors of the Law. If their respective opinions are in accord, there can be no doubt as to what Islamic Law is. Now on the question of equality Count Ostrorog declares them to be entirely agreed. The words of the Prophet have never been in doubt among them. Speaking of non-Moslems the Prophet himself says: "Your rights are our rights; your duties are our duties." These words proclaim equality. They have been much commented on, but are universally accepted as binding and as establishing equality. The comments of the doctors take the form of fixing the limitations which are to be placed to the principle thus laid down. The conditions upon which equality is to be granted are carefully noted, and are firmly established in Moslem jurisprudence. They reduce themselves to six, and are all of a negative character. The non-Moslem must not (1) speak disrespectfully of the Koran; (2) nor of the Prophet; (3) nor of the religion of Islam; (4) he must not attempt the honor of a Moslem woman; (5) nor attempt to convert believers from their faith; and, lastly, (6) he must not give aid to foreign enemies.

Other writers have contributed interesting letters to the newspapers in Constantinople offering curious evidence that a strong case can be made out for the recognition of equality by Islam. These are not opinions manufactured for the occasion, but represent the drift of educated Moslem opinion.

Everyone would wish success to the promulgation of such views; but history cannot be forgotten. Just as we have outlived the religious hostilities of Mary and Elizabeth, so the Moslems may outlive the spirit of persecution by which their history in Turkey has been marked. I believe, however, that they will have more obstacles to overcome in accomplishing their purpose than Roman Catholics and Protestants found. Whether English experts are right or wrong in claiming that Islam declares that the "People of the Books" (Christians and Jews) are to be reduced to subjection, it is certain that in every country conquered by Moslems they have been so reduced, and all sorts of inequalities have at once come into existence. While hailing, therefore, the desire to give equality we must wait for results.

We may, however, look at the more hopeful side of Turkish history without forgetting the religious intolerance. The tradition of Moslems in Turkey has been not to interfere with Christian worship. It has been one of contemptuous toleration. Massacres of Christians have always been made by orders; those of Chios, in 1825, of Bulgaria, in 1876, and of Armenia in 1895-6, because the respective races were known to hope for the aid of Christian Powers to redress their grievances. Greeks, Bulgarians, and Armenians were slaughtered because they were Christians, and as Christians could not trust their Moslem rulers, though they could save their lives by being traitors to their faith. But if Moslems can really establish a Government which will grant equality, the Christians may learn to forget their wrongs. Nevertheless, confidence is notoriously a plant of slow growth, and Islam is on its trial.

It should be noted also that the Turkish people have an advantage, when seeking to establish constitutional government, in that they possess neither nobles nor aristocratic families. It is amazing how bootblacks and the like rise to power, and more amazing is the fall of even wealthy officials, whose families are swallowed up out of all recognition in a few months. In this sense the Moslems are wonderfully democratic. There is no old noblesse to form a permanent nucleus of reaction.

Having glanced, cursorily, it is true, at some of the chief factors to be considered in trying to answer the question at the head of this letter, I venture to sum up by saying that there is reason to hope that the leaders of the Moslems will persuade their followers that equality is enjoined by their faith; that the habits of all races oppose no obstacle to representative government; that probably each race will leave the choice of its representatives to its notables, who will virtually form an oligarchy, and that, provided the Parliament is not suppressed by a party of reaction and has no unforeseen obstacles, it will convince the people of the superiority of constitutional government and thus render it permanent.

The position is profoundly interesting. If Islam can prove its liberalism by placing Moslems and Christians on an equality, it may create a new Turkey. The followers of Christ and Mahomet working together may form a nation in which the combined forces may supply the thought and intellectual activity for the want of which Turkey has been steadily decaying since 1683. The bloody pages of religious persecution, intolerable tyranny, massacres and inefficiency during the past century, may be forgotten, and regenerated Turkey may take honorable rank among European nations. On the other hand, if Moslems cannot, or will not, admit Christians to an equality, then the steady, but certain, decay of the Turkish race will surely continue, and Europe will admit the truth of Andrassy's statement that every inch of territory taken from Turkey is gained for civilisation! —Yours, &c.,

EDWIN PEARS.

Prinkepo, Constantinople.

Music.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF RICHARD STRAUSS.

THE mental life of the musician presents a curious problem in psychology. To the ordinary man the executant seems a nervous and emotional freak, as he too often is, and the creative composer an ill-balanced amalgam of mathematics and feeling. To the achievements of neither can the canons of ordinary intellection be applied. This view is, of course, quite erroneous, for musicians are as other men; but there is this much truth in it: the art of music is superficially an expression of the human mind which has no clear relation to the normal working of the brain in other directions. Music stands outside every other activity of life. It is not to be explained or described by the only means we have of explaining or describing other phenomena, for words are but counters in the game of music. As a consequence, we find that creators of music, for the most part, construct their works of art by instinct. Very seldom have they any clear theory or conception of what they are doing. Wagner was an exception to this rule. Richard Strauss is not. He has extended the symphonic-poem to its uttermost limits in one direction without, apparently, any consciousness that he has passed the limits of the art, or, which is stranger still, that there are any limits at all. Mr. Ernest Newman, in his "Richard Strauss," (John Lane) has written by far the most concise and complete account of the composer and his works which has yet appeared in English, and has much to say of genuine critical insight on the subject of the symphonic-poem. His analysis of Strauss's genius is keen, logical, and masterly, and his volume may be recommended to all who desire to see this extraordinary composer within an intelligible focus. Yet Mr. Ernest Newman, being a literary man who has devoted his gifts to the criticism and analysis of music, has not quite understood the paralysing unconsciousness of the creative musician. It is paralysing because we feel it is futile to judge music by the standards by which we judge other arts. A composer will take a beautiful, tender little lyric and twist it into a grandiose musical composition, rising to a climax which would seem only in place if describing some terrible psychological cataclasm. When we have a composer who does not thus divorce his means of expression from the thing to be expressed, we are astounded by his artistic consistency and moderation. Hugo Wolf was such a man. We who are not primarily musicians beat our hands in almost impotent protest against the door which shuts off music from artistic intelligence, and in his "Richard Strauss" Mr. Ernest Newman has performed quite a frenetic tatoo of protest.

This perpetual protest of the literary mind against the unconscious working of the creative musical brain will, it is to be hoped, have its effect in time. In these days of "programme music" the composer must recognise that his naïve treatment of his art is no longer possible. When music was evolved entirely from itself the composer could go his own way in sublime disregard of any but musical ideas. The old forms gave him logic —for the old forms are logical. Richard Strauss himself, being an artist, has publicly recognised this. He also recognised, as Berlioz, Liszt, and Wagner had recognised, that music being a human art is not really outside life; that the logic evolved from itself could not be made to cover the expression of something beyond itself. The development of music flowed in a natural flood to Richard Strauss, enveloped him, and has carried him on. Has he the will and initiative to extricate himself from the swirl, or will he drift hither and thither at the mercy of powers stronger than himself? Mr. Newman thinks that Strauss has to a great extent deteriorated since the days of "Don Juan" and "Tod und Verklärung"; that he has allowed a freakishness of nature to get the better of him, with the result that we have the jarring comic realism of the bleating-sheep, of the wind-machine in "Don Quixote," the baroque humor of the antagonists and battle sections of "Ein Heldenleben," the childish grotesqueness of the "Sinfonia Domestica," and the futile psychological elaboration of "Also sprach Zarathustra." "Deterioration" is a strong word to use of a composer who is still in the first years of middle age. It means that his creative life is at an end. Possibly this may be so with Richard Strauss. One must know the man to be quite certain, and Mr. Alfred Kalisch's interesting "personal note" hardly deals with more than the externals of the composer's mental life. A man who could write "Don Juan" and "Tod und Verklärung" by his twenty-fifth year may be one of those spirits who come to early fruition and to early decay. One cannot be dogmatic about Strauss yet, and it is open to doubt if his later compositions do show the deterioration of which Mr. Newman writes. At least we must make due allowances for the new paths which the composer has struck out for himself. He has had to find his way through a dense wood without a compass and without sight of the sky.

In a technical sense there has been no deterioration from "Don Juan" to "Ein Heldenleben." The "Sinfonia Domestica" shows signs of haste, it is true, and of a flagging musical innovation which has resulted in a certain looseness of texture, but, in general, Strauss's mastery of his art has grown from one symphonic poem to another in a perfect chain of development. The most difficult thing in the world for any artist to achieve, whether he be creative or executant, is to express himself, to strike out a style of writing which shall be as natural to him as the character of handwriting is to ordinary men. It is a truism to say that individuality is the last quality to be developed in a man. If we look at Strauss's development in a technical sense we see that his debt to the past has gradually been wiped out. The homogenity of "Don Juan" and "Tod und Verklärung" was largely due to the strong influence of Wagner, and also to the fact that Strauss was still speaking in a known language. Both symphonic poems are more abstract in treatment than any of the later compositions. Strauss was still writing "absolute" music in comparison with what he afterwards attempted to do. Had he continued to write in the same vein he would not have done his valuable pioneer work in the development of programme music; for, whether he has gone beyond the limits of music or not, his labours in cutting new paths have been most valuable to the art. That he gained his individuality of expression at the expense of sanity and nobility of thought is tragical enough. But is it so much a deterioration as the true expression of himself? And even here one must distinguish. The freakishness which found its perfect expression in "Ein Eulenspiegel" is an original aspect of Strauss's genius. Sometimes it has a most irritating effect on the listener; yet again it will seem quite in place, and give the music just the external shape which prevents its being only a subjective picture. We must allow the creative artist to have his mannerisms. After all, the grotesque ugliness of parts of Rodin's work could not be altered without changing the whole conception and character of his art.

To understand Strauss's "Don Quixote" and "Ein Heldenleben" we must accept the composer's method of working. That method seems to consist of taking a subject as the basis of inspiration and of expressing it subjectively in music, without losing sight of the origin of the inspiration. For instance, the bulk of "Don Quixote" is a beautiful lyric poem, in which all the composer's regrets and passionate idealism (which makes him so much a realist in music) are shadowed forth. This is the abstract side of the symphonic poem. But Strauss really wishes to place Don Quixote before us in music and not only himself, so he gives us both his own commentary on the hero and some realistic touches illustrating the subject which has inspired him. It is here that the curious want of artistic consciousness, from which the musical creative mind suffers, has led Strauss astray. We have not the clue to the composer's attitude of mind. To him, no doubt, the grotesqueness of the realism in "Don Quixote," and the cheap humour of "Ein Heldenleben," seem quite in the frame. They are connected in his mind with the whole scheme of the symphonic poem, but to us they appear out of place. The composer has evidently not given a thought to this aspect of the matter, nor has he seriously considered the homogenity of his musical poems. The writer of programme music must consider this homogenity of expression. He must choose subjects which not only demand musical expression, but must so arrange them in his mind that the moods to be expressed make for musical form. Strauss's realism cuts his symphonic poems to pieces. It is not only that it is out of place in the midst of subjective expression, but as part of a musical picture these realisms do not justify themselves as music. They require something to illustrate them instead of illustrating something. The Antagonists and Battle sections of "Ein Heldenleben," for instance, are justified as an expression of the hero's outward strife, through which at last he is to attain to peace, but they are on a different plane of utterance; they are merely an accompaniment to action which we do not see. Perhaps Richard Strauss will never gain the intellectual grasp which would make these grotesque exaggerations impossible. He merely follows his instinct, and that possibly is the instinct of a man who has an inexplicable kink in his brain. At the same time this is not deterioration, for with the growth to full maturity it has always been present in his music. Also we must not forget that Strauss's ill-timed humour and freakishness have actually had their value, for they are an attempt, crude and ill-wrought as it may be, to give to music a fuller scope of expression, by tempering romance and emotion with the pathos of humour. Music has been too apt to deal with only some set emotions and their variations, and so to draw but a segment of the circle of life.

Communications.

BAD HARVESTS AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—That bad harvests and other failures of natural resources must contribute something towards trade depressions and unemployment is quite evident. If a smaller amount of food-stuffs and raw materials of manufacture are put into the industrial system, to be converted into saleable goods, less productive power of capital and labor will be required for handling them in the various processes of manufacture, transport, and commerce. In primitive industry where agriculture counts for so very much and where markets are narrowly circumscribed, great local depressions with accompanying unemployment may be entirely attributable to failures of harvests. Even in our present state of world-markets the simultaneous failure of the chief crops in a number of large areas of agriculture might involve directly a large quantity of unemployment.

But there is no reason to attribute the great volume of cyclical unemployment to such a cause. Neither the economic theory of employment, nor such facts and figures as are available, sustain the view, which Mr. Bisgood supports in his interesting letter in your last issue, that bad trade is caused by bad harvests.

Sometimes it is argued, as by Mr. Bisgood, that a bad harvest will mean a lower income for the agriculturists, that having less money to spend they will be unable to buy the various kinds of goods they usually bought, and that the producers of these goods having lost their customers will not produce them. But other supporters of the "harvest" theory of depressions argue that, when harvests fail, the price of food will rise so high that the general body of consumers having to pay more for their food than usual will have less to spend on other goods, and that in this way the demand for other goods must fall and general unemployment follow.

Now it is evident that these two lines of argument are inconsistent with one another, and I think it can be shown that both are false. Suppose a failure in the wheat crop to the extent of a quarter of the ordinary harvest. The price of wheat will rise. It might rise so much that the shorter crop would sell for as large an aggregate sum as the bigger crop last year. In that event the argument of Mr. Bisgood, that unemployment in other industries will be occasioned by the diminished demand on the part of the agricultural classes, falls to the ground. With it also collapses the other argument which imputes to the rise in food prices a reduction in the purchasing power available to demand other goods. For though the price of wheat per quarter has risen, the total amount of the general income expended upon food is the same as before, and the same amount of income remains for the purchase of other commodities.

Even if a larger aggregate sum were paid for the smaller supply of wheat, this would only transfer some purchasing power from the general consuming public to the agricultural classes or other classes handling wheat; it would not reduce the aggregate purchasing power, and could not, therefore, be regarded as a vera causa of unemployment.

Or take the case of a total failure, such as is imputed this year to the Champagne grape. "The vine growers," we are told, "have nothing to offer us in exchange for the commodities they usually purchase on the sale of their wine to the great houses, and so a large production of manufactured goods will not be required in Champagne, and those who would have made them are unemployed." Why must they be unemployed? The money that would have been spent upon Champagne will be spent, partly in increased demand for other wines, partly for other luxuries competing with wine in the standard of comfort of the well-to-do. Even if part of the money is not spent at all, but "saved," consideration of what is meant by "saving" will show that it will be paid to employ producers to make new instruments of production, or to work them. Though, therefore, the Champagne growers have less income to spend on manufactured goods than usual, other classes have more, and there is no reason why the goods which the former would have bought should remain unsold. Some injury, no doubt, is done to the employment in some special trades, due to the fact that the classes endowed with the purchasing power which the Champagne growers have lost will not necessarily employ it in demanding the same sort of goods. But though some trades may thereby suffer, others will be benefited, and the aggregate of employment will not be affected.

Although reliable and adequate statistics are not available for measuring the influence of bad harvests upon trade depressions, it is interesting to compare the following compilation of the wheat harvest of the world, published during recent years by the Agricultural Bureau of the United States Government with the unemployed percentage of Trade Unionists, our best index of unemployment. I append also the average price of wheat in Great Britain during each year.

Year.	Wheat harvest. Million bushels.	Wholesale price. s. d.	Percentage unemployed.
1891	2,432·3	37 0	3·00
1892	2,481·8	30 3	6·20
1893	2,562·9	26 4	7·70
1894	2,672·3	22 10	7·70
1895	2,552·6	23 1	6·05
1896	2,506·3	26 2	3·50
1897	2,333·6	30 2	3·65
1898	2,921·0	34 0	3·15
1899	2,725·4	25 8	2·40
1900	2,627·9	26 11	2·85
1901	2,929·3	26 9	3·80
1902	3,103·7	28 1	4·60
1903	3,195·8	26 9	5·30
1904	3,147·6	28 4	6·85
1905	3,317·3	29 8	5·60
1906	3,423·1	28 3	4·10
1907	—	30 7	4·20

(I do not think that the Washington computation of the 1907 harvest is yet available.)

If the size of the wheat harvest had any appreciable effect in depressing the volume of our trade this effect might be expected to be traceable to the unemployed figure for the year following the bad harvest. No such effect seems traceable. No clear relation between the price of wheat and the amount of unemployment is discernible.—Yours, &c.,

J. A. Hobson.

September 22nd, 1908.

Letters to the Editor.

THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In your issue of 8th ult. you invited readers to report on four specified points in the above connection. I now act upon your suggestion, and beg to transmit to you some carefully ascertained data, which, in collaboration with a friend similarly interested, I have been enabled to establish.

First, however, a word by way of preface and explanation. My residence is near the southern end of a good-sized village in the country, on a main road. The village is "protected" by boards requesting slow driving of motors; the situation of these boards being, at the northern end, fully half a mile, at the southern end, about 200 yards, distant from my house. A length of road within the protected section was accurately measured off, and the times occupied by the motors noted and checked.

This brings me to your queries: (1) "Speed of motors and conduct of drivers." In all, twenty-nine motor-cars and motor cycles were timed, this number comprising the whole of such vehicles as passed. The lowest speed recorded is sixteen miles per hour, and this in the case of one car only; then rates ascend thus: 17 miles per hour (two cars), 18 (1), 18½ (1), 19 (2), 20 (3), 21 (3), 23½ (4), 25 (2), 26½ (5), 28 (1), 30 (3), and 38½ (1). That is to say, an average speed of 23½ miles per hour for the twenty-nine motor vehicles. In regard to the conduct of drivers, a noticeable feature was a tendency to unduly force non-motor traffic to the sides of the road. Query 2: "Dust nuisance, and injury to roads." I cannot open my roadside windows at all, and other windows only occasionally, either by day or night, unless when raining. The injury to the roads is so obvious as scarcely to require comment. In our village it has been found necessary to put down a coating of tar, towards the cost of which I, not a motorist, will be charged my quota. Replying to your query No. 3, re "Opinions of various classes of individuals." The people chiefly prejudiced in my district are the farmers and cottagers. The first because of the damage done to crops grown in the vicinity of the highway, and resultant lessened prices. Added to this a new trouble has arisen, viz., the increase of veterinary work where cattle feed near the main road. The cottagers are under the disability of having to keep doors and windows closed during fine weather; and, what is infinitely more serious to them, living as they do, in many cases, right on the edge of the high road, is the constant menace of injury or worse to their little ones, and to the aged and infirm amongst them, after nightfall in particular. Re your fourth question, "remedial legislation," I can more conveniently embody comment upon this with my general conclusions.

The speed figures which I have given, occurring as they do on a "protected" (sic) stretch of road, go a long way towards proving that the habitual exceeding of the limit allowed by law, is the rule, and not, as our motoring friends strive so keenly to maintain, the exception. It has been out of the question for me to record the worst cases, because these happen after dark, often in the small hours, on the same piece of road. In regard to the cars concerned, when seen by me, it has more often than not been impossible to distinguish the tail number, owing to the excessive rate of speed; one I should judge to exceed on the average 30 miles per hour. In view of these facts, and most especially in view of the immense increase to be looked for in the number of cars all over the country, it is my firm conviction that a speed limit (or limits) must be retained. The contention held—as I think, very unfortunately—by our leading Lancashire daily paper, and naturally by motor car owners, that in parts of the country a speed considerably in excess of the present legal limit may be indulged in without risk; if it means anything at all, it means this: that the use of such roads by the pedestrian will become more or less impossible; it means that residence in the country, now so desirable for town workers, of the poorer classes in particular, will be discouraged and curtailed; it means finally, that what control by the police over the traffic on our roads does exist will be greatly weakened. I do not speak without knowledge, I have had to give up the use at night of one of the pleasantest roads in my neighbourhood, the margin of personal safety having been passed long ago.

The question of the up-keep of the roads has not been touched upon in this letter; it is not so important as that of security for life and limb, but I think that what is wanted is that the cost of maintenance should be arranged so as to fall on all road users, in definite relation as nearly as possible to the effect of their traffic.—Yours, &c.,

Reform Club, Manchester, A.
September 23rd, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your article to-day makes one almost despair. The arrogance and selfishness of the motorist are his stimulus and security in offence and defence. You, having been successful in forcing a promise of redress, seem afraid of your own shadow, and fall back on the complexity of the question, and fear ingenuity may get round regulations.

Now, if "excessive speed is the cause of the entire trouble," surely "the exceptionally lawless class" who need to use it for their vacuous amusement can make their own tracks or motor roads, instead of, as at present, turning the ratepayer off his with their insulting noises.—Yours, &c.,

Balak.

September 19th, 1908.

[Our correspondent quite misreads our article. The inference that we draw from the complexity of the question is that the regulations required will have to be numerous and stringent.—Ed., Nation.]

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have been much interested in the correspondence on this subject in your columns. Living as I do on the main road to the West of England the motor nuisance has been much in evidence, and this summer has become almost unbearable. On a moderate computation at least 100 cars pass daily, and the owners of a vast majority contribute nothing to the local rates which have to bear the burden of the up-keep of the roads. The dust nuisance is appalling, and all the members of my household have had to give up cycling and we never go on the main road at all if we can possibly avoid it, either walking or driving.

My suggestion would be to tax all motor cars at the rate of £1 per horse power of the engine, and apply the whole of the proceeds of the tax to the improvement of, and dust allaying on, the main roads. To meet the case of doctors and others I would allow a rebate of half the duty on all motors used exclusively for professional or trade purposes.

It is the large, heavy, high-power cars that create most of the nuisance, and they should be made to contribute proportionately.

Much more drastic treatment in the case of reckless driving is also needed.—Yours, &c., John Grubb.

The Down, Winscombe, Somerset,
September 18th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Some of the proposals I have seen for regulating motor traffic do not appear to recognise that simplicity is essential. I venture to suggest that the price of licences should depend on the possible speed of the car.

The licence for a car unable to travel at a greater speed than ten miles on a level road might be quite cheap.

The price should increase with the possible speed until twenty miles is reached, when it should be a fairly substantial sum.

Cars able to travel on a level road more than twenty miles an hour should pay a sum increasing by leaps and bounds.

Few people would care to pay the very heavy price exacted for great speed. A car might be tested at any time by an official engineer to see whether it was paying for an adequate licence. Most people would be satisfied with a moderate speed, and prefer a cheaper licence.—Yours, &c.,

Edmund Verney.

Claydon House, Bucks,
September 21st, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Railway trains churn the air in the same way as motors, but as the rails and road are clean the dust is of little importance.

These, then, are the problems to solve:—

Get a clean track and dust and discomfort will be minimised.

Reduce the displacement of air as much as possible, and govern the dust before it rises in clouds

Run the wheels in close boxes, excepting at the actual point, or area, of contact with the road, and by air suction draw the "centrifugal" wheel dust into tubes, or chambers, for control. The air suction can easily be obtained by light flanges on the spokes of the wheels arranged as a circular fan.

Not the most tyrannical of police laws and restrictions will stop the motors. They are going—to stay.

If the dust were checked we could see them better and life would be less precarious on the road, and pleasanter at the road side.

The enormous displacement of air by a rapidly moving vehicle will always lift some dust, and my practical suggestions to engineers are not expected to destroy the nuisance altogether, but to help to minimise it.—Yours, &c.,

John Higgins.

Pylle, Somerset,
September 21st, 1908.

[Our correspondent will do well to remember that this is a self-governing country, and whether the motor is "going to stay," and if so, on what conditions, rests with the people themselves to determine.—Ed., Nation.]

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I ask leave to add a few words to my former letter.

1. I take it to be the duty of foot passengers on a road that has no side path to keep to their left. This I know, from bicycle riders, makes it easier for them.

2. We notice, I think, that most motor accidents happen at corners, at places where roads cross, or where two roads have the form of the letter T. I submit that the adoption of the rule of the road at sea would be of use here.

Once on a steamer, voyaging northwards up St. George's Channel, we espied another steamer a long way off, moving probably out of the Clyde westward. Immediately our captain began to change his course some points eastward of north. If it had been night the steamer ahead of us on our starboard bow would have been showing the red light, the light on her port side corresponding to the near side of a horse, the left side of one standing on deck looking to the bows, the left-hand side of the driver of a land vehicle. Our captain knew that it was his duty to give way, that if the two steamers had met and collided more or less at right angles he would have been to blame.

Whereas if the steamer had appeared on our port bow, moving eastward from Ireland to Scotland and at night showing her green light on her starboard side, the right-hand side to one on board of her looking to her bows—the side corresponding to the offside on land, then the sea rule would have applied. Then

"You have not so much to do,
The green light must take care of you."

On the first blush it might seem that as road vehicles pass to the left and ships to the right, the sea rule ought to be reversed. As far as I see at present this reversal is needless; I leave that to readers whose mathematical wits are nimbler than mine.

Would it be possible to have signals such as these? One blast of the horn to mean I want to cross the road on which you are travelling. Two blasts in quick succession: I want to pass into your road and turn to my right; and three blasts: I want to pass into your road and turn to the left.

The effect of my suggestion would be, look out for corners to your right.—Yours, &c.,

T. Wilson.

Rivers Lodge, Harpenden, S.O., Herts.
September 22nd, 1908.

DON PORFIRIO.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your slightly sub-acid eulogist of Don Porfirio Diaz attributes to him, amongst other qualities, a wonderful memory, in that the President remembers the Christian name of every Indian he has met.

Had he said the surname I should also have been amazed. Though not a President (as yet) myself, I think, in Mexico, that I could emulate the feat.

Nearly all Indians in Mexico are called José, their wives Maria, and when Don Porfi meets his Indian and calls him by his name, he does so "with the same confidence a Christian feels when he has got four aces in his hand."—Yours, &c.,

R. B. Cunninghame Graham.

September 23rd, 1908.

"PERU."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In a not altogether inappropriate, but somewhat rambling review, your reviewer—Mr. Cunninghame Graham—gives his ideas upon my book, "Peru," in your last number. I wish, however, he had been free from the prejudice which shows itself in such references—scarcely worthy of a thoughtful mind—as, "This . . . leaves the military picnic in the Transvaal even more hopelessly ridiculous than it was at first." Without enquiring what this has to do with Peru, one may well ask why he calls it a "picnic." Your reviewer shows other evidences of hasty thought and expression, and takes upon himself to deny "the least pretence of literary style" to an author who happens to be an engineer, and refers rather sneeringly to the "theodolite and the pen," although this is doubtless one of those witty catch-phrases by which some reviewers, with a neglect of literary honesty, catch the eye of their readers. Nor is his reference to "newspaper-made opinions" at all relevant. He falls foul of Prescott, and, indeed, with almost everything connected with the subject, but it is doubtful if the statement that the "Americans have 'civilised' all their (Indians) away," is a just one. If Mr. Graham will study the matter of the Indians of America—North or South—he will find that all of them tend to disappear, or have disappeared, except those who came under the influence of the prehistoric civilisations of the Mexican or Peruvian empires. The roving tribes of Indians, whether of North America or of the Amazon, tend to disappear naturally, as well as by any act of the encroaching races; whilst the others form the basis of growing nations. Many years in America (notwithstanding the occasional use of the theodolite) have not failed to show me this. But I am afraid Mr. Graham is too much concerned to punish us for our work in the Transvaal, to consider this, although as a historical critic (according to his review) he might pause and consider.

Hoping to be favored with your kindness in the publication of these remarks.—Yours, &c.,

C. Reginald Enock, F.R.G.S.

Northwood, Middlesex.
September 23rd, 1908.

CAN MORALS BE TAUGHT?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—You make two good points in your article under the above title. As you say, it will be sad if we seek a moral significance in every subject taught, and still sadder if "moral" teaching is made mainly direct.

When Christ wished to carry captive the minds and hearts of his hearers he resorted to the fable, and left the "moral" to be discovered by his hearers. How easy it is for commonplace teachers to reverse this method, and to make the moral tag the principal event, so to speak, of the short story or parable.

Of course, morals can be taught, as can everything up to a certain point; but the vital question always is, Whose morals? It may be a good thing for a child to learn disobedience. . . . I am the head master of a private school, and, being a Socialist, I teach history for the pleasure I get out of its revolutions. If I were in India I should tell my pupils that Tilak was a hero, because he believes that India should be governed by Indians. I tell them, also, that in this England of ours poor people are scarcely ever poor, because of their sins. I tell them that our Government is unequal to solving the simple question of unemployment, because they have not courage enough to tax the classes in receipt of large incomes from rent and interest. If, in answer to all this, a child gets up and leaves the room, I should not complain. He has a perfect right, according to my moral practice, to resist me.

For all that, moral education will come, sub-consciously, through experience and reading. Finally, can we improve on Christ's method, and, after reading as beautifully as we can the parable of the Ten Virgins, say should we not leave it, without comment, with the child with all its haunting and admonitory beauty? The great Teacher in all ages has taught thus, and has science to-day discovered a better way? I think not.—Yours, &c.,

F. Kettle.

The Clapham School, High Street, S.W.,
September 21st, 1908.

"THE DOCTRINE OF TOLERANCE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Every true Liberal must sympathise with your plea for universal tolerance in the matter of religious worship. But is it intolerance to object to the performance of religious rites in the public streets? If anybody chooses to set up an image of Mumbo Jumbo, and call it God, and bow down to it, and worship it, there is no reason why the law should interfere with him, so long as he confines his adoration to the privacy of his own house or chapel. But if he and his co-religionists were to carry this effigy down the Strand, with worship and genuflexions, proclaiming it as the Supreme Being, could we rightly invoke the aid of the civil power to protect the procession against the brickbats of the unbeliever?

Now the simple fact is, whether we deplore it or not, that thousands of our fellow-citizens look upon the Host as in no sense divine. Thousands, too, look upon the adoration of a crucifix as the violation of a commandment, which they believe to be of divine authority, to the effect that man should not bow down to a graven image. Nevertheless the law, very rightly, allows the adoration of the consecrated wafer, and of sacred images, to proceed with an entire freedom in places of worship, both public and private. But when I am told that I am intolerant if I venture to dispute the proposition that the performance of these rites and ceremonies should be allowed and protected by the police in the streets of London, I must enter a mild protest. I think, for many reasons, that the public thoroughfares are not suitable to religious worship. Personally, I think that religious processions through the streets, even though unattended by any ceremonial of actual worship, are objectionable. They block the already too congested traffic, and, in certain cases, are very liable to give rise to disturbance. But, it will be said, political processions are allowed, though many strongly object to and are offended by them. The answer is (as Lord Morley long ago put it in his work on "National Education") that it is a settled principle of our civil government to make a marked distinction between things religious and things secular. A man cannot be heard in support of a conscientious objection to paying the income-tax, but a conscientious objection to being forced to pay for religious teaching or ceremonies of which one disapproves is generally held entitled to some respect, at any rate among Liberals. Political processions, therefore, in reasonable number, and under strict regulations, are to be allowed. I can see no reason why the same right should necessarily be admitted in the case of religious processions, but if toleration must be extended to these also, at least let rites and ceremonies be reserved for the appropriate religious edifices, and not paraded in the public thoroughfares.

In the recent case the Government were, of course, upon the firm ground of an Act of Parliament, and a Proclamation of the last reign; but I set these aside as irrelevant to my contention.—Yours, &c.,

Sept. 20th, 1908. A Liberal M.P.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I am a Liberal and a Protestant (brought up in the Scotch Presbyterian Church), and when I read in my Sunday paper that the Prime Minister had insisted upon the elimination of the Host from the Eucharistic Procession I was dismayed. I felt it was a stroke that hit our country hard, and I also felt that it was an act which would cost the Liberal Party dear at the polls (as is likely at Newcastle). But I remembered Featherstone. There the military were called out, and murder took place. The Home Secretary of that day—the Premier of this day—was blamed, and wrongly blamed, for that blunder; but I venture to say it was a blunder which has burned into his soul. The fanatics of the Protestant Alliance had made arrangements "to bring down the Host." Had they done so, or attempted to do so, there would have been bloodshed. The sin and the shame of it would have been upon the heads of the fanatics. But, Sir, as a humble member of the Liberal Party, I would prefer to defend the discretion of the Premier in vetoing the Host in procession, than I would have cared to defend him before my Catholic friends had he permitted the procession as originally arranged, and had the blunder of Featherstone been repeated. I think the Catholics of England will realise ere long that they are blaming the Liberal Premier and Government for a course of action which permitted of no alternative.—Yours, &c.,

Bridlington, Sept. 21st, 1908. W. D.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—As a subscriber to your paper from the first, I write to protest against "The Doctrine of Tolerance."

Liberalism, as I take it, does not sanction unqualified freedom for any section of the people.

The Pope's Legate was loud in his praises of British freedom, but where do the Catholic Church allow it to Protestants when they are in authority?

The proposed carrying of the Host was a menace against public order, in permitting an escort of 15,000 men to usurp public streets. It was an affront to the consciences of a Protestant nation, whose guests they were. It was designed as a symbolical act for the return of the nation to the rule of the Pope.

I say nothing about the deliberate breaking of the law of the land.—Yours, &c.,

H. W. Francis.

112, Tresillian Road,
September 22nd, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The writer of the able critique contained in your last issue, in reference to the proposed carrying of the Host through some of the streets of Westminster, is entitled to the thanks of your readers for the fair and impartial manner he has dealt with the matter.

When we consider that 3,000,000 of his Majesty's subjects in Hindustan alone, without including the Colonies, are allowed to celebrate their religious rites according to their accepted beliefs, and that in this country all and every kind of doctrine—good, bad, and false—is shouted into our ears at every street corner, it surpasses my comprehension that in these days of so-called progression any objection could be placed in the way of Catholics parading the streets in their vestments and carrying the Host.

For years the procession of the Feast of Corpus Christi has taken place, and Catholics have paraded the streets of our great cities without let or hindrance. I fail to see that the carrying of the Host, or any other religious symbol, would spiritually affect the masses of the people. The days are past, never to return, when Catholicism was the dominant power in this country. State education, Socialistic teaching, and the general indifference to matters spiritual, will prove effective barriers to Catholics, or any other sect, ever meddling with State affairs. A return to the Marian and Elizabethan methods is out of the question, and the idea can at once be dismissed as the chimera of a diseased mind.

And yet we find, in these days of enlightenment, a Liberal Ministry absolutely awed by the threats of a Protestant section, who threatened to wreck the procession, should the carrying of the Host through the streets be persisted in. But in spite of the Ministerial interdict, the Host was publicly elevated, and the kneeling crowds were blessed by the Papal Legate. It appears to me very much like being prohibited carrying a flag in the street, while one may place the same in one's window.

The action of the Government, who were well acquainted with the intended procession, and who seemingly wished to treat the matter privately, cannot be too severely condemned.

I am not a Catholic, but I am of the opinion that toleration and fair play should be granted to all. Provided order and decorum is observed, all have a right to the use of the streets.

The Government's spoliation will do a vast amount of harm, and at the next General Election the Liberal Ministry will lose thousands of votes.—Yours, &c.,

Walter Philip High.

21, Trederwen Road,
London Fields, N.E.
Sept. 20th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I must apologise for adding one more to the pile of letters you have received about the Eucharistic Procession.

To my mind the crux of the question is not whether Mr. Asquith is to be admired or censured for diverging from our usual course of toleration—a course of which he is, probably, just as proud as the most austere of his critics—but how it has happened that that interference was necessary; in other words, how any Christians could have so far forgotten their Lord's teaching as to condemn or judge their brothers, especially in an affair of conscience.

No one at least can excuse himself by simulating ignorance of the maxim, "Do unto others as ye would they should do unto you."

Evidently toleration is a hard thing even to understand; for instance, what possible meaning is there in one correspondent's exhortation, "Now we have won the victory, we can afford to be tolerant." It is as though one were to starve a man to death, and at his last gasp offer him a sumptuous dinner.

Also, let us not be so sure that we have won the victory; an anyone who believes that "right" and not "force" is might, the victory lies with the followers of conscience, rather than with those people who exploited the thoughtless enthusiasm of the crowd by encouraging them to shout such irrelevant matter as "Rule Britannia," and "God Save the King" in the actual presence of a religious ceremony.

This brings to mind the Jewish tour de force of the first century, when, to gain their evil purpose, the priests gave up on a sudden their long-cherished ideal of independent nationality, and let the mob shout, "We have no king but Caesar."—Yours, &c., M. L.

The Grange, Loughton, Essex.
September 22nd, 1908.

THE "MESSAGES" FROM FREDERIC MYERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Whenever I have taken the trouble to analyse cases of psychical phenomena, however mysterious and complex they might seem, I have never found myself driven to the necessity of admitting the existence of discarnate spirits as being the only and most reasonable explanation of such phenomena.

The whole of the psychical research of the last few decades has at least emphasised the fact that telepathy, telaesthesia, and the subliminal part of man's mental being play a vast part in all these curious psychical phenomena, or, as Maxwell calls them, "metapsychical" phenomena. We are in almost entire ignorance of the conditions under which one mind may affect and communicate with another in an occult manner, and I see no reason to doubt, for example, the idea that what is known subliminally, and not consciously, to one mind may be communicated to another. So that, in order to establish the fact that a particular communication is needed from a discarnate spirit, it is necessary to eliminate, not only the action of the subliminal self, not only the action of telepathy in communicating what is consciously known, but also the action of telepathy in communicating what is subliminally known.

The elimination of these elements is almost inconceivably difficult, and their presence in the problem should make us demand exceedingly conclusive and unambiguous proof that such communications do emanate from discarnate human spirits. And analysis of the cases presented by spiritists as proof of survival after death will show invariably that they are never so definite and conclusive as to have got rid of these complicating elements. It seems to me that before any phenomena can be regarded as establishing the spiritistic thesis they should be examined by men who are sceptical, or, at least, by men who do not initially lean to the spiritistic interpretation. The psychical researcher himself is seldom sufficiently sceptical, and does not give full weight to the possibilities of telepathy, and particularly of the telepathic communication of things known subliminally. For instance, interesting and, in many ways, admirable as is Myers's "Human Personality," one is inevitably struck, in reading the second volume, by the altogether too ready acceptance of a spiritistic interpretation, by the lack of analysis, and by the insufficient incredulity which it displays.

One must admit, however, that the recent communications purporting to come from Frederic Myers and Richard Hodgson contain quite novel elements, and seem to display a consciousness of the complexity which is introduced into the problem by such elements as those which I have mentioned. But the evidence (of which, unfortunately, I have not yet got a full report) should most certainly be examined critically, with constant reference to such possibilities as those of telepathy. I very much doubt whether a critical person would then need to call in the spiritistic hypothesis.

One notes, for example, that, in the case quoted by Mr. Graham, the husband of Mrs. Verrall had consciously formulated an explanation in his own mind. And this might quite possibly have affected Mrs. Holland. This may sound far-fetched. But the facts of this subject sound far-fetched. Here, indeed, fact often seems more fictitious than fiction.—Yours, &c.,

G. STAFFORD WHITBY.

12, Charles Street, Hull,
September 19th, 1908.

GERMAN FOREIGN POLICY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A stick of late freely used with which to beat Germany is the story, repeated almost ad nauseam by some of Mr. Arnold White's fellow alarmists. They enlarge on the assumed crafty and unscrupulous action of Prussia in striking down, as they term it, Denmark in 1864, Austria in 1866, and France in 1870. This is parodying history and playing to the gallery.

1. Prussia did not strike Denmark down, as alleged. Austria and Prussia jointly took military possession of Schleswig-Holstein, owing to a question of long-disputed right of succession. Argument failing, force was employed, as is commonly done in all such cases, great or small.

2. For about a couple of centuries rivalry had existed between Austria and Prussia as to the headship of Germany. Prussia decided to settle it in the interests of German nationality. And she did so in the famous seven weeks' campaign. That was a natural and national development.

3. No doubt Prussia welcomed, and even angled for, the war with France in 1870, so that her unity might be completed by a victory. The traditional policy of France in claiming the primacy of Europe had kept Italy divided and Germany also. The time was rife with the spirit of Nationalism.

What crime was it for Prussia to head the movement for making Germany, like Italy, a nation, and not a mere geographical expression? There is no evidence that Prussia would have declared war on France. The declaration of war was made by Napoleon III., urged on, as plenty of evidence shows, by the Empress.—Yours, &c.,

J. H.

August 31st, 1908.

Poetry.

THE SHIP SIREN.

Across the fog, across the rain,
On glimmering London pavements falling,
I hear the voice, again, again—
A voice that is calling, calling.

It calls me where the rivers run
Through forest gloom unbroken for ever;
And the steamer's mast to the mid-day sun
Is shadowless on the river.

"You know," it cries, "how mornings rise
In smoke from untrodden islands streaming,
And long waves roll from a southern pole,
And southern stars are gleaming.

"Remember where the desert lay—
Purple desert beside the sea—
And barren mountains round a bay,
And a storm-crowned promontory;

"And how the midnight draws her breath
As the sleeping sun returns on high,
And pallid water sleeps beneath
A pallid dome of sky.

"Ah! leave the crowd that howls below,
Crowding houses on either hand.
The streets are wide by which I go
To a wide and silent land.

"By a silent road I'll bear you home."
From London dock the siren's calling,
"Come to the seas, to the desert come!"
And I lie enchained in a London room—
And the rain is falling, falling.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

A NEW literary monthly is a rather daring venture to-day, when such periodicals as "Macmillan's Magazine," "Temple Bar," and "The Monthly Review" have ceased publication, while few of their survivors are supposed to be very prosperous. "The English Review," however, of which the first number will be issued by Messrs. Duckworth next November, promises to make a bold bid for permanence. Its editor will be Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer, and he has secured a strong list of contributors for his opening number. There will be a poem by Mr. Thomas Hardy, a short story of the supernatural by Mr. Henry James, a sketch called "War" by Tolstoy, the first instalment of Mr. Joseph Conrad's "Autobiography," containing interesting details of the Polish revolution, the opening chapters of a serial, "Tono Bungay," by Mr. H. G. Wells, a story by Mr. John Galsworthy, and an article on Stonehenge by Mr. W. H. Hudson. The nominal "hero" of Mr. Wells's serial is a patent medicine, whose owner gains a large fortune by speculation. This fortune he afterwards loses, so that his progress through the different grades of social life gives Mr. Wells an opportunity of introducing a great variety of types. "The English Review" will contain editorial comments on the chief events of each month, though it will support no political party. Its chief aim will be to publish works by writers of pronounced views or pronounced faculties, which the existing reviews might not care to admit without excision or modification. We hope the new venture will prove successful in maintaining the high literary standard with which it begins.

* * *

THE history of anonymous and pseudonymous literature appeals to every real book-lover, so that a book upon that fascinating subject, which Mr. W. P. Courtney has in the Press, will be looked for with interest. "The Secrets of our National Literature" claims to be the first attempt that has been made in this country to set out the history surrounding the chief works published without an author's name, or with some disguise of its language. There is, of course, Halkett and Laing's "Dictionary of Anonymous and Pseudonymous Literature," but it is a work of reference, and does not treat the subject in narrative form. We are certain of an entertaining volume from so accomplished a bibliographer and man of letters as Mr. Courtney. The book is to be published by Messrs. Constable.

* * *

"THE PANMURE PAPERS," which Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton have in the Press, is likely to be the chief political book of the season. It contains a selection from the correspondence of Lord Panmure (afterwards Earl of Dalhousie), who was Secretary of State for War in the Palmerston administration of 1855-1858. Many hitherto unpublished letters from Queen Victoria, the Prince Consort, Lord Palmerston, Lord Clarendon, Lord Russell, Sir James Simpson, Sir William Codrington, and others will be given. The book, which is edited by Sir George Douglas and Sir George D. Ramsey, will supply a large amount of material bearing on the later conduct of the Crimean War. It will doubtless rank among the prime sources of material for the future historian.

* * *

UNDER the title, "Side-Shows," a volume of essays by Mr. J. B. Atkins, will shortly be published by Messrs. Christophers. Some of these papers have already appeared in the "Manchester Guardian" and the "Spectator," and have won notice for their open-air atmosphere and grace of phrasing. Mr. Atkins' dialogue with a racehorse, originally published in the "Manchester Guardian," was a fine piece of work, and his essays on cats are as good as Loti's, and are free from the sentimentality that mars the French writer. Messrs. Christophers, who have hitherto confined themselves to educational books, open their literary record with a promise of distinction and freshness.

* * *

MR. CHARLES G. HARPER'S long series of works on the great roads of England, and the road-life of the ages before railways, are deservedly popular. His new book, which will be published during the present season by Messrs. Chapman & Hall, promises to be even more interesting than its predecessors. It is called "Half Hours with the Highwaymen," and accounts are given of all the notorious gentlemen of the road, from the "Cavalier" highwaymen like Captain Whitney, who made their Royalist sympathies an excuse for highway robbery, to "Swiftsticks" Nevison, the real hero of the ride to York, with which Turpin is usually credited.

* * *

WE learn from Mr. William Archer that he has not as we had supposed any thought of undertaking a regular causerie in "The Fortnightly Review," but will contribute an article on "Plays of the New Season" to the October number.

* * *

MESSRS. LONGMANS have in the press an interesting volume of biographical and critical sketches by Mr. Wilfrid Ward. The book is called "Personal Studies," and among the subjects are J. T. Delane, R. H. Hutton, J. Knowles, Henry Sidgwick, Father Ryder, Lord Lytton, Grant Duff, Mr. A. J. Balfour, and Pope Leo XIII. Some of the essays have already appeared in the "Dublin Review," which, under Mr. Ward's brilliant editorship, is enjoying a new lease of prosperity. Several literary essays of distinction, the most notable being that on Shelley by the late Francis Thompson, have appeared in recent issues.

* * *

THE second volume of Samuel Butler's works in the "Cambridge English Classics" series will be issued shortly by the Cambridge University Press. It will be called "'Characters' and Passages from Note-Books," and is largely made up of selections from the Butler manuscripts at the British Museum now printed for the first time. The edition will be completed by a third volume giving the remaining poems, together with some unpublished passages which Mr. Waller holds to be Butler's work.

* * *

MESSRS. METHUEN'S new series, "The Romance of History," has made a capital start with Major Martin Hume's "Two English Queens and Philip," published this week. Major Hume is the general editor of the series, and he has written an introduction to "The First Governess of the Netherlands, Margaret of Austria," by Mrs. Eleanor E. Tremayne, which will be issued early in October. Mrs. Tremayne has been at work upon the subject for several years, and her account of Margaret of Austria's life and times is largely based upon materials hitherto unused by English historians.

* * *

THE book by Professor L. T. Hobhouse, of which Mr. Fisher Unwin is preparing a second edition, is "Democracy and Reaction," and not "The Labor Movement," as was stated last week.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Age of Shakespeare." By Algernon Charles Swinburne. (Chatto & Windus. 6s. net.)

"Orthodoxy." By G. K. Chesterton. (Lane. 5s. net.)

"Realities and Ideals: Social, Political, Literary, and Artistic." By Frederic Harrison. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Jean Jacques Rousseau." By Jules Lemaître. Translated by Jeanne Mairet. (Heinemann. 10s. net.)

"The Pinafore Picture Book." By W. S. Gilbert. Illustrated by Alice B. Woodward. (Bell. 5s. net.)

"From Ploughshare to Parliament." A Short Memoir of the Potters of Tadcaster. By Georgina Meinertzhagen. (Murray. 6s. net.)

"An Alabama Student, and other Biographical Essays." By William Osler, M.D., F.R.S. (Clarendon Press. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Two English Queens and Philip." By Martin Hume. (Methuen. 15s. net.)

"The Wife of Lafayette." By M. MacDermot Crawford. (Nash. 15s. net.)

"The Princesse de Lamballe: A Biography." By B. C. Hardy. (Constable. 12s. net.)

"An Incarnation of the Snow." By F. W. Bain. (Parker. 5s. net.)

"The Resurrection of Jesus." By James Orr, M.A., D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

"Diana Mallory." By Mrs. Humphry Ward. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

"Interplay." By Beatrice Harraden. (Methuen. 6s.)

"Pascal et Son Temps." Troisième et Dernière Partie: Les Provinciales et Les Pensées. Par Fortunat Strowski. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 5 fr. 50.)

Reviews.

MR. SWINBURNE AS EULOGIST.*

THE hundredth anniversary of the publication of "Specimens of English Dramatic Poets" could not be celebrated with higher or a more appropriate honor than it is in this volume which is dedicated to the memory of Charles Lamb:—

> "A child it was who first by grace of thine
> Communed with gods who share with thee their shrine:
> Elder than thou wast ever now I am,
> Now that I lay before thee in thanksgiving
> Praise of dead men divine and everliving,
> Whose praise is thine as thine is theirs, Charles Lamb."

Possibly Mr. Swinburne has forgotten that 1908 is also a jubilee year. In 1858 was issued, as a collected volume, "Undergraduate Papers," which began to appear at Oxford in December, 1857, under the editorship of John Nichol and reached a third and last number in the following April. Here was published Mr. Swinburne's first contribution to the study of Elizabethan drama—an article of eight pages on "Marlowe and Webster"—two of the dramatists dealt with in the present volume. The writer of that article, looking backward after a quarter of a century felt a certain tenderness towards it, ranking it above his other "crudities," of the "Undergraduate Papers," his "awful doggerel on the subject of Tristram and Iseult," and his "terrific onslaught on the French Empire and its Clerical supporters." "It must have shown," wrote Mr. Swinburne (doubtless to Mr. T. J. Wise), "that before leaving Eton I had plunged as deep as a boy could dive into the line of literature which has always been my favorite." Among his fellow-contributors to the "Undergraduate Papers," beside the late Professor Nichol, were the late Professor T. H. Green, the late Dr. G. Birkbeck Hill, and one who is still happily with us, Professor A. V. Dicey. The prophecy in "awful doggerel" of Mr. Swinburne's great Arthurian poem and the prophecy of the arduous and ardent critical studies now gathered from the "Encyclopædia Britannica" and the "Nineteenth Century" make the "Undergraduate Papers" something more than a collector's costly knick-knack; it was stated twelve years ago that only three perfect copies were known. But we have here in large measure the fulfilment of the prophecy—we have a later Marlowe and a later Webster, with added articles on Dekker, Marston, Middleton, Rowley, Heywood, Chapman, Tourneur. It seems as if we ought to be gratefully content; but, in fact, we are a little dissatisfied, and ask with plaintive importunity—Why not also John Day, and Philip Massinger, and Richard Brome? Mr. Swinburne's studies in Elizabethan drama still remain in part scattered. Is it not time that a collected and well-ordered edition of the prose writings should follow the "Collected Poems" and the "Tragedies"?

It is unnecessary to attempt to describe Mr. Swinburne's critical method. He does not offer us a history of Elizabethan drama; he does not determine the development of species among dramatic compositions—how the species originated, how it produced varieties within the limits of a type, how it declined and was superseded by another species. For such a study as this the reader can now turn to the two admirable volumes of Professor Schelling. Mr. Swinburne's unit is not the type of play, but in each case the genius of an individual writer. With swift, fiery, and penetrative insight he discovers what is the characteristic virtue of each poet; to what is entirely beautiful he renders the response of entire delight, but his praise is never vaguely rhetorical, for he is always seeking after what is characteristic, and, though he rightly likes better to dwell on what is beautiful than on what is base, his perception of characteristic vices and defects is also keen. A colder temperament than Mr. Swinburne's does not necessarily imply a more judicial temper. And if he does not stint his enthusiasm for what is in itself lovely because what is repulsive may be found hard by, we may remind small ermine-robed judges of literature of certain words uttered by the most illuminating of critics, Goethe—"I am more and more convinced"—the translation is that of Blackie—"that whenever one has to vent an opinion on the actions or on the writings of others, unless this be done with a certain one-sided enthusiasm, or from a loving interest in the person and the work, the result is hardly worth gathering up. Sympathy and enjoyment in what we see is, in fact, the only reality, and from such reality, reality as a natural product follows. All else is vanity." The result to be gathered up from Mr. Swinburne's criticisms is always of the highest value; we can then, if we please, develop his brief words of condemnation to more full proportions, and strike that average between good and evil which results in a complete decision, or at least satisfies a temper that is timid in presence of what Goethe so highly esteems—"a certain one-sided enthusiasm."

Take, for instance, that most detestable of Elizabethan dramatists, Marston. He can write, declares Mr. Swinburne, in a style of the purest and noblest simplicity; he can make his characters converse in a language worthy of Sophocles. Mr. Swinburne is no more than just, and he can prove the truth of his assertion. But we find on the same page as clear-sighted a recognition of what makes Marston's writing often intolerable:—

> "A vehement and resolute desire to give weight to every line and emphasis to every phrase has too often misled him into such brakes and jungles of crabbed and convulsive bombast, of stiff and tortuous exuberance that the reader in struggling through some of the scenes and speeches feels as though he were compelled to push his way through a cactus hedge: the hot and heavy blossoms of rhetoric blaze and glare out of a thick-set fence of jagged barbarisms and exotic monstrosities of metaphor."

Nothing could be better said; Mr. Swinburne has felt the torture of Marston's style at its worst, and cries with the thorns still lacerating his sides.

The marvel, indeed, of Elizabethan drama is that poets who could write so divinely could in a moment write not only in so slovenly a fashion but often so laboriously ill. Admirable dramatists there are, not a few; good plays, setting aside many of Shakespeare's and a few of Jonson's, are rare indeed. Gold is not less gold because it is found in quartz; the eager miners delight in their hopeful operations; but you cannot expect a trader in literature to carry about in his baggage a ton of crushed quartz and wash-dirt; he seeks in his commerce of mind for the minted gold. The Elizabethan play sometimes deals with a revolting theme, ill-fitted for imaginative treatment; often it is of haphazard structure or of none; often it is faint in the outlining or monstrous in the conception of character; often it is unnatural in the treatment of motives at cardinal and critical points of the action; often its humour is fatiguing or subhuman; sometimes its pathos is mechanical, and you see the wires that move the puppets; often it tumbles into the mire of a base realism, often it mounts into the unbreathable air of incredible romance or pseudo-heroics; often its style has neither the accent of Christian, pagan or man. All this is true; and yet to the Elizabethan drama belong Hamlet, and Cordelia, and Imogen, the Duchess of Malfi, and Webster's White Devil.

Perhaps it has been noticed, but possibly not, that this "White Devil" serves as an interesting point of connection between Puritanism and the stage. In 1612 Webster's play was published in quarto. On March 7th, 1612, that eloquent minister of the Gospel, Thomas Adams, who loved quaint titles for his discourses, preached at Paul's Cross a sermon which was published under the name of "The White Devil, or the Hypocrite Uncased." It was he who in another sermon, with a singular title, "Mystical Bedlam," tells us that he had heard of "a Jew that would, for security of his lent money, have only assured to him a pound of his Christian debtor's living flesh." Adams's sermons are, indeed, better reading than many an Elizabethan play; the original "White Devil," he informs us, was Judas, and it was Martin Luther, as godfather, who gave him that name. It would be worth comparing sermon and play on the chance of Webster's having conveyed something from the Puritan preacher. This touches on a side of Webster's genius which is unnoticed by Mr. Swinburne—he was the most accomplished of mosaic-masters. No dramatist could so neatly pick up some little colored square from Florio's "Montaigne," or Sidney's "Arcadia," or Donne's verse, and insert it with precision in the right place of his own work of concentrated passion, now some exquisite image, now some scrap of sententious, perhaps cynical, wisdom, fitted for the lips of a Bosola or a Flamineo. The discovery of Webster as a mosaic master is especially due to that eminent scholar in Elizabethan drama—unrivalled in his own line of original and indefatigable research—Mr. Charles Crawford.

* "The Age of Shakespeare." By Algernon Charles Swinburne. Chatto & Windus. 6s. net.

EDWARD DOWDEN.

SIR SPENCER WALPOLE'S HISTORY.*

THE lamented death of Sir Spencer Walpole occurred when he had just completed, but before he had fully revised his "History of Modern England from the Battle of Waterloo to 1880." It is common to deprecate contemporary history; but in its favor we have the example of Thucydides, perhaps the greatest of all historians. Yet, even for the purpose of securing the bare facts, the advantages are not altogether on the side of the contemporary observer. Dr. Arnold remarks:—

> "For historical facts, properly so called, the value of a contemporary historian is often greatly overrated. No man sees the whole of his own times, any more than an officer in action sees the whole of the battle. . . . To this must be added the disadvantages which are generally recognised; the livelier state of passion to which a contemporary is liable, the veil hanging over many characters and over the cause of many actions, which only after ages will see removed."

From the usual blemishes of contemporary history Sir Spencer Walpole's dignified and reflective narrative is remarkably free. The reviewer well remembers being recommended by Sir William Harcourt to study closely Walpole's "History of England from 1815 to 1857" if he wished to master the two momentous chapters of English politics and finance that preceded and followed the establishment of representative democracy and Free Trade. The stately leisure which Sir Spencer Walpole enjoyed as Governor of the Isle of Man was well employed in searching and sifting, comparing, criticising, and digesting the baffling and unwieldy record in which modern history hides its disputed facts and conflicting opinions. His judgments of men are singularly fair, and his impressions of things are scrupulously accurate, as indeed any one who knew him might have predicted. Perhaps the fact that, while he held broad Liberal opinions, he came of a high Tory stock, may have helped to assuage the ferocity that is so often associated with the function of political criticism. Anyhow, we may certainly agree with Sir Alfred Lyall, the editor of these two volumes that:—

> "those who desire to read or refer to the annals of Great Britain's economical progress, or the course of Parliamentary legislation and administrative reforms, and to study the influence and inter-action of British politics upon Continental affairs, are likely to find no better or surer information and guidance than in the nine volumes that now cover the whole period between 1815 and 1880."

The two volumes under review traverse the ground between 1870 and 1880. At the commencement of this period Mr. Gladstone was at the height of his power and success. His reforming administration had carried out many of the measures to which it was pledged—notably in regard to Ireland, education and retrenchment—and, the Opposition being weak and home affairs quiet and prosperous, there seemed no reason why it should not continue a useful career and receive in due time from the country a new lease of power. But the paths of reform are always thorny, one section cries "Forward," and another section cries "Back." Sir Spencer Walpole says:—

> "At the moment at which moderate Liberals were beginning to complain that the pace was a little too fast, the group of men who sat below the gangway were declaring that Mr. Gladstone was guiding his Cabinet on the wrong side of the post. One set of men thought that the Government was doing too much; the other set, that much that the Government was doing was wrong."

Mr. Gladstone himself was becoming unpopular in his own (dockyard) constituency of Greenwich, several important members of his Cabinet were causing political difficulties, and the tactlessness of others, notably of Mr. Lowe, detracted from the popularity of the administration. Still the Government held on its reforming course and much important work continued to be done. It may be noted that four subjects, each of them still of pressing and immediate importance, contributed to wreck the great Gladstone Ministry. These were the general problem of Irish government, the Irish University question, the drink question, and the education question. Of these the second is at the present day the only one which holds out any prospect of a speedy and amicable settlement. The general Irish question probably did not do the Liberals at that time much harm; but the Irish University Bill was the occasion of their downfall, while a Temperance Bill with a time limit antagonised the licensed victuallers, who alleged, as we are told:—

> "that the existence of the Liberal Administration was inconsistent with the security of property."

That observation has a familiar ring. Lastly, the education policy of Mr. Forster, energetically defended and pushed along by the Prime Minister, cooled the zeal of the Nonconformists, and drove their ablest spokesman into opposition. The interesting points of constitutional procedure raised by Mr. Gladstone's action after his defeat on the Irish University Bill, and his reasons for determining upon a sudden dissolution are told with such brilliancy and insight in Lord Morley's "Life of Gladstone," that Sir Spencer Walpole's survey appears pale by comparison. Still, his reflections, as usual, are just and weighty.

If politics from 1870 to 1880 be regarded as a duel between Gladstone and Disraeli, the General Election of 1874 ended the first round with a complete victory for the latter. Disraeli had waited with wonderful patience until the fruit was quite ripe. Then he gathered it, and with a few exceptions the old Tories forgot their prejudices against the Jew in their admiration for the brilliant and successful party leader. For a couple of years after the General Election Mr. Gladstone's interest in politics seemed to be evaporating, although in his passages with Sir William Harcourt and others he showed that his eloquence and dialectical ability were unabated. The Bulgarian atrocities which drew him from his retirement and the long sequel of sensational events in the near and far East that produced the reaction against Disraeli's Imperialism are well related by the historian, and the account is of special interest for the analogy which it presents to the last chapter of Imperialist policy, and the still more decided reaction that followed the Boer War.

It seems but yesterday that the Beaconsfield triumph was eclipsed after a remarkably short interval by the Midlothian campaign, and Mr. Gladstone again became Prime Minister. As he remarks in his diary, the Queen, while he was forming his administration, said with some good-natured archness, that he would have to take the consequences of his speeches. His difficulty was not so much the keeping of the promises made in Scotland, as his failure to fulfil the sanguine expectations of his followers, who had expected a long era of peace, economy, and prosperity, but found their hopes frustrated on the one hand by declining trade, and on the other by the Transvaal War, an unexpected recrudescence of the Irish difficulty in its most virulent form, and the Egyptian entanglement. But with the formation of Mr. Gladstone's second administration and the close of his splendid duel with Disraeli, Sir Spencer Walpole's history comes to an end. It will long remain the best account, owing to its superiority in authority, accuracy, balance, and sense of proportion, that has appeared of a great epoch in English history, and the services which Sir Spencer Walpole has rendered to the student of English progress, humanitarian, social, economic, and political, from the close of the Napoleonic War to the opening of the Home Rule controversy will long give him an honored place in the roll of our historians.

* "The History of Twenty-five Years, 1856-1880." By Sir Spencer Walpole, K.C.B. Vols. III., IV. Longmans. 21s. net.

MORAL INSTRUCTION AND TRAINING IN SCHOOLS.*

IT is difficult, unless one happens to be either a superman or one of the unemployed, to keep pace with Professor Sadler and assimilate as rapidly as he produces. At the beginning of the year he issued an exhaustive volume on "Continuation Schools in England and Elsewhere"; he now presents us

* "Moral Instruction and Training in Schools." Report of an International Inquiry. Edited by Prof. M. E. Sadler. In 2 vols. Longmans. 5s. each.

A SELECTION FROM

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S

AUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Belles Lettres, Biography, Art, etc.

MY AFRICAN JOURNEY. By the Right Hon. WINSTON CHURCHILL, M.P. Fully Illustrated. 5s. net.

THE PANMURE PAPERS. Edited by Sir GEORGE DOUGLAS, Bart., and Sir GEORGE DALHOUSIE RAMSAY, C.B. With Photogravure Portraits. Two Volumes. 24s. net.

EGYPT AND ITS MONUMENTS. By ROBERT HICHENS, Author of "The Garden of Allah." With Pictures in Colour by Jules Guerin and a number of Photographs. 20s. net.

THE BRONTËS: LIFE AND LETTERS. By CLEMENT SHORTER. Two Volumes. 24s. net.

IAN MACLAREN: THE LIFE OF THE REV. JOHN WATSON, D.D. By W. ROBERTSON NICOLL. 6s.

THE GIRLHOOD OF MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS. By JANE T. STODDART. 12s. net.

THE REFORMATION IN SCOTLAND: Its Causes, Characteristics, and Consequences. By D. HAY FLEMING, LL.D. 7s. 6d.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF GEORGE BANCROFT. By M. A. DE WOLFE HOWE. Illustrated. Two Volumes. 16s. net.

A SHORT HISTORY OF MEDIÆVAL PEOPLES. Part II., Italy and the Papacy and the Nations of Western Europe. By ROBINSON SOUTTAR, M.A., D.C.L. 12s.

THE LIFE OF BEETHOVEN. By ALICE M. DIEHL. With Photogravure Portrait. 10s. 6d. net.

OUT OF DOORS IN THE HOLY LAND. By HENRY VAN DYKE, D.D., LL.D. Illustrated. 6s. net.

THE WORLD I LIVE IN. By HELEN KELLER. Illustration. 3s. 6d. net.

TO THE TOP OF THE CONTINENT: Discovery, Exploration, and Adventure in Sub-Arctic Alaska. The first Ascent of Mount McKinley, 1903-1906. By FREDERICK A. COOKE, M.D. Illustration. 12s. net.

THE COMPLETE POEMS OF EMILY BRONTE. Edited by CLEMENT SHORTER, with an Introduction by W. ROBERTSON NICOLL. 6s.

THE READER'S LIBRARY. By W. J. DAWSON and CONINGSBY DAWSON. The first two volumes to be published this Autumn, entitled "The Great English Letter Writers." Vols. I. and II. 2s. 6d. net each.

Illustrated Art Books

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF THE TEMPEST. Illustrated with 40 Plates in Colour by EDMUND DULAC. Introduction by A. T. Quiller-Couch.
Edition de Luxe, £2 2s. net. Popular Edition 10s. 6d. net.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF TWELFTH NIGHT. Illustrated with 40 Plates in Colour By W. HEATH ROBINSON. Introduction by A. T. Quiller-Couch.
Edition de Luxe, £2 2s. net. Popular Edition 10s. 6d. net.

HUNTS WITH JORROCKS. From Handley Cross by ROBERT SURTEES. Illustrated in Colour by G. DENHOLM ARMOUR.
Edition de Luxe, £2 2s. net. Popular Edition, 10s. 6d. net.

MRS. WIGGS OF THE CABBAGE PATCH. By ALICE HEGAN RICE. With 24 Illustrations in Colour and 12 in Half-Tone by HAROLD COPPING.
Bound in Vellum, 10s. 6d. net. Popular Edition, 6s. net.

OLD CHRISTMAS. By WASHINGTON IRVING. With Illustrations in Crayon and Colour By CECIL ALDIN. Bound in Vellum, 10s. 6d. net. Popular Edition, 6s. net.

OLD LONDON CHURCHES. Illustrated by 25 Plates in Colour by ARTHUR GARRATT. The Text by the Rev. CANON BENHAM, D.D. And an Introduction by the Right Rev. the BISHOP OF LONDON. £2 2s. net.

Hodder & Stoughton's full Autumn List will be sent post free on Application with two bulky volumes on "Moral Instruction and Education," even more catholic and world-wide in their scope. These volumes, like their predecessor, are a fine monument of co-operative inquiry, carried out by trained investigators, under skilful direction. The first volume begins with the metaphysical basis of the problem, the growth of moral ideals, their connection with religion, their translation into actual conduct and life; and proceeds to a survey of the present state of moral training in all the many-faceted branches of our national system, the Public Schools, Protestant and Catholic, the Preparatory Schools, Girls' Schools, Training Colleges, Reformatories, Sunday Schools, Adult Schools, Public Elementary Schools. The second volume ranges with extensive view from the United States to France, from France to Japan, over all the countries in which moral training is effectively studied and carried out.

WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

The two countries which have made systematic provision for instruction in morals are Japan and France. It is significant that in both these countries the religious basis is wanting; Japan has no national religion; France has of set policy "laicised" her state schools and colleges. As to Japan, there can be no doubt that the system has produced a nation with a wonderful solidarity, and splendidly efficient in the arts of peace and war.

> "I certainly consider," says Baron Kikuchi, "that the courage and devotion of the Japanese soldiers during the late war was, to a great extent, the result of this systematic moral instruction and training in schools. . . . I think that by this organised moral teaching we have prevented a great melting away of principle; we were drifting, and seemed to be loosened from all solid ground of morality."

But two points need to be borne in mind in drawing inferences from the striking success of Japan. In the first place, the system was admittedly unsuccessful until the Imperial Rescript of 1890; this rescript has been the basis of all subsequent achievement, and the effectiveness of the system depends on that intense reverence and loyalty of the Japanese towards the Emperor, which lends to all he ordains the force of a religious sanction. Secondly, there is in the whole nation a tradition of filial piety, frugality, fidelity, and patriotism, which antedates all school instruction, and is beyond the power of any moral teaching syllabus to create, though such a syllabus may possibly articulate and enforce it. It is this tradition which gives the nation its remarkable cohesiveness. "In Japan," says Baron Kikuchi, "we talk of duty, of what we have to do, and we talk very little of rights."

The really vital part of this inquiry, however, is the report on France; on the issue in France depends the adoption or rejection of moral instruction in our own country. No less than six of the special investigators deal with the experience of France. Not one of them is able, after enquiry, to commend the French example. Mr. Harrold Johnson is clearly prepossessed in favor of the French system, and even the Catholic writer, the Rev. Edward Myers, shows no prejudice against it; but when one faces up to the question, "Has moral instruction put new fibre into the French nation?" the answer is in the negative, and the well-wishers of the system can only say, "It is a noble effort, but success is not yet."

> "Moral instruction," says Mr. Harrold Johnson (speaking of the boys), "appears to be the aim rather than the moral training—the enlightening of the intelligence in moral matters rather than the steady formation of habits and character. No child need leave the French public primary school in ignorance of the fundamental moral distinctions. And, so far, this is excellent. But one is not always so sure that he leaves with firmly imbedded moral principles, and with any considerable driving power towards good."

With regard to the girls things are somewhat better. Girls are more accessible and receptive, but even of them Miss Jourdain reports:—

> "It is difficult to trace any clear moral result except where, as in many of the écoles primaires supérieurés, there is an appeal not only to the reason, but to the will and the feeling of the child."

The reason is not far to seek, nor is it complex. There is no ultimate sanction, no point d'appui. The idea of God and a future life was retained in the syllabus, but not as the basis of instruction; it is a mere parenthesis, and resented by many teachers. In place of it most teachers at first adopted the categorical imperative of Kant. Now the sociological theory of the evolutionists has taken its place, and the distinction between right and wrong is represented as a compromise in the conflict between egoism and altruism. This point of view, though it may satisfy the adult mind, is somewhat difficult of presentment to the young, and somewhat unsatisfactory in the conclusions to which it works out. Hence, we find, a high authority

> "advocates the teaching of Kant's categorical imperative; for, although he does not think that the postulates on which it rests can be demonstrated, he considers it to be admirably adapted to the intellectual dispositions of the pupils, who are not likely to suspect its insufficiency."

With such insincerity in fundamentals, no wonder results are dubious. Not thus is the life of a nation built up anew.

The weak point of these volumes is the summing up. The reports are excellent, but there is no unifying principle, there is no positive affirmation as the outcome. One might write on the fly-page of these volumes what was written in the old Bible:—

> "Semper in hoc libro quaerit sua dogmata quisque, > Inque hoc inveniet dogmata quisque sua."

None of the outstanding questions meet with any decisive answer. Is virtue a thing that can be taught? If so, can it be taught apart from the sanctions of religion and acts of common worship? Should it be placed in the hands of a specialised teacher, or can it be left to the ordinary practioner? Is the co-education of boys and girls a safeguard against the dangers of puberty, or does it enhance the danger of temptation? Is corporal punishment conducive to the highest discipline, or not? These questions remain altogether without answer, nor are they by this inquiry advanced any more nearly to solution than they were. The philosophic stone remains undiscovered. Education is a spiritual endeavour, and there is no formula for the workings of the spirit.

A REALISTIC STUDY.*

If we are to consider this exhaustive study of a musical student's life in Leipsic from any but an artistic standpoint, we may call it a remarkable work. Mr. Richardson is liberally endowed with that combination of mental gifts which goes to the making of an excellent novelist. He has observation, imagination, insight, intuition, clearness of vision, and powers of psychological analysis and of character-drawing. There are many passages—indeed, many pages—in his closely-packed and redundant chronicle of the hero, Maurice Guest's sensations and emotions which are admirable in their penetration. Both in conception and in expression, the study of the strange, feverish, and alluring heroine, Louise Dufrayer, whose insatiable thirst for love sucks up and consumes the moral and spiritual energy of the hapless Maurice, is an achievement. Nevertheless, the novel is, strictly speaking, most unsatisfactory as a work of art. Mr. Richardson is probably a young man, and it will be a thousand pities if his artistic sense should not develop his feeling for form—a feeling which at present is merely rudimentary. All art implies selection, and good art implies severe elimination of the material. In "Maurice Guest" there is practically no elimination and no selection, and we have never come across a modern novel in which the author's inability to leave out anything has so negatived his best effects. The curious thing in Mr. Richardson's case is that his artistic faculty for the mirroring of life should be so strikingly divorced from his perception of the relative value of what he is chronicling. With scientific impartiality he sets down, with such thoroughness, every detail that bears on his hero's experiences that we have a feeling as though some mental bioscope were at work, recording automatically everything within its field of vision. It is possibly the author's theory that a novel should be

* "Maurice Guest." By Henry Handel Richardson. Heinemann. 6s.

MACMILLAN'S EDUCATIONAL LIST.

A SCHOOL ARITHMETIC. By H. S. Hall, M.A., and F. H. Stevens, M.A.

Complete with Answers. 4s. 6d.; without Answers, 3s. 6d. Or in Two Parts—Part I., with Answers, 2s. 6d.; without Answers, 2s. Part II., with Answers, 2s. 6d.; without Answers, 2s. Answers, 1s. KEY, in preparation. This work follows closely the recommendations of the Mathematical Association.

A MODERN ARITHMETIC, with Graphic and Practical Exercises. By H. SYDNEY JONES, M.A. Parts I. and II., with or without Answers, 2s. 6d. each. Complete, with or without Answers, 4s. 6d.

PRACTICAL ARITHMETIC AND MENSURATION. By F. CASTLE, M.I.M.E. 2s.

THE ETON ALGEBRA. Part I. By PAUL SCOONES, M.A., and LEONARD TODD, M.A. 2s. 6d.
 Answers to Miscellaneous Examples sewed. 6d.

THE NEW ALGEBRA. By S. BARNARD, M.A., and J. M. CHILD, B.A., B.Sc.
Volume I., containing Parts I., II., and III. 2s. 6d.
Part I.—A generalised Arithmetic in which letters are employed to represent Natural Numbers and the idea of Algebraic Form is introduced.
Parts II. and III.—Zero and Negative Numbers and Fractions are considered. These two new classes of numbers are defined so that the expressions $a-b$ and a/b may always have a meaning.

MACMILLAN'S OROGRAPHICAL MAP OF EUROPE. Designed by B. B. DICKINSON, M.A. and A. W. ANDREWS, M.A. Cloth, mounted on rollers. 15s. Also Notes to same, limp cloth. 1s.

A LATIN READING BOOK: GOTHAM and other Stories, By REV. E. D. STONE. 1s. 6d.

DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH AND GERMAN LANGUAGES. By WILLIAM JAMES. Forty-first Edition, entirely Rewritten and greatly enlarged. German-English and English-German in one volume. 4s. 6d.

CAMBRIDGE LOCAL EXAMINATIONS, 1909.

RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE.

The Gospel according to St. Matthew. Greek Text. With Introduction and Notes by Rev. Canon SLOMAN, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Preliminary, Junior, and Senior.
The Acts of the Apostles. Greek Text. With Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 3s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.
The Acts of the Apostles. Authorised Version. With Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.
The Epistles to the Thessalonians. Greek Text. With Commentary. By Rev. G. MILLIGAN, D.D. 12s. [Senior.
The First Epistle to the Thessalonians. By C. J. VAUGHAN, D.D. 1s. 6d. [Senior.
The First Epistle to the Thessalonians. Analysis and Notes. By Rev G. W. GARROD, B.A. 2s. 6d. net. [Senior.
The Second Epistle to the Thessalonians. Analysis and Notes. By Rev. G. W. GARROD, B.A. 2s. 6d. net. [Senior.

ENGLISH.

Lamb.—Tales from Shakespeare. Edited by Rev. A. AINGER, LL.D. Contains "A Midsummer Night's Dream," "The Winter's Tale," "Much Ado About Nothing," "Macbeth," "The Comedy of Errors," "Othello," 2s. 6d. net. [Preliminary.
Shakespeare.—Julius Cæsar. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DEIGHTON. 1s. 9d. [Junior and Senior.
—— Julius Cæsar. Eversley Edition. With Notes. 1s. [Junior and Senior.
—— Julius Cæsar. (Text only.) Sewed 6d. [Junior and Senior.
—— Richard II. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DEIGHTON. With an Appendix. 1s. 9d. [Senior.
—— Richard II. Eversley Edition. With Notes 1s. [Senior.
Scott.—A Legend of Montrose. 2s. net. [Junior.
Spenser.—The Fairie Queen. Book I. With Introduction and Notes. By H. M. PERCIVAL, M.A. 3s. [Senior.
Tennyson.—Geraint and Enid and the Marriage of Geraint. With Introduction and Notes. By G. C. MACAULAY, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Senior.
—— Gareth and Lynette, With Introduction and Notes. By G. C. MACAULAY, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Senior.
—— Tennyson for the Young. Edited by Rev. A. AINGER, LL.D. 1s. net. [Preliminary.
Bacon.—Essays. With Introduction and Notes. By F. G. SELBY, M.A. 3s. [Senior.

ENGLISH—continued.

Gibbon.—The Age of the Antonines. The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. By E. GIBBON. Chaps. 1-3. Edited by J. H. FOWLER, M.A. 1s. [Senior.

LATIN AND GREEK.

Cæsar.—The Invasion of Britain. By W. WELCH, M.A., and Rev. C. G. DUFFIELD, M.A. Selections from Books IV. and V., adapted for Beginners. With Exercises. 1s. 6d. [Preliminary.
—— De Bello Gallico. Book IV. With Notes and Vocabulary. By C. BRYANS, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Junior.
—— De Bello Gallico. Book V. With Notes and Vocabulary. By C. COLBECK, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Junior.
Virgil.—Aeneid. Book XI. With Notes and Vocabulary. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.
Livy.—Book XXII. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. W. W. CAPES, M.A., and J. E. MELHUISH, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Senior.
—— Books XXI. and XXII, Edited by Rev. W. W. Capes, M.A. 4s. 6d. [Senior.
Cicero.—Pro Milone. Edited by F. H. COLSON, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Senior.
Xenophon.—Anabasis. Book II. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Junior.
Sophocles.—Antigone. Edited by Rev. M. A. BAYFIELD, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.
Herodotus.—Book VI. Edited by Prof. J. STRACHAN, M.A. 3s. 6d. [Senior.
Plato.—Euthyphro, Apology, Crito, and Phaedo. Translated by F. J. CHURCH, M.A. 2s. 6d. net. [Senior.
Plato.—Crito (Phaedo.) Edited by Prof. C. H. KEENE, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Senior.
—— Euthyphro (and Menexeus,) With Introduction and Notes by C. E. GRAVES, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Senior.
Homer.—Iliad. Books I.-XII. Edited by W. LEAF, Litt.D., and Rev. M. A. BAYFIELD, M.A. 6s. [Senior.

FRENCH AND GERMAN.

Molière.—Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme. Edited by L. M. MORIARTY, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Senior.
—— Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme. Edited by DR. BRAUNHOLTZ, M.A. Ph.D. [In the Press. Senior.
Schiller.—Die Jungfrau von Orleans. Edited by JOSEPH GOSTWICK. 2s. 6d. [Senior.
—— Die Jungfrau von Orleans. Edited by W. HUMPHREYS. 3s. 6d. [Senior.

OXFORD LOCAL EXAMINATIONS, 1909.

RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE.

The Gospel according to St. Matthew. Greek Text. With Introduction and Notes. By Rev. Canon SLOWMAN, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.
The Acts of the Apostles. Greek Text. With Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 3s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.
The Acts of the Apostles. Authorised Version. With Notes. By T. E. PAGE, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Preliminary, Junior, and Senior.
The Epistles to the Thessalonians. Greek Text. With Commentary. By Rev. G. MILLIGAN, D.D. 12s. [Senior.
The First Epistle to the Thessalonians. By C. J. VAUGHAN, D.D. 1s. 6d. [Senior.
The First Epistle to the Thessalonians. Analysis and Notes. By Rev. G. W. GARROD, B.A. 2s. 6d. net. [Senior.
The Second Epistle to the Thessalonians. Analysis and Notes. By Rev. G. W. GARROD, B.A. 2s. 6d. net. [Senior.

ENGLISH.

Keary.—Heros of Asgard. 2s. 6d. [Preliminary.
Macaulay.—Lays of Ancient Rome. With Introduction and Notes. By W. T. WEBB, M.A. 1s. 9d. [Preliminary.
Scott.—The Talisman. With Introduction and Notes, 2s. 6d. [Preliminary.
Shakespeare.—The Tempest. With introduction and Notes. By K. DEIGHTON. With an Appendix. 1s. 9d. [Junior and Senior.
—— The Tempest. Eversley Edition. With Notes, 1s. [Junior and Senior.
—— The Tempest. (Text only.) 6d. [Junior and Senior.
—— Henry V. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DEIGHTON. 1s. 9d. [Junior and Senior.
—— Henry V. Eversley Edition. With Notes. 1s. [Junior and Senior.
—— Macbeth. With Introduction and Notes. By K. DEIGHTON. With an Appendix. 1s. 9d. [Junior.
—— Macbeth. Eversley Edition. With Notes. 1s. [Junior.
—— Macbeth. (Text only.) Sewed, 6d. [Junior.
Scott.—Quentin Durward. With Introduction and Notes. 2s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.
—— The Lay of the Last Minstrel. With Introduction and Notes. By G. H. STUART, M.A., and E. H. ELLIOT, B.A. 2s. [Junior.
—— The Lay of the Last Minstrel. Edited by F. T. PALGRAVE. 1s. [Junior.

ENGLISH—continued.

Tennyson's Select Poems. With Introduction and Notes. By H. B. GEORGE, M.A., and W. H. HADOW, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Preliminary, Junior, and Senior.
Burke.—Thoughts on the Cause of the Present Discontents. With Introduction and Notes. By F. G. SELBY, C.I.E., M.A. 2s. 6d. Junior and Senior.
More.—Utopia. With Introduction and Notes. By H. B. COTTERILL, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Senior.
Chaucer.—The Prologue. With Introduction and Notes. By A. W. POLLARD, M.A. 1s. 9d. [Senior.

LATIN AND GREEK.

Cæsar.—The Gallic War. Edited by Rev. JOHN BOND, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 4s. 6d. [Senior.
—— Gallic War. Books II. and III. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. W. G. RUTHERFORD, LL.D. 1s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.
—— Gallic War. Book IV. With Notes and Vocabulary. By C. BRYANS, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Senior.
Virgil.—Aeneid. Book III. With Notes and Vocabulary. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.
—— Aeneid. Book IV. With Notes and Vocabulary. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Senior.
Livy.—Book XXII, By W. W. CAPES, M.A., and J. E. MELHUISH, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Senior.
—— Books XXI. and XXII, Edited by Rev. W. W. CAPES, M.A. 4s. 6d [Senior.
Horace,—Odes. Books III. and IV. With Notes and Vocabulary. By T. E. PAGE, M.A. Elementary Classics. 1s. 6d. each. Classical Series. 2s. each. [Senior.
Xenophon.—Anabasis. Book III. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. G. H. NALL, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Junior and Senior.
—— Anabasis. Book IV. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. E. D. STONE, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Senior.
Euripides.—Hecuba. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. J. Bond, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Senior.
Plato.—Apology. Edited by H. WILLIAMSON, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Senior.
—— Crito. Edited by C. H. KEENE, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Senior.
Aeschylus.—Prometheus Vinctus. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Rev. H. M. STEPHENSON, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Senior.
—— Prometheus Vinctus. Edited by E. E. SIKES, M.A., and St. J. B. W. WILLSON, M.A. 2s. 6d. [Senior.

MACMILLAN and CO., Ltd., St. Martin's Street, London, W.C.

exhaustive, and that its subject should be unrolled before us with undeviating thoroughness and calm breadth of treatment, so that, at the end, we may see the whole lie of the land. But it is only the giants who succeed in this, and truth of observation is no artistic end in itself. In any case, in "Maurice Guest" we cannot see the wood for the trees, and were one half of the subject matter to be excised the value of the remaining half would be doubled.

It is easy to recognise that the ineffectiveness of this artistic scheme of "Maurice Guest" has sprung from the author's effort to solder on to his realistic picture of student life in Leipsic a subject that has come out of it, one that needs detachment and separate treatment. Louise Dufrayer, this neurotic incarnation of feminine passion, is a striking creation, faithfully observed and sympathetically treated: while Maurice Guest the puritanic and strenuous young Englishman who is preyed on by his own passion for her, and is drained of his mental and moral energy, is portrayed with even fuller knowledge. The middle stages of this love tragedy are ingeniously constructed, but Maurice's self-abandonment in his love, jealousy, and suicide, have not the inevitability of Louise's infatuation for Schilsky, the violinist, and her desertion by this spoiled and insolent blackguard of genius. It is, however, quite natural that in Louise's fever of misery she should have yielded to Maurice's devotion and tenderness. And given their intercourse at this stage, it seems inevitable that the excessive demands of Louise's morbid and egotistic passion upon Maurice's cautious and precise character, should work out in mutual misunderstanding, bitter recrimination, jealousy and hate. And yet, in these latter stages we are left only half believing in the reality of Maurice's tortures, and more than sceptical as to his fits of brutality, despair, and final suicide. Is it that there are two Maurices? the first the quiet chronicler and mouthpiece of Leipzic musical life, and the second an imaginary character, the virtuous hero destined by Mr. Richardson for the altar of his tragedy?

Anyway, this subject, the love contact and clash between a man and a woman so radically unsuited by temperament as are Maurice and Louise, should have held nearly the whole stage, and their Leipzic environment should have served merely as background and atmosphere to the story. Or, on the other hand, the author might have confined himself to his clever, though exhaustive, realistic picture of Leipsic student manners and morals. There is a complete novel in the wide variety of scenes, and in the social relations of the English, German, and American types sketched; the great teacher Schwartz's relations to his class pupils; the episode between Maurice and the American family, the Cayhills; the fluffy little Ephie's betrayal by Schilsky; the affairs of the cynical Krafft with Avery Hill; Dove's successful career and unsuccessful love affairs; Madeleine's feeling and friendship for the unlucky Maurice—all these clever sketches, which now smother the main theme, would have made a capital novel of manners.

Mr. Richardson has, however, set himself to write an exhaustive general chronicle regardless of form, and as indifferent to the structure and balance of his whole effect as were Richardson and Fielding. It is the English tradition in novel-writing to throw a heap of material at the reader, and say, "Take it; it is life." A great genius, such as Tolstoy, can afford to do this, because not only is his breadth of canvas immense, but the intimacy of his touch is exquisitely delicate. We are held by every page, because we always see new mysteries of life and nature evolving before our eyes. But Mr. Richardson writes with a minute brush, his effects are on a restricted scale, and he takes a quarter of a million words to deal with a single year of his hero's life at Leipsic! His gift is undeniable, but he has one thing to take to heart—the old truism that in art the half is greater than the whole.

SCHOOL BOOKS.*

Some seven or eight years ago there was a boom in elementary, especially in Latin and Greek, school books. Publishers vied with each other in running series, not differing in essential characteristics, and involving much duplication of labor. Some of these volumes showed that the editors had long studied their authors, and were glad of the chance to explain their views on disputed passages, and on the qualities of the classic with whom they dealt. More often it was evident that the work had been undertaken to order, and the editor was wholly dependent upon the work of his predecessors. Of this kind of book the flow seems almost to have ceased, and our list contains only one superfluous edition. There are many editions of the books of the Aeneid, and that which we have to notice differs from them only in its numerous errors and inaccuracies, not the least of which is a misquotation of Horace, which will not even scan. The cause of the classics is not helped by work of this stamp. It would be better to fall back upon the usage of the most famous of English schoolmasters. Busby gave his boys only a plain text, and for elementary use the plain text under the guidance of Dr. Rouse and others tends to reappear. It is not always the learner only who profits, for there are teachers also in whom the presence of notes fosters a slovenly habit of mind. Such a teacher should be restricted to books like Dr. Rouse's excellent Greek Reader.

Superfluity is not confined to editions of the classic authors. Elementary Latin readers and exercise books have been poured out by the dozens. Many a man whose time and thought has been given to teaching Latin to beginners, comes to believe that his own method is the best, and wishes to present it to others. But he should not rush into print until he has got a sounder and wider knowledge of the tongue than can reasonably be demanded of every elementary teacher. Thus Mr. Asman has compiled a volume which is not devoid of good points, but which in various ways shows the scholar that its author lives from hand to mouth. For instance, the preface tells us that "naturally long vowels are marked throughout the book," but they are never so marked when one of them is followed by two consonants. It would be unkind to draw the full inference from this inconsistency. It may, however, be well to remind any would-be writer of such an elementary volume that there is no call for haste, that there are many like books already in the field, and that his own will be the better if to his skill in teaching the beginner he waits to add a scholarly acquaintance with the Latin tongue. Against a new Latin Grammar the charge of super-

---

* "A Greek Reader." By W. H. D. Rouse. (Blackie. 2s. 6d. net.

"Virgil's Aeneid." Book X. By H. B. Widdows. (Dent. 1s. 4d.)

"A Junior Latin Prose." By H. N. Asman. (Methuen. 2s. 6d.)

"A School Latin Grammar." By H. G. Ford. (Methuen. 2s. 6d.)

"Cicero in Catilinam." I.-IV. By J. F. Stout. (Clive. 2s. 6d.)

"Historical Geography on a Regional Basis: The British Isles." By E. W. Dann. (Dent. 2s. 6d.)

"Regional Geography: Asia." By J. B. Reynolds. (Black. 2s.)

"An Historical Geography of the British Colonies." Vol. V. Canada. Part II. By H. E. Egerton. (Clarendon Press. 4s. 6d.)

"To-day in Greater Britain." By W. B. Thomas; and "The Face of England." By A. K. Collett. (Alston Rivers. 1s. net.)

"Knölle's "Wars with the Turks," Commine's "Warwick the King Maker," Froissart's "Reign of Richard II." (Blackie. 6d. each.

Cavendish's "Life of Wolseley." "A Book of Poetry illustrative of English History," Hawthorne's "Wonder Book." (Macmillan. 1s. each.)

"Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice." By S. E. Goggin. (Clive. 2s.)

"Dramatic Scenes from History." By F. Johnson. (Arnold. 1s. 6d.)

"Black's Literary Readers.' Book III. By J. Finnemore. (Black. 1s. 4d.)

"More's Utopia." Ralphe Robynson's Translation. By A. J. Grieve. (Dent. 1s. 4d.)

"Readings in English History from Original Sources." By R. B. Morgan and E. J. Balley. (Blackie. 2s. 6d.)

"English History from Original Sources, 1216-1307." By N. L. Frazer. (Black. 2s. 6d.)

"Sea Kings of Britain: Hawkins to Blake." By G. A. R. Callender. (Longmans. 2s. 6d.)

"A Plant Book for Schools." By O. V. Darbishire. (Black. 2s. 6d.)

"Elementary Botany." By M. A. Liversidge. (Blackie.)

"The Sounds of English." By Henry Sweet. (Clarendon Press. 2s. 6d.)

"Tros Semaines en France." By M. L. Chouville. (Clarendon Press. 1s.)

"First Novel" Competition.

Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN has the pleasure of announcing that his "First Novel" Competition has been won by Mr. Rupert Lorraine, and that the successful Novel, entitled 'The Woman and the Sword,' will be published on September 28.

London: 1, Adelphi Terrace,
September 26, 1908.

SEVEN SPLENDID SINNERS.

By W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 39 other Illustrations. 15s. net.

Contents.—I. The Duchesse de Châteauroux. II. Ehrengard Melusina von der Schulenburg, Duchess of Kendal. III. Catherine II., Empress of Russia. IV. Elizabeth Chudleigh, Duchess of Kingston. V. The Comtesse de Lamotte. VI. The Duchess de Polignac. VII. Lola Montez.

CONCERNING LAFCADIO HEARN

By G. M. GOULD, M.D. With 5 Illustrations. 8s. 6d. net.

"All readers of Dr. Gould's amazingly frank and arresting monograph will feel that the study of such a character is of very real interest to all who care to consider the wonderfully varying aspects of that illusive and sometimes impenetrable study, human character."—Daily Telegraph.

CULTS, CUSTOMS, AND SUPERSTITIONS OF INDIA.

Being a Revised and Enlarged Edition of "Indian Life, Religious and Social." By J. CAMPBELL OMAN, D.Lit. Illustrated. 14s. net.

"A highly important contribution to the vast and bewildering, yet fascinating, subject with which it deals."—Scotsman.

THE NUN ENSIGN.

Translated from the Original Spanish, with an Introduction and Notes by JAMES FITZMAURICE-KELLY, Fellow of the British Academy. Also "La Monja Alferez," a Play in the Original Spanish by D. JUAN PEREZ DE MONTALBAN. With Illustrations by DANIEL VIERGE, Illustrator of "Pablo de Segovia" and "Don Quixote." Large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

THURSDAY MORNINGS AT THE CITY TEMPLE.

By the Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL, M.A. 5s. net.

"'Thursday Mornings at the City Temple' is the ripest and richest fruit of Mr. Campbell's genius which has yet been published."—Sussex Daily News.

THE "CHATS" SERIES.

Practical Handbooks for Collectors.

CHATS ON OLD LACE AND NEEDLEWORK.

By Mrs. LOWES. With a Coloured Frontispiece and 70 other Illustrations. 5s. net.

CHATS ON ORIENTAL CHINA.

By J. F. BLACKER, Manager of the "London Opinion" Curio Club. With a Coloured Frontispiece and 70 other Illustrations. 5s. net.

CHATS ON OLD MINIATURES.

By J. J. FOSTER, F.S.A., Author of "British and Foreign Miniature Painters," &c. Copiously Illustrated with Examples from celebrated Collections. 5s. net.

Also a LARGE-PAPER EDITION. With 8 Illustrations in Coloured Collotype, and 116 Reproductions in Black and White. 10s. 6d. net.

NEW AND FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

Please send for a Copy of Mr. FISHER UNWIN'S NEW ANNOUNCEMENT LIST. Post free on application.

THE PRIZE NOVEL.

The Woman & the Sword.

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS, SEPTEMBER 28. Price 6s.

T. FISHER UNWIN.

THE CONFESSIONS OF A BEACHCOMBER.

Scenes and Incidents in the Career of an Unprofessional Beachcomber in Tropical Queensland. By E. J. BANFIELD. With a Map and 48 Illustrations. 15s. net.

"This wholly exceptional book. . . . It is a book which has been lived, and there are not over many books like that."
Daily Chronicle.

"A volume of high merit and singular interest."—Glasgow Herald.

BY DESERT WAYS TO BAGHDAD.

By LOUISA JEBB. With a Map and Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.

"Altogether the book is one of the brightest, if not the best written, things of Eastern travel that we have seen for many a day."—Daily Chronicle.

"A volume which is full of interest, and enlivened with personal sketches and incidents of travel in remote regions that are seldom visited."—Outlook.

WASHED BY FOUR SEAS.

By H. C. WOODS, F.R.G.S. With an Introduction by Sir MARTIN CONWAY. 66 Illustrations and a Map. 7s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Woods, who was formerly an officer in the Grenadier Guards, is to be congratulated on not merely a practical, but a vivid, book of travel."—Standard.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE.

By HENRY L. MENCKEN. 7s. 6d. net.

NIETZSCHE: His Life and Work.

By M. A. MUGGE, Ph.D. 10s. 6d. net.
[In Preparation.

THE HISTORY OF CO-OPERATION.

By GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE. Illustrated. Popular edition in 1 vol. 7s. 6d. net.

"No other historian could have given us the story of the progress of co-operation in the way that Mr. Holyoake has done."—Nation.

ANNIE BESANT.

An Autobiography. New Edition with a new Preface. Illustrated. 5s. net.

"It is a fascinating story; it deals with scenes and matters of vital interest to every man and woman."—Daily Chronicle.

AUGUSTUS.

The Life and Times of the Founder of the Roman Empire (B.C. 63—A.D. 14). By E. S. SHUCKBURGH, M.A. Illustrated. Cheap Edition. 3s. 6d. net. Uniform with Morley's "Life of Richard Cobden."

THE HISTORY OF THE AUSTRALIAN BUSHRANGERS.

By G. E. BOXALL. Second Impression. 5s. net

"A sensational but accurate and valuable history."—Evening Standard.

"M.A.B." (Mainly about Books.)

A Copy of the OCTOBER Issue will gladly be sent gratis to any reader of the NATION on receipt of a post card.

THE INTERNATIONAL.

A Review of the World's Progress.

OCTOBER NO. NOW READY.

1s. net.

Principal Contents.

A LETTER FROM COUNT TOLSTOY.

PROBLEMS OF THE TURKISH REVOLUTION.
By Christian Rakowski (Sofia).

THE SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVE QUESTION.
By Ralph Durand.

SOCIAL LIFE IN JAPAN.
By Sumi Myakawa (Tokyo).

THE IRISH NATIONAL REVIVAL
By V. St. Clair Mackenzie.

THE FUTURE OF THE RACE PROBLEM IN AMERICA.
By Alfred Holt Stone (Washington).

GERMAN SOCIAL INSURANCE.
By M. Zacher (Berlin).

THE ECONOMIC FUTURE OF CANADA.

T. FISHER UNWIN, London.

The ATHENÆUM says:

"In Mr. Unwin's valuable series 'The Story of the Nations,' 'The Roman Empire,' by H. Stuart Jones, will take its place as one of the best."

THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

B.C. 29—A.D. 476. By H. STUART JONES. With Maps and Illustrations. 5s. A New Volume in "The Story of the Nations."

NOTABLE FICTION.

THE WOMAN AND THE SWORD.

By RUPERT LORRAINE. 6s.

THE TEMPTING OF PAUL CHESTER.

By ALICE and CLAUDE ASKEW. 6s.

PATSY.

By H. DE VERE STACKPOOLE, Author of "The Blue Lagoon." 6s.

THE STEM OF THE CRIMSON DAHLIA.

By JAMES LOCKE. With Coloured Frontispiece. 6s.

THE PRINCE'S MARRIAGE.

By W. H. WILLIAMSON, Author of "The Traitor's Wife." 6s.

SYLVIA IN SOCIETY.

By Mrs. BLOUNT (Mrs. George Norman). With Coloured Frontispiece. 3s. 6d. net.

THAT GIRL.

By ETHEL TURNER. With 23 Illustrations. 6s.

F. C. G.'S FROISSART.

1903-1906. Told and Pictured by Sir F. CARRUTHERS GOULD. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

Also a FINE EDITION, limited to 50 copies and signed by the Author. 21s. net.

"ART TOY BOOKS."

Please write for a Copy of the Illustrated Catalogue of NEW ART TOY BOOKS. Sent post free to any address on application.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

fluity can hardly be brought, for the current volumes have different defects, and the ideal school grammar is yet to be written. In grammars, as in dictionaries, positive errors have a way of perpetuating themselves. In the recognised Latin lexicon false quantities are quite common, even when the wrong mark is refuted by the citations. False references are even more numerous, and call for a revision in which the authorities shall actually be consulted. We cannot say that Mr. Ford has kept every traditional error out of his grammar, but we note the disappearance of a fair number. In other points there is much to say for his work. The matter is arranged with a good sense of what is primarily necessary, and explanations have often been simplified. Mr. Ford recognises the facts that a beginner need not be cumbered with exceptions and rarities, and that his grammar should be brought into direct relation with his authors. The other grammar on our list is meant for beginners only. Of the kind of book which is meant for a special class we have an example in Mr. Stout's edition of the speeches against Catiline. It is designed for those with whom Latin is not a strong subject, and who have to get it up for an examination.

The study of geography has of late made considerable progress at Oxford and in our schools, a progress in some degree due to the devotion of Sir Clements Markham and the zeal of Mr. Mackinder. It has been said that every boy should begin his geography with the study of his own parish, its hills, its roads, and its brooks. Such a counsel of perfection is not likely to be generally followed, but in these days, when even the young go much about the country, it would be no bad course to begin with the British railways. To some extent Mr. Dann has followed this line, and he has missed no point which would enable a boy to start from something which he knows already. It is this fact which in the case of many schoolboys makes the study of geography a fascinating subject. When he has mastered the British Isles he can go with Mr. Reynolds in his well-illustrated volume to visit the wonders of Asia. Geography must lead on to history. Professor Egerton rightly describes his own excellent volume on Canada as a history which lays especial stress on geographical considerations. We have something even more modern in "The Citizen Books," which Messrs. Alston Rivers publish as guide-books to the present. "The Face of England" deals with the geography of our country as it now is, while "To-day in Greater Britain," gives an elementary, but not the less necessary, account of the King's dominions as they now are.

A fear has sometimes been expressed that the formal study of English literature in our schools might do no more in many cases than arouse a dislike for the subject. The fear is probably groundless except in the case of boys who will take care to dislike anything that takes the shape of a task. We have known even children in an elementary school to take an interest in Shakespeare and act parts of the plays with intelligence and spirit. Our list contains one play of Shakespeare's which has satisfactory annotations, but it is desirable that as far as possible a boy should not be troubled by notes to an English author. The selections from Froissart, Commines, Hawthorne, and others, which are on our list, are admirable except in one respect. This is their outward appearance which stamps them as school-books. They would make excellent books for a holiday task, but it is probable that they would be more attractive if the jam entirely concealed the powder. We remember as a child reading the folio of Knolles, which contains his history of the Wars with the Turks. We are not sure that we should have opened a duodecimo in a limp cover of a hue which proclaimed school. "The Readings in English History from Original Sources" are less obviously school-books, and the selections may well lead a learner to hunt out the complete volumes in his father's library. He will not be likely to find them all, but he will not be astounded, as we are, by this editor's statement that Gilbert Burnet "conducted the defence of Lord William Russell in his trial for the Rye House Plot affair." Mr. Frazer's like book covers a shorter period and is good. We must add a word of praise for Mr. Callender's "Sea Kings of Britain," which may well be taken for something other than a school book.

"A Plant Book for Schools," by Mr. Otto V. Darbishire, and "Elementary Botany," by Miss M. A. Liversidge, are two illustrated text books on botany, which should be useful to the novice in that science. The former aims at interesting young children without being impossible for their teachers; and its reading matter, which is simple, though not affectedly so, is supplemented by a few drawings and a collection of really fine photographic studies, grouped at the end of the volume. Miss Liversidge's book, which is written not merely for the lower forms in secondary schools, but is meant to cover the syllabus of work for the Oxford and Cambridge Locals, is necessarily a trifle "stiffer," but is full of sound information and instructive diagrams.

Published by the Clarendon Press, Mr. Henry Sweet's "The Sounds of English," serves as an introduction to the same authority's "Primer of Phonetics." Mr. Sweet is the University Reader in Phonetics, Oxford, and this little book is intended chiefly for the use of those who have to teach phonetics in connection with elocution and modern languages.

"Trois Semaines en France," a French Reader by M. L. Chouville, which Mr. D. L. Savory has edited, and Miss F. M. G. Batchelor supplemented by "Questions for Conversation and Grammatical Exercises," is intended for children of tender age. It is put into the form of a conversation between three young persons, travelling through Brittany and Normandy, and observing French life and history in those parts. Careful directions are given as to the way to make the instruction efficacious. The book is illustrated.

A general survey of the volumes before us, and many others which we have seen from time to time, leads us to the belief that there is a real improvement in the books which the schools put before boys and girls. We are not sure that the weakest point is not to be found in school editions of the Latin and Greek writers. There are, doubtless, many excellent works in this line, some of which are by no means likely to be superseded in our time. On the other hand, there are many in which little regard has been had to the learner's standard. The same book will contain notes, some of which are too elementary, and some too advanced for a middle form. We would suggest to editors that the first thing they should consider is the standard of those for whom they write. Without this much of their toil will be but labour lost.

MATHEMATICAL TEXT-BOOKS.*

(1) This very useful and comprehensive work is one of "The University Tutorial Series," which is almost a synonym for accuracy and thoroughness. It is written in accordance with the principles laid down by the Mathematical Association. Although departing from the order and the peculiar phraseology of the "Euclids" of the past generation, with their useless technicalities and mediæval flavour, the proofs and treatment are everywhere strictly logical. Both arithmetic and algebra are used throughout in illustration of the various propositions, and a large number of fundamental geometrical properties not contained in Euclid's text are given. The subjects of Ratio and Proportion and the relations of similar figures are made simple to the pupil by the use of algebraic notation. In this connection there is a very useful chapter on the nature of incommensurable quantities. The work contains a very large collection of exercises, as well as a treatment of harmonic ranges, centres of similitude, the method of inversion, and, in fact, everything required in a sound knowledge of geometry.

(2) This well-arranged little book is divided into three parts, which serve very well to mark three distinct stages

* (1) "Geometry: Theoretical and Practical." Part II. By W. P. Workman, M.A., B.Sc., and A. G. Cracknell, M.A., B.Sc. Clive. 2s.

(2) "Blackie's Elementary Modern Algebra." By R. C. Bridgett, M.A., B.Sc., F.C.S. Blackie. 1s. 6d.

(3) "Experimental Trigonometry." By R. C. Bridgett, M.A., B.Sc., F.C.S. Blackie. 1s.

(4) "The Elements of the Geometry of the Conic, with a Chapter on the Geometry of Certain Curves Occurring in Applied Mathematics." By G. B. Bryan, M.A., F.R.S., and R. H. Pinkerton, M.A. Dent. 3s. 6d.

(5) "A School Course in Physics. Light and Sound." With Answers. By F. C. Endecott, Science Master at Lutterworth Grammar School. Blackie. 2s. 6d.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.

THE OXFORD GEOGRAPHIES.

By A. J. HERBERTSON, M.A., Ph.D., Reader in Geography in the University of Oxford.

THE PRELIMINARY GEOGRAPHY.

Second Edition. 160 pages, with 72 Maps and Diagrams. 1s. 6d.

Preparatory Schools Review.—"Where a class-book of geography is first introduced, this should be the book. There is nothing else so good."

THE JUNIOR GEOGRAPHY.

Second Edition. 288 pages, with 166 Maps and Diagrams. 2s.

School World.—"Is good everywhere. The sketch maps are most interesting and most instructive."

THE SENIOR GEOGRAPHY.

Second Edition. 370 pages, with 117 Maps and Diagrams. 2s. 6d.

School World.—"The relation of cause and effect is continually insisted upon, and the lesson driven home by the frequent insertion of educative maps and plans and cross-sections."

OXFORD TREASURY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. By G. E. HADOW, Tutor in English Literature, Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford; and W. H. HADOW, Fellow of Worcester College, Oxford. Three Vols., 3s. 6d. each.

Vol. III.—Jacobean to Victorian.

Guardian.—"It would be difficult to name a more complete work of its kind even in the matter of selection, while the literary criticism is illuminating and original."

Previously Published.

Vol. I.—Old English to Jacobean. Second Edition.

Vol. II.—Growth of the Drama.

THE RENAISSANCE AND THE REFORMATION. A Text-book of European History, 1494-1610. By EMMELINE M. TANNER. History Mistress at Sherborne School for Girls. 3s. 6d.

[Immediately.

TROIS SEMAINES EN FRANCE.

An Illustrated Reader, with Questions for Conversation and Grammatical Exercises. By D. L. SAVORY, French Lecturer at Goldsmiths' College, University of London; and L. CHOUVILLE, B. ès L., Assistant-Master at the Perse School, Cambridge. Second Edition. 2s.

Journal of Education.—"The narrative is simple and natural. . . . The questionaire provides a searching test."

SELECTIONS FROM ERASMUS,

Principally from his Epistles. By P. S. ALLEN, Fellow of Merton College, Oxford; Editor of "Erasmi Epistolae." With Life of Erasmus, Five Illustrations, Notes, and Vocabulary of Special Words. 3s. 6d.; and on India paper, 4s.

Educational Times.—"A good selection with judicious notes."

SCENES FROM THE LIFE OF HANNIBAL. Selections from Livy. Edited, with Historical Introduction, Notes, Maps, Vocabularies and English Exercises. By W. D. LOWE. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY

Narrated for the most part from the Bible. By GEORGE CARTER. With Maps, 2s.

SCHOOL ALGEBRA.

By W. E. PATERSON. (20th Wrangler), Trinity College, Cambridge; Mathematical Master, Mercers' School, formerly Mathmetical Master, Christ College, Breckon, and Assistant Mathematical Lecturer, Owen's College, Manchester.

Part I (Immediately). With Answers, 2s. 6d. Without Answers, 2s.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE THEORY OF GROUPS OF FINITE ORDERS. By HAROLD HILTON, Lecturer in Mathematics at Bedford College, formerly Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and Assistant Mathemetical Lecturer at the University College, Bangor. 14s. net.

Athenæum.—"The student who is making a serious study of this branch of pure mathematics will find this text-book of great assistance."

TYPES OF FLORAL MECHANISM. Part I., Types II.-XII. (Jan. to April). With Diagrams and 39 Coloured Plates. By A. H. CHURCH. 21s. net.

School World.—"It would be difficult to conceive a work more useful, instructive, or inspiring. . . . In the school library and in the country house the work will truly be a thing of beauty and a joy to all who make use of it."

Select List of Educational Works, List of Books set for various Examinations and Complete Catalogue (144 pages) post free.

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, E.C.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

THE SERVICE OF THE STATE.

Four Lectures on the Political Teaching of T. H. Green. By J. H. MUIRHEAD, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Philosophy in the University of Birmingham. Demy 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"The lectures are throughout both thoughtful and stimulative of a high ideal of citizenship."—The Globe.

"It is of perennial interest to dive into the problems of how all that is best in the old system of Individualism can be preserved in the service of the newer spirit of Collectivism, and Mr. Muirhead's book is an excellent rock from which to take the interesting plunge."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"A short but remarkably suggestive sketch of a comprehensive view of a Christian State.....There are few topics in politics of grave interest on which he does not touch, and there is very little in all that he says which is not noteworthy."—Birmingham Post.

THE MILITARY MEMOIRS OF LIEUT.-GEN.

SIR JOSEPH THACKWELL,

G.C.B., K.H., Colonel 16th Lancers. Arranged from Diaries and Correspondence by Colonel H. C. WYLLY, C.B. With Portraits, Maps, and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

A MARINER OF ENGLAND.

An Account of the Career of William Richardson from Cabin-boy in the Merchant Service to Warrant Officer in the Royal Navy [1780 to 1817], Told in his own Words. Edited by Colonel SPENCER CHILDERS, R.E., C.B. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

FROM PLOUGHSHARE TO PARLIAMENT.

A Short Memoir of the Potters of Tadcaster. By GEORGINA MEINERTZHAGEN. With Portraits and other Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s. net.

REMINISCENCES OF A STONE-MASON.

By A WORKING MAN. Large crown 8vo, 6s. net. [Ready Next Week.

FROM RUWENZORI TO THE CONGO.

A Naturalist's Journey across Africa. By A. F. R. WOLLASTON. With Maps and numerous Illustrations, demy 8vo, 15s. net.

THE INNER LIFE OF THE UNITED STATES.

By Monsignor Count VAY DE VAYA AND LUSKOD, Author of "Empires and Emperors." Demy 8vo, 12s. net. [Ready Next Week.

PEARLS AND PARASITES.

A Series of Essays on Scientific Subjects. By A. E. SHIPLEY, M.A., Hon. D.Sc. (Princetown), F.R.S., Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge. With Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE HEREDITY OF ACQUIRED CHARACTERS IN PLANTS:

An Aspect of the True Darwinism based on Personal Observations and Experiments. By the Rev. Prof. GEORGE HENSLOW. With Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE LATINS IN THE LEVANT.

A History of Frankish Greece [1204 to 1566]. By WILLIAM MILLER. With Maps, medium 8vo, 21s. net. [Ready Next Week.

COLLECTIVISM.

A Study of some of the leading social questions of the day. By PAUL LEROY-BEAULIEU, Member of the Institute and Professor of the College of France. Abridged and translated by Sir ARTHUR CLAY, Bart. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Ready Next Week.

TWO NEW 6s. NOVELS.

MISS ESPERANCE AND MR. WYCHERLY.

By Mrs. L. ALLEN HARKER.

THE CHILDREN OF THE NILE.

By MARMADUKE PICKTHALL, Author of "Said the Fisherman," "The Myopes," &c.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

in the pupil's career. The first part ends with simple equations; the second is almost wholly devoted to the use of graphs on squared paper and the elementary use of co-ordinates, by means of which simultaneous simple equations are solved, the illustrations and problems for solution being very numerous; and the third part deals with fractions, square root, quadratics and their graphs, and a few other subjects. The order of treatment follows the recommendations of the Mathematical Association, and the work is in every way suitable for the teaching of algebra, even from the very beginning.

(3) To make Trigonometry easy to the beginner is a somewhat difficult task; but we think that the author succeeds very well in the attempt. The nature and properties of the trigonometrical functions of a single angle are well exhibited and impressed on the pupil's mind by causing him to make constructions for a large number of angles from numerical data; and these constructions are such as the youngest pupil who can use a compass and a scale can make with ease. By this same method of drawing he also learns how to find the height of a tree, the breadth of a river, and other things which are often unnecessarily postponed.

When we come to the functions of the sum or difference of two angles, the procedure is not so simple. Thus, to find the functions of an angle of 75 degrees from those of 30 degrees and 45 degrees, the process is merely a verification of results told to the pupil by the teacher; but when the pupil is asked to generalise the result for the sum of A and B, we think that too great a demand is made, and we are afraid that a resort must be had to stereotyped procedure. Still, whatever simplification is possible the author supplies, and his little book can be strongly recommended for beginners.

(4) The subject of Geometrical Conics is not usually regarded as an attractive one, and there appears to be little room for originality in it. Nevertheless, we think that this book has amply justified its publication. Not only are its proofs very simple and elegant, but it adopts the sound principle of keeping side by side the corresponding properties of the parabola, ellipse, and hyperbola—contrary to the general plan of discussing each conic in a separate chapter. The drawing of accurate figures of each of the curves is insisted upon, and very simple methods for doing so are explained. All the ordinary properties of the conics are deducted, and the systematic arrangement of the book is admirable. A most interesting feature is a chapter exhibiting all the important properties of such curves as the catenary, the cycloid, the logarithmetic curve, and certain spirals, which are of frequent use in mechanics and kinematics. Each chapter contains an ample collection of examples.

(5) This is not a treatise on Light and Sound, but a note-book containing blank pages to be filled in by the pupil from lectures or the work which he does day by day in the laboratory. The course of practical exercises of which the pupil has to write an account are, however, all specified, and numerous questions on the theory, exercises for constructions with regard to lenses, mirrors, &c., precede each blank page which the pupil has to fill.

The whole system of instruction indicated in these exercises is very extensive and both well and progressively arranged. How long such a book will continue clean and tidy in the hands of the average schoolboy we should be afraid to say; but for a teacher who supervises everything done by the boy the book has much value.

INTRODUCTORY HISTORY OF ENGLAND.*

Mr. Fletcher is not one of those historians who think it necessary to conceal their individual predilections, and readers of this volume must be prepared for some emphatic expressions of Protestant and Tory views. But there is an engaging frankness about Mr. Fletcher which disarms criticism, and provokes no more than a smile at his most extravagant outbursts. One is reminded of Carlyle's remark about himself and John Sterling to the effect that except in opinion they did not disagree; and when Mr. Fletcher denounces the "outcry against Greek . . . now again raised by ignorant and interested bigots" (p. 42), one imagines that he says a little more than he means. The late Professor Maitland was against compulsory Greek, but no one has a higher opinion of Maitland than Mr. Fletcher, and one feels sure that he does not consider him "an ignorant and interested bigot." In spite of Mr. Fletcher's Protestantism, no Catholic is treated so cavalierly as the opponent of compulsory Greek. He likes More, loathes Thomas Cromwell, to whom he is perhaps a little unfair, and is not unjust to Laud, although, of course, he does not sympathise with Laud's ambitions. The striking merits of the book are its freshness, its imagination, and its humour. We never read a text-book so utterly unlike the dreary and conventional type; one can read it out of sheer pleasure in the perusal. Mr. Fletcher, in fact, writes history not because he is obliged to, but because he likes it; he has a real touch of that imagination so lacking in the text-book, so essential in the historian; and his volume is based to no small extent upon contemporary literature, and not upon the works of moderns. Here is an example of Mr. Fletcher's method; he is contrasting Henry VIII.'s with Charles I.'s attitude towards Parliament:—

> "Could we imagine a dialogue on that subject in the Elysian fields between his burly shade and that of the refined and melancholy successor who died by the axe, we might in fancy hear Charles reproach Henry with having forged the instrument which, a century later, overturned the throne; but we can imagine the scorn with which the elder king would turn upon the younger, and ask him 'What hast thou done with the counter-instruments of prerogative and royal majesty which I also forged? When didst thou feel the pulse of thy people? Was I led by priests and bishops? Was I the slave of any of my numerous queens? Did I let my valets search my pockets at night for the memoranda of my most secret councils and then betray them to my enemies? Avaunt, animula, vagula, blandula!'"

We are not quite sure that the schoolboy, for whom Mr. Fletcher professes to write, would make much of the last apostrophe, but he would get a more vivid and correct impression of the question than in any other text-book. The social history of the period is most admirably illustrated in the romance of Tubney Manor. Ireland, perhaps, is treated too much from the conventional English standpoint; but the vigour and originality of Mr. Fletcher's treatment of nearly all other topics make his book the most interesting and readable short history of England published since J. R. Green's.

* "An Introductory History of England." By C. R. L. Fletcher, (sometime) Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. Vol. II., 1485-1660. Murray. 5s.

BIOLOGY AND POLITICS.*

Although it is now nearly half a century since the "Origin of Species" appeared, and although many measures adopted on quite other grounds are recommended by a smattering of "Darwinism," yet biological considerations have not begun to have any real influence upon the actions of statesmen or upon the opinions of those who are active in politics. Nevertheless, it is hard to resist the conclusion that no aspect of our institutions is so important, or so urgently in need of consideration, as their effect upon the biological quality of the race. This aspect is that considered by Mr. Chatterton-Hill; and although his practical recommendations appear to us for the most part unsupported by the facts to which he appeals, yet these facts are such as ought to be widely known, and such as no social reformer can safely ignore.

His book begins by a long account of the theory of heredity and natural selection, the main practical outcome of which is to show that, as Weissmann has urged, acquired characteristics cannot be inherited. This conclusion, however, is subject to an exception: such acquired characteristics as affect the germ-plasm will affect the offspring. Thus disease, or change of climate, though both acquired, may have effects which are inherited. The extent of this exception, we are given to understand, is inconsiderable; but it remains undetermined, and somewhat mitigates the rigidity of Weissmann's theories. Practically, however, we must presumably admit such facts as that an educated man's

* "Heredity and Selection in Sociology." By George Chatterton-Hill. Black. 12s. 6d. net.

French by the Direct Method

A FOUR-YEAR COURSE.

Based upon ROSSMANN & SCHMIDT'S Work, which is adopted by the Prussian Board of Education.
(2nd English Edition.)

The Series comprises the following Volumes.

Part I.	160 pp., many Illustrations, cloth	1/6
Part II.	176 pp., many Illustrations, cloth	1/8
Part III.	260 pp., many Illustrations, cloth	2/6
Part IV.	Livre d'Exercices, 296 pp., with many Illustrations, cloth	2/-
Livre de Lecture, an Illustrated History of France, French Literature, and Geography, by H. VIVIER. 160 pp., cloth		2/-
Grammaire Française, en Français by H. VIVIER. Cloth		1od.

This Series, expounding fully and faithfully the Direct Method, ensures:—

1. A thorough grounding in the Grammar that really matters—the Grammer "in being"; not obscure points of French Syntax of little or no value.

2. A strictly Systematic Course—a beginning, a continuation, and an end—the end of the Course leaving the English student sufficiently well equipped to continue his studies, just as the French student continues his—namely, by close application to French literature.

3. That Translation from English into French should come late in the Series, and properly so, the Essay replacing the Translation from English into French. The mind is thus nourished on French idiom in the earlier parts until a goodly store of such idiom has forewarned the pupil against the mongrel compound of French words and English idiom.

Please write for fuller details to—

London: T. C. & E. C. JACK, 16 Henrietta Street, W.C.; and Edinburgh.

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE

By L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

(Reprinted from "The Daily News.")

The publication of 100 POINTS for FREE TRADE day by day during the last few months in "The Daily News" has been followed with the keenest interest. These 100 Points are now issued in convenient pamphlet form (100 Pages). Free Traders all over the country have thus an opportunity of possessing in a handy form the material for an immediate answer to the fallacies of the Tariff Reformer.

100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE

PRICE ONE PENNY.

The price of this 100-page pamphlet, which is of a handy shape for the pocket, is 1d. for a single copy or 1½d. post free. A comprehensive index to the entire subject matter makes every item of information contained readily accessible.

We have arranged for special terms to be in force for large orders as follows:—

SPECIAL TERMS FOR QUANTITIES.
(Carriage Paid.)

2 dozen and upwards -	1d. each.
200 and upwards - -	1d. „ less 2½ per cent.
500 „ „ - -	1d. „ „ 5 „
1,000 „ „ - -	1d. „ „ 10 „

1d. 100 POINTS FOR FREE TRADE. 1d.

Applications to be made to THE MANAGER, Publications Dept., "The Daily News," Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

R.P.A. BOOKS,

NEW AND RECENT.

MODERN ENGLAND. A Record of Opinion and Action from the time of the French Revolution to the Present Day. By A. W. BENN, Author of "The History of English Rationalism in the Nineteenth Century," &c. 2 vols., large crown 8vo, xxvi-519 pp., cloth, 7s. net.

Contents of Vol. I.: Chapter I. Organised Anarchy. II. The Gods Arrive. III. The Epic of Nations. IV. The Liberal Odyssey. V. De Republica. VI. Prometheus Unbound. VII. The Churches and the World. VIII. Ideals and Realities. IX. The Master-Builders.

Contents of Vol. II.: Chapter X. The Pupils of Canning. XI. Light from the West. XII. Cosmic Economy. XIII. A Study in Explosives. XIV. Transfers of Power. XV. The Result of Literature and Science. XVI. The Empress of India's Grand Vizier. XVII. The Last Paladins. XVIII. Tangled Issues. XIX. The Eclipse of Genius.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE. By JOSEPH McCABE. With 2 Photogravure Portraits and 8 other Illustrations. 2 vols., medium 8vo, xviii-716 pp., cloth, gilt tops, 16s. net.

"It is a fine figure of a man which stands out from the pages of this well-written and interesting biography."—Daily Telegraph.

"A work of singular value and absorbing interest."—Daily News.

"Holyoake's long life brought him into relation with a vast number of earnest men. There is scarcely one honoured among reformers in the closing half of last century with whom he was not on more or less intimate terms. The whole army of advanced thinkers moves in long procession through the pages of his biography."—Westminster Gazette.

COURSES OF STUDY. By J. M. Robertson, M.P. New and Cheaper Edition, Revised and much enlarged. Large crown 8vo, 540 pp., cloth, 6s. net.

With a view to its re-issue Mr. Robertson has during the past year carefully revised this work, checking every reference, and adding over seven hundred books to those already included in the various Courses. He has also prepared, with the co-operation of a competent student, a new course on Geography.

THE FIRST EASTER DAWN: an Inquiry into the Evidence for the Resurrection of Jesus. By CHARLES T. GORHAM. Cloth, xii-320 pp., 4s. 6d.

"The book is well written, is marked by conscientious study, and takes a wide survey of the field."—Edinburgh Evening News.

"An impartial and clear-headed summing-up of evidence."—Scotsman.

BETWEEN BOY AND MAN. Being Lectures to Sixth-Form Boys. By QUILIBET. viii-149 pp., cloth 2s. net; paper cover, 1s. net.

Subjects: The Golden Rule—Home—Reading—Openness and Reserve—Sex—Individuality—Bores, Prigs, and the Seriousness of Things—Man's Place in the World of Nature—Your Place in the World of Men—Manliness—Choice of Profession—Money.

THE CHURCHES AND MODERN THOUGHT: an Inquiry into the Grounds of Unbelief and an Appeal for Candour. By P. VIVIAN. Cheaper Edition, in paper cover, 432 pp., 1s. net.

"Orthodox and heterodox, Socialist and Individualist, Churchgoer and outsider, all should get this clear, straight, constructive, critical work."—Christian Commonwealth.

THE ORIGINS OF RELIGION, and other Essays. By ANDREW LANG. (No. 34 R.P.A. Cheap Reprints Series.) 128 pp., paper cover 6d.; cloth, 1s.

TWELVE LECTURES AND ESSAYS. By Prof. T. H. HUXLEY, With Introductory Note by EDWARD CLODD. (No. 35 R.P.A. Cheap Reprints Series.) 128 pp., paper cover, 6d., cloth, 1s.

A Specimen Copy of "The Literary Guide" (16 large pages), with complete catalogue, will be sent free on receipt of post-card.

Agents for the Rationalist Press Association, Ltd.,

WATTS & CO.,

17, Johnson's-court, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

children do not inherit any greater intelligence than if their father had remain uneducated; and that, broadly, the stock is not improved except by some form of selection.

In his second part, on Social Pathology, the author accumulates his indictment against the institutions of Western Europe; and a very formidable indictment it is. Suicide and insanity are both increasing with alarming rapidity. But when we turn to the political deductions from these facts, our author shows, so it seems to us, a complete misconception of the problem. In a chapter headed "The Bankruptcy of Liberalism," he shows, as it is not difficult to do, that its two ideals of liberty and free competition are incompatible. Proceeding to Socialism, he contends that it aims at suppressing the struggle for existence, and that such suppression, by preventing the elimination of the unfit, must lower the biological quality of the race. He tells us also, of course, that Socialism postulates the natural goodness of man. He proceeds, like Mr. Kidd, to affirm that unaided reason can only prompt men to selfish actions, though he does not deign to give any grounds for this view. We want, therefore, some means of prompting men to actions contrary to reason, and this is to be found, for Europeans, in the Catholic faith, though Asiatics should be allowed to retain the religions they have.

Now in all this there seems to us to be an inadequate conception both of the problem and of its solution. The problem is this: Given that, nowadays, the more intelligent section of society is less prolific than the less intelligent, how shall we prevent this? To revert to medievalism is impossible; this proposal is virtually one for hastening the advent of those very evils which are to be feared if the present régime continues unchecked. But a real solution is possible on other lines. The birth-rate among the better sections of society has declined in recent years because of the voluntary limitation of families; and this in turn is due to the economic disadvantages of a large family. If these disadvantages were removed, the effect would cease with the cause. The problem then is essentially one of economic and social organisation. It is not possible for a civilised society to make progress by the destruction of the unfit, but by the opening up of every avenue of opportunity for those who are capable of taking their part in social life.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

The coast-line between the Foreland and Penzance certainly yields to no other in point of historical importance or of scenic variety. To a great extent the story of the south coast is the history of England; while one has only to think of the stark white cliffs of Dover, the low-lying, desolate expanse of Romney Marsh, and the red headlands of the Teignmouth district, to realise the geological changes that occur every few miles. Then there are many romances beneath the surface of what we see with the eyes. There is the romance of shipbuilding, associated with the records of Buckler's Hard and Portsmouth; the always entrancing romance of smuggling; the even more fascinating romance of the sea itself, of the sea which has governed the destinies of every port it has washed with its tides. It is perhaps of this remorseless and capricious sea that one thinks first in regarding the story of the coast. Take the "Eastward Drift" that caused the powerful little confederacy of seven townships, known under the name of the Cinque Ports, to crumble into impotence, by silting up the fairways of their havens until what had been water became dry land, and the flourishing seaport an inland village. This one example epitomises the mastery of the sea so far as the tale of the south coast ports is concerned. Nearly every port had its day of prosperity; that prosperity was constantly being transferred from one to the other; and, whatever might have been the minor causes, the determining cause was invariably the action of the sea's tides. So the constant rise and fall of the ports went on as inevitably and almost as rhythmically as the rise and fall of the tide itself. The south coast, therefore, with its storehouse of stirring memories, its physical picturesqueness and deep-down significance, assuredly deserved a historian who would treat it comprehensively, and Mr. Clive Holland's book ("From the North Foreland to Penzance" (Chatto & Windus, 12s. 6d. net.) is nothing if not comprehensive. Not less than thirty-six ports are treated in detail; neither does this number represent the mass of miscellaneous information he has gathered regarding the districts in which the ports are situated. The text is enlivened by anecdotes of smugglers, culled principally from Commander the Hon. H. N. Shore's "Smuggling Days and Smuggling Ways," and there are piquant touches—such as the American lady's description of Cowes as "a sort of Hurlingham by the sea, with a dash of Buckingham Palace garden-party thrown in to steady things"—that show the hand of the practised popular writer. Yet, in spite of its industry and skill, the book disappoints us a little. It lacks the personal touch that alone can endow a record of places visited with life; it is enthusiastic, but the enthusiasms, extended as they are to nearly every locality mentioned, are apt to read as if they were made to order. One feels that Mr. Holland, who is an imaginative writer of no mean merit, has allowed his imagination to be crushed beneath the burden of the ponderous tomes, local histories and so forth, that he has consulted; and the literary result is often that mere "guide-book information" which he disclaims any intention of giving. He convinces us that he has "read" his subject very thoroughly; but we are not persuaded that he has felt, as well as seen, the places he describes. The volume, however, in spite of this one unfortunate impression it conveys, is very readable, and is greatly helped by Mr. Maurice Randall's illustrations. These fresh studies of coast and harbor, sea and shipping, give the real open-air feeling, and their reproduction is a triumph in color work.

* * *

We usually think of a beachcomber as a worthless ruffian, who in some island of the Pacific lives partly by swindling the natives, and partly by what he can pick up from wrecks, sometimes caused by his own efforts. In his interesting "Confessions of a Beachcomber" (Unwin, 15s. net.) Mr. E. J. Banfield used the word in an entirely different sense. The book tells the experiences of a man who decided to leave civilisation and make trial of the simple life on a small island three or four miles off the coast of North Queensland. Dunk Island, as the place is called, is described by Mr. Banfield as a sort of tropical Garden of Eden. The climate is excellent, a very small emall exertion produces the necessaries of life, and the manners of the native population, together with the bird and animal life of the island, are enough to prevent the beachcomber, if he be of Mr. Banfield's temperament, from feeling any monotony. Mr. Banfield seems to have derived most of his entertainment from the birds. From his first settling on the island he made it an inflexible rule that no bird was to be killed, with the result that they increased rapidly in numbers, and after a time became quite indifferent to the presence of human beings. All the aspects of outdoor life are described in pleasant fashion, and so charming is the picture Mr. Banfield draws of his little island that the reader will be inclined to wish that he, too, could become a beachcomber. Possibly it is well for him that the wish cannot be gratified. Mr. Banfield frankly confesses that for his part he "sought isolation because of the lack of those qualities which make for dutiful citizenship, because of indifference to the ordinary enchantments of the kaleidoscopic world, not because of any lack of appreciation of the wisdom of the majority." He has at any rate written a book from which those of us who are still bound by civilisation may enjoy at second-hand the experiences of an existence apart from our ideals.

* * *

Dr. Arthur D. Peill, whose letters are now published under the title of "The Beloved Physician of Tsang Chou" (Headley Bros., 5s.), was head of the Medical Mission in Tsang Chou from 1899-1906. He first went to China in 1896, and spent three years at Hsiao Chang before he moved to the town where, with some few short intervals, he was destined to live the rest of his life. Dr. Peill has a good deal to tell us of the working-up of the Boxer rebellion of 1900, and his personal experiences, culminating in a rather narrow escape from a strongly disaffected centre,

Just Published. F'cap. 8vo. 1s. net.

DOGMA AND HISTORY.

By Professor Dr. GUSTAV KRÜGER, of Giessen.

Intended for those who have little acquaintance with the historical development of religious ideas, and especially for those who, while becoming ever more uncertain about the validity of Creeds and Dogmas, cannot see their way to true religion without them.

Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

WHOSE SON IS CHRIST?

TWO LECTURES ON PROGRESS IN RELIGION.

By Professor FRIEDRICH DELITZSCH, of Berlin (Author of "Babel and Bible").

The author holds that Protestantism, when possessed of a full consciousness of its sacred task of serving the truth, will free the life and the teaching of Jesus from the dross which has collected on both and threatened to smother them.

LONDON: PHILIP GREEN, 5, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

BOOK BARGAINS.—Garnier's English Landed Interest, 2 vols., 6s. 6d. (published 21s.) Cruikshank's 400 Humorous Illustrations, 4s. 6d. (published 16s.) Pepy's Diary, 4 vols., 15s. (published 30s.) Fennimore's Cooper's novels, 32 vols., 42s. Thackeray's complete works, 26 vols., 45s. (cost £4 12s.). Chaffer's Pottery and Porcelain, 28s. 6d. (cost 42s.). Art of Extempore Speaking, 2s. 6d. 100,000 books for sale and exchange. Menpe's World's Children, 8s. 6d. (cost 20s. net). Wood's Complete Natural History, 5 vols., 2,000 illustrations, 27s. 6d. (cost £2 12s. 6d.). Harmsworth's Encyclopædia, 8 vols., 25s. Please state wants. Catalogues free.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.

BIBLES

Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear, Revised, and other Editions.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY and can had free on application to the Manager.

THE LEGAL

Insurance Company Ltd.,

(WITH WHICH IS NOW MERGED THE PROFITS DEPARTMENT OF THE PROFITS AND INCOME INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED).

Capital, £1,000,000. Subscribed Capital, £500,000.

Trustees: The Hon. Mr. Justice Channell, The Hon. Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane, The Hon. Alfred E. Gathorne-Hardy.

Head Office: 231-232, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

FIRE: The Perfect System of Fire Insurance—Special Profit-Sharing Policy.

ACCIDENT: All Branches of Accident Insurance and General Contingency.

PROFITS: Loss of Net Profit and Standing Charges due to the interruption of Business by Fire or Boiler Explosion

Write for particulars. HENRY M. LOW General Manager.

THE

LEADING EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES

Try them. They are the finest imported, and can be obtained from all High-class Tobacconists, Stores, &c.

Wholesale depot—20, Cheapside, London, E.C.

Liver troubles

SHOULD NEVER BE NEGLECTED.

The principal duty of the Liver is to extract the bile from the blood, and carry it direct to the digestive organs. Therefore, if the Liver is disordered, it cannot perform its duties properly, and the result is, the blood becomes overloaded with bile, which causes Lassitude, Debility, Irritability, and may develop Dropsy.

MERIT'S (FAYRINE) Liverets

STRENGTHEN WHILE THEY RELIEVE

will speedily and permanently cure all liver troubles, because they thoroughly cleanse the Liver of all impurities, and stimulate it to easily perform its functions in a natural healthy manner. MERIT'S LIVERETS are prepared from purely vegetable ingredients only, as prescribed by a prominent physician, and have no debilitating effect upon the health. Price 1/1½ of all Chemists and Stores. If unable to obtain, will be sent post free by

MERIT & CO., 66, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.

CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the name MERIT'S LIVERETS, and the signature MERIT & Co., is on the package. So beware of spurious imitations.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

forms exciting reading. After an enforced sojourn at Wei-Hai-Wei, he was able to return to Tsang Chou, to superintend the opening of the Roberts Memorial Hospital, and to lead a "revival" among the Chinese Christians. A life of vast activity in the mission field was cut short at Kirin in Manchuria, the doctor being then only thirty-two years of age. The style of the letters, which have been edited by the deceased's father, is rugged from the literary standpoint; but they show sympathy with the Chinese characters, some few traces of humor, and a shrewd sense of the practical side of missionary work. Modern medicine, administred free of charge in a country where medical science has stood still, can be a most potent argument in favor of Christian dogma, and Dr. Peill appears to have had the faculty of using it tactfully and successfully.

* * *

THE marked increase in the number of three-cornered contests, together with the Prime Minister's announcement that a comprehensive Reform Bill will be introduced before the close of the present Parliament, has given an impetus to the study of electoral methods. "The Second Ballot," the latest pamphlet issued by the Proportional Representation Society, price one penny, is a clear exposition of the disadvantages of the second ballot, and includes an interesting table of the actual figures and results of eleven of the recent three-cornered contests, together with the results based on the supposition of the change effected by recourse to the second ballot in each case.

The Week in the City.

THE MOVEMENT OF LEADING STOCKS.

	Price Friday Morning, Sept. 18.	Price Friday Morning, Sept. 25.
Consols 2½ per cent.	85 9/16 ...	85 1/16
German 3 per cent.	83½ ...	84⅝
Union Pacific	167⅝ ...	161⅜
Canadian-Pacific...	176½ ...	176½
Peruvian Corp. Ord.	11⅜ ...	11

I WISH I could say that the outlook for trade and business showed definite signs of improvement, but this can hardly be said. At home the engineers' strike, which has caused so much misery and unemployment on the North-East Coast, has at last been settled by a compromise which might as well have been arrived at weeks ago. Some improvement is spoken of in building and shipping. But the long-dreaded cotton dispute in Lancashire has broken out, though the differences between the parties certainly did not warrant an industrial war. Perhaps we ought to be thankful that peace has reigned so long in the cotton trade, and there seems to be an idea among both masters and men that a short suspension may serve a useful purpose, as production for the time being has out-run consumption. Unfortunately the price of wheat keeps high, so that the demand for manufactures does not expand as it probably would do if the world's harvest had been sufficient to repair the deficiencies of last year. However, the prospects of the harvest in India, Argentina, and Australia are all so good, that we may fairly hope for cheaper food by the beginning of next year. Meanwhile, money keeps cheap, and there seems to be no fear of an autumn stringency this year. But the stock markets are less animated, and without any decided tendency, save for the continued relapse in Wall Street, for which readers of this column will have been quite prepared. The upward movement of the last few weeks has been largely artificial, or at any rate speculative, and was never justified by earnings or trade prospects. The slump of the last few days has been accentuated by the Foraker revelations, and the panic among the Republican managers.

THE ALBERTI FRAUDS.

There has been much talk in the City about the Alberti frauds, and all the suspects emphatically declare that they had nothing to do with the matter. Probably the heaviest losses have fallen upon Danish taxpayers and also on the Co-operative Society. There seems to have been a good deal of bad banking and foolish speculation in Denmark, and, indeed, throughout Scandinavia during the last year or two, and the difficulties have been enhanced by withdrawal of German capital and credit. London seems to have stepped into the gap, and has been taking a good deal more commercial paper from Norway, Sweden, and Denmark than used to be the case.

HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY.

The New York "Evening Post" has been examining the "Economist's" index number, with results that are rather interesting, and well worth bearing in mind when we are trying to forecast the future of trade.

On July 1st, 1897, average prices of commodities touched the lowest figure of our times; on July 1st, 1907, they touched the highest figure. The "Economist's" "index number" for the one date was 1,885; for the other, 2,601. The number for September 1st was 2,168, and a moment's comparison will reveal the extraordinary fact that in the fifteen months since June, last year, more than half of the average enhancement of values scored since 1897 has been cut off. This September figure showed reduction, in the forty-seven commodities from which it is compiled, of 14 per cent. from September, 1907, and of nearly 17 per cent. from the June maximum of that year, though it is still 15 per cent. above the minimum of 1897. Most people will doubt whether cost of living, to the average man, has declined as much as 17 per cent., and they will be right. "The average man, except where he is buying less in quantity, finds household expenses very close to what they were a year ago." But if this is so, then what becomes of the 14 per cent. decrease in the general average? The answer is, that prices have fallen where the average consumer purchases little, and have not fallen where he buys much. At present prices, iron is 21 per cent. below last September; tin is down 20 per cent.; copper 25 per cent. But these commodities do not figure largely in monthly household bills. Flour does, and is as high, or higher, than a year ago; meat is up, and probably the food bill as a whole is much the same as this time last year

GERMAN DEFICITS AND TAXES.

The German Government is gradually disclosing its disagreeable project of financial reform, and Herr Sydow, late telephone expert, and now Secretary to the Treasury has published in a monthly paper an official demand for additional revenue to the amount of twenty-five millions sterling a year. The amount is horrifying to taxpayers, but the German Bourse has put up German bonds a little on the ground that Herr Sydow emphasises the necessity for a real sinking fund by which the debt will be annually reduced. The "reforms," however, bristle with unpopularity—taxes on beer, tobacco, light and warmth for the poor, and increased estate duties for the rich, &c.—and it will be very surprising if a demand does not grow up that the Government shall forego a few millions of revenue rather than pile up taxation in a year of trade depression. Thus financial embarrassment may promote an Anglo-German understanding.

LUCELLUM.

SMOKED EVERYWHERE BY (NEARLY) EVERYBODY.

No. 1, Equestrians

PLAYER'S "NAVY" MIXTURE

"THE MIXTURE OF MATCHLESS MERIT."

Sold in Two Strengths

Medium 4½d. per oz.

Mild 5d. per oz.

JOHN PLAYER & SONS, Nottingham, will forward testing samples post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

0522

The Imperial Tobacco Company (of Great Britain and Ireland), Ltd.

ONE & ALL SEEDS

THE BRAND GUARANTEES ONE & ALL QUALITY.

ONE & ALL SEEDS are reliable, pure, and guaranteed.

Each packet is dated with the year of issue.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS are complete Manures.

All are supplied in small quantities at reasonable prices.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Choice Varieties of Sweet Peas, with an Original Pamphlet on their Culture, by Richard Dean, V.M.H.—viz., Dorothy Eckford, white; Hon. Mrs. Kenyon, yellow; Prima Donna, soft pink; King Edward VII., crimson; Miss Wilmott, rich deep orange pink; Mrs. Walter Wright, mauve; Prince of Wales, fine rose; Duchess of Westminster, violet purple; Othello, deep maroon; Lady Grisel Hamilton, pale lavender; Duke of Westminster, purple; Navy Blue.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Annuals.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Perennials and Biennials.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables for Saladings.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables.

One & All Collection of Choicest Asters in 10 Varieties—2s. 6d. Giant Comet, white; Giant Comet, The Bride, white; Giant Comet, rose; Giant Comet, azure blue; Giant Comet, dark violet; Mixed Dwarf Chrysanthemum; Finest Mixed Bouquet; Mixed Victoria; Mixed Paeony; Perfection; and Betteridge's Quilled in mixed colours.

One & All Fertiliser No. 24 for general garden purposes. Half-rod packets 6d. bags, 7 lbs., 2/3; 14 lbs., 3/6; 28 lbs., 5/9; 56 lbs., 10/6; 112 lbs., 20/- Carriage Paid.

ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, LIMITED. Name and address of nearest Local Agent, Illustrated Catalogues, and other details, sent free by post on application to EDWARD OWEN GREENING, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS

TANGYE

OIL ENGINE

AUTOMATIC TUBE IGNITION.

NO LAMP EXCEPT FOR STARTING

TANGYES LTD BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

HIGHEST QUALITY

TURKISH TOWELS

AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING. — Typewriting of every description high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education, Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.
Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

For copies of prospectus, with illustrations of the School Exhibit in the Franco-British Exhibition, apply to the Head-Master.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

NEW BOYS ARRIVE SEPTEMBER 17TH, OTHERS 18TH.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

CO-EDUCATION BY THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

Friends' School, Great Ayton in Cleveland, Yorkshire.

A Boarding School for Boys and Girls (9-16). Modern Education. Preparation for Exams. Unique health record. Ten acres Recreation Grounds, Gymnasium, Swimming Bath, Laboratories, Domestic Science School. 30 Guineas per annum. Apply to the Headmaster for Prospectus, etc.

The Abbey School, Beckenham.

FINE POSITION, SIXTEEN ACRES OF GROUNDS.
TEN MILES FROM LONDON.

Preparation for the best Public Schools. Write for List of Scholarships won last year.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.
(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

LINCOLNSHIRE COAST.

ESSENDON GIRLS' SCHOOL, SKEGNESS.

Headmistress, MISS PAGAN, M.A. Full Staff. L.R.A.M. Swedish Gymnastics. Higher Examinations. Tennis, Hockey, Swimming. Dry sunny climate. Bracing sea air. Exhibitions offered.

EDUCATIONAL.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

RESIDENCE FOR WOMEN STUDENTS,
18, ENDSLEIGH STREET, W.C.

Founded and carried on by Members of Society of Friends. Convenient for University College, Slade School, Women's Medical School, &c. Apply Principal.

HASLEMERE, SURREY.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD SCHOOL for GIRLS. Sandy soil; nine acres of ground; nearly 600 ft. above sea level.
Principals: Miss AMY KEMP, Camb. Certif. for Theory and Practice of Teaching (St. George's Training College, Edinburgh); Diploma for the Teaching of German (Berlin); and Miss HELEN T. NEILD, M.A. (Vict.), Classical Tripos (Camb.), Certificated Student of Girton College; 11 years at the Mount School, York.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,
R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London. E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR
CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.
By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information, and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.
"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.
"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.
"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

THE INDEX TO
VOLUME II. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS-URBANA
3 0112 119967666